That is quite a list, but most of the measures I have mentioned are I believe, noncontroversial and will not involve much in the way of discussion. It is nevertheless a lengthy bill of fare, and if we are to conclude the work of the session reasonably soon it will, I think be necessary, as I have said, for the whips of the different parties to meet together and see if they cannot arrange some general plan of organization that will help expedite the business.

Some hon. members have spoken about when we will begin morning sessions.

Mr. MacNICOL: And Wednesday evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And Wednesday evening, as my hon. friend says. I can see there is a disposition to expedite matters and a readiness to begin morning sessions fairly soon. However, I doubt if it would be wise to attempt the morning sessions until we conclude the debate on the budget. It has been customary not to begin morning sessions until the reports of the different committees have been made to the house, and I should hope that the reports of most committees might be in by the time the debate on the budget is concluded. If that should be so, then I think the government would be prepared, if the house is willing and so desires, to begin morning sessions about that time.

Hon. members will have seen that I have a notice on the order paper to take Wednesday evenings. I have learned, since having the notice inserted, that in some parts of the house there is the feeling that if we are to have morning, afternoon and evening sittings, we ought to have one evening in the middle of the week which we can call our own. If that is so, I shall not press the motion now on the order paper.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was only trying to help.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has referred to the programme of work for the remainder of the session, and the means for expediting it. If I understood him correctly he indicated that the work now on the order paper in the form of bills or resolutions should be proceeded with, that any work before the other chamber should be proceeded with, and that any work arising out of reports of committees should be proceeded with; and has read a dozen or more bills which are still to come before the house. From all that, on top of the budget and the estimates, it is apparent that we have a heavy programme of work still to complete, without adding anything more.

The Prime Minister has indicated further that if the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act is to be discontinued fifteen days after the next session, still another batch of legislation will have to come in at this session; and he has raised the question whether the house would agree to extending that measure from fifteen days to sixty days after the next session meets, in order to obviate the necessity of considering a large number of additional bills at this session. I believe I have stated correctly his summary of the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: I would say, speaking for this party, that in view of the heavy programme we now have before us it would be better to approve the amendment, rather than to have still another lot of legislation, some of which might be contentious, brought before us. But I do that on one condition, and that is that the house meet in January, not in March. If we meet in January instead of March, even with the extension of the Emergency Powers Act from fifteen days to sixty days after the time of opening of the next session, the bill would still terminate as early as under the present legislation. I gather that the Prime Minister, speaking for the government, is prepared to follow the suggestion he has made as to the date of opening the next session. That suggestion, I believe, meets with the wishes of this section of the house, and I should hope with those of other sections.

No further observations would seem necessary at this time. If the government wishes to hold consultations with respect to the means by which the work of the house can be expedited, we should be glad to sit in either with representatives of the government, or with the whips, or any other persons with authority to speak.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has outlined a heavy programme of legislation. I would say that if we are going to deal with it, following the ordinary process and giving the consideration which is usually given to legislation of this kind, we should not try to do it by forced marches—that is by sitting morning, noon and night—because we cannot do it properly in that way.

The other matter to which he referred was the extension of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act for about sixty days after the house meets. This party has not discussed that point, and I cannot speak for it with authority, although I believe we would be agreeable. I would point out, however, something which perhaps affects hon. members to my right more than it affects us. During the last four or five years, while the Prime Minister was passing these several thousand orders in council to which reference has been made, we were panning the government because it was legislating by order in council. Now we are willing to extend that power for some time longer in order to get home a little earlier. It does not look good to me. If it is wrong to legislate by order in council, then it is wrong to do it even though it would allow us to return to our homes a little earlier.

As to the matter of arranging the business of the house and trying to expedite it in some way, I believe I can say that this group will be ready to assist in that—and when we do, it will include all our members. There will not be any free lances who are not subject to the decisions arrived at.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What about the agreement last year with regard to closing? You had a lot of free lances then.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; we carried out our agreement. We were not the party which violated that agreement.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You were the first to do it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not at all. As to the matter of morning and Wednesday evening sittings, we shall have something to say about that when the proposals in respect thereto come before the house.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have little to add to what has already been said about the projected programme, except this, that I think it might be wise if the Prime Minister were to give consideration to having the Wednesday sittings extend to seven o'clock. This would give us four hours instead of three on that day, with the understanding that the members would not be called back for the remainder of the evening. In my opinion this extension would serve a useful purpose because on Wednesdays we do not get very much done in three hours. Anything we consider is, as a rule, something of an innocuous or unimportant nature. Four hours would give us a chance to do something more important on that day.

So far as the extension of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act is concerned, I believe I am speaking for this group when I say we would be prepared to support the Prime Minister's suggestion provided that the next session is called in the latter part of January. If it is to be called later than that, then of course the extension would not be wise.

We shall be prepared to work with the Prime Minister in having frequent discussions to see if it is not possible to arrive at decisions which will expedite the business as much as possible, consistent with care.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in giving the list of additional bills he forgot the promise made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) that legislation would be introduced respecting old age pensions. This promise was made on June 24 and will be found reported on page 2793 of Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to just look at the promise and then perhaps give my hon. friend a word in relation to it a little later.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is it the intention of the government to introduce a resolution based upon the recommendations of the special committee on standing orders for expediting the business of the house, made earlier this session and reported in Votes and Proceedings of April 10? Is the committee to sit again?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we are anxious to expedite the business of the house I imagine it would be advisable to go on with the legislative programme I announced this afternoon and leave the consideration of the report of the committee on the rules of the house until we see what progress we make with other things.

HOUSING

VETERANS—ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES—INVESTIGATION BY MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, based upon a report in this morning's press to the effect that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Montreal have exposed an alleged black market of homes built for war veterans in a government-approved Veterans Land Act project at Boucherville, across the St. Lawrence river and east of the city of Montreal. The article is headed, "Say Veterans Charged $4,000 Extra for Homes". Will the minister say what foundation there is for this report?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I received no notice of my hon. friend's question. I saw the report in the press this morning. May I inform the hon. member that I received notice in January, before I went west to Winnipeg, and in five minutes I directed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to have investigations made immediately. Their final report has not yet come in. If any impropriety is discovered, we shall promptly rest the matter with the courts for final disposition.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But the minister has had reports on it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have had suggestions of impropriety, but no final report.

WHEAT

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN BRITISH AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he inform the house as to the present standing of negotiations between the British and Canadian governments with respect to the sale of Canadian wheat?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In addition to the question of the leader of the opposition I have received a somewhat similar inquiry from the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). In reply I would say that I have nothing to add to the statement I made in the house a few days ago. There is nothing mysterious about the delay. Conversations have just been adjourned for the time being.

1943-44 WHEAT BOARD REPORT—QUESTION OF REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question, of which I sent him notice. Is it the intention of the government to refer the 1943-44 wheat board report to the agriculture committee of the house at this session?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No consideration has been given to referring the 1943-44 wheat board report to the agriculture committee, but I see no objection. I am perfectly agreeable to doing this if there is a general desire on the part of hon. members that it should be done. I am not just aware of the formula, but my understanding is that it can be done by any hon. member or members asking the chairman of the agriculture committee that it be done.

COAL

SHORT SUPPLY IN CENTRAL PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. I have not sent him notice, because I know he will be capable of answering it without notice. My question is based upon an interview I had last Saturday with one of the most prominent coal dealers in Toronto. He thoroughly alarmed me as to the serious outlook of obtaining coal for the city during the coming fall and winter. The minister has a thorough knowledge of the situation, and I wish he would reassure the house and the country that there will be ample chance of getting coal.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I regret that I cannot give a more optimistic report than I have given in the past. Shipping is returning to normal; the coal mining situation is normal at present and shipments are much improved. However, I should be a very bold man indeed if I predicted that there would be sufficient coal in any city in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec next winter to meet the full requirements for heating purposes. The government is doing its best to improve the situation. A little later in the session I shall give a more detailed report.

CANADIAN FORCES

TRANSPORTATION TO CANADA OF SERVICE PERSONNEL AND WIVES AND CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): For the purpose of bringing the house up to date on the matter I wonder if the Minister of National Defence could inform us approximately how many Canadian service men and women still remain overseas, and also approximately how many Canadian war brides and their children are awaiting transportation from the United Kingdom to Canada? Perhaps the minister could indicate when he expects this movement to be completed.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. As the house is aware, these figures change almost from day to day. As of June 30 there were approximately 11,500 army personnel and 2,400 air force personnel, or a total of approximately 13,900 still overseas. There were approximately 18,500 women and 5,200 children, or a total of approximately 23,700 still overseas. Our arrangements for shipping continue to be satisfactory. I cannot hazard a prophecy as to the exact date when they will all be returned, but it should be before the end of the year.

RECONSTRUCTION COUNCILS

INQUIRY AS TO TERMINATION OF ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Press dispatches in the last day or two have intimated that it is the intention of the government to do away with the regional reconstruction councils. Is the minister prepared to make a statement on this matter.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): It is the intention of the government to do away with the regional reconstruction councils. These councils were established to act as advisers to the government on matters affecting the transition from war to peace. They have served a very useful purpose indeed. They have given the government excellent advice on matters having to do with that transition. To-day the transition has largely been effected. Canada's private construction programme is heavier than was expected with the result that the work of the councils has declined to a point that does not justify continuing them indefinitely; therefore arrangements have been made to terminate their work at an early date.

Mr. GREEN: Did they not have the duty also of advising on research questions and other work of the kind.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. A representative of the research council was attached to each regional council, and this representative will be kept at work in the locality. The services of these representatives have been much in demand, and will not be withdrawn.

EMERGENCY POWERS

QUESTION OF CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON PROPOSED EXTENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): In view of the recent decision of the privy council with regard to a local option case in Ontario and the doubts cast on the power of parliament to pass legislation, and also in view of the fact that provincial rights under section 92 will be interfered with by the extension that is to be asked for and which was referred to to-day by the Prime Minister, may I ask if the provinces will be consulted in regard to this matter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am sorry but I cannot agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre as to the construction to be put upon the judgment of the privy council in the Canada Temperance Act case. I do not think it is necessary or desirable to consult the provinces on the extension of the emergency powers legislation for forty-five days when this parliament will be in session in 1947. If it appears that there are matters which should no longer be dealt with on the basis of a national emergency, I think the house will be prepared to trust the government to make the necessary repeals. In my view many of the matters referred to a few moments ago by the Prime Minister present an emergency situation and still require to be dealt with on a national basis. There are only one of two courses to adopt. We should ask parliament to provide by legislation at this session for the situation which may still exist after the fifteenth day after the opening of the next session, or we can wait until the next session to have a look at the situation then and ask parliament to deal with it at that time. I think parliament would probably be in a better position at that time to dispose of these matters than it would be if it attempted now to foresee what might be the requirements of the months of February and March, 1947.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that the reason for the extension?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the Minister of Labour in a position to report any progress in settlement of the dispute between the international typographical union and the Southam newspapers? May I ask in particular about the situation in Vancouver?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. Yesterday, at the request of Hon. George S. Pearson, Minister of Labour for British Columbia, I appointed an industrial disputes inquiry commission composed of Brigadier Sherwood Lett, K.C. as chairman, C. B. Delbridge, and R. K. Gervin, to deal with the dispute affecting the Vancouver Province division of the Southam Company Limited and the international typographical union.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

CLARIFICATION AND EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS AND BENEFITS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of bill No. 243, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 62, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill which was before the house went to the other place and has come back with several amendments. In section 2 there are two words which I think have been properly deleted. That is, after the word "both" the word "such" has been deleted. I think that adds strength to the section. In subsection 2, the word "shall" has been deleted and the words "may in his discretion" have been substituted therefor. That leaves it in the discretion of the magistrate to confiscate any gold that may be taken. On page 2, in line 5 of the bill, the word "evidence" has been substituted for "proof". On page 2, line 7, the words "has reason to suspect" have been deleted and "has reasonable and probable grounds for believing" have been substituted. That I think adds to the strength of the section. A similar amendment is made in line 8, where the words "has reason to believe that any person" have been inserted. The amended subsection 4 now reads:

Where any peace officer has reasonable and probable grounds for believing that any person has committed or has reason to believe that any person is about to commit an offence described in subsection one or has in his possession or in his belongings any gold . . .

And so forth.

The important amendment made by the senate deals with subsection 5, where the following is inserted:

No female shall be searched pursuant to this section except by a suitable woman who is a peace officer or is authorized by the peace officer to make the search.

That is in line with the practice. I think that these amendments should be concurred in.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have considered the amendments made by the senate to the bill as it passed this house, and I think that their general effect is to improve the bill; therefore they should be accepted. In that I agree with the minister.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

ENLARGEMENT OF PURPOSES FOR WHICH CREDITS MAY BE USED

The house resumed from Thursday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKinnon for the second reading of bill No. 126, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at eleven o'clock last night the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) suggested that I make a statement on the bill. I am glad to do that.

This bill is being presented as an amendment to the Export Credits Insurance Act for two main purposes: first, in order to extend the authority of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation so that it may offer to Canadian exporters insurance protection equivalent to that which can be obtained by exporters in foreign countries; second, to enlarge the purpose for which the credits granted to foreign governments or their agencies may be used.

The Export Credits Insurance Corporation has been set up under part I of the act to assist in the development and expansion of Canada's export trade by offering Canadian exporters insurance protection against the main risks of loss involved in foreign trade.

The main changes to part I which are being requested as a result of the experience which the corporation has gained during the first six months of its active operations, are as follows:

(a) To allow the corporation to insure an exporter against any risk of loss under an agreement for the export of goods as well as any risk of loss involved in the actual export of the goods. The original act authorized the corporation to insure an exporter only after the goods had been shipped, whereas it is desirable, in order to promote the increase of Canada's foreign trade, to insure exporters immediately they enter into contracts with foreign buyers:

(b) To allow the corporation to insure an exporter against all risks of loss involved in foreign trade arising from events which are beyond the control of the exporter, whereas the original act allowed the corporation to insure against certain specific risks only; and

(c) To allow the corporation to insure all goods which are exported from Canada, whether they be Canadian-produced goods or imported goods which are reexported. The reexport of goods forms a minor but integrated part of Canada's export trade.

These extensions of the insurance protection which should be offered by the corporation have been authorized under order in council P.C. 5845 of August 31, 1945, which order in council will, of course, be cancelled upon passage of this bill.

The amendments to part II of the act are designed chiefly to enlarge the purpose for which credits may be used and fall into three main classes.

(a) There are first the amendments designed to enable a credit to be used for the purpose of paying for Canadian services. Under the act as it now stands, a credit can only be used for the purpose of paying the cost of Canadian-produced goods. There has been a demand by some countries for Canadian shipping services, engineering services, etc. and it is considered that the act should be wide enough in terms to meet reasonable demands of this nature.

(b) The second class of amendments is designed to enable a foreign country to make the credit available to private importers in the country concerned. As the act now stands it is necessary for the foreign government itself or some agency of the foreign government to purchase goods directly from an exporter. It is considered to be most desirable that ordinary channels of trade be established as quickly as possible and that private importers in the various countries to which credits have been granted should get in touch with their opposite numbers in Canada.

(c) The third class of amendments, enlarging purposes for which credits can be used, would enable foreign governments to purchase Canadian-produced goods from the crown or crown corporations such as War Assets Corporation. Under the act a foreign government is required to purchase from an "exporter", and doubt has arisen whether the crown or a crown corporation is an "exporter" within the meaning of the act. It is desirable that foreign governments should be allowed to use the credits to purchase Canadian-produced goods from the crown or agencies of the crown, for example, that foreign governments should be allowed to purchase surplus equipment and supplies from War Assets Corporation.

Last evening the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked me a question from which I gathered that he is interested in the views of the Canadian chambers of commerce and of the Canadian Manufacturers Association with regard to the decision of the government to provide export credit insurance. I am glad to say that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation has received the active support and cooperation of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian chambers of commerce and the Canadian Exporters Association. At the recent chamber of commerce foreign trade conference held in Hamilton in May, and at the Canadian Manufacturers Association annual convention held in Toronto in June, officials of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation were present to explain the services offered by the corporation. A number of questions were asked which indicated considerable interest in the proposal, but I am informed that no formal resolutions were passed dealing with the matter.

I might add that I was personally present at the annual meeting of the Canadian chambers of commerce at Hamilton in May, and this matter was discussed there informally, and also formally I believe, when I received nothing but the greatest support from people in business so far as this legislation is concerned.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Undoubtedly every Canadian will support any programme of the government to facilitate exports, particularly in a time of declining employment. There is one point, however, on which the minister may be able to give us some enlightenment. The total income of our people, the so-called gross national product as compiled by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, is now at least double what it was in normal times. With that amount of purchasing power in the hands of our Canadian people, I believe the total domestic consumption of goods will be much greater than formerly, and it follows that in connection with certain products we as a government or a parliament may be putting too much emphasis upon the export of certain products which might be used by our own people.

What I am suggesting is that whereas Canadians as a whole used X number of shirts and shoes in 1939, now with the greatly expanded income we may expect to find that those who were on the narrow margin of subsistence, with merely one pair of shoes or one extra shirt, will have a better supply of this world's commodities. Therefore we must realize that Canadian industry must provide for the higher standard of living represented by the present higher national income which we are striving to maintain.

Of course we must direct our greatest attention to facilitating exports of many of our basic raw materials, the products of the mine, the forest and agriculture. But of some of the secondary products of industry I wonder whether we are not taking from our own people and endeavouring to find export markets when we have right at our front door a home market which is always much better than an export market. Perhaps the minister's economists have given some thought to this question. Certainly it is something we should seriously consider when granting insurance credits to companies that manufacture locomotives, let us say, and other products which are not, if I may use the expression, indigenous to Canada, where workmen and products entering into the manufacture of such articles might be used for building homes and supplying other needs for Canadians.

I have been at a loss to follow the working of the Export Credits Insurance Act because I do not find available yet the report of the corporation authorized under that act, namely, the Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Mr. MacKINNON: It was tabled.

Mr. JACKMAN: I inquired for it at the distribution office as late as this morning, but I could not get it there, nor did they have a record of it.

Mr. MacKINNON: I may be wrong, but my understanding is that the report was tabled some weeks ago.

Mr. JACKMAN: I shall try to get it from the parliamentary papers branch, but I think it should be made available to all members, and they should receive the usual notification from that department, where one usually obtains such documents. On inquiry of certain business men I have found that the corporation has not been used extensively, though the report may show what the volume has been. I hope that in his reply the minister will give us some idea of the loss up to date. Perhaps sufficient time has not yet expired to enable the officials to find out whether or not some of these insurance credits will involve us in any loss, and what the premium cost to the insurers has been. In one or two cases I have heard the criticism that the cost is fairly high. However, I should think the question whether the department has had losses in the running of the corporation might indicate the facts in that regard.

The minister said that the amendment before us will also help to provide working capital to manufacturers in Canada who intend to export their products. If it is necessary, it is a good idea, but I think the state of most corporations in Canada to-day is such that they have adequate working capital. If they are efficient corporations and have come through the war period doing a large volume of business, most of them have sufficient working capital. I should be glad if the minister would let us know just what need this amendment is to provide. Have there been many requests from manufacturers in Canada for payments in advance of finishing the products which they intend to export? As a rule if a company has no working capital it is not a very strong company financially, and it is not strong financially because it is not efficient.

The minister also said that the amendment would include a guarantee of payment to Canadians who are rendering service particularly in shipping to foreign countries. I hope that guaranteeing services of this kind will not run the country into losses, because it is a dangerous thing to guarantee services such as shipping if we cannot compete economically. We also run the danger here, as we do so frequently when governments intervene in business, of having a race with other countries. If we guarantee a country which employs our shipping, then the Scandinavian countries, or Britain, or some other country, must also guarantee their shippers against loss. It is a difficulty which one always runs into when governments take a hand in subsidizing exports, whether of goods or services.

The only other point I wish to draw to the attention of the government has to do with a question which the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has under consideration in a recent issue of their periodical, namely, that they do not look with favour upon the government entering into trade associations with other countries. Their suggestion was that the actual trading should always be left to the individuals or concerns in the particular country, and that the government itself should not become involved in these matters.

Any other questions that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister can be discussed in committee on the relevant sections.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Can the minister indicate the number of employees that will be required to carry on all these services—the advisory council, the corporation, and so forth—and the extent to which he feels that this work is necessary? I may be a little pessimistic, but in looking over some of the returns which have been brought down in answer to hon. members' questions, the thought struck me that here another large group of employees will probably be required. The minister might be able to get experienced men from the wartime prices and trade board, which has 5,106 employees, costing $842,000 a month. That was the number on June 1, and there has been only a small reduction since the first of the year.

I suggest to the minister that the criticism I have received about the setting up of these advisory councils is that a doubt arises in the public mind as to the ramifications of these bodies and whether we are creating other groups of civil servants. Can the minister give us some idea of the personnel which will be required? Then I suggest to him the place from which he could get any help that may be needed.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I support the bill sponsored by the minister; and may I first compliment the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) on his constructive thoughts. The house should take to heart the warnings of the hon. member for Rosedale. In our laudable anxiety to advance and increase foreign trade, we may forget the home market. I believe we have to export on the horizontal line not less than twenty-five per cent of what we produce. That figure may be a little high, but it is approximately correct. Judging from official figures released by the United States, they have to export ten per cent of what they produce; therefore I suppose I am not far out when I say that we have to export twenty-five per cent of what we produce. Any assistance we can give to increasing foreign trade, without doing injury to the home trade, should be given.

I should like to elaborate in a general way on what the hon. member for Rosedale said about our home trade. All our brilliant younger members, perhaps the ablest of them, devote much of their time to the foreign affairs committee. That is all to the good; but I hope that this house will establish a home affairs committee which will have as its chief object the increasing of trade in Canada. One way in which we could do that would be to create more home trade on the Alaska highway. I fear that we are not doing all we should in the matter of development along that great highway, looking to the creation of a great deal of trade.

I agree with the hon. member for Rosedale that our great market is our home market. While supporting foreign trade we must not neglect our major opportunities at home. I notice that gold has been discovered in substantial quantities near Watson Lake. Those who have been over the Alaska highway know that it is one of the most outstanding scenic routes in the world. I can see a great deal of trade along that route if we develop it. I believe that thousands and thousands of United States tourists would go to their great country of Alaska. I may be out of order in making these remarks on the bill now before the house, but I wanted to interject them so that we would not devote so much of our time—I shall not say too much of it—to the question of foreign trade. We must have foreign trade and foreign establishments, but I want to see more attention paid by our brilliant younger members to the development of home trade. I want to see every effort made to create a much wider market in Canada. Having said that I repeat that I am in favour of the general principle of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Preamble repealed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister give us a little exposition of what good he believes this measure is going to do, and why it is worth while passing it?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not sure whether the hon. member was in the house when I attempted a few minutes ago to give that information at some length. If the hon. member did not happen to be in his seat I am sure he will find a satisfactory explanation in Hansard.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am agreeable to having a summary at this time.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister give us some idea of just how much money is involved under the Export Audits Insurance Act? It would appear that the policy of the government is to go out and buy export trade. In other words, under this act we are putting up our own money to buy goods produced in Canada to be sold to a foreign country in the hope that that will increase our external trade indefinitely, and I suppose in the hope that we shall get most of the money back, although I am doubtful as to how much will come back. How much is involved in this legislation? The act provides for guarantees by the dominion government up to $200 million, and for loans to other governments up to $750 million. In other words almost $1 billion is involved here. It may be that we are being reckless with our hundreds of millions of dollars where we should watch carefully the expenditure of a million dollars in another direction. We should know how much is already involved; how many loans have been made; how many guarantees have been given; to whom they have been made, and how much will be involved within the next year.

Mr. MacKINNON: The hon. member is now dealing with part II of the act.

Mr. GREEN: On section 1 of the bill, Mr. Chairman, it is customary to have a general discussion of the whole bill.

Mr. MacKINNON: Just as a suggestion, Mr. Chairman, if hon. members are agreeable I should very much prefer to deal with these matters as we come to them. As a matter of fact part I of the bill is under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, while part II, with which I am going to attempt to deal also to-day, is under both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If my hon. friend will agree, it would be very much more satisfactory to me to have his questions dealt with under part II. Just on that point, the loans to which the hon. member has referred have all been passed and approved.

Mr. GREEN: By whom?

Mr. MacKINNON: By this house.

Mr. GREEN: Individual loans are not approved by this house.

Mr. MacKINNON: Under authority granted by this house. We can give the information asked for, but I suggest that it be given on part II of the bill when we come to it.

Mr. GREEN: I am trying to get at the background of this whole measure, dealing not only with part I but also with part II. The very section which is now under review deals with part II as well as part I.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not arguing that.

Mr. GREEN: It is a section which deletes the preamble to the bill, and the preamble deals not only with part I but also with part II. It seems obvious that the amendments alter the purpose of the bill to quite a large extent, and for that reason the department has found it necessary to repeal the preamble. I think we are entitled to an answer to the question I asked a few moments ago. Tell us just how deeply we are involved under the act at the present time, and how deeply we are going to be involved during the coming year.

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not wish to argue the point, because I think I would come out a poor second in an argument with the hon member for Vancouver South.

Mr. GREEN: It all depends on your case. You must have a poor case.

Mr. MacKINNON: No, I think my case is all right. If the hon. member insists, as he has insisted, that this be dealt with now I am quite agreeable. He suggests that this bill grants increased amounts which can be lent by the dominion government to foreign governments or agencies. That is not correct.

Mr. GREEN: That was done last year.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have before me a summary of the loan agreements under part II of the act as at March 31, 1946. I had intended, when in my opinion the proper time had come, to submit this summary to the committee. I should be very glad to place the statement on Hansard after I have referred to it in order to answer my hon. friend's questions. The total purchasing programme amounts to $744,600,000.

Mr. GREEN: Does that mean the amount already lent under the act?

Mr. MacKINNON: The total purchases to be made by the borrowing countries amount to $744,600,000. Of that amount Canada is putting up in credit $577,500,000, the difference being put up in cash by the borrowing countries. That difference totals $170,100,000. Perhaps I should go on and give additional information which might be asked for later. The commitments as at March 31, 1946, total $343,367,000.

Mr. GREEN: What does the minister mean by commitments?

Mr. MacKINNON: The amount of actual purchases made by the borrowing countries. The interim advances amount to $102,048,000, and the amount drawn on the loans up to March 31, 1946, is $67,413,000.

Mr. GREEN: That is the amount that has been actually paid by Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: Canada has actually made the interim advances and the amounts drawn on the loans, the total of the last two items of $102,048,000 and $67,413,000.

Mr. GREEN: Then we are already committed to expenditures by Canada of approximately $577,000,000?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: To what countries are those goods going?

Mr. MacKINNON: All the information asked for by the hon. member was presented to this house in a report tabled by the Minister of Finance some days ago. The countries to which these loans have been made are France, Belgium, China, Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands, Netherlands East Indies, Norway and U.S.S.R.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give the approximate amount to each country?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes. The amounts are as follows:

France	$242,500,000
Belgium	100,000,000
China	60,000,000
Czechoslovakia	19,000,000
Netherlands	125,000,000
Netherlands East Indies	15,000,000
Norway	13,000,000
U.S.S.R.	3,000,000

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing to the near east, Egypt, or Palestine?

Mr. MacKINNON: These loans are all apart from the loans to the United Kingdom and the sterling area.

Mr. MacNICOL: I asked if we had made any arrangements or commitments in the near east, for instance to Algiers or Tunis.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have given the complete list of loans.

Mr. MacNICOL: But I did not hear any names of countries in the near east.

Mr. MacKINNON: There are none.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the minister the consent of the committee to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has sufficient time elapsed to indicate whether recoveries in connection with guarantees or repayment of loans will be good?

Mr. MacKINNON: The hon. member has gone back to a discussion of "corporation", which I understand he has a perfect right to do. During the limited time the act has been in force there has been no real opportunity to establish a record. As a matter of fact no losses have been established.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Who would guarantee a loan to, for instance, the Netherlands East Indies? Is that $15 million guaranteed by the East Indies or by the Netherlands government?

Mr. MacKINNON: This is a direct loan from the government of Canada to the government of the Netherlands East Indies, against which $1,800,000 has been advanced.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What government would that be precisely?

Mr. MacKINNON: I can understand the reason for the hon. member's question. The loan was made to the government of the day, which is described as the government of the Netherlands Indies, through the Netherlands minister in Ottawa.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What goods were shipped for that $1,800,000?

Mr. MacKINNON: The principal purchases included trucks, motor cars, carriers, flour, and payments for the ferrying of passenger aircraft.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did we not sell them a large number of cups to catch the rubber sap from rubber trees?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have no record of that as yet. Either the purchase has not yet come through, or it has been financed in some other way.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Was any of this material for military purposes?

Mr. MacKINNON: The items speak for themselves. I have no knowledge of any military goods having been shipped to the Netherlands Indies.

Mr. QUELCH: What was the total amount of business done last year under this measure?

Mr. MacKINNON: We are back to part I of the bill. If the hon. member for Vancouver South has not seen the Export Credits Insurance Corporation annual report, which was tabled on May 23, it might be worth while if I were to place some of it on Hansard. It states:

Canadian exports during 1945 were at record levels, but for the most part the volume represented goods purchased by foreign governments and the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, or by shipments financed under mutual aid and by direct Canadian government loans. As a consequence of this situation, which will continue in decreasing measure through 1946 and into 1947, there has not as yet been an opportunity to assess the ultimate demand for the corporation's services. It does mean, however, that the corporation has a most useful period in which to canvass, study, and prepare to meet the situation that will be encountered with the return of more normal trading conditions.

Notwithstanding these conditions, and despite the fact that no extensive effort has been made to publicize its services, the corporation has in the last six months of the fiscal year issued forty-five policies, covering an estimated annual sales volume of over $12 million. Policies have been issued to exporters in the maritimes, central Canada and the west, and cover shipments, to some 60 different countries, of agricultural products, raw materials and manufactured goods. The classification of these policies by estimated export volume is as follows:

Estimated Annual Export Volume	Number of Policies	Amount
$25,000 and under	7	$ 62,000
$25,000 to $100,000	15	875,000
$100,000 to $250,000	13	2,075,500
$250,000 to $1,000,000	7	3,610,300
$1,000,000 and over	3	6,238,000
	45	$12,860,800

All the policies issued to March 31, 1946, cover general commodities sold on short credit terms. Quotations have been made on a number of contracts covering capital goods sold on medium-term credit, some of which are pending at the present time.

Mr. QUELCH: I understand the important part this corporation has to play, especially in the world of to-day where conditions are unsettled. If we want to expand exports we have to make certain that those who export goods are paid for them. After all, international trade is a two-way street, with the result that we are keenly interested in the imports which will come into Canada. I understood some form of imports board was established last year. What was the amount of business done by that board, and what are its duties?

Mr. MacKINNON: It was not a board, but rather an imports branch of the department. Its duties are to stimulate imports into Canada. No complete record can be kept of what is actually done.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it done through advertising?

Mr. MacKINNON: Perhaps this matter might more properly be discussed when my estimates are before the committee. I might state briefly, however, that the imports branch, working in cooperation with trade commissioners in those countries of the world in which Canada is represented, does its utmost to see that our trade commissioners arrange to let Canadian importers know about goods which, while not available in Canada, are available in surplus quantities in other countries. In this way imports are encouraged.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have some questions to ask, and if it is not convenient to give the answers under this bill I shall be content to receive them later. The minister has stated that we have given credit of about $240 million to France and about $100 million to Belgium. There was also a credit of some $15 million to the Netherlands East Indies, but in this later case the products shipped were manufactured products. I should like to know what was shipped to France and Belgium. Did we ship only raw materials such as wheat and other products? What may we expect to get back from them? I am thinking of the workers in the plants in my riding where there are perhaps more factories than in any other riding in Canada, and I must be on guard to see that their jobs are not jeopardized by imports from these other countries.

Mr. MacKINNON: The question asked by the hon. member for Davenport should really be asked on the estimates of the department. I would point out that what we actually obtain from France bears no relation to what we sell France as against these credits.

Mr. MacNICOL: The answer will do when the estimates are before us.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The minister said that we had extended a line of credit of some $125 million to the Netherlands. Will any part of that credit be used for the purchase of military equipment and material?

Mr. MacKINNON: Up until March 31 the principal Netherlands purchases were trucks, agricultural implements, lead, wheat, leather, horses, seed, paper, meats, hides and various foodstuffs.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that under part I of the act which deals with insurance of export trade there have been forty-five policies issued; also, that there has not been the demand that the government expected there would be for this insurance. Under part II of the act Canada has been committed to extend credits of approximately $577 million, but it has not been suggested how much of that is by way of guarantee and how much by way of loans.

Mr. MacKINNON: There are no guarantees.

Mr. GREEN: None of that is by way of guarantee?

Mr. MacKINNON: No; it is all loans.

Mr. GREEN: We would still have available approximately $175 million in order to make up the total of $750 million by way of loans?

Mr. MacKINNON: As of March 31.

Mr. GREEN: Are further loans being negotiated and, if so, what are they? Will it now be possible for these other countries to purchase goods direct from producers in Canada without the Canadian government lending the money?

Mr. MacKINNON: A number of other countries have been asking for loans.

Mr. GREEN: What countries?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think it would be fair to answer that question just now. I have no special reason for making that answer except that I do not think we should place on the record what countries have approached us informally for loans. While this matter relates to the Department of Finance, I know other countries have approached us for loans and that matter will be dealt with by the Department of Finance. At the present time these are the only loans in existence.

The hon. member for Vancouver South asked about the demand for this legislation. This legislation follows similar legislation which has proved to be extremely helpful to the trade of Great Britain and of the United States. Our legislation is patterned on that of the United Kingdom, and I may say that at the present time the United States are amending their legislation along the lines of our legislation. The demand for the loans has been general. We have not received any criticism—and we would be quick to get it if the public were in a critical mood—about this legislation. Everything that has been said has been in commendation of the department for its efforts to follow leads to increase export trade.

Just at this point I think it would be proper if I made a brief statement which has a bearing on some of the remarks which have been made by hon. members to the effect that we are interfering with private business. We are not doing that and there is no intention to do it. I want to emphasize that as strongly as I can. It is contrary to the entire purpose of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation to have the corporation do work that can or should be done by private agencies. The corporation does not invade the field of private enterprise in any way. Its one objective is to provide Canadian exporters with services and facilities that cannot be furnished by private insurance companies.

There are only two insurance companies in Canada, the American Credit Indemnity and the Employers Reinsurance which, in addition to accepting insurance for domestic sales that form the bulk of their business, also insure exports. But these exports must be sent to the United States or Newfoundland if any insurance is to be granted. The Export Credits Insurance Corporation, therefore, while insuring exports to all parts of the world, is willing to exclude the United States and Newfoundland from its contracts on the ground that alternative services from private agencies may be obtained. That is to say, whenever a Canadian exporter wishes to obtain insurance on goods shipped to the United States and Newfoundland, he is advised by the corporation that such insurance can be obtained, if desired, from a private agency. If the Canadian businessman, however, after receiving this information still wishes to use the facilities of the corporation, these are, of course, made available to him by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. I do not think there could be any more convincing proof of the determination of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation not to invade the field of services rendered by private companies.

Mr. PEARKES: In listing the items which have been sent to the Netherlands, the minister mentioned trucks and other vehicles. In view of the shortage of motor vehicles and the urgent demand for trucks by veterans who are trying to reestablish themselves in this country, would the minister give the total number of trucks and motor vehicles which have been sent out to all the countries he mentioned.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not that information before me, but I shall be glad to get it and give it later.

Mr. PEARKES: That would be satisfactory. I think we should be given some idea of the extent to which trucks and motor vehicles are being sent out of this country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have two questions to ask in regard to trade. Recently I was in Bermuda attending the parliamentary conference, and amongst the matters discussed was trade as between Canada and the colonies. The attitude of all the colonies was that they were desirous of trading with Canada, and Bermuda was most anxious to increase her trade with us. The great difficulty was the shipping situation. One of the great fears of the representatives of the colonies at that conference was that the colonies were to be sacrificed because of the necessity of doing away in part or in whole with the British preference. I think a statement from the minister in regard to the attitude of his department and of the government would be most helpful. The representatives of the colonies are serious about this matter and fearful of what may happen.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would ask the hon. member to keep to the section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am dealing with trade, Mr. Chairman. General questions have been asked, and I am sure the minister has no objection to my asking a question about a matter that is causing grave concern.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are considering an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Acts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You were allowing unusual latitude, Mr. Chairman, up to a few moments ago, until I asked this question. Of course, if it is disconcerting, I shall not press it.

Mr. MacKINNON: Not at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then, possibly with the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, you will allow my question, as well as another one I have to ask at this time. My second question has to do with a news item in the July 8 issue of Time. This is a matter of concern to the farmers of this country, and it has been referred to also by our own press.

Time's article is to the effect that the wheat agreement between Canada and Great Britain cannot be or is not being entered into at this time because of the antagonism of the United States. The article in Time says:

Canada's family ties with Britain and her neighbourly ties with the U.S.A. were strained last week. The irritant was wheat, which Canada and the U.S.A. have to sell and Britain wants to buy.

It goes on to speak of the visit here of Britain's Food Minister John Strachey and says that he was ready to sign an agreement but:

At this point the U.S.A. stuck its neighbourly nose into the deal . . .

And prevented an agreement being arrived at.

Furthermore, the state department warned that the British loan, still awaiting U.S.A. approval would be endangered.

That article, I think, requires an answer from the minister. The Minister of Agriculture, during the course of his recent trip through western Canada, has spoken of the wheat agreement as though it were an accomplished fact. Is that agreement being held up because of any interference or criticism from the United States as set forth in Time's article.

Mr. MacKINNON: The hon. member's question is clearly out of order but, since it is now on Hansard, I should like to reply briefly. I am interested in his comments. After his visit to Bermuda, I am glad that we shall have his cooperation and assistance in developing trade with these friendly sister countries, shall I call them, in the Atlantic. The department in every way is pressing for increased mutual trade with these countries.

I have already made two statements on the wheat negotiations, one of them to-day. If there is any truth in the article from which the hon. member has just quoted I can only say that I know nothing of it. The reason why the wheat negotiations are not proceeding at the present time is that it suited the experts of each government and the members of the governments themselves to postpone the discussions for the time being.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain the new subsection 2 of section 2? It says:

For the purposes of this act a sale of goods to a buyer who intends to export them shall be deemed to be an export and the seller shall be deemed to be an exporter.

Does that apply to a sale to another firm in Canada or only to a foreign firm which takes over responsibility for the goods in Canada? It is not clear to me.

Mr. MacKINNON: It applies only to a foreign firm.

Mr. GREEN: The section does not make any restriction of that kind. It says "a sale of goods to a buyer", which is broad enough to cover any buyer, Canadian or foreign.

Mr. MacKINNON: I can see where the hon. member may have some reason for doubting the exact meaning, but the intention is that the clause applies only to a foreign buyer.

Mr. JACKMAN: The definition of "person" does not include a corporation, although it includes any association. Further on in the act, in section 11 it is provided in paragraph (b), line 9, on page 5 of the bill, that the governor in council may:

(b) make a loan to the government or any agency of the government of any such other country to enable such government or such agency or any person ordinarily resident in such other country to pay the cost of Canadian-produced goods purchased from an exporter or the cost of Canadian services.

Should "corporation" not be included, or does the word "association" embrace a corporation for the purposes of this bill?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am advised that under the Interpretation Act the word "person" includes a corporation.

Mr. JACKMAN: This bill has its own interpretation clause, and definitely says that "person" includes any association or partnership. Whether the definition of "person" in the Interpretation Act overrides that definition, I do not know. It would seem to me it was specific rather than exclusive. If the minister says otherwise, I am quite content.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Board of Directors.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Who are the directors of the corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: M. W. Mackenzie, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, chairman; W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance; J. A. Chapdelaine, Department of External Affairs; G. F. Towers, Governor of the Bank of Canada; H. T. Aitken, Chief Executive Officer.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What fees are paid?

Mr. MacKINNON: No fees whatever.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Contract of insurance.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is any part or purpose of the corporation the establishing of depots in foreign countries to which exporters in this country can ship large numbers of trucks or boilers or radiators or tubs or manufacturing equipment, and to which dealers in the other countries can go and purchase and take away such equipment?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Liability under contracts outstanding.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What page are we on?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Page 4.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it not be possible to have the bill drafted in such a form as to enable members to know exactly what it will look like when it is finished? As it stands, certain portions are repealed and other portions substituted therefor, and it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to tell what it really looks like in its completed form. I object strenuously to passing the bill in this way.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The bill is drawn in the usual form of amending bills. There are rules of the house which govern the manner in which amending statutes are to be submitted. The rule is that if a change is to made in a section or subsection the section is to be repealed and reenacted with the change, and it is usual to set out in the explanatory note showing the form in which it was before. I understand the hon. gentleman's suggestion to be that the whole act should be repealed and reenacted so that he would have the entire statute before him. But that is not required by the rules of the house, and I think it would occasion considerable delay in dealing with amendments if, in order to have an amendment, you had to repeal and reenact the whole statute. It would substantially increase the time devoted to its consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I grant all that, but my feeling is that this act is an important one, and nothing has been said in my hearing up to the present time, nor anything that I have so far apprehended, that suffices to show why the preamble should be repealed. The preamble is to be repealed, we are told, because it is not consistent with certain amendments made in the act. Well, the preamble looks like a very good one and, if it is to be repealed, I find it difficult to understand what the act is all about. I raise the question because I think we are going too fast, and I seriously doubt whether many members can get anything like a comprehensive and consistent grasp of that which we are undertaking to do.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am quite sure the hon. gentleman could not have been in the house when I made my statement. May I point out to him that the preamble has been carried. However, perhaps I shall be allowed to make this brief comment in answer to what he has said. The preamble to the act is being deleted since in itself it has no force and effect and is referred to only in the event of clarification being required in connection with any particular clause of the act. Rather than have the preamble amended to make sure that it clearly reflects all the proposed changes, we are deleting it entirely.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is precisely the kind of thing that would fill me with apprehension. May I read what the preamble says? It is true we have already passed it, but I am raising this question because, as I have pointed out, I think we are now going too fast, or at any rate fast enough to tax the ordinary member's ability to follow the proceedings, when the bill is made up of a hodge-podge of repeals and substitutions. The preamble looks consistent to me and, if something is being changed in the act which renders the preamble not in accordance with the act itself, then I find myself really concerned as to what the act will look like when it is finished. May I read the preamble to show what I am driving at?

Whereas it is desirable—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are on section 8.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well, Mr. Chairman; I am in your hands. However, on behalf of the ordinary member of parliament, I protest. It is entirely impossible to tell where we are going; we are going so fast. If that is your decision I must fall in line with other members, but once more I say we are going too fast to know what we are doing.

Mr. KNOWLES: I suggest that one of the reasons we are having difficulty with this is not the form of the admendment on the lefthand page of the document but the form of the explanatory note on the righthand page. We have had previously during this session bills that have been complicated, but the explanatory notes have been sufficient to give us an idea of what we were doing. In this instance, however, the explanatory notes just seem to confuse the picture.

Mr. ABBOTT: Or perhaps it is the fact that some members have not read the bill ahead of time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I cannot hear what the minister is saying. I do not know what he is saying. It is to be understood that when a man speaks just a little above a whisper, so that Hansard gets it and ordinary members do not, it is not fair. I should like to hear what the Minister of National Defence said.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are not missing as much as you think you are.

An hon. MEMBER: You would be surprised.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are doing a whole lot more than we think we are doing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is good for beet sugar.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is another bit of smart aleckism. One of the reasons why the member for Lake Centre, a few minutes ago, had to raise a question which was so embarrassing was the fact that this house last fall went too fast and committed itself to a great many things it did not dream it was undertaking, and now the chickens are coming home to roost. I suspect that in this measure there are many things which we do not realize we are committing ourselves to, and the speed at which we are going, as well as the general confusion resulting from the hodge-podge we have before us, makes it much more conducive to misapprehension.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Fiscal year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to say a word on this section and to compliment the person who drafted the bill upon making this provision:

The fiscal year of the corporation shall be the year ending on the thirty-first day of December.

I hope the day is not far distant when the thirty-first of December will be the end of the year in all government business.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Statement of accounts.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I suggest to the minister that when the annual report comes down next year he be sure to have it distributed to all hon. members as is done with the Bank of Canada report, and not just table it in the sessional papers' office. Will the minister make it available to all hon. members in their boxes?

Mr. MacKINNON: I should be delighted to see that that is done. My information and my understanding are that copies of the annual report were not only tabled but went to every hon. member. I am sorry if that is not so.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Definitions.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have four minor amendments to section 11 which I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Justice, to move.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I beg leave to move:

That section 11 of the bill be amended by striking out paragraph (a) and substituting therefor the following:

(a) "Canadian-produced goods" means goods wholly or partly produced or manufactured in Canada or goods belonging to His Majesty in right of Canada, or to His Majesty in right of any province.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Can the minister give us a definition of "Canadian-produced goods?" What amount of work has to go into them to make them Canadian-produced goods?

Mr. MacKINNON: I did not hear the question.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Suppose we buy an unfinished article from another country, how much work have we to put into it in this country to put it in the category of Canadian-produced goods?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is not definitely spelled out in any way. Canadian-produced goods are goods which are wholly or partly produced or manufactured in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: In Great Britain prior to the war I believe that British-made goods had to have a British content of over fifty per cent.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that this amendment means that goods belonging to a province can now be sold to a foreign country and the dominion government put up the money by way of loan to that country. Why is it necessary to do that? What is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. MacKINNON: This amendment would permit foreign governments to purchase from cooperative organizations in a province or a provincial crown corporation.

Mr. GREEN: Why does the dominion government have to finance a foreign government to purchase goods from a provincial government in Canada? That is what we are doing. Why cannot a provincial government make its own deal without bringing in—

Mr. PROBE: Why cannot an exporter do the same thing?

Mr. GREEN: Why does the dominion government have to finance a provincial government?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is all trade for the nation.

Mr. MacKINNON: Provincial governments are not in the foreign loan business. They are not equipped or they have not the facilities to make these loans.

Mr. GREEN: The same thing applies to sales by the dominion. This act is now extended for the first time to cover goods belonging to the dominion. Apparently that is done primarily to cover goods sold by War Assets Corporation. Where does the Canadian buyer come into the picture? Why is War Assets Corporation selling goods to a foreign government and the Canadian government putting up the money? That is what is happening. If we do not get repayment of these loans it will be the Canadian people who will be paying for the goods which go to the foreign countries. Why is it necessary to have War Assets Corporation selling to a foreign country?

Mr. KNOWLES: If trade is good for the country does it matter who carries it on?

Mr. MacKINNON: These loans are largely for the rehabilitation of the countries to which the loans are made. A province may have goods which are necessary to their rehabilitation, and may be the only available source of supply. We think it good business to arrange so that these goods can be purchased.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not answer my question about War Assets Corporation. What type of goods is being sold to a foreign government by War Assets Corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: A variety of products, machinery and supplies, is being sold. It might be hospital equipment. I have not the various items before me, but many items might be sold by War Assets Corporation.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any priority established in connection with the sale of these goods? Does the Canadian get a priority over the foreign government?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think that is a proper question to ask when we are discussing this bill; it is a matter for War Assets.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister said that the primary purpose of this bill was to rehabilitate devastated countries. If that is so, is it not also true, according to the preamble which we have discarded over the protest of the hon. member for Lethbridge, that part of the purpose is to promote the revival of trade.

Mr. MacKINNON: Certainly.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just wanted to get back to that and to repeat the question I asked a moment ago. That is the purpose, and if it is recognized that trade is good for all concerned what does it matter whether the exporter on this side is one of those so-and-so private enterprises or the dominion government, a provincial government or a cooperative.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just one word; I am not going to use the words "so-and-so" because they might mean any adjective which would not look good on Hansard, but I am going to say one word for a provincial government. I thought some hon. member to my left would have said it. In my opinion the Saskatchewan government is doing a good job in processing a large number of horses, I believe about 500,000. I was in the factory—

Mr. GREEN: Did the hon. member eat any of it?

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know whether I did or not. In fact the cabinet told me they did and they did not know they were eating it. It was good meat anyway. The doctor in charge said it was excellent meat. I asked where they were shipping it and they told me, Belgium. I can quite understand that Belgium may not be able to buy No. 1 cattle meat, and if they are quite satisfied with horsemeat I see no objection to this government facilitating the sale of 500,000 horses processed in Saskatchewan into meat for Belgium.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is one of the items, I may say.

Mr. KNOWLES: Since horsemeat has been referred to, may I point out—and I do so for the purpose of asking a question—that it is being processed by a cooperative in Saskatchewan, not by a crown company. My question is this. Is exporting on the part of a cooperative covered by this measure as well?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes, it is.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister say whether or not any other loans being made by this corporation will be handled by the international bank of reconstruction after it is set up? If not, will he explain where the line of demarcation is as between the international bank of reconstructon and this corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: This corporation is not lending money at all; it is insuring sales. The loans in part II of the act are from government to government.

Mr. KNOWLES: Probably the last comment by the minister answers the question I was going to ask, but may I go ahead just to get it perfectly clear. I notice away down in section 11, on page 5, paragraph (b) refers to "any person ordinarily resident in such other country." Those words are being added to the act, so that loans now may be made, not only to a government or the agency of a government, but to any person ordinarily resident in such other country. Is it clear that loans are made to persons in other countries only with the backing of the governments of such other countries?

Mr. MacKINNON: I would suggest that we wait until we reach that section.

Amendment (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move:

That section 11 of the bill be amended by striking out paragraph (b) and substituting therefor the following:

"(b) 'Canadian services' means services performed by persons ordinarily resident in Canada, or by His Majesty in right of Canada or in right of any province."

Hon. members will notice that the amendment merely adds "or by His Majesty in right of Canada or in right of any province." That is because services are required to handle the goods.

Mr. GREEN: This is the first section of part II of the act, and part II deals with loans to foreign countries. When the bill was originally introduced we understood that those loans would be made only during the period of transition from war to peace, and those words actually appeared in the preamble which is being struck out by the present bill. Has there been any change in the intention? Are these loans still to be made only during the transitional period, or is it now to be a permanent plan running into the years that Canada is to make loans to foreign governments under this measure?

Mr. MacKINNON: This provision merely extends the time to the end of 1947.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking whether there has been any change in governmental policy.

Mr. MacKINNON: There has been no change in the intention.

Mr. GREEN: Then we have been told that a crown company known as Canadian Commercial Corporation is to be set up to assist in the promotion of both import and export trade. A resolution to that effect is on the order paper at the present time. Where does that new corporation fit into the working of the bill we are now considering?

Mr. MacKINNON: It has nothing whatsoever to do with this bill.

Mr. GREEN: It will have nothing whatever to do with the Export Credits Insurance Act?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Amendment (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move:

That section 11 of the bill be amended by striking out paragraph (e) and substituting therefor the following:

"(e) 'exporter' means a person, including His Majesty in right of Canada or in right of any province, who exports or agrees to export goods from Canada."

Mr. JACKMAN: May I just ask the minister a question, not so much in regard to this particular amendment, but as to the working of the whole act, since many of us are relatively unfamiliar with it. As I understand it, we do not expect that the government or the export corporation will lose any money. It is on a self-supporting basis; I believe that was in the original statement by the minister. This is a measure, including the amendment we are now discussing, designed to help exporters in Canada who cannot afford to assume the risk in connection with sales to foreigners during this reconversion period. If that statement is correct, why does the government need to help any financially strong corporation, and more particularly why does it need to help the government itself or War Assets Corporation, which is an emanation from the crown? In this particular case, why does the dominion government need to help a province, which we must assume is financially strong, in connection with exports to some of these countries which may turn out to be buyers? Unless the dominion government sees that it is going to face a loss on these exports and believes that loss is worth while in order to stimulate employment during the next year or two, I do not understand why the dominion government, much less a provincial government or even a strong corporation, should receive benefits under this act.

Mr. MacKINNON: I think the hon. member is somewhat confusing the two parts of the act. I would point out that part I, which has been passed, is concerned with providing insurance for exporters, that is, firms exporting from Canada to other countries.

Mr. JACKMAN: Part II has to do with the corporation, under the act, buying—

Mr. MacKINNON: Part II of the act has nothing whatever to do with the corporation. It provides for the making of loans to foreign countries.

Amendment (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move:

That section 11 of the bill be further amended by striking out paragraph (g) and substituting therefor the following:

"(g) 'security' includes bills, promissory notes, bonds, debentures, and any other evidences of indebtedness, shares and any agreement to pay amounts drawn or to be drawn under a letter of credit."

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain what types of securities have been taken up to the present time to cover the various loans that have been made?

Mr. MacKINNON: This has to do with the guarantee provision in part II, and no guarantees have been issued to date.

Mr. GREEN: Have any securities been taken in connection with any of the loans made to foreign governments?

Mr. MacKINNON: None.

Mr. GREEN: Canada has merely a written agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: We have their promise to pay.

Mr. GREEN: No securities at all?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Amendment (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the section carries, will the minister give the assurance I asked for a little while ago that loans to persons in other countries are in all cases either at the request of, or guaranteed by the governments of those other countries. I note the expression "or any person ordinarily resident in such other country".

Mr. MacKINNON: Previously the government had to do the purchasing as well. The loan is made to the government, but a person may do the purchasing for the government. This encourages the return to private trading.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not that the purchasing is done by the private buyer in the foreign country? He does not make the purchase for the foreign government, but the foreign government stands behind his purchase. Is that not what happens?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The foreign government allows the private purchaser to use the money borrowed on the credit of the foreign government to pay the amount of the purchase.

Mr. PROBE: In other words, it covers all transactions envisaged in this bill as between this and foreign governments?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Coming into force of section 11.

Mr. GREEN: What is the position respecting the loan to the U.S.S.R.? When the minister gave the figures a few minutes ago I think he said that loan amounted to only $3 million.

Mr. MacKINNON: I would refer the hon. member to the report respecting these loans under date of May 28, 1946, which was tabled by the Minister of Finance, and in which a detailed explanation of the loan to the U.S.S.R. is given.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give us a summary in so far as the U.S.S.R. is concerned?

Mr. MacKINNON: Agreement was reached with the government of that country for a small credit to enable it to pay for certain hydro-electric equipment being purchased from Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any difficulty in promoting trade with Russia?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That's a hot one.

Mr. GREEN: I ask that question because I have here a press dispatch dated May 2, taken from the Vancouver Sun. The heading is, "Exports to Soviet wait cash or loan; Rail supplies rusting in B.C. while Russia passes up credit". Then in the first paragraph it states:

If the U.S.S.R. wants the flat cars, cranes, rails and other railway equipment now stored on the Pacific coast she can have them by negotiating a loan to pay for them or by making other financial arrangements.

This was the reply of government spokesmen when asked what was delaying shipment of large stock-piles of the khaki-coloured equipment in railway yards at Vancouver and in the Port Mann district.

Could the minister give any further explanation?

Mr. MacKINNON: There is nothing I wish to say in regard to the newspaper report. The only loan made to the U.S.S.R. is one for $3 million. At the present time negotiations for further loans are not in progress.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the whole of the loan of $3 million been used up?

Mr. MacKINNON: Of the total amount, $2,776,000 has been used.

Mr. QUELCH: Have applications from any nations for loans from Canada been turned down? If so, from what countries?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not know of any that have been actually turned down.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Why has the coming into force of the act been made retroactive?

Mr. MacKINNON: Only this section was made retroactive, and this has been done as a result of operating experience.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Do I understand that something was done which was ultra vires of the original act?

Mr. MacKINNON: The opinion was expressed that the crown might not be an exporter, and we wanted to make that clear.

Mr. GREEN: Has the crown already been an exporter?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What matters are considered by the government before granting a loan to a given applicant? Do we consider the possibility of Canada's being in a position to import the goods that country can produce, or are there other considerations? Might this be called an element in a mutual aid arrangement?

Mr. MacKINNON: There are many reasons for the legislation, one of which is that we consider it a contribution toward the rehabilitation of those countries the economies of which have been temporarily disrupted and which have been overrun by the enemy. It is an act on the part of Canada to assist in the rehabilitation of countries which in the past have been good credit risks and which we hope in the future will again be in that position.

These loans are being made also with a view to increasing mutual trade in the future. We have looked at the records of the countries concerned, the experiences through which they have passed and their prospects for the future.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

LABELLING OF CANS—CANNED FISH OR SHELLFISH

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of bill No. 164, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister given an explanation of this bill?

Mr. BRIDGES: I can only repeat what I said when the bill was introduced on June 3. It is a small bill being comprised of just two sections. The first section is to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act so that it will no longer be compulsory for dealers to have cans of fish or shellfish labeled with the name of the place and/or province where the same are packed. The present requirement causes unnecessary hardship to assemblers who pack or buy a number of products in more than one province, in which case labels have to be made for each type of product and for each province where it was packed. The amendment will make this no longer necessary.

I might also say that the present requirement is now unnecessary, because under the regulations all cans are required to be embossed with the registered mark or number of the cannery in which they are packed.

The second section of the bill substitutes "fish or shellfish" for the word "lobster". This change will provide statutory authority for the establishment of standards of quality and grades for canned fish or shellfish in addition to lobster if the need for such is established to the satisfaction of the governor in council.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

JUDGES

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT OF ACT—ADDITIONAL PUISNE JUDGE FOR EXCHEQUER COURT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Exchequer Court Act to increase the number of puisne judges of the court from two to three, and also to present a measure to consolidate and amend the Judges Act to include provision for the appointment, tenure of office and duties of the judges of the dominion and provincial courts, fixing judges' salaries and providing for the payment of salaries, and for the payment of increased salaries, travelling allowances and annuities to judges and annuities to their wives and widows in certain cases and subject to conditions therein set out.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution contemplates the introduction of two bills. The first one will increase the number of judges of the Exchequer Court from three to four, while the second will increase the salary of all superior courts or district court or county court judges by one-third as from January 1, 1947. As to the first part of the resolution, the Exchequer Court Act was amended in 1944 to provide the court with three judges instead of two, but that increase has proved to be insufficient to cope expeditiously with the business coming before the court. It is felt that it is desirable to make all possible efforts to have litigation disposed of in an expeditious manner.

Moreover, it is felt that with one more judge on the court it will be possible to restrict the calls being made on judges of provincial courts to preside over or take part in royal commissions, special boards or other agencies it may become necessary to set up from time to time to deal with matters which cannot come before the courts in the usual way but which require to be considered in the judicial and strictly impartial way that characterizes the work of our courts of justice.

Hon. members have from time to time expressed concern over the fact that, especially during the war, it was considered necessary to take judges away from their ordinary duties and ask them to assume other important functions for the state which it was necessary to have discharged by gentlemen of their calibre and repute. I have always shared that concern. But other functions needed to be discharged, and it seemed to be in the interest of the state that they be discharged by the persons best fitted to convince the public that they were being discharged in an impartial, competent and objective way.

Similar situations will probably continue to arise, but I hope that with an additional judge on the exchequer court bench it will be possible to draw more frequently from that bench and less frequently take from their ordinary judicial duties the judges of the provincial courts.

The second part of the resolution deals with judges' salaries. The salaries now being paid are those which were fixed in 1920. I think it is fair to say that those salaries are only about two-thirds as high as those being paid for like public service in any of the countries where the administration of justice is modelled on the British system. What is proposed here will make some improvement. If we take 100 as the index of the salaries prevailing generally in those countries where the courts are modelled on the British system, our judicial salaries at the present time would rate about 66.

Mr. BRACKEN: What countries does the minister refer to?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The United Kingdom, countries of the British commonwealth and the United States of America all of which have courts modelled more or less on the British system. The provision now being proposed would bring our rate up to about 88. It is suggested that it is time that this should be done. Those hon. members who were here in 1929 will probably remember that this matter received serious consideration at that time, but a depression overtook the country and it was felt that it was not the proper time to consider judicial salaries. Many people consider that this increase is long overdue. For at least twenty years the Canadian bar association has been urging that this matter be dealt with by parliament. The last committee appointed by the Canadian bar association to deal with the matter looks as if it might be a standing committee of this house. Of the six members comprising the committee, one is the hon. member for Vancouver South and another, the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. GREEN: I was not on that committee; I was never called in to any of the committee meetings.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have a list of the members of the committee and I read: "Howard C. Green, M.P., Rogers Building, Vancouver."

Mr. GREEN: I was never called to a meeting.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope other members of the committee have been more active than the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. GREEN: I never even got notice of any meeting.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps they had such confidence in the Minister of Justice that they did not feel that any further meetings were required since the annual meeting of last summer. Two other members of the committee are the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott).

But quite seriously there is no doubt that we are all highly appreciative of the services rendered to the state by the judicial body. The salaries that are being paid at this time are those that were fixed in 1920. Personally I feel that they are out of line, not only with what are the salaries elsewhere, but also with what prevails for salaries and income in our own country. The suggestion is, now that there is being some relaxation in the controls over wages and salaries, that a provision which will come into effect on January 1, 1947, will not be out of line with what will be happening generally in the readjustment of the post-war period. The increase would be an increase of one-third. The increase would reflect itself automatically in the number of dollars for the retirement pensions but will not be wholly reflected in those provisions. There were provisions in the Judges Act of 1920 whereby judges who were compelled to retire at the age of seventy-five, whether of the federal courts or of the district or county courts, would retire on an allowance equal to full salary. It is not proposed to increase the number of dollars for such cases, and it is not proposed to take from the number of dollars provided by the statute as it at present exists. Thus a county or district court judge is entitled to retire on full salary of $5,000, which is the full salary at the present time, though under this resolution the salary would be increased as from January 1, 1947, his retiring allowance would not go beyond $5,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is there a provision for the retirement of judges at seventy?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; that provision is not changed. The only judges we can retire are judges of the federal courts or judges of the district and county courts. The retiring age is still seventy-five, and I am not proposing to change that at this time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is there a provision for the pension being the same after seventy-five years of age, regardless of the number of years served thereafter by a judge rather than retiring voluntarily at seventy-five?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That provision has existed heretofore. A judge did not increase his pension rights by serving beyond seventy-five years of age.

If I might be permitted to suggest it, I think the house would be in a better position to consider and discuss the proposals if it allowed the resolution to pass and the bills to be introduced and read a first time. Then they would be immediately available for distribution. Hon. members need not feel they are being committed by the adoption of the resolution, but further discussion might, I think with more advantage take place on the second reading of the bill when hon. members will have before them exactly what the proposals are in the form in which they would appear on the statute book if the bills were adopted.

Mr. JACKMAN: Can the minister say how much the increase will amount to in dollars?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will be an increase of one-third.

Mr. JACKMAN: In dollars?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: One-third of the total amount in dollars that is required for the judicial salaries. I did not make the calculation, and the figures in the estimates include travelling allowances. There is no increase in that regard. It would not be an increase of one-third of the total amount that appears in the estimates but an increase of something of the order of $600,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister say a word about the last sentence of the resolution dealing with the payment of annuities to wives and widows in certain cases?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no change in principle there. The hon. member knows that two years ago we provided that a judge on appointment could declare his option to take for himself in his own name only two-thirds of what he would otherwise be entitled to as pension rights and to have the other one-third placed in the name of his wife. If the pension were thus divided, the survivor kept his or her portion after the death of the consort. There is no change in that regard. But perhaps anticipating an objection such as that made this afternoon by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), instead of amending merely the figures, the bill that is being proposed is a consolidation of the whole act so that hon. members will have before them in the bill just what the Judges Act would look like if the bill were adopted.

Mr. BRACKEN: It means no change in principle?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It means no change in principle.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved to introduce bill No. 249, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved for leave to introduce bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL POLICY

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE AS TO STEPS TO BE TAKEN TO MAINTAIN ORDER, STABILITY AND INDEPENDENCE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I wish to announce to the house several important steps which the government is taking in the economic and financial field in order to prevent undue increases in the cost of living and costs of production, improve the effectiveness of price control, encourage a greater supply of scarce goods which we import from other countries, and generally strengthen the stabilization programme and facilitate an orderly post-war adjustment of the Canadian economy while protecting it from the major effects of adverse developments outside our borders.

It is now almost six months since the Prime Minister in a public statement gave a comprehensive review of the anti-inflation policy in the light of the post-war situation. At that time it was said that essential controls would be maintained so long as emergency economic conditions arising out of or resulting from the war required special action to preserve economic stabilty. But it was also stated that, in order to assist the process of conversion from war to peace production and the many adjustments that had to be made to post-war conditions, a degree of flexibility would be recognized in the administration of price control, and that progress would be made in removing controls that were no longer necessary or desirable.

Early post-war developments were not unfavourable. Reconversion unemployment did not occur on the scale which some had feared, demobilization proceeded with comparative smoothness and rapidity, and the evils of both inflation and deflation were avoided. In many lines there has been a marked increase in the supply of goods and services available to consumers, and this will be further apparent to civilian consumers in the near future as the special requirements of demobilized members of the armed forces are satisfied. In the case of some other goods, however, various interruptions have seriously delayed the progress of production and distribution.

When parliament gave its approval to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act last December, it recognized that the emergency economic conditions which prevailed at that time would continue to endanger the stability of the Canadan economy for at least another year, and that certain measures such as price controls and rationing would have to be continued. Most of us hoped that the situation which made these controls necessary would gradually improve. In recent months and weeks, however, a series of developments of increasing seriousness have combined to create a great and growing threat to our national stabilization programme.

Perhaps the greatest threat to the stability of prices in Canada comes from the rise in prices in the United States and, to a lesser extent, in other countries. The present position with respect to the future of price control in the United States is confused and uncertain. Without presuming to forecast what will happen in the legislative sphere, recent developments would seem to suggest that further increases in prices in that country are likely to occur. Indeed, quite aside from recent congressional developments, the fact is that prices in the United States have been rising steadily for some time and are already at a level substantially above the Canadian level when compared with the normal or pre-war position. In view of the strong commercial ties between this country and the United States, this trend has naturally exercised an increasingly strong upward pressure upon Canadian costs and prices, which we have sought to resist or neutralize as best we could. To a lesser extent ,increases in prices in other countries than the United States have had the same effect. Higher prices for Canadian imports tend to push up production costs and the cost of living in Canada, except to the extent that these increases are offset by subsidy payments, or absorbed by Canadian importers and distributors. Every increase in foreign prices for our own export products also stimulates pressures for increases in the domestic price of such commodities. It tends to divert more of these commodities to the export market, and compels us to strengthen our controls over distribution so as to retain sufficient supplies for use in Canada itself.

But while the greatest threat to the stability of prices in Canada arises outside our own borders, the situation in Canada itself is not free from difficulty. The same tendencies that are present in almost every other country to-day are working in Canada also to raise prices. Most of the price increases which have been authorized in Canada in recent months, and which have naturally given rise to concern on the part of the public, were the result of an accumulation of cost increases (increases in labour and material costs and the like) which have been going on for five years. Moreover, the continued shortage of materials, and shortages of labour in certain lines, are tending to raise costs of production still further and to push prices up.

Still other price increases have resulted from the necessity of encouraging the production of needed but less profitable lines of goods as against the more profitable alternatives available to the same producers. The removal or reduction of subsidy payments on certain imports and domestic products have also given rise to price increases in recent months.

On the other side of the picture, it is clear to every observer that, with employment and consumer spending power being maintained the way they have, the demand for goods has continued to rise ever since the end of the war. In this situation many goods are still relatively scarce and this, too, creates another upward pressure on prices.

The whole combination of actual and prospective price rises abroad, shortages of goods which we urgently need from abroad, and delays in domestic production, taken in conjunction with the difficulties of providing effective administration of controls in a transitional period, undoubtedly threaten to undermine price control in Canada unless strenuous measures of defence are taken now.

Accordingly I wish to announce the government's decision to take four major steps to implement this country's determination to maintain order, stability and independence in its economic and financial affairs. These measures we feel will go a long way toward insulating Canada against unfavourable external conditions and easing the inflationary pressures which are now so strong.

The first of these is the issuance of a long but simple and clear list of all goods and services which continue subject to price control, a list which includes practically all articles of significance in the normal household budget and in the costs of production of farmers, fishermen and other primary producers. The result of this will be to suspend from price control a number of less important articles which create administrative trouble and red tape out of all proportion to their importance.

That list is contained in an order of the wartime prices and trade board, of which I am tabling copies now. It tells exactly what goods are subject to price control. The next question is, how is control to be exercised? As regards domestic products the answer is that the principles of price control remain the same as heretofore, that is, maximum prices are based on prices in effect in October 1941, or on specific price ceilings or regulated prices named in orders of the prices board, and price increases are in general authorized by the board only where over-all financial need is proved. As regards imported goods, however, a change is being made which constitutes the second of the major announcements which I have to make. Hereafter all imported goods of a kind subject to price control, unless specifically dealt with on another basis in orders of the board, will be priced on the basis of the importer's landed costs, plus a prescribed maximum mark-up in each case which will be somewhat less than the mark-up normally obtained by distributors of similar domestic goods.

Thirdly, for reasons which I shall discuss at some length later on, it has been decided to adjust the rate of exchange of the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar. This change is effective immediately, that is to say, at 8 p.m. eastern daylight saving time. Banks and other authorized agents of the foreign exchange control board will now buy United States dollars at $1 Canadian funds, and sell at $1.00½. Similarly, the buying rate for pounds sterling will now be $4.02, and the selling rate $4.04. I wish to draw special attention to the fact that persons accepting United States dollars from tourists should now do so at par, that is to say, dollar for dollar, instead of at a premium.

The fourth matter which I wish to mention is that the policy of paying subsidies will remain in effect in order to prevent undue increases in prices of articles of major importance in the consumer's cost of living or in primary producer's costs of production.

Having described in brief the four main features of this programme, I should like now to give the house and the people of Canada some more detailed description and explanation of the steps we are taking.

First, in order to reassure the public and industry that the government has no intention of dismantling the system of price control so long as the emergency exists, we have prepared a definitive and detailed list of all the goods and services which will remain under price control. I am aware that the decision made several months ago to suspend certain goods and services from price control, necessary as that was, has been followed by a certain amount of public confusion and uneasiness. But it will be agreed as a general principle that, as part of our gradual progress towards decontrol, and in order to lighten the heavy burden of administration, it is desirable to remove price ceilings from items which are trivial or unimportant to most consumers or producers, and from all items which are in such ample supply that price ceilings are no longer needed to keep prices within reasonable bounds. The present measure recognizes this and has the effect of removing from control a substantial number of individual items. This measure has the further merit that, by concentrating its attention on those things which matter most, the prices board will be able to make more effective use of the staff at its disposal.

The list of goods and groups of goods and services still under control is very large, so large that some may feel it should be further reduced. It is intended to cover virtually all of the items which are of everyday importance in the household budget, and many more; and also all the items of chief importance in costs of production. In general, basic materials are included and almost all parts and components of consumer goods. So far as the consumer is concerned, practically all food, fuel, clothing, textiles and leather goods remain under control, as well as the significant items under the headings of kitchenware, hardware, household appliances, radios, automobiles, furniture, house furnishings and building materials. The farmer or fisherman will observe that most of the goods he needs to purchase to assist him in production are also included. The control of rents, I should add, remains unchanged.

At this point I want to emphasize that no increase in the ceiling prices of domestic goods remaining under control is involved in this step. The basis of price control continues to be the prices already authorized by the wartime prices and trade board. Demands for price increases will continue to be resisted, except in cases where the financial need of the producer concerned make some upward adjustment imperative.

The second step which the government has authorized the prices board to take, that relating to prices of imported goods, is one which has been forced by external circumstances over which we have no control. The new system may be briefly described as follows: an order of the prices board will be issued establishing maximum mark-ups over landed costs for a wide list of imported consumer goods. The mark-up will be somewhat less than normal, in order to minimize any adverse effect on consumer prices in Canada, prevent pyramiding of foreign price increases, and remove any temptation to handle imported goods rather than domestic goods if domestic goods are available in adequate quantity.

It will be recalled that, commencing in February last, the prices board has been permitting imports from the United Kingdom and those war-ravaged countries which were so recently our allies to enter this country on somewhat the same terms as those now extended to all countries. It is expected that as a result of this action, goods which were in danger of being excluded from Canada in the operation of our own price control policy will begin to be imported more freely as conditions of supply improve. We are taking the view that it is better to get the goods, even at a higher price, than to insist that domestic price ceilings must be maintained on imports, which in many cases makes importation impossible. In so doing we are taking a step towards decontrol and providing for an extension of a two-way system of trade without seriously endangering our price control programme at large. Needless to say, this decision will also assist considerably in easing the administrative burden of the prices board. Applications for specific price increases on imported goods, with the exceptions noted, will no longer be necessary. The general law applicable to such goods is simple and clear, and provides for automatic flexibility in accordance with movements of foreign prices whether up or down.

It should be noted, however, that the new system does not apply to imported foods or to imports of goods eligible for subsidy. Existing price control orders will continue to apply to such goods. There are also a number of other classes of goods such as imported motor vehicles, farm implements and household appliances, which will not be in this list because they are already controlled by specific board orders on a somewhat similar basis, or will be so controlled upon application and investigation.

The adjustment in the exchange rate will help to offset the effect of high and rising prices in other countries. It will mean that the cost of imports will be 10 per cent less, in Canadian-dollar terms, than would otherwise have been the case. This is important in respect of machinery, equipment and supplies, and a wide variety of consumers' goods. In fact, we may hope that in some cases there will be an actual decrease below present costs of imports. In any event, as a result of the movement of the rate, actual or prospective increases in other countries' prices of such items as coal, crude oil, gasoline, farm implements, sisal for binder twine, clothing and textiles, citrus fruits, bananas, coffee, tea, sugar, etc., will be restricted in their effect upon Canadian prices, and the task of holding a reasonable level of costs by means of subsidies on essential imports will be kept within manageable proportions.

Another benefit from this change will be that prices of goods which we normally buy from England, France and a number of other countries will now be more in line with our prices with the result that we will receive more goods from them. They will receive more Canadian dollars from their commerce with us and so be less dependent on inter-governmental loans to finance their purchases from us.

Before dealing further with the question of exchange rate, it will be convenient here to comment on the policy with respect to subsidies. The change in import price policy does not affect imports of materials basic to the cost of living which are presently being subsidized. We may find it necessary to increase these subsidy payments, notwithstanding the government's desire to reduce and ultimately eliminate all wartime subsidies of this character. And the same will be true of certain important domestic subsidies. It had originally been intended that the prices board would be able to withdraw from practically all subsidy arrangements by the end of 1946, and actually a good deal of progress has already been made in this direction. However, as I have said, the government feels the time is not opportune for any further major removal of subsidies and, having in mind the likelihood of rising prices in foreign markets, it is possible that we may not be able to reduce our total subsidy bill for this current year to the extent that we had expected.

I come now to the question of the exchange rate. The other proposals, it might be said, are principles of policy, and make for greater administrative efficiency, and for greater public assurance as to what is under price control, and as to how that control is to be exercised, but they do not actually attack the inflationary pressures at their source, except perhaps through subsidies.

Undoubtedly the greatest present source of inflationary pressure lies in the high and still rising price levels of other countries. Prices in other countries directly affect the prices of our exports and imports, and ultimately, through their influence on costs, affect the prices of virtually all our goods and services. Foreign prices are translated into Canadian equivalents through the medium of the exchange rate, and the question of the appropriate rate of exchange for the Canadian dollar is a matter of major importance in its own right, as well as in relation to price control.

Our present situation is that a very marked difference has developed between the general price levels of Canada and the United States, especially if American prices are translated into Canadian funds by the addition of 10 per cent exchange premium. The depreciation of the Canadian dollar by 10 per cent at the beginning of the war caused an immediate increase in many of our prices as compared with the United States. In the course of time our entire price structure might have reflected, on the average, the full 10 per cent difference in the values of our two currencies. The application of price ceilings, however, came sooner in Canada, and had a more restraining influence on price increases here than in the United States. The result was that by the end of the war our general level of wholesale prices had increased on the whole no more than theirs, despite the 10 per cent exchange differential. In respect of retail prices and the cost of living the disparity is even more marked, for the United States index had by May of this year increased 33 per cent over the level of August, 1939, compared with an increase of 21 per cent in Canada.

It has become increasingly clear that we could not continue to maintain a price structure which is roughly 10 per cent out of balance in terms of our exchange rate, or, looking at it the other way round, to maintain an exchange rate which is roughly 10 per cent out of line with our price structure.

If world prices, or at least American prices, had declined soon after the war, or showed any likelihood now of an early decline, no doubt it would be better for us to continue without changing the rate; but instead United States prices and costs have risen, and it is most unlikely that a major decline of the general price level can occur during the transitional period when both the foreign and the domestic demand for goods is so strong.

Accordingly, when this trend became clear, we were faced with the alternative of either changing the exchange rate, or of setting in motion, as the process of decontrol continued, an increase in our own price and cost structure, more or less to the American level plus 10 per cent. What this last would mean in terms of high cost of living, social unrest, and wage conflicts, can readily be imagined. The government has decided that such an extra measure of inflation, additional to whatever price increases may otherwise be necessary if we are ever to complete the adjustment to post-war conditions, would have the most serious disruptive effects on the entire economic and social structure of our country, and must be prevented by the only action which in the long run can prevent it.

There are a number of further points I should mention, to avoid misunderstanding. I would not want anyone to think that by this action we were conflicting with the rules of the international monetary fund or using up our freedom of action to make other changes at a later time if we saw fit to do so. We propose to notify the fund that the new rate is the proper initial rate for Canada at the time the fund commences to operate. We believe that the circumstances are such as to make this new rate acceptable to the fund as the initial rate for the Canadian dollar. In such event we retain the same freedom as any other member to move the rate later up or down by as much as 10 per cent without the fund's approval, and by other amounts in accordance with the provisions of the fund agreement, if circumstances should arise which made such a move on our part seem necessary and desirable.

I have emphasized, for the sake of clarity, our future freedom of action in this regard. But we do not propose—no Canadian government would ever propose—to move the exchange rate with every passing wind. The present move is only being made after very careful study and deliberation over a considerable period. I should like to reaffirm what I said on June 17 last, when introducing in this house the foreign exchange control bill, with reference to the great advantages obtainable by maintaining exchange stability for as long a period as economic conditions may justify. To maintain that desirable degree of stability, to avoid erratic and frequent fluctuations, as well as to protect ourselves against speculative or otherwise undesirable capital movements, we must maintain the principles and the administrative machinery of foreign exchange control. The present action does not in any way change that, for exchange control is as necessary at one level of rates as at another.

The alteration of the exchange rate at this time takes on added significance in the light of very recent developments in the United States. Even before the recent difficulties over price control legislation, however, price increases in the United States and further increases in prospect as a result of cost increases, were such as to make the case for restoring parity of exchange a strong one on economic grounds. The rapid deterioration in price control in the United States in recent weeks aggravated the situation, and emphasized the need for our action on practical grounds, to cushion the immediate impact of higher United States prices. But whatever the United States may do in the future to revive the office of price administration and restore price ceilings in the United States, the divergence of the price levels in our two countries had already gone too far to permit the continuation of what had become an unrealistic exchange rate.

I have spoken several times of the general level of prices, and of the fact that our price structure as a whole has been prevented, so far, from showing the effects of the 10 per cent exchange premium. The total price level is composed of many different prices, some of which have been held far below the American level; others have, in respect of exports at least, already fully reflected the increases in the United States and the 10 per cent exchange premium as well. It is a fact, therefore, that some industries which export chiefly to the United States have already obtained, for their exports though not for their domestic sales, the benefit of higher American prices which, when converted to Canadian currency, yielded them an additional premium of 10 per cent which will no longer be available.

We must recognize that the disappearance of that premium will have some unfavourable effects for a number of industries. But I think we must also recognize that the action which is being taken is clearly desirable in the interest of the country as a whole, and that therefore it will also be in the long-run interest of Canadian industry. Moreover, this action is being taken at a time when the unfavourable effects will be minimized for practically every one of our great export industries with the exception of gold mining. In the case of agricultural products, for example, export prices are now almost entirely expressed in Canadian dollars rather than in foreign currencies; the same is true of a number of other products, and to the extent that exports to certain markets are still priced in foreign currency, there is in most cases a firm and rising price level in such markets. In any event, our export industries share with our domestic industry the benefits of our stabilization policy and the lower costs of production which it makes possible.

Indeed, unless we absolutely refuse to consider the possibility of ever restoring our dollar to parity with the American dollar regardless of their intrinsic values, it would be difficult to conceive of an occasion more appropriate than the present time.

That completes what I wish to say at this time about specific measures, the strenuous measures which I said earlier the present situation calls for. I believe they are necessary, and that they are also adequate for the job we have to do until full peace-time production is restored and supply is in better balance with demand. But that job is not easy, and success will continue to depend, as we must all recognize it has always depended, upon public understanding and support. That support implies a widespread feeling of responsibility, of restraint, of moderation in individual and collective action.

When all is said and done, the objectives of our national stabilization programme are the preservation of real social values, the protection of the value of real wages, of the real incomes of primary producers, of the real value of the income of pensioners, and teachers and office workers, and of the wartime savings of so many millions of Canadians.

Demands for increases in actual money wages, if pushed to extremes, lead only to conflict and turmoil, and in the end are worthless if they result in skyrocketing prices and a corresponding fall in the value of money. It is to protect the real value of the workman's wage and the purchasing power of the housewife's dollar that we are continuing the struggle to avoid price and wage increases beyond such reasonable amounts as are seen to be justified by changed conditions.

The same is true of farm prices and costs, both the farm household's living costs and the farm operator's costs of production. The farmer above all has reason to fear a substantial increase in his costs, for one thing because he knows how rigid those costs prove to be at a time when his own prices may be depressed. The government has endeavoured by its policy of floor prices to insure farmers against sharp declines in agricultural prices in the future. But in the meantime, and for the future as well, it will be recognized by all farmers as essential to their welfare to keep their costs of production, I do not say absolutely fixed, but within reasonable limits. For this purpose, no amount of increase in farm prices, to be followed by an inevitable decline in the usual boom and collapse cycle could possibly provide adequate compensation. It is the preservation of a reasonable balance that we must strive for, and it is by holding in check the farmer's costs that we can do him the best service.

The war, and the experience of other countries, have indeed taught us the vital importance of keeping all inflationary pressures under firm control until supply and demand conditions are in a more normal relationship. The present Canadian programme should strengthen our hands in that regard. We have removed uncertainties and simplified administration by preparing a specific list of goods and services whose prices are under control. We have reaffirmed the principles of price control, and of adjustments where necessity is proved, in respect of Canadian products. We have established a simple and workable pricing principle for imports, which among other things will ensure a continued flow of whatever goods are available from other countries despite fluctuations in foreign prices. We will reduce the impact of increases in foreign prices of the most essential goods by continuing and if necessary increasing subsidies. Finally, we have taken a step which will reduce the cost of imported goods, or will offset increases that would otherwise occur, through our action in moving the exchange rate to a point which more accurately reflects the true international and domestic value of the Canadian dollar.

TERMS OF SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER INDUSTRY

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): With the consent of the house I might announce that I have just been in conversation with Chief Justice Sloan in Vancouver. The terms of settlement in the strike in the interior area box factories in British Columbia are ten cents across the board; time and a half after forty-four hours, and a number of minor adjustments. The basic adjustment is an increase of ten cents an hour across the board, and I should like to say that I think that would be a very fair yardstick for the settlement of industrial disputes in Canada, where they are of a serious nature.

PRINTING AND STATIONERY

ADVANCES TO KING'S PRINTER FOR PURCHASE OF MATERIALS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of bill No. 245, to amend the Department of Public Printing and Stationery Act.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest that the minister ought to give us a full explanation.

Mr. MARTIN: I did last night.

Mr. GRAYDON: I must have been out of the house at the time.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes; the hon. member was.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister would give us a summary.

Mr. MARTIN: The purpose of the bill is to increase advances to the king's printer. Some years before the war, the advance was $700,000. The auditor general has had to call the attention of the king's printer to the fact that he was spending an amount greater than that on hand. All we are doing is to put into legislative form something that is now provided for by order in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to second reading, but I shall have some questions to ask in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—How expenses shall be met.

Mr. GRAYDON: In dollars and cents, to what extent has the business in the office of public printing and stationery increased from the time the act was originally passed until the present time, when the maximum expenditure may amount to $2 million? I do not suggest that office is spending $2 million, but that is the amount in prospect.

Mr. MARTIN: I have not the figures to show the expenditures when the office of king's printer was established. I would answer, however, by pointing out that the total expenditures by the king's printer, covering both inside and outside printing and stationery, and other miscellaneous revenue, were, in 1939, $4,995,000. In 1945-46 it was about $12 million, or almost three times as much. Of course that was due to a great extent to necessarily increased business during the war. The king's printer estimates that, while the amount in 1946-47 will not be in the neighbourhood of $12 million, it will likely be somewhere between $4 million and $12 million. This is largely due to the increased pressure of business and the demands made on the office of the king's printer. In any event, the amount is well over the $2 million advance.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the difference between the amount spent by the government for printing in the year before the war broke out and the amount spent in the present year?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot say what it will be next year. However, it will be somewhere between $4 million and $12 million; perhaps about $6 million.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about the year before the war?

Mr. MARTIN: In that year, 1938-39, the gross turnover was about $5 million.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I point out that this year we have more committees doing more detailed work than has been done at any time in the last fifteen years. They have all asked that their reports be printed.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy the work of printing which can be related directly to parliament is only a small percentage of the work done by the king's printer. I imagine the increase in work in that office arises to a great extent from documents sent in to the office from outside for printing. For instance, I fancy that the printing charges for the House of Commons, including the printing of Hansard and other house documents, while possibly of considerable extent in themselves, at the same time do not comprise the greater share of the work done by the king's printer. I am wondering whether it is the policy of the government to cut down on unnecessary printing done by the king's printer. An enormous amount of money is being spent by the government upon all kinds of informational and publicity work. This matter has been up before the house on a previous occasion, and I should not like to consent to this bill going through committee unless there was some undertaking by the government that there will be a definite and effective curb upon the printing being put out by the government. If there ever was a government that seemed to be printing-ink conscious, it is this one. I hope the minister will be able to give some undertaking that economies will be effected.

Mr. MARTIN: Special attention is being given to that particular point. While it is not a new post, there is a controller, an official of the department, who pays strict attention to unnecessary expenditure. I may say that the king's printer has so much business to do even now that he cannot possibly handle the full requirements with his own staff and equipment; and every effort is being made, both by the administration and the king's printer, to avoid unnecessary work which means unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is any work that would normally be done by the king's printer farmed out or sublet to other firms in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: During the war there was a great amount. During that period the king's printer was unable to handle forty per cent of the requisitions that were made. That work was farmed out, as it has always been farmed out in varying amounts almost from the time the office of king's printer was established in 1889. Of course, during the days of peace the amount farmed out is not as much as it was during the days of war; but in the light of the present state of the equipment and in the light of the space which the king's printer has at his disposal, there is not much hope of our giving assurance that we can handle all the work, even exercising the greatest diligence on the side of economy. However, the king's printer does a substantial part of it, and to the extent that he does the cost, as compared with work done by commercial firms, is on the side of economy.

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the minister give more details as to the amount of work done outside during the past three years?

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member will look at parliamentary return, reference number 164, he will find the details by provinces for the period he has mentioned.

Mr. MacNICOL: The king's printer does good work, and one of the best jobs he does is to print the speeches of the members of parliament which are mailed out to the ridings in Canada. By this means we are able to keep those whom we represent in touch with what we are doing and saying here. If they read the Hansard we send them they will be able to judge whether we should be returned or left at home. Why has the cost gone up so much that to-day it costs almost a small fortune to send out a few thousand copies containing five or six speeches?

Mr. MARTIN: It is simply a question of increased costs which are made up of additional wages paid to the staff and so on.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there a cost department in the office of the king's printer?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who would ascertain the exact cost in each case?

Mr. MARTIN: There is a specialist in cost accounting in the department.

Mr. FERGUSON: Prior to the war, the estimates for this branch were given as $3,000,000, but now they run between $4,000,000 and $12,000,000. I have seen several of the pamphlets that are put out by the government. One was an expensive lithographed pamphlet advising employers to establish in their plants suggestion boxes into which employees would be able to drop suggestions for improving the business. To my own knowledge, that practice has been in operation for at least twenty-five years and there are a thousand plants in Canada that have had it for over ten years. If the government is to take its money and distribute twenty or twenty-five thousand pamphlets like that, then with the greatest respect I say to the minister that he had better watch some of the departments that are placing orders with the king's printer.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister has been accused of being too strict in that particular, but I can assure my hon. friend that he intends to continue in that regard.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask two questions? How many printers employed in the king's printer's establishment here in Ottawa are members of a trade union? When the king's printer places an order for printing with an outside commercial firm, is it always placed with a union shop?

Mr. MARTIN: I shall have to defer replying to the first question. With regard to the second question I may say that during the war there were some instances, particularly with respect to some very rush requisitions, where that policy was not lived up to. I can assure my hon. friend that every endeavour is made in normal times to give business to such firms, where possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is the policy of the government that printing farmed out is to be placed with union shops?

Mr. MARTIN: It is the policy.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has consideration been given to placing the union label on such printing?

Mr. MARTIN: Consideration has been given to that.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it is the government's policy that farmed-out printing is to be placed with trade union shops will the minister indicate whether consideration has been given to entering into a collective agreement with the printing employees at the printing bureau here in Ottawa?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: When vacancies occur in the higher posts in the department of public printing and stationery are they filled by promotion of employees who have been working there, or are outside persons brought in?

Mr. MARTIN: By promotion as far as is humanly possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: How far up does that policy apply?

Mr. MARTIN: The office of king's printer of course is one that is filled at the pleasure of the crown, but the principle applies to all others.

Mr. FERGUSON: Surely small printing offices which do not belong to a trade union will not be debarred from tendering, provided that they do efficient work?

Mr. MARTIN: That is why I said that every endeavour was made to do that wherever possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: You cannot suit both of us.

Mr. FERGUSON: He can suit the citizens.

Mr. HAZEN: The last sentence in the explanatory note reads:

The amount of two million dollars is considered requisite to meet adequately normal expenses incurred in advance for the printing and stationery requirements of parliament and the departments of government.

Where in the estimates is the cost of printing and stationery requirements shown?

Mr. MARTIN: Office of the king's printer.

Mr. THATCHER: According to information which the minister gave me earlier in the session, 98 per cent of the printing for the government which was done by outside firms this year was printed in Ontario and Quebec. Could the king's printer not give a little more printing to firms in western Canada and the maritimes?

Mr. MARTIN: I anticipated this because the hon. member asked me the question privately some time ago. The king's printer found it almost impossible to place orders with far-away firms under the limitations of the statute, which provided that no orders involving an expenditure over $500 should be placed with outside printing plants without competitive prices having been secured. As a result, the king's printer during the war, through the then secretary of state, asked for authority under the War Measures Act to extend this amount to $2,500. This helped considerably in placing more orders with firms located in the eastern and the western provinces. This privilege could not be used as extensively as we would have liked because of the urgency of so many of the orders and the constant pressure which was placed on the king's printer by various government departments calling for almost immediate production and delivery of the requirements ordered on their requisitions, with the result that in many cases orders had to be placed at most convenient points. Another thing preventing more orders going through firms located at a distance from Ottawa was the difficulty of transportation and the extra cost of shipping stock and returning the finished product to Ottawa.

In an endeavour to give work outside Ottawa during the war, the king's printer gave the privilege to many agents of the government to place orders locally, especially the war finance committee, the wartime prices and trade board, the national defence department, and more especially the directorate of recruiting, on the condition that a complete report of every item was referred to the king's printer, showing the price paid in each case. Since these orders were paid for out of funds of the department placing the order, the statements I submitted in a return some time ago do not fully indicate the exact cost under the operation of the king's printer. However, in no case was authority granted for orders involving more than $500.

In comparing the amounts spent in each province under these conditions and realizing the difficulties under which the department laboured all through the war period, one must keep in mind the facilities of the printing plants in each province. In this regard, I could give a statement of the capital expenditure, personnel, and salaries and wages paid in each province in connection with the printing industry. It would seem reasonable that under the circumstances more orders should be placed in those provinces where the printing facilities were greater, more varied and more adaptable to the nature of the printing material which had to be produced.

With regard to the different amounts of money spent with each printing plant, it is quite difficult to explain the many differences existing between the plants. First of all, there is the difference in their equipment. Then, there is their ability to quote low enough to secure a job and to make delivery in the time allowed. So that every endeavour is made in farming out material to give every province as fair a distribution as possible. The return which I tabled some weeks ago will indicate that while the heaviest expenditure occurred in Quebec and Ontario, that was due in many cases to the ability of printing firms to make prompt delivery, particularly during the war period, and also due to transportation costs and factors of that kind. During the days of peace, when the urgency is not so great, it should be possible to effect a more equitable distribution, and to the extent that that is possible, having in mind all the exigencies, I can assure the hon. gentleman that that will be done.

Mr. BOUCHER: An increase from $700,000 to $2,000,000 is substantial. I wonder if the minister feels that it is really necessary, now that we are through the period where there was such a rush of printing because of the war. The statement which the minister has just made does throw some light on the situation. He said that previously the king's printer had been able to farm out work without competitive bidding up to an amount of $500 and that was later increased to $2,500.

Mr. MARTIN: That was during the war.

Mr. BOUCHER: We who believe in competitive bidding for printing should insist on that rule being adhered to as much as possible, because otherwise we have not that check which has hitherto prevailed. I can appreciate that, while $700,000 may have been sufficient in 1928 it may not be adequate for present requirements, but $2,000,000 is almost three times the $700,000 in 1928, and this is being asked for when the heaviest strain on the printing bureau is over. In the economy which the people of Canada are demanding to-day, we believe that they will demand much greater economy in the printing bureau than we have seen in the last six or seven years, and when that economy is brought into effect it should cut down the necessity for such substantial advances. I believe that, before asking us to raise this $700,000 to $2,000,000, the minister should give a full explanation why such an increase is required.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend, may I say with great respect, is confusing what I had to say about competitive bidding with the bill before the committee. This proposal to raise the advances to the king's printer from $700,000 to $2,000,000 has nothing to do with competitive bidding. The king's printer is not only the king's printer but the supplier to all departments of government of their stationery requirements, such as inks, paper, machines and other supplies. This amount of $2,000,000 does not represent an expenditure of money. It is part of a revolving fund. It is an advance to the king's printer of money which he must have in order to meet current obligations. Otherwise he would get himself into the same position he was in when the auditor general had to point out that he had spent more money than he was authorized to spend out of the then revolving fund. I repeat, it is not an expenditure. It is simply a fund out of which the king's printer is able to pay for stocks and supplies which he must hand out to the various departments of the government in return for which at a later date he receives payment from the departments concerned.

Mr. BOUCHER: I appreciate that this is only working capital; but in view of what the minister has said of the king's printer farming out such a great quantity of work to private enterprise, and since the amount that he can farm out without competitive bidding has been increased from $500 to $2,500, and since we have passed through the period where there was such a strain on the king's printer, I think we should be careful about increasing these advances from $700,000 to $2,000,000 when there is such a demand for economy and the cutting down of expenses in this country. Certainly raising from $500 to $2,500 the value of the work which the king's printer can hand out without competitive bidding at least lends itself to a lack of economy.

[Mr. Boucher.]

Mr. McIVOR: It does seem a big increase from $700,000 in 1928 to $2,000,000. But I would ask the minister, by how much have the general expenses of the labour department, say, and some other departments, increased in that period? As we extend our work we have to pay for it. What I rose to ask, however, was whether the linotype operators or typesetters of the king's printer belong to the civil service?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. McIVOR: Are they eligible to join a union?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: And most of them are members.

Mr. MacNICOL: Should there not be four words added after the word "requisitions", so that the sentence would read:

. . . for the execution of orders given or requisitions made under the provisions of the act, and to pay the wages of workmen engaged in the execution of such orders or requisitions the established union rate.

Mr. MARTIN: With regard to wages paid men who work in the office of the king's printer, the wage paid is the average of the wage paid in the cities of Montreal and Toronto. An adjustment was made last fall. There is a periodical revision and the last revision was made at that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where you farm orders of the king's printer around the country, are the men engaged in printing in the smaller shops assured the average union rate?

Mr. MARTIN: They are paid the prevailing rates.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the Department of Public Works lets a contract for the erection of a building it is stipulated in the contract that the men engaged in the work are to receive for all trades the standard established union rate.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that the printing staff are all what we call prevailing-rate employees; that is to say, they get the prevailing rate in that particular trade in localities surrounding Ottawa.

Regarding the point raised by the hon. member for Davenport, my understanding was that in all contracts let by the government there is a fair wage clause, and that would also mean the prevailing wage for the particular kind of work where government work was being done. Did the minister indicate that that was not the case in regard to these contracts?

Mr. MARTIN: As far as possible that is done. A small order amounting to $450 was given the other day to a small shop in a little town. In such a case it is difficult, where the order is small, to exercise a full supervisory direction. I am going to have that matter looked into and possibly we can take a definite step in that direction. Perhaps by the time my estimates come up I shall have something more definite to report.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am going to show the minister how he can save a great deal of money. My suggestion is that he cease printing menu cards in the restaurant. We have all been here for three months now. Our memories are not all bad and we all know the particular kind of poor food that we shall get every day. The food may be all right when it reaches the restaurant, but when it reaches us it is simply terrible, so let us not bother about printing these cards any more. Just let us go and take chuck. If they mix it all together and make a good stew it will be infinitely better than the courses we get now.

Mr. KNOWLES: When a member gets the answer "yes" he should be satisfied, but I wish the minister would be a little more enthusiastic, to say the least, about this question of whether or not consideration that is really worth anything is being given the matter of a collective agreement with the employees and also the use of the union label. So often we get the answer that consideration is being given that it is not always convincing. Hence I ask the minister to indicate to the committee the precise stage at which that consideration now stands.

Mr. MARTIN: The matter is actively under consideration. The hon. gentleman knows that when I say "yes" in answer to that kind of question I mean this.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF TRADE WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a corporation to be known as the Canadian Commercial Corporation empowered to assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations and to assist persons in Canada to obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada and to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada. Provision is made for grants to the corporation from unappropriated moneys of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts not exceeding in the aggregate ten million dollars and other grants out of the consolidated revenue fund as authorized.

He said: On April 2 of this year I tabled in the house an order in council establishing the Canadian Commercial Corporation. At that time I pointed out that in the present disturbed condition of world trade there are many transactions which cannot be handled entirely by private business and that, in order to deal effectively with many urgent transactions then in hand, it was necessary to bring the corporation into being as rapidly as possible by order in council.

That order in council, P.C. 1218 of March 29, 1946, became effective on the first day of May, and on that date the property, obligations and rights of the Canadian export board were assumed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

The legislation now before the house will enable the corporation to serve the needs of Canadian business on a continuing basis so long as the requirements of international trade demand.

As I have already mentioned, one of the principal obligations which the Canadian Commercial Corporation will be called upon to discharge is the work hitherto performed by the Canadian export board which made purchases in Canada for foreign governments and for the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. I should refer here to the work done by the Canadian export board in this very important field.

The Canadian export board was established in January, 1944, to buy essential non-military supplies in Canada for other governments. Its work has developed steadily in scope and importance since that date. Among the countries for whom purchases have been made by the Canadian export board are the United Kingdom, and the United Kingdom crown colonies, Australia, India, Southern Rhodesia, France, Russia, South Africa, New Zealand, Belgium, the Netherlands, the Netherlands East Indies, Norway, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, China and also, of course, purchases for UNRRA. The actual value of the contracts placed by the board as of April 30, 1946, totalled $404,274,550. The value of goods on requisitions raised by the board and transferred to the Canadian Commercial Corporation for future action is estimated to be $41,142,310.

In order to accommodate large quantities of goods such as clothing, soap, farm implements, leather and fertilizer purchased by the Canadian export board on behalf of UNRRA it became necessary for the board to establish several packaging and storage warehouses. These are located at Halifax, Saint John, St. Lambert, Lachine, Beauharnois and Winnipeg. The stores are held in the warehouses and shipped overseas from time to time as vessels become available.

It is beyond question that the services rendered during difficult war years by the Canadian export board in obtaining essential civilian goods for members of the British commonwealth and foreign governments were of great importance to the export trade of Canada. Wartime restrictions made normal trading activities impossible in most instances and consequently the establishment of this government agency was invaluable both to buyers and sellers. In many cases the purchases made by the Canadian export board for the governmental agencies of other countries provided the only means whereby Canadians were able, at least in part, to supply traditional markets, in addition to which they assisted in introducing Canadian goods into new export markets.

The work which the Canadian Commercial Corporation will undertake, however, will embrace both the export and the import fields, and I believe that it will be useful to the house if I summarize in broad outline the projected activities of the corporation under both these heads, and refer briefly to the policies of government which underlie them.

All contracts placed by the Canadian export board and not completed as of May 1 were automatically transferred to the Canadian Commercial Corporation without specific amendment. I should like to emphasize, as a point of considerable importance, that while the corporation is government owned and controlled, the contractual relationship between buyer and seller is greatly improved by the establishment of the corporation. As a separate entity, the corporation may sue or be sued in its own name in an appropriate court of justice.

In general, the corporation acts only as an agent and does not of itself initiate purchases in Canada. Nevertheless, at the request of Canadian suppliers, it will bring commodities available in Canada to the attention of those whom it represents, supplementing in this regard the foreign trade service of my department. Should such inquiries result in orders, the contracts would then be let by the corporation. One exception to this is the purchase by the corporation of canned fish, surplus to Canadian requirements, at prices arranged in collaboration with the Department of Fisheries. The stocks so purchased are held in storage awaiting release on allocation by the combined food board.

The corporation will not encroach upon the activities of private business; in fact, one of its primary objectives will be to assist it directly in many important ways. For example, in the import field, it will aid Canadian traders in obtaining essential supplies from ex-enemy territories under military occupation. It is impossible now, and may be for some years, to permit private business to be transacted in a normal fashion between ex-enemy nationals and private concerns in other countries, including Canada—this will apply particularly during the process of reorientating the Japanese and German economies toward peaceful occupations. During this period it will be the responsibility of the occupation administrations to control all industry in these countries and foreign commerce will, of necessity, have to be transacted through government agancies. The measuring-rod for the entrance into Canada of supplies from these areas will be the needs of Canadian business, it being borne in mind that exports from such countries must be permitted in order to pay for necessary imports.

The situation regarding goods available for export from ex-enemy countries is still obscure. Some commodities certainly will be available for export from these areas before long. The corporation is at present endeavouring to arrange for representatives abroad through whom specific information will be obtainable in response to enquiries from Canadian businessmen. In the meantime, the corporation will welcome inquiries from those interested, but it must be emphasized that it may be difficult for some time to obtain precise information.

As far as these ex-enemy areas are concerned, the function of the corporation would be to assist the Canadian importer by acting as an intermediary, having a position of prestige recognizable by the export licensing and foreign exchange government organizations of the foreign governments or military occupation administrations concerned. The corporation would be expected to certify that the goods would be permitted entry into Canada and that the necessary foreign exchange will be provided in payment. It would thus enable a private shipper in the other country to obtain an export licence. The terms of the transactions, for example arrangements as to shipment, insurance coverage, and the purchase from the foreign exchange control board of the foreign exchange involved would all rest in private hands to the fullest extent permitted by the exigencies of international trade.

The corporation in all instances, except when purchasing on government account, will require suitable coverage in the appropriate foreign exchange, in the form of guarantees on acceptance of the order, and actual exchange on acceptance at seaboard in the countries of origin.

The Canadian Commercial Corporation also will provide a means which, if desirable, can be used, in the future, for purchasing commodities under international allocation or foreign government control such as sugar, tea, oils and fats which may, owing to the shortages which now exist, continue under such governmental regulation for some time to come. Although the corporation thus provides machinery capable of assuming responsibility for the bulk purchasing now carried out by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, it is not proposed that it shall do so, so long as profit control and subsidies remain in effect.

In its capacity of purchasing agent, the Canadian Commercial Corporation will award contracts on the basis of competitive sealed tenders in all cases where it is practicable to do so—having regard, of course, to the utilization of surplus stocks owned by the crown. Save where the goods to be exported are in free supply, a clearance is obtained from the export permit branch of my department, before purchase action is initiated, so that there is no danger of the domestic market being stripped of essential supplies by the export purchasing of the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

The Canadian Commercial Corporation will make a small charge for its services for the purpose only of covering the cost of its administration expenses.

Despite the fact that there is no compulsion on any of the agencies representing other governments to avail themselves of the purchasing machinery of the corporation, the extensive use made of its facilities and those of its predecessor, the Canadian export board, indicates clearly the appreciation of such governments of the manner in which the work has been carried out and the ready access to the Canadian market thus afforded them.

I have spoken at this length to give the house as full a statement as possible of the purposes which the Canadian Commercial Corporation was incorporated to serve and the principles under which it will operate. There is, however, one point I cannot stress too strongly; that is, that the policy of government by which the Canadian Commercial Corporation will be guided is that it shall, at all times, seek to provide supplementary services necessary to assist Canadian traders to obtain access to world markets. I do not propose that it shall occupy, or in any way trespass upon, the field normally reserved for private business. I would like to make that assurance as clear and emphatic as possible. I believe that this corporation will play a role of growing magnitude in assisting the vigorous expansion of Canadian trade which, during the years immediately ahead, will be of such vital importance to us all. That is why I respectfully commend this Bill to the favourable consideration of the house. It is not practicable at this time to anticipate just what calls for assistance may be made upon the corporation by private business from time to time, as, for instance, in the case of state trading by other nations, and it is felt that it would be unwise to delimit its purposes and usefulness by a too precise detailing of its activities. These functions inevitably will be influenced by practical experience, the acknowledged needs of Canadian business, and the changes occurring so swiftly in the pattern of world trade in these difficult days, but the welcome already extended to the Canadian Commercial Corporation by the Canadian business community provides ample proof that this new agency is destined to make a most constructive contribution to the restoration, development and enlargement of our trade.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the minister on the resolution concerning the Canadian Commercial Corporation have been interesting, and I am sure the house took it as a matter of some importance that already this organization had purchased some $404,000,000 worth of goods, probably mainly for other countries the minister did not name and for UNRRA.

Mr. MacKINNON: That was the predecessor of this organization.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is right. As I understand it, this bill is to incorporate by statute the Canadian Commercial Corporation which was set up under P.C. 1218, dated March 29, 1946. The minister did remark, however, that he expected this agency would have a continuing basis. While Canadian businessmen may have found it of some use during the transition period following the close of the war, I wonder whether or not it really has a function in our economy as a permanent fixture. I say that because Canadian business does not want to see our government engage in state trading. While Canadian business is willing to accept what help the government should provide in the way of information, consular service and so on, I believe its opinion is that the actual trading, the buying and selling, should be left to the businessmen themselves.

May I just say that one approaches this resolution without as much knowledge of the background as one might wish, with the exception of that which the minister was good enough to give us this evening. It is not often that a government department will get requests from this side of the house for more publicity, but I think it was news to most of us on this side that this agency had purchased $404,000,000 worth of commodities for the account of others. That is an item of some importance, and if we knew about these matters as we went along we would be able to grasp more fully exactly what this resolution envisages.

I was glad to hear the minister say that it was not the intention of this corporation to encroach upon private business, but merely to be helpful. May I point out, however, that in the order in council are certain provisions which, I take it, will be incorporated in the bill when it comes down, pretty much in their present form, and those provisions are extraordinarily broad in their wording. For instance, the corporation may carry on the business of—

(a) importing goods and commodities into Canada,

(b) exporting goods and commodities from Canada, and

(c) storing and processing goods and commodities, either as principal or as agent, in such manner and to such extent as it deems advisable to achieve the said purposes.

It will depend a great deal upon who is running the corporation as to whether or not there will be conflict and interference with those endeavouring to carry on private businesses. The powers contained in the order in council, which, I suggest, will be incorporated pretty much word for word in the bill, are great, and perhaps the minister ought to consider limiting those powers if that can be done without too severely hampering the purposes of the corporation. Certainly in the hands of some we can see that these powers are so broad that they could deal a deathblow to free enterprise.

As I said, we have not had much information about this corporation heretofore. Perhaps we do not fully appreciate all the purposes it serves, and it is a little too much to expect that even after the remarks of the minister we can understand exactly what it means. But if there is an economic need to be filled by this corporation; if the providing of it is not a matter of charity on the part of the government; if it is economically sound and not likely to involve the country in loss, then I do not see why those who are engaged in exporting and importing, even though they be foreign governments or foreign agencies, cannot provide the necessary machinery themselves instead of relying upon the government to do so. If there is a particular reason why Canadians—and I refer to businessmen particularly—are not as adventurous in the export field as one might expect them to be, it cannot be that they are short of capital. As everyone knows, our savings deposits are to-day greater than ever before. More capital is awaiting investment, and much of it is willing to adventure; but I suggest that if this money is not adventuring in the foreign field to develop some of these markets the minister has in mind, it is because the tax rate on businessmen is such that there is very little advantage to them in venturing their money where there is a substantial degree of speculation and risk. May I just quote from the Ottawa Journal of this evening a statement by Mr. Gordon Cockshutt, president of the Canadian chamber of commerce, who said:

> This year's budget ignored the relief Canadians had a right to expect and which was promised in the previous budget address. There is no tax relief announced for the current year and only niggardly gestures for 1947 . . .
> Instead of offering hope and encouragement to individuals and business to stimulate production, the reverse is the case. We cannot emphasize too much that maximum production alone can provide the goods for consumers at home and abroad and, equally important, that maximum production is the most effective anti-inflationary measure.

I merely quote that statement to indicate how the taxation laws of this country are interfering with all business, and the export business in particular. If companies wish to engage in the export business I believe there is a real need for the grouping of potential exporters into little organizations so that they can afford to send a man abroad to take orders and investigate markets for their particular products. But if they do engage in the hazardous occupation of endeavouring to sell in foreign markets and thus provide work for our own workmen, they will find that their little corporation is taxed thirty per cent on any earnings it may have, with the possibility of a provincial tax being levied in addition. If they are a new corporation they probably will have a fixed rate of earnings under the excess profits tax, and any earnings above the fixed rate, which would be only perhaps five, six or seven per cent, which is a niggardly return when one risks one's capital and may easily lose it in a foreign country, would be subject to the excess profits tax. One has to have a higher premium than that in order to break even, because of the large number of failures. So that if the small corporation does succeed in making something, it is first of all subject to a thirty per cent plus tax, and those individuals who would risk their money—and I hope they would not be widows and orphans, because theirs is not the type of money which should go into adventurous enterprises connected with the development of foreign trade—those businessmen who have incomes of $10,000 a year or more are taxed very heavily. If a man has $10,000 a year and he invests his money in this little corporation to develop trade and to fulfil the function which apparently the government is trying to do at the present time for him, he will find that what is left to him after the corporation tax is paid will be taxed in the personal income brackets at not less than forty-six per cent. If he happens to be a man with $13,000 a year or over in income, all the earnings he gets out of the corporation by way of dividends will be taxed fifty per cent. If he happens to be a man who can really afford to go into this type of development in Central America or South America or the orient, where the risk is very high, and where one finds not only business risks but also political risks, and if he is a man with an income of $100,000 he will find that all the money he gets as income from the corporation is taxed by the government at the rate of seventy-five per cent.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How much does that leave him?

Mr. JACKMAN: If he has made $10,000 from the corporation, in addition to his ordinary income, $3,000 of it would be taxed away in the corporation itself, which leaves $7,000. And seventy-five per cent of the $7,000, which would be three-quarters of it, would be taken away, with the result that he would get about $2,000, after risking his capital in the company. Therefore, so far as the government is concerned, it is a case of heads we win, tails you lose, because, if he loses, 100 per cent of his money is gone and he gets no reimbursement for it.

If we wish to stimulate activity and adventure we must offer commensurate returns. My suggestion is that, so far as our export market is concerned, the tax rate in this country does a great deal to prohibit, if indeed it does not completely prohibit those who would venture their money in foreign fields in order to expand markets for Canadian products and give work to Canadians.

So I suggest to the minister it might very well be that if he finds his department has to go into certain fields which ordinarily would be taken care of by businessmen themselves, it is not because those men lack adventure or lack capital, but because, if they are successful, they get little or no returns for their effort, owing to our tax laws. If they are not successful they have to bear the full brunt themselves.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the chamber during the whole of the minister's statement, but from reading the resolution I see no reason why we should not welcome a bill such as is proposed at this time.

The speech made by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) reminded me of some adventure books I read about thirty-five or forty years ago.

An hon. MEMBER: "Good Manners"?

Mr. MacINNIS: One of them, I remember quite vividly, was entitled "Under Drake's Flag". Evidently the hon. member is living in those days.

Mr. JACKMAN: Those good old days.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, good old days—although I do not think most people would want to go back to them. They were good old days, in those days; but I believe, if we use our intelligence, sufficient things have happened since the time of Queen Elizabeth to enable us to have a much better life than the people of those days ever thought about. As a matter of fact, I think we are having a much better life. There is, for one thing, a great deal more humanity in the world to-day.

But, may I ask, why in the world should the people of Canada have to depend upon a group of individuals, who have got control of a little money, to develop trade between Canada and other countries?

Mr. JACKMAN: Because they can do it so much better.

Mr. MacINNIS: It does not appear that they can. As a matter of fact, there was no such measure as that now proposed by the minister on the statute books of Canada prior to 1930. What happened to Canada's trade at that time?

Mr. JACKMAN: Political interference.

Mr. MacINNIS: Political interference? It was not political interference at all. It was the failure of private business to venture capital. They had ventured so much that they did not know what to do about it. They could not venture any more under the system of scarcity which is essential to private capital.

Mr. JACKMAN: They had ventured too much.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Rosedale remarked that Canadian business does not want the government to engage in trade. But fortunately the government is not just representing Canadian business. The number of businessmen who have put this government into office, or, for that matter, any other government which might hold office here, are infinitesimal as compared with the population of Canada. Surely the rest of Canada should receive some consideration.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was speaking for all of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend failed to speak for all when he spoke. But he did speak definitely for Canadian business. He told us what Canadian business did not want and what it did want.

I am satisfied that whether we in this house like it or not, we have entered into a period of bulk buying and bulk selling. I quite understand that this bill is not intended for that purpose. Nevertheless it is a step in that direction, and one which is made necessary by developing conditions. I am willing to take one step at a time, provided that those steps are taken soon and often enough.

This party welcomes the measure, and that is all we shall say until we have an opportunity of studying the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. GREEN: After the enthusiastic remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, I suggest that the government should give careful consideration to the bill. When there is such enthusiastic support of a measure which appears to be moving toward socialism it is time that ordinary Liberals, or those members who call themselves Liberals, should look under the bed to see just what the measure contains.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We might find a Tory under there.

Mr. GREEN: Is this corporation intended to be a permanent agency of the government, or is it only temporary and intended to operate during the transitional period from war to peace? I gathered from the minister's statement that the government intends to have the corporation carry on permanently.

That is directly contrary to the intention shown by the order in council. I would refer hon. members to the preamble of the order in council which reads:

> Whereas the Minister of Trade and Commerce reports that by reason of the continued existence of the national emergency arising out of the war against Germany and Japan, it is advisable for the purpose of facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace that the order hereinafter set forth be made.

That preamble clearly shows that when the order in council was drawn the intention was that this corporation would be of a temporary nature. Paragraph 4 of the order sets out:

> The corporation is established for the following purposes:
> (a) to assist transition in the development of trade between Canada and other nations during the period of transition to normal from the exceptional trading conditions existing during the war, and
> (b) to assist during the aforesaid period His Majesty's Canadian subjects—
> (i) to obtain goods or commodities from outside Canada, and > (ii) to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada.

I think there are one or two other references in the order in council which would lead one to believe that the corporation is to be just of a temporary nature.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: What is the intention of the government with regard to the permanency of this corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: The bill is intended to take care of the needs of Canadian business during the transitional period and only as long as it is required by Canadian business.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us an estimate of the length of time the corporation will be required? The government must have given consideration to this factor and it would be helpful if we knew.

Mr. MacKINNON: From appearances at the present time we expect it will be a short period.

Mr. GREEN: Two or three years?

Mr. MacKINNON: Two or three years.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister explain why this work could not be carried on by the Canadian export board? Apparently that board operated effectively during the war in purchasing non-war goods for export, and it does seem questionable that a corporation should be set up. There is a further feature. The Canadian export board was directly under the department and therefore more closely under the control of parliament. I may be wrong, but I think that was the picture. Now a corporation is to be set up which will be practically out of the control of parliament. According to the order in council setting up the corporation, no provision is made for a report to be filed in parliament. In effect, there will be no control over the corporation. Why is it necessary to set up a corporation to take over the business of the board, particularly when it is to continue for only two or three years?

Mr. MacKINNON: There are a number of reasons why it was necessary to have the powers that will be asked for in the bill to carry on the work formerly carried on by the Canadian export board. I would much prefer to go into the details of these matters when we are in committee and my officials are before me. I should like to comment upon the suggestion by the hon. member for Vancouver South that this corporation will not be as close to the department as was the Canadian export board.

Mr. GREEN: Not as close to parliament.

Mr. MacKINNON: Not as close to the department and to parliament. I think, through the department, it will be just as close to parliament as was the Canadian export board.

Mr. GREEN: How much will the activities of this corporation cost the country? Can the minister give the approximate number of employees who will be working for this crown company and state whether they will be subject to the Civil Service Act? I notice that the order in council setting up the corporation provides, just as have other measures setting up crown companies, that employees may be hired quite apart from the civil service commission. In other words, this appears to be another example of setting up a super civil service.

Mr. MacKINNON: It is impossible at this time to give details of the cost of the operations of this corporation. It is taking over the Canadian export board which now employs approximately 120 individuals. We have also secured the services of four of special experience. One or two of these have been with the Department of Munitions and Supply, at present the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, while the chief official has been secured on loan from the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. GREEN: At what salary?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not sure at the moment what the salary is, but I can get that information. In answer to the second question I may say that the individuals at present employed by the Canadian export board, whether temporaries or on loan from other departments, are being retained. The salaries of the extra officials to whom I have referred will be along the lines of civil service salaries.

Mr. GREEN: What are the salaries of the executive officers?

Mr. MacKINNON: Surely that is information I could give while the officials are in front of me.

Mr. GREEN: The minister says he can give only an idea of the cost. Surely there will have to be a vote to cover the cost of this corporation and careful consideration must have been given to what the cost will be. For example, the order in council provides for a capital of $10,000,000. Have we already paid out that $10,000,000? What additional sum will be required during the fiscal year?

Mr. MacKINNON: Surely my answer that I could not give the exact figures as to the cost of this organization was a proper one. It is a large organization, comprising 120 or 125 employees. It is impossible to state what the cost would be for a year, but I could give the figures as they exist to-day. It is an organization that will expand or possibly contract according to the needs of Canadian business and the demands made upon the services of the corporation.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister not asking for a vote to cover the expenses of the corporation during the fiscal year?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us to-night how much he is asking for that purpose?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Mr. THATCHER: What can this corporation do which the trade commissioners cannot do? If the corporation is set up, will our trade commissioners come under it?

Mr. MacKINNON: No; this is a corporation entirely outside of the trade commissioners.

Mr. THATCHER: Will there not be duplication there?

Mr. MacKINNON: No. The work of the corporation will not cause any duplication.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister explain to the committee, although he may feel that he has explained it already in presenting the resolution when he said that the corporation had purchased on behalf of foreign governments and others goods to the value of $404,- 000,000, what there is that the corporation can do in the months to come that cannot be done by businessmen for themselves if they are willing to do it? Why do we need the interposition of this government agency to do something in connection with business? Is there something so peculiar about these arrangements that we must set up an organization with 120 employees, taking them out of production and putting them on the backs of the taxpayers, so that we can never get any incentive restored to business itself?

May I say in regard to the second part of the resolution, which says that this corporation is to create export markets for Canadian products, that surely that has been the purpose of the Department of Trade and Commerce for many years, practically ever since it has existed. Is this corporation now to take over that function?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not remember making any such statement.

Mr. JACKMAN: The two copies of the order in council were sent up to the debates office and are not available to us, but it consisted of two sections, and the purpose was (a) to find goods for import into Canada and (b) to find outlets for Canadian goods. I think I am correct in that statement. I should like to know whether or not this corporation is to find markets for Canadian goods or find out what there is to know about such markets. Take, for example, the bacon market in Great Britain. Is that to be the function of this corporation? I do not understand the real need for this corporation apart from the fact that it is handling business for UNRRA and foreign governments. What is it going to do that business cannot do for itself? I do not think I can put it any more clearly than that. I do not know whether the minister can give me a clearer statement of exactly what it is going to do that Canadian business cannot do for itself. For the benefit of my hon. friend the member for Vancouver East, when I say Canadian business I mean the whole Canadian people, but it is the businessmen who must take the responsibility and leadership in these matters. I do not see what this corporation can do that businessmen cannot do for themselves if given a fair break.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, this resolution—

Mr. JACKMAN: Just a moment. I was waiting for an answer from the minister. I do not want to go back to the days of Drake, but even in those days we had those who would scuttle the ship.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. MacKINNON: This corporation is not set up to find markets for our goods. It is set up to make purchases in Canada for foreign demands. It provides machinery not now available to private trade.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the minister speaking of exports or imports?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am speaking of exports.

Mr. MacINNIS: This resolution has been on the order paper since May 28, and I imagine that since that time business firms and business organizations such as chambers of commerce and boards of trade have had an opportunity to see it and study its implications. I would ask the minister how many protests against this measure he has received from business organizations.

Mr. MacKINNON: No protests, no adverse criticism, no objections whatsoever; nothing but commendation, and a great deal of commendation, from business generally.

Mr. GREEN: Of course nobody knew anything about the bill until to-night.

Mr. MacINNIS: The resolution has been on the order paper since May 28, and its purpose is clearly outlined by its language. Businessmen would realize its implications just as quickly as we would, and would be in just as good a position to judge of the value of the measure as we are. So I would suggest that there is really something wrong here to-night; either businessmen do not know their own business, or they are not properly represented in this house.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I think this resolution has been brought about, not so much from the desires of the government, as from necessity, because of the trend there is in the world to-day. I have a clipping here from the Montreal Standard of June 22, giving an interview with Robert W. Keyserlingk, managing director of the British United Press. He points out:

> Canada, hoping for trade in post-war Europe, is confronted by the fact that in order for them to buy from us we must first lend them the money.
> She is confronted, too, with the ceaseless and boundaryless conflict between individualism and collectivism. For collectivism has already gone further in fact in Europe than it has even in theory over here.

The point is this. Over in Europe, in the major trade centres of the world, our government is entering into business direct with other governments, buying and selling, because that business cannot be handled by individual businessmen. They can work only in and through this corporation. The nations of Europe are demanding long-term loans and trade and commerce; and only governments, not private individuals, can carry on trade with them. If, as suggested by members of the Progressive Conservative party here tonight, the government did not bring in such a bill as this, it would mean that we would be isolated from the major trade routes of the world. It is not a question of what you want or do not want. It is a question of what you have to do when you are facing a given condition. It would be nonsensical not to put through such a bill as this, and the government has come to that conclusion through being faced with hard facts. More and more this government will have to enter into this form of enterprise, whether they like it or not. Some of the ministers have stated that they are going to solve our problems through good old Manchester Liberalism. But here is proof that this government is entering into trade relations with other governments.

Mr. JACKMAN: In answer to one or two suggestions made by the hon. member for Vancouver East, I am sure that the help the government is getting from the left wing must be valuable. The hon. member who last spoke said that this is a clear example of the manner in which our government is being forced into the position of trading with other governments. Certainly that is not what we believe, and what I think the majority of Canadians believe, is the best thing for Canadian prosperity and our standard of living. The hon. member for Vancouver East did have a word or two to say on the question whether or not business in Canada liked this measure. May I say to the minister that those of us in the official opposition who may appear to be critical of the measure are not necessarily against it; but even if certain organizations may or not have put their imprimatur on it that is no reason why we should not carefully examine the legislation instead of passing it without looking into it, as our friends of the C.C.F. would do. There is a strong tinge of socialism in it and that is to them proof of its goodness. I suggest to the minister that, while we may seem unduly critical at times, so far as this measure is concerned, all we wish is to understand it and to make sure that it is in the interests of the Canadian people, because we represent all the people in our ridings and not any particular section, as those in some parties may or may not do. We want to know what it is about, and it is a fair question to ask whether the minister intends this measure to have a long life or a short one during the transition period. He has told us that he expects it will expire in the course of two or three years. I hope that is the story that he is telling the able men whom he is getting to administer the legislation, because you cannot pick good men out of the hat, offer them employment for a few years and then drop them unless the department will find a place for them afterwards. That is, I suggest again, another reason that the less government has to do with business, the better it will be all around. Business is a continuing affair; at any rate it strives to be continuing, and you cannot keep the best brains employed and expect them to serve you for a few years if you do not provide some other place for them when you cease to have need of them. The minister has said that the life of this corporation will be, he expects, only two or three years.

Mr. GREEN: The minister spoke of the purchasing of commodities under international control. When he made his statement on April 2 he referred to sugar, tea, oils and fats. Will he tell us how these commodities have been purchased hitherto for Canadians?

Mr. MacKINNON: The commodities mentioned have been purchased by the Canadian export board up to the present time.

Mr. GREEN: For how many years has that been done? Have they been buying all the tea, oils, fats, and sugar?

Mr. MacKINNON: I would not like to give a definite answer to that question at the moment. I think it is only reasonable and fair when a minister is presenting a bill, while he is being questioned on the technical aspects of the legislation, that he should have his officials in front of him. It is only a short time before we shall be going over the whole question again, and I suggest that the questions which are being asked now can best be answered when the officials are here.

Mr. GREEN: The house is in committee now. Ordinarily the minister would have his officials before him at this very time. If they are not here it is not our fault; it is his own fault, and he has no right to suggest that a member of the opposition asking questions should wait until the house is in committee on the bill. When the house is in committee on the bill it will be after the second reading and the principle of the bill will have been approved.

Mr. MacKINNON: Whether correctly or not, I have been informed that the officials are not allowed on the floor of the house until a bill is before the committee after second reading.

Mr. GREEN: That is not right.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is why they are not here.

Mr. GREEN: That, I submit, is not correct. I would ask the opinion of the leader of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The officials may be present at any time the minister desires to have them here.

Mr. MacKINNON: They would have been here if I had understood that.

Mr. GREEN: The minister in his statement dealing with the purchasing of those commodities under international control said something about the Canadian export board importing them. I had understood that the work of the Canadian export board was to purchase goods in Canada and export them. We would like to know whether the work of the board went farther and included the purchase of goods to be imported into Canada and, if so, how far the board went in that direction. We are entitled to know that while we are in committee on the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON: As far as I can see, the bill goes beyond the ordinary conception of trading relations. How does this Canadian Commercial Corporation handle the goods it gets from outside countries when it brings them into Canada? What will happen after they get into Canada? I take it that the government would not go into the business of retail selling, but would distribute, for example, to a firm or other distributors. What would be the method of disposing of merchandise once it came into the country?

Mr. MacKINNON: When Canadian firms wish to buy in foreign countries where there is at present no machinery for private trading, this corporation will step in and do that buying.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It will take the orders.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes, just as agents.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It will purchase the goods and bring them back and turn them over to companies in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. JAENICKE: Will the corporation handle grain and other agricultural products?

Mr. MacKinnon: No, because there are facilities for handling those commodities at the present time.

Mr. BENTLEY: I presume the corporation will act as agent or broker for the federated consumer cooperatives and other organizations of that nature doing business in this country in bringing supplies from overseas, the same as for private business.

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation will act for anyone in need of the special services which it will provide.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister answer the question I asked a few minutes ago as to the way in which the Canadian export board has been purchasing and importing commodities under international control such as sugar, tea, oils and fats?

Mr. MacKINNON: I did not give the hon. member for Vancouver South the correct information earlier. I am informed that up to the present time none of these articles has been purchased by the Canadian export board but has been handled by the commodity prices stabilization corporation of the Department of Finance.

Mr. GREEN: Then this importing business is to be transferred from the stabilization board to the new corporation. Is that the plan?

Mr. MacKINNON: Eventually that may happen. This corporation is not taking over the commodity prices stabilization board, but is actually performing certain operations which are not being dealt with by the stabilization board. I am informed that this corporation is not going to become involved in subsidies in any way. The purchases which are being made by the commodity prices stabilization board have to do with subsidies.

Mr. GREEN: Then the commodity prices stabilization board will continue to import sugar, tea, oils and fats. These commodities will not be imported by the new corporation.

Mr. MacKINNON: Not at present.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. MacKinnon thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 251, to establish the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Demobilization and reconversion—

510. To provide for expenses in connection with prize courts, $10,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have the prize courts been performing any functions during the year 1945-46?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. The expenditure to December 31, 1945, was $2,764.18, and there were accounts which had not then been received, for work previously done.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are these prize courts and the matters with which they concern themselves not somewhat of a relic of the Elizabethan days, and not having much to do with modern progress? I am just wondering whether or not the whole thing is necessary, although it is not that aspect of it to which I wish to direct the minister's attention; but inasmuch as the costs of the court have to be paid by someone, is it not reasonable to make the recommendation that the prize money itself should bear the burden of the legal administration of the court?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there were prize money which was coming to the government it would go into the consolidated revenue fund and would not be available for expenditure. The principle of responsible government, as I understand it, is that expenditures, even though they be made for the purpose of creating revenue, have to be voted by parliament; that all the receipts go into the one fund, and whatever is required as expenditure has to be voted by parliament out of that fund.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am glad to accept the minister's explanation of it; but may I at the same time direct his attention to the fact that that principle has been grossly violated in a number of the government operated companies now set up under the Department of Reconstruction?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the present time the committee is not considering the financing of crown companies, but the items the Department of Justice requests to have voted under the old system.

Item agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

348. General administration, $266,379.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Some time ago I tried to have the following question placed on the order paper:

> Do the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have files containing information concerning Canadian citizens; and if so, what members of parliament are covered by such dossiers?

The question was rejected on grounds which I believe were adequate, and I have no complaint at all about the rejection. Nevertheless I said then that I would raise this matter when these estimates came up. One of the most vicious practices in Europe before the war, and many years before the war, was the collection and maintenance of dossiers on private individuals. They were used in a sinister manner; they were used to spy on individuals and to collect—

Mr. SKEY: The hon. member's party lost on that in Ontario; why bother with it now?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The hon. member's party won. The dossiers were kept and were exposed. Do not say you lost.

Mr. SKEY: The hon. member's party did.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): They were used not only in Europe but in some parts of Ontario in a sinister manner to spy on individuals. I do not for a moment deny that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have the right to investigate Canadian citizens whom they may suspect of crminal intent or criminal practices, but I do not believe the mounted police have any right whatsoever to retain such a file on an individual once its purpose has been served. I call to the attention of the minister a section of a proposed charter which was drawn up by a group of private citizens in the United Kingdom before the war. The chairman of this group was Lord Sankey, who was lord chancellor from 1929 to 1935. The section I wish to quote reads as follows:

> All administrative registration and records about a man shall be open to his personal and private inspection. There shall be no secret dossiers in any administrative department. All dossiers shall be accessible to the man concerned and subject to correction and verification at his challenge. A dossier is merely a memorandum; it cannot be used as evidence without proper confirmation in open court.

As I said before, I believe that on occasion dossiers are necessary, but I do not think they should be maintained perpetually, containing information about citizens in this country. I should now like to ask the Minister of Justice the question I attempted to place on the order paper. Do the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have files containing information concerning Canadian citizens? That is the first question I wish to ask.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; they have files containing reports of investigations made whenever it appeared in the interests of the public that such investigations should be conducted. The hon. member also asks if there are any dossiers on members of parliament. There are no dossiers on members of parliament as such. There was a dossier that consisted of reports of investigations concerning a man who is now a member of parliament, but investigations that were made at a time when he was not a member of parliament but was a fugitive, during the period of a couple of years while he was looked for by the mounted police to execute an order for his detention that had been made prior to December, 1941, when I became minister.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Might I ask if there are dossiers on members of parliament as individuals, whether there are dossiers on present members before they became such?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Getting nervous?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Not a bit.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. I have here a report that the sole exception with respect to members of parliament at the present time is this dossier which had been compiled before the person became a member of parliament, concerning the activities of the hon. member for Cartier while he was being looked for under this order for detention that had been made.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Can the right hon. gentleman tell me if dossiers are prepared on immigrants coming to this country, and, if so, what is the final disposition of such dossiers after the applicants have been granted citizenship?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot tell the hon. member that dossiers are prepared on immigrants to this country; I am quite sure that is not done as a general practice. There may be cases particularly pointed out to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and requests may be made to them to report upon certain individuals; but it is not the practice to investigate all those who migrate to this country.

Mr. PROBE: Because my constituency is Regina City, which at present is one of the headquarters of the mounted police; because I have been a citizen of Saskatchewan for quite a number of years, I should like to say a few words about the mounted police. I remember them with considerable affection as individuals who used to patrol the plains when we homesteaded. We looked forward to the visit of the redcoat, riding his lovely horse, who would spend the night with us discussing matters of local interest. Those of us who are native to the prairies have a feeling of admiration and friendship for the rank and file of the mounted police. At the present time, as I understand it, by agreement they are officially charged with the maintenance of law and order in six provinces, excluding Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. Their duties have increased to a tremendous extent. They are technical experts in many fields going far beyond the mere maintenance of law and order. In my humble opinion, however, the men in the service are not receiving from the national exchequer the consideration to which the nature of their duties entitles them. I am referring now especially to the non-commissioned officers and constables.

Quite a number of what I consider to be definitely anti-social regulations still apply to members of the mounted police. The seven-year marriage clause is, I think, an anti-social regulation, and I suggest to the minister that it is time we got away from the restriction on this splendid body of men which compels them to remain celibate and potential prey of people who become enamoured of the uniform, while they must live in a manner which I consider not entirely normal. I have in mind a constable who is a personal friend who left the force to enter His Majesty's service. As the minister is aware, limited permission was given members of the R.C.M.P. to enlist when the war began; but in order to maintain their full civilian rights, as I remember it they had to enlist in No. 1 provost company. That was all very well; but the members of the force who enlisted in other organizations, who occupied responsible positions during the war, who received both promotion and high honour, many of whom were decorated, should not, as a result, be penalized by our government in a way they would not permit civilian employers to treat returned men coming back to civil employment. Under the regulations, when a man returns to his pre-war employment he must be given the regular promotions he would have received had he remained at that work during the war. That is not the case in connection with the non-commissioned members of the mounted police, and I think they are being done an injustice in that regard. In the case of the individual I have in mind, the young constable who was decorated for gallantry while in the air force, during the interval that he was absent from the mounted police he got married. When he returned to this country and resumed his status as a constable in the mounted police he was penalized to the extent that he is still on a single constable's pay. I believe the pay for a first-class constable is not to exceed $2.75 a day. That, of course, is a ridiculous rate of pay for a man who is on call twenty-four hours a day and every day of the week.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is aware, is he not, that for the last three years that has been increased by 75 cents.

Mr. PROBE: I understood that there were certain supplements. However, the nature of those supplements does not appear in Commissioner Wood's report. The rate of pay for this specialized branch of our constabulary, our protective force in Canada, should be considerably increased for the men at the lower end of the scale.

There is another matter which concerns the personal comfort of the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when on duty. I refer to those men who are on show in front of our buildings, who add dignity and, shall I say, some interest to the tourist trade. I think that is a fair description of their role out there. They stand in front of these buildings in the sweltering heat, clad in full regalia, with high boots. These men are splendidly equipped, but it seems to me that they are not comfortably dressed for their job. I suggest that the minister should take up with Commissioner Wood the matter of issuing to those men some form of sensible summer garb to be worn during the time when they are employed in positions where they cannot get under a tree and enjoy a cool breeze for a few moments, and also change regulations to permit them to remove their tunics.

There is another matter which looks like discrimination against non-commissioned officers in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and to which I would direct the minister's attention. It may be that he will make a statement on the point, because I notice that in his annual report Commissioner Wood has drawn attention to it. Commissioned officers in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are in receipt of pension rights for their wives to which the commissioned officers contribute nothing. That grant to the widows, by virtue of the fact that the commissioned personnel do not pay into the fund, is not on an actuarial basis. The widows are entitled to one-half of the pension allowance of the husband before his decease.

What is the position in respect of the non-commissioned officers and men? The men receive pensions, without contributions having been made. But to assure the payment of pensions to their wives, in the event of marriage, since 1934 it has been compulsory for non-commissioned officers and constables to pay into a fund which is kept actuarially sound. This is where the discrimination arises, when we compare that fund with pensions payable to judges' wives, and the like. Those non-commissioned officers and constables must pay into the widows' pension fund five per cent of their salaries. On their decease an actuarial calculation is made, and a petty pension is granted to their widows.

This savours of class distinction which is not in the best interests of the members of the force. To my personal knowledge their esprit de corps has always been excellent. I believe that in general they command the respect of all Canadians, because of the manner in which they conduct their police duties. I regret that instances have arisen carrying the suggestion that there has been a policy under which they should spy on individuals across Canada. I assume that they do carry on a form of investigation, and I should hope that that practice would not be continued.

Would the minister give us some assurance respecting the marriage privileges of single constables? Will he, too, give some suggestion as to what relief may be expected in connection with the widows' fund for non-commissioned officers and men, and respecting a general increase in pay for those at the lower end of the scale? Then, too, he might discuss some remedy for the condition of the men who stand out here on parade each day in their regular garb.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police require no commendation, because all of us realize that their achievements and the heritage that is theirs are unequalled anywhere in the world. My experience with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police extends over many years. I can remember some of the old-timers who served with the original force.

With much of what my hon. friend has said I am in agreement, but I must say that after an extensive practice in the courts, running over a period of twenty-five years, I have yet to see a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who has been engaged in anything bordering on spying. Their actions and activities, in all my experience, have always been consonant with the highest traditions of the force to which they belong. While there have been suggestions to the contrary—and suggestions are easily made when proof is not required—I say the mounted police, as a whole, have performed a work which needs no commendation either in the house or out of it, a work that has resulted in the building up of our western country, and making it a law-abiding land, unequalled anywhere.

I join with the hon. member in his reference to the marriage provision, a matter which has been discussed before. I am familiar with the reasons given by the commissioner and the minister for not allowing constables to marry at an earlier age. But I believe to-day that, when it is so necessary to have efficient men in the mounted police, nothing should be permitted to exist which in any way would cause deterioration in the force.

In addition to what the hon. member has said, I would refer to the difficulty experienced by young constables with nine or ten years experience receiving promotion. To-day those promotions are too slow. Many able young men who are fully qualified for police work would be only too willing to join the force, were it not for the fact that, having regard to the small numbers in the force, it is impossible for them to be assured of early promotion.

There is one other matter to which I would refer, before I direct my remarks to the matter which caused me to rise at this time. I have in mind those young men who served overseas, who left the mounted police in order to perform that service. To-day, when they rejoin they are denied the privilege of wearing their stars of service. I think a change should be made in that regard so that their broken service should not deny them the privilege and honour of showing the years of service they have given.

This gives me an opportunity to ask the minister for information in connection with the coupon racket revealed by the issue of a press release on June 25 in connection with La Banque Provinciale du Canada. When this matter was brought to the attention of the house on June 26 we were told that an opportunity would be given on these estimates to ascertain the situation. I do not want to go into anything that would prejudice the trial of those who have been charged, but there is one thing in connection with which the committee should be given information.

In the release to the press it was stated that the bank had been warned on several occasions about the manner in which it was handling coupons and that it had failed to carry out instructions as to changed procedure that were given. The other evening the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance stated that certain clerks in the employ of the bank had been arrested. I do not believe it is fair that proceedings should be taken against clerks who have given good service in all banks during the period of the war. If the head office or the officials of the bank received instructions from the wartime prices and trade board regarding illicit dealing in coupons, the committee and the country should be given some information as to what instructions were given, to whom they were given, when they were given and the extent to which the officials of the bank, not minor clerks, are responsible for what actually took place.

When the minister is explaining this, perhaps he would be willing to enlarge upon what is set out in the commissioner's report with reference to illicit coupons and the extent to which trading in illicit coupons has been carried on. I refer particularly to page 29 of the report for the year ended March 31, 1945, where the following statement is made in connection with sugar coupons:

> . . . the rationing of sugar has resulted in the appearance of a certain quantity of counterfeit sugar coupons. Shortly after the new year a "black market" operator in Montreal was found to have dispensed some 40,000 spurious coupons to the trade. It is anticipated, however, that a system of coupon audit centres now being set up by the wartime prices and trade board will result in a marked decline of offences of this type.

Has the hope expressed by the commissioner been justified by subsequent events, and to what extent are these rackets now being controlled by the activity of the mounted police and of the crime detection laboratory at Rockcliffe which was set up for the purpose of preventing a continuation of these rackets?

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): I agree with all that has been said about the quality of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but I think something should be done about their comfort. I have in mind the uniform the men on parliament hill are required to wear during these hot summer days. Although they may prove good subjects for photography, I think these men should be permitted to dress according to the weather.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I intend to follow the request made this afternoon by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition and be brief. I endorse everything said by the hon. member for Lake Centre about the admirable qualities of the mounted police and I wish all hon. members would do the same. These police constitute one of the finest tourist attractions we have in Canada.

Mr. PROBE: Do you want the police to suffer?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Anyone who came from your province would suffer.

Mr. PROBE: Some of my people have suffered for a long time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: These men have been sent over to London in their uniforms, and they have been sent to Washington, the capital of the great United States, in their uniforms. They are the greatest attraction we have. I appreciate the suffering they may have to undergo because of the weather, but perhaps they could be relieved at shorter intervals. I am strenuously opposed to changing this uniform, the most famous uniform of the Dominion of Canada. Our tourist industry is the one industry which brings in money and which takes away none of our natural resources.

Mr. PROBE: They took the kilts away from our soldiers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, and I am sorry they did not put them on some others. While the kilts may have detracted from the appearance of some because of their natural physical disabilites, they added to the appearance of others.

The mounted police are definitely underpaid for the work they are doing and the responsibilites they must assume. I had the privilege of visiting the headquarters of the F.B.I. in Washington, and I know something of the work they are doing and the class of man and the educational qualifications they require. Those men are paid according to the work they are doing and I think we should pay our mounted police in the same way.

The Minister of Justice should consider the young men who want to take up this work. I understand that they cannot get married until they have attained a certain salary and years of service. Some members of parliament get a certain amount, while others are ministers in the cabinet and receive greater amounts, and yet they are still single. I am not referring to any particular individual. I want to repeat that I do not think the department is doing its duty to these people who provide the best safeguards we have, as was demonstrated not so many months ago right in this parliament and throughout Canada.

Mr. SKEY: I want to endorse what the hon. member for Fraser Valley has just said, not only with reference to shorter tours of duty but with reference to the pay they should receive. I happened to mention to a distinguished and able member of the press gallery that I intended to advocate higher pay for the members of this estimable force and he turned to me with a rather cynical look and said, "You know, that is nothing but an annual parade." With that, my hopes fell. "An annual parade", he said, "that takes place every year at this time." I am a new member, Mr. Chairman; this is my first year in the house and this information made me feel rather sick at heart.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member allow me to put a little balm on his sick heart by saying that the first-class constable receives $2.75 a day; but also, in addition to that, seventy-five cents for war duties, and $2.25 for living allowance; making in all $5.75 a day for 365 days, which amounts to $2,098.75. I am not boasting about it, but I wish to point out that when his pay is referred to as $2.75 a day a lot is being left out. This is the third year war duties supplements are being paid.

Mr. GRAYDON: It should be made permanent.

Mr. PROBE: What does a single constable get?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A single constable gets the same pay, $2.75, plus seventy-five cents a day, but his living allowance is $1.50 a day instead of $2.25.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What would he get in a shipyard?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He might get a higher wage in a shipyard, but he would not have the feeling of performing for the country the service that this corps feels that it is performing. There are no men conscripted for this corps. They join it because they wish to serve their country in that capacity, because of the prestige they have in the community and because of the pension provisions, which are such that I have not asked to have them revised. If they were revised, there are certain dispositions in the act which I am afraid I would lose.

Mr. SKEY: I am willing to bow to what the minister says with regard to the rates of pay of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Force. But I would ask him now if he really does not feel that these men should be put on a permanent and guaranteed basic rate of pay instead of having these unreliable bonuses for war duty, et cetera. I do not think there is a decent man or woman in Canada who is not proud of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of the reputation it has won throughout the world. Surely we can guarantee them a decent basic rate of pay, and put them on a permanent basis at reasonable rates.

The minister has mentioned pensions. There is a subject which I believe is very close to the hearts of these men. Take the case of an ordinary constable killed on duty. Even if he dies in the service of his country, his widow, unless he has signed the pension agreement of 1934, I think it was, does not receive any guaranteed pension. Cannot these men be put on the same basis as the armed forces of the country?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They could, and if it were felt that it would be a good thing that that should be done it would be accepted at once by treasury board. But I have been holding out against it.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister tell the committee why?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Because there are provisions in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pension statute which are more favourable to them on account of the manner in which the force is recruited and the periods for which members serve than would be the terms of the army pension act. If the hon. member will compare the two he will see that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have special provisions which are not allowed in the superannuation fund or in the army pension act.

Mr. SKEY: As I understand the army pension, a service man is not even guaranteed a pension. I understand now that there are men with seventeen years' service in the R.C.A.F. who are being asked to leave the forces with one month's pay for every year of service and no pension, and that if a man elects or asks for his pension he is only allowed two-thirds of the pension to which he is rightfully entitled. If the minister wants to talk about the army or navy or air force pension—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not, and the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not.

Mr. SKEY: Of course I am open to reason in what I am advocating, but it has been represented to me that the constable in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is far less well provided for than the army pensioner, in spite of the unfortunate regulations. I do not wish to delay the committee, and I see it is almost eleven o'clock.

I would just say, in conclusion, that as a returned service man I feel that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be considered on an absolutely equitable basis with the armed forces of Canada in every respect. They should lose no seniority through any service for their country and lose no pension rights. The man's family should be protected equally with the members of the armed forces because he and his family are a part of our community, and so long as we provide for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as well as we provide for the men of our armed forces I feel that we shall be doing for these men what the people of Canada would agree is the right thing to do.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I be allowed one minute, in fairness to La Banque Provinciale. I shall be glad to show the hon. member for Lake Centre all the reports that I have received in connection with that incident, and then we can proceed further with the discussion. But I wish to say at this time, and I say it after having said to the hon. member for Lake Centre that I am going to show him all the reports I have, that there are no grounds for casting reflections upon the bank itself. There are grounds for casting reflections upon certain individuals in the employ of the bank who did not carry out diligently and correctly the instructions they had received as to how coupons were to be handled. But the situation is not one that reflects upon the bank generally.

[Mr. Skey.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was an unfortunate press release, then.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was unfortunate as to the form in which it was made, and it has already caused some anxiety to the customers of the bank and has caused the displacing of some accounts with the bank. For that reason I thought it was only fair that I should make this general statement this evening, because it may be some time before we come back to the estimates of the department. In the meantime I should be glad to let my hon. friend see all the reports I have on that incident.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister clarify one point. Why in view of these facts were the rights of the bank to continue its coupon procedure cancelled as of July 31?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There were a few branches with which the wartime prices and trade board had had these difficulties. They could not get these staffs to keep a proper and timely accounting of the coupons, and could not make them realize that it was quite as necessary to keep that accounting up to the minute as it was to keep the dollars and cents accounting of the ordinary banking business up to the minute. The board came to the conclusion that, having made these representations to these branch offices more than once, and inasmuch as they were not having their instructions fully complied with, they would say to the bank that from and after July 31 they would not allow its branches to deal with these coupon accounts. I think the very fact that they made the 31st of July the deadline shows that they wanted it to be a warning to the head office to take the matter seriously, and in the meantime, between the date the statement was issued and July 31, they expected satisfactory assurances might be obtained and the order cancelled. This is not one of the large banks. This bank does about 1·8 per cent of the banking business of the chartered banks of Canada, of which there are only ten. It has a large number of small branches. I have the figures here. It is a bank that is doing a retail banking business and, though it is one-tenth of the number of banks, it does 1·8 per cent of the business.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many false coupons were found, approximately?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In connection with this incident, it is not a matter of false coupons; it is a matter of the coupon accounts being overdrawn by the orders made for coupons. That was not a case of forged coupons being used; it was a case of the coupon accounts in certain branches being overdrawn.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To what extent, approximately?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not remember exactly what it is, but I will let the hon. member see the full reports I have on the investigation, and he will realize what can be stated publicly about it at the present time without embarrassing the continuation of the investigation. Black market operations have to be checked constantly and those investigations are being continued to ascertain what outsiders were involved. When the hon. member sees the reports he will realize how far we should go in giving out details of what has been uncovered up to the present time.

2. From whom was this land purchased and what price per acre was paid for the said land?
3. What distance is this property from Winnipeg city limits?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

Graham, W. H.	2 "
McQuade, Jos.	4·5 "
Harstone Estate	4 "
Murray Estate	4 "
Manitoba Farm Loans Association	4·5 "

It is considered that the public disclosure as to details of prices paid for various lands purchased by the Veterans Land Act would be detrimental to the administration and operation of the act and not in the best interests of the veterans for whom the lands are purchased. This is in accord with statement made to the house on April 17, 1946, page 951 of Hansard, and on subsequent occasions.

Note: The answer does not include properties purchased for individuals on direct application.

CORN STARCH AND GLUCOSE—CEILING PRICE

Mr. HATFIELD:

What was the ceiling price on corn starch and glucose made from corn for the years 1942, 43, 44, 45 and 46 to date?

Mr. MAYHEW: From December 1, 1941 to May 20, 1946, the ceiling prices on corn starch and on glucose were their basic period prices (i.e. maximum price established in the four-week period September 15 to October 11, 1941). On May 20, 1946, the rate of subsidy on imported corn was reduced and compensating increases of 1½ cents per pound at the manufacturers' level on both starch and glucose were authorized.

ALLIED MILITARY GOVERNMENT IN GERMANY—CANADIAN CITIZENS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many Canadian citizens are there in Germany connected with the work of the allied military government in that country?
2. What relation does this number bear to the number of citizens of the United Kingdom and citizens of the United States of America, respectively, who are engaged in Germany on work connected with the allied military government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Under the terms of the declaration regarding the defeat of Germany, signed in Berlin on the 5th June, 1945, supreme authority with respect to Germany was assumed by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the provisional government of the French republic. The Canadian government does not participate in the administration of the allied military government, which is supervised by these four powers. For this reason statistics regarding personnel employed in Germany in the work of the allied control authority are not normally communicated to this government. A number of Canadian citizens have, however, offered their services to, and have been employed by the allied control authority (British element) in Germany. Precise figures as to the number of Canadians so employed are being sought through the Canadian military mission to Germany, Berlin.

2. No information.

UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION—EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIANS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What is the procedure required for a Canadian citizen to make application for a position with the united nations organization?
2. How many Canadian citizens have made application for positions in the said organization?
3. How many Canadian citizens are presently employed with the said organization?
4. Of the numbers of Canadian citizens so employed, how many are women and how many are men?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The procedure at present required for a Canadian citizen to make application for a position with the united nations is to make written application to the secretary-general of the united nations, Hunter College, the Bronx, New York City. The applicant will then be supplied by the united nations secretariat with the requested application forms. It is understood that the secretary-general is making further arrangements to expedite the procedure with regard to the procedure for application for such positions.

2. As applications by Canadian citizens for positions in the organization are made directly to the united nations secretariat in New York, the government does not possess detailed information regarding Canadian citizens employed therein. Inquiries are being made of the united nations secretariat on this point.

4. Answered by No. 2.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIANS OVER FORTY YEARS OF AGE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the government received a request from the Senior Citizens' Association of Canada for the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into ways and means of combating discrimination against persons over forty years of age when seeking employment?
2. Has consideration been given to such request?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1 and 2. A request from the senior citizens' association of Canada calling attention to the alleged discrimination in employment against persons over the age of 40 years, and requesting that a royal commission be appointed to inquire into the matter was received.

The petition has been given consideration, but it was considered that the recommendation for the appointment of a royal commission at the present time would not have a beneficial effect.

In the national employment service a special section has been set up to deal with the cases of men and women who find it difficult to obtain placement, and it is anticipated that more beneficial results will accrue from the activities of this special section than in any other way. It is felt that persistent day-to-day activities through the special section herein referred to would be effective.

LOUIS PHILIPPE GAUTHIER

REFERENCE TO PASSING OF FORMER ASSISTANT CLERK OF SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. L. LANGLOIS (Gaspe): With the permission of the house I wish to say a few words on the passing of Major Louis Philippe Gauthier, former Conservative member for Gaspe, and until recently assistant clerk of the Canadian Senate, who died in Ottawa yesterday.

Born at Ste. Anne des Monts, Gaspe, my own native village, on January 17, 1876, Major Gauthier was educated at Rimouski and Levis colleges, and at Laval university, Quebec, where he graduated in medicine. He practised the medical profession at Ste. Anne des Monts, and was elected to this house in 1911, representing Gaspe here until 1917. In 1916 he enlisted in the Canadian army and saw service with the 127th battalion in France and Belgium, until December, 1918. Major Gauthier was appointed assistant clerk of the senate in 1926, which position he retained until last April, when he was compelled to resign due to illness.

Through his varied activities in the medical, political, military and civil administration fields, Major Gauthier always served his country and his native land of Gaspe with unfailing devotion and outstanding ability, and I must add that we in Gaspe held him in very high esteem. On behalf of my constituents and speaking personally as well, I pray Major Gauthier's family to accept the expression of our deepest sympathy. Canada grieves to-day the passing of a great Canadian, and the Gaspe peninsula deeply regrets the loss of one of its greatest sons.

INQUIRY AS TO ADMISSION TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): In view of the increasingly tragic situation of thousands of Jewish refugees in Europe, and the delay of the British government in implementing the recommendations of the Anglo-American committee of inquiry, will the Prime Minister inform the house if the government is prepared to permit some of the refugees to enter Canada at once, pending the adoption of the report?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend sent me notice of his question, and the answer is as follows.

The government and people of Canada are naturally concerned with the fate of these refugees. To assist in meeting this tragic situation, two amendments were made in the immigration regulations on May 28 which were made known to the house by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) on May 29. The amendments will permit some increase in the movement of immigrants to Canada without discrimination as to race or creed by adding to the admissible classes the following:

> The father or mother, the unmarried son or daughter eighteen years of age or over, the unmarried brother or sister, the orphan nephew or niece under sixteen years of age, of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relative.

Since many prospective immigrants coming within the above classes may not be able to obtain a valid passport, as required under present regulations, the acceptance has been authorized of alternative travel documents establishing the identity of the holder.

The action taken is intended as a short term measure to provide some early and partial relief in a number of individual cases. The general problem of refugees, because of its magnitude, can only be resolved by the united nations as a whole. Canada participated fully in the study given to it by the social and economic council at its recent meeting in New York and will join with other members of the council at the meeting which is scheduled for August 30 when a recommendation is expected to be submitted for approval by the general assembly for the establishment of a united nations refugee organization.

TAXATION AGREEMENTS

INQUIRY AS TO RESPONSE BY PROVINCES TO DOMINION PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the Minister of Finance or the government received proposals or communications from Nova Scotia or from other provinces regarding taxation agreements or the payment of subsidies to such provinces in accordance with the budget? If so, has the dominion government made reply, and will copies of these communications be laid on the table?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The government has received telegrams or letters from two provinces accepting in principle the offer made to the provinces in the budget. Others have acknowledged the telegram and letter which I sent to them, stating that consideration will be given the offer. One province has asked for clarification on a number of points, and a reply has been sent. Copies of these communications will be placed on the table in due course.

TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

MEETING OF BOARD AT CHARLOTTETOWN ON JULY 17

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Transport, or both. Under what or by whose authority is the board of transport commissioners to hold a meeting in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, on July 17 next regarding truck freight rates on the Borden-Tormentine ferry?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid I shall have to leave it to the Minister of Transport to answer that question, or have it stand as a notice.

Mr. McLURE: Then I would direct the question to the Minister of Transport.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): As the Prime Minister has already indicated, the question may be treated as notice. I shall inquire into it and have an answer for my hon. friend. I may tell him immediately, however, that any individual or group of individuals may make application to the board of transport commissioners to have rates revised, as the hon. gentleman was told some time ago in reply to a similar question. However, I shall be glad to ascertain who made this particular application.

Mr. McLURE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest against this meeting being held.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member should debate the matter here.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): On May 30, under item 30 of his estimates, the Minister of Agriculture stated that it was his intention to introduce a bill this session to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and to refer it to the agriculture committee. When may we expect this bill to brought down?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I just returned a few hours ago, and have not had an opportunity of ascertaining the position of this legislation at the moment. So far as I know, however, that is still the intention.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, June 27, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, when I made the other evening my few preliminary observations, I said that the budget was a monumental work. I realize much more now than I did then the truth of that statement, and I should say at the outset, that I may have to avail myself for only a few moments of the latitude which I believe is given to a speaker on this occasion, namely that of exceeding the usual forty-minute speaking time.

I do not believe that the government will use this budget as its ace of trumps when the next election comes. It becomes more and more clear that there is great disappointment, some of it from very unexpected quarters, and I submit that that is not surprising. It actually takes the eye of faith to see any relief coming to the taxpayers at all. It has been well remarked that this is not a budget for 1946, but for 1947. And, indeed, the individual taxpayer will not find any change in his situation until he begins to make out his tax return early in 1948. In other words his 1947 bill would be the same as it would have been. This disappointment is accentuated by reason of the fact that it was believed—rightly or wrongly—that hints of imminent reductions had been given from rather august quarters.

If the taxpayers had read the budget carefully enough to find in it the minister's statement to this effect, that "lighter taxes are not needed now for the purpose of permitting or encouraging additional private spending in order to maintain employment this year," I think their disappointment would be much increased. Because I believe they would feel that the minister has treated their urgent necessities in a very casual and impersonal way.

If by reason of the minister's action the budget had been balanced, of course that would have been a horse of a different colour. I believe the people would have been prepared to carry their burdens if the budget had been balanced, and they had been able to look forward with the degree of hope that that would have given them. But although the minister has presented to us an estimated deficit of $300 million I believe he must have had a very difficult job in making himself believe that that was a realistic picture of the situation.

After congratulating himself upon this $300 million which, as he indicated, was somewhere in the neighbourhood of a ten per cent deficit, he used these words:

> This year we must finance not only the anticipated deficit of $300 million but also the large programme of loans, advances and investments which, as I have already indicated, may involve in the neighbourhood of one billion dollars.

In this connection I venture to recommend to the minister the remarks of one of his predecessors in office, the Hon. Charles Dunning, who, speaking some ten years ago, criticized what he called the bridge-score method of accounting, so much above the line and so much below the line. And Mr. Dunning added:

> If the people of Canada are fully aware of all the facts I am confident that they will support us in the steps necessary to achieve that balance of government resources and expenditures which, in my opinion, cannot safely be postponed much longer.

It seems like reading of a different world to read of a world in which that was immediately expected. I doubt myself if the minister was very happy in entirely ignoring these large additional amounts when he gave us his estimated budget deficit. He comforted himself by speaking of these export credits as—> —from the economic point of view replacing our war expenditures by government investments on which we shall earn a return in future years.

Now, however correct this may be in a narrow technical sense, nevertheless when we take cognizance of the history of loans of that kind in the past, and especially after the last war, it was a surprise to me that the minister was prepared to regard these as active interest-bearing assets. I doubt if anyone in private business would dare to say that. Undoubtedly any private corporation under such circumstances would have had to do one of two things; it would either have set up a reserve, if resources permitted, or would have to proceed to charge itself so much, year by years, towards anticipated possible losses.

I think I am correct in saying that the minister last year informed the house that substantial losses might be incurred from this quarter. Reverting to my illustration, may I say that any corporation which acted in that way would find itself speedily in the hands of the receiver. And this is not the whole story. I shall mention to the house later that it seems to me the minister is prepared to proceed with deficit financing on a big scale.

May I point out in passing that $200 million of the income which the minister is counting on is to be special receipts, I presume war assets. This reminds us that we shall be getting merely a modicum of the cost which we originally put out.

What does all this add up to? So far as I can see it means—no incentive to production, no relief from taxation—only more borrowing.

I know the minister felt that some sweetener was necessary for this sour budget, and so we have the minister hitting upon this curious plan of tax relief in the future. I believe this is the first time a Canadian Minister of Finance has dealt in "futures". If the minister is able in 1946 to promise relief for 1947, then why not in 1948 and 1949—like the man who sent out the Christmas card for 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949.

Those who are skilled in these matters evidently may have suggested to the minister that he could get a double modicum of gratitude—gratitude for this year, and gratitude for next year for this relief. But my suggestion is that if he gets no more credit next year than he did this year he will have to enter it in red ink.

The minister has failed entirely to do anything to stimulate production in the immediate future, and notwithstanding his rather optimistic forecast it seems to me it is doubtful whether he is going to get the production that he wished. The minister in any event is telling us in one breath to produce and in the next breath is expressing his regrets that he cannot do anything to help.

So we have the worst of both worlds. And yet until the government can successfully grapple with the problem of reducing war-time expenditures, tax relief can never come.

Is there any sign that the government is grappling with the problem—this problem? If it cannot, then it is "just too bad"; because if it is not possible to make drastic reductions in our present expenditures—and I am speaking of our ordinary expenditures; not war expenditures, because we all understand that they are automatically falling—but if it is not possible to make drastic reductions in our ordinary expenditures, or, conversely, if the present expenditures have to be regarded as permanent, then I think our present picture is a very gloomy one, except indeed to those who feel that deficits do not matter, and about whom I shall have something to say later.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

I should like to point out that if we feel, like the socialist Chancellor of the Exchequer in England and the private-enterprise Secretary of the Treasury in the United States, that budgets must be balanced, then we can get small comfort out of the present situation, which I maintain shows not the first sign of a beginning, let alone what Churchill called "the end of the beginning."

As I said a minute ago, let no one be confused by the sharp drop in total expenditures, because that was due to automatic decreases in war expenditures. What we are entitled to look at is the situation with respect to peacetime expenditures. I want to point out that the expenditures on the non-war departments have gone up some $200,000,000. I should add quickly that a large part of that is due to interest—nearly $100,000,000, I think—and a very substantial part is due to increases in family allowances. Nevertheless there have been other increases.

I suggested to the minister last autumn that a mere pious desire for economy would produce nothing. I ventured to say to him then that if he could not in some way continue to keep down the spending departments it would break his heart and, incidentally, he would not get results. I am beginning to think that my prophecies are coming true. We are entitled to ask for some real evidence of economy, and my complaint is that there is no sign of it. I propose to take as a test case what has happened in connection with the civil service, and I shall direct your attention to some figures there. But before I do that, I want to say this about the civil service itself. I want to make it very clear that anything I say is by no construction whatever to be regarded as criticism of the civil service, particularly the permanent civil service which had to carry on through difficult days and which has seen a lot of temporary people come in who were perhaps given more interesting and remunerative jobs. That permanent service has carried on in an admirable way all through the years.

I want to say a word about economy. We all recognize that economy is a difficult thing to achieve, and I think we all realize also that in government departments it is even more difficult to achieve than in business, and I know something about it in business. What happens is that you develop in each department a kind of little kingdom. No one wants to see his kingdom reduced. What happened during the last five years? Large numbers of people came into the civil service as temporaries and extras, but they very quickly became a part of the landscape, so to speak. When the time comes for reducing, it is extremely difficult to reduce. As I said a moment ago, every man has his kingdom and he does not want to see that kingdom reduced. Not only is this true absolutely, but it is truer relatively, if I may say so. No department head wants to feel that his department is the one that should be reduced.

What is the moral of this? I submit that the moral is very clear. We cannot expect this economy to come from inside the civil service. Let us consider a few basic facts. Since 1939 the civil service has risen from something under 70,000 to 150,000. I am informed that both figures include more than permanent civil servants, but I am also informed that these two figures are fairly comparable. What has happened is that the civil service has more than doubled in number. While this was going on I think the public feeling was that they had to be very sympathetic, that they must not be critical because things were being done in a hurry, that people had to come in, probably more than were necessary. However, when the war came to an end I think the people had the feeling that substantial reductions should begin. I think they felt that it was quite fair to ask for a very substantial reduction within a year.

What would be a reasonable figure? I find that hard to answer. I am quite sure that some people who have thought about it would consider that the service having doubled from 70,000 to 150,000 perhaps it would be reasonable that within a year we would get a twenty-five per cent reduction. However, I think that is too high. I myself would think that perhaps there should have been a 16⅔ per cent or even a 10 per cent reduction. If that had happened I would have found it pretty hard to put much heart into any criticism.

What are the actual facts? As I understand it, the actual fact is that there has been virtually nothing done, that there has been a reduction of less than one per cent, in fact only a little more than one-half of one per cent. I am not forgetting that perhaps in the armed services—I believe it is true in the navy—certain work is now being done by a civilian staff which formerly was done by those who were in the services. That is one reason why I think that twenty-five per cent, or even sixteen per cent, is too high. I think when you come down to ten per cent you have reached a reasonable figure. But I find that nothing has been done—or virtually nothing; because a reduction of 900 out of 150,000 is really nothing. I confess I am alarmed. I imagine the Minister of Finance, with his Baptist background, which I think is more or less similar to my Presbyterian background, likes to think of economy. But I can find no sign that he is doing anything about it. Both at the dominion-provincial conference and in this house last year—I think I am correct in this—there was virtually no reference to economy.

Now, if this is a fair summing up, what does it mean? It means that in respect of continuing expenditures of $240,000,000, nearly half of our total budget in 1939, we have not been able to cut out a single dollar. Indeed, the actual cost is higher by something like $800,000. What does that mean? Has the minister lost heart and given up? Is that the reason no mention of economy was made at the dominion-provincial conference or here in this house? I think it is fair to say that the talk was tax, tax; spend, spend; borrow, borrow, but never save, save.

Last December when we debated the matter in this house the minister made a very disarming confession. I cannot quote his exact words but I can give the effect of them. He pictured his lonely struggle in trying to get some economy, a very unequal struggle it appears to have been. I fully sympathize with him, but I suggest to the house that if he fails in this, he is not the one who suffers primarily; it is the people of Canada.

I just want to give a few figures to show what could have been saved. A reduction of ten per cent, which I have mentioned, would have given us $25,000,000 on the way to tax relief. A reduction of twenty-five per cent would have given us $60,000,000 on the way to tax relief.

I have brought the matter of the civil service estimates to the attention of the house because I felt that it was bound to be brought up. I feel that when in respect of an item of $240,000,000 we have had no result whatever there is cause for alarm. I can see no reason to expect any more effective or rigorous scrutiny elsewhere.

There is only one way this problem has ever been dealt with—I mentioned it in this house last autumn—the spending departments must be rationed. That is what they have done in Great Britain. They decided what they had to spend and they spent it, and no more. It may seem the hard way, it may seem difficult, but it will have to be done. I would remind the house of what Sir John Anderson said when speaking on the British budget. He said that one of the great duties of a minister of finance is to keep down the spending departments. It has been done and it can be done. But it cannot be done without a new mentality on the part of the government. What do I mean by this? I think I can best express what I mean by reading an extract from a speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made many years ago when he was in opposition. We are apt to forget that the Prime Minister was once in what I understand Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to call "the cool shades of opposition". When the Prime Minister was in those cool shades in 1920 he said some things which I imagine were not very comforting to those who listened to them across the way. However, I think they are most applicable to the situation now and with the permission of the Prime Minister, I will read them. The Prime Minister said:

—these honourable gentlemen have the war habit of mind, and so long as they remain in office they will persist in it. What do I mean by "the war habit of mind"? It is the habit of mind which believes that everything should be done by the autocratic will of the ministry, regardless altogether of the wishes of parliament; it is the habit of mind which allows lavish expenditures to be accounted for by chance.

I do not know what the Prime Minister meant by "chance". I do not know whether I can use a slang phrase here and say: "What a chance" is there of our getting it now? The Prime Minister went on:

And I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, and more particularly to the people of Canada, facing as we are the great questions of the day, that so long as this present administration remains in office, so long will that war habit of mind continue to actuate the government in their management of public affairs, especially as regards extravagance in public expenditure.

What evidence have we of that tendency? As I have said I do not propose to speak of the actual period of the war, but to take the post-war period.

As an example I refer to the expenditure for the last current year as given in the Auditor General's report. And in that connection let me develop the thought which my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), brought out so clearly last week. He showed that the addition to the public debt during this year of peace was $395,000,000, or more than $1,000,000 a day.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

I do not know how good the Prime Minister is at arithmetic, but if he will take his pencil he will find that the addition to the public debt during this last year is not one million dollars a day but between four and five million dollars a day; I think four and three-quarters million dollars a day. It is perfectly true that we do things on a more lavish scale now. Nevertheless there is the situation.

There is one further point I wish to make in connection with this question of organization and administration—I mentioned it the other night, but it is worth mentioning again. I refer to the utter failure of the government, as I see it, to implement what I understood was the promise made by the Minister of Finance last autumn that the tax administration machinery would be overhauled. Apparently nothing is being done to that end and certainly so far as I can learn, it is not because it is not necessary.

Having spoken of the immediate impact of the budget on our minds as taxpayers, I wish now to deal with its broader impact on the whole Canadian economy. I wish to deal with what the minister said about present business conditions, about future business prospects, and about the financial policies which the government proposes to follow in order to maintain employment. One could not listen to the minister without realizing the extent to which public finance has invaded our lives. It has come to live with us. It gets first cut at everything. It is senior partner in our affairs. To put it in another way, the Department of Finance, instead of being purser on the ship of state, has now become the captain and in effect determines the destination and the course the ship is to follow. As Sir John Anderson said, the budget has become a main instrument of financial and economic policy. For that reason I hope the whole budget debate will be taken very seriously. We are certainly considering things that go to the very root of our welfare.

Speaking of our present position the minister had this to say:

We are enjoying a level of employment and prosperity that we have never experienced before in peace time.

He then proceeded to trace the rise in national income, from $5·1 billion in 1938 to $11·75 billion in 1944. While he did not emphasize the point, it came out elsewhere in his speech, that nearly all of that increase in the national income was due to the fact that government expenditures had gone up from a little over $500 million in 1939 to $5½ billion in 1944. One could not help remembering that in spite of the minister's imposing figures, dry goods shelves are still empty, and we still cannot find houses to live in. I suggest that far too much of the minister's speech deals with money, and far too little with things.

The minister went on to explain how this level of national income was being maintained. He pointed out, very fairly, the things we know—the large gratuities of various kinds to the troops through various departments. He pointed to the big backlog of savings accumulated during the war which are now available for civilian expenditure, and thirdly he referred to our export trade. He emphasized very properly the fact that this export trade is being maintained largely if not wholly by loans which we ourselves make. We are making loans not to pay for imports but to pay for exports.

The minister has so little in the budget to take satisfaction from that I hate to question what little he has. Nevertheless I wish he had not left the feeling that things were promising quite so well. As I consider the inevitable shrinkage which we hope will take place in government expenditure, and the condition of those countries in Europe whose trade means so much to us, I find the minister's picture tinged with a certain unreality. I should have been more pleased if he had spoken more gravely than he did. It is quite true that he made an appeal for production and used serious words, but to me the picture he painted took the urgency out of those words. My feeling is that unless we can prevent production costs from rising and produce more efficiently, export markets may be hard to find and our home market will begin to dwindle, and if that happens, not all the efforts of finance will find us full employment.

With the consent of the house I should like to put on Hansard tables IV and V of the Bank of Canada Statistical Summary for April-May, 1946. An examination of these tables will show already some signs of shrinkage of production, which will do something to alter the minister's bland optimism. The tables follow:

* Excludes firewood. In 1926 firewood appears to have slightly exceeded petroleum as a source of energy. Petroleum, however, increased approximately 200% from 1926 to 1945 whereas firewood appears to have increased about 10%. (1) Output of central electric stations, generated by water, less exports. Water power is calculated at the coal equivalent, based on the average efficiency of central electric stations in the United States as reported by the Edison Electric Institute. Because of increased efficiency in the utilization of coal, this average decreased from the equivalent of 1.95 lbs. of coal per kilowatt hour in 1926 to the equivalent of 1.31 lbs. in 1945. (2) Calculated at the constant 1926 rate of 1.95 lbs. of coal per kilowatt hour. (3) Includes anthracite coal, bituminous coal, sub-bituminous coal, lignite coal and imported coke. The unit heat values employed are: anthracite, 27,200,000 b.t.u. per ton; bituminous, 26,200,000 b.t.u. per ton; sub-bituminous and lignite, 20,000,000 b.t.u. per ton; coke, 26,000,000 b.t.u. per ton. (4) Sum of sales by Canadian coal mines, colliery consumption, coal supplied to employees and coal used in making coke, etc., less tonnage bunkered and exported. (5) Imported for consumption. Deductions have been made to take account of foreign coal re-exported and bunkered. (6) The coal equivalent of the sum of gasoline, fuel and gas oils and kerosene estimated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and converted to b.t.u's on the basis of 1 ton of coal equals 26,000,000 b.t.u. (7) Total production. The unit heat values employed are 1,075 b.t.u. per cubic foot. (8) Including water power calculated at the yearly average coal equivalent.  Preliminary.

Speaking of high income the minister went on to say:

Indeed the pressure of expenditure at the present in many fields is so great that action by the government and others is needed to prevent rapidly increasing prices and the development of inflation.

Again he said that ordinary expenditures and loans:

. . . will bring our total financial requirements on the basis of present commitments and present estimates during the year to roughly three and three-quarter billion dollars.

He pointed out that these financial requirements "do not of themselves suggest a reduction in taxes". Later he added:

Lighter taxes are not needed now for the purpose of permitting or encouraging additional private spending in order to maintain employment this year.

Having said this and emphasized all this, the minister was evidently a bit troubled by the fact that he was not providing any stimulus for increased production, and accordingly he changed his tune and referred to his "pleasant duty in a few minutes to announce reductions." He then proceeded to announce reductions—1947 model!

I need hardly spend time in July, 1946, to consider the effects of tax reductions in 1947, particularly as by that time we shall be on the eve of another budget which might affect even the concessions which are now being made.

I come now to say something about deficit financing. Having underlined the argument for restricting purchasing power even to the extent of keeping up taxation partly for that purpose, the minister at a later stage in his speech referred to the expansive side of his policy. In other words, the minister, having told us that he is afraid of too much purchasing power, now proceeds to make it clear that he is prepared to create a lot more. This is surely blowing hot and cold. One of his reasons for not reducing taxation is the fear of letting loose spending power, but at the same time he apparently contemplates, if he can reach agreement with the provinces, a whole series of commitments which if he carries them out will, according to the figures given by him to the dominion-provincial conference, involve annual expenditures of several hundred million dollars. This is manifestly impossible without an incredibly high tax burden, presumably even higher than at present, or deficit financing in a big way.

It appears that the minister has not only moved from the old fashioned annual balancing to the doctrine of cyclical balancing of budgets—that is, balancing over a cycle of years, not necessarily every year—but that he is also contemplating the final step of the new financial thought, namely, out-and-out deficit financing. Particularly in the light of the fact that this is a year of high income, to contemplate large additional deficits, piled on top of our present deficit and the large loans and advances we have in contemplation, is enough to make us think seriously. What it will do is to increase an already overabundant supply of money while adding little or nothing to the supply of goods.

The London Economist, commenting on the English situation, and the various social services and other expenditures contemplated, said:

> Each of these, regarded by itself (the country) can perhaps afford, but can it afford them all together? That is the question that this government . . . is apparently unwilling to ask or at least unable to answer.

I apply these words to the minister, and I ask him, has he tried to make any such calculation, or is that unnecessary according to the theory of deficit financing? Let me make one thing abundantly clear. I am not suggesting that we should starve social services. What I am suggesting is that if we disregard precautions which even the socialist chancellor in England observes, we may all suffer, and social services most of all.

But someone will say, surely the Minister of Finance is as much against inflation as anyone. He has repeatedly said so. Surely we can rely on him not to run these risks. In answer to this I think it can fairly be said that the minister has been forced into a situation where he halts fatally between two courses. Is he to favour inflation or deflation? Has he too much money or too little money? In this condition of mind it is not surprising that we have this astonishing facing-both-ways budget. In one breath he is warning us against inflation, and in the next he is expounding expansive income-creating policies, which will have to be based on borrowed money, and in the end he takes an action which is really no action, as it does not become effective until 1947.

While talking of deficit financing, let us have a look at the attitude of Britain and the United States, which I have mentioned already. Both the socialist chancellor in London and the private-enterprise secretary in the United States are at one as to the necessity of balancing and hope to do so soon.

Now a word as to the technique of deficit financing. It depends, of course, on the government being able to borrow money practically without limit and on having the resources of the central banking system available to support the bond market. It is essential that bond prices should be kept firm; otherwise a loan might fail.

For several years this policy of deficit financing has been maintained partly by the creation of additional bank credit, deliberately created for that purpose. Recourse to the creation of additional bank credit solves none of our problems. It only postpones and multiplies them. I note that bank deposits are expanding at the rate of about 1 per cent per month in Canada. That is roughly $50 million a month; I believe that in the last two years, from 1944 to 1946, deposits increased, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, by some two billions. No corresponding increase in our wealth production has occurred or is occurring, but the dykes against inflation are being weakened dangerously. The present dangerous situation in the United States is due in no small measure to the fact that they have proceeded with the creation of spending powers on a scale much greater even in proportion than ours. Apparently the belief is that this procedure can be maintained indefinitely. To me this is suspiciously like the mentality of the stock market speculator who believes the market will never fall.

It is part and parcel of this theory of deficit financing that interest rates should be kept low; for if interest rates are tending to rise, or even are expected to rise, the citizen with a capacity to save can be no longer relied on to subscribe as required at the low rates, and therefore the government is compelled to put its entire reliance on the creation of bank credit. There is only one end consequence of this procedure.

The advantage of low interest from the point of view of government interest charges is, of course, obvious, and this same low-interest policy has been pursued in the United States and in England, and of course has naturally affected our situation here. But there are signs, at any rate in the United States, of a change.

The success of any course may fairly be tested by asking whether it can be permanently successful. The success of the last five years both in deficit financing and in maintaining a low interest rate makes the government authorities feel that they can go on indefinitely following the same course. But really the theory has not been fully tested. So far it has been maintained partly by appeals to patriotism, partly as a good investment, and when necessary by support in the market afforded by the Bank of Canada.

I want to digress for a moment to tell of an incident which is related of a bond dealer in the United States who was going about selling his wares after the war was over. He approached a coloured gentleman who was engaged in some kind of improvised government employment which was taking care of him, and used some well-tried arguments. First of all he used the argument of patriotism; and the coloured gentleman said, "Boss, de war is over; don't talk to me about dat". Then the bond dealer came to his second argument, the excellence of the investment, and to this the coloured gentleman replied, "Boss, dem dat pays me what I gets for what I does will go broke".

The first of these supports, that is to say, patriotism, is no longer to be relied on to anything like the same extent. The continued low interest is going to tend to make government bonds less attractive as an investment and therefore the task of the bank might be heavier. The truth is that deficit financing and its offspring, low interest, is still untried under peacetime conditions. I suggest that they are not supported by the common sense of the man on the street, but are the financial conceptions of people living in a world inhabited not by ordinary men of hopes and fears but by that imaginary creature, the economic man.

The ordinary man on the street cannot be made to believe that interest charges can go on mounting indefinitely. He believes there can only be one end to constantly mounting debt, namely, currency instability. Moreover, while low interest rates may be very convenient for borrowing governments, there is another aspect of this question which we should not overlook. Whatever may be the blessings of low interest in some ways, let us not forget that it has important implications for those who have through life insurance or otherwise acquired security for their old age.

The policy of hammering all interest rates down to aid the government in carrying a mounting debt burden means an increase in the cost of security to the largest and most diversified group of investors in the country. Those who, aged or disabled, have provided for self-support from past savings find their retirement allowances cut by this policy. It means that people in modest circumstances must either make larger contributions out of current earnings or accept lower pensions at the time of retirement. It is here that cheap money strikes its hardest blow. It is here that cheap money levies a special tax on the frugal and the thrifty. Inflation can become a vicious form of taxation. Cheap money, especially occasioned by vast government spending, can become in this respect a tax also. It hits the thrifty. It hurts those who are trying to help themselves.

To sum up, the whole deficit theory of financing is based on a controlled economy. Let us face the fact that we have had a virtually controlled economy since 1939. It is not unnatural that those who have been in control should believe that they can do in peace what they did in war. I wish to point out that three of the all important aids which they had in wartime are now gone. First of all they had the insatiable demand for goods. Second they had practically unlimited spending powers. They ran up our debt from three billion to somewhere near seventeen billion. Third, they had control over both producer and consumer. They could tell the producer what to produce, what not to produce. They could tell the workman at what job he was to work. Do not let us deny that with these advantages they accomplished certain things, but the conditions which made their achievement possible no longer exist.

Do I then suggest that government should from now on take an entirely negative attitude? By no means, but what I do say is that to embark or prepare to embark on large further deficit financing when in addition to a deficit on ordinary account of $300 million we are borrowing hundreds of millions for loans abroad, is a highly questionable proceeding.

Bound up with this matter of deficit financing is the question of security, about which it will be convenient at this point to say a few words. I doubt if there ever was a time in the history of the world when there was such an anxious urge for security and such an appalling awareness that we have not got it. There is a widespread feeling that security must come through government. Well, we have had evidence of governments providing security. Governments provided security for several years over large parts of Europe and large parts of Asia. There was security for work; work was not only obtainable; it was inescapable—the work of the slave, the kind of security the Israelites had when they worked for the ancient Egyptians. We can have that kind of security, but it is not the kind of security we want or could tolerate. The truth seems to be that to get security we must take risks. I ventured to suggest that to the minister the other day when he was speaking about the foreign exchange control board. Perhaps that was in Shakespeare's mind when he made one of his characters say—I think it was in Macbeth—"You all know security is mortals' chiefest enemy." That may be a somewhat mysterious statement; nevertheless I believe if we examine into our own minds and study history we shall find that if a man or nation concentrates exclusively on the getting of security, that man or that nation will not get security. I believe we can say that security in a free economy depends on having enough people who are ready to take risks. These are the people who get the thing going; these are the people who provide work for others, and the role of the state is not primarily to provide security but to provide opportunity, and to create an economy conducive to freedom and enterprise. No one will say that we have made a perfect job of it, but great things have been done, and what we need to do is not to change the mainspring, though we may need a better regulator.

Security has come through a multitude of individuals prepared to make the most of their opportunities. At this point I should like to interject this question: what brought our ancestors to this country, from the earliest ones who came from the north of France and then from Britain, on down to the ones who came more recently from the continent of Europe? Did they come here looking for security? They came here looking for opportunity. That is what brought all of them here. Almost without exception they came looking for opportunity, and happily we are able to say that on the whole they found it.

This is not the time or the place for me to take time to discuss the merits of free enterprise and socialism, but I should like to quote something from a man whom I believe no one will regard as a reactionary or a narrow-minded supporter of free enterprise. I refer to the late Lord Keynes. Before quoting him I want to say that just before the statement I wish to quote he had spoken about the extension in certain ways of the traditional functions of government. I trust that hon. members to my left may listen to what Lord Keynes said, because I believe they have respect for him and because I think it tells the story so well. After speaking of the functions of government Lord Keynes said:

> There will still remain a wide field for the exercise of private initiative and responsibility. Within this field the traditional advantages of individualism will still hold good.

Let us stop for a moment to remind ourselves what these advantages are. They are partly advantages of efficiency—the advantages of decentralization and of the play of self-interest. The advantage to efficiency of the decentralization of decision and of individual responsibility is even greater perhaps than the nineteenth century supposed; and the reaction against the appeal to self-interest may have gone too far.

He is a little cagey there. I continue.

> But above all, individualism, if it can be purged of its defects and its abuses, is the best safeguard to personal liberty in the sense that, compared with any other system, it greatly widens—

Mr. MacINNIS: That is a big "if."

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am ready to admit that. You see, I did not leave out that "if." I continue with the quotation:

> —it greatly widens the field for the exercise of personal choice. It is also the best safeguard of the variety of life which emerges precisely from this extended field of personal choice and the loss of which is the greatest of all the losses of the homogeneous or totalitarian state.

I commend this particularly to the hon. friends to my left, many of whom come from Saskatchewan, because that province probably is the most individualist and the most capitalist province in the whole dominion, composed, as it is, largely of farmers.

Under our system the duty of government is to create conditions to increase the number of those who will provide employment. There must be more enterprises, more people to take risks. For that there must be freedom for profits, too, because that is the way to distinguish between efficiency and inefficiency. That is the way and the only way to get the maximum production in a free country.

I want to say a word about workers on their own. Sometimes I think we forget them. A reference to security impels me, naturally, to speak of them. In the house the other day the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) said, as I recall it, that workers on their own numbered about half of the employed people in the dominion. I was surprised when he said that, but at any rate, it is a very large number. Workers on their own number something over 1,100,000. They include 630,000 farmers, 54,000 manufacturers, 99,000 in trade, 49,000 in fishing and logging, and so on. I should also add over a million people who are taking part in pension schemes, in other words, seeking to look after themselves. What is the characteristic of all these people? The characteristic is that they have a sense of responsibility in that they want to look after themselves. My own riding is full of people like that. There are hardly any other people in it. There are large numbers of them in every riding.

What is happening to these people? Remember that I say they all have one characteristic; they all wish to be independent. The two things which are making it difficult for them are taxes and high prices. These and low interest are making it extremely hard for them and sometimes I think they wonder whether in the process of providing security for other people they are to be pushed into a situation where they will have insecurity forced on them. I ask the minister to consider whether he is jeopardizing these people. Is it even possible that there are those who wish to increase the number who are leaning on the state? If so, I wish to proclaim my view that it is people like these who are the cornerstone of any free economy. As I understand it, democracy as we have it really takes its roots from seventeenth century England, and if there ever was a place where they believed that people should try to look after themselves and have a sense of responsibility, it was seventeenth century Puritan England. Our whole desire should be to try to strengthen these people. Morally and materially they are a priceless asset.

I wish to say a few words about production. If I say nothing else to-day I hope I may say a word which may help to concentrate our minds on this all-important thing. Really the one inescapable test of the minister's budget is this: Does it help to create production? Does it encourage the investor to invest, the producer to produce, the workman to produce his maximum. So far as it does these things it is a success; so far as it does not, it is a failure.

In considering production, let us concentrate our minds on consumable things which alone increase wealth, and refuse to allow ourselves to be led away and made dizzy by astronomical money figures. Many people who talk about money as if it were worth having as a thing in itself are guilty of a great error. There is another fallacy of which people are guilty. They talk about production in an abstract and unrealistic way. You hear people say that everything is all right; we have got more skills developed during the war and all we need to do is to put people to work. I wish it were as simple as that. But we do not produce in a vacuum. The only production we can get is production related to other parts of the economy in terms of skills and materials to be supplied, costs and so on. Of course the great bulk of our production must be in those things where we have special skills to produce. It is essential, unless we are going to reshuffle the whole deck, that we keep employed 630,000 farmers, 54,000 manufacturers, 49,000 fishermen and loggers, and so on. On this production depends our whole foreign market, because in these things we produce more than we consume, and if production is high in these lines then we are functioning efficiently, but if it goes down in these lines there is no use in comforting ourselves in an abstract way by saying we shall be able to produce. You cannot suddenly turn a farmer into a miner or a papermaker into a fisherman. Furthermore it is not going to be cured by the huge outpouring of government money. However much we may be prepared to recognize the duty of the government to meet unemployment, we must recognize that the task of turning, let us say, skilled papermakers into foresters is difficult, if not impossible. Therefore, I repeat, when we think of production let us not think of it in abstract terms but let us think of keeping our existing skills employed in production, and let us judge the minister accordingly. Government measures to aid employment should be ancillary, to be used in emergency, and should not blur the fact that the main business of government is to create a favourable climate for the production of the products which we are specially organized and skilled to produce.

Judged by these standards I criticize the minister in three ways. First, he fails to give a definite stimulus to production. Second, his policy of deficit financing I believe will create great uneasiness as to the stability of the currency, if it is continued. Third, the timid and hesitating manner of dealing with controls, even though there has been some improvement, is still hampering business. I shall have a word to say on that later.

Beyond these, and more important still, is the state of mind which has been created throughout the community by vast government expenditures and the hope held out of more. This has created a widespread impression that governments can create money at will and provide full employment by their own financial measures. This has the dangerous effect of lessening the individual sense of responsibility far and wide. In addition, the use of subsidies and bonuses in wartime has created a feeling that the government can step in to fill any money deficiency. "Are the wage-earners not getting enough?" "Let the government make up the deficiency." "Can the company not make money?" "Let the government subsidize the company so prices to the consumer can be kept low." "Are the farmers not getting enough?" "Let a subsidy be given there, too." It all looks to me like pulling ourselves up by our bootstraps. It reminds me of a story which, while of a rather trivial nature, I hope will not offend anyone in this house. A farmer had an invaluable pig man, but he discovered that he had one failing. He explained that his man was a wonderful fellow, always on hand when the sows were farrowing, always there to see that each little pig had its proper channel to receive nutriment, and all the rest of it. The only fault of this pig man was that he forgot to feed the sow!

Let me add that perhaps much of this was unavoidable in war time, but the trouble is that it is continuing in peace time. It cannot go on forever unless we are prepared to resign ourselves to a controlled economy. So on all hands we have strikes, refusal to do certain jobs, and so on. This is partly due to other causes—suspicion, distrust and the like; but it is also due to the widespread decline of an individual sense of responsibility, and for this I believe the minister cannot escape responsibility.

Let me give one illustration. We have men who were formerly engaged in mining, lumbering, farming and so on, who have been released from the army or from munition work. They have come to like a gregarious life. Sometimes it happens that they do not wish to return to the work for which they are best fitted and which will enable them to contribute most to the national economy. No one should criticize them; nevertheless responsible leaders, their own labour leaders first of all and also the government, should make it clear that we cannot prosper as a nation unless every man has a sense of responsibility to do his best at the thing at which he is most skilled. Let no one think, however, that I am forgetting the responsibility of investor and producer, particularly the latter. He too must have a full sense of responsibility; and incidentally I associate myself fully with the minister's appeal to him, only I wish the minister had done more to help him.

I have emphasized the fact that social security can come only from production. I believe this is true. Nevertheless I often hear people talking in this house as though they believed we could get things just by voting money. How easy life would be if that were so! We could all then live in the never-never land which W. S. Gilbert describes, when he says:

> There lived a king, as I've been told,
> In the wonder-working days of old . . .

Then he describes life in this kingdom as follows:

> He wished all men as rich as he,
> And he was rich as rich could be;
> So to the top of every tree
> Promoted everybody.

But speaking seriously, as I have sat here listening to the call for expenditures how often have I said to myself: Can this really be true? Can we have everything we want regardless of expense? Sometimes I feel that anyone who questions it is regarded as anti-social, and my feeling is that if those of us who think there is a limit somewhere prove to be right, then the anti-social people will prove to be those who carelessly and recklessly, in my opinion, have urged people to believe that government spending could be carried on without limit.

I wish to say one other thing, and it is this. In this house I believe we should be prepared to credit each other with sincerity. The other day I was very much surprised to hear no less a person than the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) say:

> I know my Progressive Conservative friends dislike the idea of many other things that are being done for the benefit of the ordinary man and woman in Canada.

I resent this sort of thing very much; I think it is beneath the dignity of the hon. member to talk in that vein. If he must talk in that way I suggest that he keep it for his own constituents.

While I am on this matter there is another thing I should like to mention. It is one of the most popular indoor sports in this house, as far as I can make out, to suggest that in the period from 1930 to 1935, when our party was in power, there was a disregard of the needs of social security. Incidentally I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite that we inherited the years from 1930 to 1935 from those across the way; and while the conditions we had then were in the main world wide, nevertheless prudent housekeeping by the Canadian government in the gay twenties would have made the years from 1930 to 1935 very different from what they were. At the present rate of going, we may have a bad legacy again in a year or two. But to come back to the barrage of criticism, particularly from hon. gentlemen to my left, perhaps it would interest them to hear what a distinguished member of their own fraternity had to say of the prime minister of those days. The speaker is none other than Professor F. R. Scott, who I believe is still in good standing in the C.C.F. party. He had this to say:

> A glance at the dominion statutes of 1933-35 will reveal how active was the Conservative leader in the promotion of social reform.

I wish to add quickly, in order to save hon. gentlemen to my left the trouble of pointing it out to me, that at the time Mr. Scott was making this statement he was also pointing to the fact that the Prime Minister of that day had done certain things to extend government operation.

Now I wish to say a word or two on the subject of controls. At the end of the war I think almost everybody felt (1) that controls had served a useful purpose, (2) that they could not be done away with immediately, (3) that they hoped they would be done away with as soon as possible, and (4) that they wanted a continuing plan known and understood by the public. In respect to the first three points I am sure the government would agree, but in respect of the last I think we are entitled to criticize the government. I think we can say: (1) that there should be a developing plan; (2) that it should be known; (3) that it should operate in successive stages; (4) that some trouble should be taken to sell it to the public, as trouble was taken when price controls were put on in 1941, when a good job was done; and (5) that the plan should be a general one. The present confused situation in the United States has been the occasion of a new statement by the minister on the subject of controls, but the main principles to which I shall refer are not affected by what has happened; actually they are emphasized by it.

At the present time the picture one has is of the attempt to deal with a multitude of individual cases, and I submit that it is doomed to failure before it starts. What happens? Case A is considered, and it take some time. It cannot be done overnight. It may take weeks to assemble all the facts, or at any rate a considerable time. If everything else remained static while that was being done, it might be all right; but what happens? Everything else is in a state of flux, so I suggest that by the time a decision is reached in a great many cases, it is already obsolete; and I suggest that has been going on in scores and perhaps hundreds of cases and that we are getting an uneven situation in every direction. The triviality of the cases with which the board still deals is almost beyond belief. I have mentioned here previously that it came to my attention that the price of horseshoeing in one of the small towns in my riding has been under control. The hope was expressed by the board that they might be able to lift the ceiling, and I was asked to hold up the matter for a week while that was being considered. Finally there was a civil and courteous statement that it could not be done, that is was part of a pattern. That, to me, is pure doctrinaire intellectualism. Therefore my feeling is that if this is going to be done successfully it has to be done to some extent "by and large", and that we cannot proceed by dealing with each individual. Also the public must be taken into the confidence of the government as they were with regard to control.

What has the minister to say about it? I quote his words:

> We believe it is wise, and practically necessary, gradually to relax and remove the controls which made up our stabilization programme.

That is all very well, but there must be some method indicated, some plan that is intelligible and for which public support may be sought.

This raises the question of publicity. The original price control was sold to the public in a most effective manner. People were made to believe in it. It is now necessary to sell decontrol to the people in the same effective way, and get them to believe in it also.

Next comes the human equation. In order to get decontrol we must have people who believe in decontrol. People who have been working controls have believed in them. But is it likely that they are going to become enthusiastic about decontrol? I think that to ask them to work for decontrol will be like asking a lot of admirals to decide upon reducing the navy.

Let us be realistic about it. We have a group of men who have had unlimited power in their hands, and who have the controlled economy complex. They are industrious and high-minded, and no doubt convinced that their controlling hands are still necessary. It will be hard for these men to believe really in decontrol. Must it not almost inevitably seem to them a risky thing to trust people to look after their own affairs again?

Then, one final point on the matter of control. The key problem of control is to keep increases in prices and increases in wages related to each other, but at the present time we can see only too clearly that this is not being done. What we actually find is something like this: An increase in wages granted by the national war labour board, then an increase in prices granted by the wartime prices and trade board, then a further demand from labour for increased wages to offset the increased price which the producer, on the other hand, regarded as compensating him for the increase in wages already given.

So long as the period of control exists, and until employers and employees can get back to the healthy business of making their own agreements, there is only one solution for this difficulty, namely to bring employers and employees together and let them hammer out their differences of wages and prices before a joint authority which can arrive at an over-all decision.

This is the only way to get production, which is the answer to every problem whichever way we turn. I cannot do better than quote briefly from Mr. F. P. Walsh, a well-known labour leader in New Zealand:

> And nothing should be allowed to interrupt the productive system. We cannot afford to have stoppages of production. Machinery exists in the federation of labour and in the government for the settlement of industrial disputes. This machinery is adequate and is there to be used. The history of disputes shows that it must be used at some stage and therefore the most effective way for our movement to use it is before the stoppage occurs. Every time a stoppage occurs, not only are wages lost but goods are lost which are essential to the attainment of a higher standard of living—our primary objective.

I wish to say just a word about dominion-provincial relations. I said the other evening that in their method of presenting the new proposals to the provinces, the dominion government was using a very big stick. I favour, as my leader favours, and as I hope all hon. members favour, the adjustment of dominion-provincial relations on the basis of fiscal need. I shall confine myself in my further remarks at the present time to method.

What were the provinces entitled to expect when the meeting adjourned on May 3? Very considerable progress had been made. Much of what the dominion wanted had been conceded already, so that there was no reason for precipitate action. The principle which was advocated on behalf of the provinces had had, on a previous occasion, some years before, the approval of the Prime Minister himself. I shall quote him later.

The great principle which the provinces sought to sustain was the classic principle of responsible government—that all governments should by their own taxation measures raise as much as possible of the money they spend.

After emphasizing the importance to the provinces of retaining certain minor taxation fields, Mr. Macdonald, Premier of Nova Scotia, said that if these be lost—and these are his words as they are reported at page 39 of the official report of the proceedings of the conference—

> Provincial autonomy will be gone. Provincial independence will vanish. Provincial dignity will disappear. Provincial governments will become mere annuitants of Ottawa. Provincial public life—and I do not think these words are too strong—will be debased and degraded.

It is with this background of words used by Mr. Macdonald that I now quote the words used by the Prime Minister in 1930, as reported at page 1237 of Hansard for that year. The Prime Minister, if I may say so, on this occasion spoke with unusual absence of qualification. Here are his words:

> When on a previous occasion we were discussing this matter of grants from one treasury to another, I said I thought it was an unsound principle; in fact, I think I used the expression that it was a vicious principle to have one body raise the taxes and another body spend the peoples' money thus raised.

These words of the Prime Minister put the matter very clearly. In all these circumstances—the progress already made, the wishes of the provincial premiers, the known attitude in the matter of the Prime Minister which I have just quoted—the provinces were entitled to expect that the conference would have been reconvened.

This would have been in accordance with the spirit which characterized the making of confederation. Confederation was brought about only by an exercise of tact, wisdom, moderation, mutual understanding, forbearance, patience, and willingness to give and take. Moreover this principle, the principle of seeking progress by discussion and agreement, has been well established already in commonwealth relations. This spirit of seeking agreement by discussion and compromise, which served us so well at confederation and which has characterized all meetings of the commonwealth, the government of Canada has cast aside in its methods of dealing with the provinces.

I am aware that the answer will be made: Well, what about it? The provinces will have to agree, and if they do, is there anything more to be said?

One or two provinces have accepted, and others will no doubt accept. Needs must when the devil drives. But that is not the final answer. The final question is not whether this high-handed action will succeed, but what bearing it has on the vitally important future relations between provinces and dominion. The question is what would be the effect of this use of the power of the purse, of this shot-gun substitute for consultation, compromise and agreement.

This, I fear, is another instance of what the Prime Minister, in the quotation from which I previously read, called, "the war habit of mind", which he defined as "the habit that believes that everything should be done by the autocratic will of the ministry, regardless altogether of the wishes of parliament." These words of the Prime Minister may rise to confront him still as centralized power goes on from one high-handed arbitrary step to another.

The statement made by the Minister of Finance on Friday last will have, as he recognized, a most serious effect on the gold-mining industry. Whether or not, as some think, it will close down low-grade mines, is not clear. We must hope it will not. But it will be bad enough, bad for shareholders, but far harder on the miners themselves.

It should not be forgotten by any hon. member that in 1943 there were 64,324 employees in the metal mines industries throughout Canada; that they received in wages and salaries $128,483,302, or an average amount of $1,997, or just $3 less than $2,000. If the gold industry is to be maintained in a strong and progressive position, further immediate steps will have to be taken by the government. Some of these steps are indicated in the recommendations of the senate committee on steps to be taken for the mining industry as a whole, comprising the following basic measures:

(1) Return of fifty per cent depletion allowance for both mines and shareholders;

(2) Wipe out the excess profits tax on all mining.

With the full gravity of the situation facing them, I urge the government in the first place to adopt these senate recommendations, which they have so far ignored; second, to consider seriously whether further steps can be taken to maintain this industry, which has been of inestimable importance to the economy of this country, particularly since 1929, by reason of the fact that practically the whole mining output has been exported abroad.

I wish to say a word now about trade—and I also wish to say that I am nearly through.

Two things have always been essential in the past to the prosperity of Canada:

1. That there should be economic relations on a large scale between the United States and the United Kingdom; and

2. That we should be able to export large amounts of natural products to the United Kingdom and western Europe.

To-day this remains as true as ever, but there remains the fact that there are tremendous influences at play which tend to create an impossible situation in western Europe. We know that a great part of western Europe has been overrun by Russia and is really inaccessible to us. The rest of Germany is in a very unsound position. While in the balance of western Europe there has been some encouraging progress, that is something which could easily be put back.

What about the United Kingdom? It stands with one foot in Europe and one foot in the western hemisphere. It is trying, as it always has done after successful wars, to treat the enemy decently, wisely and constructively, both from motives of humanity and from motives of enlightened self-interest. It is the bastion for the western hemisphere in time of peace, just as it was in time of war. It is a bastion now against the flood of economic communism, as it was in war against the flood of nazism. If the flood of communism should cover the rest of Europe, it is hard to see how Great Britain could survive economically.

What would her failure mean to this country and to the United States? Assuming, as one could hardly fail to assume, that if communism should sweep west it would also sweep east, we would then find an America isolated. Does any one suggest that South America alone could afford a sufficient export area to make possible North American prosperity? How earnestly then must we hope for the success of Great Britain, and how ready we should be to play our part?

The first objective obviously was to enable Britain to resume as rapidly as possible normal economic relations, and in particular to aim for a convertible sterling. The Bretton Woods agreement, which was approved in this house last December, was a step to that end, and a second step was the loan approved in this house some weeks ago. A greater step, which we await anxiously day by day to hear the accomplishment of, is the American loan. I cannot believe that shortsighted obscurantism can possibly win the victory in that great country over the forces of reason and enlightenment. How anyone can doubt that the United States, cut off from Europe, would suffer grievous economic injuries, I cannot understand. A new factor in the situation, from Canada's point of view, is that during the war we become a creditor instead of a debtor nation. This means that the import-export situation is basically altered and, in the long run, we must find a way to take more imports.

I should like to digress here for a moment just to put on record one or two facts often forgotten in the history of trade policy. It can, I think, fairly be said that the Liberal party, if the record is studied, has followed remarkably closely Conservative tariff policy. The Laurier government in 1896 adopted the national policy of 1878. The King government in the nineteen-twenties accepted with little variation the tariffs of Borden and Meighen. Since then the same has been true. The much maligned policy of Bennett in the difficult nineteen-thirties has quietly been adopted with no significant changes by the present government in the nineteen-forties. We hear little now of those Liberals who preached unilateral lowering of tariffs. Hon. gentlemen opposite may be surprised at this, but if they will look at the facts I believe they will find I am right.

This, as I said, is for the record. To-day we face new conditions and cannot rely complacently on old methods. We are providing large sums of money to enable our products to find a market—perhaps something like a billion dollars this year, not to pay for imports but to pay for exports. We are coming to be creditors in world trade relations, and we must adjust our policies accordingly.

I come back to where I began. We need exports as never before. In the world of to-day there are new and perplexing difficulties in the way of trade. Difficulties of currency are added to the old difficulties of tariff. If we seek security exclusively, pursuing our own prosperity by policies of exclusiveness, we may very well find that we have failed to get security but have only the exclusiveness. What we must try in every way to do is to pursue security through cooperation and exchange policies.

It will be natural that many hon. members at this moment will have in their minds the question of British preferences which the United States, in signing the British loan agreement (subject to the approval of congress) suggested we should relinquish as part of the greater freedom of trade which it was hoped would result from that and other similar agreements. In my opinion we in Canada should do all in our power to contribute to the increase of trade. Whether it comes or not depends, it is true, to an almost overwhelming degree upon the United States. However, we bring much greater strength to any negotiation than in the past, and can play a greater part than in the past, particularly with the United States. Meanwhile it would be natural for many in Canada to feel that we must not give up a bird in the hand until we have some indication of what is in the bush.

I have tried to emphasize the unreality of this budget. There is unreality in the new deferred form of tax relief which reminds us of the children's game, "This year, next year, sometime, never." There is unreality in facing our deficit; there is unreality in failing to accentuate production but on the contrary getting lost in mazes of dollars. There is unreality in painting our economic position too rosily, and, worst of all, in making no concentrated attack on the citadel of extravagance.

I sometimes wonder if the government which has been borrowing and pouring into our pockets as part of our income some three billion dollars a year is not allowing or even inviting us to commit the error of a man who has an income of $3,000 a year, who borrows $2,000 and then spends the lot, leaving to someone else all the worry about repaying the loan. Much was expected of the budget—it is almost pathetic to recall how much—but the hopes have largely turned to ashes. Instead of relief and encouragement, the budget has given us disillusionment and disappointment.

It will be hard for the minister's appeal for production to succeed when no new incentives are offered. But it is essential that all of us as good citizens should do everything in our power to bring it about.

However, the great responsibility must remain on the government, and it seems to me that unless they show a greater ability to organize economically, a greater capacity in other ways, the prospect is not what we would desire.

I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets:

(1) That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946;

(2) That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government;

(3) That the policies of the government are discouraging much-needed production."

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I want my first word to be one of congratulation to the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the careful and comprehensive review of the nation's business which he gave in his budget speech. I am glad that in this one respect I find myself in complete agreement with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). We both agree in loving the sinner while hating the sin. Perhaps I should say, while hating the sins, because we may find some difficulty in agreeing on the particular sins that we hate.

This is the first peace-time budget since 1939. The budgets in the years 1939 to 1946 had to do with the economy of the country in the emergency of war. Under such circumstances we could not expect much constructive long-term planning. Consequently our strongest criticism of this first peacetime budget in seven years is not so much for what it does as for what it fails to do. It is a perfectly orthodox old-fashioned budget, and may I say that the criticism we just listened to was perfectly orthodox old-fashioned criticism. If any proof were needed I would point to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario quoting something that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in 1920.

This budget takes no account of the social and economic changes which took place in this country and in the world during the ten years of the depression and the six years of war. It looks back to yesterday, and I may say that my hon. friend the member for Muskoka-Ontario also looks back to yesterday, not forward to to-morrow.

Let me remind the house that we were told during the war that never again would we allow the economy of the country to sink back to what it was in the thirties, never again would we condemn ourselves to live in poverty while all round us we had potential and actual abundance. Yet there is nothing in this budget to indicate that the government has any intention of honouring that promise. In the war we achieved full employment and the economic security that goes with that condition. I think it is agreed, at least, among all progressive people, that we could do the same thing in peace. There is nothing surer than that we cannot do it by using the hit-or-miss methods of private enterprise. It cannot be done without careful over-all planning to meet civilian peacetime needs as we met military needs in time of war. Planning the Canadian economy to meet the requirements of the Canadian people—that should be the foremost feature of this our first peacetime budget in seven years.

Let me draw to the attention of hon. members what the lack of planning results in. It is amusing to hear members of the government and members of the opposition talk of the period from 1930 to 1935 and the years before that. The Conservatives say: Oh, yes, but in the years 1930 to 1935 there was a world-wide depression and, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said, we inherited that from the Liberals. Unfortunately, the Liberals also inherit from the Conservatives, because Liberals and Conservatives have always been the government in this country, one following the other. What they do is merely to put the blame on each other, and the blame is, of course, correctly placed.

Let me quote briefly from page 144 of book I of the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, sometimes referred to as the Rowell-Sirois commission. It says:

> When the bases for progress along the old lines disappeared—

Let my hon. friends on my right listen to this:

> —and the full force of the world depression fell upon our specialized exports, the problems of adjustment were extremely difficult. Canada's political, public finance and economic organizations were not adapted to deal with sharp and prolonged economic reverses. When a specific and coordinated programme was required, there was bewilderment; when positive action was needed there were only temporizing and negative policies; when a realization of the far-reaching effects of the altered circumstances was demanded, there was but faith in the speedy return to the old conditions of prosperity.

Could anything be truer of this budget than that statement? Could anything be truer as applied to what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has just said? Again I quote from page 172 of the same book:

> It is clear from the above brief review that there was no coordinated or carefully planned relief policy in Canada during the depression. It was a policy of expediency which failed either to promote maximum welfare under the circumstances or to safeguard the financial position of the various governments. The dominion, from whom alone leadership could have come, was mainly concerned with steering a day-to-day course between insisting on the constitutional responsibility of the provinces and the necessity of preventing wide-spread starvation.

Surely the policies which failed then are not good enough for 1946.

We regret, Mr. Speaker, this fundamental defect in the budget, the defect that it does not plan. Indeed it holds out no hope whatever that we can have steady and enduring prosperity in a peacetime economy. In this budget the Minister of Finance bases his whole hope for the maintenance of the prosperity that we attained in the war on three main factors; perhaps I should say three main hopes. First, he places his hope on continued high export trade. His second hope is high private investment. His third hope is in the large reserves of savings in the hands of Canadian people which will be used in consumer purchasing. I wish to deal in some detail with these three hopes of his for maintaining prosperity, on which the government, may I point out, bases its whole fiscal policy.

At page 2902 of Hansard the minister said:

> Our income from exports is the most important factor determining our prosperity and employment in peace time.

He then goes on to show how during the war our exports rose to enormous proportions and that while our exports of war material have stopped they are being replaced by manufactured goods and raw materials for civilian consumption. He closes the paragraph with this sentence:

> This is the main factor in the maintenance of our national production and employment.

With all due deference to the minister, I suggest to him and the government that when in a country like ours we place the whole or chief emphasis upon exports to maintain prosperity we are leaning on a broken reed. The history of the last twenty to thirty years is sufficient proof of that. Has the minister forgotten that during the depression years one-quarter of our population went hungry and without sufficient clothing, went without decent shelter, while we had right here in Canada all of the things needed, and they were all going to waste? On the one hand, men deteriorated, while, on the other, the goods they needed also went to waste. Are we to go back to that? There is nothing in the budget to say that we are not, and there is nothing in the criticism that we heard from the official opposition this afternoon to indicate that they too are not prepared to go back to that.

May I pause to say, for fear I might be misunderstood, that this party is not opposed to a policy of encouraging export trade. Indeed we are very much in favour of such a policy, and we have supported every proposal of the government to that end. We believe export trade to be an important factor in our economy, provided that exports are paid for by imports. But that is an altogether different thing from saying that Canada must depend upon export trade as its main prop in producing and supporting a high standard of living. In my opinion there is only one reason why a country must sell goods, and that reason is that it must buy the goods that it cannot or does not produce. The less varied the resources of a country are, the greater is the necessity for export trade, because the exports will pay for what the country must import. Let me cite an example of what I mean: An export market is much more important to Great Britain than to the United States, because the latter country can and does produce more of the needs of its own people. Similarly, export trade is more important to Canada than to the United States, because our resources are less varied than those of the United States.

An export market, then, sufficient to enable us to buy such imports as are necessary to the functioning of our economy and the maintenance of the health and well-being of our people is highly essential, in fact imperative, if we are to have a high standard of living. But once we have attained that amount of exports, it is the home market which is important; it is the making available to the people of Canada of the goods that can be produced in Canada which is important.

The minister referred to the policy of the government of extending credits to the countries of Europe and the value of this policy in expanding our export trade now and in establishing it for the future. I appreciate that part of the government's policy. But even without these considerations we, because of our circumstances, have an obligation to help our more unfortunate neighbours and to make sacrifices if necessary to do so. Consequently we shall support the government to the limit in that regard. But we must remember that we cannot raise the standard of living of our people without higher consumption at home.

The second factor to which the minister looks for maintaining employment and production is private investment for capital purposes. It would be strange indeed, Mr. Speaker, if there were not heavy capital expenditures at this time, in view of the fact that very little was expended on durable goods during the war. The minister and the government should be aware, however, that under our present economic system the production of capital goods and money capital has a pronounced habit of outrunning opportunities for investment. I think it is correct to say that every major depression in the last fifty years and perhaps for longer than that was brought about by the drying up of opportunities for investment. Such situations were incorrectly attributed to overproduction. It is also a patent economic fact that the openings for new capital on a world-wide scale are decreasing—that is, leaving aside the result of war devastation—while the means for creating new capital are constantly increasing. The speed with which we found the capital needed for war production is ample proof of that assertion.

The minister himself is not at all hopeful that the investment of new capital on a large scale will continue very long. Commenting on retardation in the construction industry because of shortages of material and skilled labour he said, as reported in Hansard, at page 2903:

> It is to be hoped that this industrial and commercial expenditure that cannot readily be made now will be deferred a year or two, when it will help in sustaining high levels of employment and incomes after other temporary stimulants are less strong.

The use of the word "stimulant" here is appropriate, because the whole idea seems to be to keep the economy going by means which can no longer maintain healthy economic conditions, regardless of how effective they may have been in the past. This sort of shot-in-the-arm method does not and cannot meet the situation to-day. May I say that the minister has every reason to be apprehensive that in a year or two other stimulants will be necessary for even the partial functioning of our economy. I share his misgivings, and for reasons which I am sure he knows.

Early in the war the government appointed an advisory committee on reconstruction. It was commonly known as the James committee because of the name of its chairman. This committee reported in 1944 that under full employment conditions the annual savings of the Canadian people would be about $1,500 million. With savings at this level, the report said, full employment could be maintained only if the $1,500 million were actually invested, used to buy capital goods, that is plant, machinery and such capital material. What are the prospects that we can invest so much? I do not think they are very bright. Mr. J. R. Beattie, of the Bank of Canada, writing in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science in August, 1944, stated as follows:

(a) that even the tremendously rapid industrial expansion during the war had not involved more than one billion dollars of capital expenditure, public and private, in plant, equipment and housing in any one year;

(b) that though electric power is a heavy capital-using industry, its total pre-war investment in fixed assets was less than $1,500 million;

(c) that one year's saving at the rate of $1,500 million a year would cover the cost of all the residential housing in Canada built in the twenty years from 1917 to 1937;

(d) that $1,500 milllion would cover nearly half the total fixed capital investment in Canadian railways;

(e) that even the building of a new industry comparable to the pre-war automobile industry would absorb less than three weeks' saving at the rate of $1,500 million a year.

These are impressive figures and, coming from a source so close to the Minister of Finance, he has no doubt heard them before.

A later survey of post-war investment plans of private industry is contained in the Canadian Bank of Commerce monthly Commercial Letter for January 1946. The letter surveys all the available material on pre-war investment, takes into consideration expenditure on new equipment which has been postponed because of the war, and makes an estimate of the total prospective investments of private firms and corporations, publicly owned transportation, hydro and telephone systems, and government highways, from 1946 to 1950. The estimate includes everything — lands, furnishings, machinery and all other equipment. This is the finding: city and town homes, $750 million; business building (warehouses, stores, theatres, hotels, garages, office buildings), $250 million; industrial and mining, $1,000 million; public utilities, $350 million; transportation (highways, railway equipment, airports, waterways), $400 million; farm improvement and extension (buildings, machinery, implements, rural electrification), $350 million; making a total of $3,100 million for the five years. This works out to an annual outlay of $620 million, less than half of the James committee's estimated savings under full employment.

There is a still later survey, one, by the way, made public on June 27, the day the budget was introduced. The Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) released the result of a joint survey of the investment intentions of private industry for 1946, made by the Department of Reconstruction and the dominion bureau of statistics. The survey includes private industry and public utilities with plans for expenditures on new construction and improvements, new machinery and equipment for 1946 as follows:

Mining	25,000,000
Woods operations	10,000,000
Central electric stations	75,000,000
Telephones	50,000,000
Transportation (Airports, highways, railway equipment and waterways)	140,000,000
Total	$700,000,000

The release pointed out that there is an additional amount of $500 million mainly for residential, institutional and commercial construction. This will make a total of $1,200 million. But this investment, even if it were realized—and the Minister of Reconstruction said it is not likely to be realized—would fall short of the amount mentioned in the James committee's report.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of the party for which I speak to-day, if the present government is to prevent unemployment there will have to be investment on a scale much greater than private enterprise is prepared for. What does the government then propose? How is the gap to be bridged? Nothing is proposed? There is no bridge. Export trade, private enterprise, and the spending power in the hands of the public; that is all that is proposed. The country that can plan so well for war is left in peace time to the blind blundering of private enterprise.

Here I should like to quote briefly from the Bank of Canada report for 1943, dated February 10, 1944. The governor of the Bank of Canada had this to say:

> The magnitude of the adjustments which Canada will face in maintaining high employment after the war can be indicated in simple terms. In 1939 about four million Canadians were gainfully occupied and at least 300,000 who were available for work were not employed.

In other words, they were unemployed. I continue:

> By the end of 1943 the gainfully occupied population had risen to approximately 5,100,000, but about 1,900,000 of these were engaged in the armed forces, in supplying the weapons of war, or in producing the food required for special war-time exports. The number available to meet civilian needs had therefore fallen to about 3,200,000, but at the same time the average standard of living had risen materially and was probably higher than it had ever been.

This increased output of consumption goods by a smaller working force can be accounted for in part by longer hours of work, favourable crop conditions and the abnormally small number now employed in private capital development and maintenance work. Another important factor, however, has been the improvement in production techniques worked out under the stress of war.

What are we to expect after the war? This is what he says:

After the war, some of those who are now employed will voluntarily withdraw from the working force, and the armed services may be maintained at a level considerably above their pre-war strength. It seems likely however that at least 4,700,000 workers will be available for employment in civilian jobs, or at least 1,500,000 more than the number employed in that sector of the economy at the present time. A working force of this size, at present rates of efficiency, will be able to produce a vastly greater volume of civilian goods and services than Canada has ever known before. By the same token, a vastly increased volume of consumption and capital development will be necessary if this output is going to be fully absorbed and high employment maintained. The adjustments required will clearly be of unprecedented magnitude, and bold planning on the part of labour, farm and business organizations, as well as governments, is urgently needed.

I see no sign that there is any bold planning. Industry says, let the government keep out of business, but there is no indication that industry is willing to plan on the magnitude that will meet the needs of the people with this tremendous power in their hands. The government hesitates between letting industry do it and doing something itself, and it does nothing.

In two or three sentences I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members what I consider to be the imperative implications of the situation confronting us. It is this: if the products of industry are not consumed as either capital or consumer goods, unemployment is sure to develop. If private capital cannot or will not make the necessary investments—and they have never been able to do so—then there are only two alternatives for this government: either to permit production to slow to a stop, or else to take effective steps to increase the consumption capacity of the people, and particularly of those in the low income brackets.

We cannot forever continue to make investments at even the present rate. That, however, should not be something to fear or worry about; it should be something to look forward to with pleasure, because it should mean that we can at last have more of the good things of life.

In case my time should run out I wish to move an amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That all the words in the amendment after "the calendar year 1946," be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

(1) by raising sufficiently the exemptions of those in the lower income brackets;

(2) that the budget fails to provide for the investment of public funds to bridge the gap between anticipated private investment and the total national investment required to assure a high national income and full employment;

(3) that the budget fails in the new offer to the provinces to provide for social security measures which will achieve a reasonable standard of economic security for all Canadians;

(4) that the budget fails in its tax proposals to recognize the principle that cooperatives are non-profit-making organizations.

This brings me to the third factor or stimulant or hope mentioned by the minister as an offset to the decline in war expenditures. At page 2903 of Hansard the minister is reported as having said:

The third offset to the decline in our war expenditures has been a substantial increase in the expenditures of consumers. At present a great many consumers have on hand large reserves of savings which they accumulated during the war, and some of which they wish to spend when the goods they want become available.

That there are large reserves of savings in the hands of Canadians is quite true, but there is not nearly as much in the hands of the people who are eager to spend it on consumer goods as we are sometimes led to believe. Savings deposits in the chartered banks are perhaps our best criterion as to what people have to spend, and also as to the people who have it to spend. A return of classifications of loans and deposits in the chartered banks as at October 31, 1945, shows that at that date 5,616,712 depositors had total savings of $2,991 million, and to-day the deposits are some $400 million greater. Let me analyse those figures for a moment. It will be remembered that I gave the number of depositors as 5,616,712. Those with $1,000 or less on deposit numbered 4,968,655, so that nearly 5,000,000 of the 5,616,712 had $1,000 or less. They had an aggregate of $862 million, or an average of $173.50 each. So we see that the greater number of the Canadian people have very little to spend. As a matter of fact I could give figures to show that the great mass of the people have no savings at all. I would like to examine the other categories, but I shall mention only the last one. There were 819 deposits in excess of $100,000, totalling $347,798,839, or an average deposit of $424,662. These are the people who have money to spend, but they will not be spending it on consumer goods. They will be spending some of it on luxury goods and some on investments, if they can find a place to invest it. I should be very glad if the house would allow this table, taken from the report, to be included in the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MacINNIS: The table is as follows:

Savings Deposits—Chartered Banks of Canada—as at October 31, 1945

Size of Accounts	No. of Depositors	Aggregate Deposits	Average Deposits
$1,000 or less	4,968,655	$ 862,261,212	$ 173 50
$1,000 to $5,000	584,182	1,142,894,098	1,956 00
$5,000 to $25,000	59,971	496,976,622	8,287 00
$25,000 to $100,000	3,085	133,405,289	43,243 00
In excess of $100,000	819	347,798,839	424,662 00

Of course I am aware that this is not all the savings in the hands of the people. A considerable number of the victory bonds sold are still held by the people who bought them, but I should be very much surprised if an analysis of victory bond holdings would be materially different from that of saving deposit accounts. In this regard a comparison of the figures for the two victory loans floated in 1945 is significant. The minister placed them on record in his budget speech. Though $431 million more was raised in the ninth victory loan than in the eighth loan, there were 230,639 fewer subscribers to the latter loan. This shows that with the end of the war the ability of the workers to buy bonds or to save had diminished rapidly.

In view of all this, the party for which I speak deeply regrets that the Minister of Finance did not see his way clear to raise the exemptions on the lower incomes to at least $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. The minister said that raising the exemptions to $750 and $1,500 had taken between 550,000 and 600,000 persons off the income tax rolls. Nothing more need be said to show how shamefully inadequate our low incomes really are. People in those income brackets cannot live decently. A study of the tables appearing on pages 2916 and 2917 of Hansard, showing the percentage of the proposed 1947 taxes, would seem to bear out the truth of the biblical dictum that "to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." It cannot be said too often that the taxes one pays must be measured in terms not of the amount paid but of the amount left after the tax has been paid. If an individual has paid only a dollar he has paid too much if he has not enough left for himself and his family to live in decency. On the other hand, if a person has paid $10,000 in taxes he has not paid too much if he still has sufficient left for a decent living. Raising the exempt income from $660 to $750 for single persons, a paltry $90, is totally inadequate at a time of rising living costs. It is not only inadequate; it is a shameful condition.

The minister mentioned that this exemption was somewhat higher than in Great Britain, New Zealand, the United States or Australia.

I have not time to go into these figures, but in the case of New Zealand he pointed out also that there was a national defence tax and a social security tax amounting to ten per cent. That would make the rate of taxation on the lower incomes pretty much the same. But I wish to point out that in the case of New Zealand—and I believe this is also the case in Australia and will be the case in regard to Great Britain—the whole of the social security tax goes back in benefits to the people. In New Zealand the social security fund is not based on actuarial considerations. The whole of it is paid out each year, and if it is not sufficient to meet the benefits provided the balance comes from consolidated revenue. Let me point out again that the whole of the 7½ per cent social security tax goes back to the people in free treatment in public hospitals; free treatment in mental hospitals; free treatment in maternity hospitals; free medical attention; free medical and surgical appliances; sickness benefits of £4 weekly if the husband is ill and £2 weekly if the wife is ill; unemployment benefits of £4 a week; universal superannuation at sixty-five years of age at £50 for man and wife without means test, which amount will increase by an additional £5 each year until it amounts to £4 weekly or £208 yearly, or, in the alternative, £4 weekly for life at the age of sixty years for man and wife, with a generous means test. It also includes permanent invalidity pension for the husband of £4 a week; permanent invalidity pension for the wife of £2 a week. If the husband dies the wife receives £2 a week. If both parents die the orphan children are entitled to receive up to 15s. 9d. each, and there are a number of other benefits in return for the social security tax. But over and above that, every family of four in New Zealand is guaranteed by the state that in all circumstances their yearly income will not be less than £260, less social security and national security taxes. That is an altogether different situation from what we have in Canada. A person who receives an exemption of $750—or of $1,500, as the case may be—will have to pay for nearly all these things which, in New Zealand, they get because of their tax.

Living costs are generally higher for single persons than for married persons. We believe that an exemption of $1,000 for a single person is not too much. May I say, further, that an exemption of $1,500 for married persons is far too low. The welfare council of Toronto in a study of the cost of a standard of living which would maintain a standard of—and these are their words—"health and self respect" for a family of five, at 1944 prices, found that it would require an income of $1,864 a year. Let me repeat that that was at 1944 prices. To-day's prices, as everyone knows, are much higher.

A single person receiving an income of $850 will benefit to the amount of $27 under the new proposed tax. That is the benefit which will be received in 1947. However, a single person in receipt of an income of $5,000 will benefit to the extent of $246—and the higher the income, the greater the benefit.

What is the sense of taking $22 from a person with an income of $850 and giving a person with an income of $5,000 a benefit to the extent of $246? Or, to put it another way, a person with an income of $5,000—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes. He would not be permitted to continue without unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, I call attention to the fact that only a few weeks ago in another debate you stated, Mr. Speaker, that an amendment to an amendment of this nature was a new motion of want of confidence. On that occasion Your Honour after making that ruling allowed the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to speak for more than forty minutes. If the ruling was good then, it is good to-day. I should not be placed in a position where I am allowed to continue only through unanimous consent of the house. I submit I should continue, by right, under Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member's attention to Beauchesne's third edition, page 93, paragraph 220 where it states:

> An amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne is a motion of "no-confidence"; so is an amendment not accepted by the government on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for committee of supply or ways and means. But a sub-amendment (as the amendment to the amendment is usually called), is not a new motion of no confidence; it is intended to strengthen or weaken the amendment to which it must be relevant and upon which it is dependent. It does not entitle a member to speak longer than forty minutes, this privilege having been already exercised by the mover of the amendment.

I suggest that the rule is clear, and unless the hon. member has unanimous consent I shall be obliged to ask him to take his seat.

Mr. BRACKEN: I express no opinion on the point of order. But if the hon. member is permitted to continue, he may do so without any protest from this section of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I point out that what you read, Mr. Speaker, was in the rules at the time of your other ruling. It was because the other ruling was made that I prepared to speak at this length.

I should like to know where I stand on the matter, not by consent but by my rights as a member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: A person with an income of $5,000 has left, after paying his tax, the sum of $3,548, or more than four times the income of the man in the $850 class. Surely this is not equitable treatment. The human needs of the one are the same as those of the other; and the state, when in need of their services, demands the same service from each. Then, again, the second largest number of taxpayers is in the class between $1,000 and $2,000. In this reference I quote from the publication "Taxation Statistics" issued by the Department of National Revenue. The figures for 1941 show that the number of taxpayers in the income class from $1,000 to $2,000 was 386,862. Their total assessed incomes amounted to $554,305,999. Their total tax was $25,042,082. The income left after the tax paid amounted to $519,000,000, or an average income of $1,407 per person.

Persons paying tax on incomes of $50,000 and over numbered 506. Their total taxable income was $47,264,266 and the total tax paid was $26,675,253. This left these 506 individuals with an average income, after tax was paid, of $40,689, or an average income nearly thirty times as great as that of the average person in the $1,000 to $2,000 class.

Surely the thing to do, if we want to improve the standard of living of all our people, and at the same time ward off a depression, would be to allow higher exemptions—say $1,000 for single persons, $2,000 for persons with dependents—and leave the tax on all incomes over $3,000 as it was.

In concluding his budget speech, the minister referred to the cooperation of effort achieved during the war, and said we could achieve the same results in peace if we would but select our objectives and cooperate to reach them with the same spirit and energy that made our war effort possible. I agree with the minister entirely. I wish we could select our peacetime objectives and cooperate to attain them as we did during the war. But I am positive that we cannot do so, as long as there is the great difference in the reward of effort that I have just shown. Neither can we get the cooperation of all our people as long as the motive underlying production is personal gain.

I am glad that in what I am now to say I can commend the minister. We wish to commend him for the decision to make agreements with those provinces which are ready to enter into an agreement with the dominion. It is in our opinion the correct thing to do, and I am sure it will receive the approval of the great majority of the Canadian people.

When speaking in the house on June 27 at the close of the minister's speech, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, who finished his speech to-day, accused the government of using the big stick on the provinces. Without wishing to get into the controversy between the two hon. gentlemen in this matter, and without wishing to absolve the federal government from all blame for the failure of the dominion-provincial conference, I just want to say that the big stick was first used by little fellows, at least by fellows who are little as compared with the dominion government. I refer to Premiers Drew and Duplessis who, by their refusal to cooperate with the other provinces and with the dominion, showed a complete disregard for Canadian unity and for the welfare of the Canadian people.

We regret, however, that the minister did not see his way clear to include contributions for a social security programme in his proposed agreement with those provinces wishing to enter into such an agreement. The backward provinces will hold back in the matter of social security as they did in the matter of old age pensions, but there is no reason why the people in the more progressive provinces should be penalized because of the backwardness of others.

In regard to another important matter in the budget, the taxation of cooperatives, it is not my intention to do more than merely refer to it. Further criticism or commendation, as the case may be, I shall leave to other members of our group who know more of cooperatives and their usefulness than I because of active participation in them. While the proposed legislation is not all bad, some of it is bad. The minister seems to have taken the position that there are no non-profit cooperatives. That is not the case. Cooperatives built on the Rochdale principle are truly non-profit making and, moreover, they are the most democratic form of economic organization yet devised. It would be unfortunate if anything that the Canadian parliament did at this time had the effect of retarding their growth or limiting their usefulness.

I want to conclude as I began with a personal reference to the work of the Minister of Finance. In the difficult years which we have come through he has given service to the people of Canada of a character and in a measure which, in my opinion, deserves the approbation of all Canadians. He has given us of his energy and ability without stint. As one who recognizes his ability and believes in his integrity I would urge him to continue his work for the Canadian people in the only way it can be useful to them and satisfying to him, that is, by looking forward to the new world which is in the making and not backward to the old world which, if not dead, is dying.

In that direction alone lies salvation, not only for Canada but for the world. The cooperation which my right hon. friend referred to in the closing words of his budget speech, and which I agree is not only desirable but imperative if we are to meet effectively the challenge of our time, is not attainable in a society based on competition. Such harmony of effort can be found only in a society based on cooperation and equality of opportunity.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should not like the hon. member to have the impression that if I let him speak for more than forty minutes it was because he was entitled to do so. I did that because I understood there was no objection from the house.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thought I detected in the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) some anxiety lest those of us in the house who advocate monetary reform have lost sight of things and had emphasized only the need for more money. To reassure my hon. friend, let me say that as he learns more about social credit principles he will see that for more than twenty years we have emphasized consistently this fact: money without goods is useless. We have also emphasized its necessary accompaniment: goods without money is stupid. I noted that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred to the budget as a monumental document. I thought I detected in his tone of voice a conviction that he thought it marked the place where the Liberal party had committed suicide. If that is a correct implication, then I share it definitely.

I must say that the actual building of a budget is a gigantic task. Now that it is finished and now that tributes have been paid to the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), well deserved I am sure, I suggest that the minister should take a year off. It looks to me as though this is the year for his sabbatical leave. During that leave he should subject himself to some refresher courses. It is always recognized that the hard-working professor in the university cannot possibly keep pace with the things that are going on around him, immersed as he is in his studies and experiments and research. He often finds himself in need of a new objective approach to the field in which he is working. In my judgment, the Minister of Finance likewise is much in need of a new objective view of things in Canada. If he should by the merest possible chance take my advice and set out for refresher courses I suggest that he visit the country of Belgium and see what they are doing there to distribute goods.

As the minister possibly knows, for many years Belgium has been the stronghold in Europe of orthodox finance. I am advised on good authority from overseas that within six months of its liberation Belgium had made an astonishing economic recovery. In the light of world conditions she could not be said to be in the doldrums; she was relatively prosperous. The recovery was due in the main to a new financial policy, more particularly to the introduction of debt-free consumer credits. Instead of financing the production of goods for export and instead of having the goods the people need sent to other countries on an "export or die" policy which is so much in vogue throughout the world, the Belgian government is ensuring that the home market is so financed that the people might enjoy the benefits of their own productive capacity.

In order to raise the total purchasing power of the people to equal the total prices of the consumable goods produced and imported, the Belgian government has declared a national dividend to all people who, by their work, directly or indirectly, are contributing to the national wealth. Extra amounts are given for each dependent who is not employed, and also to pensioners. The principle behind the scheme is one of simple justice, which I hold should be recognized by the government of Canada—that wages and ordinary incomes are barely sufficient to enable the people to meet the everyday expenses of living. They are not in the position to replenish their wardrobes, to buy furniture and the household equipment, and new homes which have been destroyed during the war.

The budget was a great disappointment to millions of Canadians. People who, during the long years of the war, worked so willingly and well and who made such great sacrifices as did the Canadians, expected much more consideration from the government now that the shooting part of the war is over.

I must admit that the budget did provide some relief for taxpayers. I want to congratulate the minister upon providing that farmers and fishermen may average their income for a period of three years for income tax purposes. This, in my judgment, will be hailed with considerable satisfaction by the basic producers of our country in these particular fields.

Corporations also are to benefit considerably under the new schedules. This, too, is to be commended, particularly if it results in an all-out effort by productive corporations to speed the production of consumer goods to meet the demands of the Canadian people.

We must also compliment the minister on his expressed determination to revise and simplify the whole income tax act. Undoubtedly such a move will cut materially the cost of tax compliance.

The general opinion of people across Canada seems to be that the increase in exemptions announced by the minister in his budget speech for individual taxpayers is much less than the great majority of Canadians thought they had reason to expect this year. We had all held out the hope that the government would relieve the Canadian people in a substantial measure from the terrific burden of taxation they have been carrying since the early months of the war. Our hopes received a rude jolt, however, when the minister brought in his budget. The people of Canada also received a rude jolt when they found they could expect no relief at all this year; that the benefits announced would not begin until January 1, 1947. One hears bitter criticism on every hand. People say: "The increased taxes and enhanced prices have dwindled our real incomes to half or less of what they were before the war. We expected the government to announce enough reduction in our burden to arouse enthusiasm amongst us for hard work to produce the great volume of goods and services needed to prevent inflation in Canada and to help to prevent suffering in war-ravaged countries of the world. We are having a terrible time to keep up with the high cost of living, and after all the effort and sacrifices we made to ensure victory in the war, we thought the government would recognize our contribution by lightening our burden."

The minister says that it is still necessary to raise very large amounts of revenue. If one may judge by the commitments the government has made, that may possibly be true. If the minister is absolutely convinced that he needs the revenue now to meet the commitments of the government and to prevent inflation, then I make the suggestion that he should have met the demands of the people for exemptions on incomes of married people up to $2,000 and of single persons up to $1,200 by the issuance of tax bonds representing the amount of the tax in excess of the exemptions announced by the minister and up to the exemptions demanded by the people. I would suggest that these tax bonds could very well have been made redeemable a year hence, when the floodgates of production are once more wide open, and the supply of consumer goods is adequate to prevent inflation. It would be only fair and just to do something of this kind for people in the lower income groups. Hundreds of thousands of them have not been able to replenish their clothing supply or their household furnishings during the war. High taxes and high prices have prevented it. Hundreds of thousands of them knew nothing but poverty for years before the war started, in the years just prior to the war, and from present indications these same unfortunate people will be unable to replenish their deferred needs for many years to come, if at all. Therefore I feel that the minister should have given them a chance to enjoy at least a little of the prosperity that other groups have known at various times in past years, by raising the effective exemption to the figures which I have already mentioned; and they should have been made to apply from July 1, 1946, not as from January 1, 1947. I am certain that had he followed the principle of tax bonds to make up the difference in the two exemptions, and had the exemptions applied as from now, there would have been many thousands more satisfied people in our country, and it would not have hurt the government one particle. I would suggest—and with emphasis—that it is not yet too late to make the concession, and perhaps to retrieve in some measure the good will of many Canadians.

I am not convinced that the departments of the government have made anything like an effective transition from wartime to peacetime spending. It is my judgment that considerable savings are yet possible, savings that could result in a lowering of the tax load on the people. Time will permit me to mention but one specific case among possibly hundreds of foolish or needless expenditures by various departments. One could name such things as needlessly overloaded staffs in some branches, notably defence and others. The case I wish to mention particularly is publicity. There is ample evidence to show pure unadulterated waste of the taxpayer's money, running into very large amounts, on foolish publicity.

[Mr. Low.]

Let me give just one example. Recently the Department of Trade and Commerce sponsored a series of advertisements in newspapers and magazines on the theme, "one-third of your dollar", which attempted to show the proportion of the national income conservatively estimated as earned, directly or indirectly, by export trade. The series is to cost about $22,000. That is almost a complete waste of money, and is almost as stupidly foolish as spending money to crash mosquito planes and to bring Hollywood movie stars to Canada to sell bonds to a people already having a full sense of their responsibilities.

The Department of Trade and Commerce could have better spent their money in an effort to awaken interest amongst Canadian manufacturers and business men in expanding imports. J. B. Carswell, former president of War Assets Corporation, and now a business consultant in Washington told a Canadian Manufacturers Association meeting about a month ago that the theory of exports exceeding imports, creating a favourable trade balance was outdated; under present circumstances, he said, it is a most unfavourable theory. He emphasized the need of a sharply awakened interest in the necessity of balancing exports with imports. I suggest that not only is the expenditure of $22,000 for the series of "one-third of your dollar" advertisements a wasteful thing, but it also attempts to indoctrinate Canadian people with at best a half-truth. Close examination of other publicity expenditures of the government would doubtless yield a good many other extravagances of a wasteful nature.

The whole tone of the budget speech seemed to imply that the minister is not at all hopeful that a high level of taxes is avoidable for years to come. With this I can thoroughly agree unless something jars the government loose from the money monopoly system they have persisted in following in public finance. Debt, high taxes, poverty, money control in scarcity, are all parts of the money monopoly racket. They are all parts of what appears to be a widely organized conspiracy to grind down to abject subservience the individuals who make up the ordinary people of any country.

The military war is over, but huge debts and high taxes remain with us as reminders of man's stupidity. It is becoming clear that our mounting national debt can never be paid by taxes alone. Therefore, if the people are ever to become free, some new financial technique will have to be applied. The starting point of that new technique should be an abrupt end to the pyramiding of debt, for debt is the main reason for high taxation.

One could enumerate many evils of high taxation, amongst which would be such things as discouraging production, elimination of private enterprise, economic slavery, impoverishment of the people and a good many others. I have not time to deal with those here. But I want to emphasize one other evil which is rarely considered. I refer to the softening of the moral fibre of the people as the growing power of taxation transforms a social government into an anti-social state. Here, step by step, is my idea of the process of deterioration which takes place:

First, as more of the individual's production is taken by the state, the less he has for his own enjoyment, and the greater effort he must make to maintain himself or to better his circumstances.

Second, as ever-increasing portions of the production of his own efforts are taken from him in taxes, the more the dignity of the individual disintegrates under the hammering of want and the fear of it. On the other hand, the power of the state grows greater in proportion to the wealth it absorbs through taxation.

Third, as economic power is thus transferred from the individuals to the state, the individual very often is pressed by circumstances into bargaining for some of what was properly his by right of production. In the bargaining process he is often forced to surrender what have been considered his inalienable rights for a hand-out from the state. The hand-out may be relief, unemployment insurance, a place on the public payrolls, or a subsidy of some kind. But whatever it may be, the uneven bargaining demonstrates that the non-productive state has gathered economic strength and political power through taxation authority, while the productive individual has become a supplicant with cap in hand. Moral disintegration has followed inevitably upon the heels of high taxation. We saw the ultimate of this disintegration of the individuals in Germany, Russia, Italy, and Japan where the power to tax made a shambles of all property rights. For further evidence we might look into the history of the fall of the Roman empire. I repeat, the power to tax is the power to destroy human dignity. Unless that power is used wisely and with restraint, it will destroy the moral fibre of a people. We are witnessing that very result in a measure to-day. Never before has the government of Canada been so nearly the all-powerful state. Never before has so large a portion of the wealth produced by individual Canadians been confiscated by the state. And what seems to me to be more ominous still, is the growing public acceptance of the doctrine that high state taxation is an instrument for social good. For this we can thank that brood of theorists hatched out of the Marxist cesspool. The work of the missionaries of state paganism has been pretty thoroughly done; we now witness that it fills a righteous purpose to be robbed.

Continued high taxation is not necessary. The people of Canada must organize themselves for a determined and sustained effort to force a lowering of the burden. A united effort to this end will bring the minister and the government face to face with the necessity of a new approach to public financing, a new technique that will eliminate the debt-creating feature of the present system we have been following. It is largely because our system breeds debt that high taxation is resorted to. On the other hand, continued apathy on the part of the people will result in continued high taxation, with an ever-increasing proportion of the national income flowing in to strengthen the economic and political power of the state and an ever-growing tendency to Marxian paganism.

An examination of the budget papers will show that in 1945-46 the government confiscated by way of taxes 20·68 per cent of the estimated gross national product of the people. In 1939 only 9·8 per cent of the national income was taken for taxes. Past experience has indicated that Canadians can never again expect to reduce their burden of taxation to the 1939 level unless we get rid of the monopoly of credit which has usurped the powers of government. Last year taxes made up about seven-ninths of the total revenues the government received. All this taxation was paid in increased prices of goods and services; this is one of the main factors that make up the disparity between purchasing power and prices, and contributes to a periodical break-down of distribution machinery. Depressions in future will be inevitable if we persist in a public financial policy which levies for huge sums of confiscated money to pay interest on counterfeit money in the shape of bank credit.

I turn now to a consideration of the main reason for high taxation—the national debt. The budget disclosed that Canada's funded debt has reached the staggering total of $16,807,000,000 as at March 31, 1946. A study covering the period 1918-1939—the inter-war or peace period—reveals that the total debts of all the governments in Canada increased each year by an amount approximately equal to the interest on the debts for the year. Thus is cannot be said that Canada in reality ever paid the debt interest even in times of peace; and much less in times of war.

The largest single item in the present budget is that one covering the interest and servicing of the public debt—$481,207,000 in round figures. This huge sum is nearly equal to the total of all ordinary governmental expenditures for the year 1938—$525 million including debt servicing—and is the main reason for the heavy tax load. Until we enter upon a policy of continuous debt and interest reduction, taxes will never find a permanently lower level. The government should make an immediate start on such a programme by asking the chartered banks to hand over to the Bank of Canada all government securities purchased by the banks with created credit or by credit expansion. This should be followed as soon as possible by the removal of the flaws in our money system. Tax reduction could follow immediately thereafter, because the interest loan would largely and progressively disappear.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LOW: When the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the question of taxation, and I suggested with emphasis that the government should introduce a policy of tax reduction, but before they could do so they would have to tackle the debt problem realistically, because the largest single item in the budget was for debt interest. I should like to say that I am quite aware of Mr. Towers' argument that interest should be regarded as a transfer between various groups within the country rather than as a burden on the people as a whole. Whether there is anything sound in that argument or not will depend on just where the $16,800 million of bonds and securities representing Canada's funded debt really are. Who holds these securities? I venture the opinion that people generally would be very much surprised to find out just who does own the vast bulk of these securities.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), in commenting on the third of four powerful influences offsetting the decline in government war spending at the present time, said in his budget address, as reported at page 2903 of Hansard:

> At present a great many consumers have on hand large reserves of savings which they accumulated during the war, and some of which they wish to spend when the goods they want become available.

I know that a good many Canadian business men are anticipating a fairly long period of prosperous turnover once consumer goods again become plentiful. It appears that the government is quite optimistic over the anticipated fairly long-term increase of consumer spending which is expected to offset government spending in keeping up the volume of production and in giving work to people in Canada. The big question is, is this optimism justified? The answer here again also depends largely upon the distribution of ownership of the large reserves of savings deposits in the Canadian chartered banks.

I noted with a great deal of interest the results of a recent experimental study prepared for the federal reserve board in the United States by the national interview survey division of the department of agriculture, and published in the June issue of the federal reserve bulletin. The survey revealed the following facts:

1. At the end of 1945, personal holdings of liquid assets in the United States, composed of currency, bank deposits, and government securities amounted to $130 billion. This was an increase of $90 billion since 1939.

2. The top ten per cent of the American people held sixty per cent of the $130 billion.

3. The bottom fifty per cent of the American people hold only three per cent of the liquid assets, or less than $4 billion.

These facts appear to be of great concern to United States businessmen who must measure immediate future prospects for selling consumer goods. The survey indicates that while there is a vast potential reservoir of spending power in our neighbouring country, the actual spending power is tremendously concentrated; and further, that the ability to continue to buy goods at current inflated prices is a luxury which hundreds of thousands of United States families just do not possess, even after five years of war boom.

It is coming to be widely accepted that depressions occur largely as a result of the failure of masses of workers and others throughout the country to get incomes to enable them to consume the goods which they produce. I would point out, too, that if mass production methods are to serve the people in this age they must be matched by mass consumption. We must have a nation of consumers, of good customers. Have we them in Canada? I believe that the government should at once, if they have not already done so, undertake a similar survey in Canada to determine accurately just how the liquid assets of this country are distributed, and this survey should be made available to the people. Industry needs to know just how far it can count upon pent-up war savings to supply it with markets for its goods; and the government needs to know what measures will have to be taken to prevent the onslaughts of another period of depression.

While the survey is being made, the government should secure accurate information about the distribution of holdings of government securities. The results will be surprising, I will guarantee that, and the facts adduced from the survey will doubtless show that the payment of the huge interest on our national debt is largely a transfer of payments from the majority group in the bottom eighty-five per cent of Canadians to a much smaller group in the top ten or fifteen per cent. In other words, I feel sure that our bond debt financing methods have not only resulted in a tax load of almost unbearable proportions, but also created a small but powerful creditor class in Canada. Both of these results are to be regretted. But if the people of Canada are ever to have the situation corrected they must forget allegiance to political parties for a time and unite in one great concerted demand that taxes be sharply and progressively lowered, beginning at once, and that ways and means be worked out immediately to establish every Canadian in his own rights as a good customer for the things which Canada can produce.

I turn now to the government's modified tax transfer proposals to the provinces. To me it is most regrettable that the dominion-provincial conference should not have been called again to consider the modified proposals before they were announced to the world in the budget address. The ethical position of the senior government would have been improved vastly had an attempt been made to reach agreement of the modified proposals before the budget was brought down. Since the government did not do this, it cannot escape the charge that it has resorted to force, whether that charge is well founded or not. The minister was careful to point out that "acceptance of the proposals is wholly optional", but a careful examination of the alternatives to acceptance leads me to believe that few provinces can find it possible to refuse the minister's offer.

A cursory appraisal of the value to the provinces of the minister's proposals, and the figures which he gave showing the benefits to be gained by the acceptance of the proposal would lead one to believe that the provinces should be quick to accept. Indeed that is what the government would like. But it must be remembered that conditions have changed materially since the wartime tax transfer agreements were made, and therefore the government's figure showing advantages to the provinces of acceptance of the new offer is out of date. Since the ultimate comparative value—say five years from now—to any province is not immediately ascertainable, the provinces will probably do considerable research and balancing of values before indicating their acceptance or rejection of the offer.

I am in agreement with the minister that the budget problems which will shortly face the nine provinces must be solved, and that too, if we are to build a strong and united Canada. A system of adequate, automatic payments, objectively determined, made in return for the rental of an asset is, in my judgment, superior to a system of hand-outs negotiated bilaterally. In recent years we have seen something of the evils, the weaknesses and the abuses of the latter practice. It seems to me much more sensible to adopt the automatic payment principle contained in the minister's proposal to the provinces, but I submit that we should make positively certain of three things: first, that the objective formula for determining the size of the payment to the provinces makes adequate allowance for proper increases in subsidy as time and developments bring greater needs; second, that payments to the provinces include, over and above the $15 per capita set out in the modified proposal, a sum sufficient to allow the provinces themselves to extend to their citizens the same or greater old age pension benefits as were envisioned in the original offer to the provinces. Just as many taxes are involved in the new deal as in the original, hence this will certainly be possible; third, that every effort be made to reach agreement with the provinces as the result of consultation with them. It does not tend toward unity in Canada to have the provinces feel that something is being surreptitiously imposed upon them. In fairness to the minister, I must say that whoever may have been responsible for the failure of the conference—and certainly I am not trying to assess that responsibility myself—in building this budget he faced a situation that did call for unusual action.

A good many more things in the budget are of such importance that I should like to state my views on them, but the forty-minute rule does not permit me to do so and I am not going to ask for an extension of time. Therefore my colleagues of this group will deal adequately with these things so that there may be no doubt whatever as to just where we stand with regard to every important matter covered by the minister in his address and in the budget papers.

But allow me to say two things by way of concluding this effort. I sincerely recommend to the government that legislation be enacted at this session to prevent retroactive taxation of cooperative patronage dividends. I stand for absolute fairness in distributing the load of taxes that are necessary, but I feel that to make the recommendations of the McDougall commission retroactive in any respect would be a tremendous injustice. My colleagues will deal with this matter at greater length as we go along.

The second and last thing is this. People who have been in the habit of laughing at what they so frequently called the social credit "funny money" system, are now having the tables turned. Every time a social crediter listens to a tale of economic woe, hears predictions as to the oncoming depression, has someone complain to him about taxation or debt, or is asked to donate to the old man's home; or if he hears the prevailing reports of starving millions in other parts of the world and at the same time thinks of the wheat the farmers in recent years were paid not to produce, invariably the retort is, "So that is how your funny money system works, is it?" Social crediters face the future confident that when the people awaken to the true facts they will apply social credit principles to the economy of Canada and help bring abundant happiness, freedom and peace to all men.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow the reasoning of the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low).

Mr. BLACKMORE: A good thing; you do not because you could not do it.

Mr. ISNOR: Nor do I, as a rule, interrupt as they so often do. I feel, however, that I should like to compliment the leader of that group on the definite manner in which he stated his position with regard to the dominion-provincial proposals. I think I can go farther and say I feel that I am in accord with the thoughts he expressed. I was sorry and a little disappointed that he did not enlarge on his views with regard to the report of the McDougall commission. That is a question with which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) dealt in a sincere manner and placed before the people without any thought of favouritism to any particular group. I trust, as the leader of the Social Credit group said, other members of that party will, later on, more definitely express their views in respect to this proposal.

I do not intend, either, to follow the reasoning of the acting leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), in his presentation this afternoon. His group differ definitely with this party in regard to public ownership and private enterprise. While they stand for public ownership in the broadest possible terms, in a socialistic manner, I stand for free enterprise because I believe that if we are to produce and continue the prosperity Canada is enjoying at present, it must be through the enterprise and initiative of the individual.

I am more concerned with what was said by the financial critic of the opposition than with the remarks of any other speaker who might take part in this debate; and I imagine that is also the case with the people of Canada. Since the evening of Thursday, June 27, when the Minister of Finance presented his budget, the people have been looking forward to what would be said by the official opposition. Naturally they expected criticism, but I believe they also thought they would be offered some solution for our difficulties, some recommendations of a constructive nature, which might make the picture brighter than it appears to them at the moment. I was disappointed, and I believe that was the feeling throughout the house this afternoon. In fact, as I watched hon. members opposite. I thought I could discern signs of keen disappointment on their part in the remarks of the financial critic, and I believe the same feeling existed in the galleries of this chamber. I make that statement in all sincerity; and I believe that if hon. members of the opposition were to give an honest opinion they would say that was right.

What did the financial critic say? He dealt with the lack of any benefit to the taxpayers of Canada, and then in his opening remarks went on to make the astounding statement that no one would profit from any deductions until they made up their income tax returns for 1948. Surely he could not have thought of what he was saying when he made that statement. I have every respect for the high position this hon. gentleman holds in financial circles in this country, but perhaps because of the high position he occupies he has lost touch with the common people, the man on the street, the ordinary wage-earner.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Don't ever fool yourself.

Mr. ISNOR: I am expressing that as a possibility, from the expressions and observations of the financial critic of the hon. gentleman's party. Hon. members will recall what he said this afternoon, that no one would benefit during 1947. I say to the house that a very large number of taxpayers at present paying income tax will, immediately, in 1947, be struck off the so-called taxpayer's list. That number runs 550,000 to 600,000.

As I said a minute ago, this will greatly help the low-bracket employee, wage-earner and worker. I am in close touch with the small businessman—not those who move in high financial circles. I know, coming in touch with these smaller businessmen that they appreciate what the government has done in the matter of giving them exemption, and I pass that information on to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). When one considers half a million taxpayers I do not think he can pass over that number lightly.

Then, I would refer to the hon. member's statement that no one would profit by these reductions. I would point out again that an additional number of wage-earners who are paid by the week, who receive their weekly pay envelopes, will, immediately in 1947, enjoy benefits because of the smaller deductions from their pay envelopes.

So I say to the hon. member that, while he may have looked at it from a high plane indeed, he did not view it from the point of view of the average man on the street, the average wage-earner, who does appreciate and understand what this budget means to him.

The hon. member referred to a balanced budget, and I shall have something to say about that later on. Then, he mentioned economies, and said that no steps toward economy were being undertaken.

Mr. JACKMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ISNOR: I hear the former financial critic say "hear, hear."

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario then dealt with the civil service, saying that whereas before the war there were only 70,000 civil servants, there are 150,000 to-day. He forgot to mention the expanded service rendered by the various departments of government. Surly the hon. member knows that service cannot be given without having sufficient staff. In fact, there has been criticism from time to time that the income tax branch is not sufficiently staffed to give the necessary service. If we are to give that service, then we must have the employees. I do not know if the hon. member was advocating doing away with a large number of civil servants, and thus adding to the unemployment situation.

He referred to the security of private enterprise, and with his comments in this respect I am in accord. I said a minute ago that if we are to have increased production it will have to come largely through that source.

There was one interesting fact the hon. member did not touch upon, and his failure to do so surprised me somewhat. I thought he would dwell at some length upon it, because he had expressed himself clearly on more than one occasion in the house that he, and those he represents, were in favour of immediately doing away with all controls.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He never did any such thing at any time.

Mr. STIRLING: Never, never. That is a Liberal explanation.

Mr. ISNOR: That is strange, coming as it does from the west. We see the west coming to the defence of Toronto. But I do say the hon. member showed that he defended that principle, and not on one but on several occasions.

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is a matter of being truthful about the matter. The hon. member has misinterpreted the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario three times.

Mr. ISNOR: We shall permit the record to speak for itself.

Mr. STIRLING: That is better.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you; I agree with that. Since the evening the budget was presented I have read newspaper comments from one end of Canada to the other—Liberal newspapers, Conservative journals, and those expressing independent views. I have listened to comments from men on the street and in streetcars. I have talked to men in hotels, and listened to them in the corridors in the House of Commons. Like the majority of members of the house I have received scores of telegrams, letters and postcards, some of which speak favourably and others unfavourably.

I have received criticism from businessmen who complain about the reaction from a business point of view and state that business has not received as great a reduction as was expected. I am frank when I make that statement, and say that I have received such complaints. I have received from others communications indicating that they expected higher exemptions for both single and married persons. I have received communications from those who favoured the action taken by the Minister of Finance in reference to cooperatives, and from those who were opposed to any change in respect of cooperative methods.

Yes, I know that members receive all kinds of advice and criticism. I am pleased to say that many useful suggestions are received. Roughly speaking, there came to my hand 600 cards and letters recommending that the government apply income taxation on exactly the same basis on all forms of commercial enterprise including cooperatives, crown companies, municipal and government undertakings and mutual concerns Many others also recommended that patronage dividends and like payments be disallowed as expenses before arriving at taxable income. Still others—a few hundred—urged that the government apply the same principles of income taxation on all forms of retail business, including cooperatives and others.

I have no fault to find with those who signed the cards and sent them to their members. It is their privilege to show that they are interested, and it is through such communications that we learn and keep in touch with the views held by our constituents.

Having said that, may I come directly to the budget, as I see it. As I said, I listened to the Minister of Finance unfold thought after thought and reemphasize that, although hostilities were over and this was essentially a peacetime budget, providing for the financial needs of the first post-war year, which is wholly a year of peace, it also contained certain remaining costs of demobilization, heavy costs for gratuities and other benefits for our veterans—costs which will not recur on a similar scale in subsequent years.

May I ask the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario whether he is one who would advocate taking those amounts out of the budget, thus lessening the expenditures to be undertaken by the government.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He is not here, but the answer is definitely, no.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member answers for him. I could not avoid being impressed by the honest, frank and sincere manner in which the Minister of Finance approached his task. I was proud he was a maritimer; I was equally proud that I, too, am a maritimer. I have been reminded of two other outstanding maritimers who filled this honoured post of Minister of Finance, and who filled it with honour and with distinction. I recall such men as the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, who stood so high in the hearts of the people of Canada and who in 1897 presented a budget of $38 million. I was reminded, too, of the late Hon. E. N. Rhodes, also highly respected and honoured, not only in his native province but throughout the length and breadth of Canada and who, in 1932, estimated his budget revenue at $311,735,000. Then, as I sat and listened I made a mental picture of the outstanding contributions made by the Minister of Finance during the war period. I thought of the wonderful effect and achievement of his wartime measures and controls, and the splendid cooperation given to this man by the people of Canada. By that cooperation we in Canada won and maintained the respect and admiration of all other countries.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Surely we as Canadians may justly take pride in the carrying out of our financing and economic policies during the war. If possible, as it would appear to be, we should be ready to bear with a portion of those controls and taxes for a while longer until we are safely on the road to a proper readjustment period.

The federal government fiscal year, as hon. members all know, ends on March 31. While I do not intend to quote figures to any extent, I feel I must mention a few. The total estimated revenue, as shown by the Minister of Finance when he tabled the budget, is around $2,955 million, exclusive of refundable taxes.

The total estimated expenditures are about $4,691 million. There is thus left an over-all deficit for the year of $1,736 million. I mention this deficit of $1,736 million because it is interesting to note that this is $822 million lower than the deficit of the previous year. That is another step in the direction of a balanced economy.

The Minister of Finance then went on to deal with our economic life and stated that to-day we in Canada are more prosperous and farther along the road to reemployment and reconversion than he expected we would be when he presented his budget last autumn. Despite many shortages and interruptions, Canada's economy as a whole has turned with remarkable speed from war services and war to peacetime jobs and objectives. We are enjoying a level of employment and prosperity that we have never experienced before in peace time.

When the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario came to that portion of the Minister of Finance's remarks he paused and observed, as I recall his remarks, that this was because we were still continuing on a wartime basis of employment. I want to take exception to that remark, and I do so along the following line. When the war ended in Europe a little more than a year ago there were three-quarters of a million men and women in our armed forces. To-day there are only about 100,000. In a little more than a year we have released about 650,000 members of the armed forces to enter into civilian production. A large majority of those people have found employment or are taking university or vocational training or have gone into business for themselves assisted by their wartime savings and the benefits provided by the government. During the same period, but even more suddenly, our workers in war industries have been released upon the labour market. The number of these people is approximately the same as the number of service people who have been demobilized. That is to say, we have 1,300,000 persons who have been suddenly taken from one type of employment or service and placed in another to produce civilian requirements.

Canada's present prosperity and employment are, on the whole, well distributed throughout the country. In 1938, one year prior to the war, our national product, which is our current production of goods and services, amounted to $5·1 billion; but to-day, one year after the war, it is estimated at over $11 billion. It is only fair to say that that figure may drop as the result of interruptions to production. The reason for this continued high level of production, employment and income is that the demands of war have been replaced by other demands which are supported by effective purchasing power.

There are three main factors which determine our prosperity and the degree of employment we shall have in peace time. The first is our income from exports. The question of exports was touched on this afternoon by the hon. member and he also placed it as the first factor in the reconversion and prosperity of our country. I put it in the same position. If we are able to produce and export we shall have a prosperous country with the highest type of living standard. The second factor is the private enterprise expenditures which include both skilled and unskilled labour. The third factor is the spending power, or what might be termed the consumers' expenditures. To me production should be our primary objective, both for its own value to our country and to satisfy the need of goods in other countries and as a safeguard against the dangers of inflation.

As a businessman I have done everything possible to hold prices down and to get volume up. The time has arrived when there is no need to restrict production in order to conserve resources for war. Civilian production must be given the green light so that we may aim at high-volume production for civilian purposes despite shortages, strikes, delays and uncertainties and by these measures overcome the danger of inflation and high prices.

Now, a few more figures from this budget. First, the revenue figure of $2,510 million forecast shows that there will be a decline, or saving, of $446 million in the 1946-47 estimate as compared with the 1945-46 figure. On the other side, expenditures show an expected outlay of $2,769 million, or a deficit of $259 million compared with $822 million for last year, or, in other words, a reduction or saving this year of $563 million.

Before leaving these figures I believe I should point out a few facts which have been overlooked by a great many. Personal income taxes will be reduced by $52 million. This item includes the great majority of our citizen taxpayers. Excess profit taxes will be reduced $154 million. This will make additional money available for expansion and production, I hope resulting in increasing employment.

I am coming now to the morning after the night before. The morning newspaper published on the day following the bringing down of the budget, which hon. members will recall was brought down on Thursday, June 27, published heavy type and bold headlines which went something like this: "Disappointed".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ISNOR: I hear "hear, hear." "Low income group fail to get expected relief," and "Tax reductions prove disappointing" and "Ilsley's first peacetime budget gets chill reaction". I am putting these headlines before the house to show how non-partisan I am, how honest I am. I feel it necessary to point out a few definite facts with regard to the benefits and savings which do mean something to the Canadian low-income group of taxpayers. The income tax changes effective January 1 next will mean that between 550,000 and 600,000 persons at present paying income tax will be removed entirely from the list of taxpayers. Let hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear" to that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): When will they be removed?

Mr. ISNOR: Surely this means something to those in the low-income brackets. It removes at one stroke twenty-five per cent of the present taxpayers.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You mean it will?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If they live long enough.

Mr. ISNOR: Second, it means that single persons now enjoying an exemption of $660 will be given an added exemption of $90. The married person, whose present exemption is $1,200, will have an added exemption of $300.

Mr. HARKNESS: That will be a great satisfaction in the spring of 1948.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That will be long before the Tories get into power again.

Mr. ISNOR: May I give a few illustrations to show the savings that will be effected:

Single Person

Income	1946 Tax	1947 Tax	Saving
$1,000	$77	$55	$22
2,000	370	313	57
3,000	692	593	99
4,000	1,070	896	174
5,000	1,452	1,206	246

Married Person (No Children)
$1,000	No Tax
2,000	$194	$118	$76
3,000	491	383	108
4,000	810	663	147
5,000	1,158	973	185

Yet in spite of those reductions hon. members on the other side of the house say that there is no saving in this budget.

Mr. HARKNESS: It is like one of those delayed action bombs.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You never know when it is going off.

Mr. ISNOR: It seems very difficult for members of the opposition to restrain themselves and keep quiet, but I notice that the members on this side show respect by keeping silent when an hon. member has the floor.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred this afternoon to a balanced budget. During my term of seven years, from 1928 to 1935, as a member of the Nova Scotia legislature, when I sat with the opposition and at another time with the government of the day, I was always keenly interested as a businessman in financial affairs and my interest naturally centred around the budget. I recall that it was my endeavour to emphasize the importance of a balanced budget and the necessity of keeping expenditures in line with revenue. When I was first elected as a member of this house for the constituency of Halifax I continued to follow this course. On the outbreak of the war and during the war our thoughts were more on finding money and using it to win the war and we gave little thought to balancing the budget. But now that the war is over and Canada is embarked on a post-war high employment and reconversion period, I believe it is necessary for all members of the house, particularly businessmen to see how quickly Canada can be brought into a position where she can report a balanced budget.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance, when presenting his budget, say that his 1946-47 budget proposals meant that he was covering nearly 90 per cent of the expenditures and that if we could maintain high employment and income we shall be able to look forward to something like a balanced budget in 1947-48. Like the Minister of Finance I am a great believer in the ability of Canadians to achieve great objectives. This was shown during the war when Canada's achievements won the admiration of all nations. In peace times, with human needs just as urgent, happiness and contentment so essential, and a high standard of living so necessary, cannot we look forward to continued cooperation and unity of purpose in achieving these objectives and devote our energies to reaching them and thus focus the eyes of the world on Canada not alone in war but in peace?

I am going to touch on the subject of controls, which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario passed over so lightly this afternoon. I believe the controls which were brought into effect in 1941 are reflected in this budget and have a direct bearing on the financial economy of our country. Modern war requires the full and effective mobilization of a nation's economic resources, and Canada was quick to realize that if this was to be had, steps must be taken not alone to equip and supply the fighting forces but to maintain the civilian population in such a manner as to get the fullest possible cooperation from all Canadian citizens.

Fortunately, so far as financial organization was concerned, though Canada's financial structure was already established and developed before the war, it was felt that with the increased spending power created during the war through accelerated employment and earning power, it was necessary that certain controls should be set up. When one looks back and realizes the benefit which is accruing from these controls I am sure that each and every member of the house will say that these were of direct benefit to our country, and no argument on their behalf seems necessary. Still there are those who to-day advocate doing away with the controls which have helped to make Canada the envy of perhaps every other nation of the world. Taking into consideration the vast amounts which would have been spent in Canada and the greatly increased earnings of Canadians, I think the government was most wise in bringing into being the wartime prices and trade board, "to provide safeguards against any undue enhancement in the prices of foods, fuels, and other necessaries of life and to ensure an adequate supply and equitable distribution of such commodities." Underlying the work of this board has been the belief that if ample supplies were kept available and were controlled, fair and reasonable prices could be maintained and our financial structure maintained on an even keel.

I do not propose to go into all the various control branches that were set up. We are familiar with the steps taken in the appointment of administrators in the major commodity fields. Some of these administrators have been severely criticized, while others have been praised for their work. I personally believe that, taken on the whole, they have performed a worth-while job.

I referred to this matter of control as early as 1942, complimenting the government, because I felt that it would serve the purpose intended, namely to keep prices down. I should like briefly to put on record my remarks at that time, as reported in Hansard of July 2, 1942, at page 3893:

I should like to refer briefly to the price ceiling brought into effect by the government, the wage-freezing order and the instalment buying regulations. These regulations for the ordinary storekeeper doing that kind of business were a godsend, and I believe they were a blessing in disguise also to great numbers of people who were subject to high-pressure salesmanship which had been spreading throughout the country. The credit regulations, whereby purchases made in one month had to be paid for the next month, were also beneficial both for the store and its customers. All these regulations have, I believe, made it possible for the businessman or storekeeper to carry on and meet his obligations under this budget.

I may have something to add in this connection when we are dealing with the resolutions in committee.

I have in mind to suggest two or three changes. One deals with the tax as affecting retailers; one, with the tax on soft drinks, and another, with the excise on jewellery. It is felt by jewellers throughout Canada—and I am not a jeweller—that this is a discriminatory and unfair tax. They have repeatedly made representations on this matter, and I understand they waited on the Minister of Finance and presented their brief. They feel that all retail businesses throughout Canada should be taxed on the same plan, and recommend the elimination of this particular tax. I feel, in fairness to retail jewellers throughout the country, that it is an unfair position in which they are placed. They are placed in the position of being the minister's tax collectors, and the door is opened, I feel, for practices which are not always what they should be. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he take this matter under consideration with a view of eliminating the tax.

I need not remind hon. members of the effect which price control has had upon our country. To-day, if I remember the figure correctly, it is at the highest point since the outbreak of the recent war, but from 1939 up to the present time it has increased to the extent of only 23·5 per cent. When we think of the increase which has taken place to the south of us, and realize the actions which United States authorities have had to take, we can have some realization of the benefit of this particular control.

I had hoped to touch on the dominion-provincial proposals as submitted by the Minister of Finance, on family allowances and their effect on income payments, and more particularly I hoped to have an opportunity of complimenting the minister on his action in spreading the income tax returns for farmers and fishermen over a three-year period.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to deal with one aspect of this budget, that is production, and to refer to one industry and one industry only. I am, therefore, anxious to bring to the attention of the house and of the minister the condition which exists in respect of the forest industry in British Columbia, and in particular those industries located in the coastal region of that province.

There are in British Columbia 2,446 active primary and secondary forestry industries. The primary wood-using industries include 1,600 logging operations, supplying raw material to over 600 primary manufacturing plants. These active primary manufacturing industries include saw, pulp and paper, plywood, shingle and barrel mills and box factories. The secondary industries include sash and door mills, furniture factories, boat building works, and many other miscellaneous wood industries.

The capital invested in these forest industries may be classified as follows: the logging industry, that is the industry which takes the logs out of the forest, $30,379,000; pulp and paper industry, $58,912,000; the lumber industry, that is the conversion of the logs into lumber, $49,939,000; and other wood-using industries, $14,880,000; making a total of $154,112,000. That is exclusive of the standing timber. The value of the standing timber is estimated at between two hundred and two hundred and fifty million dollars. Thus the forest industries have an over-all investment of over $400,000,000.

Direct employment in the forest industries represents a total of 100,000,000 man hours and an average of 37,000 persons over twelve months. Direct wages and salaries of the various industries total $58,677,000. These are figures which I have obtained from the Sloan report, and they were based on the year 1942, which he took as the basic year. Of course since that date wages have increased considerably.

Indirect employment, such as that derived from transportation by truck, rail and water, the distribution of products, the banking, the insurance and all the other services dependent upon the forest interests, greatly increase the total I have mentioned. The total value of the production of the forest industries was estimated in 1944 as $146,611,000. This represents forty per cent of the total income of British Columbia.

The foreign export of forest products totalled in value $73,105,000. This includes pulp and paper products, logs, poles, piling, pit props, railway ties, lumber and lumber products. These exports were shipped waterborne or by rail to points outside Canada. They do not include exports from British Columbia to other provinces. If such exports, that is to other provinces, were included, the total must be raised by another $27,000,000 in order to include the exports to the prairie provinces and to eastern Canada. That would bring the grand total of all the exports from the forest products to over $100 million. In this distribution of earnings from the conversion of timber assets during the war, direct revenues to the province in 1942—I take that basic year—totalled $4,268,000, but the dominion government also benefited greatly. On the basis of forty per cent of the total income of the province in forest income—that is generally accepted—this would indicate a dominion tax bill of $60 million contributed in the aggregrate by individuals and firms directly and indirectly connected with the forest industries.

Evidence presented before the provincial royal commission under the chairmanship of Chief Justice Sloan showed that over a period of five years the dominion government collected in income taxes and in excess profits tax $1.57 for every dollar of direct forest revenue collected by British Columbia. In other words, during the past five years the dominion has collected from the industry more than one and a half times as much as the province collected; but the dominion government has given very little in return. For the purpose of comparison I have looked up the appropriation by the dominion government for the support of forests, agriculture, mines and geology for the last peace-time fiscal year, 1939-40. The figures quoted will be found in the auditor general's report for that year, and comparable figures for later years will be found in the public accounts. For the year 1939-40 the dominion government appropriated for all forest purposes $360,529; but for agriculture, $28,633,000; for mines and geology, $7,284,000. Some discrepancy in the dominion support is evident in the succeeding years because the appropriations must have been distorted by the war atmosphere; therefore I feel the comparisons would hardly be fair. Just to mention one, the public accounts for the year 1943-44 give the appropriation for agriculture as $120,794,000, while the forest service appropriation however remained comparatively normal at $298,741. In the current estimates which the house is being asked to approve, over $19 million are allocated to agriculture, of which sum $6,500,000 may be earmarked for research purposes. In the Department of Fisheries some $3 million are to be spent chiefly on research, while for forestry and forestry industries only $625,000 are earmarked. I suggest that although the government drains off by far the greater part of the earnings produced from the forests, it has contributed next to nothing for the protection and maintenance of these forests which are the very source of its income.

The report of the royal commission appointed by the province of British Columbia in 1910 makes the following recommendation:

> Your commissioners regard the income from royalty on timber as differing essentially from any other form of revenue in the province. Such receipts should be regarded as capital and not as current revenue. We have no hesitation in recommending that the amount so received, large as it may appear, should be expended by the government for the protection, conservation and restoration of our timber resources. With our present knowledge regarding reforestation, to treat these receipts as other than capital would be utterly unsound in principle and might produce disastrous results in the ultimate impairment of the public estate.

It is regrettable that for thirty-five years this recommendation has been consistently ignored by succeeding governments, provincial and dominion. Millions and millions of dollars have been drained from our forests into the general revenue to help pay for government services wholly unconnected with the protection and development of our forest industries.

This revenue is not a true income, but is the result of the sale of capital resources which can be replaced only in part. If our forest administration were adequately financed to fulfil properly its function of protection, conservation, management and development of our forest resources, then any surplus forest revenues could be absorbed into the general revenue, but such is not the case, and our forest administration for years has not been adequately financed. The British Columbia loggers' association, the Canadian society of forestry engineers, the Wallace report and other reliable sources have repeatedly urged that a much greater proportion of revenues derived from the forest industries be returned to the forests for protection and their perpetuation.

At the present time under dominion government controls the industry is required to sell a high percentage of wood products, logs, lumber, shingles, and plywood in the Canadian market at ceiling prices actually below the present cost of production. A certain percentage, until recently approximately sixty per cent, could be exported. It is not generally realized that this export, for which a much higher price is obtained, compensates the low domestic market and has for many years been the means of keeping the forest industry solvent. But the world lumber market is certain to be a highly competitive export field in post-war days. Operating expenses to the industry are ever increasing. Recently, in order to meet the increased cost of living and the demands of organized labour, a twenty per cent increase in wages—that is to say a fifteen cents an hour wage increase—has been authorized, coupled with a reduction in the hours of work per week. Furthermore, a fifteen per cent increase in the amount of wood products to be made available for domestic consumption has also recently been authorized. While this undoubtedly will help relieve the shortages in building material which is so urgently needed to meet the acute housing situation that exists, yet it should be remembered that the ceiling prices set for lumber for domestic consumption are, as I have already said, below the cost of production, and the returns received for the lumber which has been exported have enabled the industry to operate so far without going into the hole. This change in the percentage of wood products for export and domestic purposes adds just another handicap to the successful operation of the industry. I suggest that some compensating relief should be afforded. In the new dominion-provincial proposals which were presented in this house when the budget was brought down, the fact that the logging, lumbering and mining industries were singled out for double taxation indicates that the present government is not fully conversant with the difficulties facing the primary industries of British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I say that is incorrect, they were not singled out for double taxation.

Mr. PEARKES: That is my interpretation of it; perhaps the minister will have an explanation later.

A few moments ago I said that operating costs were increasing throughout industry. This is partly the result of the high standard of living rightly demanded by those engaged in the industry. In recent years logging operations have become completely mechanized. You never see a team of horses in the British Columbia woods now. The donkey-engine, the high lead operations, the logging truck and the "cat" have completely replaced the team. To an ever-increasing degree the power-saw is replacing hand tools. Work in the woods is still hard, but it is not so physically exhausting as it used to be. No doubt many hon. members have seen pictures of the loggers who take the tops off these high trees, some of them perhaps two hundred feet in height. Employees in the logging industry to-day are skilled tradesmen, and every year a higher percentage of forestry mechanics and craftsmen are required in the industry. To meet these changing conditions, the companies have had to provide better living conditions. No longer are men satisfied to put up with what one might well say were the sordid conditions of the old-fashioned bunkhouses, where men slept in rows of double bunks, tier on tier. In most camps to-day the men have individual quarters, or cubicles for two men. Excellent meals are provided in the restaurants, and in the more modern camps they are served by qualified waitresses. These advantages necessitate additional outlay, but they are essential if the operators desire to retain the best class of employee.

On several occasions I have urged that assistance be given by the federal government to the construction of housing projects in areas adjacent to the mills and logging camps where employment is assured for many years to come, instead of proceeding with projects on the outskirts of cities. No real progress has been made, however, because under any of the existing schemes the operator is required to tie up too much of his available liquid capital. During the war it was the policy of the government to finance entirely the building of houses for workers engaged on jobs of national importance. In the present interregnum between war and a return to normal peace conditions, having also in mind the present acute shortage of houses for workers engaged in industries whose products are so urgently needed for reconstruction purposes, a more flexible system and a more generous lending policy should be devised to meet the present need for houses for these men employed in the forest industries; that is to say, for these men actually employed in the industry which produces the very materials required for home construction throughout the country.

The forests of British Columbia are not merely a local concern. During the war they proved to be of the utmost value to the national economy. They still are, and must continue to be such. I respectfully suggest that in formulating its taxation policies the dominion government has lost sight of this fact. In my view the dominion government should be prepared to facilitate the development and perpetuation of our forests by allowing the operator to charge annually current operations, with all reasonable costs incurred during the year, to the reforestation of logged-off lands under his control or management. As far as our forests are concerned, Canada has been living on capital. In other words, we have been mining the forests of British Columbia in exactly the same way that the forests of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were mined years ago; mining our forests in the same way the wheat fields of the prairies were mined thirty or forty years ago. Wood products are a crop reaped from lands that are not suitable for other agricultural purposes. In order to ensure a continuous yield, agricultural lands must be fertilized. In the same way our forest lands must be protected. If there is to be a sustained yield that protection must be in the form of dollars and cents expended to prevent unnecessary wastage of the young crop by fire, disease and insect pests, and also for purposes of reforestation. I do suggest in all seriousness that under the present policy the dominion government is killing by starvation the goose which lays this golden egg.

The important thing to the citizens of British Columbia is the perpetuation of the forest industries, for the whole provincial economy is based on these industries to such an extent that the population of the province could not be supported without them. The industries recognize the value of the forests from the point of view of water and soil conservation, fishing and hunting, and the tourist trade; but the greatest value to the public lies in the cropping of the forests and the conversion of wood into marketable products. Therefore the maintenance of the forest crop at maximum sustained capacity and the development of wood-using industries, hold the key to the future of British Columbia.

The operators have subscribed to a policy of joint action by the provincial government, the industries themselves and the public, of measures to assure continuous crops on all forest lands, and to attain this objective by practical measures which will maintain maximum production and employment during the period of transition to a sustained forest economy. The attainment of this objective means for the industry a further increase in present operating costs; for the crown, increased expenditures out of forest revenues, to build up the forest capital; and for the public, the enjoyment of somewhat less net revenue than previously derived from its forest capital. But this should not be regarded as a solely provincial matter. As I have already pointed out, the dominion government derives more money from the forest industries of British Columbia than does the provincial government. The whole national economy of this country would be affected by any serious dislocation of this industry. But this federal government is doing practically nothing to ensure that the production of wood products can be assured in the years to come. It is not unreasonable to say that heretofore the federal government has not assumed its fair share of its responsibilities in this respect.

The first and most important step in a programme such as has been suggested is to keep fire out of the woods. The great economic loss in connection with our forests in the past has been and still is the destruction of young growth by repeated fires. Unless this loss can be stopped, there is grave danger that proper regeneration will be found economically impossible. The final result will be that one day there will be no crop to harvest.

Much criticism has been given by uninformed persons and has been directed against the methods used in the logging operations of to-day. But the evidence of expert foresters indicates that the practice of clear-cutting is more conducive to proper regeneration than any of the methods which are usually referred to as those of selective logging. Danger from erosion has been shown to be practically nonexistent if the fire can be kept out of cut-over land. Evidence has shown that the leaving of seed trees is neither efficient nor economical. The practice known as block-logging to those operators who have sufficient timber and sufficient capital so to log, has much merit. But the only certain way to ensure regeneration of our forests is to keep the fires out of the young growth. If fire can be kept from destroying seeds and young growth the regeneration of land now cut over or to be cut over in the future presents no great problem. In a period of ten years—and I am taking the period 1934 to 1943, because those figures were available—fires have destroyed from 350,000 to 400,000 acres of valuable young forest growth in the coast district of British Columbia. We have an annual average net loss of over 16 million board feet. These fires, contrary to popular opinion, usually occur years after the loggers have actually left that particular area. It is not the loggers who are responsible for the majority of fires which occur.

The chief forester of British Columbia has estimated that the cost of forest protection should be $1,500,000 annually for the whole province. That may presumably be to protect the 126 million acres estimated by him to be worthy of protection. Those 126 million acres which the forester considers worthy of protection include hundreds of thousands of acres of productive forest land on Indian reserves, which are administered directly by this federal government. In round figures, as nearly as I can ascertain, 118 million acres are owned by the crown and eight million acres alienated under various forms of title, of which about five million acres are owned in fee simple. Therefore, of the total area of forest lands to be protected the crown owns the sole interest in 94 per cent and an important interest by way of royalties and taxes in the remaining 6 per cent.

To ensure new growth and the sustained yield, the organization of a fire protection service on a sound industrial basis is essential. This can be achieved only through provision of ample financing by adequate contributions from the dominion government, whose interest in the forests is, as I have already said, greater than either that of the province or that of the industry itself. This assistance might also include provision of aerial photography, map production, detection air patrols and the transportation by air of fire-fighters and fire-fighting equipment. Coupled with fire protection must be protection against insects and fungus disease such as the spruce sawfly, the borer, the hemlock looper, and the pine blister rust. These are not as great problems in British Columbia as fire. But in some regions of Canada they are an even greater menace. The westward migration of the insect pests is, however, beginning to be felt in British Columbia. The prevention of this spread which pays no heed to provincial boundaries is primarily a dominion responsibility. Adequate steps must be taken by the dominion to control insect pests and the spread of disease.

During world wars I and II the coast forests supplied 100 per cent of the aeroplane spruce used by the empire air services for the construction of fighter and bomber aircraft. British Columbia is the only source, as far as I know, of that particular type of spruce, which made possible the production of the Mosquito fighter and bomber. In both wars the dominion government took over the production and exploitation of this aerial spruce. But not one nickel was ever put back by the dominion government to safeguard the remaining stand against any future emergency. At the present time certain of these stands are threatened by insect pests and, as far as I know, no federal appropriation has as yet been made to combat this danger. Need for industrial and silvicultural research to discover new methods of marketing economically the refuse which is now being left in the woods is also apparent. In all these respects opportunities are provided to the federal government to assist the industry by larger appropriations. Moneys devoted to these purposes are a sound investment, because they will assure future production and yield a direct profit in the form of increased revenue. It is beyond the combined means of the province and the industry to provide these requisite services. The dominion government has a strong interest in our forest resources. The products of Canadian forest industries compete in world markets with those of countries which maintain extensive research facilities. I suggest that in order to prevent duplication of effort, to ensure that silvicultural research is organized on a continuing basis, the dominion government should assume the main responsibility in that field. The maintenance by the dominion government of extensive and up-to-date research facilities in the fields of silviculture, wood utilization, forest protection and forest economies is long overdue.

At present the various categories of cutting rights are under several jurisdictions. The forest branch governs them as to forestry and fire protection regulations, royalties and fire protection tax. The workmen's compensation board governs them as to important operating regulations and relatively high payroll assessments which cost several times as much as it would cost to replant the land and protect the crop from fire to saleable age. The provincial taxation authorities, independently of all other bodies, fix the assessments for property tax on crown granted land classified as timber land. The dominion taxation authorities collect personal and corporation income taxes, excess profits taxes and succession duties which at the present time exceed in cost per acre the total of all other government imposts. The provincial government also preserves an interest in the collection of succession duties.

If forest land is to be managed by individuals or companies for perpetual yield there must be some simplification of the present complicated taxation structure and some assurance that a coordinated policy will be developed under one authority in order to encourage private capital to embark on the growing of crops that cannot be reaped before the second or third generation. But, according to the proposal for the new dominion-provincial agreement, suggested in this year's budget, there is still to be an open season on the logging and lumbering industries which must tend to discourage production.

I have endeavoured to show the great value of the forest industry to the country as a whole; the necessity of maintaining a sustained yield for the industry; the interest and responsibility the federal government has in connection with our forest industry, and the action that the federal government must take now before circumstances make it impossible to save the forests of British Columbia for future generations of Canadians. This is a most vital and urgent obligation. I trust I have made some progress by way of proving to the government its responsibility for aiding proportionately in the protection of a major source of its own revenue.

The three to four billion foot crop, which can be produced if adequately protected, annually from the ten million and more acres of forests on the British Columbia coast will bring in an income of at least $120 million every year. The protection of assets of such magnitude demands the serious attention of this government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Did the hon. member indicate what the cost would be to the federal government of the interesting development he has suggested?

Mr. PEARKES: I did not say what the total cost to the federal government was, but I did quote the estimates by the chief forester of British Columbia.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, the budget address was presented some ten days ago, and in the meantime we have had an opportunity to study it and to receive from our constituents and other interested persons everywhere their reactions with respect to the forty-page discourse given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). This afternoon we heard a painstaking criticism by the official critic of the opposition, my genial friend, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). During the course of the few remarks I intend to make I shall refer to a few points wherein the official critic and I do not see exactly eye to eye.

If we consider the estimates that were tabled with the budget we find that it is expected that this coming year we shall be in receipt of some $2,500 million from various taxes. As against that we are going to have ordinary expenditures of some $2,770 million. The increase of expenditures over last year fall mainly under the following heads. There has been an increase in the debt charges of nearly $100 million, owing to the large borrowings in the various loans last year. Family allowances are going to cost us another $60 million because we are now in the first full year of the operation of the Family Allowances Act. Public works have grown by some $15 million. In this regard I found it interesting, as I perused the estimates, to note that the government has generously allotted an increased expenditure of $4,500 out of that $15 million increase to my own province of Saskatchewan. I hope that our people will send the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) an appropriate letter of recognition for that startling increase in expenditures in my province.

On the side of decreases in expenditure I find that the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, which I think all of us feel is the outstanding department in the reconstruction period following the war in which I believe we still live, has reduced its commitments this year by some $107 million as compared with last year. Its present commitments are largely to clear up obligations which resulted from war contracts. I find that expenditures relating to the purely administrative end of the Department of Reconstruction are below those of the Department of Labour and nearly $5,000,000 below the cost of operating one branch of the Department of Justice, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. So much for the principal current year expenditures because, after all, figures generally tend to bore us unless we can interpret them in terms of our national economy.

With respect to the important matter of tax relief, I think all of us expected that some measure of relief would be granted this year. We had expected that income taxes and excise taxes would be cut, to ease the growing cost of living, especially for those in the low income groups. Of course we have been disappointed, although the Minister of Finance, in forecasting changes which might come about next year, almost led me to believe that he has a plan somewhere in the back of his mind looking forward toward a cyclical budget covering a period of years instead of a budget running from year to year, as has been our custom. For the year 1946-47 our taxes, except in one instance, and it is rather a significant one, have remained unchanged. That instance which I think is significant is based on a resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance in which he proposes to reduce the excise tax on cigars, effective June 28, from $3 to $1 per thousand.

Mr. ILSLEY: The excise duty is reduced, but the ad valorem is increased and the total increase is $160,000.

Mr. PROBE: Then we shall not get cheap cigars.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have lost your last hope.

Mr. PROBE: I was thinking that we might have a cheap smoke.

The important tax from the point of view of the small income earner, in addition to the present onerous income tax, is the eight per cent sales tax, and that eight per cent sales tax on most purchases still stands. I remember that last May, about the time that election platforms were being cleared for action, there was a report in the press that the sales tax would be removed on builders' supplies so that we might get cheaper homes. That report, as far as the government is concerned, was correct, but in so far as the change brought about cheaper building materials, the result was entirely the opposite. The householder still pays eight per cent on his electric light bill and the kiddies still pay their two cents to the Minister of Finance on their pop. Had it not been for the minister's correction of my impression that the tax on cigars was to be reduced, I was about to dub the budget of this year "the Ilsley stogie budget," but if the tax on cigars has gone up, as the minister says, my description of the budget does not apply and our stogies are really going to be 10-cent cigars.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) reminded us this afternoon, the Minister of Finance in his budget speech said, at page 2905 of Hansard:

> Lighter taxes are not needed now for the purpose of permitting or encouraging additional private spending in order to maintain employment this year. In fact, if only immediate economic conditions were involved, one could make a case for temporary higher taxes in order to curb the excess of spending in some directions that is tending to pull prices up.

There the Minister of Finance in his economic wisdom has stated in the most orthodox manner his case for the retention of the present budgetary plan. It is his intention apparently to secure a balance between tax revenues and expenditures in perhaps another year or so, judging by the rate at which the deficit is being reduced from the high figure of last year to its present figure of something in the neighbourhood of $300,000,000. He proposes to do that without greatly disturbing the present taxation pattern except, as some of my hon. friends in the cooperative movement may say, by starting to break down the recent rapid growth of Co-Ops by the repeal of clause 4(p). If by some miracle Canadian production should remain at its present level of $11 billion and the unemployment figure should not rise above its present level of some 210,000, it is likely that the tax relief suggested for the next year will come to pass.

Canada has a right to expect expanding national production of all goods which this country is able to produce, the minister said in his budget speech. He went on, at page 2904 of Hansard:

> The real answer, the constructive answer, to the inflationary pressures existing at this time is to work and produce the goods that are wanted in greater volume, so that our greater buying power will result in more goods at reasonable prices, rather than fewer at higher prices. To business men in particular—

I like the way he puts this:

> —I would like to address a plea that they do all in their power to hold prices down and get volume up, over this next critical year.

With that statement and wish of the minister I think most of us are in agreement. But the Minister of Finance has taken no budgetary steps to bring about this all-out production. He simply asks businessmen to do the right thing, to keep prices down and bring production up. Under the free enterprise or profits system which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) lauds so much and with which the members on the government side of the house are in general agreement, you do not get all-out production nor do you keep prices down unless you increase the profit stimulus. We learned in the crisis of the war that Canada is able to make unlimited quantities of goods. But here we are in the second year of peace and we are still desperately short of housing for our people. Can you get a lumber merchant to build more houses or to cut down the prices of housing materials by a plea to him? I wish I could. I am trying to build a home for myself following the war, and all I can see, as one day follows another, is that the price of everything required for that house is going up. You cannot solve the difficulty by asking a merchant to give you a fair deal under the present system. We are short of materials and short of craftsmen to do our building. Private enterprise is not providing them, the Minister of Finance is not giving us a lead, nor have we any aggressive government action which can provide them through official agencies. As you are aware, we set up a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and it paid over to the federal treasury $14 million, which was the aggregate of the loans, less repayments, made under the National Housing Act since that act was passed in 1935, and represented some 30,000 housing units. To my mind, that does not suggest aggressive action by the federal government to increase the supply of housing in this country.

We are short of essential food, clothing, furniture, refrigerators, motorcars and almost any consumer commodity which one could name. We are short of health services and of the doctors and dentists needed to provide them, and we lack security of income. Yet large-scale production and the sales to the small consumer of these commodities still await government action.

The minister emphasized in his budget speech that our export position must be built up, no matter what happens at home. As he put it, our income from exports is the most important factor determining our prosperity and employment in peace time. I like to project myself back to the farm where I was raised and think of a farmer becoming prosperour following the advice of the Minister of Finance, by selling all his hay and oats to his neighbour and leaving his own live stock tied up in the stable to starve. If a farmer did that he would have his head examined. Yet, when our responsible ministers say that, and mean it—because we all give the minister credit for his sincerity—it is called good government business. Over a year has passed since V-E day, and our political and business leaders are actually denying Canadians the abundance which they were promised after the war; sending all available products, whether or not they are surplus to home needs, into a post-war chase for foreign markets, and financing those markets for the most part with Canadian credits, while we at home patiently wait and do without. I am quite prepared to grant that exports form part of the requirements for Canadian prosperity and that right now foodstuffs should move quickly to relieve world suffering. But, in general, exports alone will make no nation prosperous; they must be regulated in the light of that nation's home needs and come from the nation's surplus production. The minister's job is to create a surplus in every possible Canadian field of production, and to the extent that his government's plan fails to speed up the production of surpluses, to that extent the budget fails to create the prosperity which the minister wishes Canada to have.

My hon. friends to my right have said in effect that the way to stimulate production is to reduce the excess profits tax and to lift the price ceiling. Such stimulus was not needed in the emergency of war, nor is it needed in the present emergency of peace. The policy of removing profits taxes and lifting consumer prices means, as hon. members all know, that the number of units which consumers with fixed incomes can buy decreases in direct ratio to the numbers of each unit produced for sale. Such a government policy can only lower production and not increase it. With fixed wages, as is now preached here, demand for goods must fall as prices rise. Orthodox economists know this only too well. Let prices rise now and unemployment and depression will follow the present consumer prosperity in the same regular cycles which they always have, ever since capitalism began.

[Mr. Probe.]

No; we will increase our supply of goods, not by relaxing price controls as they are doing across the border and as the Minister of Finance pledged himself to do here, but we must profit by the war-time planning which we did and adjust that planning to peace-time uses. We shall need not to scrap but to adjust those price ceilings and price floors too, so that the net earnings or the take-home pay of the farmer, the manufacturer, the doctor, the miner, the carpenter, the professor, the pensioner, will bear some relation to the take-home pay of those in other occupations. But will we do this? To do this we must reinvigorate the planning boards which we partialy set up during the war. Our money system must be used to finance all production, whether of the factory, the field or the mine. We must think in terms of stockpiling surpluses for a change, instead of destroying them, until they are sold. We must think of sponsoring a national home-building plan.

My hon. friend to the left this afternoon made some reference to Belgium. I was in that country at the time that its government at one swoop took sixty per cent of the currency out of circulation. The general plan was to give each person who had that amount 1,500 francs, or roughly $40, and beyond that, sixty per cent of that individual's currency was taxed out of existence by the state, due, I assume, to the heavy inflation of paper which had taken place during the period of the German occupation. Yet that country has been able to finance a nation-wide home building plan; and my hon. friend was right when he said that that was being done with tax-free money. There, any man who wishes to own a home has the entire cost of that home financed by the state and the payments are amortized over a period of thirty years, without interest. Further, should by any chance the home owner and his family become unemployed, the payments on that home are assumed by the state during the period of unemployment. There is one condition to that, namely, that that man keep a garden. Of course we have a sort of housing plan but, as I say, the terms of the housing act so discouraged the small would-be home owner that we have thirty thousand and some odd loans under the housing act at a time when we need over twenty times that number of homes.

It is time that we controlled exports and imports by properly constituted boards in accord, not with export demand solely, but with Canadian needs and with an eye to foreign needs, shall we say, but let the foreigner have of our goods when we have developed a surplus. Let us direct and provide that our public investment of surplus money shall meet proper development needs and social needs of Canada's unlimited productive power. Our money need not be used, as it has been in the past, to pay bonuses to keep goods off the market, to burn or plough down our crops when human stomachs are unfilled anywhere, or to close shops and factories, or to slow down machinery within those factories to keep supplies short and prices up, as our free enterprise system does.

Finance must never again compel whole sections of this country to take relief when others work fifty, sixty, seventy, yes, eight-four hours a week in the case of the merchant seamen, and yet that is the budget path on which we are walking now. Look at our country. You take the train and you travel over vast unimproved near-wilderness in many places, and yet the current budget makes little provision for its development. I remember, when I was a younger man, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was asking us on the prairies for votes and his spokesmen told us of a wonderful Trans-Canada highway which would be built when his government came into office. That was in 1930. His government did get into office, and now, sixteen years after that time, with depression, with people idle, with all sorts of materials, with everything except the national will to complete the job, if you want to travel from my city to Ottawa you go via Minneapolis, Chicago and Detroit, or if you prefer another more scenic route you go to No. 2 highway via Duluth and Sault Ste. Marie.

An hon. MEMBER: You may go by the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. PROBE: No, you will never drive to Saskatchewan from here on that basis. Perhaps that is the intention of our governments, to keep us away from the prairies unless we take the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. GARDINER: You can drive all the way through now on the Canadian side; cars are doing it every day.

Mr. PROBE: Yes, I presume one could make the trip all right.

Mr. GARDINER: You can do it quicker than you can through the United States.

Mr. PROBE: Of course, I do not know whether the minister has ever made the trip, but I would venture to say—

Mr. GARDINER: My friends have, and are making it this week.

Mr. PROBE: I take it that is now the Trans-Canada highway. Well, if it is and if that is the best that can be offered to our citizens at the present time it is still not a highway according to modern standards. In my own area there are difficulties over water supplies. Water supplies for Moose Jaw and Regina have been mentioned frequently by hon. members on all sides of the house. Irrigation and the use of water from the Saskatchewan river have been discussed, and they are still in the blueprint stage. I presume those blueprints will be untied at about election time. The Hudson bay route is still a trackless waste, traversed by the occasional tramp steamer. At this time I wish to pay a tribute to the Minister of Agriculture who did make a constructive statement in the house a few weeks ago, namely, that trade between the maritimes and the prairies could be developed by the proper utilization of that route, and yet War Assets Corporation has disposed of the means by which our government might have undertaken the three or four years' exploratory work. They sold the Park Steamships to what are likely to be, for the most part, foreign competitors.

The social security measures which have been debated for months at dominion-provincial conferences are again shelved, while various premiers, federal and provincial, wrangle over provincial rights and blame the British North America Act when things do not work out to the interests of our people. The fathers of confederation would turn over in their graves if they could see the disunity which the terms of the British North America Act have created in our country because of the buck-passing tactics when a government does not wish to implement a measure. Hospitalization of our sick, pensions for the old and helpless have to be provided provincially until our premiers get together. Our veterans are fast spending their gratuities and many have no homes, no farms and no jobs. The savings of war workers which were supposed to go into cars which they hoped or longed for, and other luxuries, are now going to meet rising food costs. When a worker gets a wage increase he gets it after strikes and loss of production. Taxes are forecast for the humble cooperatives; yet the excess profits tax will come off the shoulders of the powerful manufacturers. High-priced advertising of soap and other huge corporations, Pullman travel, entertainment and fancy clubs for high salaried executives are still proper deductions for income taxes, while at the same time the worker pays his eight per cent excise tax on necessities and the child still hands his two cents a bottle on coke to the Minister of Finance.

Last year the Minister of Finance estimated that the excise tax levy would bring into the treasury some $455 million. The excess profits taxes were estimated to net $426 million, or roughly equivalent amounts of money. Excise taxes, sales taxes and the like for the most part are levied on the purchases of necessities of the people of modest incomes. The excess profits tax is levied on the surplus excess charges of huge corporations. It is forecast that the excess profits tax is to be reduced and cancelled next year. As a matter of fact it is going to take another form, I believe, but there is no hint that there will be a reduction of the eight per cent sales tax on the necessities of the average individual.

Mr. MITCHELL: What about the two per cent tax in Saskatchewan?

Mr. PROBE: Yes, and may I say to the Minister of Labour that poor as that province is compared with many parts of this country, that two per cent tax is coming off many commodities on October 31 of this year, and there is no election in sight. At the same time may I tell the minister that we are increasing the social services in our province, and we are not demanding that these be paid for by the small wage earner to the exclusion of the wealthier corporations.

I should like to leave with the Minister of Finance a constructive suggestion. I realize that he will be restricted in his point of view. I do not want to speak as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario spoke, who, as I recall it, revelled in the good old seventeenth century days. He spoke of the days of Puritan England, the days of good free trade and free enterprise. In his mind at least, he painted a glowing picture of seagoing vessels loaded to the gunwales with profit-bearing goods, with perhaps missionaries on top of them, going to the natives in distant lands to bring profit to the entrepreneur. That was his picture. In my mental picture of that period in the history of the old land, however, all I could see was the slave who was brought back, the factory set up in smoky surroundings with hovels on every side, and children working day and night to maintain the position of the industrialist. Yes; capitalism has two sides. To the man who has power and is ruthless, it spells fortune, whatever that is. All the rest of us can see in it is misery.

After all, corporations are simply collections of business men who still get their wages, shall we say, for the jobs they do; and whatever their workers get for the goods they produce simply swells the total of what that business group's enterprise gains from their work. Instead of removing the excess profits tax, would it not be better to say to these business men, "Let us look at this thing nationally; let us take the amount you now begrudge paying to the government of Canada by way of excess profits tax, and let us put it into specific ventures. Let us start out by using that money as a revolving fund for housing. Let us put half a billion dollars a year for a number of years into the construction of homes for the people of Canada." That is roughly the amount brought in by the excess profits tax last year. Then, when we have enough homes for our people—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for more than forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. PROBE: When we have built enough homes in this land—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Two minutes.

Mr. PROBE: —we can switch to social services of other kinds. We can go to highway construction; we can go to the reforestation programme mentioned a few moments ago by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). Let us be realistic, not in terms of cash but in terms of human welfare.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), who said the government was proposing double taxation on logging and mining. That statement was contradicted at once by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), but I should like to read what was said in the budget speech of June 27, at page 2910 of Hansard:

> An agreeing province would undertake to levy a five per cent tax on net corporate income within the province and would also agree on behalf of itself and its municipalities to impose no other corporation tax or tax on corporations except corporations engaged in mining or logging operations.

This means that the provinces are now collecting a stumpage tax from the logging companies and royalties from the mining companies. These two taxes remain as they have always been, but are now allowed as an expense. No change whatever is proposed in the taxation as outlined by the minister in his speech. I thought I had better make this correction before the statement by the hon. member became too widely circulated. Further proof of what I say is found at page 2911 of Hansard for the same date.

Before I deal with some other points raised in the budget debate, I should like to clear up a misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). On June 25, during the debate on the interim supply bill, the hon. gentleman discussed what he thought was a mystery arising out of his interpretation of the public accounts, and out of answers given to questions he had placed on the order paper. I am glad to be able to set his mind at rest and assure him that there is no mystery in the accounting methods followed by the Department of Finance. In his statement the hon. member used figures up to February 28, 1946, in one case, and up to March 31, 1945, in another, because figures for the whole fiscal year were not then available. I shall bring my figures down to March 31, 1946, using the figures for the last fiscal year which appear in the appendix to the budget speech.

The hon. gentleman begins with the point that in his view the revenue and the increase in debt during the war period, the increase in the debt through borrowing on the one hand and on the other hand the non-war and war expenditures during that period, should balance. That appears to be a simple statement, but it overlooks the fact that the dominion has to make disbursements for the purchase or acquisition of active assets, that is to say in loans, advances and investments, and the money required to purchase or acquire such assets must come out of the funds raised by the government through either taxation or borrowing. Let me try to make the matter clear by referring to the figures. During the period September 1, 1939, to March 31, 1946, the revenues totalled $13,346,500,000. In the same period the increase in the dominion debt was $15,238,600,000. Adding these two figures together, we arrive at a total of $28,585,100,000, representing the total receipts of the government during the period. Out of these total receipts, the total expenditures for war and non-war purposes were $23,245,200,000. This leaves a balance of $5,339,900,000 to be accounted for. This is the mystery which the hon. member desires to have explained.

The explanation is to be found in the increases in cash and other assets which are found to be in possession of the government to-day, and are recorded in the dominion balance sheet. If the hon. member will turn up pages 45 and 46 of the appendix to the budget he will find the dominion balance sheet, and on the assets side he will find the amount of cash, loans, advances and other investments held by the dominion as of March 31, 1946.

The first and most liquid item is cash, which amounted to $796,685,000,000, which is an increase of $714,200,000 from September 1, 1939.

The second item is advances to the foreign exchange control board of $1,550,000,000. This advance arises out of the necessity of providing the board with Canadian dollars in order that it may purchase United States dollars from Canadian exporters and others who obtain these dollars in their day-to-day business transactions.

The nature of these advances may be ascertained by examining the balance sheet of the foreign exchange control board as of December 31, 1945, which is in the report of the board tabled in the house on June 5. At December 31, 1945, the government advances to the board totalled $1,300 million against which the board had foreign exchange, mainly United States dollars and gold, to an amount of $1,410,200,000.

The third is advances to the Canadian National Railways, which increased by $666,500,000 during the period in question. These advances relate mainly to the repatriation of Canadian National securities held in Great Britain. The government has replaced the British investor as creditor of the railways. The government receives interest on its advances to the railways at various rates of two to three and one-half per cent.

The loan made to the government of the United Kingdom originally in the amount of $700 million stood at $538,600,000 at March 31, 1946, an asset created during the war period. In addition, at March 31, 1946, the amount of $425 million represented by accumulated liabilities of the United Kingdom under the British commonwealth air training plan was carried as an active asset. Although cancellation of this indebtedness was provided for in the financial agreement with the United Kingdom the relevant article of the agreement and section of the act implementing it have not yet been put into effect, pending action of the United States congress on the Anglo-American financial agreement. If and when approval is given to this agreement the amount of $425 million will be written off active assets and included in expenditures.

Other advances to the United Kingdom and foreign governments under section 3 of the War Appropriation Act and Export Credits

Insurance Act increased by $241,800,000 during the period.

Advance to crown companies increased by $108,500,000. These advances are covered by inventories and other assets of the companies. Another asset account arising since the outbreak of war is that entitled "Minister of Finance special custody account," amounting to $1,025,000,000, which is in the form of foreign exchange and securities and is offset by a contra item in the increase in total debt.

The increases in the foregoing items total $5,269,600,000, and the remainder, $70,300,000, is made up of sundry small increases or decreases in other active assets.

I think the house will admit that this is an impressive list of assets. The government has acquired them by disbursement of funds raised by either taxation or borrowing. But such disbursements are not expenditures in the sense of budgetary expenditures. The latter cover only outgoes for which the government receives no active asset.

I also point out that these assets are conservatively valued in the dominion's balance sheet. Over the last six years a reserve of $150 million has been built up by charges to expenditure to take care of any loss on the ultimate realization of these assets.

The hon. member for Temiscouata also raised the point that he could not obtain in May the figure for the total debt of Canada at March 31, 1946. As the hon. member knows, that date is the close of our fiscal year, but under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act expenditures relating to the fiscal year may be made up to April 30. In addition, many adjusting entries between expenditures and asset accounts have to be made after March 31. Accordingly, it is not possible to take off a balance sheet for the fiscal year-end until some months after the close of the year. However for the hon. member's information and for the information of the house I would point out that the Minister of Finance receives detailed statements of revenue, receipts and cash balances daily, and expenditures and asset and liabilities accounts twice monthly. I can assure the hon. member that the minister is at least as well informed on the operation of his department as any businessman on the operation of his company.

The budget speech indicated the deficit for the current fiscal year is now estimated at $300 million, and there is a good prospect that in the following fiscal year our revenues and expenditures will be in balance. The reduction of the deficit to an amount no larger than $300 million is a remarkable achievement when considered in the light of the very heavy outlays, amounting to over $600 million, which will be made this year by the Department of Veterans Affairs, the expenditures of the defence departments, for which $489,000,000 will be required, and various other expenditures, including price subsidies and the cost of termination of war contracts, which represent a substantial additional amount. These specific outlays we may reasonably expect to decline in the following year, although there may be moderate increases in other expenditures and, of course, a decline in our tax revenues from the reductions announced in the budget. It is apparent, however, from the magnitude of the figures I have given that when a more normal level is reached in the following year the reduction in our outlays will be substantial and give every reason to believe that our budget will be in balance in 1947-48.

This prospect is even more striking when one considers the heavy reductions in tax revenue that have been proposed, coming on top of the reductions already in effect. On personal income tax and corporation taxes alone these reductions for the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 amount in total to $530 million in tax revenue and, in addition, a reduction of $72 millions resulted from the removal of the refundable portion of the excess profits tax, giving a total in excess of $600 million. This figure does not include a further $90 million that resulted from the repeal of the war exchange tax and the exemption of producers' apparatus and equipment under the sales tax.

The itemized list of the reductions under the personal income tax and the corporation and excess profits tax is an impressive one. For the information of hon. members I will give a summary of the tax relief which is given by the changes which have been in effect for 1945, 1946 and 1947. I would prefer not to read the whole table since it is getting late, but I should like to make a couple of observations on it. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said that we were getting no immediate relief. The relief of four per cent which was effective last fall amounted to $30 million. We already have that to our advantage. The immediate effect in 1946, which we are enjoying at the present time, is the sixteen per cent reduction, which amounts to $115 million. The effect of the other, which we shall enjoy immediately after the turn of the year, amounts to twenty-three per cent, including family allowances, or a total of $155 million. Then there is a total of $300 million in relief from corporation taxes, giving a total of over $600 million. Surely that ought to be some inducement. The table follows:

Tax Relief—1945, 1946 and 1947

Personal Income Tax	Revenue Reduction
1945— 4 per cent	$30 million
1946—16 per cent	115 million
1947—23 per cent	143 million
1947—additional family allowance	12 million
Total Reduction — Personal Income Tax	300 million
Corporation Tax Cuts
Tax reduction applying to income (1945 budget)	1945 corporation
Reduction of E.P.T. rate to 60 per cent and increases in minimum standard profits	$95 million
Tax reductions applying to Income (1946 budget)	1946 corporation
Net revenue loss from removal of 22 per cent flat E.P.T. rate and reduction of excess rate from 20 per cent to 15 per cent less increased revenue by raising 18 per cent corporation rate from 18 per cent to 30 per cent	$135 million
Total reduction on corporation incomes excluding E.P.T. refundable taxes ..	$230 million
Removal of E.P.T. refundable taxes	$72 million
Total corporation tax reductions including E.P.T. refundable taxes	$302 million
Total reduction (excluding E.P.T. refundable taxes) ..	$530 million
Total reduction (including E.P.T. refundable taxes) .	$602 million

Many of the salient features of the personal income tax proposals for 1947 do not seem to have been understood, and I should like to explain more fully some of the aspects of the proposals in order to clear up certain misapprehensions. The proposals will relieve completely of tax between 550,000 and 600,000 taxpayers in 1947, which is about one-quarter of the present number. Under the proposals, our exemptions will be increased to a limit higher than the limit in any other English-speaking country in the world. The exemptions of $750 and $1,500 represents a return of three-quarters of the way to the pre-war exemptions. Some have argued that the exemptions should be increased immediately to $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married person. That would be going much farther than any responsible government would contemplate going in the light of our present financial position. The cost of increasing the exemptions to that level would be almost $300 million and would cut our income tax revenue in half. The revenue loss of $143 million under the budget proposals represents almost one-quarter of our present income tax revenue. I submit that this will be regarded by all responsible persons as being a generous measure of relief. Surely it is sound ordinary common sense to meet our bills now as a nation when we are fairly prosperous rather than to postpone them to the uncertain future.

I think hon. members will be impressed, on closer examination, with the modest amount of tax that will be paid under our new proposals by the lower income people. For example, a single person with $1,000 a year, who some call oppressed, will pay a tax of $55, or about five per cent of his income. That would hardly seem to be an onerous burden. Similarly, a married man with an income of $2,000 will pay a tax of $118, or about six per cent of his income. In both cases the taxes paid will be lower than those imposed in the United States and Great Britain.

The reduction of taxation under the proposals is substantial for the great majority of taxpayers. The over-all revenue reduction is about twenty-three per cent, which comes on top of the sixteen per cent reduction now in effect. The percentage reductions are largely in the lower incomes. Below $1,000 in the case of single persons and below $2,000 in the case of married the percentage reductions average fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent. Over these incomes they average ten per cent to fifteen per cent, with the percentage dropping gradually from about fifteen per cent in the $3,000 to $4,000 class to about ten per cent at $50,000. Above $50,000, the percentage reductions are less than ten per cent. At $100,000 it is around seven per cent; at $200,000, about three per cent. In general, our income tax in 1947 will be below the 1941 level. We shall have reduced our taxes two years after the end of the war to below the level they had reached two years after the war started.

There appears to be a great deal of confusion regarding the place of family allowances under the proposed changes. Perhaps this confusion arises out of the transition from the present system to the new system rather than out of the new system in itself, which is the essence of simplicity. One misconception that is most prevalent is that all parents not now receiving family allowances will be forced to take them in 1947, but that they will be required to repay the whole amount of the allowance to the government. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Next year every taxpayer can apply for the allowance and keep the whole amount he receives. Let me repeat that every taxpayer, next year, no matter what the amount of his income, can apply for the family allowance and keep the whole amount he receives. He does not include it with his income in making up his income tax, nor is it subject to a recovery under which part or all must be repaid as under the present system. If he does not apply for the allowance it is his own loss.

In addition to the family allowance payment, however, every taxpayer will be given a deduction from his income of $100 for the same child. For example, if he is a taxpayer with two children of family allowance age he will receive his family allowance payment in full, which at the present average of $72 a child would amount to $144, and, in addition, he will be given exemption from tax on $200 of his income in respect of the same two children.

The allowance under the income tax for a dependent for whom family allowances are not paid, that is for children over sixteen, and for other dependents qualifying under the law such as dependent brothers, sisters, parents, and so on, will be in the form of a deduction of $300 from income in respect of each such dependent. There has been some argument that this $300 deduction should be allowed to a taxpayer with children of family allowance age if he chose to have his children recognized in this manner rather than through the receipt of family allowances. I wish to point out to the house first in regard to this proposal that for the majority of taxpayers the measure proposed in the budget speech carries a greater benefit than a $300 deduction from income. In the lower income groups this excess of benefit is substantial, and is of significant amounts on all incomes up to $7,500. Take, for example, a married man with two children and an income of $5,000. Under the budget proposal this married man would pay a tax of $911, against which would be offset family allowances of on the average $144, making a net liability of $767. If the same married man were to take instead for his two children a deduction from income of $300 apiece, or $600, he would pay a tax of $897, or $130 more than his net liability under the budget proposal.

Another aspect of the income tax changes which has not been fully understood is that affecting husband and wife where each have separate incomes. The nature of the change might be best explained by reviewing the background of the proposal. Prior to 1942 the law was that when husband and wife each had an income in excess of the exemption limits for a single person each was subject to tax as a single person on their own separate incomes. If the wife's income was under the exemption limit, however, the husband was allowed to retain the married allowance. In order to encourage married women to take employment during the war, the law was amended in 1942 to allow the husband to continue to pay tax as a married man even though his wife's income exceeded the exempt limit, which modified the previous rule that both would be taxable as single persons when the wife's income exceeded the exemption.

The change proposed for 1947 might be best explained as falling into two parts. The first part relates to husband and wife both having incomes in excess of $750. In this case we propose to return to the pre-1942 position; that is, each will be taxed as single persons on their own income. The second part of the change applies where the wife has an income of her own but less than $750. Under the pre-1942 law in this circumstance the husband would have been allowed to retain the married exemption, and in effect he and his wife had a combined income exempt from tax of $1,500 in the hands of the husband and up to $750 in the hands of the wife, making a combined total exemption of $2,250. This compares with an exemption granted two single persons having the same income of $750 apiece, or only $1,500 in total. We propose in large measure to remove the advantage enjoyed by a married couple under this rule by providing that if the wife has an income in excess of $250 then the husband's exemption of $1,500 must be reduced by the amount by which the wife's income exceeds $250. The amount of $250 of the wife's income will be disregarded because of the very large number of cases where the wife has incidental earnings of so small an amount as to be negligible, but the husband's exemption will be reduced by any excess income his wife has over $250.

An illustration will serve to show the effect of this change. Assume the case of a married man with a $5,000 a year income. If his wife has no income he will get the full $1,500 exemption and his tax in 1947 will be $973. If, however, his wife has an income of, say, $600, then his $1,500 exemption will be reduced by the excess of $600 over $250, or $350, leaving an exemption of $1,150 in place of $1,500. His tax with the reduced exemption will then be $1,081, or $108 higher than it would be if his wife did not have the income of $600.

The changes I have discussed apply to the year 1947. It would appear that in some quarters they are regarded as "postponed" changes because they apply to 1947. They are in no sense postponed changes but simply changes for which legislation affecting the coming year is necessary for good and sufficient reasons. I do not recall that the Minister of Finance has ever made any statement which implied directly or indirectly that there would be a further reduction in 1946 over and above the sixteen per cent reduction now in effect. This cut of sixteen per cent is on a level with reductions made in some English-speaking countries for 1946 and is higher than in others. Further, it is now anticipated that without tax reductions in 1946 we shall still have a gap between our revenue and our expenditure of $300 million. While this is encouraging in comparison with the deficits of earlier years, it still represents a substantial gap, and it would be, in my opinion, unwise to make that gap larger and live on borrowed money when our incomes are high and we can better afford to meet our current expenses out of our current income than we may be able to at a later day. Finally, our obligations to make reductions in the personal income tax for the year 1947 under the existing dominion-provincial agreements have been overlooked in assessing the personal income tax changes. These agreements call for reductions applying to the year 1947, and the dominion would certainly have been giving hostages to fortune, even if financial conditions had warranted a reduction in 1946, to make a reduction in that year in the expectation that the provinces would accept this reduction as fulfilling the terms of the agreements.

I wish to deal now with the effect of the proposal regarding succession duties made in connection with the offer to the provinces. The impression created by editorials and statements appearing in the press is that the dominion has doubled the rate of succession duties that will apply on estates in 1947. How such a gross misstatement of the facts could have been seriously advanced is beyond my comprehension. The dominion's proposal was simply that the rates of duty under the dominion act would be doubled and that any duty paid to a province would be offset against the dominion duty up to one-half the amount of the increased dominion duty. Since existing provincial duties are now generally as high as or higher than one-half the increased dominion duty, in general there will be no increase in total duty under the change.

A simple illustration will show the truth of this statement. Take the case of an estate of $50,000 left to a widow in the province of Quebec. At the present time the Quebec duty on this estate is $2,000, and the dominion duty, $1,470, giving a total duty of $3,470. Now assume that the dominion duty is doubled, which would increase the $1,470 to $2,940. Under the proposal the provincial duty will offset half of the new dominion duty, so that the new duty will be $2,000 paid to the province plus $1,470 payable to the dominion—that is, half of $2,940 —or a total of $3,470, the same as the present duty.

Let me take another example. Assume an estate of $2,000,000 left to a widow in Ontario. The present provincial duty is $494,500, and the present dominion duty, $451,440, giving a total of $945,940. The dominion duty doubled would be $902,880, which, reduced by half for the credit for the provincial tax, would leave a net dominion duty of $451,440, which along with the provincial duty would give a total of $945,940, or exactly the same total duty as the estate now pays.

I think these illustrations show clearly enough that, in general, succession duty rates in Canada will not be increased by the dominion's proposal. This will be true in any province where the provincial rates are as high as or higher than the present dominion rates, which is generally true of all provinces with the exception of Manitoba and British Columbia. There may also be individual cases where the dominion taxes a succession which the province does not tax or possibly taxes a succession in a manner different from the provincial practice where the duty under the dominion's proposal might be increased. In these cases, however, the increase would normally be relatively small in amount, and would not affect the general statement that the level of succession duties in Canada has not been raised.

Further proof of this may be shown by the fact that the revenue from provincial succession duties in Canada has averaged around $25,000,000 in recent years compared with revenue of about $21,500,000 from dominion succession duties in the last fiscal year. It is obvious that provincial succession duties are high enough in general to absorb the credit against the dominion duty, and that the dominion duty remaining payable will be the same as under the present rates.

So much for the arithmetic of the proposal. Its purpose, of course, is to provide a way by which any province, whether it enters into an agreement with the dominion or not, can remain in the succession duties field or withdraw from it as it may choose. If a province remains, the credit against the dominion duty is allowed for provincial taxes. If, on the other hand, a province withdraws its duty, then the new increased dominion duty replaces the present combined provincial and dominion duty. It is to be hoped that, for the sake of uniformity and simplicity of taxation, all or most of the agreeing provinces will withdraw their own succession duty measures and thus remove the duplication of administration which now exists in this field.

I had another statement, Mr. Speaker, but it would run over the allotted time. I thank you.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO LETTER FROM PRESIDENT OF INCOME TAX PAYERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I understand that copies of a letter addressed to me by Mr. Thorvaldson, president of the income taxpayers' association, have been circulated among members of parliament. The letter contains this statement:

The first sentence of the third paragraph of your letter is sufficiently evasive to make me doubt the substance of your charges. Indeed, I do doubt them, and now challenge you to prove them.

Therefore, though I have not permission from the writers to do so, I now table a number of letters dealing exclusively or almost exclusively with the forgery of signatures to certain cards that have been received by certain hon. members; envelopes marked "Unknown" or "Unclaimed" though some of the envelopes so marked have been already destroyed, and cards obviously addressed by one person, or several persons in the same handwriting, together with affidavits obtained by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) when he was in the west, from some of his constituents denying that they had signed such cards. I may say we know of other persons who deny having signed such cards, but from whom we have not written or documentary evidence.

I believe these communications, of which there are quite a few, will be sufficient evidence to show that the statement I made in the house with regard to the forgery of these signatures is well founded.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that while his question of privilege is well taken, according to the rules of the house it is not the privilege of an hon. member to table private correspondence. I have no objection to allowing him to do so, since every hon. member has received letters complaining about what he has mentioned, but I would ask the house if it could be done by unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM BARRAUTE TO KIASK FALLS, QUEBEC

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a line of railway from Barraute to Kiask Falls on the Bell river, in the province of Quebec, a distance of approximately 55 miles at an estimated expenditure of $4,125,000 and an average expenditure of $75,000 per mile. The bill will make provision for the issue by the company of securities, which may be guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction. To enable the company to proceed with construction forthwith temporary loans may be made to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council and secured by company securities.

COINAGE

COPPER-COLOURED FIVE-CENT PIECES—WITHDRAWAL FROM CIRCULATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question with respect to the copper-coloured five-cent pieces. These coins and one-cent pieces are too much alike. Every person dislikes that five-cent piece—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GLADSTONE: —and tries to pass it on to another. Through oversight eleven cents is frequently tendered to pay for a three-cent newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to come directly to his question.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Will the minister consider withdrawing the copper-coloured five-cent piece from circulation?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The department is taking steps to have these coins withdrawn from circulation. It will take some time to do this, as the actual withdrawal will have to be done by the chartered banks. I am hopeful, however, that these coins will be out of active circulation in the comparatively near future.

TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

MEETING OF BOARD AT CHARLOTTETOWN ON JULY 17

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked the following question:

Under what or by whose authority is the board of transport commissioners to hold a meeting in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Edward Island, on July 17 next regarding truck freight rates on the Borden-Tormentine ferry?

The authority is that contained in sections 33 and 325 of the Railway Act. The complaint has been lodged by the board of trade for the town of Summerside.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, July 8, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, sugar, like rubber or gasoline, is an important munition of war and an almost indispensable requirement of peace. Whoever wittingly jeopardizes his country's sugar supply line is guilty of dereliction of duty. Whoever unwittingly jeopardizes his country's sugar supply line might be guilty of culpable ignorance. Whoever, having essential facts pertaining to his country's sugar supply line, fails to communicate them to those in responsible positions, could be guilty of gross dereliction of duty.

There have come into my possession certain vital facts pertaining to Canada's sugar supply line. It therefore becomes my duty to-day to discuss in the house the beet sugar industry in Canada. It may be questioned whether this matter directly pertains to the budget. I think upon mature consideration every hon. member will acknowledge that sugar supply in Canada does have a vital bearing upon the budget, upon price control, upon the value of money, upon the amount of money we can have in circulation, and upon many other things pertaining to the budget of any country, particularly of Canada.

Canada could be one of the sugar bowls of the united nations. Taken ten years ago, Canada could have been made an asset in the world sugar situation, not only during the war but also during the dangerous post-war days. Canada was made a liability in respect of the world sugar situation, a poor relation whose needs had to be considered a first charge on the sugar resources of the hard pressed united nations. With reference to sugar, Canada had to be carried through several of the most exacting war years, and now, with untold millions starving, Canada still must be cared for from the perilously depleted sugar stockpiles of the world, cared for with sugar that could help to save millions of lives. It is a sorry picture, and one far from gratifying to Canada's national pride.

In order to justify what I have said it will be necessary for me to deal briefly with four questions which it is my purpose to ask. The first of these is: Can the beet sugar industry in Canada be economically sound—first, for the beet producers; second, for the consumers of Canada; third, for Canadian agriculture and, fourth, for the Canadian economy as a whole? With respect to the producers of beets in Canada I believe there is an irrefutable answer to the question which is found in two sets of facts. The first one of these is a statement drawn from the submission of the Alberta cooperative beet growers' association to the Rowell-Sirois commission in 1937; I quote from page 2 of that submission. This statement of fact will show quite clearly to what extent the beet sugar industry in southern Alberta was able to cope with the situation surrounding it and come out victorious. The statement follows:

> To indicate the value of this industry to the agriculture of our district, the community in general and the Dominion of Canada, we submit the following figures relating to the 1937 beet crop:
> 235,481 tons of beets were produced from 19,829 acres of irrigated land—an average of 11·88 tons per acre.
> 75,603,700 pounds of sugar were manufactured.
> 3,813 pounds was the per acre yield of refined sugar.
> $3,040,000 worth of sugar was manufactured.
> $155 was the total gross return per acre.
> $77.50 was the gross return to the manufacturer.
> $77.50 was the gross return per acre to the farmer.
> The farmers' costs approximated $60 per acre which includes $25 per acre paid for hand labour by the farmer. These figures were given in a speech made by T. George Wood, manager, Canadian Sugar Factories Limited, at Lethbridge, Wednesday, March 23, 1938. We believe that this land is producing more food value per acre than any other land in the dominion.

I think to hon. members that must indicate clearly that the beet sugar industry is not a poor relation. It is not an industry that needs any particular help other than plain ordinary commonsense good management from any government in Canada, which kind of management I submit it has not thus far received at the hands of the present Liberal government.

Another set of figures which has an important bearing on the matter gives the price to the refiner of sugar on the Montreal market. These prices were as follows:

	Cents
1930	4·754
1931	4·552
1932	4·378
1934	3·875
1935	3·832
1936	3·626
1937	4·006
1938	3·895
1940	4·754

I received these figures from a high official who, I have reason to believe, knew they were correct. If anyone thinks that they are not correct let him quote the accurate figures and prove that they are incorrect. I received those figures confidentially. The reason I mention them is to show hon. members that the beet sugar industry was competing in a market in which the price of sugar was astonishingly low. Hardly one of those figures exceeds four cents a pound. No people in the world could ask that their sugar be produced more cheaply than that, yet the beet sugar industry was competing in that market and succeeding admirably well.

Is the beet sugar industry a going concern or a success from the point of view of the consumer? The mere statement of those prices to the refiner is a clear indication that the Canadian consumer was pretty well off. It must be remembered that the dominion government has seen fit to impose an excise duty of two cents a pound on sugar, raising the price of sugar virtually fifty per cent in many cases and thirty-three per cent in all cases. It must be obvious that the price of sugar to the consumer could be most attractive to the consumer in Canada if the beet sugar industry could get the administration in Canada off its back.

There is another matter which is important to all consumers—stability of supply. People want to know whether they are going to be able to get their sugar or whether they are going to be held up by some country or countries that happen to be in a position to refrain from giving them sugar. I think most people in this country were alarmed when they were told over the air that Canada was having all the sugar that was apportioned by an international board which had taken upon itself the responsibility of apportioning to Canada her share. I fancy that what is being prepared for Canada is a situation in which she will always be subject to the will of a board that will apportion sugar to her or refuse to do so in accordance with the whims of its own mind. I think the consumers would appreciate having a stable supply on which they could depend.

Another matter is stability of prices. Many hon. members of this house will remember that after the last war the price of sugar went up to as high as 24 cents a pound. Why? Because certain cane interests found themselves in a position to dictate prices. Because of the almost unbelievable mismanagement which has taken place during the last fifteen years in Canada and the United States that same crowd of people are virtually in position to dictate prices once more and are beginning to do so. There will be people who will doubt the truth of what I am saying; to all such people I would refer an article which came into my hands to-day and which was published in the June 15, 1946 issue of a paper called "American Carbonator and Bottler", Atlanta, Georgia. In this article it is clearly shown that Cuba is beginning to feel that she is in a position to dictate. So the certainty of stable prices is of great importance to consumers. I ask any hon. member of the house where you could possibly gain for the consumers of Canada a cheaper product and a more stable supply at a more stable price than you could obtain through the operation of a beet sugar industry in Canada, large enough and well enough managed to supply the needs of Canadians.

Is the beet sugar industry a success from the point of view of Canadian agriculture? I am not going to linger on any of these points. I am merely indicating for hon. members some of the things that derive from the beet sugar industry for Canadian agriculture. First, a profitable crop in sugar beets. Second, a stable predictable market and a stable predictable price. Third, almost a sure crop, especially in my province, where water is available through irrigation; a crop which enriches the soil for two or three reasons—a crop which improves the friability of the soil and the chemical nature of the soil; a crop which distributes labour and risk over the whole year instead of concentrating the risk all on one crop, such as wheat; a crop which enables mixed farming to be carried on; a crop which reduces grain surpluses, about which nearly everybody is led to worry in Canada; a crop which permits of the employment of hired help all the year round, which is a major problem of most farmers; a crop which provides cheap valuable feed in pulp, tops, leaves, molasses, alfalfa, which is raised in rotation in preparing the land for the crops, and straw which comes in abundance when grain is grown after beets. These are only some of the values of the beet sugar industry to Canadian agriculture.

Is the industry a success from the point of view of the Canadian economy as a whole? First, with respect to the domestic market, the beet sugar industry provides a domestic market for a considerable number of commodities in Canada—coal, lime, coke, agricultural implements, boxes, bags and a number of other things. It provides labour for all the people who produce these commodities. It provides traffic for the transportation systems which convey them to the sugar factory. This means an appreciable domestic market. If any considerable portion of the sugar of Canada were produced from the beet sugar industry there would result a really valuable market. One hundred million pounds of beet sugar will put into the hands of the Canadian people $5,000,000. One hundred million pounds of cane sugar will put into the hands of the Canadian people $555,555. The beet sugar industry therefore will put into the hands of the Canadian people nine times as much purchasing power as the cane sugar industry will in providing Canada's sugar supply. These figures I computed from the October 1945 submission to this government by the Canadian Beet Sugar Producers Association, at pages 6 and 7 of their submission. The nine hundred million pounds of cane sugar annually imported into Canada puts not more than $5,000,000 into Canadian pockets. If this nine hundred million pounds of cane sugar were sugar made in Canada from Canadian grown beets it would put $45,000,000 into Canadian pockets. I ask any hon. member to tell me which one of these two will provide a better means of aiding the Canadian economy.

Now a word as to the employment provided by the two industries. First we have all the employment which is provided by the various industries which supply the commodities required by the beet sugar industry in manufacturing and processing sugar. We have between eight and nine times as much Canadian labour required to produce one hundred pounds of beet sugar as is required to produce one hundred pounds of cane sugar. For these figures I again draw on the October 1945 submission, at page 6, paragraph 2.

Another important consideration from the point of view of Canadian economy is variety of production. We have as a result of the beet sugar industry practically every kind of meat produced, eggs, canned vegetables, canned fruits; for the canning industry goes hand in hand with the beet sugar industry because the land is prepared well through the raising of beets and is therefore eminently suitable for the raising of all kinds of vegetables for canning; we have dairy products and we have honey. It seems to be just dawning on hon. members on the government side that the money of a country depends upon the goods which the country is producing. Already in this debate we have heard mentioned four or five times the importance of things instead of money. If you want your economy stable, if you want your money stable, make sure that there are plenty of things behind your money. If you want to avoid inflation and rising prices, be sure you have plenty of things, then prices will not rise. Consequently, looking at it from that angle, it is of great importance that we have this variety and richness of production flowing into the Canadian economy as a result of the beet sugar industry. This variety of production can stabilize our money, stabilize our prices, stabilize our trade.

From what I have already said it must be obvious to all hon. members that the beet sugar industry would greatly increase prosperity of agriculture because irrigation farmers become stable from having a sure cash crop and through having mixed farming.

The matter of trade and the bearing of the beet sugar industry on our trade is of great importance. A wide variety of misconceptions is deliberately spread abroad across this country concerning trade in respect to the beet sugar industry. We have an example of that in the references to the supposed loss of the maritime fish and potato market by reason of the development of the beet sugar industry. This idea about the loss of that market is a complete fallacy; it always was, and I am more than a little suspicious that the men who first foisted it upon the country knew it was. The more purchasing power you put into the hands of the people, the more goods they can buy from abroad as well as in their own country, and the more goods we can buy from outside our own country, the more goods we shall be able to sell outside. This has been emphasized several times by several speakers in the hearing of all hon. members. Therefore the development of the beet sugar industry certainly should be more conducive to developing trade for Canada than the development of the cane refining industry in Canada, which puts the purchasing power in Cuba, Haiti, Jamaica or some other far-off land.

The second important question of the four which I propose to ask and answer is this: Can the beet sugar industry be expanded to satisfy Canadian needs? All hon. members I believe know that there are successful beet sugar factories in Ontario, Manitoba and Quebec. I am not going to deal with those provinces but only with my own province of Alberta, with which I am in some measure familiar.

Has Canada enough available land in the province of Alberta to develop a sugar beet industry? This is the picture in Alberta. We have already a sufficient number of irrigated districts in Alberta to provide 508,800 acres of irrigated land through twelve projects already constructed. Now we have the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, which has been discussed several times in the hearing of hon. members. This project is now being constructed because of the wisdom of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). It will bring under irrigation 345,000 more acres of some of the finest beet-producing land on the face of the earth, and second on the American continent only to California. Now, 30,000 acres of irrigated land will supply a 1,200-ton slicing capacity sugar beet factory such as is found in Raymond and at Picture Butte, in my constituency. A 1,200-ton slicing capacity beet factory will produce one-twentieth of the sugar which Canada requires in a normal peacetime year. Hon. members will readily compute that 508,800 acres, together with 345,000 acres which ought to be under irrigation in Alberta within a short time, say three years, will very easily take care of all the requirements of Canada. All that is necessary is to establish fourteen more mills of the size of the Canadian Sugar Company's mill at Raymond or Picture Butte. It is obvious therefore that Canada could easily develop a sufficiently large sugar beet industry to provide all the needs of the dominion and have a great deal of sugar left over for export in case of need.

The next question which would be raised is this: Has Canada sufficient labour? Labour difficulties are disturbing us at the present time, I will grant. We have depended a good deal on various peoples who perhaps may not be available to us much longer. But let me point out to hon. members that there are being developed at the present time a considerable number of machines which are going to displace labour to a surprising degree; in fact, it is the ideal of those working on the beet sugar industry to displace hand labour almost entirely by machines. We have to-day a machine which plants broken or segmented seed, and which largely overcomes the difficulty of blocking and thinning. We have a machine, which has not been perfected, but which appears to have a good deal of promise, which will overcome the blocking problem. We have another one which will lift the beets, and yet another which will top them and elevate them into trucks ready to be transported to the factory. Thereby it is easy to see that all the difficult tasks which labour has now to perform will be taken over by machines in the not distant future. Meanwhile a good many fine people over in Europe are eager to emigrate to this country. I will not pronounce on the immigration policy of Canada; all I will say is that in my constituency there are many fine people, drawn from such countries as Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland, who have succeeded admirably in the beet sugar industry and in life, and who are mixing in with the Canadian people and becoming good Canadians. We can easily take some more of that kind and allow them to work in the beet sugar industry.

I have not had a chance to examine into the possibilities of this suggestion, but hon. members to-day are interested in the Indian problem. I have an idea that if we managed our Indians as we could manage them we could train them to be skilful beet workers and thereby go a long way towards solving the economic problem, which is ever a serious one to the Indians in Alberta.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the hon. member mind if I asked him, are the Indians in Alberta assisting now in this work? I think the hon. member's suggestion is a good one.

Mr. LOW: Yes, they are.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A good many of the Blood Indians have worked in the beet fields—those are the ones with whom my hon. friend is familiar—and they do the job well. With training I believe they would be quite successful.

The third of the questions which I indicated is this: Is an increased quality and variety of production in Canada desirable?

This opens up the whole vexatious question whether Canada is to become more or less self-sufficient. There is a wide variety of opinion on this matter, and a good deal of heat is generated in the discussion of it. I am not going to enter into that matter; I shall approach the question from the point of view of plain common sense. When the war was on, it was of the first importance that we should be able to produce the things we needed. All hon. members will readily recognize that in a time of war, self-sufficiency is an attribute which most nations would be very glad to possess. Furthermore, in war, in our day, it is vital that a nation be industrially strong, that it have great factories which can be utilized for the production of war materials. Then it is important that a nation should have not only plenty of goods, food and the rest, but that it should have a supply to spare for its allies. Certainly from the point of view of war it is eminently desirable that Canada attain the point at which she will be able to produce her own sugar.

Now with respect to peace time. Let us consider rich and varied production from the point of view of its being a means of ensuring Canada's economic and financial independence. I was comforted by a remark which came in the minister's statement the other night on the four measures he was going to adopt to cushion Canada's economy against the irregularities developing in the United States. As I recall it, he said that Canada was going to maintain her economic and financial independence. I wish to commend the minister for that remark. I believe in it entirely. What development could possibly contribute more to the desirable objective of attaining and maintaining Canada's economic and financial independence than a wide variety of production so that the country can be independent of outside sources for the essentials of life? And certainly, sugar, being one of the essentials of life, should qualify.

May we look at the matter first of all from the point of view of the balance of trade? When the minister gave his excellent speech—and it was a most excellent speech—on the foreign exchange control situation he revealed to the country the dangers which have always confronted Canada of incurring an unfavourable balance of trade with the United States. He referred to the revealing report of the foreign exchange control board, which again emphasizes that matter. Now, every commodity of which Canada can produce her own needs is an additional bulwark against the possibility of developing an adverse balance of trade. That ought to be obvious. So surely from that standpoint it is wise to develop the beet sugar industry in Canada. The more we produce the less we have to import.

It will be argued that perhaps this is inconsistent with the statement I made a few minutes ago to the effect that if we have an abundance of purchasing power within the country we shall be able to buy more from the outside. We can use foreign exchange control to keep out the non-essentials. What bothers us is having essentials which we must import. That is a thing which we must avoid. If we can increase our productive capacity in the country we shall increase our population and in due time we shall begin to have manufacturing, which will produce many of the things we now import from outside, especially the United States.

Let us look at the matter from the point of view of price control, the very thing that the minister dealt with the other night in his statement. Price control, I think he will agree, is relatively not so difficult if there is plenty of goods. He himself has emphasized that time and time again. All hon. members recognize it. Consequently if we have plenty of sugar in Canada we shall certainly be able to control sugar prices much more effectively than if we are in danger of being constantly held up, shall I say, by Cuba or by some other foreign source of sugar.

May I deal with the question from the point of view of the stability of our money? I have already referred to this. The thing that gives money its value is plenty of goods and services. It used to be thought, only a short time ago, that what gave money its value was gold. No one believes that to-day, at any rate no one who is well informed. We hear the Minister of Labour every once in a while repeating his classic to the effect that what imparts value to money is the scarcity of it. He will learn in due time that that is not what gives money its value, because in 1932 our money was scarce enough, and it was not sound money for the reason that prices were far too low and the result was that things were not going well with us.

The thing that does give money its value is having plenty of goods and services in the state. Hence the importance of sugar in the matter of keeping Canada economically and financially independent. I could go into greater detail but I had better not take the time now.

The fourth point under that general caption is our freedom from foreign control. A good deal of discussion has already taken place on the matter of cartels. Well, if the sugar supplies of the world should be found to be in the hands of an international cartel, it is obvious that any government that might take power in Ottawa would be under the necessity of bowing and scraping to the foreign cartel that controlled sugar. If we wish to be free from any such danger we must have our own sugar supply. And if we are to be free from the dictates of other nations I would commend to hon. members a careful study of the article to which I have already referred, wherein it is shown that even the lordly United States is in danger of having to bow to Cuba by reason of the fact that Cuba has the sugar and the United States has not. Surely if Canada is to be free from other nations, from their dictation, domination and influence, she must have her own supply. She must be free equally from international groups, from groups of nations which might take the notion to cooperate in dictating the affairs of the nations of the world. We see plenty of evidence of that already.

This is the fourth question that I asked: Does the present government in Ottawa encourage the beet sugar industry in Canada? I will answer that with a flat no.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to refer to several circumstances from which I draw that conclusion. I could cite a great many, but a few will do. In the spring of 1941 an order went out that 1,300 acres were to be taken out of production of sugar beets in my constituency. What was the reason? There were 200,000 hundredweight of sugar in the storehouses of Canadian Sugar Factories Limited, and there was in Canada, in charge of sugar, a controller whose business it was to take that sugar. But he chose not to take it, and thereby forced the sugar company to take 1,300 acres out of production. I will ask any hon. member of this house whether a government that was in sympathy with the beet sugar industry would have tolerated behaviour such as that on the part of the sugar controller, whoever he may be. Hon. members can find an account of that at page 2125 of Hansard of 1941, where I discussed the matter.

Could there be any conceivable explanation of that most ill-advised move, except that the sugar controller, appointed definitely to hurt the beet sugar industry, seized the first opportunity afforded and exposed and overplayed his hand? A wave of popular opposition developed across the country; or it may be that on second thought the controller was led to change his decision so as to allow the 1,300 acres to come back into production. At any rate, in the light of what happened since, the minister must realize that that was a most fantastic order for the sugar administrator to allow to go out when he had the power with respect to sugar at the beginning of the war—a most dangerous power from the point of view of the industry.

Another evidence of Liberal lack of sympathy with the beet sugar industry is this: The government and government spokesmen have used various specious arguments against the beet sugar industry. They argued that it was not economic in Canada. The speciousness of this argument I have revealed in what I have said. It is nonsense.

The government spokesmen constantly proclaimed that beet growing and the manufacture of beet sugar are too expensive to be carried on successfully without high tariff protection. I will ask the minister this question, and he can reply to it later if he sees fit: Is it not a fact that the Canadian sugar tariff is constructed in such a way as to protect the Canadian refiners of cane sugar, and that it only accidentally proves a partial protection to the beet sugar producer? Do not tariff items 134, 135, 135b, clearly answer this question in the affirmative? Does not this affirmative answer become extremely emphatic when these Canadian tariff items are compared with the corresponding items of the tariff structures of the United States and the United Kingdom?

Again, government spokesmen spread the story that Canada signed the London sugar agreement in 1937, contracting not to aid the further development of the beet sugar industry. Is this story not false? The minister will have to confess that it is. Is it not true that Canada never did sign the London agreement? Yet people in the government have urged upon me the alleged fact that Canada had signed this solemn agreement and therefore had to keep her pledge.

Liberal spokesmen constantly spread the story that the development of the beet sugar industry lost for us the fish and potato market which the maritimes need. Even the Minister of Agriculture had accepted this fallacy, as is clearly shown by replies he gave to certain hon. gentlemen on May 29, as reported at page 1994 of Hansard. One suspects that somebody must be deliberately falsifying. Listen to this from "Reports on Markets for Dried and Pickled Fish", prepared by O. F. MacKenzie and F. Homer Zwicker, printed by the king's printer, issued by the Department of Fisheries, Ottawa, in 1938. On page 17 of the report there appears the following:

> A great deal of idle and ill-informed comment has been in circulation regarding the so-called dump duty on refined sugar from Cuba, imposed in 1932 being responsible for the loss of Canada's market in fish and potatoes in Cuba. Careful study of the Cuban graph is invited and this study will definitely prove that the West India treaty is responsible for the loss of the Cuban market, and the dump duty had nothing to do with the downward turn in the trend of trade with Cuba.
> In 1926, the year before the West India treaty was proclaimed, we did a business with Cuba of just under twenty million dollars. At that time Canadian fish entered Cuba at the low duty of $1.30 per 100 kilos and potatoes at 65 cents per 100 kilos. In 1930, with the West India treaty becoming effective, this trade has shrunk to less than eight million dollars. At this stage Cuba raised their duty on codfish from $1.30 to $3 per 100 kilos. In 1931, with trade down to five million, the duties were increased to $4 and consular charges were also drastically increased. In 1932, Cuba again increased duties on codfish to $5.50 per 100 kilos where it has remained. By this time, as the graph so clearly shows, the market for codfish in Cuba was practically gone. After a further slight decline the following year, the demand had been increasing, and in both 1936 and 1937, Canada's exports of codfish to Cuba were considerably more than what they were the year dump duties were enforced.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that publication was available to the members of the government; and in the face of those facts how can they possibly excuse themselves for this story that has gone out about the destruction of the maritimes market for potatoes and codfish?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall have more to say about this matter later, when the opportunity arises.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal to-day with one particular aspect of the budget, more particularly the minister's statement last Friday night bringing the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar. We in this party have emphasized, as have responsible citizens throughout Canada, that the only salvation for our economic future is increased production, particularly primary production. This is the third and to me the most important part of our amendment. To be prosperous the Canadian economy must be at all times an economy of production. Many people, including most economists, consider that the war years, despite the tremendous increase in the funded or per capita debt of the people, nevertheless were a prosperous era. We are now burdened with the service charges for this debt, as well as very greatly expanded social services and commitments, and our debt to our veterans. If we are to meet these obligations we must have an expanding production proportionately greater than that of 1939. We cannot increase our taxation, because it has reached the saturation point now; and it is highly probable that if an attempt were made to increase it, the law of diminishing returns would immediately become effective. We cannot, and it is our sacred duty to see that we do not, meet these obligations with a dollar depreciated in productive power.

I mention the productive dollar rather than the purchasing dollar, Mr. Speaker, because I believe the productive dollar controls the purchasing dollar, and unless you have a high productive dollar the value of your purchasing dollar will fall. By a productive dollar I mean a dollar that can be put to work to build, to create, to bring into being the capital and consumer goods that our purchasing dollars can buy. If we do not have the former, no matter how the rest of our economic structure is secured we face inflation, because of the simple fact that we have created a demand for goods and have not allowed those goods to be produced. There is a spurious belief that an ever-increasing amount of money automatically has inflationary consequences. The idea that increases in our money supply inevitably mean inflation is a legacy of the old-fashioned quantity theory of money. However, because our money supply has increased to somewhere around eighty per cent of our national income, we cannot avoid the very real danger of inflation unless we give that money something to do. There used to be an old saying that the devil finds work for idle hands to do. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, the devil finds work for idle money to do as well. How much higher our production must be to meet our greatly expanded economy can be only conjectured, but I believe it safe to say that unless we can bring about an increase in production of at least from one-third to one-half more than that of 1939, the inflation-deflation cycle is inevitable, which is what booms and depressions really are.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the minister's statement of Friday night, while immediately deflationary since it destroys production, in my opinion is bound to have inflationary consequences. As I am dealing with mining and the employment of money as a means of production, I want the house to look at the immediate result of this policy. The first result, apart from the stock market recession —and this also was instantaneous—is that prospecting for and developing of new properties, particularly gold properties but base metal properties as well, has been sharply curtailed. The flow of money into prospective and projected mines has dwindled and eventually will dry up altogether unless some spectacular find is made, and this in turn becomes more unlikely because of the decrease in prospecting and developing being carried on. Therefore this money will do one of several things. It may be hoarded, and become unproductive. Because of its existence it will increase the demand for goods that are in short supply, and in turn will force up their prices by the very pressure it exerts. In the third place, if this money is American money it will be lost to the development of Canada; and as a pioneer country we can ill afford this.

The next pressure which will be brought to bear on the Canadian economy will be from the employees of mines which are forced to close. A little later I shall show how serious this condition is, particularly in the province of Quebec. To-day's miners will not be able to find other jobs in the mining fields of Canada because the reduction in exchange, even in connection with rich and high grade mines, will destroy from thirty to fifty per cent of the rock which previous to Friday evening was considered ore. Therefore even high grade mines will have to curtail production and leave behind them material which was once a valuable asset to the country. Despite the fact that some of them are high grade mines, they will not be expanding and hiring more men. Even though many mines will continue to operate, there will be no expansion. Naturally, therefore, these miners who will be thrown out of work because of the closing down of their mines will have to seek employment elsewhere. Most of them will return to the cities, increasing the congestion there and pushing the demand for housing and consumer goods even higher. Though this movement will be inflationary at the start it is certain to have a depressive effect in the near future. With the world demand for metals at an unprecedented high we in Canada have chosen this moment to take a step which will cut our production of both base and precious metals. A condition which formerly we considered fortuitous, in that in many instances our base and precious metals were mixed with each other in the same deposit, may now react unfavourably.

The value of our mine exports over an eighteen-year period has been greater than the value of total exports of farm or wood products, and about 71 per cent of our total exports of farm and animal products combined. I mention that fact, Mr. Speaker, to show how vitally important the mining industry as a whole is to Canada. Furthermore it is axiomatic that if we are to become a nation we must have a population that can consume a greater proportion of our secondary production than heretofore. Therefore it is imperative that we have population. Many figures have been given in this connection. The United States bureau of mines and the chamber of commerce of the state of Utah have issued figures which are well known, and they have variously estimated that from ten to twelve people are supported by one man operating in the mines. A committee of this parliament which sat some time ago very conservatively estimated that a married man working in a mine gives employment to 4·6 persons, and that a single man gives employment to one other person. The Canada Year Book gives the figure of 112,000 people employed in the mineral industry, 64,000 of whom were hard rock miners.

So I want to say that any curtailment in this industry has a proportionately greater effect upon the economy of the country, because of what is known as the leverage principle, in that one man's job at the mine creates several men's jobs elsewhere. In Quebec and in the clay belt of northern Ontario mining and agriculture went hand in hand. Colonization followed the mines, and a ready market for all produce of the farms was provided by the mining communities. This pattern is a common one throughout the world, and it may be said that in Australia, the states of Victoria and New South Wales were opened up to a large degree by mines whose pioneer discoveries in the interior of these states brought about the development of an agricultural economy. Many of the mines in these states in Australia have subsequently ceased to exist, but they were in production long enough to allow agriculture to become firmly established. If the mines in northern Quebec, particularly the low-grade properties from Bourlamaque to the Ontario border, are forced to close, the agricultural and colonization efforts will also fail, because they have not yet been established long enough to be self sufficient if the immediate and local market is taken away from them.

Furthermore, because of the rigour of the climate, they cannot live off the land with the ease of residents in the southern states of Australia. Therefore we face an added calamity. Not only do we destroy great mineral resources, but we run the danger of making it impossible to develop our northern agriculture. This in turn will limit our population possibilities with its attendant out-of-balance economic structure.

I now wish to discuss very briefly the use of gold as a monetary metal and an economic stabilizer. What I am going to suggest will I believe answer all those who say that the government is generously buying a metal which is not desired anywhere else, and that the somewhat fantastic procedure of taking gold out of one hole in northern Canada and putting it into another hole at Fort Knox is a useless procedure. Actually it is the desire of the government, and it is particularly the desire of the United States government, to own much of the gold of the world that aborts the proper functioning of gold as an exchange medium. Gold may be worth $35 an ounce, it may be worth more or it may be worth less. But as the government of the United States was not prepared to free gold from its control it was difficult for the true world price of gold to be arrived at. Up to the present time it was reasonable to think that action in establishing of a free market for gold could be taken only by one of the major powers, more particularly the United States. However the drastic action that the Minister of Finance was forced to take last Friday night puts an entirely different face on the matter.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, we are now in a position to act independently. I believe, further, that we must do so. Canada faces an economic crisis of great severity unless the restoration and encouragement of the mining industry can be brought about. Mining, next to agriculture, is Canada's greatest industry. And after this hurt the reaction upon us will obviously be severe. Some people have suggested that an appeal ought to be made for a subsidy, and that the Canadian government should bonus gold to the extent of $3.50 an ounce. This is defeatist talk. I reject it, and I am sure that most gold producers would reject it immediately. What I do ask for, and I plead with the minister to give it serious consideration, is that a free market for gold be established right here in Canada. I make the following suggestions: I want to urge upon the government that in order to save the industry and Canadian economy in general, some immediate steps must be taken. I urge (1) that a free market for gold be established, and that buying and selling of this metal shall be carried on as the buying and selling of any commodity without any restrictions from any government agency whatsoever; (2) that corporations and banks in Canada have the opportunity of purchasing gold and using it as part of their reserves and (3) that any individual or corporation, whether Canadian or foreign, shall have the opportunity to purchase and sell gold on the open market, and furthermore that all restrictions on the import or export of gold shall be immediately withdrawn; (4) that Canadian producers may sell on the free market any precious metal they desire.

The government has gone far to hurt the gold mining industry. No clearer statement of intent could possibly be made than that by the minister the other night. The government cannot have it both ways.

I wish to quote briefly from a statement made by the deputy minister of finance before a parliamentary committee, showing that the government realizes the seriousness of the situation. The question was:

> Exchange rates are very important to the metal industry, particularly to gold mining, because without the ten per cent discount many of our mines, perhaps the majority of them, would be out of business before long.

To this Doctor Clark replied, "That is right". I think it is only fair, if the house will allow me, to give the rest of his statement, because I do not wish to be accused of lifting the text from the substance, as it were. Therefore, with permission, I shall read the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. ILSLEY: What committee was that?

Mr. ADAMSON: The standing committee on natural resources, which sat in another place on May 28 of this year.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is my impression that the hon. member cannot quote from the proceedings of a committee in another place until the committee has made its report.

Mr. ADAMSON: I bow to Your Honour's ruling. I was simply trying to be fair, by giving the whole rather than part of the statement. If that is your ruling, I accept it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, Mr. Speaker, something will have to be done about that. Either the answer will have to be withdrawn from the record, or the explanation added to it. The hon. member has now quoted only part of the report of the senate committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: And he is now willing to bow to Mr. Speaker's ruling.

Mr. ILSLEY: He was stopped from proceeding. However, so long as it is understood that something further was said by the deputy minister, I think we can let it rest at that.

Mr. STIRLING: Would Mr. Speaker be good enough to quote the rule?

Mr. KNOWLES: Standing order 41.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is a well-known rule.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think with leave of the house the hon. member had better finish; otherwise it would be most unfair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The rule is clear that hon. members may not refer to debates in another place, nor may they quote from the proceedings of committees appointed in another place, until the committee has made its report. Likewise hon. members may not quote from the proceedings of a committee appointed by this house, until such time as the committee has reported.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that the hon. member proceed with his speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member is continuing to quote from the report of the proceedings of such committee it must be with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not think that he was.

Mr. ADAMSON: No, I am not quoting from the unmentionable place. Credit me, however, with trying to be fair. I merely wanted to record my contention. The government cannot have it both ways. It cannot deliberately restrict by price control the price of any commodity and set that price so low that it is impossible for the basic producers to produce the commodity. Gold is the supreme hedge against inflation. If the government is genuine and sincere in this fear of inflation it will realize that the possession of gold by the citizens of the country is a great safeguard against runaway inflation and its attendant evils.

It is obvious that the government has little interest in gold. The effect of the order will be to close low grade operating mines in Canada and gradually to strangle the entire gold mining industry. As proof of this statement I want to quote figures which show the cost of producing an ounce of gold in 1944 in Quebec and Ontario respectively. In Quebec the cost was $34.72 an ounce and in Ontario it was $30.95, leaving a profit of $3.78 and $7.20 an ounce respectively after mint charges. Those were the figures for 1944. In 1945 and again in 1946 the costs of mining rose considerably so that both figures, $3.78 and $7.20, would be materially reduced.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the source or authority for those figures?

Mr. ADAMSON: The Quebec department of mines and the Ontario Mining Association. Even if this were not so, the loss of ten per cent exchange reduces the profits per ounce to $0.28 and $3.70 respectively. It is obvious that the entire Quebec gold mining industry must come to a quick end, and only a few of the richest mines in Ontario will be able to operate for any length of time. This lethal shock to the entire Canadian economy is one from which it is doubtful we can recover. Mining is now the second largest industry in Canada, and gold mining represents approximately one-third of the total output.

That is not all. Our base metal position is also in a precarious condition. Our internal prices of copper, lead and zinc are 11·55 cents a pound, 5 cents a pound and 5·75 cents a pound as compared with the United States prices of 15·8 cents per pound, 9·07 cents per pound and 10·17 cents per pound respectively, and those of the United Kingdom government of 14·24, 8·90 and 8·05 cents per pound respectively. I quote these to show the unfavourable position of our base metal mines. If Canada is to continue as a major producer of base metals, her mines must be allowed to receive the world prices for the metals produced.

If the gold mining industry is to be saved, further immediate steps will have to be taken. There are three steps which I believe should be taken. First, there should be a return to a fifty per cent depletion allowance to both mines and shareholders. Second, we should exempt all new mines for three years. Third, we should wipe out the excess profits tax on all mining.

The first two suggestions were part of the recommendations made by the Ontario and Quebec mining associations to that unmentionable place. I repeat that unless these steps are taken immediately the effect on the industry will be progressively severe. Other countries have let their mining industry go in a way almost identical to that which the minister has been forced to follow at the present time, and it took them decades, even generations, to bring it back on its feet, and in several instances it has never recovered. Truly this is a case of killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. However, the more permanent damage will be to kill development of metal deposits. Initiative will be destroyed, and once destroyed will not easily return. Therefore will vanish all the hopes and all the dreams we once had of developing the north country, of having a great population and providing a cure for any coming depression and its consequent unemployment. It may be said that at one stroke the government has hit initiative and blasted the hopes so fondly held of Canada becoming a great industrial nation. Surely this is an awful price to pay for fear of inflationary reaction within the United States.

Some years ago Australia in a moment of socialist extremity imposed taxation on mining which destroyed her industry. The result was that the economy of Australia was paralysed and her credit during the depression years was virtually non-existent. She had to take drastic steps to get the mining industry back on its feet, and for many years—I believe this is still the case—imposed no taxation whatever on metal mining and was actually forced to pay bonuses to people to get them interested in the discovery and development of mines. I am no prophet of doom, but I do say this to the government: Unless these regulations are amended in the way I have suggested it will not be many years before we in Canada may be bonusing people to return to the ghost towns of northern Ontario and Quebec.

I come now to another question that the house may like to ask: Why is this reduction so serious? At the present time mines in Quebec are making a profit per ton of ore of 62 cents. The gross value of the ore put through the mills of the average Quebec gold producer is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $6.20. Ten per cent of $6.20 is 62 cents per ton, which is the profit the mines are making at the present time. That goes to show how serious this reduction is to the mines.

It may be said that the mines produced gold when gold was worth only $20.67 per ounce. It is true they did, but only the richer mines were able to produce at that time. Costs were extremely low; wages were less than half of what they are to-day; the cost of supplies was less than half, and taxes were negligible compared with what they are now. Furthermore, the increased price of gold has brought into being many northern communities, which are now dependent on development of low grade deposits.

The next question the house may like to ask is: Why is the situation so immediately serious? I have referred to the destruction of profit. As a matter of fact, mines will immediately begin to be operating in the red. Because these mines have been unable to build up surpluses they will shortly come to the end of their resources and it will not be long before what capital they have to tide them over a bad period will be exhausted. When it goes, it goes quickly in a mine, because it costs a lot of money to operate a mining property.

The house may ask: How would an open market operate? I do not suggest that it would be necessary for Canada to follow the South African policy and have a refinery as they have in Johannesburg. I believe that the mint could produce, as it does now, ingots of any desired size and marketability. I believe that the operation of a free market in gold could be conducted similarly to the operation of almost every other commodity exchange. I believe many of our firms will find that the possession of gold as a part of their reserves is a great asset in carrying on trade throughout the world. Insurance companies, banks, and large oil companies will probably find the use of gold very helpful not only as a reserve but as a means of acquiring foreign exchange and concessions. There is also the factor that there are many people not living in Canada who will wish to purchase gold as a hedge against inflation within their own country.

I come to the final question which the house may ask, and it is this: Can gold stand on its own feet? Here is the final question that must be decided, and it can only be decided by the march of trade. If gold is not worth anything, it should not be produced. But if gold is worth anything, it should receive the world price, and not be restricted. That is the question, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that question can be resolved only through a large open market. There have been stories of the market in Bombay and the market in Alexandria and of very high prices, $70, $90 and probably even more being paid for gold. We are not sure how large those markets were, or whether they were constant, and what the daily volume was of those markets dealing in precious metals.

The whole basis of the Bretton Woods agreement is the value of the various currencies. Under that agreement several countries undertook not to devaluate their currencies. But the actual value in terms of gold of any of these currencies has yet to be decided. In my opinion there is only one way in which the value of these currencies can be adequately determined, and that is by trading those currencies in a free market against gold. The currency is what it is worth in terms of the supreme trading blue chip, and that is gold. That has been the history since the gold standard came into effect. Gold was traded freely on the London market, and it had become fairly stable over a period of years. When the authorities of that day undertook to put the pound sterling on a gold basis they merely took the day's market quotation for the metal. I do not believe we can arrive at any parity of exchange for gold for a long, long time. I do think that unless we allow the market to be free we are never likely by artificial means to have a true yardstick of the actual values of world currencies.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, although Canada has covered herself with glory, she is suffering from deep wounds as a result of the war. Our country, proud of her heroes, hails them and strews their path with the flowers of her everlasting gratitude. War prisoners, infantry troops, sailors or airmen—they exemplify the stamina and the fighting strength of a young and vigorous nation.

However, our joy is tempered with sadness when we think of those who have gloriously fallen on the fighting lines and when we remember the great wounds which the conflict has inflicted on the nation.

We are going through a period of joy and sadness, hope and regret, post-war worries and planning for the future. We are entering the struggle for a new life.

During the war the needs of our three armed services, as well as those of the devastated allied countries, of some occupied territories and of the essential industries of this country have considerably extended our markets both at home and abroad. The steamship lines and the railroads have reached a pitch of activity that has hitherto been unknown. Our production has increased to a remarkable extent. It is now up to us to maintain our economic power at a high level.

In order to attain that goal we must join our efforts without any partisanship but inspired by the purest Canadian spirit. If there are people who would prefer to play politics, they will be sternly called to account by the people of this country.

Our attention must first go to agriculture which, to my mind, is Canada's basic industry. Besides, history shows that from the point of view of their everyday needs successive generations have always turned to agriculture in fulfilment of their normal destiny. To that, let us add the development of our other natural resources. With the advance of science and the growing needs of the nations, the other industries have taken on a necessary and considerable expansion, but this cannot change mankind's destiny, which is to obtain its daily bread from the soil where the Almighty has caused it to grow.

May I be permitted to pay a grateful tribute to our settlers and farmers, whose heroism is on a par with that shown by the warriors of all times? Their bravery is daily renewed in the discharge of toilsome and oppressive tasks. Soldier heroes may achieve glory by a single feat of arms, but our pioneers of the soil achieve their country's glory by assuring its greatness and prosperity by a lifetime of toil and sacrifice. As farmer's son, I take pride in my origin and take this opportunity of paying homage in this house to the memory of my father, for the valuable lessons taught me by his humble and arduous life as a tiller of the soil.

One of my fondest wishes, therefore, is that agriculture in my country should prosper. As I have already mentioned in this house, my constituency has two choice institutions for the development of agricultural science: the agricultural high school and the experimental station of Ste. Anne de la Pocatière.

During the war, certain public men claimed that these experimental stations were not essential industries, and urged that they be closed down. To my mind, this course would have been quite ill-advised. When a people's life is at stake is hardly the best time in which to cut down its facilities for production and supply. All the more, therefore, can we now appreciate the government's wisdom in keeping these farms in operation.

True, their budgets were curtailed during the war. But now that hostilities are over, could the government not increase its subsidies to those important institutions, particularly the one at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière? This investment would bring dividends to the whole country by placing our agriculture on a more modern and scientific basis.

In this connection, may I be allowed to suggest an improvement? There seems to be some anomaly in the management of the Ste. Anne farm and, I understand, in that of all experimental farms in Canada. The superintendent, a government official, is in the same position as the manager of a private concern. Out of the funds at his disposal he has to meet all expenses, including employees' wages, with the exception of salaries paid to the office staff and department heads. Well-meaning as he unquestionably is, he cannot escape a certain amount of misunderstanding with his employees. Whenever the latter have grievances over wages it is only natural that they should hold the superintendent responsible. In fact, the latter is torn between the obligation to pay fair wages and the no less reasonable obligation to economize and indeed to show a surplus. And there lies the source of many difficulties.

In all fairness to the superintendent and the employees, it would seem necessary that a substantial budget be voted for all farm expenditures, with the exception of wages. These should all be paid by the government directly on a higher classification and wage scale, consistent with regulations provided for various trades in each province. Present wages are inadequate and the classification of trades is an imperative necessity.

I might add that these farms are operated by qualified men, whose experience is deeply appreciated. It would seem just to raise the officials' salaries as well as the employees' pay.

In my view, scientists and technicians are bound to play in agriculture the same part as in war industry. Through their research, experiments and wise counselling, the farmers of Canada will attain first rank in the agricultural world of to-morrow.

In anticipation of this rebirth of agriculture, may I suggest that the government place at the farmers' disposal all obsolete war equipment suitable for farm work. Tractors, trucks, bull-dozers, steam shovels and other machinery used in war time might thus serve to improve our production. This material could also be employed in draining flatlands where new parishes would develop and absorb large numbers of our young people.

The government might in the near future go one step farther and, in conjunction with provincial legislatures, subsidize the drainage and rehabilitation of our farms.

By contributing financially to the setting up of public markets, not only in great cities but in rural centres, as Rivière du Loup and other towns of the same size, we could help to stabilize prices in country areas and particularly in my own riding of Kamouraska. Any measure aiming to stabilize prices permanently is preferable no doubt to special and temporary grants.

The last session opened with a long debate on wheat, a commodity which is highly prized in our country because of its value as an export and as food for our own people. But we must not forget the rest of our produce. In my riding some farmers grow wheat for domestic consumption, but dairy production is the main industry.

"The nation can make no better investment than in milk for its children", said Mr. Winston Churchill during the recent war. Thousands of children from devastated countries and particularly from France and England beg us to relieve their hardship and to save their lives. It is our duty, as descendants of these two great races, to meet that appeal.

During the war, we stoutly assisted Great Britain while she was heroically resisting the aggressor. At that time, however, we were unable to lend a helping hand to France, the mother country of a large section of this dominion. This nation which was credited with so many resounding victories through the ages suffered the most brutal and most humiliating defeat. Trodden down by the oppressor, France deplored her ills in silence, awaiting the hour of liberation. This long hoped for liberation, expected with so much anxiety, must have cost a great deal of devastation and suffering as well as many lives. To-day France rises anew and asks Canada to supply her with milk that she may save the lives of her children, rendered anaemic by hardship.

In the dairy industry, our country is a great producer, but it can increase its output. In 1943-44, Canada produced more than 8,000,000 tons of milk, distributed as follows: 1,678,000 tons of fluid milk, 776,000 tons consumed on the farm, 354,000 tons fed to animals, 4,533,740 tons used in the production of butter and cheese, 275,740 tons processed into condensed, evaporated or powdered milk.

There is no doubt that the output of powdered milk can be largely increased. Aside from whole milk, skim milk, with its high nutritional value, can also be powdered; in that form it will be greatly appreciated by starving countries. May I suggest that the government and particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) promote the dairy industry by every means in their power. The numerous farms in operation can boost to a greater extent our production of milk.

But there is another angle to consider. Numerous farms already under cultivation, which had shown good yields, are now abandoned. In the province of Quebec, alone, there are at least 5,000 such farms. It is also estimated that approximately thirty million acres of arable land in northern Abitibi, in the province of Ontario, could be brought into production. Must I mention the possibilities offered in New Brunswick, in the way of land clearing and settlement? In that part of Quebec known as the lower St. Lawrence and around Chicoutimi and in many other regions near the elder settlements, there are at least one million acres of uncleared land, which could be subdivided into no less than ten thousand farming establishments. Do I have to mention that, according to experts, the districts of Abitibi and Temiskaming hold 15,760,000 acres of tillable land, which represent at least 100,000 farming establishments, or 500 parishes of 200 families each?

We are now faced with the problem of reconstruction. Our war industries are being reconverted to civilian production rapidly enough, but industry alone cannot survive unless we encourage in every way the production of agricultural commodities. Development of agriculture is the answer to unemployment. By increasing production on land already under cultivation and by encouraging the bringing into cultivation of those millions of acres which have never been cleared, we could easily create work for everyone. Those who are employed on farms can earn their own living, as well as that of their families, without becoming public charges. Besides, they can thus bring about a greater industrial development and are in a position to supply the needs of our urban population. We would thus help our trade, by marketing at home part of that production which must otherwise be exported. There would still be jurisdictional difficulties, as between the federal and provincial governments; but I am inclined to believe that, in a matter of such importance, a suitable plan could be worked out to facilitate our country's normal development along the path intended by Divine Providence.

We are an agricultural country and I believe we must encourage agriculture in every possible way. The greater the number of veterans, farmers' sons and men of good will set up on farming establishments, the better stabilized will be our national economy. In war time it is a guarantee of survival and in peace time a guarantee of progress.

May I point out that it is not necessary to bring in immigrants in large numbers from other countries in order to develop our arable lands? If agriculture is given more encouragement and if prices of farm products are maintained at a high level, that is, in keeping with wages and prices of manufactured products, I am firmly convinced that most of our young men will be happy to live peacefully on farms which they will clear themselves or which they will improve with their own hands.

It is absolutely necessary to employ Canadians rather than foreigners. Further, in most European countries there is a tremendous amount of reconstruction work to be done. In England and in France, it seems obvious that every able-bodied individual is needed to restore the economic stability of those countries. It does not behoove us to request much outside help. It is preferable to see that every able-bodied man is given employment, first on farms, and then in some of the industries which have been set up in Canada and which have developed tremendously since the beginning of the war.

In the Canadian scheme of things there is room for the scientific and progressive development of agriculture and for the normal advancement of related and other industries which may help the consumption of our products and the development of our export trade.

If I have supported the agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada, it is because I was convinced that it would help to maintain prices of agricultural products and the economic stability of our country. Indeed, it was difficult at the end of the recent war to maintain our exports and retain our foreign markets without making some kind of contribution, but we must not depend only on such a scheme. If prices of agricultural products should fall off, a depression would certainly follow. We would then witness the exodus of farmers to the cities, a decrease in agricultural production, a curtailment of industrial activities and, finally, unemployment. That is the problem which must be faced.

It must be admitted that the government has endeavoured to restore quickly our peacetime economy, but I humbly suggest that we should continue to guarantee stable prices for agricultural products and to encourage our young people to settle on farms.

Indeed, family allowances are a great help to farmers in looking after the needs, the education and the training of their families. The amounts paid to them bring about a greater increase of wealth on the farms than in the cities. It is true, no doubt, that the children of workers benefit from this important grant, but the sums handed to farmers' children contribute to a higher agricultural production, to a more careful education and to a special vocational guidance for these children. It is to be hoped that these family allowances may enhance the scientific development of agriculture and that our future farmers may thereby become known as the best in the world. Given the proper development of farming methods and the stabilization of industry, our country will be assured of a foremost part in future world activities.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to make to the hon. members of this house a special plea for Canadian unity. It is now more timely than ever to avoid deluding ourselves and being carried away by mere words. If we love our country, if we wish greatness and unity for it, we must put aside all racial and religious prejudices, all differences originating in local difficulties, avoid all sectional rivalries, so that we may think, act and speak as Canadians should. Do you not believe that were a part of this country to refuse to recognize the rights and opinions of other parts, an impassable barrier for our descendants would thereby be erected which would create chaotic conditions for our children? The sole material object of our lives is to prepare the future of our descendants. To a certain extent the French-speaking members of the house have expressed a strong wish to promote a truly Canadian feeling in this country. They all endeavour to speak both official languages. We acknowledge the right of each and every one to entertain personal views, but we deny them the privilege of refusing the same freedom to those who speak our tongue.

I do not claim that certain hon. members are devoid of Canadian spirit and feeling. On the contrary. I believe each one of us is anxious to develop our country and to create a national idea. Then, once and for all, let us place our cards on the table; let us be straightforward and put away from our minds the thought that when someone presents a measure for changing the name of a holiday or for designing a distinct national flag, he does it with the purpose of changing the constitution. We wish to live as Canadians, under Canadian statutes and a Canadian flag, in a united and peaceful Canada.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, the taxation levied upon cooperatives by this budget is an unfortunate move. Nothing was neglected by religious and civil authorities when the problem came up of promoting cooperation in all domains, and especially in the agricultural domain. But, when preparing this budget, did we pay any attention to the substantial subsidies granted to cooperatives by the provinces? Is the government forgetting the devotion of our religious authorities toward the fruitful work of cooperatives? We should not give in to evil influences whose object is only the interests of a few instead of those of the whole nation. Profiteering capitalism will not retreat in front of anything. It will even walk over the corpse of our cooperatives in order to attain its selfish interests. The taxation upon cooperatives built up by the sacrifices of the poor and humble is the worst item of this budget.

The government received innumerable protests against this tax. Every member of this house was warned beforehand. I addressed personally to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) several resolutions from cooperatives in my riding and my province, protesting against this tax. Consequently it is with regret that I realize that the government seems to ignore the expression of public opinion based this time upon simple common sense. I beg that it amend the budget resolutions before it is too late. Let the government exempt cooperatives from income tax. Let it not destroy by a stroke of the pen an economy built up after thirty years of sacrifices, devotion and unselfishness. Instead of imposing a tax upon cooperatives, the government should revive subsidies to agricultural county fairs, which were suspended during the war. It would thus foster the breeding of pure bred cattle and the improvement of our much needed dairy industry. On the contrary, on the one hand, agricultural cooperatives are taxed, and, on the other, agricultural fairs are deprived of class B subsidies which are necessary to their survival. The government is all the more stingy when it has no reason to be so, in the same proportion that it is prodigal toward foreign countries.

In 1939, it cost the government $97,000 to subsidize our agricultural county fairs in the province of Quebec. Others are given or lent billions of dollars without interest, but the sum of $97,000 is refused agriculture whose contribution was so great to the victory of our armies. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, how odious such a policy is? It is never too late to render justice. Let the government revive former grants to our agricultural societies, and relieve our cooperatives from paying income tax. It will then fulfil its duty toward agriculture which was our first line of defence during the war, and which remains our wealth and our strength.

My colleague, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) has on the order paper a resolution asking that irrigation works be executed in the Mille-Iles river. It is with great pleasure that I second this project of my hon. friend. We both represent, in this house, a district where tourists are numerous. Providence has bestowed upon our ridings all the beauties of a majestic nature. Therefore, in view of the public interest, I recommend that the project of my hon. colleague for Terrebonne be put into execution.

On several instances, I have asked for an amnesty in favour of our young men who did not comply with the mobilization act. I am still asking for this amnesty. Why always contemplate punishment? The time has come to forgive these young people. Real justice, like real peace, cannot arise out of hatred and punishment. Above human justice, there is a great commandment which was preached almost two thousand years ago by the Dispenser of justice and peace. This commandment is the commandment of love and charity. Canada did not fight for anything else. The war aims of the united nations were founded on a doctrine of peace, love and charity. Let us not deceive ourselves. Let us grant a general amnesty to our young men.

There is a more frightful danger than the attitude of those who avoided the mobilization act. This danger is within our walls. It is ready to explode simultaneously in a hundred different places. It is communism. How many times in this house did I not denounce this atheistic doctrine? Instead of putting a stop to this communist wave, the government acts as if this doctrine suited its aims. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has just offered its facilties to the Labour Progressive party whose recognized chief is Tim Buck.

Is there now a sole Labour Progressive member in this house? The only representative of that party is no more sitting in parliament, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, instead of granting broadcasts to representatives of the people, whoever they be, gives its facilities to Moscow and its gang of spies. How edifying this is! The first duty of the government which is controlling the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is to notify this servile instrument of propaganda that it should deal in all fairness with every member of this house.

In a Christian country, is it befitting to allow the atheistic and revolutionary Labour Progressive party to diffuse its nefarious doctrine among a nation which needs all its moral strength to overcome the difficult times we are experiencing? The government is breeding a monster which sooner or later will devour it. Let it beware of the hammer and sickle. The Jewish-Masonic gang can effect the worst interventions in Canada, and can carry them very far. The government should not listen with sympathy to promoters of immigration recruited among the emissaries of powerful transportation companies, which are only seeking their selfish interests. There is no room in this country for even one immigrant. A great number of war veterans are still unemployed. There is a housing scarcity. Our whole economic structure was shaken by the war. We have an urgent duty toward Canada, and toward Canada only. To reestablish our national economy, reorganize our finances, pay our debts and give to the nation an example of honesty and thrift. this is the very common sense based upon the most elementary equity and justice.

Before closing, I wish to remind the government of its duties toward the provinces. It cannot avoid them without incurring the most serious difficulties. Let the government hand back to the provinces, in their entirety, all the rights which are guaranteed to them by the constitution. This is no time for arrangements. It is time for action. If such an injustice must persist, the nation will see to it, sooner than we think, that right triumphs over strength and unfairness. This is going too far. Let us hand back to the provinces the complete range of their jurisdiction, which short-sighted politicians have abandoned to the central government. If the government aims at the termination of confederation, let it continue along the line of its mostly unfair attitude toward the provinces.

Finally, I am looking forward to the day when Canada, like the Philippines, will be able to proclaim its independence and cease to follow in London's wake. Like all true Canadians, I sincerely wish that we may live in a free and independent country, and that a distinctive flag, with no signs of colonialism, may unfurl over this magnificent and immense country, the only country we have covered with glory, ennobled and uplifted by the supreme sacrifice of those who fell overseas under the guns of the enemy for the triumph of freedom, justice and right. Then, and then only, shall we see the real sovereignty and the real valour of Canada. And we shall cherish but one ideal, the most noble and most worthy—independence. A shield of glory will assert the freedom, independence and sovereignty of our nation. Canada needs this freedom for the huge task of restoration which requires all its efforts. This sovereignty must emerge with complete clarity, distinction and brightness beneath a flag which will be a distinctive symbol of rallying around an essentially Canadian policy. It is in this broad, immense and enlightened horizon that I foresee and call for the freedom and independence of my country.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, in looking about for a particular subject upon which I might speak in the budget debate, I came across a paragraph from something written by the pen of Ellen Wilkinson, minister of education in the British government. She says that her aim is to make the schools provided by the state so good and so varied that it will just seem an absurd thing not to send children to them. Then I received a letter from an address in Canada which reads:

> I am the teacher of a rural school in a small fishing village. This school is built by the side of the public road, and as the land surrounding it is privately owned, the children have no playground. The desks on which the children must sit day after day are old, shabby and uncomfortable.

I could go on with that letter, but it ends with an appeal to the various citizens of this country to come to the rescue of the little children in that school district.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where was it from?

Mr. KNIGHT: Nova Scotia. Then I come to this sentence:

> There is no point in education if it does not give youth a desire for a better life.

So I have my text. I have no apologies to make for speaking on education. I know this is a subject which is somewhat shunned in this house. We feel that it is so much and so particularly the prerogative of the provinces that we are almost afraid to introduce it here. I think that is a mistaken idea. Speaking on the subject of federal aid to education during the debate, I think last May, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) made such a lucid and constructive exposition of the subject and covered the ground so thoroughly, that I was not much disappointed when the procedure of the house precluded my taking part in the debate although I had intended to do so.

The fact that the dominion-provincial conference has failed, or, if that language is too pessimistic, the fact that it is in a state of suspended decision makes it even more imperative that the dominion government should come to the assistance of the provinces in this matter of education. May I assure my hon. friends, with whom this is a debatable point, that I am not suggesting that there should be any form of interference with provincial autonomy with respect to education but rather a standing by of the provinces on the part of the dominion with moral support which would lend weight to the importance of education as an essential part of the national life, and financial support which would ensure to the people of each and every province some equality in the matter of educational opportunities.

There are those who have said that the acceptance of federal grants would be a surrender of provincial freedom, but that is not necessarily so. The federal government is already in the field of education in the matter of grants in aid of technical education, without the loss, so far as I know, of the freedom of anyone. The acceptance of family allowances has enslaved no one. The provision of federal support for education could become an agency for the promotion of national unity. A new national interest in education could be an instrument for national unity, just as education in a broader sense could be used to promote mutual understanding among the people of the world and, with its ultimate aim of international peace, could shine into and dispel dark ignorance, the gloomy breeding ground of suspicion, of hate and of war.

One way in which the dominion government could aid education without objection from anyone would be to provide direct financial assistance to certain brilliant scholars unable to finance their own university courses, thus ensuring that Canada as a whole would have the benefit of their trained minds. Britain's labour government is giving the lead in that connection. Basil Dean in the Ottawa Citizen of May 20 says that scholarship winning students in Britain whose parents earn $2,600 a year or less will get full maintenance grants, so that it will not cost the parents one cent for their children's university education. In future, no promising student in Britain will be deprived, by lack of means, of the opportunity for a full university course of study. This is a type of investment which we might well emulate.

Leaving my listeners to study further in the speech of my colleague the matter of federal aid, I shall advance some ideas: first, on the meaning of education; second, on the place of the educator in a world of social change and, third, on a special organization for education which we might well encourage for the national and international good.

Many and diverse are the definitions of education that have been advanced and great are the differences of opinion in regard thereto. I shall only define it indirectly as I develop my idea. Perhaps I shall define it negatively, as to what it is not, rather than positively, as to what it is. Hon. members would be astonished at some of the misconceptions held and the theories advanced. For example, we find that one hon. member of this house has said:

> I suggest that we do not always educate our men and women for the callings for which they are best fitted.

And again:

> This nation cannot afford to waste many of those people by educating men and women for the wrong jobs.

Here is a conception or misconception held by some, but surely one would expect more in a speech on education from a public man in this house. It is a question, of course, of the difference between education and training. The terms are not synonymous. Might I suggest to hon. members generally, and to the hon member whom I have quoted in particular, that education is not necessarily the fitting of a man for a job. Education is a thing of the mind and spirit; its purpose is the creation of a personality, the acquirement on the part of the individual of a broad culture, the creation of a being with a proper sense of values and with the mental equipment for a full and happy life.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. member suggest for one second that as much is being done in the old country by way of university training for veterans and ex-service men as is being done in Canada?

Mr. KNIGHT: I did not make any such statement. I said not a word about veterans. The minister seems to be a little touchy on the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are miles ahead of them.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not think the minister needs any defence for his scheme, and if I were in his place I would not say so. Nothing used to make me so angry during my teaching years as to have a parent say to me, "But my Willie doesn't need French or literature," or whatever subject he had failed in, "you know he's just going back to the farm"; or "Mary is going to be a dressmaker; why should she read all these books?" Well, now, we have come to the argument of the hon. gentleman. One should say to such people: "Let Willie be a farmer; we hope he will be a good farmer—it is a fine profession; it will provide food for his body, but why should we on that account starve his soul? If he is to work with his hands, if Mary is to work at what may be a monotonous job, all the more reason why their minds should be stored with some of the great thoughts of literature. All the more reason that they should have at hand the greatest thoughts of the greatest men of all the ages, and what is important, some power to interpret them." I am going to pass over the statement of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), who, speaking of his Ontario constituency, said: "We do not need education." It is refreshing to read elsewhere the words of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He said more in a breath than the author of the speech I quoted said in forty minutes. He said:

> A man appreciates being on a farm just a little bit more if he has had the opportunity to get a university education. That should not prevent a man from working with his hands if he has the right kind of stuff in him.

Good! Hear, hear! Education, in the sense I understand it, is not wasted on anyone, no matter what his occupation is to be.

I am not opposed to vocational training or to the teaching of skills; far from it. But let me say this. Let us beware of going too far with this evident trend in utilitarian education. It has been intensified during the war. It is the craze of the machine age.

Knowledge does not necessarily give wisdom, and our science is on the way to destroy us, and will destroy us, if we have not with it the sense of proportion and of values which only true education can bring. Let us beware lest our educational system, in its worship of material things, may gain the whole world and lose its own soul. We must be realistic, you say. Exactly. "Education has now to take on new and terrible responsibilities," President Truman of the United States said the other day. Realism, yes, but the only true realism is idealism; without it civilization cannot survive.

So much for what education is. Now as to the need of it and the teacher's place in it. Harried as we are by the day-to-day call for solution of imminent and immediate national problems, we have been inclined to neglect, federally, the importance of education in a changing social order; and as I speak I am thinking of the world situation, as well as of our national situation here in Canada. In the face of present-day speed and progress, surely there is need for haste in instituting long-range plans for sharing with all peoples collectively the scientific and cultural heritage of all peoples individually. Cannot education be made to play a vital part in the building of the peace? May it not, free and universal, form a basis of mutual understanding and respect?

That change in the social order is continual and inevitable is acknowledged even by those who wish to apply the brakes to the vehicle of progress, even as it is by those of us who would fain grease the wheels of that same vehicle. Let us first accept that fact, then try to discover how education, and what education, can make this progress smooth and beneficial. Let us learn how best to contribute in the things of the mind and spirit to the welfare and culture of others, how best to absorb what they have to offer in the same sphere; a process which should be as effective between province and province in our own country, between nation and nation in the community of the world, as it is amongst individuals. Indeed, I think it will be proven by experience that the sharing of knowledge, of scientific invention, and a common interest in the arts, and the use of the universal language of music can be aids in the preservation of world peace.

If one accepts the inevitability of social change, then one must also accept as inevitable the necessity of an emphasis on the teaching of the social sciences. The teaching of the social sciences involves more than merely a recitation of social facts; it involves some attempt at interpretation thereof, and that puts the educator into the role of a leader in social progress, rather than that of a mere instrument for the defence of things as they are.

It is unfortunate that the educator has perhaps too easily accepted the latter role, has accommodated himself to the environment and society with which he finds himself encompassed, and so has been pushed into the position of passivity, and is not at all the dynamic force in the shaping of events that he ought to be. He has found out that in his position life is more easy and placid if one does not too vehemently assert his rights of citizenship, and so he yields sometimes to the temptation to follow the paths of least resistance. In proportion as he does so, to that degree he loses the respect of those who look to him for leadership.

I have always protested the circumstances which produce such a retreat from reality. I am not saying to teachers that they should indoctrinate or indulge in propaganda, but I could remind them, too, that by passivity and acquiescence they are already propagandists for the status quo. They are apparently generally so accepted, for when they do even mildly step out of that role, they are immediately rebuked and told that they should stick to the intricacies of algebra or of the transitive verb, or they are accused of indoctrination or of being agitators or communists—and in that connection I deplore the recent comments made upon the educational institutions of this country by the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low).

He would no doubt agree with the following statement by the deputy leader of the Conservative party in the house, who said:

> One of the things that this country must do is to see that the seats of learning, whether they be higher or lower, are purged—

A good word!

> —of any teachers who may be found to have undemocratic ideals, whether they are purveying them to the pupils or not.

He does not define "undemocratic", nor does he say who is to do the purging. And so we are now to dictate to the teachers not only what they shall teach, but what they shall think! That word "purge" does not somehow go well with a passion for democracy. It reminds me too vividly of certain historic events which took place prior to the war in two countries which have for some time not been considered as good examples of the democratic state. I am glad, however, that the hon. member realizes his own limitations. He referred to his own speech, and quite rightly, I think, as a group of rambling remarks and expected criticism in regard to it. Well, let me tell the hon. gentleman that the German teachers, suitably muzzled as to democracy and indoctrinated as to nazism, were the key group in the plans of Hitler in the building up of his tyranny.

But to return to my remark that education can play a vital part in the building of a peaceful world, I want to ask for both government and public support for the united nations educational scientific and cultural organization, which was set up in London in the closing months of last year.

The term "federal aid to education" can have a practical application in connection with this institution. It will need an ample budget, may I say, and the government can help there. Education as an instrument of peace must be universal. It is vain for one country to educate its youth for peace, whilst, all around, its borders are bristling with the guns of those who cry for war. Our aim should be to acquire the means to teach a minimum programme of peace in every schoolroom in the world.

The organization of which I spoke, commonly known as UNESCO, was planned at San Francisco in the spring of 1945, when the nations pledged themselves to promote international cultural and educational cooperation. A conference was held in London in November, 1945, attended by representatives of forty-four of the united nations, including Canada. A constitution was agreed upon, and the first conference to be held under it was planned to take place in this summer of 1946.

The declaration setting up the organization set forth the following as its purpose:

To contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law, and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the charter of the united nations.

Article VII recommends that within each signatory nation there shall be set up a national commission to act in an advisory capacity to their respective delegations, and to act as agencies of liaison between their respective governments and the main body of the organization.

To-day I am appealing to the government and to the country for support for this international organization, and for thoughtful consideration in the setting up of the proposed national organization or commission in Canada. While asking for action and leadership in this regard, I realize that this is a matter in which it is perhaps necessary to hasten slowly, for since it deals partly with education, it is dealing with a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces. The commission should be established, then, with the support of the provincial governments and all national bodies interested in education, science and culture generally.

This may take some time, and so I urge upon the government some immediate action by way of a beginning. In this field there is no minister, no government department to give a lead; some leadership should be arranged forthwith. The national commission should be set up at once as a consultative and advisory body. Such a body might have the following purposes:

(1) To assemble representatives of the intellectual and cultural life of the nation, those who pursue it professionally and those who enjoy its fruits, and are organized to serve its interests.

[Mr. Knight.]

(2) To provide a national group in which the intellectual and cultural resources of Canada may be expanded and fortified by the mutual exchange of views and experience.

(3) To provide a national body through which the government may keep in constant touch with the ideas, wishes and activities of those directly interested in the education, science and culture of Canada.

(4) To provide, through the government, a link between this aspect of Canadian national life and UNESCO, the international body of which the country is a member.

As for the personnel of such a commission, its membership should be drawn from all the provinces and from organizations in the educational, scientific, and cultural fields. It should meet in widely separated parts of the country. It could thus in its own right become a powerful instrument for national unity.

One thing on the educational side of the organization I would particularly urge upon the federal government. The educational organizations of this country are vitally interested in the success of this organization. The organized teachers of the country are vitally concerned in it. I was informed, in reply to a question I put on the order paper some time ago, that the Canadian teachers' federation have already advised the government in this matter, have asked for representation on the proposed national commission and on the Canadian delegation to the main conference itself, and have even suggested names of those who, they consider, would represent them suitably. Organized teachers are entitled to such representation; I urge it upon the government with all the earnestness at my command. I would urge the government to keep in touch in this whole matter with such fine organizations as the Canadian teachers' federation and the Canada and Newfoundland education association.

UNESCO is vitally important. Let us support it wholeheartedly. In appealing for federal aid to education in this particular and special sense, I think that I can do no better than quote the words of that fine scholar Doctor R. C. Wallace, president of Queen's university, who was one of the Canadian delegates at the preparatory conference of UNESCO last year. I find them in the International Journal (winter number 1945-46) published by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. Doctor Wallace there maintains that the great nations can secure peace for a generation by the use of power, and that during that time this organization of UNESCO can be laying the foundations on which permanent peace and security will be built. He says:

What then is the purpose which has inspired this movement? It can be put in a few words. It is in the minds of men that wars begin. It is in the minds of men that understanding must be created, sympathy inculcated, cooperation established. That can only be done if education is universally shared, knowledge made common property, scientific progress available to all, the fine arts an open book to the whole world. By interchange of scholars and teachers, by translation and publication, by all the means of mass education, by books, by word of mouth, by national and international organizations, the fruits of the mind and the spirit must become the common property not of the intellectuals only, but of men and women everywhere.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is a thing worthy of the most generous support of the Canadian government.

I have endeavoured to enlist the support of the members of this house and of this government for federal aid to education. I have defined briefly education as I see it, both as to its effect on the individual, and as a potential instrument of human understanding and international peace. I have outlined the plans of the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization for making that instrument effective. I have quoted the words of a great head of a great university, a university I think of as peculiarly my own. Let me conclude with the statement of another, the president of the university in my own home city, speaking upon the necessity of the world being as one in the matter of education. He has said well the things that I fain would say. President J. S. Thomson of the university of Saskatchewan, speaking the other day upon the actuality of world community, said that it was a bright spot of our time that never in history was such a great interest taken in education. He believed that the idea of the world community should enter all departments of education; that the theme of our history should be the story of mankind. He said that music should be taught as the international language which interprets the feelings and thoughts of all men. Science belongs to no single country; it is the great cooperative enterprise of the human spirit coming to grips with its natural surroundings. The story of mathematics should be presented as the saga of the human imagination. If we approached our education with that attitude, as training for world citizenship, the teacher and the child would lead the world into a new and better day.

May the words and the ideas of these two men of vision, whose lifework education is, bring us in this house and in this nation to a sense of our responsibility in regard to it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ARMY AND NAVY VETERANS

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (for Mr. Cleaver) moved the second reading of bill No. 244, respecting the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not happen to have in my list a copy of this particular bill and I should like to have it. That, however, is not the reason for my rising now. I am quite sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) is only too anxious to give some explanation before we go farther with the second reading of this bill, and it would be a great shame if he were now deprived of that opportunity.

Mr. MAYBANK: The only explanation I can give, seeing that the request that I should move the second reading has just come to me, is that I understand the object to be the incorporation of this body. That is all I can say.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CANADIAN INDEMNITY COMPANY

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of bill No. 246, respecting the Canadian Indemnity Company.

Mr. MacINNIS: I presume the sponsor of the bill will be able to give the same illuminating explanation of this one as he gave of the last bill.

Mr. MAYBANK: I feel I can give just about as illuminating an explanation of this one. The bill has gone through the senate, and the explanation will be found in the explanatory notes. In the main, it appears to be asking power to cut stock, as they say, five ways, from $50 to $10. That is what was done some little time ago in the banking and commerce committee with respect to all the banks at the time of the revision of the Bank Act. They are also asking power to write certain additional kinds of business. Certain powers which they have not had along that line they are asking for now.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has this bill been before the appropriate committee of the senate?

Mr. MAYBANK: I can only presume so, in view of the fact that the senate reported it. I do not know anything about procedure in the senate. I only know that this was a senate bill, and I understand it was before the appropriate committee there.

Mr. GRAYDON: I asked the question because I am wondering whether the superintendent of insurance appeared before the committee and gave his approval of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MAYBANK: I do not know, but I should suppose that he could come before the banking and commerce committee of this house and give evidence. He usually does.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it my hon. friend's object that this bill shall go before the banking and commerce committee after second reading?

Mr. MAYBANK: It is not a question of what my object is; it is whatever the procedure of the house is. I believe that this sort of bill always goes to the banking and commerce committee.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I should say a word about this bill and another one that will come up. I understand that this bill went before the appropriate committee of the senate, received the approval of that committee, and passed through the senate. I should say that the superintendent of insurance does not approve the subdivision of these shares and I would suggest that when this bill is referred to the committee of this house that deals with such bills the superintendent of insurance be called and asked to give his reasons. It is not a matter upon which I feel I should take a stand myself, or upon which the government should take a stand. It is one feature of a bill, one clause of a bill. Unless I change my mind, I would be content to take the judgment of the committee of the house that considers the bill. I think the committee should have before it the superintendent of insurance and hear what he has to say about it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

CANADIAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of bill No. 247, respecting the Canadian Fire Insurance Company.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The same remarks apply to this bill as to the previous one. This also contains a section providing for subdivision of existing shares. Here again I may say that the superintendent of insurance is not favourable to this being done, and once more I am content to leave the matter to the judgment of the committee that considers it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

PRESCOTT AND OGDENSBURG BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina) moved the second reading of bill No. 248, to incorporate Prescott and Ogdensburg Bridge Company.

Mr. GRAYDON: The sponsor of this bill, I notice, is in his seat and he too, I am sure, is anxious to give a full explanation of the bill.

Mr. CROLL: This bill is very similar to one passed in this house in 1939 fixing the date of expiry in 1942. The sponsors were unable to proceed with the building of the bridge at that time owing to the war, and now they feel they ought to have a new bill rather than have the other one extended, in that they ask the right to build either a bridge or a tunnel. I do not believe there are many differences in this bill and the sponsors are the same.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the sponsor of the bill whether it is his intention to ask that the bill go to a committee of the house?

Mr. CROLL: To the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Notwithstanding the fact that the mining industry is greatly exercised and chagrined over the actions of the government during the last ten days, and notwithstanding the fact that many assert that production in the mining industry will be greatly reduced, I rise to-night to advocate a vigorous expansion in the whole mining industry along the line of greater production. If we can bring this about I believe two things will follow. First, there will be a widening of the business base, with the result that there will be a further broadening of taxation and, to that extent, a general lowering of taxes upon the public generally. Second, such an expansion in production will bring about a great demand for labour, as has been the case in the past and as happened toward the end of the great depression. So I have no hesitation whatever in advocating that in the whole mining industry production be vigorously accelerated.

To-night I am going to try to present one view of expansion, and shall deal with one mineral. Time, of course, would not permit me to deal with many, and I believe my time will be exhausted when I have dealt with one. I am not going to choose the precious metals to talk about; the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) dealt with that subject this afternoon. I am going to deal with a humble metal, plain, ordinary red iron ore. I am convinced that if we can bring about a great expansion in the production of iron ore, in the last half of this century Canada will have perhaps the same opportunity to expand its whole business fabric that our cousins to the south had in the last half of the last century.

Many hon. members have visited Toronto lately, and that is only one city where what I am going to speak about may be noticed. Those who have been there have seen another skyscraper, the new Bank of Montreal building, going up on the northwest corner of King and Bay streets. That provides a great object lesson as to the results coming from the production of iron ore. I am sorry to say that we import a great deal of steel; and while our iron and steel industry has given a great deal of employment we do not begin to produce in this country anything like the iron ore we should produce, nor do we take care of even a small part of our own demand for steel. If one drives outside and around the city of Toronto, one may see—I do not know if it is the case to-day, because I have not been driving very much lately—signboards with beautiful pictorial illustrations of what results from the production of iron ore and steel. One may see beautifully portrayed on these signboards steel ships, steel frames of ships, steel bridges and steel construction work of every order. Beneath these pictures one may read a long line of printing stating that the contractors of Canada have had on hand for this post-war period orders for $300,000,000 worth of structural steel consisting of perpendiculars, horizontals, angles, bars, shapes and other steel products. That $300,000,000 worth of structural steel represents $250,000,000 worth of labour; that is the proportion. In addition, anyone who knows anything at all about steel and construction knows that in orders for $300,000,000 worth of structural steel there are coincident or correlated orders for other steel equipment, such as that required for the expansion of factories; the dump cars; the rails; the expanded steel metal and steel doors; the pipes for conveying steam; the vacuum plants, and all the other works that enter into the buildings of steel construction. Here we have another $300,000,000 worth. In other words, the statement on those signboards means that there are in sight orders for not less than $600,000,000 worth of steel, which means $500,000,000 worth of labour.

That is big business. That is the kind of business Canada should go after. That is the kind of business we must make at least some effort to develop in this country from our own iron ore, in our own steel mills. There is ample opportunity. Anyone who looks at the statistics will see that during the four years prior to the outbreak of the last war Canada imported $600,000,000 worth of iron and iron products of which something between $15,000,000 and $25,000,000 represented raw iron ore imported into this country. If we ever had an opportunity, in my opinion we have it now, in the first place to expand our own iron ore production and in the second place to expand our own steel mills and mills for the smelting of iron ore. I believe it was the late Thomas Carlyle who wisely said that the nation which controls iron controls gold. That puts gold in a secondary position to iron; and if there is one nation in the world that demonstrates the truth of that statement it is the United States.

I may say that I have visited many of the great steel mills in the United States and many of the iron ore deposits in both the United States and Canada. About the middle of the last century two men, Henry Bessemer in England and William Kelly in the United States, though several thousand miles apart, at almost the same time discovered what is now known as the Bessemer steel process which revolutionized the steel business of the world. Very shortly after that discovery the Marquette iron ore range in northern Michigan was discovered. Later on, the great Vermilion iron ore range in Minnesota was located; still later, the incomparable Mesabi iron ore range, also in northern Minnesota, was discovered; and the United States went ahead to become, as it is to-day, the greatest producer of iron and its products in the world. To-day the steel industry in that country, with its thousand or perhaps two thousand puddling plants, steel plants, rolling mills and so on, is the greatest employer of labour in that great nation and the greatest contributor to the national wealth of that country.

That is something for us to shoot at in this second half of the twentieth century we are now approaching. That is a target for Canada to aim at, if we have the iron ore. I believe we have large deposits of iron ore. If time permitted I should like to give a history of the development of the iron and steel industry in Canada from those far-off days when in your own beautiful province, Mr. Speaker, along both sides of that great river which flows into the St. Lawrence at the fine city of Three Rivers, Canada's iron ore business commenced. That is one thing your fair province can take credit for, that therein the iron and steel industry of Canada was begun. The iron and steel industry of Canada commenced there, and it continued for quite a number of years until finally the resources ran out. In my own province of Ontario—I could also speak of the other provinces such as Nova Scotia where they started to smelt iron ore in the eighteenth century—on a beautiful little creek called Potter's creek in the county of Norfolk iron ore was melted. Evidence of it still remains. It was the commencement of a real iron ore industry in Canada. It was not the first, as iron ore had been found about 1800 in the county in which my people settled in 1820, the county of Lanark and in Leeds, but neither deposit was of much importance. For some fifty years they smelted bog iron on Potter's creek, the same type of iron as the ore discovered in Quebec along the St. Maurice river. It is a far cry from the time of Louis XV and the deposit of iron ore which was discovered on the west side of the St. Maurice river to the present day. In all these years Canada has been trying to do something with its own iron ore, but nothing of any magnitude was done until we came to the first great war.

During the first great war a rich deposit of iron ore was found in northern Ontario in the Michipicoten area, 175 miles northwest and also directly north of the fine city of Sault Ste. Marie. At that time Mr. F. H. Clergue was a power in that part of Canada. He was the founder of the steel mills which are to be found at the present time at Sault Ste. Marie. He was the power that brought about the development of the Michipicoten iron ore magnetite ore. It was then called Helen mountain and it contained approximately four million tons of iron ore. That ore was put to great use during the first great war until the ore became exhausted. I am told that at present they are anticipating finding more high-grade ore north of Helen mountain. Close to that is a great deposit of low-grade ore, at New Helen mountain. I spent considerable time in surveying that area. I believe the mountain is about two thousand and some odd feet high. I thought it was about ten thousand feet high when I reached the top. It was much easier coming down than going up. At the present time they are taking out, as the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Nixon) will agree, about 750,000 tons of ore per annum. When that low-grade ore is sintered or roasted and smelted it emerges as pigiron. From those 750,000 tons of iron ore last year they received about 270,000 tons of first-class pigiron. Of course the amount is small but it can be developed. Later, I shall speak about the development of low-grade iron ore deposits.

Within the last few years, in fact during the war just closed, what is developing into a large deposit of exceptionally high-grade haematite ore, a sample of which I have in my hand, was discovered in the Atikokan area, to which I shall refer at greater length in a few moments. I wish to revert to what is going on in the United States, to build a platform, if I can, as a proposal for the development of a vast iron ore and steel industry in Canada. During the war just closed the demand for iron ore reached colossal proportions in the United States. The tonnages reached astronomical figures and, according to great engineers who have knowledge of the subject, the United States is experiencing a great contraction in its iron ore deposits. A recent issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail, I believe the October 1, 1945 issue, said that during the five years of war, in the United States 470 million tons of high-grade Mesabi and Vermilion ores were shipped to blast furnaces in Chicago, Toledo and Cleveland and other points. Cleveland has great smelting plants. To these plants they brought down 470 million tons of high-grade ore, to such an extent that the ablest of the United States engineers and geologists have become alarmed. They are alarmed, first, because, if all their high-grade ore became exhausted, what would they do in the event of another great war breaking out? I am told by those who should know that the Mesabi ore has been reduced to much less than a billion tons in sight. That is not very much from a mine which heretofore was considered inexhaustible. If their iron ore is reduced to that extent it is Canada's chance. This is Canada's chance. One of the United States great engineers and geologists, Mr. W. R. Van Slyke of Minnesota, who is thoroughly conversant with everything pertaining to the Mesabi and Vermilion iron ore ranges, the greatest in the United States, wrote the war production board of Washington last summer warning them to do two things: first, to withdraw from possible extraction of ore in that area four hundred to five hundred million tons; that is, take it out of circulation, prevent it from being used. In his letter he recommended that because of the necessity of having high-grade ore in vast quantity if and when the United States should ever again require it for defence. Second, he recommended that their own vast low-grade ores be put to work. He suggested that the United States government—and I am going to suggest the same thing to this government later—bring the best engineers, geologists and scientists together to develop the finest technique for processing low-grade ores, so that they would be able to retain their present great Mesabi and Vermilion iron ore ranges, or at least a portion of them.

What I have given has been facts. Canada has a chance because here we, too, have splendid low-grade iron ore deposits. We have the vast low-grade iron ore deposits in Algoma to which I referred a moment ago. We have vast low-grade iron ore deposits on Taxada island and on the island of Vancouver. Out there they also have water power, hydro power. If they had high-grade iron ore to mix with the low-grade ore, along with the hydro power, it would mean the erection of a steel industry in British Columbia, to which I shall refer later on.

That brings me to the next point. Where is the high-grade ore in Ontario? At this point I wish to say that I personally am not interested in the remotest possible way in any mine or in any ore. I speak from a world of experience in the study of iron and steel. I speak as a Canadian with a heart filled full of hope that the time will come when Canada, particularly in this century, will take her place in the sun by being a great producer of both iron ore and steel.

My hon. friend whom I see across the aisle, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), knows that what I am saying is true. I spent a lot of time at Steep Rock in the Atikokan area. I was there during the wet season. When one goes into an iron mine he must be prepared to get not only his clothes but his boots fairly well marked up. However, that made no difference. When I go out on a survey I want to see the last part of it; I want to see all there is about it. I made a thorough survey while at Steep Rock.

I had the good fortune while there to meet representatives of the R.F.C. in Washington and other engineers. They were capable, brilliant men and I had the good fortune to be able to discuss with them the value of this ore and its probable tonnage. I am convinced that there is a large tonnage there, not because of anything that I could see but for three principal reasons. First, I do not believe the United States government would have allowed the R.F.C. to invest $5,000,000 in that iron ore mine without sending engineers there, which they did, to make a thorough investigation as to the possible and probable tonnage. They are too clever for that. Their men must have reported back that the evidence obtained from the diamond drill cores, which are still there to be seen by anyone who cares to go there, was such that it would warrant the R.F.C. lending $5,000,000 in Canada to proceed with the production of ore in the Atikokan area. That is pretty strong evidence.

But there are two more pieces of strong evidence. The second is the fact that the Ontario government, through the hydro electric power commission, which commission has a number of eminent and brilliant engineers, put up $2,500,000 in order to provide more electric power at Alexandra falls on the Nipigon river and wire it for a distance of 150 miles west to the Atikokan area. That is another reason why I am convinced that there must be a lot of ore there.

Mr. Speaker, I can hardly hear myself speak and I am talking rather loudly. I am really trying to present something to this house. If hon. members are interested at all in the advance of their own country; if they are at all interested in what will put this country ahead and increase our production of iron ore and steel, as has been demonstrated in the United States, I hope they will listen and take an interest in what I am saying. Perhaps they will become more interested in this and help to bring about further development.

I should like to digress for a moment and refer to what two other great countries are doing along the lines of what I am urging should be done in this country. I am going to take a trip to India to see the great works of the Tata iron and steel company at Jamshepur. That is undoubtedly one of the greatest iron and steel producing plants in Asia. It has turned out a lot of iron and steel and has captured for that part of the world much of the iron and steel business. During the late war it did a wonderful job in producing iron and steel.

Then our friends the Russians are doing likewise. They are developing a tremendous iron and steel industry. Unless we Canadians wake up and develop our own iron and steel industry in a big way we may be buying our requirements from India or Russia or elsewhere when we should be producing them at home.

I come back now to where I left off. In the Atikokan area there is what is known as Steep Rock lake. This lake consists of three parallel arms. If I hold up my first three fingers, finger No. 1 would represent the east arm; the middle finger would represent the centre arm and the third finger would represent the west arm. This lake is connected to a river which flows into and out of a lake lying immediately north of the east arm called Marmion lake. This latter lake is two miles north.

Steep Rock lake is 1,262 feet above sea level, while Marmion lake is 1,363 feet above sea level, or 101 feet higher. There was a power plant situated on the river between the two lakes, but the hydro had to wipe that out in order to prevent the water from flowing into Steep Rock lake. They dammed off the lower end of Marmion lake, and they cut a canal west from Marmion lake to a small lake called Raft lake and then into Finlayson lake, which is directly north of the west arm of Steep Rock lake. Then, by a brilliant piece of engineering they lowered the level of Finlayson lake from 1,398 feet to less than 1,363 feet, so that the water would flow out of Marmion lake through Raft lake into Finlayson lake. Then they cut a canal from Finlayson lake into the west arm of Steep Rock lake. Then they dammed off the centre arm of Steep Rock lake, from the east and west arms.

It is in the centre arm of the lake that two ore beds are found. As I say, they dammed off this arm and pumped it dry. It would be worth any hon. member's time to read of the engineering problems that our Canadian engineers overcame in draining out a lake that had a river flowing into it at the average rate of over 1,000 cubic feet per second. I take my hat off to the Canadian engineers who did that. They dried out the bottom of the centre lake.

In the centre arm of Steep Rock lake are two fine beds of iron ore. The one at the south end, which is within three miles of Atikokan station on one of our great main lines of railway, is called B ore bed. I have here a piece of ore from B ore bed, at the north end of what is called A ore bed. When the overburden is taken off over both these ore beds the ore can be taken out by steam shovel. The week I was there they were taking out ore from B ore bed by steam shovel at the rate of five to six thousand tons a day and taking it out to Atikokan by rail from where it was shipped to the United States.

This is fine business. There were a lot of men working there, and anything we can do to increase the amount of tonnage to be taken out of that lake is all to the good for Canada. When I was there the engineers told me that they can take by steam shovel, open pit method 15,000,000 tons or more of ore out of B ore bed at the south end of the centre arm by steam shovel, and another 15,000,000 or more tons from A ore bed at the north end of the centre arm. Better still, they tell me that as far as the drills went they found the same grade of ore which can be taken out later by regular mining methods.

I believe that Canada has something wonderful in that high-grade Steep Rock ore. Canada has something that will help to push this country along. One pound of gold at the rate of about $35 an ounce is worth about $560, but a pound of steel watchsprings is worth $1,600. In other words, a pound of steel made into watchsprings is worth more than three times as much as a pound of gold. In this ore this country has a treasury that will permit us to advance to heights never dreamed of before.

We have in this country many iron and steel mills. I see my good friend, the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross), looking at me. He has two great steel mills in his riding, Dominion Foundries and Steel, and Steel Company of Canada. I shall speak of that a little later, of the expansion that is possible there. We have in Algoma a vast quantity of low-grade iron ore. We have, I am told, upwards of a billion tons high grade iron ore in the three ore bodies, A, B and C, at Atikokan. I suggest that we make every effort to develop these iron ore bodies. We should have steel plants in Winnipeg and in Vancouver. We have them in Hamilton. We should have them in Ojibway, where two or three unused blast furnaces have stood for I do not know how many years, but ever since my hon. friend (Mr. Croll) was mayor of that city. I want to see those blast furnaces put to work. We should have a blast furnace in Toronto. I do not see why we should not have these developments because this iron ore body lies along the great railway highway, the Canadian National Railways, and it is only 140 miles from the St. Lawrence waterway at Port Arthur. There is no reason why, if we developed these mines to the extent they should be developed, we should not be shipping high-grade ore both east and west, from Fort William and Port Arthur. I am sure the hon. member for that district would like to see a mill there, and that will come some day. Some day you will have a big smelting plant in Port Arthur and Fort William and you will be shipping your product east.

Mr. REID: Is it haematite ore?

Mr. MacNICOL: This is haematite. The red proves that, to start with. I said at the beginning, red iron ore. Magnatite is not red in the same manner. They are both No. 1, and I wish we had inexhaustible quantities of both. Nothing can hold this country back if they are developed.

Mr. GILLIS: How? By private enterprise?

Mr. MacNICOL: I was a private enterprise man myself and I like to hear my hon. friend talk about private enterprise. If there is one thing that I am proud of it is that I have assisted in giving thousands of men jobs, and I like to talk to a man who has given men jobs.

Mr. GILLIS: Is the hon. member suggesting that private enterprise develop these deposits?

Mr. MacNICOL: The iron ore deposits are now being developed by a very fine company. I am glad that my hon. friend mentioned that. The men who discovered this iron ore are wonderful men, Jules Cross of Port Arthur and the late Joseph Errington. For years they travelled up and down that part of the country with no possible hope at that time of getting any reward. But finally, as a result of the persistence of these men, this ore body was discovered and developed. It never would have been discovered but for their persistence and their stick-to-itiveness. The ore was developed by a company which these men promoted, along with Major General Hogarth. I give them credit for promoting that company. The United States government and the Ontario Hydro also put money into its development, as well as this government. I did not mention that before and I am glad to mention it now. I would not suggest for a moment that this government does not also deserve credit, because it put in about $2,500,000 through the Canadian National Railways to build a line from Atikokan to Steep Rock, three miles in length, and strengthening the whole line from Atikokan to Port Arthur, and building a trestle bridge half a mile long and dock at Port Arthur capable of loading 2,000,000 tons of ore in ships that come alongside the dock in the shipping season of 200 days. I give credit to all those who helped to bring about this development. Anyone who helps to develop this country deserves credit.

I see that my time is passing, Mr. Speaker, and I want to make some recommendations as to what might be done. I am not going to ask the government to put up money because this is a time of economy. But they can help by showing their willingness to assist in other ways. I would first recommend that the Minister of Finance consider every possible way of relieving taxation on mining, and particularly on any new mine like this. This is a new mine. It took years to develop it. Last year they shipped about 750,000 tons and this year they expect to ship about 1,000,000 or 1,500,000 tons. It is exceptionally high-grade ore. It contains only about ·020 of phosphorous, only ·021 of sulphur and 2·86 of silica. The iron ore itself is of very high grade, containing from 60 to 61½ per cent of pure iron. So much is that so that the purchasers in the United States can put the iron ore straight into the smelters. It has also other features. It is full of vuges or interstices, so that when it goes into the smelters it rapidly disintegrates, and that is important, as anyone knows who knows anything about melting iron. It is of such high grade that it receives a premium on the market in the United States. That is a wonderful thing for Canada.

My first suggestion was that every possible tax be taken off primary mines.

Next, I suggest that freight rates should be equalized from Atikokan to Port Arthur to compare with the rates from the Mesabi range in Minnesota to Duluth. That is the competing mine.

Third, I would suggest that this government help in the matter of power costs. How can they do that? At the present moment electricity loses a considerable amount of power in its transmission over the wires. I think the time has come when this country should ask its scientists to get busy as the scientists did in Germany and discover a method of transmitting electricity without too much loss of power. That would help to cut down power costs. That is one way in which the government could help.

I have already said that the A ore body was covered with a large overburden of dirt. The government could, if it would, assist in removing the large burden over A ore body by supplying the equipment. That would be something that would enable the company to turn out more ore, and that is the problem. They are expecting, I am told, to turn out this year 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 tons of iron ore. If they could turn out 10,000,000 tons, just think what that would mean! We would then be able to ship this high-grade ore to Vancouver, to mix with the low-grade British Columbia ore and start blast furnaces out there. We would be able to ship to Winnipeg and have blast furnaces and a steel rolling mill and a puddling mill there. We would be able to ship it to Windsor for Ojibway, and open up the three blast furnaces there. Why they did not go on with that development, I do not know. But there should be great steel works in the vicinity of Windsor. They have them across the river at Detroit, down the river at Toledo, down the lake at Cleveland. We should like to have a steel plant at Toronto. It would be practicable because we have a great water highway, the greatest in the world.

There is a vision; there is a target to shoot at, for this country to produce as much iron ore as it can and smelt it into iron and steel.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your great kindness to me before the dinner recess.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Does he think that dollar parity will result in a boost for the Steep Rock iron ore? I know it will be a great help to our people in the purchase of United States heavy trucks. Does he not think the dollar parity measure will be a great help in selling this iron ore in Canada?

Mr. MacNICOL: In answer to the hon. member's first question, I might say I am for whatever will produce iron ore in Canada.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to prolong this debate—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLIS:—but after the last forty-five minutes I am not making any apologies.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been on my feet for just thirty-five minutes.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to say that the last forty-five minute speech was extremely good.

Mr. GILLIS: That is a matter of opinion. I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) making an historical survey of water or power or metals. The thing I can never figure out is how the group to my right can plead with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to grant exemption from taxation to billion dollar corporations and at the same time suggest the taxing of cooperatives, people who are lifting themselves up by their bootstraps. That is an angle which always provokes me; it is completely inconsistent. They say, do not tax these billion dollar corporations; provide everything in the way of social security, but do not tax anyone except the people down in the $750 class; spare these poor corporations!

I am going to try to stick with the budget for a few minutes. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), speaking for this group, made a general survey of the budget and did, I think, an excellent job. What I am going to try to do is to be as brief and as explicit as possible on points which, I think, support the arguments he advanced.

To begin with, I am not quarrelling with the Minister of Finance. The minister just happens to occupy a very uncomfortable position; and so long as the rules of the game are as they are, and hon. members on both sides of this house rise in their places and insist that those who hold the means of life in this country in their possession to-day should utilize those means of life for private profit, the minister is going to have to do the kind of job which he has done in this budget. There is no alternative.

Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps the worst feature of the budget is the failure to raise the exemptions on the lower income groups. I believe the effect will be to create further problems for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Many of the workers across this country, heavily taxed during the war, were looking to this budget for some relief and some improvement in their standard of living through a lifting of the exemptions. Now that they are disillusioned on that score, I believe the result will be to create a brand new set of demands for wage increases, and I think those demands will be completely justified.

The second and perhaps most serious defect in the budget was the failure of the Minister of Finance to follow through with the proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference. One of the most serious things which happened in this country since confederation was the refusal of the premiers of some provinces to assent to the steps taken by the dominion government in order to determine the fields of taxation and pave the way for social security, for putting into effect the building programmes which have been set up across the country, and the health programme which a comimttee of this house spent some months in considering. I believe the major responsibility rests with the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in failing to recognize the fact that, coming out of this war, we are entering a new era, and that it is not possible to redeem the promises and pledges made to the service personnel who fought this war unless the narrow prejudices which existed in the past are swept away and the dominion government is given greater responsibility and larger finances to meet the many social needs which exist in all the provinces. Perhaps the premier of Nova Scotia was as great an offender as the premiers of the two central provinces. I read very carefully his statements in the proceedings of the conference; and while he took the stand, when the conference had practically broken up, that he would like to see it reconvened at some future date, he certainly did not make any contribution to keep the conference on an even keel or try to adjust the differences which existed between those who sponsored the meeting and those who, in my opinion, were trying to wreck it. His stand left much to be desired. As a member from Nova Scotia I am quite free to criticize him here or elsewhere, and to a greater extent than are some others.

The plea made by some of the provinces to the effect that provincial governments will be merely a fifth wheel on the coach, that they will lose their constitution and forfeit their power and authority, arouses the reflection that if their performances in the past seventy-five years are the criterion for justifying their existence, it is pretty nearly time that some of them were uprooted. At any rate, in the province from which I come, and in New Brunswick as well, for the past fifty years we have been nothing but overseers of the poor. Everything we had when we went into confederation was siphoned up without any protest from those who had jurisdiction to manage the affairs of the country. Social legislation has been completely lacking. Yet they want to hold on to their positions. It means more prestige for them. To my mind, any premier who takes that stand is thinking of himself and not of the country, and I am convinced that if we cling to these old ideas, and the attitude which wrecked the dominion-provincial conference persists, we are betraying the people who fought this war for a new deal, a new world, and a new order of society. I am reasonably sure that had these agreements gone through and an understanding been arrived at in the conference, the programme mapped out by the reconstruction committee in regard to public works across Canada could have been proceeded with and we in the maritimes would not have the unemployment problem which we have at the present time. That applies also to the health programme and to many other social measures. The wrecking of that conference is the most serious thing that has happened in this country since confederation.

I realize that perhaps the Minister of Finance has not all his own way in the cabinet. His organization is a large and complicated one that cannot be presided over and understood in all its ramifications by any one man, and he has taken a creditable stand and one for which we give him all the praise in the world, in that he is prepared to make agreements with any province that wishes to make them. But he did not follow that through and decide to go forward in that province, if it so desired, with the social measures that were outlined in the dominion-provincial conference. I think that around him and behind him are too many Tories, and I suggest that he should try to weed them out because, unless that question of dominion-provincial jurisdiction in the field of taxation is decided, a serious road lies ahead of the Dominion of Canada.

Another point in the budget upon which I wish to comment briefly is the proposal to tax cooperatives. An agitation was carried on across the country for several months by an organization known as the income tax payers' association.

An hon. MEMBER: Who are they?

Mr. GILLIS: That is just what I should like to know, who they are.

An hon. MEMBER: That should not be too hard to find out.

Mr. GILLIS: If the hon. member has information he would be doing a public service by giving it to the house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was given before a senate committee, every word of it.

Mr. GILLIS: I have here an editorial from which I wish to quote a few sentences for the benefit of my hon. friends to my right, and if some of them follow me in this debate I want them to comment on this editorial and give the information asked for in it:

> Just about a year ago the secretary of the income tax payers' association was questioned by the McDougall commission sitting in Winnipeg. The association claimed a membership of 6,300. The secretary said that it depended on membership fees of $1 per member to finance its activities. At that rate and with that membership its revenue could be computed at a little over $6,000 a year—if the members all paid their dues.

Which does not happen all the time.

> Just at present the income tax payers' association is spending money for radio broadcasts at the rate of $10,000 a week, estimated. The spot campaign is already in its third week and, we gather, will continue into the fourth week. Briefly, this means that the income tax payers' association is spending $40,000 (more or less) to misinform the public regarding the cooperatives.

These are the questions I should like hon. members to my right to answer, if they are prepared to defend the income tax payers' association:

> Where is the association getting the big money to carry on its campaign? That is a question which we believe the average Canadian citizen wants to see answered. Is it subscribed by cartels and like-minded big interests and deducted from profits and charged to advertising or some other account in order to escape the income tax?

That angle to the question should be investigated by the government.

This is a question which we suggest should be asked in the house at the present time.

I bring this question up because I know the value of the cooperative movement; and I wish to say that in the province from which I come, and from which the Minister of Finance also comes, the cooperative movement really got its start in the thirties, in the depth of the depression, when miners and steelworkers were working one and two days a week trying to maintain a family. They banded themselves together and went out to find ways and means of raising themselves by their bootstraps under the leadership and guidance of the university of St. Francis Xavier. No one was getting paid for it. It was a recognition on the part of these industrial workers, and on the part of clergymen and small business people, that as far as the system under which they lived was concerned, it had failed to provide the means of livelihood. They could not sit idly by and starve, so they went out to do something for themselves. They organized credit unions, cooperative stores and wholesales and succeeded in building these organizations into fairly large and substantial businesses, out of which no one makes any money. I have been actively associated with them since their inception, and still am, and I have never received anything in the way of dividends. We do not look for them. The earnings of the average cooperative consumer store or credit union go back into the movement in the form of education and the provision of cheap insurance for the average worker, because most of them could not carry on under the circumstances that existed at that time and protect their families.

The Minister of Finance has had pressures and difficulties during the preparation of this budget. We recognize that. But I do not think he gave this question proper consideration, not because he did not wish to, but simply because he did not have the evidence. I want to warn my hon. friends to the right, and other members in this house as well, if they are interested in the democratic form of government and in a democratic order of society, to be very careful in tripping up movements that are built by the people themselves, because you have reached the stage in this country and on this North American continent where you can fail to give the people ownership, to raise their average of education, to show them a real democracy working among themselves and of which they are part and parcel—you can fail to do that, I say, and do what they did in Europe. You can pull our own house of cards down about our ears. Make no mistake about it, that while we succeeded in defeating the nazi philosophy in this war, the nazis were not all in Europe and totalitarianism did not exist only in Germany, Italy and the European countries. You still have that ideological war on your hands, and the surest way to alienate the people from the democratic form of government that we know and understand is to start taking from them the things that they have built themselves. That is confiscation, and that is what you are doing by taking money from the cooperatives in the form of taxation. And you will not get much money. By taxing them you are taking away their means of education. Every year their financial report is brought out, a certain amount is allocated for education, literature and so on. Their education is the democratic philosophy, which enables them to keep people on the road organizing and training store managers, credit union clerks and managers, and things like that. That is what you are taking from them.

Mr. ILSLEY: How?

Mr. GILLIS: By taxing them. You are taxing their reserves; you are preventing them from expanding. In effect, as I understand it with the chance I have had to read the budget, you are relegating them to the position of a profit-making organization.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only to the extent that they make profits.

Mr. GILLIS: But they do not make profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then they are not taxed.

Mr. GILLIS: They are not taxed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not if they do not make profits. I have expressly stated that if they do not make income we do not propose the imposition of any tax whatever.

Mr. GILLIS: Then it is a matter of interpretation; that is the point. Half a dozen lawyers, sitting behind the scenes in Ottawa, draft the budget. Around that budget will be evolved a lot of regulations, which are to be interpreted, not by people who understand that movement, but by people who have the concept that you have over there; and we suffer. People who know and understand the cooperative movement have no illusions. This fight goes deeper than the budget. The fight to-day is a test between the people's organizations and the cartels of the North American continent. That is what it is; do not make any mistake about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does my hon. friend think we did what the cartels wanted us to do?

Does he think we did what the income taxpayers' association asked us to do? Not by any means. We received over thirty thousand cards asking us to tax patronage dividends, and we refused to do so.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, whether or not patronage dividends are taxed is something we shall determine when the proper item comes up. I am not going to argue it now. If the regulations are to be handled and applied by people of the calibre I think will administer them, then I believe the budget resolutions could be construed as meaning that patronage dividends are being taxed. However, as I say, I am not going to argue that point now; when the proper item comes up we shall consider it further.

It amuses me to hear our hon. friends to my right talk about free enterprise. The only free enterprise we have in this country is the cooperatives, the small business in this country from coast to coast. They say a man is free to go out and work and build and do something for himself, but to-day private enterprise in this country is a small monopolistic stranglehold. There is not a small business man in this country to-day who has any more elbow room to do business than I have, and before I am through I will show the house how free they are. I am awfully glad to be able to pull these fellows out into a frank admission. To-night they frankly admit they stand for the taxation of the cooperatives. They did not say that during the campaign, though they were asked that question quite frankly.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you say?

Mr. GILLIS: I said exactly what I am saying now, and I shall continue saying it no matter who likes it or who does not. I think I am right; and election or no election, that is the programme I shall support.

How free is this free enterprise? It has freedom to exploit the people; it is free to walk on the other fellow's back and trample him to death, if it is big enough. It means the tooth-and-claw law of the jungle. As I heard Tommy Douglas, now premier of Saskatchewan, say in this house once, it is pretty much the same as an elephant dancing among the chickens. It is all right if you are the elephant, but it is pretty hard if you are in the chicken class. That is about the philosophy of the enterprise you have to-day. The freedom is gone.

Here is another example of that freedom. The Minister of Finance is from Nova Scotia, a province that has had practically all its industries stolen from it. The banks were siphoned off, and it lost control of its credit and control of practically its whole economy. To-day, if you want to borrow $500 there to establish a small industry—and a great many people are trying to do that to-day—you have to go to Montreal, if you are doing it straight through the private banks. Then, when you go to Montreal they look over their list. What are you going to establish; a machine factory? They say it cannot be done; they already have one in Montreal, and they are selling their products there. Only a few weeks ago in Halifax the minister of industry in the government of that province made a pretty serious accusation against an agency of the dominion government and the milling companies, the free milling companies of Canada. You can go out and establish a flour mill anywhere you like, provided that the big mills want you to. In this case the minister of industry of Nova Scotia made an accusation which I never intended to let go. It appeared in the press. Nobody seemed to bother with it. I am going to read it for the benefit of my hon. friends as another example of free enterprise in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Can you take the flour and make dough?

Mr. GILLIS: It is not necessary to have flour to make dough; there is a lot of it over to my right just now. This is an editorial which appeared in the Halifax Herald of May 8, 1946.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a good paper.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I think I would be quite free to admit that the Halifax Herald is perhaps one of the fairest newspapers in Canada. It is interested in the province in which it is published; it fights the battle there, and I give it credit for that. The editorial states:

> During the session of the Nova Scotia legislature recently prorogued, the minister of industry levelled a direct and serious charge against the national harbours board. He charged that "the milling interests of central Canada blocked the Nova Scotia government's plans to erect a million-dollar flour mill at the ocean terminals in Halifax."

I am not going to read the rest of it, but that is the charge.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. GILLIS: If you want me to I shall do so; it gets better farther along.

> Before a house committee the minister declared that—
> ". . . he was entirely satisfied that the decision of the national habours board to refuse the government permission to use pier 23 for the mill 'was dictated by the milling interests of this country'."

The fellow who said that is not a socialist. He is a Liberal in a Liberal government presided over by the former minister for naval affairs in this government. The editorial goes on:

Other committee members "expressed agreement with this view" . . .

There are no Conservatives in the government.

Mr. MANROSS: That is why you have not got the mill.

Mr. GILLIS: I am particularly glad to hear that admission from my Conservative friends. It is a practical admission of the official opposition that the milling interests of Canada are Tories, and because there are no Tories in the government of Nova Scotia, no mill went down to Nova Scotia. We shall see that proper use is made of that statement at the proper time. I merely put that on the record as an indication, first, that free enterprise is not free in this country and that, second, sometime before parliament prorogues I want the Minister of Finance or the responsible minister to give us a statement as to whether the minister of industries in the Nova Scotia government made that charge and can substantiate it or otherwise. The reason I want that done is that if the milling interests of Central Canada blocked the Nova Scotia government from establishing a million dollar industry in that province they did a serious disservice to that province.

At the present time in Nova Scotia we have perhaps one of the greatest unemployment problems in Canada, and it is not getting any better. The solution now is the same as it was in the Bennett slave camps. If you want a job we shall get together four or five hundred at a time. We all remember the mobile labour reserves that Bennett used to talk about, the boys on the rods drifting from one part of the country to another, to keep wages down.

A few weeks ago I noticed an item in the press where 500 men, practically all ex-service men, from the island of Cape Breton are back home, back to the rods. Their gratuities are gone and they have no jobs. They were told that they could take a train and that they would be shipped over to the lumber camps in Maine. The offer was attractive. They went over. That is a nice reception for them to receive. We all remember the cries we heard in the house when the boys were overseas. We all heard the talk of a new heaven and a new earth, no more riding the rods, jobs for everyone, thousands of them; the boys would never be let down. These fellows came back from Holland and took the rods. They were sent over to the woods in Maine, away from their families. They did not stay long. They landed there and found that conditions were not as described. According to the item I saw in the press, most of them had to beat their way back home. They are back in Nova Scotia. I want the Minister of Finance or the appropriate minister to tell us if some interests in central Canada stopped the erection of a million dollar plant in Nova Scotia.

There is another matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). I do not do it by way of criticism, but merely as a thought-provoker. I have heard in the house and out of it, and I have seen in the press, that the crying need in this world to-day is food; that millions of people are starving everywhere. That is true. The government has set up the Land Settlement Act, applicable to service personnel of the war just closed. The act is not too bad, but in my opinion it is not going beyond 1946. I say that for the reason that the latest report showed that some 35,000 applications had been received from soldiers to settle on the land. The director informed us that he could place some 17,000 of them by the end of 1946. The reason that the others could not be placed was that the land was not available. Crown lands were not available because of lack of agreements with the provinces. That brings up the question of the dominion-provincial conference again. If by the end of 1946 there are 18,000 soldiers who cannot be placed on the land they will never be placed there, because their gratuities and their ambition will be gone and they will have drifted into something else. That is something that should be rectified. The food situation of the world is such to-day that the federal government will be completely justified in requisitioning all the land in this country to settle soldiers who made application and who have the necessary qualifications.

There is another factor tied up with the Land Settlement Act. I am emphasizing this because I believe that our Land Settlement Act applicable to soldiers of this war is one of the most important pieces of legislation we have. There is the opportunity of rehabilitating and putting 35,000 people to work producing food, the most necessary requisite to-day. The problem that the 17,000 who can be placed are up against is lack of machinery. They are unable to get farm machinery. Those who are lucky enough to get land cannot get the farm machinery. They have not got it and they cannot get it because it is not produced. That statement was made to us officially. I criticize that because I think there is a solution. We should have solved this problem a year ago. With the legislation on the statute books the government could have taken over two, three or a dozen of the plants, if necessary, which had gone out of production during the war, retooled them and put them in production for producing farm machinery. The necessary legislation was on the statute books in the form of the Crown Companies Act. They could have done it under that act. Then there was the industrial development bank which I understood was established for the purpose of providing risk capital, capital for ventures which free enterprise will not enter. Under that legislation I believe one of the first obligations of the government should have been to get a few of these plants into production producing farm machinery. They should have requisitioned the necessary land to settle these boys and permit them to produce food, because food requirements are going to be with us for at least the next five or six years. There is no doubt in my mind about that, especially when 80,000,000 people have gone out of production in Germany. They were practically feeding Europe before the war began.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is only one thing limiting the production of farm machinery, namely, the inability to get steel.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; we probed that question also.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. But, provided that you had the raw steel to-morrow you have not the plant and equipment to start producing machinery.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. GILLIS: No. As I understand it, there is a possibility now of building up the production of raw steel in the near future. I understand from official sources that there is quite a programme, but at present it would take a little time to get into production. We should not wait for the steel to be turned out to start talking about putting these other plants into production. Get them ready, retool them and do the two jobs at the one time. The whole difficulty is that we are not planning at all; we are taking the thing piecemeal. We did not do it in that way during the war. When war broke out we examined the requirements of war and planned their production. The production went ahead one after the other. To-day we are still feeling around, simply because the government does not want to go into the business of taking over where free enterprise is not developing something, and the other fellow who has a small plant and some equipment does not want to expand. He has the opportunity to expand. There must be a demand next year, the year after or for two years. A year ago, when the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) were speaking in the house, I understood that they were quite prepared to fill in the gap if free enterprise was not doing the job. In this field of land settlement and the production of steel which is necessary for the manufacture of farm machinery we are trying to carry on by means of legislation, while free enterprise has fallen down. There is no reason in the world why the government should not step in and go ahead. We are just passing a lot of legislation in the house and not following through. You have set up farm improvement machinery and hung it on to the chartered banks. You have set up certain credit organizations for the service personnel and have hung it on to the chartered banks. These things will not work, because the chartered banks have not the necessary staff.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you very much.

I am not going to go into that any farther. There is one thing I want to leave with the minister and some of the hon. members to my right in connection with this business of increasing wages, inflation and the cost of production. I should like to give them a practical illustration to show that you can increase wages, get increased production, lower your cost and have the reverse effect of inflation. I am going to take the steel industry as an example, the very one we have been talking about.

In 1939 this organization was producing 202,904 tons of steel and this production was stepped up to 665,889 tons in 1945. With an estimated working force of 3,000 in 1929, the per man production was 67 tons annually. With an actual working force of 3,638 in 1945, the per man production was 183 tons annually. This is an increase of 173 per cent in the per man productivity. The annual payroll increased by 133 per cent from 1939 to 1945, while the annual production increased by 221 per cent in the same period. The labour cost of production per ton of ingot steel was approximately $18 in 1939, and this had dropped to approximately $13 in 1945. While they increased their wage rates by 133 per cent, they reduced the cost of producing steel from $18 to $13 a ton.

I merely mention this because this steel workers' organization has been patient and long-suffering. Finally, the government has placed their case before a commission.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What company is that?

Mr. GILLIS: The Algoma Steel.

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on this debate in the hope that we may get a vote to-night. I think we in this house and the people of Canada generally agree that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) did an excellent job during the war years. Even his most severe critics, if they are fair and reasonable, will admit this fact. To my mind, one of the most difficult jobs has been the control and regulation of prices. No government in the world has made the success of regulating and controlling prices which the Minister of Finance has achieved under the direction of the government of Canada. This fact is recognized not only by the people of Canada but by all other countries. It is well known that the officials of other countries came to Canada from time to time during the war years to make an investigation of the successful working of our regulations governing price controls and have copied and put into effect similar wartime regulations.

No one in this country wishes to have controls maintained unless it is absolutely necessary. I believe, however, that even in peace time it is necessary at times for the government to maintain control to some extent in order to prevent some classes from taking advantage of other classes who are not in a position to defend or protect themselves. It will be noticed that it is the big interests and their representatives in this house who are crying for the removal of all restrictions on both ceiling and floor prices of all manufactured goods and produce; thus allowing them to find their natural levels.

We passed through that experience after world war I with a result that many of us will not soon forget. We paid dearly for the experience and we certainly do not wish to have it repeated at this time. The farmer was a great sufferer at that time because he was at the mercy of a more privileged class who were in a better position to control the situation.

I should like to mention what happened in one particular line, the sale of beef cattle. Good butcher steers were selling on the Toronto market at uncontrolled prices in June, 1920, at $15.02 per hundredweight, and this price dropped to $5.61 per hundredweight in November, 1921. Many farmers who had bought and raised cattle at the higher cost suffered such serious losses that they were many long years in recovering, if they ever recovered. There is no question that if the restrictions were removed now we would have a repetition of what happened after world war I.

For that reason, I trust that the government will pay no heed to the cries of those who represent the big interests in this house for the removal of all restrictions, on both ceiling and floor prices. This would be most disastrous until the danger period of price fluctuation has gone by. Farmers are not unreasonable in their request for fair, stable prices for their products, but they do want some assurance of a permanent price for farm products. In order to give the farmers that assurance, floor prices must be maintained permanently. To my mind, there is no other way of giving the farmer that assurance of permanent farm prices which will assure him a reasonable and fair share of the national income, without which we can never hope to maintain a high standard of living for the people of Canada.

Farming, which is our basic industry, must be profitable if Canada is to be kept prosperous. We must not lose sight of this fact. We must continue to work for unrestricted world trade. It is true that if this is to be brought about, other countries will have to make concessions.

It is also interesting to note that the people of Canada are getting away from the Conservative idea of high tariffs and are working for freer trade with all nations. No longer can the Progressive Conservative party persuade the people of Canada that high tariffs are necessary to the economic life of Canada. That day has passed away, and the Conservative party has almost passed away with it in most provinces. I believe that nothing would have a greater or more far-reaching effect upon international relationships than a freer exchange of goods with all nations.

Another question to which I wish to refer briefly is the reduction in excess profits taxes. It matters not by what name this tax is called. You may call it corporate income tax, excess profit tax, or any other name you wish to call it; the fact remains it is excess profits.

I have heard no argument which has convinced me that excess profits should not be heavily taxed. It is true that this tax was imposed in order to prevent manufacturing industries and business generally from making large excess profits from war-created gains. But why in peace time should business be allowed to have unreasonable excess profits exempt from taxation? Is it not just as important and just as reasonable to have high excess profits taxed in peace time as in war time? Is there a more just tax or a more just source of revenue than a tax on unreasonably high profits?

Surely it is true that the concerns which are making excess profits are those which can best stand taxation, and they should be taxed much more heavily on excess profits than on ordinary profits which are not excessive. It is true that the large excess profits which were made during the war may not be made to the same extent during peace time, but I believe that when industry becomes fully adjusted to peacetime production, and materials become more plentiful, with the tremendous demand for all kinds of goods both at home and abroad excess profits will be high for at least a few years.

One of the arguments used by corporations is that, if not exempt from excess profits tax, they will not have the capital to expand and create employment. I am of the opinion that we have listened altogether too long to this argument, and we have encouraged the expansion of the large corporations to the disadvantage of the smaller business concerns which are in much greater need of encouragement for necessary expansion. It is a well known fact that any city or town is in a much better position if it has a number of small industries operating in it than if it has just one large industry operating, upon which the city, town or community is entirely dependent. I am of the opinion that small business concerns should be given greater encouragement to expand, and that large business corporations which are making excess profits should be heavily taxed.

I am firmly convinced that if we are to retain our present system of private ownership of industry, big business, cartels and large financial corporations must be controlled to a much greater extent than they have been in the past. If they are not controlled our system of private industry will pass out and be replaced by government ownership of industry. The people of Canada will no longer tolerate the control of the financial affairs of this country by cartels, big business and large financial corporations, and I know of no better way of controlling them than by taxation.

Since the war ended, there have been elections held in eight European countries. Prior to the war these countries were under very strong capitalistic control. In each and all of these countries there has been a definite swing to the left. When we see what happened in Great Britain when she swung from a strong Conservative capitalistic government to the other extreme—a strong socialist government—let us not go away with the idea that "it can't happen here". We are making a great mistake if we close our eyes to what is going on in practically all countries in the world to-day with regard to the world-wide feeling that exists in demanding greater freedom from capitalistic control. The great danger is, as history has proven, that nations struggling for freedom usually swing to the other extreme, centralizing their power in the government at the expense of the individual, so that the people bring upon themselves slavery instead of freedom. This has always been true when too great a power has been centralized in governments, and that is the great danger that we are facing to-day.

I am not entirely opposed to government ownership. I believe in government ownership of public utilities, but I am opposed to government ownership of private industry to the extent advocated by the C.C.F. party, and especially so by its extreme element who are rapidly getting control of the party.

I am sure that the people of Canada do not wish to have an extreme socialist government take office in this country. To my mind, the only way of preventing this is for the government to take a definite and decided stand on this question of the control of the moneyed interests in Canada. If this is done, we shall be able to retain our present system of private industry, which I feel all liberty-loving people of Canada would wish to retain.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the budget is always looked forward to as a document of extraordinary interest, for now it is not what our services bring in the open market but what the government lets us keep as "take-home pay" that really matters. In fact the government is gradually getting itself around to the point of view that it is not the people who create the wherewithal by which we live, but the all-powerful state that suffers us in our various capacities and makes all things possible. While we are duly appreciative of the opportunities which living in a community gives, most of us know where we would be if it were not for our own endeavour, sacrifice and hard work.

How did we manage our affairs in this country last year? We spent $4,691 million and we took in $2,955 million. The over-all deficiency was $1,736 million. This amount we just added to our debt. The war was on for part of last year, and during a war the only thing that financial figures do is to measure how much we can possibly turn out, for money is no object when it comes to winning a war and it would be foolish to let it be so. The creation of so much debt year after year does leave a painful aftermath, and that is the real reason why we are having so much trouble in holding down the price ceiling and warding off inflation.

How does the government propose to run our country's business during the present fiscal year? We are going to spend $2,769 million and our revenues will fall short of this amount by about $300 million. As well as raising the money to pay for this deficit, we shall have to raise some money, about another $1,000 million, for the United Kingdom loan, the foreign exchange control board, et cetera; and I hope that the millions for the foreign exchange control board have not already been lost owing to the recent change in the value of the Canadian dollar.

One of the most interesting things about government finances, because it is one of the most unusual ways of doing business, is the method of spending before we have any idea where the money is to come from. This debate is only concerned with the ways and means of providing the money we have already spent or planned to spend. We may preach a stricture or two on economy; but the time to pull in our belts, so that we may be able to reduce taxation and let our economic machine run in high gear, is when we are making appropriations from a not yet provided tax pot. Parliament goes on its merry way as if there were no end to that pot. If we are to have an honest dollar we must cease this business of forgetting to look at our cloth before we cut our coat. Our estimated expenditures for this year of $2,769 million, to say nothing of the extra $1,000 million we must raise for capital account, is a substantial part of our gross national product or national income of about $11,000 million. It is very nice to budget for a deficit of $300 million, for it recalls Mark Twain's saying that he was resolved to live within his income even if he had to borrow to do it. We have almost come to the point where the government is looking after so many of our requirements that we have to ask ourselves, do we want to spend our own hard-earned money, or do we want the government to do it for us? Remember, the government does not create a red cent of it, not even one of those nickels which the minister is withdrawing from circulation. Taxes come from only one source —from the people.

Here I should like to quote a few words from Sir John Anderson, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Mr. Churchill's government:

> It was very forcibly argued in the recent budget debate that all experience in modern states goes to show that when more than about 25 per cent of the national income is taken by the government in taxation, inflation results, for the reason that the public prefers to reduce the cost of the debt and other fixed charges by letting prices go up. As things now stand, when the immediate effects of the war have been worked off, the government will be taking no less than 35 per cent of the national income in taxation.

Perhaps I might add that inflation comes about unwittingly when 25 per cent of the national income goes in taxation, for then taxation becomes so discouraging that less goods are produced.

Canada's federal government's current expenditures alone, again leaving out capital account, are running about 25 per cent of our national income and with capital expenditures, about 34 per cent. We should all be this much better off if we did not have the federal government and its expenditures to support. I am not suggesting that we can do without it, but we must be careful that it does not crowd us out of our tent entirely.

The minister reviewed the reconversion period to date, and noted that 650,000 from the armed services had been released and that work or training had been found for them. Another 650,000 men and women out of war industry have likewise been released. The total number of unemployed is only 200,000, or about four per cent of our working force. There are at least 100,000 jobs available which could be filled if the government had any kind of civilian training programme to fit square pegs into round holes, as promised under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

How different these figures are from the gloomy prognostications of the government's economists and statisticians both here and in the United States who expected mass unemployment during the reconversion period. I have not the figures for Canada, but in the United States these experts figured out that the unemployment figures would reach about eight million this spring. But all the unemployed, including non-veterans, numbered 2,310,000. By May, 11,400,000 male veterans alone had been discharged in the United States. If we ever have a managed economy based on such miscalculations of the future, heaven help our national prosperity!

Nothing can take the place of free competitive enterprise. Our national income is more than double what it was in 1938. In face of our unexpected good fortune, the employment which has been made possible by free enterprise, one might have had good reason to expect some fair measure of relief from wartime taxation.

It is interesting to follow the workings of the minister's mind. He states that immediate economic considerations are of less importance in determining our present proposals than longer term economic policies and the necessities of dominion-provincial relations. Then he devotes a paragraph to the need for export markets if we are to maintain our prosperity. But there is not a word about our greatly enlarged home market. What does he think our people are going to do with their increased purchasing power? Where a man had two shirts and one pair of shoes he is now going to have an extra shirt and a pair of shoes for Sundays; he is also going to eat more meat and generally enjoy a higher standard of living, thus greatly expanding the home market. The domestic market is a much better market than the export market; and while Canada must always be an exporter of its basic agricultural products and those of the mine and the forest, we should take second thought about depriving ourselves of, much less lending the money for others to buy, what we so badly need for our own people. Why build locomotives for others when we need houses for our veterans? Exports financed by credits for which we do not immediately receive imports only add to the inflationary pressure.

The minister then mentioned the second most powerful influence in maintaining employment and production—private expenditure of a capital nature. Housing is mentioned as paramount among these. But nothing is done to stimulate the building of houses as was done for industry and labour in order to bring about war production. At the present rate of construction we shall never overtake even the most urgent cases which cry out for relief. On March 25 in this chamber I mentioned several cases in the city of Toronto; one, where there were no less than fifty-four people in one house—appalling conditions in this day and age. There is something wrong with the operation of a system which cannot provide houses for veterans and other citizens.

The minister then mentioned a third support of our reconversion period, and here drew our attention to consumer expenditures. Veterans' expenditures were singled out as having constituted a powerful influence in increasing the total of what consumers have been "trying" to spend. The minister must have blushed when he thought of his government's timing of the introduction of family allowances. Prices were referred to as being pulled up by excess purchasing power and pushed up by wage increases. We are told we must resist pressure, because the battle is nearly over and, I presume, victory is in sight. I do not propose to go into this vexed question at this time, but it will be interesting if the minister would tell the people of Canada what he means by "nearly over". A year has already gone by. Under his fiscal policies there is little early probability of supply catching up with demand unless he steers us into a depression. Nothing he has done has cured the disease caused by deficit financing. Price control poulticing only covers up the symptoms from the public gaze. The real answer, the constructive answer, the minister says, to the inflationary pressures existing at this time is to work and produce the goods that are wanted in greater volume, so that our greater buying power will result in more goods at reasonable prices, rather than fewer goods at higher prices. The real difficulty of maintaining price control lies in the government's deficits, which for the last five years have been as follows: 1942, $396,000,000; 1943, $2,137,000,000; 1944, $2,557,000,000; 1945, $2,558,000,000; 1946, $1,735,000,000, or a grand total for the five-year period of $9,383,000,000 of deficits—over nine billion dollars.

Total bank deposits have increased from $2,500,000,000 in 1938 to about $6,000,000,000. Active note circulation, that is to say, money in your pocket and in mine, has increased from $205,000,000 in 1938 to $1,100,000,000 in 1946, or an increase of over five times in note circulation. Compare these figures with the physical volume of business which in April of this year, the last month available, was 193 as compared with 100 as the average for 1935-39. That is the reason why many people will tell you that we already have inflation, and why the minister should tell the people of Canada how and when is the way out, if he really knows.

We remember that we had high war taxation and compulsory savings, not only to raise revenue but even more importantly to siphon off purchasing power and make it unprofitable to produce more goods for civilian consumption. These reasons are now largely gone, particularly the discouragement to the production of civilian goods; but the tax policies have not been put in reverse, as would seem logical if the minister is to attain his ends.

This, then, should have been a production-incentive budget. But is it? We have joined Bretton Woods in order that, in the international field, we may follow expansionist, not restrictionist policies, in helping to keep the economic ship of state on an even keel. Why not adopt expansionist policies in the domestic field also? People produce and work harder, or otherwise, because of the personal advantage or disadvantage in so doing. Surely, after the experience of the last few years, with workers refusing to work Saturday mornings and professional men taking extended holidays, this does not have to be elaborated upon.

Let us turn our attention to the personal income tax exemption. Single workers are now taxed after they receive $750 instead of $660; married workers after they receive $1,500 instead of $1,200. In the cities, where most of the tax is collected, let anyone try to maintain the Canadian standard on such minimum amounts. The tax scale starts at 22 per cent and goes up to 85 per cent on anything above these amounts. Is incentive to be found in any of those rates, in view of the minimum exemptions allowed? Should the Canadian government become an agency for lowering the standard of living of the Canadian people below the necessary level of decency? We are not so much concerned with what other countries may do as we are with allowing a fair standard for those who by their own efforts strive to maintain a decent standard.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman be in favour of raising the exemptions to a level which would lose us $300,000,000 in revenue, thus making the deficit $600,000,000, instead of $300,000,000?

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister will bear with me for a few moments he will hear some constructive suggestions which I shall presently make. The concessions granted are niggardly and even grudging, even when those applicable to 1946 are combined with those promised for 1947. Taxation is still strongly reminiscent of wartime rates when we no longer have a war. Among the strange arguments the minister cites in defence of his policy is the following:

> We cannot secure proper equity and fair treatment if the exemptions from income tax are so high as to exclude most of those receiving incomes.

What right has he to accuse the Canadian people of such a dog-in-the-manger attitude, and how does he reconcile the fact that already many small wage-earners are not and should not be taxed? The majority of the citizens are not made economy-conscious by being included in the tax roll. They merely grouse. Like everyone else, I subscribed to the idea that if a man paid a tax he would be more interested in government expenditures. It was thought to be an excellent investment in citizenship. The result disproves the theory and only leads to the asking of greater "take-home pay". Indeed, it is obviously the minister's desire that taxation be not lifted at the present time. For listen to this:

> Moreover, as I have already indicated, the current economic situation in respect of the available volume of purchasing power and current spending trends is not such as to provide an economic justification for reducing taxes at the present time. Lighter taxes are not needed now for the purpose of permitting or encouraging additional private spending in order to maintain employment this year. In fact, if only immediate economic conditions were involved, one could make a case for temporary higher taxes in order to curb the excess of spending in some directions that is tending to pull prices up.

What an example of a restrictionist policy! This is managed economy with a vengeance, a shining example of how we are to be treated if the brain-trusters are to be allowed to run the affairs of the Canadian people. Let our people be warned by it!

Yet the minister talks about increased production as the primary aim and need of the present budget. So let us see how he would encourage married women to remain at their jobs. I am not speaking of mothers with children to look after, but there are many married women who have not such responsibilities but who are free and who desire to work part time. With the shortage of help in the domestic field and in the needle trades, where work is done at home, to mention only two classes—and one might include some of the able secretaries in the House of Commons—there are many women who will not work beyond the earning of $250 which is allowed them before their husband's taxation is substantially increased. Earned incomes of married women did not reduce a husband's tax exemptions to those of the single man during the urgent need for war production. But now production apparently is not so necessary, and yet the minister preaches production as the chief means of offsetting the calamitous dangers of inflation.

Of course, in theory a married man should not be allowed the marital exemption of $750 if his wife works. I agree. But are we more interested in theory or in production? It is a case of man being made for the theory and not the theory for man.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are we not interested in equity and fairness to some extent?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not going to elaborate an answer to the minister's question. I am interested in production, and I do not believe that the Canadian people wish to adopt this dog-in-the-manger attitude which the minister suggests. If a man's wife is able to work and produce, particularly at the present time when there are more jobs offering than workers to fill them, I say, let her work and give her some incentive; don't reduce the married man's exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend can not have heard the scores of speeches made in this house in the last two or three years on the other side of that question.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am speaking as I see it, as I believe it and as I think I know it will work out. It will help the minister a great deal if he gets more production. He is endeavouring to put the lid on the prosperity and well-being of this country in order to ward off inflation. What the minister wants above all is production, and I am pointing a way for him to get production. Does he want theory? All right. If he wants fairness and equity to a certain degree, all right; but what we are after is production. If the minister thinks there is any doubt in my mind as to which of the two should prevail, I will tell him it is production.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will take fairness.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wish the minister would make up his mind whether he wants the production of goods and services to give our people a better life, or whether he wants to keep down production by taking away incentive.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the very opposite.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should be delighted if the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) would make a contribution to the budget debate in due course. In the six years I have been in this house I have not heard him make any contribution to any budget debate.

Mr. GARDINER: You make a better speech when you are not reading it.

Mr. JACKMAN: We all do that. Sometimes we must refer to our notes; otherwise we should not get as much in. Apparently the minister is following the advice of two sets of brain-trusters who never before have run the economy of a state and just do not know what makes the clock tick. Let us sympathize with the minister in his desire to keep inflation from manifesting itself; which is at the root of many of the government's contradictory policies. Inflation is with us, owing to the inevitable economic sins in financing the most costly war in history. The production of more goods over which to spread the available purchasing power is all to the good, though there are good authorities who believe that by the very process of enlarged production the purchasing power thereby created will aggravate an already strong and inevitable inflation. If there is a way out of inflation I hope the minister will show it to this house. Whatever may be the financial effects of increased production, we know its social effects are wholly good; the more goods and services that are produced, the more there is to divide among our people and the higher the standard of living

The minister asked if I could give him any suggestion in lieu of increasing the exemptions. Here is one which I offer to him, which I think will help production and help meet the inflation problem. It is my recommendation that some different way must be found to raise a good part of the national revenue, other than that of discouraging enterprise and work. I have already quoted Sir John Anderson's view in that regard. I am not suggesting here that any great part of the load may be dropped; but there is a right way and a wrong way to harness a horse; a man can pull more than he can push, and he can pull more on wheels than he can drag on the ground. To tell a man, whether he wears a blue collar or a white collar, that he will earn less per hour for overtime, because of taxation, just does not work.

While there are some arguments against the extension of the sales tax, there are few when food, which bulks so largely in the average housewife's expenditure, is exempted as I recommend. Very few of our people to-day know there is already a sales tax imposed at the wholesale level. Such a tax does not discourage the worker from working, and there is fairness in a tax policy based on the principle that the more one spends, the more one pays. There is nothing obligatory about paying a tax if one does not purchase; but unfortunately the great growth in instalment sales in normal times is a clear indication that most people will spend if they have the money, and even when they have not. Let the worker have more take-home pay if we are to encourage production. Other indirect or non-incentive destroying taxes must be found if we are to keep our economy in high gear. I may be asked, how does it help in what way we pay our taxes, when they have to come out of the same pocket anyway. The answer is that under the present system the pocket is only half full because the high individual tax rates discourage work, enterprise and production. Under a system such as I propose the same amount of taxes would have to be paid, but we would have fuller pocketbooks out of which to pay them.

May I now say a word on the effects of the government's monetary policy and deficit financing. The pumping of money into the circulation system has had the effect of lowering interest rates. Just as everything goes up in price when there is more money than things to spend it on at the old price level, so bonds went up in price because people had to invest their money somewhere and there was little else to spend it on. The government encouraged us not to spend, anyway. Of course this form of inflation was all right because the government was the producer of the bonds, and the only place one approves of a ceiling is on what someone else has to sell, not on what one produces. So investors have bought government bonds at inflated levels, and the return on their investment has been cut about in two, while increased taxation has almost reduced this income by half again. In the meantime, nearly all other groups have had some increase in take-home pay in recognition of the increased cost of living, the white collar group least of all. As a measure of great solicitude, the minister now offers the poor retired widow, who may or may not have children to educate, relief by way of increasing the exemption from the special surtax of four per cent on investment income from $1,500 to $1,800. In other words, this munificent concession, after all he has done to the retired man with a small income on which to keep himself, is to give him relief from the four per cent surtax on $300 more of income or, Mr. Speaker, $12 per annum, about the price of a new pair of shoes. Obviously the minister did not have the wealthy investor in mind. I hope he did not spend too much time in working himself up to this pitch of generosity.

Turning now to the corporation tax, we find there is no implementing of the now well recognized unfairness of the double taxation of business earnings, first in the hands of the corporation and then, what is left of the same earnings, in the hands of the individual. The latter is the only one who can consume these earnings; and it was confidently expected that the government would at least make a start in eliminating this feature of double taxation which is generally conceded to be unfair. As with so many other aspects of the budget, one must continue to live in hope. The reduction of the minimum corporation tax from 40 per cent to 30 per cent, though this may only make way for a provincial levy, was a needed step. The ordinary corporation tax was 18 per cent at the outbreak of war, and the additional 22 per cent, making 40 per cent in all, was taken from the Excess Profits Tax Act. This is once again proof that this tax—because even if a business earned less than before the war the higher tax prevailed—was always a misnomer. It was really—and I am sorry the previous speaker is not in the chamber at the moment—an excess tax on profits. A tax of 30 per cent or more on business is still a high tax, but we cannot spend on social services if we do not tax, and business will do its best to create jobs under the present imposition, thankful even for small mercies.

The excess profits tax was a fair one in many respects, because no one should be allowed to profit from the emergency and sacrifice of war and from the forced spending in unlimited volume caused by the war. Today's business is no longer the result of war expenditures, and the average 1936-39 earnings on which the excess profits tax is based has become an anachronism. Just as the island of Manhattan was once sold by the Indians for $24; just as valuable farms in western Canada were once free homesteads, you cannot turn back the hands of time. It is particularly hard on young businesses, and ten years is a long period in the life of any company. Great Britain has recognized these facts and is doing away with the excess profits tax at the end of 1946 and, of course, Great Britain has no corporation tax as we know it. The United States did away with the excess profits tax at the end of 1945. Only Canada is left with this deterrent, to be 15 per cent additional to the ordinary corporation tax of 30 per cent in 1947, a deterrent particularly to small and growing businesses. How can they expand and create employment if they cannot plough back any earnings, just as a farmer ploughs back a crop of clover.

Let me give an example of why Canada cannot afford a substantially higher corporation tax than obtains in the United States, much less an excess profits tax which that country wisely abolished. There are over $4 billion of American investment in Canada, much of it consisting of investment in branch plants. If the American company finds that it can get more profit after tax, retained profit, from its American plant than from its Canadian, it is quite obvious where any goods for export are going to be made. Employment is thus created in the United States which otherwise would have gone to Canadian workmen. Another manufacturer informed me of a developing export business with Newfoundland in competition with firms in the United States. Since the American was allowed, under their tax system, to retain a larger share of his profits he could quote a closer price than the Canadian and hence the business went to the United States.

In his budget remarks the minister said, "this tax has distinct weaknesses and limitations in normal times and it is not to be accepted as a permanent part of our tax structure. Experience, however, has shown, he says "that we are still living in highly abnormal times, the shadow of war is still upon us." What of the United States, and what of the not to be compared strains and uncertainties upon Great Britain?

Is it likely that we shall ever live in a complacent world? Let Canada get back to a fiscal basis on which she may proceed and progress. The difficulty which the minister faces at every turn is that he has not yet made up his mind whether our economy needs to be encouraged or whether it needs to be held in check. On the one hand, he wants to see production increased; and, on the other, he does not, particularly if it means making the people prosperous and putting more pressure on the price ceiling. He wants to have his cake and eat it too. He asks for more production so that he can hold his price ceiling line, and then he turns around and destroys the incentive for both individuals and businesses without which there is not likely to be more production but less. Already the index figure for the volume of manufacturing stands at 190 as compared with 271 in April, 1945, and 291 in April, 1944. Not since John Bunyan's "Mr. Facing-Both-Ways" have we had such an example of disastrous indecision.

The people of Canada might not be so much alarmed at this budget if the minister had not said that it was "essentially a peacetime budget, providing for the financial needs of the first post-war year which is wholly a year of peace", to which he added that certain demobilization costs would not be of a recurring nature. This, then, is to be the model of his government's production-incentive budgets for the future—may we hope it will be short.

I have asked for a reexamination of his government's policy on excessive expenditures, on exports, on private expenditures of a capital nature, particularly housing, and on consumer's expenditures and price control. I have pointed out the fallacy of the incentive-destroying personal income and corporation taxes, the restrictionist effects of their attempts at managed economy, and the unfair and anti-social distribution of the tax burden in the case of married women who wish to work.

The importance of "take-home pay" has been emphasized and certain alternative fiscal measures have been suggested. We are rapidly drifting, if we permit the trend to continue, into a managed economy where brain-trusters regulate the conditions under which we all strive for a living. It is a step toward socialism and state control and the eventual loss of economic liberty which inevitably leads to the loss of personal freedom for which we have just fought and won a great and costly war. Our duty is to give our people a budget which will ensure them their economic freedom as well as economic security and encourage them to put forth their best efforts in order that all may fully share in the great heritage which is Canada!

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I just wish to make a few comments on the budget and to present to the house some of the opinions of my constituents toward it. It was interesting to me to listen to the criticism of the Progressive Conservative party members, especially the first two or three speakers who asked for a policy of economy in this country. I am interested in it because, after hearing the criticism and other experiences I have had, I have found the reason why the Progressive Conservative party is called the Progressive Conservative party. When the members of that party sit in the veterans affairs committee they vote unanimously for every scheme that means the expenditure of money, and sometimes vote against the majority of the committee. When the Conservatives come into the house they criticize the government for the expenditure of money in general. Therefore, in the veterans affairs committee we find them very progressive and in the house typically Conservative.

This afternoon the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) dealt with the question of bringing the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar. He pleaded with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to work on behalf of having a free market for gold so that gold could be sold at a world price. When he was saying that I thought of the days of the depression in the United States when there was a free market for gold, when gold was selling at $22.62 an ounce. As a result of government action it had to be raised to $35 an ounce before conditions started to improve in the United States. Yet this afternoon that hon. gentleman was suggesting that the Minister of Finance work for a policy of that kind.

Mr. ADAMSON: There was no free market for gold in the United States. This is partly what caused the depression to take such a firm hold on the economy of the United States.

Mr. HERRIDGE: We differ in that connection.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is not in the hon. member's book, is it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Before proceeding further with my few remarks on the budget, I wish to express the appreciation of the people I represent of the government's policy of price control. I believe they all support strongly the present policy of price controls. Many of them write me from day to day and week to week, as also do organizations, urging that I emphasize that price controls be maintained and strictly maintained. When it comes to the question of bringing the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar there has been some criticism of that, and possibly, as far as gold mining is concerned, it may cause a temporary setback. I am quite sure that, on the whole, it will be of benefit to the Canadian economy. I am quite ready to accept the decision of the Minister of Finance in that respect because of the way in which he and his associates handled the finances of this country during the war period.

I should like to mention the issuance of Canada bonds. In the riding I represent there has been a most sympathetic response to the issuance of these bonds. They are excellent and something that should become a permanent part of the government financial policy.

I have a few criticisms to make which are set out largely in the subamendment moved yesterday by the C.C.F. This subamendment reads:

That all the words in the amendment after "the calendar year 1946," be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

(1) by raising sufficiently the exemptions of those in the lower income brackets.

In my constituency, particularly among the working people, there is considerable disappointment that the exemptions were not raised to a greater extent. I think it would have been a better policy to have raised the exemption for single persons to $1,000 and for married persons to $1,800, and at the same time place more emphasis upon the sale of Canada bonds. I am quite sure that if the exemptions had been raised and the situation placed before the people there would have been a most generous response—I assume there will be anyway—to the appeal to purchase bonds. The sub-amendment continues:

(3) that the budget fails in the new offer to the provinces to provide for social security measures which will achieve a reasonable standard of economic security for all Canadians.

I know there was great disappointment throughout Canada, particularly among old age pensioners, over the failure of the dominion-provincial conference. I think this government should have announced, as a definite policy to be brought into effect in the near future, some scheme for the alleviation of the condition of these people. There are many people in these older groups, particularly those between the ages of sixty-five and seventy years, who are not able to qualify for old age pension and who also are not able to find a place in the labour market. I submit that provision should have been made for them in the budget. The subamendment continues:

(4) that the budget fails in its tax proposals to recognize the principle that cooperatives are non-profit-making organizations.

I am glad the Minister of Finance and the government did not succumb to the wooings of the income tax payers' association, but I do not think they have recognized the cooperative movement to the extent that they should have. Labour and the cooperative movement are the twin bulwarks of any democratic country. I have had long experience in the cooperative movement and I feel keenly about this. I think the percentage of my constituents who are members of the cooperative movement is greater than the percentage in any other constituency. We have service cooperatives, consumer cooperatives and agricultural cooperatives. I realize that this is a rather strong statement to make, particularly when I am looking at the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

I am speaking on behalf of the people in my district who support the cooperative movement and I urge this government to give that movement every encouragement possible. When the government went to the country at the last election they put out posters reading, "build for a new social order". If the government want to build that new social order they will have to get the cooperation of the people, and there is no group of people in this country doing more toward building a new social order than those who support the cooperative movement.

This evening the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) mentioned what had been done in his district in Nova Scotia, but I should like to give an illustration of what has been done in my constituency. In 1932 a few men who lived in Rossland, who were working for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, decided to form a cooperative to transport themselves from Rossland to Trail, a distance of about seven miles. At that time the charge made by a private company was ninety cents for the return trip. A half dozen men got together in 1932, formed a cooperative and purchased five or six seven-passenger cars. From then until the present time they worked steadily at the development of that cooperative until to-day it has 1,000 members whom it transports between those two cities for thirty-five cents the return trip. It has a fleet of fifty-seven passenger cars, a $50,000 garage, several clerks, and has subscribed for over $20,000 of victory bonds. Last year it was able to pay $10,000 in patronage dividends. I mention this as an illustration of what a group of people working together can do for themselves.

It is not only the financial advantage that counts; it is the effect that the cooperative endeavour has had upon the city of Rossland itself. It has permeated its way into the community. These men working in that movement have seen what can be done and they have formed a consumers' cooperative movement. They are to be found on the city council and in every public activity in the city. As a result of their activities there have been formed other organizations on the same basis which have proved to be extraordnarily successful. On behalf of the service cooperatives, the consumer cooperatives and the fruit organizations of Kootenay West I urge the government to give further recognition to the functions of the cooperatives in this changing society. The subamendment continues:

(2) that the budget fails to provide for the investment of public funds to bridge the gap between anticipated private investment and the total national investment required to assure a high national income and full employment.

The government has failed in not providing for a full programme of investment. This investment should not be limited to any extent to the immediate future. This is the time to plan for the future; this is the time the pattern should be drawn. If this government in this budget had announced to the Canadian people that where private enterprise failed to give good employment at decent wages the government had a programme to put those people to work at decent wages, I think it would have been accepted by the people of Canada as a genuine effort at the beginning of a new social order.

When it comes to the question of public investment, that means public expenditure. In that respect I suppose we shall be criticized by our hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party. I think I am correct, and if I am not I trust the hon. member for York West will correct me, when I say that we have had a balanced budget only on fifteen occasions since confederation. When it comes to a question of public investment, it is not a question of going into debt. This public investment will be an investment which justifies expenditure. It is entirely different from public expenditures for purely relief projects which do not get us anywhere.

I suggest that this budget would have had a tonic effect upon the Canadian people if some such proposal had been provided, if the government had shown the Canadian people that they were preparing for the future. I admit that with the labour situation, and possibly with the material situation at the present time, it would not be possible to expect any great expansion of public enterprise, but I think the pattern for the future should have been laid down in this budget.

I suggest that there are three or four forms of public investment to which this government should give serious consideration and to which I suggest this government will be giving serious consideration before long.

First, we should have a public investment programme for national housing. That is the first need of the Canadian people; to see our people properly housed and sheltered is our first duty. At the present time several housing projects are coordinated under the administration of one minister, but at the same time we are not tackling this problem in the way we should. We have discovered that in the veterans affairs committee. No one is personally responsible. We should have a large programme of subsidized housing to meet the needs of the Canadian people. That should be planned for in a programme of public investment which would be put into effect as the need develops.

In addition, I feel that there is a tremendous necessity for public investment in the development of irrigation schemes which are so sadly required by many of our good friends on the prairies and by many people in British Columbia, especially in the Okanagan valley, in northern British Columbia and in the Kootenays. That is a programme of public investment which would bring dividends in the way of increased production. It would be a sound investment from every point of view. I believe that at the present time it would not be possible to go very far, but there, again, I suggest that in a programme of public investment this government should be planning great schemes of irrigation projects in western Canada; for the future, water means food.

There is another opportunity for public investment which would absorb the labour slack in the future. There is a great need for a programme of doing away with grade crossings. I understand that there are 30,000 level crossings in this country and that only slightly more than 3,000 are protected. There is a type of public investment which would pay dividends in the saving of life and time and which would build up and improve our facilities. I suggest that this is another form of public investment which should be considered by this government.

I now come to a programme which is of serious concern to the people of southern British Columbia and to the residents of my constituency. As part of a public investment programme trans-Canada highways should be developed. The Canadian people require for the immediate future a good highway system for the transportation of commodities and for the attraction of tourists from the south. During the past few days I have had a number of letters from residents of my constituency pointing out that hundreds of United States tourists are actually visiting the Kootenays at the present time, and they all complain of the same thing, the poor condition of British Columbia roads, which prevents large numbers of tourists from coming. Here, again, I do not suggest that the time is ripe for the government to step in with a large programme of trans-Canada highway development, but the government should be laying plans for the future, for a system of trans-Canada highways that will be a credit to the country and reflect the wealth which this country can produce. I have here a brief which has been circulated generally throughout western Canada and in British Columbia. It was originally submitted to the dominion regional reconstruction council for Alberta by the Calgary board of trade. This brief deals in general with the possibilities of highway development in western Canada. I shall not read it in full because it is lengthy, but I shall read one or two of the reasons given why this organization believes in the necessity for the development of a dominion government trans-Canada highway programme:

1. To foster and encourage communication between the separate provinces of our dominion with a view to developing a national spirit.

2. To insure Canada to some extent against unemployment.

3. To attract American tourists and to capitalize on the favourable advertising we have received during the past six years.

4. To keep Canadian tourists at home by making motor travel in our own country as attractive as it is elsewhere.

5. To assist in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and forestry.

Then 6, and I am sure this will appeal to the hon. member for York West:

6. To provide a better and more adequate postal service in rural areas, and in communities not served by railways.

7. To improve the health of our nation by bringing hospital centres and medical services closer to our rural citizens through the use of motor transport.

8. To develop our educational system by providing roads over which buses may travel and bring the students to the centres where they will receive adequate and proper training.

9. To encourage farming by bringing the farmer closer to his market with the use of motor equipment.

10. To encourage immigration from the United States.

11. To assist the individual owner of a motor vehicle to operate same more economically.

12. To assist in creating a favourable balance of trade with the United States and thereby raise the standard of living in Canada.

In addition, the Nelson board of trade of my own constituency, supported by all the other boards of trade in the riding and branches of the legion, sent the following letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) early this spring:

To the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada.

Sir:

It is requested on the following grounds that the federal government contribute to the improvement of the highway between Medicine Hat in Alberta and Hope in British Columbia and that it be recognized as the southern route of the Trans-Canada highway.

(a) It is open for travel 365 days in the year whereas owing to climatic conditions, the northern route known as the Big Bend highway is open for travel for not more than five months in the year.

(b) It serves the most thickly populated area in the interior of British Columbia, the number of residents of the area being at least ten times that of the district contiguous to the Big Bend highway.

(c) It traverses a territory considerably more developed industrially than that adjacent to the Big Bend highway in mining, smelting, power, lumbering and agricultural activities, including among others the principal operations of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, of the power plants of the West Kootenay Power & Light Company Limited and the East Kootenay Power and Light Company Limited.

(d) The public works department of the government of British Columbia has under construction a 40-car capacity steel ferry with necessary landings and approaches to provide for the Kootenay lake crossing.

(e) It provides access to some of the outstanding scenic beauties of southern Alberta and British Columbia, including the Waterton, Kootenay, Slocan, Arrow and Okanagan lakes, which have great possibilities as tourist attractions which cannot be realized until the highway is made adequate for tourist travel.

(f) Throughout its length it is approximately parallel to and within a relatively short distance of the United States boundary and has many connections with the United States highway system.

(g) Its immediate improvement would relieve the unemployment which exists and will continue during the readjustment period.

That resolution is supported by all organizations and residents of my constituency. They are very much concerned about having the southern provincial route, a portion of the trans-Canada highway between Hope and the Alberta boundary, improved and extended. There is one rather unusual feature in connection with the suggestion for the development and extension of this southern provincial highway, and that is the suggestion to make arrangements to go through United States territory to avoid going over the Cascade mountains between Rossland and Grand Forks. Between Rossland and Grand Forks the road climbs to an elevation of 5,400 feet over the Rossland summit and the Cascade summit. The road involved an expenditure of large sums of money, but a satisfactory highway will never be built, owing to the steep nature of the banks and the trouble every spring with thaws. It is a very difficult route to keep open in winter. At the present time it is not kept open because of the great expense and most people travel from the interior of British Columbia to the coast by United States roads.

An hon. MEMBER: It misses Kamloops.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Kamloops is on the central trans-provincial highway. It just so happens, Mr. Speaker, that those mountains taper out five or six miles in United States territory; and if we could get permission either to purchase 300 feet of right of way in the United States between the American towns of Laurier and Patterson, or possibly get a section—the distance would be some 25 miles long by five miles deep—and have that made into an international memorial park, with special arrangements for immigration and customs, the matter could be dealt with in that way. In any event, the people of my district are very much concerned that the Canadian government shall make some arrangements with the government at Washington to enable us to get around the tapered end of the Cascade mountains through United States territory instead of, for all time, climbing over two mountain slopes unnecessarily.

In this connection I may say that I have travelled over the whole of the road with officials of the United States government and engineers of the department of public works of British Columbia. It is practically level country, its highest floor being some 200 feet below the city of Rossland, and the cost of construction would be very moderate.

In that connection a brief has been prepared by the Rossland junior board of trade. They have done a great deal of excellent work on this subject. I do not want to take the time of the house to read the brief, but the information contained in its couple of pages would, I believe, interest all hon. members; it has to do with a quite unusual proposal, and with the unanimous consent of the house I should like to place it on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The brief follows:

The Rossland Junior Board of Trade
Rossland, B.C.

The Victory Highway

Object

It is the purpose of this brief to submit preliminary information on a proposed alternative route for the new southern British Columbia trans-provincial highway between the city of Rossland and the city of Grand Forks. It is emphasized that the proposed project is intended as a post-war undertaking.

Present Route

The present highway—locally known as the Cascade highway—is a poor class gravel road at best. In the course of some 40 miles between Rossland and Christina lake—along north slopes practically all the way—it first rises to an elevation of 4,600 feet (Rossland summit), thence drops by a series of treacherous switchbacks to a valley floor, elevation 2,200 feet (Sheep creek), thence climbs a second summit to 5,000 feet elevation (Cascade summit), dropping again to the level of Christina lake, elevation 1,400 feet. Sixty per cent of the above highway is over 3,400 feet elevation, and snow conditions are such that keeping it open all winter is both costly and difficult, if not impossible. It is our contention that it would be an extremely costly undertaking to make this a first class route, and the snow clearance problems would still remain.

Alternative Routes

There exists between Rossland and Christina lake two north-south mountain ranges both extending from the international boundary to the Lower Arrow lake. The easterly range is over 5,000 feet in elevation except for two passes, the one at elevation 4,200 feet near Sheep lake, the other near the international boundary with an elevation of 4,600 feet and occupied by the present Cascade highway. Likewise, except for one 4,000-foot pass at Faron, the westerly range is over 5,000 feet elevation.

In addition to the present route, and the one which forms the subject of this brief, the following other routes have been proposed:

(a) Faron Route

This would involve costly rock work on the north shore of Lower Arrow lake, a ferry across that lake, and a narrow and precipitous 4,000-foot summit between Lower Arrow lake and Christina lake. This road would pass through relatively uninhabited country, by-passing both Trail and Rossland.

(b) Blueberry Creek Route

This route would traverse over 50 miles of entirely uninhabited country, cross over a 5,000-foot summit, and likewise by-pass both Trail and Rossland.

The Victory Highway

The salient feature of this route is that the two mountain ranges previously mentioned both taper off 5 to 6 miles south of the international boundary to elevations of 2,200 and 3,200 feet respectively.

The proposed route—mostly on southern slopes—would follow the present highway from Rossland to Patterson, from whence it would bear west following approximately the course of an existing United States road, for a distance of roughly 25 miles, thence reentering Canada at Laurier.

Construction would be mostly bull-dozer work, the only rock work being a half-mile stretch at the headwaters of Deep creek in Box canyon, a dry canyon.

The average maximum depth of snow along the whole route occurs at Rossland, B.C., where it averages 3 feet yearly. Elsewhere the average is between 1 and 2 feet. Under these conditions, winter maintenance should be relatively easy.

The over-all distance between Rossland and Grand Forks would be about 35 miles, a reduction of from 6 to 10 miles over the present cascade highway. Faster travelling time would be possible along the proposed highway, the grades being less extreme.

Benefits

The proposed Victory highway route would:

(a) Facilitate the movement of agricultural produce to and from the prairies, Grand Forks district, Okanagan, and coast points.

(b) Stimulate tourist traffic in this district. At the present time travel through this district is severely curtailed due to the fear of traversing the treacherous Cascade highway.

(c) Provide year-round bus and freight traffic service between the Kootenay and Grand Forks district, and a highly important link in the southern B.C. trans-provincial highway.

International Aspects

During the winter months the only road link between Rossland and Grand Forks is by a roundabout route through the United States, the Cascade highway being closed due to heavy snow conditions; freight carriers are compelled to travel under bond and seal.

The following means of overcoming international complications that would arise in connection with building the proposed highway are suggested:

(a) That an area extending approximately from Patterson to Danville and from 5 to 6 miles each side of the boundary, be set aside as an international memorial park, and that travel within this area be as free as possible of customs and immigration formalities.

(b) That the Canadian government either lease, or purchase from the United States, a strip of land 300 feet wide. Most of the land is in a forest reserve in which there are few settlers.

Conclusions

The present road link (Cascade highway) between the Trail-Rossland district and the Grand Forks area is inadequate, and it would be extremely expensive to make it a first-class highway. Alternate routes through Canada are not attractive.

We feel that a first-class road link between the above-mentioned areas is vital to the continued prosperity of southeastern B.C., and suggest the Victory highway project be given very serious consideration.

I brought up this matter in the provincial legislature, and the Premier of British Columbia stated that it would be brought to the attention of the proper authorities in Ottawa. Some time ago the Rossland junior board of trade and other organizations wrote to the premier of British Columbia, and he replied to the effect that the matter was being taken up with Ottawa and that they were waiting to hear from the east. Then I wrote the Department of External Affairs, but nobody there knew anything about it. Then I asked for the production of all papers and correspondence between the government of British Columbia or any official of the government of British Columbia and the government of the Dominion of Canada or any official of the dominion government, but again I was told that no one knows anything about it. So that I do not know what has happened to date, and I should certainly like to know what is being done in connection with these proposals for this new diversion into United States territory.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is slipping away very quickly. I am not going on at greater length, except to again emphasize my belief—and it is not my belief only but that of many other people in this country—that the budget should have contained evidences of the government's approach to the reconstruction period, that it should have provided for a programme of public investment for the future, for a housing erection project, for doing away with level crossings, and for a great development of the trans-Canada highway system. I trust that, while this government has not seen fit at this time to give effect to these proposals, when the next budget comes before this house we shall see that the government has reacted favourably to these proposals and is doing the things which I know all of us realize the Canadian people wish to see it do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I call it eleven o'clock?

Mr. BENTLEY: May I move the adjournment of this debate?

On motion of Mr. Ross (Souris) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before adjourning the house, it is my duty to call the attention of hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 102, article 239, in which they may read:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (o) read from a written, previously prepared speech.

Many times since the beginning of this session I thought I should call the attention of hon. members to this rule; but I hesitated to do so. However, I feel that it is my duty now, particularly to-night, to draw the attention of hon. members on both sides of the house to this rule, and to tell them that I feel I should call to order in future members whenever they read their speeches.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 10, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

POWER TO PURCHASE CERTAIN LANDS AND TO BORROW PURCHASE MONEYS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 299, respecting the Toronto Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister give an explanation of this?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of this bill is to authorize the harbour commissioners of Toronto to purchase a tract of land having an area of 3·4 acres lying north of their present holdings on the north side of Fleet street and east of Fort York armouries in the city of Toronto. The bill also gives to the Toronto harbour commissioners authority to issue debentures in order to raise money with which to pay the purchase price. The powers contained in the bill are in addition to and supplemental of the powers already contained in the Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act, 1911.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the city corporation approved the purchase as indicated in the text of the bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand it has.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MICHAUD—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On the front page of this morning's issue of the Gazette there appears an article headed, "Debate on controversial budget carried on before empty seats." As the title suggests, this article criticizes severely, without justification, hon. members of the House of Commons. If the reporter had taken the trouble to inquire into the cause of the absence of a large number of members yesterday afternoon he would have found out that a great many of them were busy in attendance before a large and important committee. The reporter stated that there have been 245 members in the house during the course of the present session but, as we all know, three vacancies have occurred. Either the reporter's sense of observation is no keener than his judgment, or else he is disclosing an unusual lack of good faith, and that requires no further comment.

Mr. GRAYDON: You cannot accuse that reporter of bad faith.

†Recoveries of subsidy were made through the Department of Munitions and Supply on potatoes consumed by the armed forces. These recoveries together with other adjustments in subsidies paid, exceeded the total sums of claims paid by the amount of the figures marked †.

Note: Difference between subsidy payment in the years 1945 and 1946 as compared with importations is explained by the fact that some of the 1946 expenditure is applicable to importations during November and December 1945. On the other hand, the 1946 figure will increase with settlement of outstanding claims applicable to the shown imports.

EXPORTS OF FARM IMPLEMENTS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What were the yearly (a) exports; (b) imports of farm machinery and farm machinery parts for the ten-year period 1936-1945, inclusive, and 1946 to the latest date possible, showing (1) quantities of binders, drills, ploughs, combines, harrows, farm machinery parts and repairs, etc.; (2) value; (c) countries exported to and imported from?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am advised that it will take three persons from a week to ten days to compile this information. The material has been published already by the bureau of statistics, and my officials tell me that they will be glad to wait on the hon. member for Melfort and point out to him the various places where the information can be obtained or assist him in any other way to get the information. If that is satisfactory to the hon. member I suggest that the question be dropped in the meantime.

Mr. WRIGHT: Dropped.

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Has the government received any recent request from the Saskatchewan government, or the city council of Moose Jaw, to use the old No. 32 airport for housing accommodation?

2. Have any Japanese or Japanese Canadian citizens been recently housed in this former airport?

Mr. COLDWELL: There are no others?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are no others. I have made inquiry in our department and in the Department of National Revenue, and there is none there. If the hon. gentleman would like to let this motion stand until he verifies the fact that the information is already on the table, well and good; or perhaps he might agree to having it dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will take the minister's word for it. I am prepared to drop the motion.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $22,550,000 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1946; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $22,500,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, it would appear that Mr. Speaker's reading of the resolution was somewhat different from that which appears on the order paper, and we should like to know with which resolution the Governor General has been made acquainted.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The resolution on the order paper is not the one read by Your Honour.

Mr. SPEAKER: In those circumstances I will permit the hon. gentleman to give an explanation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not follow Your Honour's reading of the resolution, but I am told by one of my colleagues that through inadvertence Your Honour read one line of the resolution twice.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. STIRLING: It was a great deal more than that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman will have to explain what is wrong. This is the resolution that has received approval.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do we take it that the resolution on the order paper is the one which the minister has moved and which has received the commendation of the Governor General?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Motion agreed to.

DISCREPANCY BETWEEN RESOLUTION READ BY MR. SPEAKER AND RESOLUTION ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. SPEAKER: This afternoon, after I read the motion of the Minister of Finance under the item "Government Notices of Motion", the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) drew the attention of the minister to the fact that the motion read by Mr. Speaker and the motion on the order paper were not similar. Since that incident happened, I had an opportunity to compare the two motions and to ask for an explanation. With the permission of hon. members I shall read to them the memorandum which has been prepared for my information.

There would seem to have been a discrepancy between the resolution as read by Mr. Speaker this afternoon in the house respecting the Canadian National Railway finances and the resolution as it appears on the order paper. The practice has always been to make up these resolutions as they appear in the back of the Votes and Proceedings under "Notices of Motions". This was done in this case as part of the regular procedure in the journals office. Whenever there is any correction or alteration made by the minister or member in charge, there has always existed an arrangement by which the journals office is notified in advance so that the corrected resolution or notice of motion may be substituted before it reaches Mr. Speaker. This was not done in this particular case and as a consequence the wrong resolution was placed before Mr. Speaker. I might point out in this connection that the reason that such papers are made up in advance is that the house sometimes decides to proceed with its business as it is printed in the back of the Votes and Proceedings. This often occurs toward the end of the session. I may say that steps are being taken to prevent a recurrence of the incident.

SPECIAL OPERATORS

BENEFITS TO SPECIAL OPERATORS ENROLLED IN CANADA BY UNITED KINGDOM AUTHORITIES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to make applicable the allowances and benefits accorded a veteran, to certain persons described as "special operators" who were enrolled in Canada by United Kingdom authorities for special duty during world war II, under the Veterans Land Act, 1942, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, Part I of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, the Civil Service Act, the Pension Act, the Income War Tax Act, the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, and the War Service Grants Act, 1944.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TEXTILE MILLS IN MONTREAL AND VALLEYFIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Have representatives of the textile workers asked for an appointment with the Minister of Labour to discuss the labour dispute between the textile mills in Montreal and Valleyfield and the textile workers, and is there anything the minister can do in connection with this dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I think about twenty or thirty hon. members received similar telegrams, and they came to see me yesterday. I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question. My reply is that a telegram addressed to myself by R. Kent Rowley, Canadian director of the United Textile Workers' Association, was received yesterday. On my behalf, Mr. M. M. Maclean, director of industrial relations of the Department of Labour, sent the following answer:

Retel to Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, am directed to inform you that as Dominion Textile and Montreal Cottons strikes are under jurisdiction of and are being dealt with by provincial authorities, minister feels no useful purpose can be accomplished by meeting union delegation as requested.

On June 18, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) asked me if there would be federal intervention in this strike. My reply will be found on page 2590 of Hansard.

UNITED NATIONS

INVITATION TO PEACE CONFERENCE TO OPEN IN PARIS JULY 29

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this morning at half past eleven o'clock His Excellency the Ambassador of France called at the office of the Department of External Affairs and handed the under-secretary of state the following communication addressed to myself. The communication is in French. I shall give to the house a translation, and shall see that a copy of the original also appears in Hansard of to-day:

Ambassade de France,
Au Canada,
Ottawa, le 10 juillet 1946.

Monsieur le premier ministre,

Mon Gouvernement m'a chargé de vous transmettre la communication suivante:

"Le gouvernement français, agissant au nom du Conseil des ministres des Affaires étrangères, a, conformément à la décision du Conseil en date du 4 juillet 1946, l'honneur d'inviter le gouvernement canadien, désigné au paragraphe 2 du texte précité comme devant participer à l'examen des traités de paix avec l'Italie, la Roumanie, la Bulgarie, la Hongrie et la Finlande, à envoyer une délégation pour le représenter à la Conférence qui s'ouvrira le 29 juillet 1946 à Paris au Palais du Luxembourg. Les projets de traités de paix avec l'Italie, la Roumanie, la Bulgarie, la Hongrie et la Finlande préparés par le Conseil des ministres des Affaires étrangères seront communiqués le plus tôt possible au gouvernement canadien en vue de faciliter le travail de la Conférence. Des propositions concernant l'organisation et les règlements de la procédure recommandées à sa considération sont remises à l'ambassade du Canada à Paris".

Veuillez agréer, monsieur le premier ministre, les assurances de ma plus haute considération.

J. de Hautecloque.

Le très honorable Mackenzie King,
Premier ministre du Canada,
Secrétaire d'Etat aux Affaires extérieures,

Translation Embassy of France in Canada
Ottawa, July 10, 1946.

Mr. Prime Minister:

My government has directed me to transmit to you the following communication:

"The French government, acting in the name of the Council of Foreign Ministers, has, in keeping with the decision of the council taken on July 4, 1946, the honour to invite the government of Canada, designated in paragraph 2 of the text of the council's decision, as being entitled to participate in the consideration of treaties of peace with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland, to send a delegation to represent Canada at the conference which will open on July 29, 1946, at the Luxembourg Palace in Paris. The draft treaties of peace with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland drawn up by the Council of Foreign Ministers will be communicated to the government of Canada as soon as possible, with a view to facilitating the work of the conference. Detailed particulars of the organization of the conference and of the rules of procedure recommended for consideration will be forwarded to the Canadian Embassy in Paris.

Will you accept, Mr. Prime Minister, the assurance of my high consideration.

(signed) J. de Hautecloque.

The Right Honourable Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa.

I have not had the opportunity since the receipt of this invitation to bring its representations to the attention of my colleagues. Therefore I do not feel in a position at the moment to give the house further information than that the invitation has been received. I hope to-morrow to be able to make a statement as to the government's decision with respect to the delegation.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice when the last report of the espionage commission will be filed. I noticed that ten days ago it had been sent to the printers. When will it be laid on the table?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am afraid the hon. member is a little bit misinformed as to the date on which it was sent to the printer. Parts of the report have been in the hands of the printer since much more than ten days ago, but the last portion of it was sent to the printer, I understand, only last Friday or Saturday morning. It is now in the hands of the printer and also in the hands of the translators, and it is hoped that it will be ready for tabling at a very early day. The printers and translators have been advised that it was hoped they would lose no time in making it available for tabling.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLERS FOR STEEL INDUSTRY

In the course of the budget debate:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, hon. members should be informed immediately, I believe, that the government to-day has appointed a controller and three deputy controllers for Algoma Steel Corporation Limited; Steel Company of Canada Limited; and Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation Limited. I table herewith copy of the order in council.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The government has taken this action to assure, as far as it is humanly possible to do so, that work will continue in these important plants.

All three plants are producing coke on a large scale which is being routed by the fuel controller for heating and cooking purposes, and any interruption in the production of coke will impair the already short supply of fuel in sight for Canada's needs.

Furthermore, the continued production of steel is basic in the economy of the nation and any stoppage of the work in these three plants would affect the entire economic fabric of the country.

I am sure hon. members will have followed the various reports, including statements by officials of the steel workers' union, that a strike date would be set on July 12 in the steel industry. You will recall that on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour for the province of Ontario I appointed the Hon. Mr. Justice W. D. Roach, as an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner, and he has been endeavouring to mediate the dispute and bring the parties into agreement and while his efforts have resulted in bringing them closer to an understanding they have not as yet been entirely successful and rather than wait until a stoppage of work occurred, it has been deemed advisable to take the action I am now reporting.

Not only the workers of the three companies concerned and their families would have been affected by a stoppage of work in these plants but also hundreds of thousands of workers in industrial employment directly and indirectly related to steel would have faced the prospect of unemployment within a short time and production in many lines would have been slowed down and stopped.

Mr. F. B. Kilbourn of Montreal, formerly steel controller, has been appointed as controller of the three companies. Mr. B. G. Sullivan of Toronto, Mr. J. Argyle of Ottawa, and Mr. H. R. Pettigrove of Halifax, have been appointeed deputy controllers.

Mr. Justice Roach has consented to continue to mediate the dispute between the interested parties. The companies and the union will continue their negotiations with a view to the settlement of the matters at present in dispute between them.

It will be recalled that the national and regional war labour boards have recently been given an extension of powers in connection with wage rates and are now authorized to fix wages on a just and reasonable basis consistent with the all important matter of retaining price control.

It will be appreciated that Canada, at the present time, is going through a very critical period. If there is too great a strain placed on the wage structure, it will have a disastrous effect on the whole policy of price control.

We have recently seen the results of sudden abandonment of price control with our neighbours to the south It has been publicized from an authoritative source that prices have shot up 12·7 per cent.

The Canadian Congress of Labour unions are holding a meeting of the wage policy committee in Hamilton to-day, and I wish to report that I have sent a telegram to the chairman of the committee, Mr. Conroy, and at this point I would like to read a copy of this telegram:

Ottawa, Ont., July 9, 1946.

Mr. Pat Conroy,
c/o Royal York Hotel,
Toronto, Ont.

In view of the meeting of your wage policy committee I feel impelled with the friendliest of feelings to place before you and your colleagues the following views. According to the latest reliable information obtainable the abandonment of price control in the United States has resulted in a 12·7 per cent increase in certain living costs and an average estimated at 10 per cent. I do not need to emphasize to you the gravity of a similar inflation spiral developing in Canada which might quite easily occur with unrestricted wage increases leading to the abandonment of price control. Those in the best position to judge state most emphatically that wage increases beyond an amount considered just and reasonable cannot be made effective if price control is to be retained. Again it is the considered opinion of those best able impartially to assess the present economic situation in Canada that increases in wages beyond ten cents per hour and in some instances less will force a break in the price ceiling. Amendments recently made to the wage control order have cleared the way for favourable consideration of application to war labour boards for just and reasonable increases in wages and it is my hope that all labour leaders should see the wisdom of using the machinery provided by the wage control order as revised rather than resort to threats of strike and strike action. On numerous occasions I have commended labour for its cooperation in making the policy of price control effective and I should regret very greatly at this time any action by organized labour which would place such a strain upon the price ceiling that it would crack and bring about an inflationary situation which would be detrimental to the interests of all workers and many others whose incomes never rise as rapidly as prices once inflation sets in. Referring to our recent conversation connection with B.C. wage settlements you may have noticed I stated recently in the House of Commons that the B.C. interior lumber, logging and box manufacturing industries settled with the I.W.A. for a ten-cent per hour increase.

Humphrey Mitchell,
Minister of Labour.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 9, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in pre-war years it was the custom in this chamber to have the budget presented by the Minister of Finance in the first quarter of the year. During the war years it eventually became the custom to bring down the budget about half way through the current year. In 1945, after the termination of the war, the annual budget was presented I believe on October 12, in the third quarter of the year. Now for 1946 we are to miss entirely an effective budget; for by the financial statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 27, 1946, we were informed that no taxation changes will take place until January 1, 1947. After the reported statement of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) last March that Canadians would probably receive a fifty per cent reduction in 1946 income tax, the budget presentation by the Minister of Finance can be said to be very disappointing to the citizens of Canada. It is especially disappointing because of the fact that it discourages the production in Canada of many essentials until January 1, 1947. I think that is well borne out by the minister in his budget presentation.

In an address on March 20, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated at page 120 of Hansard:

I believe that a bushel of wheat will buy more goods in Canada than a bushel of wheat produced in any other country will buy goods in that country.

I wish to place on Hansard some figures as to the number of bushels of wheat required to purchase certain articles in this country:

To purchase a Farmall M. Tractor, International, in Canada requires 1,225 bushels of wheat. To purchase the same tractor in the United States requires 669 bushels of wheat.

To purchase a three-furrow International tractor plough in Canada requires 151 bushels of wheat. To purchase the same plough in the United States requires 83 bushels of wheat.

To purchase a 24-run International double disc drill in Canada requires 270 bushels of wheat. To purchase the same drill in the United States requires 147 bushels of wheat.

To purchase a 10-foot International power binder in Canada requires 333 bushels of wheat. To purchase the same binder in the United States requires 183 bushels of wheat.

May I add that these were the figures before the end of June of this year, when price ceilings prevailed in both countries. Moreover they do not take into account the increase of 12½ per cent on Canadian manufactured farm implements and other recent changes which have played a part in this great disparity. The disparity in the purchase price of automobiles in each country is at least twenty-five per cent greater than in the case of farm implements.

I do not think any minister will rise in his place and say that these are not essential articles on any farm in Canada. So I think that the statement of the minister and other statements of a like nature are disproved by these facts. To purchase that same tractor would require in Canada the price of twelve finished 1,000-pound steers, while in the United States for the same type of tractor the proceeds of only eight such animals would be required. In a practical way that is convincing evidence of the great disparity existing in these two countries, prior to July 1 of this year; everybody knows that things are in a turmoil down there and the present disparity is very much greater.

As was pointed out in discussions yesterday, the output of farm equipment has been reduced by the lack of steel, and authorities in the United States say that this type of production in that country will be decreased this year by twenty-five to thirty per cent. I am sure nobody will disagree when I say that full production is the true basis of real wealth. Productivity of essential goods is real wealth in this or any other nation, and we should never lose sight of that fact.

I have here the current Review of Agricultural Conditions in Canada, issued by the statistical branch of the Department of Agriculture, for June, 1946. In this magazine it is set forth that since January 1, 1946, that is during the past six months, cattle slaughterings in Canada have decreased by 12 per cent, hog slaughterings by 30 per cent, milk production by 3 per cent, and dairy cows on Canadian farms by almost 2 per cent—to be exact, 1·9 per cent. As this pamphlet is issued by the Department of Agriculture I do not suppose anybody will challenge these figures.

In the matter of personal income tax changes to become effective on January 1, 1947, the inequity of the difference which has been maintained between the wife who works in industry or an office and the farmer's wife has been repeatedly argued by myself and others in this house since 1942, when that disparity was created, allowing the wife and the man who worked in industry or in the office an exemption of $1,860. I want to object to the provision decreasing the wife's earnings exemption to $250. A levelling up process should have taken place rather than a levelling down process. This, again, affects production of much-required foodstuffs at this time and in this country. I am sure the minister has received representations in favour of allowing the farmer's wife a certain amount of exemption in respect of dairy produce raised on the farm, poultry, eggs, garden produce, and so on, and I know that managers of creameries have asked that this concession be made in order to increase the output of foodstuffs. I am sure that if that had been done it would have made a big difference in the production of these articles which I have mentioned. Rather than decrease the exemption from $660 to $250 there should have been a levelling up process in favour of the farm wife and of all married people, because it would certainly have aided in the much needed production of foodstuffs.

With respect to taxation of cooperatives, it is my view that it should not be retroactive on the patronage dividends; and that, as I understand it, is the meaning of the statement made by the minister, although I admit that some of his arguments and observations were vague and hard to understand. Therefore I simply repeat that I do not think these patronage dividends should be taxed on a retroactive basis, as I understand they are bound to be.

Mr. ILSLEY: No retroactive legislation is proposed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): As I said, some of the terms used by the minister are vague. However, the proper place to discuss this matter in detail will be in committee of the whole, when we can carry on a question and answer discussion with the minister, and I intend to do so.

I should like to support what my colleague, our financial critic, said the other day about the civil service. We have many very efficient civil servants, but, as he pointed out, in pre-war days there were about 70,000, and during the war the number has increased to approximately 150,000. One year after the termination of the war there has been a decrease of approximately one-half per cent—less than one per cent. Sometimes it is difficult to decide just who are within the civil service and who are in other branches of work under the government to-day.

I want to make some reference to the matter of controls and controllers as they operate in this country, and more especially with respect to their hindrance to the reestablishment of our veterans. I would make one specific reference, the matter of a young fellow named Tate, about whom I wrote the minister on June 28. This young chap wrote to me enclosing copy of a letter he had received from the sugar administrator at Winnipeg, Mr. J. S. McDiarmid, Jr., pointing out that he did not think his request could be considered. He had asked for a sugar ration for curing meat in a quick-freeze plant he was establishing at Killarney and hoped to have operating by July 15. The last sentence in the administrator's reply was:

> We regret that present regulations do not allow any deviation from this policy.

That decision prohibits this young man from reestablishing himself with his own money. He is not asking for any financial assistance. As I say, I gave the minister this correspondence on June 28, and he acknowledged it, but his reply did not give any encouragement that something would be done in this respect. I am not going to read all Mr. Tate's letter, because it contains some pretty rough language, but he says:

> I am starting a quick-freeze locker plant at Killarney, and would like very much to get a sugar quota for the cure of meats in this plant . . .
> I joined the army on August 7, 1940, and was discharged on November 6, 1945. I spent four and a half years overseas, and if this is not enough service to qualify me for a little consideration now that I am trying to reestablish myself on my own money and time I sure don't know what in h— you people think we were doing over there.
> I know damn well we weren't enjoying the home life and comforts that a lot in Canada were, and we sure didn't get anything to eat like the forces that were at home.
> Hoping to hear from you soon.

It is matters such as this which cause contention, and it is difficult to pacify veterans who are faced with such difficulties in trying to establish themselves with their own funds in civil life. Again, it is a matter of controls and controllers. I could cite other cases, and I do want to register my objection to this sort of thing at this time.

I should like to make reference to what I consider to be Canada's number one problem, that of housing. It is a problem confronting everybody in every walk of life throughout this nation to-day, more especially our veterans and their dependents. True, we have the National Housing Act, War-time Housing, the Veterans Land Act, the small holdings scheme, all of which are supposed to be coordinated under the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), and in the operation of these measures everything is being centralized in or near the large cities of Canada. I think that that, in principle, is definitely wrong. We should be decentralizing these enterprises as far as possible. It is utterly impossible for people to get financial assistance in the smaller centres. The National Housing Act is not operative in any town or village west of the great lakes, so far as I can ascertain. In this respect national housing is so far a complete washout. In fact, I know some fairly large cities where they cannot get assistance because the lending companies refuse to cooperate. That is a disgraceful state of affairs at this time, so long after the termination of the war, and in a country like this. Wartime Housing has developed what I am sure will prove in the future to be slums in certain cities of Canada. We have such a condition in Winnipeg, and I hate to think of the future of that settlement.

Under the Veterans Land Act, small holdings, a most extravagant spending orgy is in process with the result that the veteran and his family are not receiving value for the money expended on the houses that are being built under the present system. The houses are built on the cost plus basis, which means more waste and more profit. That is the principle that was carried out by the Minister of Reconstruction. The people were willing to let it go during the war years in the erection of airports and other buildings needed for the training of our men, but the matter is altogether different when you come to consider some of these projects of which I am speaking. Let me mention only one, that of Charleswood in Manitoba, where there are ninety housing units. The cost is appalling, and the houses are not yet completed. For a four or five roomed unit the cost is from $5,900 up to $7,000 and more, and there is further expense to be added. Having gone through these homes and inspected the material and the workmanship, I venture to say that the veterans who will live in these units will not get fifty per cent of real value from them when they buy them. To-day, under the process of adjustment, the veterans are paying a rent of $25 for a four-room unit and $30 for one of five rooms, and they are informed that an attempt may be made to increase the rent from $5 to $10 a month.

Mr. McILRAITH: What project?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Charleswood. This is a most extravagant type of construction, and I say that for this reason. To build a single storey house is much more expensive and extravagant than to put up one of two storeys because I am convinced that, once you have your basement under the one-storey structure, to build a two-storey house, instead of having just one storey, will mean an average expenditure of about fourteen per cent above what you have already spent, and in addition you will have approximately another seventy per cent of cubic living space. There is therefore a considerable difference in cost to the people who are getting the homes.

The cost plus basis is entirely wrong, most extravagant, and is a source of unnecessary expenditure to the taxpayers. Yet that is a principle which is approved by the government to-day, apart from any investigation now proceeding with respect to graft at some other points of construction. I submit that the principle is wrong. The taxpayers have a right to raise a strenuous objection to this manner of handling public money, even though something must be done, and done in a big way, to house these veterans, who are entitled to every consideration.

It strikes me as strange that housing material grown and produced in British Columbia can be transported to the British isles and converted into homes that are larger and more convenient for less money than houses cost the veterans in Canada to-day. That is the situation that exists at this moment. I trust that something will be done to create a better and more economical system of housing in Canada. In my opinion the present unsatisfactory condition is due to a lack of previous planning more than to any other cause. I do not believe that proper thought and planning were given this gigantic undertaking in due time to meet the necessities of the day.

A matter that I have been concerned about for some years is that our best educated young people in Canada have been leaving their native land to seek employment elsewhere. On this point I would refer to certain observations of Professor Brebner, who has made a considerable study of this subject by means of independent funds in the United States. He says it is estimated that one-quarter of the number of Canadian-born who have remained in North America lives in the United States. The census records of that country show more than 77 per cent of Canadian-born citizens living in the urban areas, with the heaviest concentration of Canadians in the New England states, in New York and Michigan, while there are more than 100,000 Canadians living in the single city of Detroit. It is a very long article, and the author goes into very great detail, pointing out the reasons for his conclusions. He states that we shall probably lose 20,000 Canadian-born this year who will be taking up residence in the United States. That estimate is very low, because from the first of January of this year up to the first of June some 21,000 native-born Canadians have left this country to seek homes in the United States. He points out that this movement reached its greatest height in the period between 1921 and 1930, when 924,515 Canadians migrated to the United States; and up to 1944 the number of persons recorded as entering the United States from Canada, in the period of 125 years, totalled 3,047,704. The 1940 census showed the number of Canadian-born in the United States at that date to be 1,044,119. Someone may say that there are a number of Americans in Canada, but the percentage is very small in comparison with these figures.

The reason given for this situation, in this professor's findings, is lack of opportunity in Canada, and in the broad picture it is estimated that ninety per cent of the Canadians who have gone to the United States have emigrated because of lack of economic opportunities on this side. But the answer is not only economic; for this professor, I read, is convinced that some kind of assistance must have been lacking in Canada as well. He gives various reasons. He says, for instance:

> Canada needs to detect, train, encourage and retain every scholar she can find, for they will constitute the principal group who will keep Canada up with the rapidly changing world, who will bring Canadian brains and experience to bear on Canadian problems, and who will pass on to youth and to the nation at large the vital traditions from the past.

I have raised the same issue concerning agricultural scientists who have found it necessary to leave this country for better remuneration, and who have done so on more than one occasion in the past. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that a nation such as Canada cannot continue indefinitely and successfully alongside a nation such as the United States of America with this great economic disparity prevailing. Surely, with our great undeveloped natural resources and our wide open spaces, we can build up an economy that will attract good citizens in great numbers to establish themselves in Canada and at the same time to provide required opportunities for our native-born Canadians.

I was one of those who throughout the war years, with an eye to ending the war as quickly as possible, repeated in several discussions in this house my belief that a dominion-provincial conference was essential before a proper reconstruction programme could be developed in Canada. During the recent conference in this building some two months ago I followed the proceedings very carefully and I have reread the record of those proceedings. In my opinion there was certainly no effort by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance to negotiate a satisfactory settlement at that conference. In that respect, the citizens of Canada might well read the remarks of Premier Manning of Alberta on the uncompromising rigidity of the Minister of Finance, and the remarks of Premier Angus Macdonald of Nova Scotia, who was one of the ministers of national defence in the present government throughout the war. Everyone who can obtain a copy of the proceedings should read carefully the record of the remarks made by the premiers and the officials who sat around that conference table for five interesting days.

May I conclude by saying that I wish to support the amendment made by my colleague, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), which reads as follows:

This house regrets:

(1) That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946;

(2) That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government;

(3) That the policies of the government are discouraging much-needed production.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): In rising to take part in this debate I shall confine myself particularly to the matter of the taxation of cooperatives. I believe that is important, and that the minister and his colleagues need some elementary education on the workings of cooperative associations. I am going to be elementary to-day for the simple reason that the minister may understand these elementary principles—he gives no indication of it in his budget proposals. It is well for the house and the country to know that the minister has at least been told what these elementary principles are.

Of course I cannot entirely ignore the callous disregard of the government for the people in the low income brackets. They have been given a miserable $90 increase in exemption. That means that a single person now has an exempted income of slightly over $2 a day—hardly enough to pay for the meals of an hon. member in the parliamentary restaurant for one day. It seems to me utterly cruel to expect these people to live on the amounts allowed. It is such a small amount that it is on a par with the old story of the Scotsman who came home and told his wife that he had just received an increase in pay. They were jubilant about it, and she said: "How shall we celebrate, Sandy?" He said: "I dinna ken, lass, but at least we shall start by tossing the canary another seed." The government is celebrating the end of the war by tossing another crumb to the people in the low income brackets.

In his budget speech, as reported at page 2920 of Hansard, the minister made this statement:

I am now in a position to say that in general the government accepts the commission's report as the basis of its proposals with respect to the taxation of trading cooperatives, credit unions and mutual insurance organizations.

Of course, the commission referred to is the McDougall commission. Throughout the minister's remarks on this matter—and it is one of extreme importance to many people in Canada—he clearly indicated that he is so thoroughly imbued with the belief that the returns on capital are more important than the welfare of human beings, that he has disregarded the welfare of the kind of human beings who make up these cooperatives.

In discussing this matter I propose to show two glaring examples of this predilection on the minister's part. It is apparent to me that the minister has made no study of the underlying principles of the cooperative movement or the cooperative associations, in spite of the fact that these associations have been in existence a long time in many countries. Anyone who studies world affairs, even in a casual way, is aware of the existence of these organizations for a long time. They have been established in Britain, in Russia and in the Scandinavian countries for many years, and for a great many years have been developing on the North American continent. They were established for the distinct purpose of endeavouring to improve the living standards of people in the low income groups. They have been accepted by a great many responsible people in this country, as I shall prove later, as important institutions for that purpose.

These cooperative associations are the natural outcome of the needs of people in the low income groups. They have tried to find some method of protecting themselves by being thrifty in a world of grab and greed, where monopoly enterprise, semi-monopoly enterprise and large business institutions have so much power in so many places. The only protection these ordinary income earners had was to form an association governed and controlled by themselves so that in a thrifty manner through cooperative enterprise they could save for themselves as much of their earnings as possible. It is entirely distinct from any private or corporate enterprise, because in an ordinary corporate or private enterprise the primary purpose is a return on capital. Let us look that over. In an ordinary enterprise, say a private company, before they begin the promotion stage the first thing that happens in the mind of somebody or of a small group of people is that they believe that by engaging in a specific industry, productive or distributive, there would be some profit in it. The next thing is to attract enough capital in the way of purchase of shares or other things in the business, with the promise that on the investment of the capital itself the investor will receive a reward in the way of interest or dividends. When that has been done and the business is set up, we find that all the elements of democracy inherent in the cooperative association are entirely lacking in the private corporation, because in the first place each share carries a vote. A small group of people can control a large number of shares so that the whole control can be in the hands of a minority.

Another reason is that with the sale of the shares, these requests for investment all over the country, people may buy shares, invest in this company for the monetary reward, but they will have no control because they live too far away from the headquarters of the organization to attend the annual meetings. The result is that they either have no voice or they give their shares to a proxy who votes on their behalf. The cooperative organization is entirely and distinctly different in its whole set-up and purpose. In the first place it is not formed until a considerable number of people in a local area, who have a common project or common purpose to achieve for themselves, decide that it is necessary to establish the organization on their own behalf. There is no expectation of a return on capital. It is usually formed among people in such a low income group that it is difficult to find the necessary capital for a large number of them to get started. But they do find it for the purpose, and the capital required is provided by the people themselves from their own pockets or from whatever way they can get it. They do not expect to receive much or any return on their capital. The investment takes the form of the purchase of a share in the capital stock of the company. Some organizations permit the purchase of more than one share; some allow the purchase of only one share, but no matter how many shares each or every individual may own, one individual has only one vote; that vote demonstrates his responsibility to help govern and formulate the policy of the organization, and by that action his right to enjoy its benefits. It is strictly democratic, and it is that principle of the cooperative which the minister in his proposals, as I shall show as I go along, is going to smash. Directors are elected, then, by these people, and usually in the smaller cooperatives they are located around a central point. It is not difficult for them to get to the annual meeting, and there they have a voice; there they elect their officers, and the elected officers appoint the necessary management to carry on the physical operations of the business.

Money originally subscribed is used to provide facilities, to stock shelves, and to acquire whatever goods and services are necessary and to make provision for their distribution among the members. When a cooperative store is set up, the money from the members is used collectively for that purpose. That is a distinct difference which a great many people seem utterly unable to understand. They cannot get clearly in their minds the fact that a member who walks into a cooperative store to get a pound of tea has already, in combination with his associates, bought that pound of tea with his own money, and has placed it there on the shelves. When he takes the tea away, he leaves only enough money there to replace it, so that it may always be there for him or for one of his colleagues in the association. It is not a purchase made for the purpose of providing the owner or operator of the cooperative store with a profit, because that store is his store. The member simply leaves his money there.

Why does he leave so much money there? He leaves it because at the beginning of the season the elected directors and management, who are appointed, decide as to the membership, the clientele and business they are likely to have, and what receipts that business is likely to require to pay all costs of operation and wholesale purchase prices. I am speaking of a cooperative store, but the same principle would be applied to a service organization or to any other cooperative enterprise. The management must provide sufficient for each unit but at the same time a quantity which will disappear off the shelves so that there will always be replacements and money to pay the costs of operation, plus the necessary reserves to protect the equity held by the members.

At the end of the year these same officers, in compliance with the laws of the province of Saskatchewan—and I assume there are similar laws in other provinces—provide an audited statement and a report to be placed before the membership at the annual meeting. The members of the cooperative will receive notice of the meeting and will be encouraged in every way to take part in it. The audited statement is placed before them, and they are in a position to see how much money they left for the various units of goods and services they took off the shelves, or from that place of business which they, themselves, own. They will decide how the surplus money will be distributed—because it is their money.

It does not belong to a board of directors or to an association. It is the collective savings of those people who, because of their thrift, have joined themselves together to augment the purchasing power of their low incomes.

This is an important distinction, and I wish the minister to try to understand and to deal with it. This is what is referred to as patronage dividends. The minister has expressed some doubt as to the proper word to use, but most people refer to these moneys as patronage dividends. Some call them a return on excess earnings, but the name of that kind of money is not important. The important fact, to my mind, is that it is money, that it belongs to the individual who helped to save it, and that it should go back into his pocket. And not until his individual income reaches the munificent sum of $755 a year should he pay a tax. When it does—all right, if that is the law. But it is not someone else's money to be taxed in the hands of the cooperative, or in any other hands. It is his money, and should be considered in that way.

The same process takes place in marketing associations. The individual live stock pools, wheat pools, egg and poultry pools, dairy pools and the like, follow the same processes; the same operations take place, the only difference being that they deal with different types of produce.

I believe the minister has shown himself an able man. Undoubtedly he is intelligent. I have not always been complimentary to him, but I can go as far as I have, anyway. Certainly he has intelligence enough to be able to understand what I have said, and not to make a statement such as that credited to him on page 2920 of Hansard when, on June 27, during his budget speech, he said:

> There are, moreover, a variety of payments in proportion to patronage, which for want of a better term I shall call patronage dividends, the status of which is by no means clear.

"Patronage dividends," I would remind the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, is an accepted term. It may not be the best one, but it is accepted. Its status is perfectly clear to people who understand the cooperative movement.

As I said before, patronage dividends are the individual savings of people who group themselves together for that purpose. I emphasize again that these cooperatives do not exist and were never organized for the purpose of making profit for the organizations. Their sole purpose is to make savings for their members. Any return on invested capital is purely incidental and has never assumed any important part of their operations.

Complete democracy is the keynote of the organization. But, again, the minister is going to force cooperatives to break that principle. I cannot understand why he would make a statement of this kind, or where he got his information—well, I think I understand, and I might mention that point later on. But it is amazing to me that the minister should make this kind of statement, with the intent of forming it into law:

> Patronage dividends should be paid shortly after the end of the fiscal year and on the same basis to members and customers alike.

Let me remind the house of what I said a minute ago, that a cooperative provides a place for democratic control and democratic responsibility. This is an extremely important point to remember when people are dealing with cooperatives. There is a responsibility which comes ahead of the benefits received from a cooperative institution, because first one must agree to come in and accept his share of the financial, operative and governing responsibility. Each member provides his share of capital, takes his share of responsibility, and no member should avoid responsibility. I do not say that some do not avoid it—we are all human. But in the main, members of cooperatives take a pretty close interest in the operation of their concern. I doubt if in Saskatchewan, at any rate, one could go to any cooperative organization and not find every member with at least a fairly clear working understanding of how the cooperative is getting along.

Under the minister's proposal, cooperatives will be forced to give casual customers the same benefits as a responsible member is expected to get. That is distinctly undemocratic. That is like the person who comes to Canada and, without taking out citizenship papers, or accepting any of the responsibilities of citizenship, enjoys all the privileges of our democratic country.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can the hon. member think of any explanation of why the commission, constituted as it was, with Mr. Justice McDougall as chairman, unanimously recommended that the payment of patronage dividends on an even basis to all customers be made a condition of exemption of patronage dividends from the tax?

Mr. BENTLEY: No, I cannot think of any good reason for the commission arriving at that decision. It is a wrong decision so far as cooperative principles are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: They were unanimous.

Mr. BENTLEY: I cannot help it if they were. I am not going to attempt to justify what they did, because I disagree entirely with their judgment on that particular issue. I hope I can in some way persuade the minister also to disagree with that particular part of the report. With other parts of the report I wish him to agree.

Let me give an illustration, using the Saskatchewan wheat pool. They operate in that province over 1,100 elevators. At about 170 points where they operate there are only pool elevators; there are no other elevators. These are the only elevators which it is convenient for the producers to use. At these places are farmers who for reasons of their own do not care to be members of the wheat pool. That is their democratic right, and the wheat pool has always taken the position that these people are entitled to their opinion. They say to them, "We would like you to be a member of our association; we want you in but we are not going to do anything whatsoever to coerce you, either advertently or inadvertently, to become a member of our association." At the 170 points they operate on a public licence in order to make it possible for these non-members to get all the marketing and handling services available through the pool elevator that they could obtain through a line elevator, were there a line elevator at the point. They give them just as good service as they give their own members, but they say, "Seeing you have assumed no responsibility, either for the original financing or present financing, in the governing, in the election of officers of this organization, we do not believe you should receive the benefits of this association." It is against their principles to pay dividends to those people. They could apply for private licences and provide services only to their own members, but they do not. They operate on public licences and give all the same service.

There is a tendency sometimes to think that these organizations do a lot of business with non-members. In only two years out of twenty-one years of operation have the Saskatchewan pool elevators gone over the prescribed 16⅔ per cent of non-member business. In the last four or five years their business with members has been about 92 per cent; rarely have they gone over seven or eight per cent with non-members. Why is this? A great number of younger and new farmers have been joining the association. They are willing to accept their responsibilities in order to get the benefits. There have been around 30,000 new members in the last four or five years in that province alone.

This is the thing that angers the private elevator companies; this is the thing that has made them back the income taxpayers' association. The fact that these new and young farmers are joining the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the fact that they are accepting its cooperative ideas and are working along with the marketing and handling of grain, is the thing that has made these privately owned companies, with their headquarters in Winnipeg, so angry. I say to the minister that in his department are men who are entirely too friendly to that idea, and I think the minister gets a lot of reactionary advice from that kind of people in his department.

The cooperatives agree that it is almost impossible for a cooperative of any size not to do some business with non-members. Most cooperatives will say quite frankly that business done with a non-member is profit business, and most of them will say that they are prepared to pay the full income tax on that part of their business. However, it would be difficult and there must be some elasticity. Because of this the Cooperative Union of Canada has made a recommendation which I should like to quote. I can give the source of this if it is necessary, but I assure the house that whatever I quote has an authentic source which I can give. The Cooperative Union of Canada recommended as follows:

> The surpluses of any association or organization conducting any business or enterprise for its members shall not be liable to taxation under the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act, if not more than one-third of its business in any year is done with non-members.

I would point out that the Cooperative Union of Canada represents a total cooperative membership of close to one million people. I have not the exact figure, but I do not think I am far out in my estimate.

In his budget speech the minister has abrogated another important principle. He is going to force cooperatives to become profit-making concerns. He made this statement as reported on page 2921 of Hansard:

> After careful consideration, the government has, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should accept the commission's recommendation that patronage dividends and similar payments be treated as a deduction from income—

Up to there it is good.

> —subject to one relatively minor limitation designed to avoid at least some of the discriminatory effects I have mentioned. The limitation is this: That no company or association shall be able to go so far in its distribution of tax-free patronage dividends as to reduce its taxable income below a reasonable return on capital employed in the business. This reasonable return will be defined as three per cent on the capital employed.

Right there the minister showed that by law he is going to force the cooperatives which are non-profit-making in their operations to declare a three per cent profit on the capital used before they can pay out to their members the proper collective savings. The minister is proposing by law to break two principles in cooperative organization. He is breaking a democratic law by forcing them to pay dividends to irresponsible casual customers the same as to responsible members, and he is forcing the cooperative to become profit-making to the extent of three per cent. That is not in accord with proper cooperative philosophy and it is not in accord with the opinion of people who believe in cooperatives.

As the minister is aware, there are in the world certain governments, there are in this country certain people, some of them possibly quite close to the government, who believe in cooperatives. I should like to quote two passages from the proceedings of the Hot Springs food conference which was held from May 18 to June 3, 1943 and in which Canada participated. I quote:

Whereas:

1. The cooperative movement has been of very great importance in many countries, both to urban and rural populations, especially in agricultural districts where farming is based on small units and in urban areas of low income families;

2. The proper functioning of cooperative societies may facilitate adjustment of agricultural production and distribution, as members have confidence in the recommendations and guidance of their own cooperative organizations, which they know operate in the interests of their members and of society in general;

3. The democratic control and educational programmes, which are features of the cooperative movement, can play a vital part in the training of good democratic citizens, and assist in inducing a sound conception of economic matters.

I recommend those final words to the attention of the minister and his colleagues. Further in the same report we find the following recommendation:

1. That, in order to make it profitable for people to help themselves in lowering costs of production and costs of distribution and marketing:

(a) All countries study the possibilities of the further establishment of producer and consumer cooperative societies in order to render necessary production, marketing, purchasing and other services;

(b) Each nation examine its laws, regulations and institutions to determine if legal or institutional obstacles to cooperative development exist, in order to make desirable adjustments;

(c) Full information as to the present development of cooperatives in different countries be made available through the permanent organization recommended in resolution 11.

In view of that there is no excuse for the action taken by this government, which should understand democracy, which should understand thrift. Our friends the Tories do not believe they understand thrift, but they should understand it. They should understand democracy. If this were a country in which there had never been a cooperative, which had never been exposed to the operations of the cooperative movement, then there might be some excuse. There might be some mistakes made and they might have to appoint a royal commission to decide what they were. But there is no excuse for this country not knowing about it.

I come now to the taxation of cooperatives. I do not know how many people the income taxpayers' association represents, but they say 25,000 cards were sent out. I received 320 cards from my constituency, which has 20,000 odd voters. I received many resolutions from individuals and local organizations urging me to oppose the tax on cooperatives. I have one here from the city council of Swift Current, which reads:

That this council strongly protests against the suggestion contained in literature issued by the income tax payers' association to the effect that the earnings of municipally-owned enterprises be subject to income tax.

I want that known here so that members and the people generally will not think that every city council, just because it is composed of so-called business men, stands for what the income taxpayers' association advocates.

I come now to the retroactive feature. An hon. member has already mentioned this in a casual way. I am going to speak more particularly of the Saskatchewan wheat pool because I know it best. That does not mean that because there are little differences in administrative policy between the pools there is any fundamental difference between all three pools, but being more familiar with the Saskatchewan pool I shall deal with this question from the point of view of the Saskatchewan pool, although what I say will be applicable to all the pools.

I contend that the wheat pool is in every sense of the word a true cooperative association, using the principles of the Equitable Society of Rochdale Pioneers as the criterion. I am aware that some will dispute that statement. But I make that statement; I am prepared to debate it anywhere in Canada, inside or outside this house, and I believe that a reasonable audience that is not prejudiced will see the point.

First, one shareholder has one share and one vote and no more, and remember that to be a member of the Saskatchewan wheat pool you must be interested in wheat and cereal production. As I said, one shareholder has one vote, and only one vote, no matter what his financial position may be. Democratically elected delegates each year represent the shareholders at annual and general meetings. The directors are democratically elected each year from among the elected delegates. The president and the executive committee are democratically elected each year from among the elected directors. Thus, even the president must be elected each year as a delegate, and then as a director before he is eligible to be elected as president. The president must be elected every year as a delegate in his own municipal district before he is eligible to stand for election even as a director. Let anyone here describe a more democratic method of membership control than that.

Some may ask how long a period the president holds office. I can only say that the present incumbent of that office in the Saskatchewan wheat pool has been in office eleven years, but he has had to go through that democratic process of election every year. It only proves that after a lifetime of service given to the people of his locality they believe that he is the proper man to elect as a delegate every single year, and his lifetime of service to the organization has made his fellow delegates believe that he has the necessary qualities for the position. All honour to him for having been supported by his fellow delegates for so many years.

The disposal of all excess charges is decided by the delegates at the annual meeting. If the manager could say: We will distribute this just as we like, there might be some excuse for the minister's contention. But that is not the case. The minister seems to think he is justified in singling the wheat pools from all other cooperative enterprises for taxation in 1944 and 1945 because he says that the wheat pools had reason to believe that they were subject to taxation. Let me say emphatically that never did the wheat pools believe they were subject to taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member will allow me—

Mr. BENTLEY: Just a moment. I see the minister smiling. But I will prove my statement with an abundance of evidence. I say that the wheat pools had every reason to believe that they were not subject to taxation. Besides being purely cooperative organizations, as I have demonstrated, which in itself is sufficient to give them every reason to believe that they would be free from taxation, they had also been informed by the taxing authorities over a great number of years that they were not subject to taxation.

[Mr. Bentley.]

Those are two good sound reasons which led the wheat pool to believe that they were not subject to taxation.

It is true that the wheat pools are aware that the Winnipeg grain exchange and other organizations would like to convince the public and the government that the pools should be subject to taxation. Nothing would give the grain exchange greater satisfaction. It is also true that the pools were aware that the Department of Justice at Ottawa considered them subject to taxation, but this did not convince the pools because they were prepared to submit their case to the highest court in the British commonwealth before they would consider themselves taxable as they were a true cooperative association. The former Minister of National Revenue, in reply to a question by Mr. Douglas who was then member for Weyburn, had this to say, in the session of 1943. It will be found in volume 2 of Hansard for that year:

> It is not the intention of the government to have any change made in the provisions of the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act which exempt the income of cooperative companies and associations from taxation thereunder; but, in view of the opinions—

Opinions mind you—not reasons.

> —given by the Department of Justice, after an investigation of the facts, that certain corporations, referred to in the question as the wheat pool organizations of western Canada, do not qualify for tax exemption under such provisions, it is felt desirable that the questions of facts and of law pertinent to the liability of such corporations for tax be brought before the courts for investigation and final determination.
> The Department of Justice has advised that the most practical method of getting these matters before the courts in a manner that will provide opportunity for a full investigation of all pertinent questions will be to appeal from such assessments in the usual way if they continue to dispute liability.
> It is the intention of the government to make such assessments and, if appeals are made by the taxpayers, the government will be prepared to discuss with representatives of these corporations such arrangements as may be necessary to provide that the costs of such appeals to the corporation will not be greater than would be occasioned to them by a reference to the courts by the government itself.

That indicates that the government itself and the Department of Justice were not too sure of their ground when they felt that they needed the decision of a higher authority, and in order to get this decision the suggestion of the then minister of national revenue was carried out.

The pools were assessed and the matter was taken to the courts; but the courts have not yet given a decision, for shortly afterwards the McDougall commission was appointed to inquire into the taxation of cooperatives. That commission reported only last fall. But in 1943, as I have shown, the taxation of cooperatives was being considered by the government and they were not too sure just what should be done. However, because a royal commission was appointed, because the government could not or would not make up its mind to recognize cooperative associations as cooperative associations and treat them justly accordingly, they spent two years on commission work. Now we have 1944, one of the biggest years of the wheat pools' operations, when after a series of very difficult years they were beginning to get on their feet, singled out for them to be taxed to the extent of possibly millions of dollars, and the collective savings of individuals are to be taken out of the wheat pool treasury to satisfy the uncertainty of a government which could not or would not make up its mind as to what is a cooperative and what is not.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He understands, does he not, that we are not providing by legislation for the taxation of the pools in 1944 and 1945, that we are not doing anything retroactive whatever, and that it is open to the pools, if they feel that they are not subject to taxation, to take the case to the courts, if necessary to the privy council?

Mr. BENTLEY: In reply to the minister's question, I understand that there are some very good features up to and ending in 1943—not good enough but fairly good. I say that there should be legislation. The minister is putting it up to the pools. He says, in effect, that if they are not satisfied they can go to the courts. The government has held them up for two years, and now it is telling the wheat pools that they may go and fight their case in the courts. In the meanwhile the United Grain Growers and other elevator companies may have laid aside reserves to meet such a possibility as this; they are going to reap the benefit if the pools win in the courts, and they will suffer nothing if the pools lose. The pools are going to fight the battle for them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. BENTLEY: If hon. members will consent, I shall be only eight or nine minutes more.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house only, the hon. member can continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BENTLEY: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the house for its indulgence. I claim that this is nothing more or less than a raid on the treasury of an organization composed of a lot of people who have been living for years in the low-income groups and have spent many strenuous days and nights in building up this organization, which has served them so well in the past and can serve them so well in the future.

Another point is this: the years 1944 and 1945, particularly 1944, represent the largest earnings the pools have ever had, in spite of the fact that in the former year they lowered the cost of handling grain in their country elevators below any figure which ever existed in the history of grain handling in western Canada, to my knowledge, which extends over a long time. Not only did they do that for their members, but the very fact that they lowered the handling charges in competition with private companies brought down the charges of the private companies, and every farmer who delivers grain to a country elevator in the three prairie provinces has benefited by that reduction. Now the government proposes to force them through the process of appealing to the courts or tax them on the savings they have made.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me get the hon. member's position.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister is using up my time.

An hon. MEMBER: It has nothing to do with your time.

Mr. ILSLEY: The house has given the hon. gentleman plenty of latitude. Is his position that there should be retroactive legislation exempting these pools from taxation?

Mr. BENTLEY: My position is that there should be no tax on the wheat pools from the time they started to exist until now.

Mr. ILSLEY: Even though the law is that they are taxable; is that right?

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not believe that the law is that they are taxable, and I have tried to demonstrate that the pools do not believe it either.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the position then not this, that the courts can decide? My point is: the money is not the main thing in this case; the main thing is fairness of treatment as between taxpayers. Having the opinion of the Department of Justice before the government that these taxpayers, if they are taxpayers, are taxable, how can we ignore that without legislation retroactively exempting certain taxpayers from taxation, while we are collecting millions upon millions of dollars from other taxpayers? How can we justify it? That is what I should like to know.

Mr. KNOWLES: A few days ago we made a bill, amending the Export Credits Insurance Act, brought in by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) retroactive to cover up a doubt as to whether or not—

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well, that was not a taxation matter at all. This is a matter of equity as between taxpayers, and how can we justify making retroactive legislation or taking retroactive action remitting taxes in one case unless we do it for competitors and for other taxpayers throughout the country? That is the question.

Mr. BENTLEY: I will reply to that question in this way. I am stating my opinion and what I know to be the attitude of the cooperative associations in Saskatchewan, and I believe the cooperatives are right. I have stated that the wheat pools are cooperative associations. I am going to make another statement in a minute, and I will deal subsequently with the minister's question of what he could or should have done about the matter.

I want to summarize the points I have tried to make in the course of this debate; then I will deal with that particular question, and I shall be through.

I have tried to show this house and any who may be listening or who may read this speech that the budget speech proposes to break the fundamental principles of cooperative enterprise; first, by forcing cooperatives to treat non-responsible customers in the same way as responsible members are treated. This is wrong, for democracy requires responsibility before benefits. Second, by forcing the cooperatives to adopt the principle of profit enterprise by demanding a three per cent taxable profit before the savings are returned to the members.

I have also endeavoured to show that the government proposes to discriminate against three cooperative enterprises, the pools, simply because they are now numerically and financially strong.

Now here is the answer which through you, Mr. Speaker, I would give to the minister or anybody who feels there is any justification for his point of view. I know the minister; I know that he has worked hard, and that he has got himself in a difficult position. But he is a member of a government which has been ten years in office; and during those ten years, if it found that there were any organizations in this country operating under the name of cooperatives that were not true cooperatives, it had the opportunity ever since 1935 to correct matters and definitely establish the position. Time and again the government has been asked in this house, by resolutions from the country, and I am going to ask now, that it formally introduce a dominion cooperative act defining a cooperative which is not taxable. When the minister does that, when he sets up a statute containing that definition, he will be justified in saying that "anyone who thinks he comes in under that, should we differ from him, will have an opportunity of deciding the point in the courts." But section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act states, or at least that is the opinion of a great many, that it absolves these cooperatives. I have tried to prove that the wheat pools never did believe, had no reason to believe, and do not believe to-day that they are taxable under this law, and they should not be forced to come to court, but the government should relieve them of any income tax responsibility in their legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman apply that principle to other taxpayers who do not believe that they are liable for the tax which is being asked of them?

Mr. BENTLEY: I will reply to that question although I do not think it is my responsibility. According to the laws of the country as they are interpreted—and I have never broken the laws, or at any rate never been caught breaking them—I say, yes, if under the law anybody is being taxed who legally should not be taxed, he should be exempted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly; we all say that.

Mr. BENTLEY: And I say that under section 4 (p) the pools are exempt. I am not speaking for other organizations; most of them are quite capable of speaking for themselves. But the answer generally is, yes.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I was greatly interested in the address delivered by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) in which he dealt at considerable length with the experience of cooperatives over the years. His remarks on that subject were most interesting.

I should like first of all to refer to the amendment moved by the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) and the subamendment moved by the C.C.F. The member for Muskoka-Ontario moved, among other things, that:

> This house regrets that:
> (1) That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946;
> (2) That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government;
> (3) That the policies of the government are discouraging much-needed production.

I would have thought that in reference to these matters my hon. friends of the C.C.F. would have been able to see eye to eye with us; for I have often heard them refer in this house to extravagance and to the discouragement of production. But in their subamendment they moved to strike out the references to extravagance and to the curtailment of production. Their amendment, innocuous in the extreme, points out among other things that the exemptions of those in the lower income brackets have not been raised sufficiently. With that there is no disagreement. They point out also that there should be investment of public funds to bridge the gap between anticipated private investment and unemployment. With that there can be no serious disagreement either, because it represents the point of view of those who believe in private enterprise. Reference is then made to the failure to set up a social security measure that will assure a reasonable standard of economic security for all Canadians, with which there can be no disagreement. Finally, they say that the budget fails in its proposals to recognize the principle that cooperatives are non-profit-making organizations.

A true cooperative, Mr. Speaker, is a non-profit organization and as such is not liable to taxation. The amendment of the C.C.F. is a far cry from the socialism of last year, or even of two years ago; for it contains no reference to socialism or a socialized economy in this dominion. All that is gone. I am wondering whether the experience of two years in office in Saskatchewan has convinced my hon. friends that socialized enterprise does not operate to the benefit of the country or the state.

Mrs. STRUM: We did not lose our deposits.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is amazing how my hon. friends can refer to Tories and cast aspersions at those on the government side of the house; but when one faces facts, the chattering invariably begins in all parts of the corner in which my hon. friends sit. Now, as I look at that subamendment—

Mrs. STRUM: The cooperators are still voting C.C.F.

Mr KNOWLES: Are you going to vote for it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, there is nothing in it by itself that cannot be supported, because my hon. friends have diluted it down. As a matter of fact, from this subamendment one can only conclude that my hon. friends are engaged in the great retreat from socialism. Much is made of cooperatives, and my hon. friends would have the house and the country believe that cooperation is similar to socialism, or that there is something in common between them. But the only thing in common between cooperation and socialism is the fact that a few years ago "cooperative" was made part of the name of the party to my immediate left. Cooperation is free enterprise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friends say "oh, oh". I am going to quote for their information from a report of the most successful cooperative in the province of Saskatchewan, the Davidson Cooperative Association. In its annual report the point I am now making is made clear and definite so that all can understand it. But, before I quote from the report let me go back to that cooperator, the great authority on the subject, Mr. Holyoake. He pointed out that socialism and cooperation are not the same. He said:

> Socialism works from the top down, cooperation from the bottom up.

Mr. COLDWELL: What year was that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, sir, has socialism changed? There is something in that question by my hon. friend because they appear to have changed in the corner. They have changed in the last year in this house, and they have certainly changed their opinions since 1935, 1936, and 1937. No wonder my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. asks what year was that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, what year was it? Was it 1841?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The point of view of socialism and the socialist members in the house appears to have changed with the changing years. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that all I ask of my hon. friends is that they allow me to hear the interruptions that are being made. If I hear them I will answer them. I was going to quote from the report to which I have referred, which was made on April 17. It is the annual report of this cooperative:

> Cooperation is not socialism. There is a current tendency to confuse cooperative enterprise with socialism, or state ownership of the means of production and services. Your board is convinced that they are opposite in their conception and diverse in their results.

A little while ago my hon. friends challenged me, and my answer is the words of a great cooperative in Saskatchewan. If they want any extensive quotations they will have to look at the report themselves, because time will not allow me to read extensive quotations.

However, the report of the directors of this cooperative, a successful one, is interesting. The report continues:

> State ownership of an enterprise removes the responsibility for its success from those directly connected with it. If a factory at a remote point sustains a loss it is shared by everyone who pays taxes, be they ever so far remote. As the state invades the field of production, few government experts become the voice of the nation. The great majority of its citizens become hirelings.

There is the conclusion of a great cooperative, one that has contributed much to the welfare of the people in the area which it serves, one that has a very large and ever-expanding clientele.

Mrs. STRUM: Was it Jock Wilson that wrote that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, sir, apparently, my hon. friends recognize in the person who wrote it, and in the directors of this concern, intelligent people.

Mrs. STRUM: I wouldn't go so far as to say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is why he never votes Conservative.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That, of course, is the length to which my hon. friend, the leader of the C.C.F. party, has gone in this discussion. I can say that he may not be a Conservative, but, as the head of one of the greatest cooperatives in the province, he has indicated the support he would give to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. who have endeavoured to make the cooperative movement in Saskatchewan or elsewhere an annex or an adjunct of the party they represent.

Mr. BURTON: On a question of privilege, as a member of a number of cooperative organizations in Saskatchewan, which I have been for years—

Mr. GARDINER: And so am I.

Mr. BURTON: —and as a member of the C.C.F. I take exception—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the question of privilege?

Mr. BURTON: —to the remark that the C.C.F. was trying to make the cooperative movement an auxiliary of the party.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, sir, that pretty well covers that matter.

Mr. BURTON: The fact remains that co-operation is one form of social ownership.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For me I prefer to take the definition of a great cooperative corporation. The report continues in like vein to previous quotations, namely, and it is all to the same effect, the great danger that this great cooperative movement will in any way become a matter for one political party. Let me say to my hon. friend who interrupted me and rose on a question of privilege, that there would not be a wheat pool to-day if in 1931 in Saskatchewan and Manitoba two governments of opposite political faiths, coalitions, chiefly Conservative in Saskatchewan and Liberal in Manitoba, had not gone to the aid of that institution and preserved it, and thereby indicated the attitude of both of the old-line parties toward cooperatives. It was under the aegis of these governments that co-operatives first began, were nurtured and brought into being.

Mr. BURTON: The hon. member does not give the cooperative members any credit.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I remind hon. members that interruptions can be made only with the consent of the hon. member who is speaking. I would also remind hon. members that when interruptions are made they should be made in an orderly manner. The member making them should rise in his place.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thank you. I never seem to be able to get interruptions in an orderly manner.

Having touched on the matters dealt with by my hon. friend I now come to a general reference to the budget and to some things which were not referred to by my right hon. friend, namely, the general conditions in the dominion to-day, the housing situation referred to by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) which is becoming serious as time goes on; the necessity for further production indicated each day by the shortages of manufactured and other industrial goods that are apparent on every hand; the migration of thousands of physically fit Canadians, the very best of our nation, to which the hon. member for Souris made reference, 30,000 within the last year and that number does not take into consideration many who go to the United States for educational purposes or to take post-graduate work, or those of foreign birth of whom one in ten leaves this country.

Then, there was no reference to the situation in agriculture or to the fact that farmers of this nation have over the last year continued to receive about sixty-three cents less for a bushel of wheat than is received in the United States and on the world market, with the result that during 1945 they lost $110,000,000. I wish I had the time to quote from an interview which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) gave in May, 1946, as reported in the Sunday Express. I have not the time at the moment, but I may return to it. In this interview the Minister of Agriculture stated that the only reason Britain was charged a lower than world price was that the wheat was allowed to go to Britain and nowhere else. He condemned the British people for distributing on the continent a part of what they received. So far as I am concerned I am only too willing that the British people and our other allies should receive wheat at a reasonable price. Over and over again I have repeated the right to the assurance for the farmers of Canada of the world price. and that if any amount is to be paid for advertising it should be paid by the government itself.

We hear much about inflation. The government compares prices of 1921 with 1946 using a different cost of living index. Anyone who claims that the cost of living in this country has risen only about twenty-one per cent realizes that these are official figures, but they do not take into consideration all the commodities which the individual is required to buy. As a matter of fact nobody is able to find out how the present index is figured out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall give my right hon. friend an answer in that regard. The present index covers a few commodities, but it does not begin to cover the commodities which have to be purchased, nor does it begin to show the true picture of the cost of living index in this country. As a matter of fact the dominion bureau of statistics has no records on the subject. On June 4 I received a letter from the bureau in reply to a letter I had written in an endeavour to secure a chart showing the various goods and commodities from which the price ceiling had been removed, the date of the removal and the ceiling in each case and the then prices, the present wholesale and retail price, and so on. The answer given by the dominion statistician was that it was impossible to give these figures, and he said:

> For further information I suggest that you communicate with the wartime prices and trade board.

In other words, to-day there are no certain records to show the degree to which prices have increased in regard to the commodities from which the price ceiling has been removed.

When one speaks of price ceilings one thinks of rackets across the country. There are black market rackets. It is not permissible for me to refer in particular to the one I mentioned the other day, namely, La Banque Provinciale du Canada. I shall not refer in any way to particulars which will interfere with the case before the courts or the cases that are to come before the courts, but the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other night that there were no grounds whatever for reflections upon the bank generally. I say to him that on the basis of the material which was placed before me, the records showed that of eighty-three branches of the bank which were investigated, in eighty there was a departure from the regulations and irregularities and, what is more, while every other bank in the country was willing and anxious to carry out its responsibility, La Banque Provinciale showed no indication or willingness to carry out the instructions of the wartime prices and trade board, and in point of fact in many cases neglected to reply to requests on the part of the board. This is one example, and it is one of many across the country covering not only ordinary irregularities. In this case there were forgeries in certain cases, forgeries of coupons to the extent of 10,000 pounds of butter in one coupon and amounting to a total of one and a half million pounds of butter and a great deal of sugar. That situation prevails in other parts of the country. In the report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police some indication is given of the extent to which these rackets have developed across the country and, I suggest, are not being proceeded against with the celerity and certainty which the circumstances require and conditions should demand.

We find ourselves in this position in this country—rising prices, shortages of material, production necessary and Canadians migrating from Canada. The government brings down a budget in which, to use the words of the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, spoken many years ago—

> They promise, prepare, propose, postpone,
> And end by letting things alone.

Substantial reductions in taxation, by inference, in 1945 were promised by the right hon. minister. Yet this budget shows spendthrift recklessness. It shows that the government is still on a spending spree of controllable expenditures. It shows more; it shows that there is no power in the minister, sincere as he is in his desire to curtail extravagance, to control the bureaucracy which makes possible this overexpenditure.

Moreover, the budget indicates that the war complex, the billion dollar mentality, is still the mentality of the bureaucracy which prepared this budget. I think of one example of a war-time expenditure concerning which a warning was given in the house. I refer to the building of Cornwallis in Nova Scotia. It was pointed out that it was unnecessary; but it was proceeded with, and at a cost of $9 million. It was completed on November 30, 1944. What happened to it? We in the opposition accepted tremendous expenditures without criticism during the war, because of our desire to assist the government rather than to hold it back in its aim and purpose to mobilize Canada for war.

But we warned about that expenditure. What has happened to Cornwallis? With the exception of a few buildings which have been turned over to the Department of Veterans Affairs, it has been closed down—a total loss to the country. The budget is convincing evidence of the fact that so long as the present government is in power over-expenditure, reckless expenditure and profligate expenditure will continue uncontrolled, because there seems to be no power to control those who are in charge of expenditures.

Mr. ABBOTT: Rubbish.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am going to refer to two or three matters of expenditure that could be done away with.

Mr. ABBOTT: Good.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) has any questions to ask, I shall answer them; but I cannot answer muttered monosyllables.

Mr. ABBOTT: I just said, "Good".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad I have your approval.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was not speaking in monosyllables at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to know that, because the minister is a member of the cabinet.

Mr. TUCKER: Before you go along, what do those savings total?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After all, the parliamentary assistant should be able to wait just a minute. He is not a member of the cabinet, and I am dealing with the cabinet at the present time.

Mr. TUCKER: You should not object to answering a question like that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is perfectly all right.

Mr. ABBOTT: Red herring.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: "Red herring," says the Minister of National Defence. Let me give him the philosophy of this government. It is contained in the answer of the then Minister of Munitions and Supply during the period of the war, on November 19, 1945.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) had pointed out that a million dollars might be saved out of $7 million in administration. What was the answer given by the Minister of Reconstruction? A chance remark?—no, a remark that reveals the philosophy of this government when, at page 2251 of Hansard he used these words:

> I dare say my hon. friend could cut a million dollars from this amount; but a million dollars from the war appropriation bill would not be a very important matter.

That is the philosophy; that is the psychology.

Only the other day my good friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), when a complaint was made respecting an increase in expenditures for printing from $700,000 to $2 million, brushed it aside by saying, "Oh, it is a sort of petty cash account".

Mr. MARTIN: I point out that the bill did not refer to any expenditure. There was no expenditure whatsoever involved in the bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, just a request for a blank cheque for $2 million! Just a kind of petty cash!

Mr. MARTIN: I rise to a point of order. I am sure the hon. member wishes to be fair.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Absolutely.

Mr. MARTIN: He always wants to be fair.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Do you think it was?

Mr. MARTIN: In that bill I was not asking for a blank cheque. All we were doing, when asking that the bill be passed, was giving to the king's printer an amount of money to be put in a revolving fund. It did not in any sense represent an expenditure, but rather an advance. I am sure the hon. member will accept that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No argument about it at all. But that was the attitude he had, when it was pointed out that it was an increase from $700,000 to $2 million. The attitude was that it was a sort of petty cash account.

Well, what my hon. friend said is true. It reveals the attitude of this government.

I believe this, that a Trojan horse has found its way into the camp of the people of Canada, it consists of a desire to overexpend and a refusal to control, regardless of the demands in all parts of this country for curtailment. Over and over again the attitude has been, spend, spend, spend!

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the attitude of the opposition, almost to a man.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Never has that attitude been mine. I have always said that my attitude is that there be no expenditures made unless those expenditures will bring a return to the dominion, or are necessary—such as uncontrollable expenditures are.

Mr. ABBOTT: Preach that to the rest of your party, then.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Of course my hon. friend has apparently not been listening to some of the speeches delivered by me on previous occasions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have listened to a lot of them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And apparently my hon. friend, the Minister of National Defence, is unrepentant. He thinks the people of Canada should continue to pay, pay, pay!

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say that the time has come for a reduction in expenditures, where they can be made. I do not think anyone would insist that taxes will assure prosperity or increase incomes. When you continue war-time taxation to the extent that taxation is now being continued into the days of peace, it has the effect of harassing business and hamstringing the possibility of providing jobs in Canada at the present time. It is doing more: it is reducing the standard of living of our people to an extent never before known in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is higher than ever before.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not hear that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The standard of living is higher than it ever was before.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: 650,000 people with incomes under a thousand dollars! That was the figure given the other day by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) when he was attempting to set out the wonderful advantages offered by this budget! If 650,000 be the correct figure it indicates that a great portion of the people of this country are living on a scale and standard of living far below that on which they should be living.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may merely indicate that there are hundreds of thousands of part-time workers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All of that may be replied to later on, but the fact remains that the attitude of this government and the taxation it continues to impose is punitive of success and of successful application to the job in hand. I would think that the government's attitude would be to place these expenditures before a committee and say to them, as I suggested a year or two ago, "Will we cut this down?" or, "Will we cut that down?" Expenditures should be cut to the bone, yes, into the bone itself. But that is not the attitude. In the submission made last fall by the right hon. gentleman to the dominion-provincial conference the government recognized that before there could be any return to proper conditions in this country under which the initiative and skill of private enterprise will result in new investments, the tax policies of all governments would have to be considered as a fundamental factor in arriving at that increased production which would be required.

What about the salaried man, the white collar man? He does not get any relief. He seems to be the one man who is doomed to be perpetually taxed without any hope of relief. He had some hope of relief. That was implied by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) when he spoke at a banquet given in his honour in Renfrew last fall. Income tax has been increased some hundred times since it was first imposed twenty-nine years ago and the salaried man always pays. He should be entitled to ask at this time that some consideration be given to him; for, if you pauperize the salaried middle class, you destroy the bulwark on which this country depends against the isms that are sweeping the world to-day.

I agree with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said last night that if the exemptions were increased and the rates reduced the demands of labour would be materially reduced. Labour demands increased wages because, after all, it is the "take-home pay" that counts. To increase wages means a mark-up in the goods manufactured; the pressure for increased wages causes increased prices, and so the cycle goes.

To my right hon. friend I say that the government has the billion dollar mentality. I think it would upset the members of this house if any minister were to rise in his place and say, "I am going to cut down my expenditures this year by thirty per cent, not the expenditures connected with war but the civil expenditures which have mounted so continuously since the beginning of the war, and the administrative expenses as well." The failure to take such action destroys the hope in man; it increases and maintains his fears. Some relief is given to the farmers and fishermen, but they have to wait. In 1948 they will be able to level off their income over a period of three years. I suggest that even now some relief should be given to the middle-class man with the fixed salary. It is that group that purchases the largest portion of our manufactured and industrial goods.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) asked me a moment ago to point out some examples. Let me say that it is difficult to pry information out of this government. On November 14 last the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) tried to find out something about the Canadian information service.

An hon. MEMBER: What a hope!

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What a hope, and what information we got! It was denied by the government.

Mr. CLAXTON: No information was ever denied.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know what the word "deny" means in my hon. friend's vocabulary; but when it is refused, when there is a vote against giving it to the hon. member for Eglinton, it means denial to me although others may call it a refusal.

Mr. CLAXTON: Surely the hon. member wants to be fair, as the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) suggested some time ago. The motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Eglinton was a motion for the production of the minutes of the supervisory committee of the Canadian information service. It had nothing whatever to do with expenditures in any way, shape or form. The hon. member for Lake Centre knows that the minutes of boards of that kind are not producible and never have been.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Certainly not by this government. It related to the affairs of a board which had been set up by order in council while parliament was sitting.

Mr. MITCHELL: Nor by any other government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not so sure. If my hon. friend knows as much about this as he does about some of the matters in his own department, he does not know very much about it. Then there was the case of Cardoza, of the commodity prices stabilization board, who claimed on November 7 that he was being handcuffed when he endeavoured to take proceedings against certain wrongdoers in this country. I think it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) who moved to secure the papers in that connection. If it was not a denial of information, parliament was met by a refusal on the ground that it was not in the public interest to give the information.

You say to me, "What can you do, what savings can you effect?" I shall refer to a few just at random, although I have quite a number here but time will not permit my dealing with them all. The first one is national registration. What reason is there for national registration being in existence to-day? It was all right under the OGPU and the fascist secret police in peace time but it was done away with in Great Britain within a few weeks after the war ended. Yet it is being continued in Canada at a cost of $324,000 and it is employing 232 persons at the present time. You say to me, "What does it matter if national registration is in effect?" I always like to call as a witness any authority that is recognized by the government, and to support what I have just said I should like to refer to a recent editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press which stated:

> There is nothing in the history of this country to justify registration cards. They are part of the police state and no one in their senses or with a true appreciation of where they lead would recommend them for Canada. Yet Mr. Mitchell does.
> There is a dangerous trend in this country. Some aspects of the spy investigation, the registration card, the secret order in council are all part of it. It is easy to say this is nonsense, that Canadian liberty is perfectly safe in the hands of the present government. The record shows it is not safe in the hands of the present government.

What about War Assets Corporation? It has 5,053 employees.

Mr. FRASER: Over 7,000 now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I got a return only three months ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry but I must inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I want to thank the house and I shall restrict myself to giving just two examples.

Mr. TUCKER: Let us have the total of the expenditures the hon. gentleman suggests can be reduced.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I gave the first.

Mr. ABBOTT: $325,000; what is next?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was dealing with War Assets Corporation. I pointed out that there were 500 employees each earning over $3,000 a year. I give one example to indicate the attitude of the government, the sale of Fairmiles. I think the record of War Assets Corporation so far as efficiency goes deserves the serious consideration of this house and country, and information with respect to the transactions of the corporation should be given to the house and not be held back as it is being to-day in the war expenditures committee. But I shall not deal with that report since it is not before the house.

It cost this country $140,320 for eighty Fairmiles and War Assets Corporation sold forty-nine of them at $3,000 each. They could have got $15,000 and $20,000 for one or more of them. The reason they did not was that the minister said that if they had got a better price it would have created difficulty and resentment.

What about the government ships sold to the French government? Canada makes loans to France with a view to having the French government purchase commodities in Canada? The French government purchased ten Canadian government ships for $415,000 per vessel. Did the government sell them direct to the government of France? No. They sold them through an intermediary and paid that intermediary, the American Ship Brokerage Corporation, a commission of $43,000 for each ship. I tried to find out last November who the intermediary was, and we were promised the information but it has not been given to date.

What about the situation in regard to the ships that were built by the Industrial Shipping Company Limited, of Mahone Bay, Nova Scotia, which went on manufacturing tugs, barges and scows after the end of the war, and in particular ten 65-foot tugs at a unit cost of $61,000? The British government did not want them, and what did the Canadian government do? They went ahead with the completion of these ships. When they were completed they were turned over to War Assets at $61,500 apiece and War Assets sold them at $20,000 apiece. It is waste like that, conditions like that—and I have the record here showing the sales that War Assets have made but I shall not impose it on the house—which indicate that War Assets Corporation have not been protecting the interests of the Canadian people.

You were kind enough, Mr. Speaker, to grant me an extension of time. Other matters I shall refer to when we go into committee. I suggest now, as I have suggested heretofore, that at this time when the government is seeking to increase production in this country and to give an incentive to labour and the white-collared class and to the producers of this country, the minister, even now, should do two things. He should pare down these expenditures, which if they are not pared down will pare down the fabric of this confederation. We cannot go on piling up debt the way we are doing without a day of reckoning coming.

Second, I suggest that the government can never reduce taxation until it gets rid of the billion dollar mentality. I urge the government to make every effort to cut down controllable expenditure, and not to rush this parliament home, not to bring down the budget in the last few days and say that we should not continue talking because members want to go home. I want to go home too, but we have a responsibility here to the people of Canada, and that responsibility is this. Twelve million people in Canada are asking us to see that waste and over-expenditure be cut down; that taxation be reduced; that the people be given relief from the period of war control, high taxation and the like, and that jobs be furnished so that the Canadian people will have a higher standard of living.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): It seems customary, Mr. Speaker, for hon. members rising in this debate to offer an apology for the time they intend to take. In my case I have no apology to offer. I feel it is the duty of every member here to oppose many of the things contained in the budget which was presented on the 27th of June last.

During the last six or seven years we have put up with increases in taxation and with sufferings in many directions and, now that the shooting war is over, I think it is about time that some relief from taxation be given to the people of Canada. If we sit here dumbly, I expect that that punishment will continue, and it is not coming to our people further to endure punishment. I do not intend to deal with many subjects to-day, but I hope to discuss at the resolution stage some of the matters dealt with in the budget.

One thing I see here which should make the people of Canada think is the amount of our funded debt at the end of March this year. It is stated to be, in round figures, $16,807,000,000. When we look back to the size of our debt in 1939 we find that it amounted to $3,205,956,000. That is quite an addition to our debt in a period of seven years. It does not seem to mean much to some people. To others it means quite a lot.

I am going to discuss for a few moments a return tabled on June 7, 1943, which contains answers to five questions:

1. What was the gross national debt of Canada at the end of the fiscal years of 1867-8, 1875-6, 1880-1, 1890-1, 1900-1, 1910-1, 1913-4, and each year thereafter . . .

Up to the time of that return. I am not going to deal any further with that. The second question had to do with the amount of accrued interest and other related commissions and charges. The third question was:

3. What percentage of the total national revenue of each of the above years was required to pay the interest, commissions and charges above?

I am not going to take the time to place all that information on Hansard, but it might be interesting to the house to learn that in 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935, the following percentages of the national revenue were used up in paying interest on our national debt. These years were the time when a very large majority of the people of Canada suffered privation and want, not because we did not have the goods to supply all their needs but because we did not have sufficient money. The figures are:

Fiscal year ended March 31	Percentage debt charges to total revenue
1933	44·11
1934	44·04
1935	39·24

It is about time that we should think of these amounts and, as suggested by the leader of this party the other day, do something about the source of this money and stop at least a portion of the interest which is being paid, wrongfully, at the present time.

The next question:

4. What provision is being made to satisfy the above indebtedness?

The reply given to that is as follows:

The Dominion of Canada has always paid the full face amount of the principal of and interest on every direct obligation issued by it, all promptly when due in the lawful currency of the country where payable at the time of payment thereof.

I might state here without fear of contradiction that many of these payments were made by "renewal of the note", by going farther into debt. The reply continues:

In the budget speech delivered in the House of Commons on February 25, 1937, the Minister of Finance, in referring to an issue of perpetual bonds, stated "it was intended as the initial step in a programme which is designed to provide for the consolidation and simplification of our public debt structure. Another purpose which we had in mind was to facilitate the setting up, as soon as the condition of our national finances make it practicable, of a general sinking fund to provide for the gradual amortization of our long-term debt on scientific lines."

During the war period and for some years before the dominion government has been operating at a deficit and it has not been possible to provide for the paying off of indebtedness out of revenue. However, the government plans in this respect will be made known at the appropriate time.

I think the appropriate time is now that we have reached a debt of almost $17,000 million. Perhaps when the minister goes on that well deserved vacation, he will think this problem through and give us some of his plans at the "appropriate time".

5. If the present policy is continued can this debt ever be repaid?

The reply is the terse:

Yes.

I say that that is incorrect because under our present system we can never repay the debt. If I remember correctly, only on fifteen occasions since 1867 have we either balanced our budget or had a surplus. So that any government or government official who comes out and tells us that under our present existing financial system we can pay our debt is stating something which is, I think, utterly untrue.

Then, again, we are told that the interest on our national debt this year will be $481,207,000. That is quite a large amount, and will, of course be the first charge on our national revenue. To take that amount out of our production, particularly farming production, will mean that some people will have to suffer because of the payment of that amount of interest.

The requirements for the present year, 1946-47, even though the shooting war is over, will amount to $3,750,000,000. We may be told, in fact we shall be told, that quite a percentage of this is being used to finance other countries to buy our goods. That does not make any difference; the amount has still to be collected during the year or provided for by other methods. Taxes will produce $2,510 million. That, in my opinion, is quite a drain on the resources of the people and one of the measures used to keep down the standard of living. For that reason no member should be content to allow the budget to go through in its present form. Reductions in income tax and further increases in the exemptions should be made, and I think it is the duty of the people's representatives here to voice their opinion on that score.

We have heard a good deal of discussion on the taxation of cooperatives and I do not intend to deal with that matter in detail today, but on another occasion when the resolutions are before us I shall have something to say. One of my reasons for taking this position is that we do not fully understand the implications of the present tax structure. When we are able to get information we shall be in a position to speak more definitely on the subject.

Cooperatives are possible only under private enterprise. The people have the right to patronize and to join them and to form cooperatives if they so desire, and if they do not desire to do so they are perfectly free to trade with other institutions. I submit that cooperatives should be encouraged because they are one means whereby poor people can do something for themselves. When people help themselves everything possible should be done to encourage them and no obstacle should be put in their way to prevent their continuance along that line.

Cooperatives have been formed because of the abuses of private enterprise before the setting up of the cooperative organizations. If private enterprise had carried on as it should have carried on and as it is capable of carrying on, a number of cooperatives functioning to-day would never have been set up. We realize that free Canadians must be able to choose where they buy and sell. That is one important point that should not be lost sight of.

In considering some of the abuses of private enterprise, I look back to the time, thirty years ago or longer, when I started farming in the west. I can remember getting up many days and starting for town, thirty miles away, before daylight, with four horses and a load of wheat. Sometimes it was thirty or thirty-five below zero. When we got half way to town we would find a sheltered place along the road, where we fed the horses, eating a frozen lunch ourselves. When we got into town before six o'clock we found many of the elevators in town without room to take the particular grades of grain we had. Many of us hauled No. 1 or No. 2 wheat to town, and perhaps there would be only one or two elevators that could take any grain at all. By the time our turn came we were told that there was room only for No. 4. Well, we were thirty miles away from home, and we had to choose between taking No. 4 for No. 1 or No. 2 or taking the grain home again. That is the condition that existed.

These elevator companies—private concerns at that time—made vast profits out of that dodge. We were subjected to heavy dockage and to false reading of the scale. What I mean is that if you had 100 bushels of wheat the scale was made to read 90 or 95. That was not an isolated occurrence. We had plenty of proof. We found in many cases that the agent sold some of the grain that was stolen. He sold it in a farmer's name, the farmer cashed the cheque and got a few dollars for cashing it. Some agents boasted that they sold more grain than many farmers who were hauling grain to the elevators.

There is one other point that we should not forget. It has been stated on many occasions before. The superintendents of the grain companies went around and told their agents that when the end of the month came provision should be made by them that their wages should not cost the company anything. In other words, they told the agent that he should steal his monthly wages during the month. That is not confined to grain companies alone; the same was true of some of the companies selling coal and other commodities in these towns all across the prairies.

In order to get away from that condition, many of us who at that time were members of the U.F.A. and other organizations clubbed our orders and got in carloads of coal, lumber, cement, binder twine and other commodities and we managed to get in other supplies in smaller quantities. To-day we find that we have set up cooperatives in opposition to these other institutions that were robbing us of the fruits of our labour. These other organizations do not like our cooperatives, and for that reason a bitter campaign has been put on, during the past few months particularly, to mislead the people and to try to have the cooperatives taxed in such a way as to put them out of business.

This is not working out in the interests of those who started the campaign because, if you look back over the past couple of years, you will find a reduction in the handling charges on grain and other things, led off by the wheat pool organizations, and these other companies have suffered to a far greater extent than they dreamed of when they started their campaign to tax cooperatives and wheat pools.

In my opinion the taxing of the wheat pools and other cooperatives is killing the goose that lays the golden egg. I do not think it is right, because, as I have pointed out on many occasions, the farmers of the country have been robbed of a large proportion of that which belongs to them because of the agricultural policies of the different governments that have been in office from time to time. In 1923, because we were unable to have continued the wheat board which was set up at the end of the war primarily to keep the price of wheat down, we in Alberta organized the Alberta wheat pool, and the following years similar organizations were set up in the other prairie provinces. These organizations have saved the farmers millions and millions of dollars.

In my opinion everything possible should be done to see that they are kept in active operation. By that method we have done away with many of the abuses which existed in the grain trade prior to their being set up. If these other organizations are successful in putting our pools and other cooperatives out of business, then we shall revert to those abuses which we have fought for the past forty years. This is not good enough and must not be tolerated by this country or this government.

We find that the grain exchange and an affiliated organization called the income tax payers' association, with a membership of over 6,000, have been waging a bitter fight. We find that the membership of this income tax payers' association is $1 per member and they have head offices in Winnipeg and Toronto. These gentlemen have not been good enough to tell us the source of the money which they receive to carry on their campaigns over the radio and in the newspapers. That would be interesting information because I believe that in the long run the money is drained directly or indirectly out of the pockets of the farmers across the country.

It will be wrong to tax cooperatives, particularly the wheat pools, because prior to August, 1942, what wheat brought was only seventy cents a bushel, f.o.b. Fort William, for No. 1, and that is a price much lower than the average we had to take—I say, "than we had to take"—during the depression years. Therefore, again I say that it is unfair to impose any further hardships on the farmers by taxing cooperatives.

There is one thing I notice in the report to which I must take strong exception, namely, the suggestion, or threat, if you like, to make cooperatives like the wheat pools taxable back to 1942. It has been pointed out that cooperatives are not profit-making organizations; that the savings are returned to their shareholders who are also their patrons. The returns are made on the basis of deliveries of grain and other things to these pools. Therefore I think it would be entirely wrong, particularly because a number of our farmers are still in the red in spite of the statements which are made that we are rapidly getting out of debt. This government or former governments should have clarified the position of the cooperatives long ago so that the people would know exactly where they stood. If taxes are imposed on the cooperatives now we shall immediately run into a price war, because there are many more ways of killing a cat than by choking it with butter. If the cooperatives are compelled to pay income tax they can very easily see to it that nothing is left to tax. Therefore those who are pressing for the taxation of cooperatives and wheat pools should be careful, and also the government, about getting into something into which they should inquire much further.

I desire to say a few words in connection with representations which have been made to us by farmer organizations in our respective provinces. I believe this is also in line with the brief which was presented to the government not many months ago by the federation of agriculture. The government has agreed in part to some of the requests made. One of the requests was that the farmer's income be taxed on the basis of a five-year running average. The government has agreed to a three-year average. I would suggest that the minister consider making that period five years instead of three. Many of us who have farmed for a number of years know the ups and downs of farming, and I have no hesitation in saying that this three-year term should be extended to five.

My second suggestion is that breeding herds be recognized as a capital asset, and dispersal sales averaged over a three-year period. The minister has had that under consideration, but no announcement in connection with it was made in the budget. I hope to hear more about that before the budget is disposed of. Then I suggest that the exemption for single people, which during war years was $660, and now has been increased to $750, be increased to $1,200 and, for married persons, to $2,000. Allowance should also be made for work done on the farm by the farmer's wife and family. We cannot place farming in the same class as many other businesses, because in the other businesses a man usually looks after the business and pays his help; whereas on the farm the farmer, his wife and the whole family, even down to the youngster who gathers the eggs at different times during the day, perform duties which in many cases are paid for at a pretty good rate of pay. That is not so on the farm.

Another kick which the farmer has—and I do not think many of them are complying with the law—is in connection with the collection of income tax from his help. Our experience has shown that where the farmer tries to collect income tax from his help he loses his help and does not have to pay any wages. Therefore he does not have to collect the tax. His neighbour across the fence hires the help in question and does not collect the tax. Therefore the farmer who is trying to live up to the law is penalized by having his help go to the other fellow.

A board of arbitration is another suggestion which I am glad to see the minister has provided for. The payment of arrears of principal and interest on the home farm contracted prior to 1940 should be allowed as current expenses. Representation along that line has been made on many occasions, I believe, but I do not see any mention of it included in the budget. I should like to have the minister take that under consideration because I believe he realizes, as we who live on the farm do, that farming conditions and farming prices have been anything but desirable up until recently.

My last suggestion is that final clearance be given within two years of filing of tax returns. At the present time returns are still not definitely cleared back as far as 1942. In connection with the suggestions I have made, I should like to see a reduction in the levy, an increase in the exemption and the effective date made July 1, 1946, instead of January 1, 1947.

On motion of Mr. Boivin the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 11, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MICHAUD—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE" OF JULY 11

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The Montreal Gazette of this morning carries the following heading on its front page:

M.P. scores "Empty Seat" report, accuses Gazette man of bad faith.

I did not accuse the reporter of the Gazette of bad faith. As a matter of fact I did not use the term at all, and the body of the report bears me out on this point. To the mass of readers who do not always read an editorial to the very last line, the heading is most misleading, and so I leave it to the house and the country to determine whether or not such a heading discloses lack of good faith, or just bad faith, to use the words of the Gazette.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman must state his question of privilege and be brief and to the point.

Mr. MICHAUD: The newspaper in question insinuates that I accused the reporter of bad faith, which I did not do, when referring to the fact that the house has now but 242 members as the result of vacancies which had occurred recently and of which the reporter did not seem to be aware. I made the following statement in this house, which is reported verbatim in the Gazette:

Either the reporter's sense of observation is no keener than his judgment, or else he is disclosing an unusual lack of good faith, and that requires no further comment.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is an unusual lack of good faith if it is not bad faith?

MR. BROWN—INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—NEWSPAPER REPORTS AND HEADLINES

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege affecting the members of a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. As joint chairman of the committee which is examining and considering Indian affairs I raised this question of privilege at our committee meeting this morning, and the committee have directed me to raise the same question in this house at the first available opportunity.

The question arises out of newspaper headlines and reports which give an entirely misleading, unfair and untrue impression of certain of the proceedings of the joint committee on Tuesday, July 9, 1946. Newspaper reports I hope unintentionally, are unfair to both houses of parliament, mislead Canadians generally and will cause grave distress to the people most concerned—the Canadian Indians. As examples I should like to quote the Toronto Evening Telegram of July 9, which contains this heading: "Defeat motion to put Indians on committee." The Cornwall Daily Standard Freeholder of July 10 had this heading: "Defeats motion to have Indians on committee." The Kitchener Daily Record of July 9 has this: "Reject Indians on Ottawa body." The Owen Sound Sun-Times of July 9: "Refuse to name Indians to Commons body." The Toronto Daily Star of July 9: "Defeat move to let Indians give opinions." The Toronto Globe and Mail of July 10: "Oppose naming of five Indians to house group." The newspapers from western Canada, the maritimes and British Columbia are not yet on file, but it is likely that many of them will carry similar headlines unless some correction is made.

I have seen the story which was sent out from the House of Commons by the Canadian Press. That story is fair and impartial, and if properly used by the newspapers this question could not have arisen.

Your committee has put itself on record time and again as being unanimous in its desire to give all interested parties the fullest opportunity to make representations to the committee. At present we are getting on record the departmental case. As a courtesy we have already heard representatives of one Indian organization, because they were in Ottawa in conference; and if we can find some feasible means of having Indians in attendance at all times we shall be glad to recommend it. However, the Reverend P. R. Kelly, himself a full blooded Indian, who represents the largest democratically organized group of Indians in British Columbia, and in fact in Canada, has expressed to members of the committee his belief that the present is not the time for the committee to have Indians attend Ottawa constantly to be in attendance during the deliberations of the committee.

But we have, and I think it is important to emphasize this, engaged as counsel and for a liaison officer between the committee and the Canadian Indians, a member of the Six Nations band who is also a member of the Ontario bar. He attends all meetings of the main committee and the subcommittee on agenda and procedure, questions the witnesses, and later, when we arrive at the time to hear representatives of Indian bands, will assist them in the preparation and presentation of their briefs.

It is most unfortunate that the newspapers did not take the time and trouble to make a proper use of the Canadian Press report. This is not the time when the Canadian Indian should be allowed to believe that your committee is not doing everything in its power to give effect to the resolution moved on May 13 last by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), the order of reference to the committee, or desires in any way to restrict either the scope or the character of our inquiry. I am glad to have this opportunity to assure the house, the people of Canada generally, and Canadian Indians in particular, that the work of the committee will be as thorough, as comprehensive and as searching as it is possible to make it.

Permit me in conclusion to assure all concerned that the committee is doing and will do all in its power to ensure that the revision of the Indian Act will in every sense be the magna charta of Canadian Indians.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, arising out of a similar question of privilege my complaint is this, that the Midnapore Gazette, immortalized by Bob Edwards but never published, has not mentioned my name in the last three months.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

Second report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

P.E.I. FERRY "PRINCE EDWARD"

Mr. McLURE:

1. Has the Borden-Tormentine Ferry Prince Edward been overhauled and repaired?
2. If so, when will she resume her work? Where were her repairs done?
3. What was the cost of repairs?
4. Has the Scotia been able to take care of all freight at Borden-Tormentine ferry? If not, how many cars are waiting transportation?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Resumed regular operation on July 6 at 2:31 a.m.; (b) At Halifax Shipyards Limited, Halifax, N.S.

3. Not yet finally determined. Specifications can be prepared only of known work to be done prior to entering ship repair plant, but drydocking and examination of hull by steamship inspector frequently reveals the necessity of considerable additional work, and the over-all price has not yet been settled.

4. The Scotia has taken care of movement of all freight between Borden and Tormentine, but there has been some delay in the movement of the lower grade commodities.

VETERANS LAND ACT—LAKE CENTRE, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many applications for (a) land; (b) loans, have been made by veterans under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act within the federal constitutency of Lake Centre, Saskatchewan, since the 1st of January, 1945?
2. Of these, how many have been (a) accepted; (b) refused?
3. What are the names and addresses of the applicants and what decision was made in each case?

Mr. TUCKER:

1 and 2. Lake Centre federal constituency is in the Regina and Saskatoon regional areas. The following information is supplied respecting applications for financial assistance that had been reported to the Saskatoon district office from inception of operations to May 31, 1946:

Regina	Received	Approved	Declined
Full-time farming..	420	259	40
Small holding	35	25	1
Commercial fishing	—	—	—
Provincial lands...	26	21	4

Saskatoon	Received	Approved	Declined
Full-time farming.	414	260	25
Small holding	35	19	8
Commercial fishing	1	1	—
Provincial lands...	10	7	—

The number of properties purchased in the constituency of Lake Centre since January 1, 1945, as shown on head office records is 51.

3. It is not considered to be in the public interest to disclose information of this nature affecting individual veterans.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has the Canadian government made a survey of the St. Lawrence waterway project to determine (a) what benefits, if any, would accrue to Canada from this development; (b) particularly in relation to the competition which will thus be created to the Canadian National Railways?

2. If so, what is the date of such survey?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes. The following surveys of the St. Lawrence waterway project which are concerned with the benefits to be derived from the development and with the competition with other forms of transportation have been issued as Canadian public documents:

(a) Report of the international joint commission on the St. Lawrence Navigation and Power Investigation 1921, submitted to both the Canadian and the United States governments on January 6, 1922;

(b) Report of the Canadian national advisory committee submitted to the Prime Minister on January 11, 1928.

A special committee of the senate also heard evidence, received documents and presented a report to the senate on June 6, 1928.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN INFORMATION SERVICE

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Who are the personnel of the Canadian Information Service?

2. Where does each one live and what is his regular occupation?

3. What do they receive by way of salary and remuneration?

4. In what way is the service organized and what office, if any, does each one hold?

5. Is there an executive of the service, and if so how often did they meet in 1945?

6. What days and how many were present at each meeting?

7. Are the meetings open to the public?

8. Have any persons other than the executive of the service attended the meetings, if so, who are these persons and on what occasions did they attend?

IMPORTS OF CORN

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What quantities of corn were imported into Canada in the years 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945 and 1946 to date?

2. From what countries?

3. What subsidies were paid each year on the above corn?

4. For what purpose was the corn used?

5. Have any subsidies been offered to the Canadian growers of corn to induce greater production?

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

STATEMENT AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. McCuaig) on Monday last asked me a question with regard to the bringing down of amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. At that time I stated that while my estimates were under consideration I had indicated that it was the intention to bring down amendments this session and refer them to the agriculture committee. I had hoped that the bill would be prepared and ready to present to the house at a much earlier date than this. As a matter of fact it was prepared just before I left to go west three weeks ago and could not be given final consideration until I returned. It is now suggested to me that to place this bill before the house at the present time would have two results which might not be helpful so far as this session is concerned. In the first place there are, I think, sixty members on the agriculture committee, and therefore many members who are now tied up almost continuously on other committees would have to sit almost daily from now until the end of the session to consider the bill; in the second place, full consideration could not be given even then. It has been suggested that hon. members be permitted, when my supplementary estimates come down, to ask any question on prairie farm assistance which they desire to ask on my general estimates; that I take time then to answer those questions, and that the legislation be not brought down until early next session, when it can be referred to the agriculture committee and there will be more time to discuss it thoroughly and go into all the details. If this meets with the approval of hon. members, I will bring the legislation down not this session but early next session.

Mr. BENTLEY: If there is no bill this session to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, will that prevent changes in regulations for this year's operations if the suggestions are acceptable to the minister?

Mr. GARDINER: No. There is a general section in the act which provides for the making of regulations. I presume it would be the same in an amended act. The regulations could, if thought desirable, be changed.

SEED ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): I understood that earlier in the session the Minister of Agriculture suggested that the Seed Act was to be revised this year. Is there any intention of bringing down now a new bill?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am not certain about a revision of the Seed Act. There was a suggestion made earlier in the session, which I hope and believe is being carried out, that some provision be made in the supplementaries for payments which had not been provided for in the regular estimates and which it was understood would be provided for. I think the passing of the estimate itself in that regard constitutes legislation upon it. But there is no change made in that intention, if that is what the hon. member had in mind.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—HOLIDAYS WITH PAY—APPLICATION OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I have given him notice. Because of inquiries I have had in the province of Saskatchewan may I ask if railway companies are subject to provincial legislation regarding holidays with pay for their employees?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me notice of his question. In answer to him I can only say that the question is a legal one which may eventually have to be decided by the courts. The legal departments of the railways. I am informed, have discussions under way with the provinces and I prefer to refrain from expressing an opinion for the present.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLERS FOR STEEL INDUSTRY—NOTIFICATION TO UNITED STEELWORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, arising out of a long distance telephone call I got from Toronto just before I came into the house. Did the minister say that the representative of the united steelworkers of America had received a copy of the order in council which he tabled in the house yesterday? The complaint is that they have not received it.

Hon. HUMPREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The order did not go through council until about half-past four yesterday; it then had to be signed and passed through the usual channels, but I did instruct my department to send copies forthwith to the parties concerned. That is purely a matter of mechanics; it is always done in that way.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the one just asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East? At the present time a maximum increase of approximately ten per cent or ten cents an hour is fixed by the wage regulations. Is that mandatory in the present steel dispute, or has the controller power to negotiate further with the war labour board if he so desires?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no knowledge of any fixed amount in any regulations of any kind whatsoever. My advice to the leaders of some labour organizations—and I am now speaking of a very small minority—is that if they would avail themselves of the machinery that is set up I do not think we would have a strike in Canada to-day. Let me say very plainly to my hon. friend, because I think it should be said, that down through the years labour and employers have asked for representation on boards. Now I know that some of the young men who are in charge of organizations to-day, who have not had the experience of some older men like the hon. member and myself, believe they are rendering a service to organized labour by circumventing the machinery set up for the settlement of disputes. I think that in the light of experience they will find out that they were wrong. Consider my own position. These people take the men out on the street, as they say, and they are out for a while; they break agreements with the employers—I am not speaking generally, you understand—

Mr. GILLIS: Or of the steel workers.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, I am not speaking of the steel workers, that is true, because they are not on strike yet. But they take these people out on the street, and then, when they get into a jam, as they say, they come to me and ask me to get them out of it. I believe that the sanctity of contract is the very basis of democratic life, and I do not think that anybody, be he employer or employee, who deliberately breaks a contract is rendering any service to the organization he is supposed to represent, or to himself, or to the country.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that lecture was called for by the question I asked, because I too agree as to the sanctity of contracts. But the present dispute involves a large percentage of the steel workers in my own community.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: There has been no strike there. They have been negotiating.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT PARIS CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned yesterday that I hoped to be able to make a statement to-day on Canada's representation at the Paris conference. Hon. members will have noticed that in the invitation which was accepted there is mention of the following fact:

> Detailed particulars of the organization of the conference and of the rules of procedure recommended for consideration will be forwarded to the Canadian embassy in Paris.

I have cabled the embassy to see if it is possible to get this detailed information before making a statement to the house. I expect to have it in time to make a statement to-morrow afternoon.

RESERVE ARMY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF GRANT OF CERTIFICATE OF RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether any consideration has been given to the recommendation of an honour list of members of the reserve army, which rendered such valuable services and carried out its duties so faithfully during the entire period of the war. Is it proposed that the services of these men be given any special recognition?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I thank my hon. friend for his question, which has been asked by some other hon. members. I am glad to be able to say that an appropriate certificate has been authorized expressing the government's appreciation of the devoted services rendered by the men who served in the reserve army during the war. It will be available to all who were not on active service but who had not less than six months' service in the reserve army, and it will be issued through the commanding officers of the units concerned.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

PARITY PROVISION—POSITION OF CANADIAN EXPORTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I sent him notice as soon as I received it myself. What protection will be afforded to an exporter of goods to the United States who signed B-13 form with the foreign exchange control board, thus contracting to bring back American money, prior to the parity of Canadian and United States funds, and who shipped, delivered and sold but had not received payment? Will he receive $1.10 Canadian money on his contract with the foreign exchange control board?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The answer to the question is as follows: Facilities have been available by which exporters could cover themselves against exchange risks for certain periods ahead by entering into a forward exchange contract with a Canadian bank acting on behalf of the foreign exchange control board. If the exporter had entered into such a contract he would receive an amount of Canadian dollars based on the exchange rate prevailing at the time the forward exchange contract was made. If he did not enter into such a forward exchange contract, he will receive the rate prevailing at the time the exchange is sold to his bank in Canada.

COAL

QUESTIONS OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO ALBERTA PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply two questions pertaining to financial asistance to coal producers in Alberta. First, were Acadia Coal Mines Limited, of Calgary, Alberta, refused a hundred thousand dollar loan by the Industrial Development bank in May or June, 1946, the loan being sought to increase coal production? If so, will the minister at an early date tell the house (1) why this loan was refused in these times of dangerous fuel shortage; (2) what the government is doing to enable this coal company and any other coal company similarly situated to obtain the financial assistance necessary to increase production of coal?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to put his question, which is a lengthy one, on the order paper.

[Later]:

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, shall we get an answer from the Minister of Finance with respect to these questions?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have asked the hon. member to put his question, since it is a lengthy one, on the order paper.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 10, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. MARCEL BOIVIN (Shefford) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, since the first session of the 20th Parliament was convened, the electors of the constituency which I have the honour of representing carefully followed the various reports on the House of Commons appearing in the newspapers and probably wondered, rightly so, when their member would rise to speak in this chamber. The moment, so long-awaited by many is finally at hand, and since the electoral division which I represent is mostly French-Canadian, I will take the liberty of speaking in their language, which is also mine, that is to say, in my beloved mother tongue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. BOIVIN: Since coming here, I have learned that a member of the Liberal party has a right to his opinions and convictions—

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOIVIN: —in that case, it may well be that I shall differ with some of my colleagues, but as I am aware of my rights, I consider it my duty, with reference to the budget now before the house, to express my opinion shared, I might add, by a large section of my constituency.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The budget is the most important item and if discussion of its provisions were left only to the financial experts of the house, the debate would soon end and it would be carried in no time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. BOIVIN: May I at the outset congratulate the Right Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for his masterly budget speech and for the manner in which he has accomplished such a thankless task, although he has been in poor health during the last six years.

After taking cognizance of the real meaning of the budget and in view of the confidence which our constituents have placed in each one of us, I consider that it is our duty, whoever we may be, to express our views. Some people claim that speeches delivered in this house are not very effective. I believe that eventually they will change their minds for in my opinion those speeches have always received and will continue to receive consideration. Further they are placed in the official records of the house in support of our statements and show whether we are right or wrong.

I have listened carefully to the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, my colleague from St. Boniface (Mr. Viau); may I digress here to say that bishop Cabana of St. Boniface is a native son of Granby, and the constituency which I have the honour to represent is proud of him. I have also listened carefully to the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters). You will agree with me that both did their work with the same mastery and ability as their predecessors of the first session and one might have been led to believe that they had several years of experience in parliament.

Lord Athlone's message on the occasion of the opening of the second session, that is shortly before his departure, was followed with interest and even read over again by the members of the house following its publication. As I read it later, I shall take the liberty of referring to it when I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, since your appointment to that office, several of my colleagues have spoken in this house for the first time, either in reply to the speech from the throne or on various other matters.

You have, more than anyone else, been in a position, especially in view of your experience in the Legislative Assembly and the House of Commons, to appreciate their tact in fulfilling such an arduous task, and those are moments which remain forever in the memories of the members elected by the people to represent them in the House of Commons.

Having spoken about my predecessors, I think it is my duty, at the beginning of my speech, to introduce myself and beg your indulgence as I am no philosopher.

You have no doubt noticed that I am one of the tallest members on the government side, but I am also one of the youngest.

You can easily understand why the diffidence I now feel is much greater than that of my predecessors, and for quite a good reason which I should like to state.

I had the honour to visit Parliament Hill as a young child, and my constituents showed their confidence by electing me as their representative, old memories come back to my mind. I may add further that when I went to the library in order to glance through the debates of many past years I noticed that thirty-five years ago, just a few days after the opening of the first session of the twelfth parliament, that is on November 29, 1911, in this very house, the then youngest member delivered before His Honour Thomas Simpson Sproule his maiden speech as the member for the constituency which I now have the honour to represent. While I am not a professional man, Divine Providence has ordained that the son should follow in his father's footsteps in order to protect, defend and assert the rights of his fellow-citizens.

On August 7, 1926, Divine Providence called to his reward a man who had devoted the best that was in him to his party and his country. He had been entrusted with the functions of Deputy Speaker of the house and later on, just about a year before his decease, that is, in 1925, those of Minister of Customs and Excise, duties which he honourably discharged in spite of the strong campaign waged by the opposition of that time.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall never forget the following message of sympathy sent to my mother, by the then prime minister, who is still at the head of the administration, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King:

> No other man of his time has rendered so many services to his country, with so much devotedness and loyalty, both as member of parliament, and as minister of the cabinet, as did the late Hon. Georges-Henri Boivin.

I feel it my duty, as one of the successors of the faithful supporter of the party and defender of his fellow citizens, to relate these facts to my younger colleagues from Quebec and the other provinces, so that they might draw inspiration from them and follow in his footsteps during the transition period on the threshold of which we stand at the present time; thus, we shall ease to a certain extent, the heavy burden of our cabinet and, in particular, of the Prime Minister, who has directed our country through six long years of war, in such a way as to ensure its prosperity and cause it to be better known throughout the world as a country in which it is good to be living.

I grant, Mr. Speaker, that I should have liked to take part in this debate before to-day, but felt it my duty, as a junior member of the house, to take my bearings and first look after the interests of my constituents, by answering their requests and fraternizing with them, as I have ever done in the past, so that I may better understand their needs, which are largely those of the province and of the country at large.

May I be allowed to digress at this point in order to pay them tribute. Yes, the urban worker and the rural worker have indeed devoted time and energy to send one of their number as their representative in Ottawa; and you may be sure that, in return, I strive to represent them with that same sincerity which is theirs to such a high degree. Mr. Speaker, I was saying just now that they have made their needs known to me and, therefore, as their representative, it is my duty to acquaint you with those needs and tell you what the people of Shefford expect from the central government.

The county of Shefford lies in one of the most picturesque parts of the country, a region known as the Eastern townships, about 45 miles from the metropolis. Its industrial centre is my own home town of Granby, also known as the Princess of the Eastern townships, a most fitting appellation in view of the many parks and playgrounds that grace the locality. With a population of some 20,000, it boasts of some fifty different industries which provide employment due to the initiative of its business leaders.

I should add that the city of Granby also feels the effect of reconversion. We have our quota of unemployed. Its public organizations, such as the junior and senior boards of trade, and others too numerous to mention, are constantly on the lookout for new industries, ready to welcome workers and, thus decrease its claims on unemployment insurance.

Several of its citizens live in a princely fashion in this queen city, owning their homes of which they are justly proud.

On the other hand, a great number of our citizens are still homeless. In view of their insecure position, the town of Granby appealed to the people through its radio station, its daily, its French and English weeklies, to provide them with housing facilities, but all to no avail. A government subsidiary company was approached, but answered that the number of our veterans was too small to warrant such building projects. Some time later, I took upon myself to inquire from a member of the legion in Granby the number of returned veterans. I learned that up to now we had more than 600. As a reward for the sacrifices they made overseas, those brave men would ask for nothing more than a home, however small. It is rumoured that the company to which I referred is ready to reconsider its decision. Meanwhile, a large portion of the people are waiting to see this hope fulfilled.

May I be permitted at this point to mention the county town of Waterloo, whose loyalty to the party in power has not wavered, although its two munitions factories were closed at the beginning of June last year. It can boast of the greatest war effort on the basis of its population. I tried vainly to secure the crown buildings for the municipal authorities. They were sold to strangers by the War Assets Corporation, to be demolished. Waterloo is left waiting for a new industry to absorb its unemployed, as a reward for its war effort. In view of the above mentioned facts, I hope that the wartime prices and trade board will cooperate in the way indicated recently by the Right Hon. Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) to help this municipality. Because of our returned veterans and of a floating population which has come back to its pre-war domicile, there is a housing shortage in Granby and Waterloo, as in most other cities and municipalities of the country. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that for a long time to come, the Minister of Finance will keep in office the housing administrators all over the country.

Several of my colleagues and myself have been informed of a shortage of building materials which contractors expect from manufacturers; rumour has it, however, that the latter must attend to priority orders before supplying other customers. That being the case, it is to be hoped that the building trade will increase its activity in the near future so that several thousand families now living in inadequate quarters may be properly housed. With reference to this industry, may I draw your attention to existing conditions and while my suggestion will not, I hasten to add, solve the construction problem it can substantially improve the situation. Throughout the country, at present, many wholesale merchants dealing in building materials are issued licences authorizing them to do both wholesale and retail business; nowadays, they tend to limit themselves to retail trade which is more profitable to them; contractors who formerly had the right to buy at wholesale prices and are now forced to pay retail prices, naturally refuse to purchase at an increased price. Distributors take advantage of the shortage of materials to make unreasonable profits, and in my opinion inspectors should be appointed to make sure that they sell at wholesale prices, for if their business was profitable in normal times they should, in return, do their fair share in critical times. I am sure that such steps would help to curb black market operations and materially increase the building of houses.

Mr. COTE (Matane-Matapedia): Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: The primary purpose of the budget in former years was to bring the war to a successful conclusion. Why should it not aim to put an end to difficulties occurring not overseas this time but right here in this country?

Speaking of the budget, I wish to refer to a problem which is being discussed from coast to coast at present, a problem which it seems dangerous to tackle. This matter is highly important but it seems that my older colleagues are reluctant to discuss it. I am speaking of army deserters. On July 4, 1946, the Ottawa Journal, five o'clock edition, published an article under the following headline which appeared in large type: "The Provost Corps is seeking 14,000 deserters".

It read as follows:

> The Mounted Police and Provost Corps are still seeking 14,117 deserters, of which 5,819 are volunteers and 8,298 have been called up.

After reading that item I wondered whether the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), in spite of his numerous occupations, ever took time to discuss this matter with the Minister of Finance in order to ascertain the cost to the country of these gentlemen, who deserted the army for a reason which in their own mind appears quite legitimate, and of which you are all aware.

Some people seem to believe that deserters cost nothing to the country as long as they are absent without leave. I do not agree with that opinion, especially since I visited military camps and found out that officers and men are waiting for the return of the deserters, and spend their time playing cards or fooling around; they seem to hope that the deserters will take their time to return so that they may keep their well paid jobs, especially in the case of officers. It is only natural that those officers should want to remain in the army, in view of the higher rate of pay they are drawing in addition to dependents' allowances in the case of married men.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue my speech on this same matter but to speak about judges of military courts.

In the opinion of the rank and file in the camps those men have some of the nicest posts in the army, and you may rest assured that the judges want to acquire as much credit as possible by condemning deserters to twenty months, or even more, in order to make a good name for themselves and keep their highly-paid jobs as long as possible.

I again wish to refer to that item from the Journal which I mentioned a while ago. I must say a few words about the members of the provost corps who go around in the country to look for deserters and, in 90 per cent of cases, make useless trips at the expense of the Department of National Defence, whose estimates are included in the present budget. We must take into account the fact that most deserters do not have the same education as the majority of members of this house. I beg you to believe that when they deserted the army they were willing to fight for their country, but not for another country where they never lived and which really did not mean anything to them. It is true that they deserted the army, but they would have been willing to fight had their country been threatened.

Mr. Speaker, although I do not yet know much about life in Parliament, I have already made representations several months ago to the appropriate authorities regarding the way they are treated and, later on, I heard that the lot of deserters had been improved. I speak in their behalf again and I beg you to believe that they are not murderers or thieves, and I am convinced that they should receive a reasonable sentence.

Mr. DECHENE: Hear, hear!

Mr. BOIVIN: You are no doubt under the impression that I am going to request an amnesty on their behalf, but I admit, Mr. Speaker, that this would not be practical, because the resolutions passed by the various legions would run counter to my request. I shall voice my personal opinion by stating that the best course to follow, in view of the fact that scarcely one year after the war of 1914-18 we granted full amnesty, I am wondering why the Department of National Defence does not make another concession this time, by punishing deserters with a 30-day jail sentence. The latter admit that they transgressed the law which had been passed by a majority in this house. So that I may be clearly understood I repeat that they transgressed a law of their land, but that they did not default against their country, because the latter was not threatened. Most of those deserters would submit to the law provided we give them a reasonable punishment and a humane treatment. This would considerably decrease the military estimates which, after all, are connected with this budget. Our people could then resume their pre-war employment and help to insure a sorely needed increase in our industrial and agricultural production. Fair treatment in their case would help production and those men would thereby be enabled to earn their living honourably and pay their fair share of taxes.

It is true that the government has levied heavy taxes on workers during the last six years and I know whereof I speak because I was one of them until June 11 last. I may add that we have accepted those taxes because we knew that they were necessary. The war has ended over a year ago and, now, the working people expect a fair decrease in taxes. You may be sure, Mr. Speaker, that they have done their duty and deserve proper consideration. Allow me, Your Honour, to quote Right Hon. Minister of Finance, whose statement appears in Hansard of June 27:

> A review of our war finance and of our other economic policies and activities during the war would remind us of many achievements in which Canadians may justly take pride.

This is an excellent excerpt from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. The credit given to our fellow citizens by the minister is well deserved, especially if we consider that the war not only has caused the sacrifice of the lives of our sons overseas, but has also broken Canadian homes and spoiled the future of thousands of our young men. Going still further, demobilization costs, in the previous budget, that of October 12, 1945, represented a percentage of 83·23 of our total expenses, or the fabulous sum of $4,418,446,000. I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that our population accepted the budget of 1945-46 realizing that war had ended but a few months previously, but, to-day, war being over for more than a year, it is regrettable that it has been found impossible to reduce the percentage by more than 8 per cent, since it remains at 75·85 per cent. This may be, in part, an explanation of the delay, until next January, in granting the tax deductions.

Mr. Speaker, the minister stated in his speech that taxation was the fairest means of providing revenue and that taxpayers' ability to pay was being taken into account. This, he says, applies to the low income earner no less than to people in the higher income brackets. As far as salaries are concerned, I agree, but when it comes to the taxation of professional men and business men, on this point, I must differ to some extent with the Minister of Finance. In order to achieve a fair distribution and to ensure equitable treatment to the people of this fair country, we should start with paying fair wages to the income tax assessors throughout Canada, so that they may further the interests of the department and tax all classes on the same basis. If they were paid a decent wage, the income tax assessors would better serve the interests of the department instead of catering to individuals. Tax revenues would thus soar and provide relief for the wage earner.

Mr. Speaker, I was also struck by the minister's statement to the effect that this period of numerous and persistent shortages, with the present strong demand for commodities, was obviously not a good one in which to embark upon a large-scale programme of public works. He added, however, that, as a result of the war, and of the depreciation of public property, many of our resources have been depleted to such an extent as to make it necessary for us to prepare long-term plans for a decided effort in all branches of public works when circumstances render them feasible. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I might add that in my riding of Shefford the people are living on expectations. We are in great need of such a programme of public works. It should materialize soon, considering the millions of Granby dollars which have found their way into the national revenue. I must congratulate the Right Hon. Minister of Finance on his presentation of the difficult financial relations between the dominion and the provinces, which have called for a great deal of extra work in the preparation of the budget. I realize that a prosperous central authority working in the general interest is essential to prosperity in the country.

May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Shefford are well aware of the minister's predicament and understand the pressing needs for great quantities of our products overseas. We know also that these countries are in no financial position to pay cash and that we must extend our credit to them. As the Minister of Finance so aptly said, it is all very well to replace our expenditures for the last six years by investments which will add to the productivity of our country, but we also believe that such credits should bear interest, if they are being used I commend the government for its initiative and foresight and add, as was so aptly indicated by the minister in his speech, that in an unsettled and restless world, it is impossible to determine the economic trend of the future, which justifies us all the more in continuing to lend a helping hand since our investments bring returns.

In the budget speech, Mr. Speaker, I also carefully noted the section which dealt with the simplification of the tax procedure with regard to individuals, but I regret that the budget does not raise the exemption, formerly set at $660 for single people and $1,200 for married men, above $750 and $1,500 for these respective groups. It is to be hoped, however, that the suggestions of my colleagues will be implemented and that the pre-war exemption of $1,200 for single people and $2,000 for married men will soon be in effect.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to the other section of my constituency which is not the least important; I refer to the farming population which, to my mind, deserves immediate consideration if we would halt auction sales and the exodus from the land in our constituencies.

The county of Shefford is not outstanding for its agricultural products in general but the dairy production is unequalled. The wartime prices and trade board placed a ceiling price on butter and subjected this industry as well as other industries to certain restrictions. I deem it my duty to call attention to the following, but before doing so I wish to congratulate the government for having allowed, a few months ago, an increase of four cents per pound in the price of butter. On that occasion I carried out a survey in my constituency and I found out that milk had a butterfat content of 3·5 per 100 pounds, which meant a thirty-five cent premium for the producer. The latter was receiving for 100 pounds of fluid milk giving 3½ pounds of butter the sum of $1.04 plus thirty-five cents premium, a total of $1.75. On the other hand fluid milk could be sold in the metropolis for $3.05 per 100 pounds, including premium, or $2.70 after deducting shipping costs. I personally found out at the time that there was a substantial difference between those two prices in addition to the difference in the amount of labour required. This may explain the scarcity of butter.

In 1938 the agricultural cooperative of Granby township was organized. I may add that the people of Granby, as well as myself, had some doubts as to its success, but from that moment I realized that the agricultural classes wished to get together in order to help one another and overcome the obstacles which they might have to face. I may add that the cooperative has met some difficulties but with the help of its 550 members, belonging to fifteen parishes in the vicinity of Granby, it has succeeded in overcoming them. In short, unlike a trust, the cooperative instead of exploiting the farmers, has made them prosperous and it wishes to continue to do so. It has entrusted its management with the creation of a powdered milk division which would produce for every hundred pounds of fluid milk thirteen pounds of powdered milk priced at thirty cents a pound, plus the bonus of thirty cents per 100 pounds; it would mean a profit of $4.40 which the cooperative would pass on to the farmers.

Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that I am acquainted with the cooperative movement in our province and that I give it credit for having helped the farmers to withstand hard times, because I remember how, not long ago, the farmers were living in poverty. As regards the provisions concerning the cooperatives in this budget, I support the amendments proposed by the Department of Finance and the general attitude of the government, but I reserve the right to criticize the provisions of any bill that may be based on the government's proposals. I wish to take this occasion to compliment the minister for having spread over three years the income tax to be paid by the farmers.

Hogs are also raised on a large scale in my constituency, which in this regard takes a high rank, in proportion to its population. While I was speaking of butter a few moments ago some of my colleagues no doubt were thinking of the by-products. Yes, Mr. Speaker, a medal always has two sides and you, no doubt, know that the slaughtering permit system was adopted so as to control and ration meat; and, for my part, I consider these permits, as far as pork is concerned, as having outlived their usefulness, and I wish to bring the facts of the matter to your attention. Each month, a permit holder can only slaughter his quota, which is very low in our rural districts. It happens that a number of farmers take pigs to the slaughtering house, when they are ready, but the permit holder has to tell them that his quota being filled, he cannot accept them. The farmers must then take them back to the farm and wait another month in order to comply with the instructions of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, and when they take them back they are placed in a lower class, if not rejected.

I revert now, Mr. Speaker, to my opening remarks on the throne speech. For more than a year the European war has been a thing of the past. We are glad of it but we realize that many countries who have resisted to the armed forces of an enemy bent on world domination are still to-day in the throes of privation, suffering and even starvation. May I remind those people overseas that Canada understands the sacrifices they have made to protect us from the dictators. We are prepared to help them as much as we can. We wish to develop. We desire the memory of those who fell on the battlefields to live forever. We intend to increase our export trade which has been promoted by the war.

In conclusion, I would ask the leaders of Canada to supply the needs of our own people, for charity begins at home. By such action we shall prosper, thus acknowledging that the sacrifices accepted for the glory of our country have not been useless.

May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I said at the beginning of my speech when I commended the stand taken by the Minister of Finance. In expressing by appreciation of the budget I told him that I understood the thankless task devolved upon him. I grant that, in view of the difficult years that lie ahead, he can hardly count on the improvement of the situation and I am sure that, under the circumstances, if all the members of this house who are more conversant than I am with parliamentary procedure, should undertake to supply some constructive criticism and express ideas which might directly or indirectly be of benefit to the Minister of Finance, while at the same time endorsing the present budget we should thus become truly worthy of the confidence shown us by our constituents and be of service to our party and our country.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to make the second part of my speech in English. I want you to know that it will be quite a task for me to attempt to express myself in a language which is not my own, but please believe that I am glad to do so in order to show the hon. members of this house the understanding that prevails in my riding among the French and English speaking people. I would ask you to be my interpreter with the English speaking members of this house and to offer them my congratulations for the initiative so many of them have shown in learning French. This will give French and English speaking members an opportunity to express their own opinions and to understand one another better after so many years of misunderstanding, all of which will be to the greater advantage of our country.

As I have just said, since the majority of hon. members understand French I do not wish to repeat in English what I have said already in French. However, I should like to repeat one of my first remarks. The present budget is extremely important, and it is the duty of my colleagues to rise and express their points of view or the opinions they have received from their respective ridings. As you may have noticed, it is not my intention to criticize the government on the past administration. Yesterday is yesterday and to-day is to-day. Therefore let us thrust aside the criticism made by many hon. members and express fundamental ideas which will be of benefit to the country in the future.

I should have liked to see a change made in the twenty-five per cent luxury tax which was imposed on jewellers during the war The population accepted this tax while hostilities continued, but to-day they are asking for relief. Personally I believe that their demands are justified. They are willing to accept a twelve and one-half per cent luxury tax deducted at the source. Some contend that this would cause additional work for wholesalers, but that is not so, because already they are organized to collect the eight per cent sales tax. I would add that at present certain articles are sold in hardware and other stores without the payment of a luxury tax when in fact these articles should come under the luxury tax.

Along with a great number of members I have received representations with regard to the double taxation imposed upon soft drinks. I was hoping that at least one of these taxes would be done away with, especially when we realize that the consumer of soft drinks is the daily worker in the country upon whom we have already imposed many other taxes. These workers accomplished a great war effort; let us grant them some relaxation.

There is a rumour that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) may in the near future distribute new flags to all the public buildings, but before that is done this question will have to be brought up on the floor of this house. The flag is at present the subject of headlines in the newspapers, and of conversation in practically every home in the country. I have been informed that some of my colleagues are in favour of the union jack, while others are in favour of the red ensign; therefore I consider it my duty to express myself plainly. I hope the new flag will not be a borrowed flag but a distinctive flag, in other words a flag of our own. May I borrow the words which have been used by many in the past: A flag is chosen on principles and facts. If this house does not come to an agreement in due course I shall rise to express myself on the subject.

In conclusion I should like to read the last paragraph of the address delivered by His Excellency the Governor General on his arrival in Canada, and to ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house to keep it in mind:

> Although I have now said farewell to arms, this does not mean rest and relaxation. On the contrary, there is a lot of splendid constructive work to be done, and it will be my aim and privilege to devote myself wholeheartedly to the duties of my office which will allow me to watch with sympathy the growing prosperity of the Canadian people who have earned for themselves by their own endeavours the great position they hold in the world to-day.

If everyone keeps that paragraph in mind it will be to the benefit of a greater Canada.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, there is a phrase: happy are those who expect nothing because they will not be disappointed. I have a great deal of admiration and respect for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). During the six years of war he has had a very heavy task to perform. On the whole I believe he has won the admiration, if not the support, of a great many people in this country. He is one of our native-born citizens of the maritimes, and he became a national figure in that local setting.

In my opinion there is no royal road to the return to happier days, just as there is no royal road to learning; and there is no short cut to peace and prosperity. It has to be earned and worked for and deserved. The bulk of our people, after listening to those who preach a new utopia and a new world to come, I believe expected in this budget some relief from taxation. There was a large number, however, who did not expect it, because they know the ruthless destruction which takes place in every war, and they know that the last war surpassed every war in history in destruction. There was three times the destruction in the last war that there was in the war of 1914-18. So while many people were led to expect a new utopia after this war, I believe it will be a long time coming.

I have a few constructive suggestions to make to the government. Others were made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) the other evening in his address in this debate. We should secure if we possibly can a more modern method of preparing and presenting budgets. The present method is not the fault of the finance minister, because he is simply following the practice of responsible government of the past two hundred years. Under the principle of responsible government we have to accept the whole budget as it is because if we move to strike out a dollar, and the minister opposes it and it comes to a vote and the government is defeated on that vote, it has to resign. A change is all the more necessary because of the great dislocation brought about by the war. I have always contended in this house that in parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reforms Canada is away behind the times. I should like to see the municipal system adopted in preparing the annual budget. It would involve a change in our constitutional practice, but it would restore to parliament the place which it should rightfully have. We should have federally what is known as the board of control system in the municipal field, under which a national committee of ways and means could reduce any expenditure and strike a balanced budget. I admit that a balanced budget would not be easy in this period of reconversion and demobilization, but I make the suggestion for the consideration of the government. It is unfortunate that after this great war, now over for a year, the people have still to pay high taxes, and the Minister of Finance is budgeting for a deficit of $300,000,000 for this year. In addition we have loans and advances amounting to more than a billion dollars. Our whole economic future is thus mortgaged, and future generations no doubt will have to pay part of the cost of this war. The practice used to be for fifty per cent to be paid out of taxes and fifty per cent charged to capital account. This generation has suffered enough in flesh and blood and it is only right that future generations should pay a part of the cost of this war.

We are also making loans to help rebuild the devastated countries of Europe. There is not much security behind these loans. We found that out after the last war, and the Minister of Finance gave a statement in connection with those loans in an earlier budget.

The budget of last November 8, in Washington, furnishes a pertinent comparison with the budget now before us. The United States budget relieved between 10,000,000 and 12,000,000 persons of paying any income tax whatever. The minimum exemption for taxpayers was raised to $1,000, and the exemption for a dependent wife or child was raised to $500. The excess profits tax was repealed entirely, and the normal corporation tax reduced slightly. Altogether, the taxation concessions totalled in excess of $6 billion.

I referred at the opening of this parliament in September, 1945, to what business men in this country have had to suffer and their tasks are heavy in this reconversion period, so that Canada may recover quickly. Industry and labour in Canada have worked wonders in war, and can in peace also. Canada needs stability to speed the delivery of all classes of goods and meet market demands so as to aid peacetime economy in employment, supply civilian needs and restore as soon as possible living standards and defeat inflation and black markets. It should be, with the lessons industry learned in Canada in war, much easier to work out reconversion. All irksome controls must go, and we must remove shackles from industry, large and small.

Private enterprise must have a clear right of way unfettered by a small standing army of inspectors, examiners, supervisors, card-filing clerks of an outworn, out-of-date system of control, most of whom contributed nothing to the winning of the war. Business must have freedom once again to succeed by free enterprise. We should see an end of government controls by blueprints and a horde of useless officials, many of whom have never had training in any competitive business they seek to control. Demobilization should be speeded for these reasons.

We have recently embarked on a programme of employment. There is no such thing as full employment. There is no use in people promising things like that; it cannot be done. If you consult the health statistics of this country you will find a great many people not fit for work. The reconversion policy of the government has been a flat failure and has never been anything else since it started. I will give the government of Canada credit for one thing, namely, the establishment in the city of Ottawa of a great basic industry known as the "ambassador cure for unemployment."

I said last year that the Canadian people are long-suffering, but there is a limit to their patience. That limit has been reached. As a result of mistakes made in the war and in the reconstruction period so far, they are losing their confidence in all governments. They believe that there has been over-government and overtaxation in Canada, and they are losing their confidence not only in the administration but in members of parliament as well. They are becoming critical of the work that is being done in the nation's various legislatures. The worst of it is that the public are not really acquainted with the facts in any situation that confronts them. They cannot get the truth and the whole truth concerning any problem that faces the government of Canada. We had a control system in this country throughout the war—we still have it—which has virtually made the work of the House of Commons unnecessary. We might as well have gone home and locked up the House of Commons; for in part the nation's affairs in the war have been handed over to boards over the head of parliament, over the law courts of the country, without any public regulation whatsoever. The Minister of Finance is not to blame for that, because he is only one member of the cabinet, but he has had to bear the brunt of the whole thing. It is parliament that is primarily to blame if the facts are not what they should be.

There is no sacrifice that Canadians will not willingly make in this time of peace and reconversion, just as there was no sacrifice during the war which they were unwilling to make. But the people should be given the facts. There is a great deal of waste in Canada to-day.

The Conservative party stands firm on the ground that the state exists for the individual, not the individual for the state; that state interference with the full liberty of the subject is an evil thing per se, the encroachment of which should be most searchingly scrutinized and resisted; that no government department, except where it enjoys a monopoly, can conduct business at a profit; that the prosperity of the nation rests on the enterprise and ability of individuals in free association to conduct their affairs with a minimum of regulation and interference; that capital and labour are partners—not enemies—indispensable to one another; that bureaucracy is the enemy of both and will ruin them morally and financially if they do not restrict its inordinate increase.

And finally, that what the Conservatives seek is the welfare of the whole community, and no sectional or class advantage. Speaking in this house on September 11, 1945, I said:

> Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the 17th century has been surrendered to the political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others.
> I want to emphasize to the committee that powers of legislation older even than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditure have been surrendered, and if we are to continue this sort of thing the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal . . .
> I come from a very large taxpaying city. The working class have to pay a 12 per cent sales tax, and the burden of taxation is very heavy upon them and upon business firms in the district. Some small business men have been put out of business altogether.

[Mr. Church.]

I pointed out that in Washington they are proposing to reduce expenditures along the lines I have indicated. We should call a halt to this kind of thing. The trouble is that we are only holding a post mortem when we come to deal with these estimates. The auditor general's statement is of some importance; I am glad to see that in the last auditor general's report there is some improvement. As I stated in an earlier address in 1945 in this house:

> We all know what happens to an individual or to a nation which goes on borrowing and does not keep its finances within bounds. It becomes bankrupt. When you continue to spend more than you make and keep on borrowing money to make up the difference, you know the result. You know, too, that a big chunk out of every dollar a working man earns and spends is used to pay taxes. There is a sales tax on almost everything he buys, so that everyone should look at the way the government is spending our dollars. In my opinion the government should begin now to live within its means. During the war of necessity we spent huge sums of money; yet now, with the war over, the government proposes to spend much more than in any pre-war year. Most thoughtful people believe that government expenditures are now far greater than they need be. They believe that the government, like a family, should live within its means, that it should not spend more than its takes in and that it should not keep going deeper into debt; yet that is exactly what is happening to-day. Our government is spending millions more than it takes in, and it continues to borrow or add taxes to make up the difference. That is the sort of money handling that causes inflation. Economy in government means money in your pocketbook. If the Canadian people will act to reduce government spending and take steps to increase production, inflation will be stopped; and this is the only way in which it can be stopped. I urge this house to cut the cost of government, to eliminate all waste, all unnecessary services and postpone all expenditures that can be put off until our war bills are paid. Mr. Truman has adopted that policy, and I urge the government to start living at a level that we can afford to maintain. We shall soon see the result in the cost of everything we have to buy, food, clothing and everything else.

I think these words are what should be expected.

I notice certain criticisms in the Wall Street Magazine of the Office of Price Administration, to the effect that it would mean the end of Bretton Woods—for which I did not vote, and I am glad I did not. The same source reports the failure of the international money fund and of the world bank through the bringing to the end of the Office of Price Administration. That remains to be seen. But I wish to add this, in general, that I believe something should be done to eliminate all unnecessary expense.

I wish now to refer for a few minutes to the subject of Canadian coal. The existing situation has from time to time caused much distress across our country, and I predicted during the war and after both wars the prospect of great scarcity of coal and that many industries would have to close. I made my first plea for a Canadian national coal policy as long ago as March 19, 1923. I urged that matters should be so arranged that all our coal would be mined and coked under the British flag, whether in Alberta, the maritimes, or the supply from Wales, and that we should no longer be dependent on the United States, which is running out of coal. The fact is that Canada needs a coal supply from some other source than the United States. The Globe and Mail carried part of this address on Friday, June 21, last. My plea was for a national coal supply, that we could not expect the country to the south to supply us all the time. It is a fact that charity begins at home, and as I said:

> I think the people of the United States will adopt that rule, as far as the coal situation in Canada is concerned, because no country should be expected to send outside its borders the commodity upon which the existence and life of the people depends.

Very little has been done about this matter, and I am sorry that more has not been done about Canadian coal and more in peat and wood, a substitute, and electric power. We should provide for a substitute supply. The coal question is largely one of transportation, and after the next winter it is certain that [illegible] will have to be done, because I predict that we shall again have next winter the awful suffering which was experienced in 1917 because of the shortage of coal.

Another matter which is important at this time is concerned with the housing administration. I have had some correspondence with the wartime prices and trade board on this subject. I cannot understand why the government has not been more active about providing housing, urban, suburban and rural. Little or nothing has been done. In the large city I come from several hundred cases of evictions before county judges are pending, and notwithstanding the new Housing Act and the wartime housing provision there has been considerable suffering in Toronto. One of the main things I complain about is that the soldiers who have invested all they had from their grants and gratuities in small homes find now that they cannot get possession. Under the present control system many tenants have no written lease; they are month to month tenants; yet they are allowed to continue in possession and the owner cannot get into his own house. One man named Anderson in my constituency was arrested, handcuffed and taken to a Pape avenue police station in my riding. The bailiff evicted him and put him on the street, until along came somebody and took him in. I claim that control in this matter should end immediately. I protested against the eviction of this soldier; the name of the man evicted was James P. Anderson. A man's house used to be his castle. How long is the property owner to endure this kind of thing? A man puts his savings into his house, and is given to understand he has no control of it. Essentially it becomes the property of the wartime prices and trade board. The war ended over a year ago, yet this system continues as to an owner recovering his own house to live in, it is causing a great deal of distress in the city of Toronto. I saw the controller of housing about it. We had a good man in charge of housing named Mr. F. W. Nicolls, a valuable man. When I wrote a week or more ago to the new rent controller, Mr. Owen Lobley, of the wartime prices and trade board, Ottawa, complaining about the hardships to owners I got a letter from this new officer stating that he had never heard of anyone by the name of Nicolls in the prices board, although he was for over three years in charge of housing with the wartime prices and trade board.

Such a state of affairs should not continue any longer. We should have an end of the absurd rule that the owner cannot get into his own house. I know of one tenant who goes away down south for three months in the winter time and in the summer time has a cottage in a summer resort district; he is hardly ever in his city house, and from what I hear he makes a large profit out of it, but the wartime prices and trade board do not go around and inspect such places and find out some of the abuses and the profiteering which is going on in real estate, while hundreds of owners, some of them soldiers, cannot get into their own houses. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are an ex-mayor and you should know from personal experience that this sort of thing is going on. As I say, it is causing a lot of trouble.

An important question which I think the government should try to answer is, what is the budget going to do to stop the exodus of our best brains to the United States? In the period between the two great wars a return was tabled in this house showing that over a million Canadians had in that time gone to the United States because they could not find employment in their own country. Many of them were soldiers who had fought for this country at the hazard of their lives in the last war. They found it impossible to get work in Canada. The other day, in connection with another subject that was under consideration in the house, I referred to the exodus of young graduates from the departments of civil engineering in our various Canadian universities, as well as young men in the medical and other important professions. The Toronto Globe and Mail interviewed a large number of people, including Mr. Cyrus Eaton, a great Canadian from Pugwash, Nova Scotia, to whom the hon. member for Davenport also made reference. This gentleman is chairman of Steep Rock Iron Mines, Limited. Another man who has been referred to in this house is Professor Brebner, the son of one who was well known in Toronto as the efficient registrar of Toronto university. He is now professor of history in Columbia university and is the author of a work dealing with scholarships in Canada. He states that we have not in Canada proper means for research, that young scientists have not conditions that are congenial to them, and have not the opportunities for advancement in Canada that are now offered in the United States universities. This is regrettable after all the money that this country has spent on colleges and universities, and on education, because we have some of the finest institutions in the world in preventive medicine, in many branches of the engineering profession, in chemical, electrical, mining, mineral and other branches of scientific research. Very important work is being done in our Canadian universities, and something should be done by the government to put an end to the present exodus of such really good Canadians.

Another matter I wish to discuss for a moment or two is the food situation in the post-war world. As you know, Mr. Speaker, at the Hot Springs conference resolutions of a revolutionary character were passed by the council of the united nations organization, and advertisements have been published in an endeavour to sustain the faith of small and large business men in the utopia we are supposed to have in the future. All his life the business man in this country has been depending upon free enterprise. Now Mr. Hoover, the food world head, wishes to see established a committee with power to control the production and distribution of the food of the entire world. I would remind hon. members that after the last war there was a commission under Mr. Hoover that was subject to much criticism, and apparently they did not try to do anything efficiently in this direction; and we know about the debates that have taken place on it recently in the United States congress. Now an effort is being made to create some device in connection with the united nations organization and UNRRA to set up a world authority to discharge the functions proposed by Mr. Hoover.

I do not think people realize that the mother country has suffered more from lack of food than any other country. Now they are rationing bread and flour and many other staple commodities. I hope that mistakes will not be made in this matter of world control such as we had after the last war. Canada should go much farther to aid the motherland in food supplies.

There are many other matters I would like to discuss but I have not the time. Empire preferential trade, however, is something that should receive our attention now that we are discussing the budget. Little is done by us to preserve this trade. There are three or four committees sitting this afternoon with the house now in session, and some have gone home on the four o'clock train for the big parade to-morrow. We are on the eve of a great anniversary, Mr. Speaker, one of two great days—the 17th of March and the 12th of July. The people of Canada owe a great deal to the people of Ulster for the protection which was given our fleet in two world wars in the battle of the Atlantic and for the great leaders that Northern Ireland has produced. I might mention Field Marshal Montgomery, Field Marshal Alexander, Admiral Cunningham, Sir Alan Brooke, Lord Kitchener, Lord Roberts, to name only a few. The late President Roosevelt, as well as Mr. Churchill and General Eisenhower, paid glowing tributes to these great men and to the people of Ulster generally for the part they had played in the war. They saved civilization by the protection which they gave the British fleet at a critical time when it could not use the southern ports as it had done during the last war. I presume that many hon. members have gone home so that they will not forget the parade to-morrow. We may well be proud of the work which northern Ireland did. I was going to ask the hon. member who preceded me in this debate to take part in the parade to-morrow, and I know that the Minister of Finance and his deskmate, the parliamentary assistant (Mr. Mayhew) would be very welcome.

I wish to pay my tribute to what that great country Ulster has done for the preservation of our civilization and the liberty of the world in the two great wars. Lord Macaulay has fittingly referred to the achievement of 1688-90 as a result of the battle fought there. He refers to that fight for equal rights to all and special privileges to none, for freedom of religion, freedom of worship. Ulster stands for one throne, one flag, one empire, and the principle of confederation, which is a very good one exemplifying the old Cornish battle cry, "Each for all and all for each", with equality of treatment for every citizen of Canada. These are the principles of the Orange association. Lord Macaulay's reference to those great people will be found in the words he spoke after the siege of Londonderry. He said: "The various tombs of captains have been sought, repaired and embellished. It is impossible not to respect the sentiments which manifest themselves in these tokens. They are sentiments which appeal to the higher and the purer part of human nature and add not a little to the strength of states. A people that take no pride in the noble achievements of their remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered."

In that regard, Mr. Speaker, I may say that there is no bigotry in the province of Ontario or the city from which I come, and on the two great days to which I have referred, the 17th of March and the 12th of July, our people should try to forget their differences and aid in a united Canada.

I mentioned the need of empire trade preferences. As Joseph Chamberlain said in 1903, "Empire trade is absolutely essential to our prosperity, and it is more than ever essential now. If that trade declines our fate will be that of empires and kingdoms of the past." That is the opinion that the great Joseph Chamberlain expressed so many years ago, and it is one that I heartily support to-day. Edmund Burke made this statement in his day:

> We ought to elevate our minds to the greatness of that trust to which the order of Providence has called us. By adverting to the dignity of that high calling, our ancestors have turned a savage wilderness into a glorious empire; and have made the most extensive, and the only honourable conquests, not by destroying but by promoting the wealth, number and happiness of the human race.

In my opinion the empire is at the parting of the ways. Without the knowledge of the dominions, the British Prime Minister (Mr. Attlee), declared his intention of removing the British garrison in Egypt and abandoning the Suez canal. He did not ask the dominions anything about it. I would point out that the dominions, India, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, helped Britain to hold the Mediterranean and marched across the desert with the British army in 1940-42. Consequently I contend that this new method of diplomacy, of consultation without meeting, has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. This Suez canal incident shows it. There should have been an empire conference or a meeting with the dominions. This method of consultation by telegram and telephone and all that sort of thing is entirely wrong. The British Prime Minister said that the dominions had been consulted on May 7, and the next day he rose and contradicted himself and admitted that they had not been consulted, but only told of it and not asked to consent. The defence of Egypt means the defence of the eastern empire. It means the defence of South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada also, and it involves the Pacific question. In my opinion the politicians have thrown away by such actions as this the mandate that was won for them in the war by the forces of Britain and her dominions. We should know where Canada stands herein. I wish to mention India also, where a commission is out to turn India out of the empire and over to Gandhi. The other day I termed it in this house a most mischievous commission. India is the heart of the British empire. Indian troops, along with New Zealand, Australian and British troops saved India from the axis and the Japanese powers and dynasties in the last war.

With regard to Egypt, the Egyptian army took little or no part in the march across the desert or to preserve the Suez canal with the Australian troops. I cannot understand these two particular errors which have been made by the British government without consulting the dominions. I have noticed remarks in the Australian press. They are protesting most strongly against it, as is also New Zealand. Sir Thomas Blamey is quoted by the Sydney Morning Herald as follows:

> If the proposal is carried out to its indicated conclusion its far-reaching effects on empire relationships which cannot at present be fully foreseen, must obviously have a disintegrating effect. We will be entering upon a new phase in empire history because the strategical unity of empire relations is centred on this canal zone. The Egyptian army never took a prominent part in the defence of its own country, but left it almost entirely to the British empire and our allies.

That is right. "Sir Thomas knows what he is talking about", says the National Review. The maintenance of Alexandria as a British base was a factor of safety in the empire lifeline. The same great anxiety was also shown by Mr. Casey, who found it difficult to believe that the decision to leave Egypt had been a subject of first class consultation with the dominions, while Mr. Menzies, a former prime minister of Australia, now leader of the opposition, spoke with emphasis about the decision, which was made lightly behind our backs on a matter which in the event of another war may make all the difference to Australia between national security and national destruction. This statement was made in the Argus on May 9, 1946. These reactions to the news that the imperial government were leaving the Suez canal were reported before it had been made clear that the dominions had never been consulted.

I noticed in the reading room that the Daily Express of May 18 last summed up the situation in the following brief comment:

Liquidation

Suez canal—jugular vein of the British empire.

India—heart of the empire. Imperial preference the blood stream of the British empire.

Danger to any one would be grievous to the empire's structure.

There was also the abandonment of British preference. I have been trying to find out what the stand of Canada was, but in vain. These three blows have come from within and not from without our empire, all three were unnecessary, and danger to any one will be fatal to the empire structure of the future.

The empire, I say, is at the parting of the ways. I have mentioned India, where there is a mischievous commission at the present time. I say further that the maintenance of Alexandria as a British base was a safety line for the whole empire, and the action taken was not necessary.

I wish to say a word about the empire parliamentary association, to which this parliament contributed $25,000 last year. For many years it did most useful work, but I am sorry to see that at the meeting at Bermuda the delegates attended too many golf matches, scenic trips, scenic tours, banquets, luncheons and teas, garden parties and all that kind of thing, and failed to carry on their good empire work. It turned itself into a pan-American affair and forgot all about the empire, in my opinion as an old member of the empire parliamentary association, Canadian branch.

We are about to send someone over to the peace conference. As I have said all along, Britain and the dominions will have little or nothing to say in the peace conference if the dominions do not stand together. But for the dominions the mother country would have lost the war. The dominions must hang together or they hang separately, because none of them is able to go it alone.

It is well known that the division of Europe was agreed to at Yalta and Moscow by the big three. They would not allow France in. Mr. Churchill, Mr. Stalin and Mr. Roosevelt were at Yalta, and Mr. Byrnes, Mr. Stalin and Mr. Attlee at Moscow.

The division of Europe was agreed to at Yalta, Moscow and Paris. It was practically decided there. The biggest mistake of the San Francisco meeting was the granting of veto power to any one of the big three or the big five nations. The veto power simply places all the power under the control of three nations, the senior allies. They were opposed to admitting France. Russia objected to it. France will always be a great nation. She is an ally which Great Britain must have for defence, and Britain will need all she can get to have anything to say over there. Unless the dominions stand together at Paris they will hang separately. I am opposed to any change in the union jack or in appeals to the privy council. The privy council has proved itself to be one court where a litigant gets justice.

A few years ago in an external affairs debate I suggested we should have followed the practice of appointing governors general from among some of our great generals. The appointment of Field Marshal Viscount Alexander is a splendid one. I also suggested Field Marshal Montgomery. Field Marshal Alexander and his charming wife have won the admiration, respect, affection and love of the people of Canada in so short a time.

The matter of empire preferences is one of the most important matters that we have to decide at the present time. I am not one of those who believe in what one of our members said concerning Lord Keynes and his work. A recent editorial in the National Review says:

In spite of his excellent brain he was handicapped, for he had no faith in the future of the empire, nor indeed any urge to stand by it. This lack of faith, this pessimism showed all through his life. He did not fight for his country when he was a young man, and when he was older he did not appear to rely on the essential qualities of his countrymen. He could work for them, but he could not believe in their future. This attitude of his did us immense harm in Washington.

I have pointed out all along that we have surrendered too much of our financial, military, social and economic initiative to Washington. And that was done in connection with the matter I am speaking about, imperial preferences and Bretton Woods. "Many Americans felt that they need not consider the empire when England's principal negotiator disbelieved it," says the National Review. It continues:

Added to this, he was accompanied to Washington by a crowd of superior young men, economists, professors and others who made an indelible and deplorable impression upon all who saw them and heard their haughty and highbrow voices. We make a great mistake when we send such representatives abroad. We cannot make ourselves popular in the United States; there is too deep a prejudice there against us, but the sort of people we sent to the United States to discuss the loan would be disliked anywhere and were fatal in America.

There is a lot of wisdom in the National Review. I am sorry to see the remarks which have been made about the British loan over there by some people, but you have to expect some of that, because there are some people there in congress and the press who do not believe in the mother country and were always opposed to it.

If the peace conference is to be a success it will have to be an improvement on the last one. Our delegates who go to Paris will find that they will have very little to say when they gather with the group of twenty-one nations. We must remember what has been happening at the meeting in Paris. They have been meeting for several months. An article in a British paper says:

> Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes have been meeting with the delegates from Russia and France. There have been announcements in the press, and secret meetings were held, but everything has been a failure. There was no agreement. The British, French and United States delegates have learned that Russia does not intend to play any of their games. It has been a sort of educational process. But there must be a better way of managing it.

So far as diplomacy is concerned, I think it would have been much better if we did not have the present style of open diplomacy; the old style by experts was far better. Mr. Eden referred to it in a speech he made recently in another room in this building. At the time of writing of these articles no less than six British cabinet ministers were going around the world causing disunity. I can only say that Canada is bound to weather the storm; so will Britain and the empire if we hold together, but I hope nothing will be done at the coming peace conference to affect the empire relationships we have enjoyed with the mother country in the past.

During this budget debate reference has been made to colonial days. Such phrases are a relic of thirty years ago, because there is no colonialism today in Canada. As Sir John A. Macdonald said, we are a completely independent country, and we shall be a unit with the mother country forever. They talk about British imperialism, but next to the Christian church no agency has done more than the British empire for the world, for Christianity, freedom and liberty. Long may that empire continue. Compare that with Russian imperialism, and United States imperialism. They may not have had imperialistic ideas when they came into the war; they may not have wanted to grab territory; but Russia does now and they are both imperial now in the sense that they want to have a larger say in the peace terms and in the new world to come and more territory. Perhaps you cannot blame the United States; they are a faithful ally and stood with us in two wars; but Russia is not playing the game. I am not one of those who believe there will be another war with Russia, at least not for another fifteen or twenty years, but I do believe we should have a different kind of diplomacy on foreign affairs in which Canada should play a part. After all is said and done, when we go to the peace conference we shall be only one of twenty-one smaller nations, and we shall find that the other big three or big five will keep us out in the hall while the big five decide what is to be done. Then, if they do let us in, one of the five can veto whatever we suggest. So I do not see that we will gain a great deal by attending that conference. The peace terms have all been decided in London, Yalta, Moscow and Paris by the big three; Russia has been given a great deal of territory in the Balkans, where she is introducing a new form of communism which is to be the communism of Europe. Unless we and the other dominions stand by the mother country we shall have little or nothing to say about the peace terms.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall conclude in just a moment. But for the mother country and the other dominions we might have had the awful horrors of war on our own soil, right here in Ontario, Quebec, and the maritimes, with the concentration camps, the loud speakers, the whip, the tramping of feet, the gestapo police, and with tens of thousands of our population carried off to do forced labour in the German mines. Let us pay tribute where tribute is due for this.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this budget has been brought down and I believe it is a great disappointment to the people of Canada, in view of the hopes they built up during the war. They thought we were coming at least into the beginning of a new order of society. In its wisdom, however, the government seems to be going back to the old cry of seeking normalcy, whatever that may be. In all my lifetime I have never experienced it. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) took us back to the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and spoke of that as a time of opportunity, when people left the old country and came here to seek their fortunes. The blood I come from did not come to this country under those conditions. Their homes were burned around their ears and they were kicked out on their own. Some were brought here through the charity of one individual, Lord Selkirk, and when they got here they had to start the fight all over again with the Hudson's Bay company and the Northwest Trading company. That fight is continuing now, on a higher plane.

I should like to quote what Chester Bowles has to say about normalcy, in an article which appeared in Harper's magazine for April, 1946:

> Full production, Bowles continues, is the only answer. "To achieve it we've got to use our man-power and our resources in peace time as fully as we used them in war. At 1945 levels of farm and factory prices and at present wage levels, that means $150,000,000,000 worth of purchasing power—and $150,000,000,000 worth of bathtubs, beefsteaks, refrigerators, and decent schools to spend it on. At that level America would buy 60 per cent more food than we ate in 1940, 72 per cent more clothing, 68 per cent more electrical equipment, 105 per cent more household furniture, 130 per cent more new farm machinery, and three times the number of new homes!"

The fact of the matter is that according to the tables in the budget the physical volume of business is down eighteen per cent or more. In other words, the government had it within its power, when the war finished, to continue organizing society and producing goods for the shortage which was bound to come. We solved the needs of war by organizing through the state, and the needs of peace are just as great; in fact the dangers that face our society and our country may be even greater than they were during the war; who knows? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) came back from Europe and pointed to the danger of revolution over there. If revolution breaks out in one spot it soon spreads all over the world, and we might be faced with that problem. At least we would be affected by it; and unless we solve the problems of production right here on the home front we shall certainly be faced with some disaster or another. After the first great war the government of the day in Great Britain repealed DORA, the defence of the realm act, and threw industry back into the hands of private individuals. By 1926 the great general strike had broken out and machine guns were on the corners of strategic buildings.

By not accepting its responsibilities and producing in and through the state, the government is actually bringing about a state of social disorder in this country. It is not the fault of labour; it is because the government has refused to accept its responsibility of organizing production, especially to deal with the scarcer items in the basic part of the economy. Therefore the government has sponsored inflation. I heard the appeal made here by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to labour, asking them not to strike and saying that production was the main thing. Yes; production is the main thing; but when the government throws the basic part of the organization into disorder so that it cannot be done, you cannot blame labour. On the other hand, during the war people bought bonds with the idea that later they could purchase at least as much as their money was worth during the war. Yet prices have been allowed to go up, because the government was not producing. In other words, it has not kept faith with the people who were asked and begged to buy bonds.

When we appeal to labour to produce, what is labour facing and what does it know? It knows that if it goes to work to-day it is working itself out of a job to-morrow. We have inflation with us at the moment, but we face deflation in the immediate future. I have a quotation here from Time magazine of June 24 of this year, under the heading, "Business and Finance":

> Last week Mr. M. E. Coyle, new G.M. executive vice-president, seemed to be voicing the anxiety of all industry, not merely of auto manufacturers, when he said: "We will catch up with the pent-up demand more quickly than many think."

Further on, dealing with the rise in prices in the United States, it says:

> No one doubted that prices would go up—certainly for a while. The guesses ranged from 20 per cent to 50 per cent. Businessmen figured that full production in all industry would be reached by next January, and that the end of the seller's market would come in the spring.

These are from reliable sources. When a seller's market ends and a buyer's market begins, it means unemployment. The worker knows there is no incentive to produce. Under this system it is only when profits are being made that he goes to work.

There is another feature in this budget. The taxation of lower incomes is definitely unfair, especially in view of the fact that we face deflation in the immediate future. A national survey of liquid assets was made in the United States by the bureau of agricultural economics. It was found that there was no reserve of purchasing power in the hands of forty per cent of the people in the United States. What reserves did exist were in the hands of the upper sixty per cent. It was found that that upper sixty per cent were not willing to pay more than $5,020 for a home, and this is in a country where inflation is supposed to be going on wild-eyed. But here in this country, under the veterans department, we are building homes worth anywhere from $5,000 to $7,000. Yet people with capital in the United States do not feel that they can afford to pay on the average more than $5,020.

When lower incomes are taxed too heavily, when you levy heavy taxes on them you are not giving the people a breathing spell to prepare to meet the deflation which they are definitely going to have to face in the future. After the war, the government gave some hope to the ranks of the people when they came out with the dominion-provincial conference. Many good things were advocated at that conference by the federal government. There was social legislation proposed and the government was going to enter upon the building of public works on a major scale. I should like to quote from page 25 of the proposals of the government of Canada as follows:

> In its own investment policy it is proposed that the dominion adopt practices which are consistent with and which supplement its total employment programme. Unemployment in Canada in the past has been associated with an abnormally low volume of exports, of which the effects are felt in the whole economy, and with a low volume of private domestic investment. It is proposed that investment policy be used to mitigate or offset deficiencies in export income or private investment expenditure according to the principles of
> (a) using public investment programmes to strike as near the source of deficiency as possible; and
> (b) providing expenditures through established channels in which the deficiencies of income and investment are most severely felt.

In many parts of this country that programme is an absolute necessity and yet the government has dropped it. We are going to have to face a period of deflation and no plans are being made to face the issue. In other words, the government is willing to let the country drift from crisis to crisis and we shall once again have strikes, riots and so on, on our streets. When you begin to appeal after they are out on the street it is too late. If that programme had been implemented it would have saved a great deal of suffering in this country.

I should like to deal now with what could have been implemented in the case of my own riding and how it affects us. Take the case of assistance by way of providing new access roads to undeveloped mining and forest resources. In my part of the country there is the largest stand of timber in British Columbia, but there are few roads over which to get into it. There is also a large coal field in that part of the country containing coal which compares favourably with Pennsylvania coal. The area of that field is seven times the area of the Pennsylvania field. Yet we are suffering from a shortage of coal and a shortage of lumber. Surely those provinces that would be willing to cooperate with the government under the scheme advanced by the dominion should be given the benefits that were advocated at that time. Instead of that, the government is standing by and letting things build up to a crisis.

I realize that the government is working on the principle of free enterprise to the extent that it is possible, and that is what is crippling the development of this country to-day and hindering high production. Certain events that have occurred in recent times point out the necessity of government intervention in private enterprise. For example, there is the necessity of some form of government interference in the production and distribution of lumber and coal. In fact the coal situation is so critical that the people of Canada are apt to suffer in spite of the fact that there are large undeveloped coal deposits in this country, and in spite of the fact that there are also many unemployed. Not so long ago the Bulkley collieries had to turn down an order for export shipment of 8,000 tons of coal from its mine in the Telkwa district owing to the lack of storage and loading facilities in the port of Prince Rupert.

Negotiations have been under way for the shipment of Bulkley valley coal amounting to an estimated 100,000 tons annually, and inquiries have been made for a still further 100,000 tons, but none of this can be handled until adequate storing and loading facilities have been established in the port of Prince Rupert. Bulkley valley collieries have 500,000 tons proved by diamond drilling, with 250,000 tons opened up in the present workings. There is an estimated 30,000,000 tons in the immediate area, according to Doctor MacKay of the geological survey.

We have been and are going through periods of critical shortage, and the uncertainty of the times points out the fact that we shall be facing further crises in the future. If the government is going to adapt itself to the times we live in it will have to take a lead in actively sponsoring the development of such natural resources as the coal fields around Telkwa, without even mentioning the fact that the Groundhog region should be opened up and ready in case of a national emergency.

We know what we faced during the war. At that time we faced critical shortages. We now have an opportunity of developing and opening up areas so that nothing in the line of such shortages would ever again face this country. The test of whether government as we have it to-day is going to survive will be measured by its ability to meet the day-today issues as they present themselves and upon whether it has foresight enough to prepare for the future. With active sponsorship by the government of a project such as I have dealt with, other developments would naturally follow suit and these developments would bring in revenue to the government.

If the physical business volume is falling off it is natural to assume that it will be difficult to meet the obligations of government. The only way we can meet our obligations is by continued expansion from the wartime peaks. Otherwise a heavier and heavier load will be placed upon what industry is left, finally choking it off, and it will take another war to revive it.

To-day Prince Rupert is the best equipped seaport north of Seattle and Vancouver. It is the only northern port tied to the north by rail. It is interesting to note that on a map recently published by the Christian Science Monitor, pointing out the various ports that had been in key positions during the war, the port of Prince Rupert was mentioned while Vancouver and Victoria were not. These facts finally affect the future of trade and shipping in the north Pacific. Railroad freight rates to Prince Rupert and Seattle and Portland have been equalized, so that anything shipped out of the port of Prince Rupert going into the north Pacific would be naturally on a better competitive basis than commodities shipped through southern ports.

Richard L. Neuberger, feature writer for the Portland Oregonian and correspondent in the Pacific north for the New York Times states that strong political influences are being brought to bear against Prince Rupert as a port. With the centralization of economic interests in the south, it is quite natural to assume that these interests do not want competition coming from a newly developed area. However, with the critical shortage in raw materials facing the world to-day, it behooves us to think of the future of this country and act on its behalf rather than listen to the voices of powerful economic groups which are curtailing future economic development in such areas as the Pacific northwest.

I should like to quote from May-June 1946 issue of the Nor' West Miner, published in Edmonton, Alberta:

> Post-war construction programmes as outlined by Ottawa number hundreds, and will cost millions of dollars; many of them are of real value to Canada's post-war progress, but the failure to include the project of completing this third transcontinental railway will prove a real economic loss to Canada. The time has gone by when it is possible for established interests such as Vancouver, Montreal and the great lakes to insist that nothing shall interfere with the present lay-out of carrying grain and other products from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Canada is too large to-day to see development stayed. The Fort Churchill-Prince Rupert railway is the answer to many a reconstruction problem in Canada and is cheap at the cost of 18,000,000 dollars.

During the war the Jones Act was suspended, so that vessels of foreign registry, or to put it specifically, Canadian vessels, could carry material between Alaskan harbours. However, the Jones Act has once again come into force, so that Prince Rupert cannot be used as a port to ship materials into Alaska. Canada has been much too lax in not protecting its own merchant marine, and I am sure that if the Canadian government were to invoke such an act as the Jones Act, say for instance, on the great lakes, the Americans would take a much more reasonable attitude toward Canadian vessels sailing into Alaskan waters. For instance, the shipping charges on a car from the port of Seattle to Ketchikan are $86.70. But if the same car were shipped from Prince Rupert to Ketchikan it would cost only $40.80. With the port of Prince Rupert in this challenging position, why cannot the government actively sponsor and help them take at least part of the profitable trade from the south, so that the natural resources of the north could be opened up and developed?

Another hindrance to the development of the north and Prince Rupert as a port is the load line in northern waters, which works to the detriment of the development of shipping in those waters. Under the international convention on load lines, latitude 50 degrees to 60 degrees is considered to be more dangerous for shipping than latitudes between 40 and 50 degrees north. However, according to master mariners who are familiar with conditions in the northwest Pacific, in this location navigation is as good as if not better than farther south owing to the absence of winter fogs which are such a menace to the ports in the south. The effect of the present load line is to give the port of Vancouver an unfair advantage over the port of Prince Rupert because a vessel loading an 8,000 ton cargo is able to take 300 tons more at Vancouver than at Prince Rupert. A ship sailing out of Prince Rupert would have to get twenty-one cents a ton more to handle cargo than at Vancouver. This is undoubtedly one of the main factors causing the grain elevators at Prince Rupert with a capacity of 1¼ million bushels to be almost entirely neglected.

The pilot chart of the north Pacific, number 1401, published by the hydrographic office of the navy department of the United States of America at Washington supports the argument that weather conditions along the Pacific coast are just as favourable at latitude 56 degrees as at latitude 51 degrees. In the interests of trade and commerce out of the north, which in the final analysis will benefit the whole nation, this government should add its weight to having this unfair discrimination removed. Seemingly it has been to the interests of this country in the past to subsidize shipping out of Canadian ports even to the extent of aiding shipping companies sailing under foreign flags. At one time, just prior to the war, a subsidy was granted to ships sailing out of Prince Rupert, and I realize that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) has expressed himself in the past as being impressed with the merits of once again bringing subsidies into effect. If the government in its wisdom would rectify some of the injustice and unfair laws discriminating against the use of this northern port much of the funds used in building this port up during the war could be realized in taxes from an economically developed countryside, and with the raw materials which lie behind the port of Prince Rupert it is logical to believe that whole new communities would open up all through the north. The government at the present time is not helping the matter to any degree, particularly for a government that is so much interested in and so proud of private enterprise.

I received on June 3 last an answer to a question that I had on the order paper, and the answer showed that the subsidy to the Prince Rupert dry dock of $76,970.88 which had been paid for the last twenty-five years has been cut off. But I notice that the subsidy to the Burrard dry dock is still being paid. That is a subsidy paid to a privately-owned dry dock, owned by a company that is able to expand and buy a whole new shipyard in Victoria. But, as I say, the subsidy to the Prince Rupert dry dock has been discontinued. There will have to be a change in government policy for the north to develop.

Governments throughout the world generally recognize their responsibility in taking a lead in developing their natural resources, and I should like to see this government do likewise. This parliament has recently passed a resolution presented by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), recognizing the need for connecting the Peace river with the Pacific railroad outlet. With this resolution some day being brought into effect, the government, in promoting some of these needs that I have mentioned, would be anticipating the future, applying vision to our democratic institutions.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has preceded me (Mr. Archibald) will pardon me if I do not follow him in the remarks he has just made. I had no intention of taking part in this debate this afternoon but I have been prompted to do so by the remarks made the other evening by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). In his speech he made certain statements and levelled certain charges to which I believe it is my duty to reply. The charges had to do with the national harbours board. In order that I may not in any way misquote the hon. member I will read what he said as reported in Hansard of July 9, at page 3292:

> I want the Minister of Finance or the responsible minister to give us a statement as to whether the minister of industries in the Nova Scotia government made that charge and can substantiate it or otherwise. The reason I want that done is that if the milling interests of central Canada blocked the Nova Scotia government from establishing a million-dollar industry in that province they did a serious disservice to that province.

Prior to that, the hon. member had quoted from an editorial in the Halifax Herald, which stated:

> During the session of the Nova Scotia legislature recently prorogued, the minister of industry levelled a direct and serious charge against the national harbours board. He charged that "the milling interests of central Canada blocked the Nova Scotia government's plans to erect a million-dollar flour mill at the ocean terminals in Halifax."

Of course it is not my purpose in rising to defend or attack the milling interests of central Canada. That is no concern of mine. But I am particularly concerned with the other part of the statement which was quoted by the hon. gentleman, who again was reading from the Halifax Herald:

> Before a house committee the minister declared that—

He is referring here to the minister of industry and publicity of the Nova Scotia government.

> ". . . he was entirely satisfied that the decision of the national harbours board to refuse the government permission to use pier 23 for the mill 'was dictated by the milling interests of this country'."

That is the charge with which I am concerned. I am not in a position to say whether the minister of industry and publicity in the Nova Scotia government made that statement; all I have to go upon is the editorial which I have seen; and I say now without equivocation that any policy followed by the national harbours board was not dictated by the milling interests of central Canada, nor was that policy affected either directly or indirectly by the milling interests. I think I can safely add that no flour mill in central Canada, no big interests or no cartels had anything to do with the determination of the policy followed by the national harbours board in that or in any other instance. I need only tell the house who the members of the national harbours board are, and I think they will agree immediately that the case is as I put it. The house knows that the chairman of the national harbours board is Mr. R. K. Smith, a former member of this house, a man who is particularly well known to Nova Scotia members, and I think the house will agree with me when I say that either directly or indirectly that individual certainly has no connection with the milling interests of this country, or with big business, or with any cartel. The vice-chairman of the national harbours board is Mr. J. E. St. Laurent, a former officer of the Department of Public Works, a former chief engineer of the St. Lawrence ship channel, and also a man who has no connection, direct or indirect, with the milling interests. I think I can safely say the same about Mr. B. J. Roberts, a trusted employee for a while of the Department of Finance and a man who is a watchdog of the treasury so far as the national harbours board is concerned. So that I say to this house without equivocation that that charge is totally unwarranted and is totally unfounded.

Let me now deal if I may for a moment with the facts which led to the decision of the board, and I think the house will want to know what these facts are.

Some time in 1941 the then premier of Nova Scotia made representations to my predecessor, Hon. J. E. Michaud, with reference to the erection of a flour mill at pier 23 in the harbour of Halifax. The premier of Nova Scotia stated that his government had been in conference with an Ontario flour mill and he was endeavouring to make arrangements for the construction of a flour mill at tidewater, Halifax, to supply mill feed. It was indicated in that letter that there was imported annually into Nova Scotia some 100,000 tons of mill feed and some 300,000 tons for the whole of the maritime provinces. It was further indicated that with the erection of a flour mill this market could be supplied and an important saving effected. It was also stated that grain could be brought from Churchill to Halifax at low cost, processed in the proposed flour mill, and used to supply markets not only in the maritimes but also in Newfoundland and the West Indies. The letter went on to state that arrangements were being made for the construction and management of the proposed mill, and the site selected was pier 23 in the Halifax harbour. It was also suggested that the pier should be leased to the government or to the company which would set up the flour mill at a nominal rental. The letter went on to say that because of the storage elevator which was in close proximity to pier 23 it was the intention to use this elevator as an overflow storage reservoir.

Nothing came of the application, if I may so call it, made in the letter from the Premier of Nova Scotia in 1941, for the reason that the milling company found it difficult, so I understand, to obtain milling machinery from the British isles, and the matter was allowed to stand over for the time being.

The proposal was again brought forward in 1945, and at this time this additional information was submitted to the national harbours board. Again it was stated that the proposed mill was to have a daily capacity of 1,800 barrels, and that it was to be erected on pier 23 in two units, and it was suggested that a lease of the pier and of the elevator facilities be granted at a nominal rental. The capital cost of the mill was to be $1,000,000. The mill was to be operated by a company to be known as the Atlantic Flour Mills Limited and to be managed by one R. J. Pinchin. A bank loan of $1,000,000 was to be guaranteed by the government of Nova Scotia, and in the event of the non-success of the venture the government of Nova Scotia was to be responsible for all capital costs.

In order to show that the national harbours board did everything which could be reasonably expected of it, I want to state that meetings were held following this correspondence between the premier of Nova Scotia, his minister of industry and publicity, and the national harbours board, both at Ottawa and at Halifax, and much correspondence passed between the board and the Nova Scotia government. The board's position, after it had carefully considered everything, was made known to the government of Nova Scotia in a letter which my predecessor, Hon. J. E. Michaud, wrote to the then premier of Nova Scotia. I should like to read this letter, because it places on record the position of the national harbours board, and I think every member of this house who wants to view this matter reasonably can come to no other conclusion than that it was the only decision which could be arrived at, at the time. I quote the letter of March 16, 1945, addressed to the premier of Nova Scotia.

Dear Mr. MacMillan:

With respect to the application of your government for a location on pier 23, Halifax harbour, to establish a flour mill in close proximity to and connected with our grain elevator facilities, and the use of the grain elevator in Halifax in the rear of said pier as an overflow storage house, said mill to be operated by the Atlantic Flour Mills Limited under the presidency and general managership of Mr. R. J. Pinchin of the Copeland Flour Mills, Midland, Ontario, my colleague, the Hon. Mr. Ilsley, has again brought your application to my attention urging immediate consideration by the government of your request for terms.

The national harbours board, I understand, indicated to you previously that they would not be justified in recommending the leasing of existing harbour-front transit facilities for anything other than transit purposes and, in answer to your request for an alternative site in the rear of pier 23, after investigation by the board's engineers, they considered there was not area enough there to contain the flour mill and enable the board and the flour mill company to have sufficient extra space required for their respective operations.

A meeting was called by the Hon. Mr. Ilsley in his office last week to give further consideration to your application. A thorough discussion took place developing various phases of your application and its implications, if granted, which application I may say has caused no little concern to the authorities here because of the rather unusual request which, if granted, will immobilize a pier and shed built in 1918, at a cost of approximately $1,000,000, as a foundation upon which to construct a flour mill, and the further disadvantage of immobilizing partially during the summer season and totally at least during part of the winter season, an elevator costing roughly $2,250,000.

In answer to your inqury for terms to lease pier 23 and the grain elevator storage space required, the meeting in Mr. Ilsley's office came to the following conclusions:

1. That the government would not be justified in leasing the pier and elevator on the basis of a nominal rental;

2. That the rental, in answer to your inquiry for terms, should be based on the relationship of the capital invested, together with the potential earnings of the pier in question;

3. That the national harbours board is willing to instruct its engineering staff to investigate at once the question of an alternative location in Halifax harbour on property administered by the board but not occupied by transit facilities;

4. That in no circumstances if an agreement is reached on (2) could the government allow construction on pier 23 or any other operations or undertakings connected therewith which would interfere in any way with the mobility of transit business across the pier until, not only the end of the German-Japanese war, but, running into the post-war period, a sufficient time to satisfy the authorities that the facility would no longer be required for accelerated after-war business.

When you have considered these various points, I sincerely trust you will write me as we are all anxious to assist in whatever reasonable way we can the policy of your government to establish a flour mill in Nova Scotia.

The members of the national harbours board are expecting to be in Halifax on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, the 20th and 21st instant, and I asked them to contact you or the Hon. Mr. Connolly, Minister of Industry and Publicity in this connection.

Yours very truly,

J. E. Michaud.

That letter set out clearly the position of the national harbours board, and since it was written the board met the premier of Nova Scotia and his cabinet, had a thorough discussion with them, and thereafter agreed to send one of the senior engineers to Port Arthur to discuss alternative sites on the board's property in Halifax, with the persons who were to manage the proposed flour mill. Later, engineers were sent by the board to Halifax to make a complete survey in order to ascertain whether other space was not available on the harbour property. The engineers made a survey and reported that there was such a site inshore to the south of the cold storage plant which could be made available. The board was told that that site was not satisfactory and that it was pier 23 or nothing at all.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the position so far as the establishment of the flour mill is concerned, and I say this to the house. It is not the business or the duty of the national harbours board to immobilize its transit facilities by making them available either to private corporations or to other bodies. It is its business to assist private corporations, governments and other bodies in any way it can, and I say that it has done so. To have asked the board to immobilize a transit facility such as pier 23 and to use that as a foundation upon which to build a flour mill, at no cost or at nominal cost, is, I think, going beyond the jurisdiction for which the board was established.

The house knows there is a National Harbours Act by virtue of which parliament gave the national harbours board certain powers, duties and obligations, and parliament certainly did not give to the board the obligation or the power to do what was asked here. At any rate, it would appear quite clear that if the industry itself cannot support a costly site of this nature it should not be the function of the national harbours authority to provide it on more favourable terms than to any other interest requiring harbour property. Even if reasonable financial arrangements had been proposed, the board could not at that time justify any recommendation to reduce shipping facilities in Halifax. The board was then inclined to doubt that it was the proper body to receive or entertain proposals on such a basis, however desirable the project may be in relation to the province's objective. It appeared to the board that it is only within its field when it recommends granting the use of facilities under its administration on terms and for purposes that appear to be warranted, having regard to the interests of harbour operations.

Similar requests, applications and proposals come from other interests in other parts of Canada, and it has been the policy of the board to do in these instances exactly as it has done in this. I do not wish to take up unduly the time of the house but I feel that I should at least make the statement that the charge quoted in the editorial by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is entirely unwarranted and unfounded.

While I am on my feet there is one other thing indirectly connected with this which I should like to say, and it is this. From time to time the national harbours board is attacked because of the fact that it does not consent to what local interests ask or does not grant the demands of local interests. At the moment I am not referring to Halifax any more than I am to any other port or harbour which comes under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board. In these instances the board is in the peculiar position that it cannot reply to the accusations. It is an emanation of the crown and it has not been in the habit, nor has it adopted the custom, of replying to all the charges made against it in the press.

May I say here that the national harbours board has done an excellent job in the matter of administration of harbours in this country, particularly having regard to the condition of things as taken over by the national harbours board, when it was incorporated by act of parliament. The house knows what conditions were like in those days. It knows that the report of Sir Alexander Gibb dealt with the most unsatisfactory condition that existed in a number of harbours across Canada. The board took over that condition, and the financial position of the harbours in Canada to-day is far better than it was at that time.

When the national harbours board took over the port of Halifax in 1935 the operating revenues were $500,936, the operating expenses were $504,851 and the operating deficit $3,915. In 1945, because of the policies of the board, the operating revenues were $1,653,000 the operating expenses $1,033,000, showing a surplus of $619,797. The statement I make is in reference to the harbour of Halifax. It goes to show that the position of Halifax harbour in 1945 is far better than it was when the board took over. The same can be said of all other units under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board. In 1935, these units showed operating revenues of $7,427,000, and operating expenses of $4,975,000, leaving an operating surplus of $2,451,000. In 1945 the operating revenues of all units under the jurisdiction of the harbours board amounted to $13,395,000, and operating expenses $6,851,000, leaving an operating surplus of $6,554,000. In my judgment this is a proud record, and anybody who studies the figures, if impartial, will, I feel sure, agree with this.

The national harbours board are criticized and blamed for leaving undone things which they are not authorized to do under the National Harbours Board Act. They derive their authority from that act, and certainly it is not authorized in any sense to turn harbour facilities placed under the board for administration as a harbour facility, to other parties to be used as a foundation for a flour mill.

I think it my duty to tell the house that the decision of the harbours board to act as it did was in accordance with the terms under which it was set up by parliament; that the decision to which it came was the only decision to which it could come under the circumstances; that the matter was given careful consideration not only by the Department of Transport but also by other departments of government, and that even to-day the national harbours board stands ready and willing to facilitate the establishment of that mill.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister answer a question? In the minister's statement there was one error which I should like to correct. This matter was not raised by an editorial; the editorial merely quoted the minister of industries of the Nova Scotia government. He raised the question. The minister said that there was an alternative site available in Halifax, but someone said that it was not suitable. What reasons were given as to why the site which was available was not suitable? What was the matter with the site?

Mr. CHEVRIER: All I can tell the hon. gentleman is that our engineers went there, made a survey and suggested an alternative site. I am informed the reasons were that the site was not close enough to the pier, and that the milling industries wanted the use of pier 23, or pier 26, which was immediately opposite. It was either the one or the other. The engineer who made the report—and he is one of the outstanding engineers on the staff of the national harbours board—reported that there was an alternative site and that that site was not found satisfactory by the milling industry.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): As I understand the statement of the minister, there is no expectation—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I will not permit a debate on this question.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to clarify a statement made by the minister.

I should like to know if there is any expectation that this mill will be erected. Five years or more have passed since these proposals were put forward by the provincial government, and the same question was before the minister. I should like to know if there is any expectation—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): —that this flour and feed mill will be erected?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but we are not in committee. I cannot permit a debate on this question.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I believe the minister is prepared to make some reply.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): On May 25 I made a broadcast from parliament hill over the radio, and I should like to read just a few lines from what I had to say, because it deals with the budget. I said:

> It is expected that the budget will be brought down in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance within the next two weeks. Personally, what I feel the Minister of Finance will do is to bring down two budgets. One budget, he will say, would have come into effect if the dominion provincial conference had come to an agreement, this budget will show a lowering of the income tax. The other budget that will be brought down will be the one that will go into effect, showing no decrease in the income tax.

The reason I said that there will be no decrease in the income tax, despite the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), other cabinet ministers and members of the Liberal party during the 1945 election and since, had said that there would be a lowering of the income tax was that we as members of parliament could see no practical effort on the part of the government to cut down waste and extravagance. In fact one does not have to be a member of parliament to see that. The ordinary citizen on the street knows it exists and he is up in arms about it. I feel, and I know the citizens of Canada feel, that every cabinet minister should house-clean his own department. In fact some of them need fumigation. There are sinkholes into which the taxpayers' money is going, sinkholes which the cabinet ministers know exist and where extravagance and waste predominate. Unless these holes are blocked up at once, there is very little chance of the taxpayers of Canada having any relief at all, even in 1947, despite what the budget says.

I mentioned the dominion-provincial conference in my broadcast of May 25. I feel that it was a real good excuse for the government not to bring down any deductions in income tax. To a number of people it looked as if they did not want to have an agreement, but that they wanted to have something on which to blame the lack of reductions, instead of putting the blame right on the lap of the government where it belongs. The government created this position and it is up to them to eliminate it. It never should have started in the first place.

The budget does not offer the people of Canada any encouragement at all. The veterans of the war have not had a chance, although before the 1945 election rosy pictures were painted of Canada as a land of milk and honey after the war. On his return to Canada the veteran has not found that to be so. There is no doubt that the veterans affairs department has done a number of things for the veteran, but it has not found houses for veterans. I noticed in the Montreal Star of yesterday or the day before that 250 war brides were returning to England because they could not stand conditions here in Canada where they had to live in one room and in many cases without bathroom and other facilities. This government has given very little direction to the veterans. In some cases it has given a little direction and in other cases a great deal of misdirection. The worker in industry does not know what comes next. The farmer on the land does not know what the future holds, and industry does not know what is to be the next move of the government and therefore cannot plan for the future. In fact the government is strangling industry, and many other speakers during this debate have said the same thing.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Then you think Canada is a desperately bad country?

Mr. FRASER: Under the present government, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, you do not mean that.

Mr. FRASER: I certainly do mean that. This government has given no leadership at all. If it had shown proper business management we would have had tax reductions. If proper forethought had been shown by the members of the cabinet—and I am looking at them right now—the veteran would have had a better chance for a home. Back in the budget debate of 1941, in answer to a question of mine, the Minister of Finance said he wanted to discourage the building of homes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, then.

Mr. FRASER: That was in 1941. I told the minister there were four, five or more families living in one house, but he wanted to discourage the building of houses. We had a chance to build then, but certainly we have no chance now.

Mr. ABBOTT: By reducing our war effort in some other way.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, we were at war; but we had material then, and there were plenty of men in their sixties and seventies who were able to work, who could have been used and were willing to be used. By waste and extravagance this government has built up a debt with which not only our children and our grandchildren but our great grandchildren will be burdened. They will have to pay taxes as long as they live, and extra heavy taxes at that.

Let me mention a few of these extravagances to which I am referring. First, I am going to mention "George's Wife", which has been mentioned in newspaper editorials all across the country. This is a broadcast put on by the wartime prices and trade board in both French and English. It costs the government not only $4,431.78 a week for the English broadcast but $1,243.76 a week for the French broadcast. This is just one short broadcast a day, and this is the comment of the editor of the Peterborough Examiner:

> "George's Wife" we have tested personally, and it is tripe. There is no other word—tripe. It is boring, depressing, vulgar and illiterate. It would make a cat laugh and a dog howl.

This is not the kind of broadcast the people of Canada are paying a radio licence fee of $2.50 to hear.

Mr. MAYHEW: Does the hon. member know that this programme has been discontinued?

Mr. GRAYDON: It is about time.

Mr. FRASER: That is just an example; and it would not have been discontinued but for the fact that I placed questions on the order paper to find out what it cost.

Mr. MAYHEW: It was discontinued at the end of the contract, and would have been discontinued whether or not the hon. member had asked questions.

Mr. FRASER: I doubt that. It never should have commenced; and how many more broadcasts like that there may be, we do not know. We have to dig up the information by putting questions on the order paper. Even the war expenditures committee can get only half truths; they cannot get it all. We have to dig and dig to find out what is doing; then we have to put it before the people of Canada, who force the government to close down on these extravagances. I have another article on the same broadcast, but since it has been discontinued—which I am extremely glad to hear—I shall read only the heading from the Brockville Recorder: "Throw 'George's Wife' into the river."

Another waste of the taxpayer's money is the film board, which was organized in 1939 by this government. It has expanded until now it has become even larger than what might be called a white elephant. It has 748 employees, doing what? They are supposed to be making films, making water colours, making oil paintings, making stills, designing folders, writing literature and so on, all for the Liberal party, because practically everything they put out has a political twist to it. A great deal of the material they complete is scrapped. At two o'clock the other morning, while waiting for the train to come to Ottawa, I was talking to some servicemen about entertainment for the troops. They were speaking of films. One said his outfit rented films from a commercial concern, whose name I need not mention, and said they cost so much a week. The other said his outfit rented from the same company, but that they had tried the national film board for films. I am going to tell you what he said about those films. His remark was, "The men don't like them. They call them stinkers." Some of the films produced by the board are all right, for educational purposes only.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Those are about the Liberals.

Mr. FRASER: Well, I am very liberal in my comment when I say some of them are all right; perhaps I should not have said that. This film board, with 748 employees, is using the money of the taxpayers. In opening my remarks I said some departments need to be fumigated, and certainly this is one. A few weeks ago in the committee on external affairs I said that in the film board the hat was passed around in order to obtain funds for the benefit of those accused of espionage. That statement was absolutely correct. I know money was collected there, despite what may be said by any official of that department. I know who collected the money. At the same time I had on the order paper a question in regard to a certain man, and asking if there were any known communists in the board. I am glad to say that since I placed that question on the order paper one man has been fired. There are many more who should be dealt with in the same way.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock recess I was talking about government extravagance and waste in the departments. I said that every cabinet minister should house-clean his department. I mentioned a number of departments and I shall give a few more examples of waste. War Assets Corporation is one outfit which I think should have a house-cleaning. Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) mentioned that War Assets Corporation had 5,053 employees during the month of February, whose wages and salaries amounted to $723,600. This is July, just four months later, and I understand that now War Assets Corporation have over 7,000 employees. I have no chance of knowing what the total salaries and wages would be, but if we take the basis of 5,053 employees receiving $723,600 in salaries and wages the payroll to-day would be $1,100,000 or more.

On July 3 I wrote a letter to the Toronto regional office of War Assets Corporation. This is July 11 and I have no answer. I do not know what the office staff there is doing—it may be out looking for more employees—but I know I am only one of many who have written to War Assets Corporation and have not received an answer. You get the same word from all over the country. Many people in my riding tell me that it is useless to write to War Assets Corporation. One would think that with over 7,000 employees he would get an answer some time.

Some time ago I was told by the members of the board of education in one of the large cities in Canada that they had written War Assets Corporation asking for some equipment for their schools to replace equipment that had been used during the war for vocational training. Eventually they got an answer telling them to go to a certain factory which had a nine- or ten-inch lathe—I forget the exact size—which they could have. They went to this plant the next day and told the manager that they had a letter from War Assets Corporation in regard to this lathe and had come to look at it. The manager just laughed and said, "That lathe was sold for scrap over a week ago." The same board of education had a similar experience about six months later. They went to another plant at the request of War Assets Corporation and found that the piece of equipment they were interested in had also been sold for scrap.

The Canadian information service is another outfit that should have a house-cleaning. This outfit, along with the wartime information board, did more during the last few years to create a paper shortage than all the newspapers and publications across Canada. According to information given in the external affairs department standing committee 800,000 copies were published of one leaflet, a copy of which I hold in my hand.

This is entitled "World or war?" On the inside pages at the top is, "United nations organization". There are a number of illustrations. The first one, entitled, "Settle disputes", shows a policeman running with a baton in his hand trying to club somebody over the head. The next one is entitled "Suppress aggression", and it shows an iron heel stepping on a snake. The next one is entitled, "Develop friendly relations among nations", and it shows what is supposed to be a man with his arms around two others. No. 4 is entitled "Promote social progress", and this shows what looks like a schoolteacher teaching a class. No. 5 is entitled, "Solve international economic problems", and it shows a man without a face holding up the world. No. 6 is entitled, "Encourage respect for human rights", and it shows what looks like two men leading a drunk along the street. No. 7 is entitled, "Establish fundamental freedoms", and it shows what looks like a building at the top of a hill with a few men climbing up to the top.

Eight hundred thousand copies of that leaflet were turned out and distributed and that is only one of hundreds of different folders that those people put out. What the wartime information board costs to run per month I do not know, but for the months of October, November and December, 1945, the cost in salaries and wages alone for the Canadian information service was $66,371.54. Your guess is as good as mine as to what it cost for paper, printing and the editing of these publications. I have a list of the publications which I can read, but with your permission, sir, I should like to place it on Hansard. It is as follows:

Some few years ago I asked a question about the Department of Reconstruction and Supply; I asked what the daily releases of this department cost, and here is the answer I got:

No daily press releases are issued by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply but releases are issued, however, at irregular intervals whenever it is considered necessary to do so. As the preparation of these releases is only one of the many functions of the publicity branch, and as other branches are involved in the preparation and distribution, it is not readily possible to determine the exact cost.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was the document the hon. gentleman placed on Hansard?

Mr. FRASER: It was a list of the publications issued by the wartime information board and Canadian information service.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just want to point out that that would have to be with unanimous consent.

Mr. FRASER: I asked if I could put it on. If it is not with unanimous consent, I will not put it on the record.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not objecting to this, but I am disturbed at the increasing tendency on the part of hon. members to hand in documents as part of their speeches. At some stage we shall have to draw the line.

Mr. FRASER: I am quite willing to read it, although it will take me five minutes or so. Is it all right to have it on?

Mr. ILSLEY: As far as I am concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: This looks like a proper case.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no objection to this, but we should draw the line somewhere.

Mr. GRAYDON: The government is the worst offender.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a different matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, there is.

Mr. FRASER: I was talking about the reconstruction department and the answer that was given to me in regard to their releases. I might say that when these releases are not sent out the reconstruction department does not forget you. Here is a sealed envelope addressed to me by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. You can hold it up to the light and see that there is nothing in it. This is just one of many I have seen. I have checked up and found thirty-two others who during the past year have received envelopes of this kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: With nothing in them?

Mr. FRASER: There is nothing in them. I will send this envelope over to the minister, and if he finds anything in it my eyesight will have to be examined.

Mr. KNOWLES: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing in this envelope.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad the minister did not find anything in it. Somebody suggested that there might be a ten-dollar bill in it, but no such luck.

I have a number of other cases of extravagance which I could bring before the house, but my time is limited. I might mention the Department of Veterans Affairs. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) is always very much interested in things of this kind. I do not know whether it is his department or the Department of Public Works that is responsible, but I would ask the minister, and he can answer at some future date, just what it cost the government to tear down a part of the main building at the new Sunnybrook hospital in order to put in an elevator, which was forgotten when the main plans were drawn. That perhaps comes under public works. I would also ask why the window sash in that building were not of kiln-dried lumber instead of green window sash? Many of the windows have had to have strips put on them in order to keep them in place. I do not know whether that comes under veterans affairs or public works.

Every cabinet minister evidently did not check his estimates for this year. If he did, he should recheck them, because in looking over all the estimates I find that there are only four departments which show a decrease. All the others have increases.

The office of the chief electoral officer has a decrease, because we are not likely to have an election this year. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges), who is not in his place at the moment, is a new cabinet minister and as yet he has not apparently that extravagant feeling which the other cabinet ministers have. Perhaps, as Minister of Fisheries he has had an opportunity to see so many suckers that he does not want to make suckers out of the taxpayers. Public archives estimates are down about $3,000. Reconstruction and Supply on one ordinary estimate is down, but on another item this department is up by over $207,000,000. The other departments of the government that have increases in their estimates are:

	Increase
Health and Welfare	$63,221,407
Public Works	14,710,826
Agriculture	2,213,744
Civil Service Commission	63,000
External Affairs	751,482
Finance	93,557,460
Justice	365,383
Mines and Resources	4,856,623
National Revenue	2,758,866

That is the department that collects our taxes, and it wants $26,000,000 this year to run its own office.

	Increase
Privy Council office	$ 223,725
Royal Canadian Mounted Police	3,895,216

What is the reason for that increase for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

	Increase
Secretary of State	$ 128,580

As the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) knows, that is not petty cash but hard-earned taxpayers' money.

	Increase
Trade and Commerce	$ 3,174,393
Transport	4,370,000
Veterans Affairs	13,039,949

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. member opposed to that increase for the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. FRASER: It is the only department I would expect an increase in. Was the minister going to say something?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was asking if the hon. member is opposed to that increase?

Mr. FRASER: No, I am not and if the minister would read my notes he would see that I have written down here, "This is the only department that I do not mind seeing an increase in."

There are only about three of the present cabinet ministers who really know anything at all about reducing taxes, because most of them have come in during the war and all they know is spending. They should take a few lessons in economy. In Canada we have only 12,000,000 people and we have $3 billion budgets.

Australia, according to the Australian News Summary of June 27, 1946, is cutting her income tax down this year by £37,000,000 or $120,290,000, and she is also cutting her indirect taxation to bring the total tax reductions down to something over £40,000,000, or $130,000,000.

Many times during this session and last session members of the cabinet have been getting up and praising themselves for keeping prices down. Every time I hear them praise themselves for that, it reminds me of the story I heard some time ago of a woman who went down the street to shop. She was walking along when she came to a sign in a store window that said "Bananas, seven cents a pound." She went into the store and asked for five pounds of bananas. The storekeeper said, "Sorry, madam; we have no bananas to-day." So she went two blocks down the street and in another store window saw a sign "Bananas, twenty-seven cents a pound". She went into the store and asked the storekeeper, "Why are your bananas twenty-seven cents a pound when up the street they are only seven cents a pound?" The storekeeper asked her, "Why didn't you buy some at seven cents a pound?" The woman replied, "The storekeeper didn't have any." "Well, lady," the storekeeper said, "if I didn't have any bananas I, too, would sell them at seven cents a pound." That is how our cost of living index is based. It is based on what we have not instead of on what we have.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct.

Mr. FRASER: The minister says that is not correct, but I have here from the dominion bureau of statistics a list of the items on which the cost of living is based. I will read the accompanying letter, which is dated June 28, 1946:

> I am pleased to enclose a mimeographed explanatory statement regarding dominion bureau of statistics cost of living index numbers. A complete list of items which are priced in connection with this series is included.
> Yours very truly,
> H. Marshall,
> Dominion Statistician.

I will read a few items from the list: Raisins, currants, prunes. Any housewife in Canada will tell you that they are almost impossible to get. Strawberry jam and marmalade. They are on the rationed list. Canned peaches. Has the minister had any canned peaches or canned fruit of any kind lately? I doubt it. You cannot buy it in the stores but it is on this list. That is what this cost of living is based on.

Mr. ILSLEY: What are the other items?

Mr. FRASER: I will give the rest. Coal. Try to get it. Electricity. The price of that has not gone up but there is an eight per cent tax on consumption. Topcoats for men. Try to get a topcoat. Suits for men—try to get one.

An hon. MEMBER: Shirts.

Mr. FRASER: There are no suits even for men who have priorities. The veterans have an extremely tough time to get any, and they wait for months. Socks. I wrote the minister about socks for children; it was last fall that I was inquiring about long socks for children six to twelve years of age. We had children in Peterborough who could not go to school because socks could not be bought in the stores. I was down the street the other day trying to buy a pair of socks for myself, and I was told that they were not to be had. An hon. member to my left mentioned shirts. On the list here they have "shirts, broadcloth"; that is nothing but a laugh, for broadcloth shirts cannot be had. We can get fancy sport shirts, but not white shirts or broadcloth shirts. Women's wear is up to at least double the price.

Of dairy products we have on this list milk, which is subsidized; butter, which is rationed; cheese, which is in very short supply. Then meats: a long list of meats is given, and at the bottom we have bacon. If you want half or a quarter pound of bacon, when you go to the butcher shop you have to get the butcher on the side and whisper to him, and if you are lucky and have done good business with him you may get half a pound, but you will get it only once in two or three weeks. Fish is four times the 1920 price. Lard, it is almost impossible to buy. We are told that we must cut the consumption of bread. Rice cannot be bought. Rolled oats have not gone up in price, the reason being, I believe, that they are made in Peterborough. Then follows granulated sugar and yellow sugar, which also are rationed. Canned tomatoes are on this list, and we may get tomatoes here in the parliamentary restaurant, but the ordinary housewife cannot buy them.

To-day Canada, instead of being a land of plenty, is a land of scarcity. Over the week-end two farmers called at my place asking where they could buy nails to help to build barns. The veterans cannot get nails to build their homes; and the homes which have been built for the veterans by the department are so expensive that the veterans are paying through the nose for them.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Does the hon. member say that $23 a month is paying through the nose?

Mr. FRASER: If the hon. member would wait until I have finished he might not be in the mood to chirp up so quickly.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): A home for a veteran at $23 a month is very reasonable.

Mr. FRASER: Just a minute. On the Queensway project for the veterans the houses run $6,900 apiece.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): But they pay only $23 a month.

Mr. FRASER: Hang on to yourself a minute. The return I got when I received these figures stated that what the veteran had to pay was ten per cent of the $6,000 and everything over the $6,000, which would make his down payment $1,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How much a month?

Mr. FRASER: I am going by the figures given me by the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But how much a month is that over twenty-five years?

Mr. FRASER: That is not stated in this report. They just tell me what the veteran would have to pay for his home.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. member know that what it is going to cost the veteran over the next twenty-five years is between $20 and $25 a month?

Mr. FRASER: How much a month?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Twenty dollars, with the additional grant. Tell me any country which has done better for the veteran. You do not know the first thing you are talking about.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister tell me what the veteran is paying?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, I will. It is costing the veteran from $20 to $25 a month over a period of twenty-five years, amortized at 3½ per cent interest.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Can you get it any cheaper than that?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then he owns his house.

Mr. FRASER: In the return I received from the Department of Veterans Affairs it is stated that if a veteran wants to buy a house he has to pay $1,500 down for a house, costing $6,900, for which in 1939 you would not have paid $2,500.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Stick to the tobacco business. You know something about that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You make your own speech.

Mr. FRASER: If the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) knows no more about his own affairs than he knows about mine, he does not know anything at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Wouldn't he know enough to come in out of the rain?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has already spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MERRITT: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to interrupt a speaker all the time without rising in their seats, I suggest respectfully that you should follow the procedure adopted in a football game when a wrangle starts; that is, take time out for interruptions.

An hon. MEMBER: He had five minutes extra.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the budget fully because I am not an expert in such matters. I should like, however, to express my own views as well as those of my constituents and to offer a few suggestions which, to my mind, are timely.

I have only a few comments to make on the budget. The tax reductions announced on June 27 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) have been greeted with pleasure. I must say frankly, however, that the people are disappointed because they will have to bear the present tax burden throughout 1946 and receive relief in 1947 only. Overwhelmed by the crushing load of taxes for five years, the public expected special consideration. I recognize that in order to meet its numerous commitments the government needs revenues. However, a great many persons are of the opinion that in both the national and international fields Canada is proceeding at too quick a pace. It is true that every Canadian wishes that his country should enjoy all the prestige which it deserves, but Canada's membership in every international organization, the large loans which she makes to other countries, her generosity, her entry into numerous new fields of endeavour, are costing the Canadian public millions of dollars. On the other hand, the public justly feel that Canada's needs must come first. It behooves the government, therefore, to ascertain immediately the expenditures which may be eliminated in order, first, to reduce taxes more substantially and, second, to pass for the benefit of the people certain measures the need of which is fully justified by new circumstances which have arisen.

People complained about the tax on soft drinks, and it should have been abolished or reduced. The same thing applies to the war tax on several commodities which, since we are at peace, are regarded as necessities. The government has deemed it advisable to impose a tax on cooperatives. I am glad, however, that patronage dividends are deductible from taxable income. This will enable bona fide county or village agricultural cooperatives to survive and fulfil their mission. There is something about the income tax that seems quite abnormal to me. The taxpayer must file his income tax return by a set date, otherwise he is liable to a penalty. Everyone will admit that discipline is necessary. However, I feel that when a taxpayer makes a mistake in his return—and it is not easy to fill out the forms correctly—he should not be required by the income tax division to pay a penalty and interest in addition to his tax. The government compels the taxpayer to pay on time but does not make haste in refunding overpayments. In my constituency there are people who applied for refunds in 1944 and have not yet been paid. Will the government also pay the interest? Certainly not. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. In my opinion such refunds should be made within the year and the people have a right to insist that this be done.

The discussion on the budget provides us with an opportunity for expressing personal opinions and making suggestions. I had hoped to state my views while the consideration of the estimates was progressing, but I think the session has lasted too long already, and therefore I will summarize those points in which I am particularly interested.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) said a few weeks ago that old age pensions would be increased. I commend this effort. Such is the cost of living now that the present allowance is inadequate to equip old people with the means of coping with the additional needs of existence. At the beginning of the session I moved a resolution asking for pensions for invalids and crippled people. The principle was approved by all parties in this house and I thank those hon. members who spoke on the question. The minister himself seemed to be in favour of this proposal. It should be kept in mind, and next year perhaps one may hope that a bill to this effect may be introduced. We have no right to abandon this unfortunate class of society when we are giving away millions to relieve the distress and misery of other nations.

The country as a whole has greatly benefited by the family allowances, but I wonder whether the government is giving sufficient consideration to large families. Very often the head of a family is paid high wages but he must support eight, ten or twelve children. According to his salary, he must return part of his allowances: 40 per cent, for instance, if he earns from $1,800 to $2,000, 50 per cent from $2,000 to $2,200, 60 per cent from $2,200 to $2,400, and so on up to $3,000. Would it not be fitting to consider one of these days the possibility of specifying for large families of a stated number of children or more, a recovery percentage fifty per cent lower than the present scale? This country would thus show special recognition of the large family, one of the most productive assets of a real nation.

My constituency is one of the most tourist-minded in the province. Renowned for its myriad lakes, the beauty of its forests, the grandeur of its landscape, Terrebonne county boasts hotels of international fame such as Gray Rocks inn, Mount Tremblant lodge, Pinoteau, Laurentide inn, La Sapinière, Le Domaine d'Estérel, Ste. Adèle Lodge, Alpine inn, Chalet Cochand, Chanteclere, Mont St. Gabriel, Nymark lodge, Hotel Lapointe, Hotel Maurice, to mention but a few.

The tourist publicity sponsored by the Laurentian resorts' association, which includes the above-mentioned hotels, has proved effective. Tourism is one of the country's chief industries, and it is proper to ask that appropriation for the dominion travel bureau be increased and that its advertising of this country abroad be intensified. I suggest that films should be used in order that such advertising should give the best results. Moreover, I consider that the dominion travel bureau should help bona fide associations like the Laurentian association to meet part of the cost of publicity carried out by means of booklets. I would even go farther and suggest that the national film board should produce in the tourist centres of the country films for distribution in the United States and elsewhere.

The cost of a film represents a fairly substantial sum, I admit, but the financial cooperation of tourist associations could be requested, if necessary. I know that a film taken in my mountains and divided into four equal parts corresponding with the various seasons would constitute a publicity medium from which the tourist industry in the whole Montreal district would greatly benefit.

May I suggest to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) that the programme involving the construction of tourist roads, which was carried out before the war, should be resumed. That policy gave wonderful results. In this post-war period, when tourism is making an expansion which can only increase with the years, the construction of tourist highways would open up new districts to an industry whose returns represent hundreds of millions of dollars.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have placed the following motion on the order paper:

In the opinion of this House, the Department of Public Works should, without delay, study and make plans for the deepening or cleaning of the Mille-Iles river, at five or six points and for limited distances and widths, between St. Eustache-sur-le-Lac and Ste. Rose, Rosemere, Pont-David.

All the hon. members of the Montreal district, and especially the hon. representative for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), who spoke in favour of this project, the day before yesterday, know the picturesqueness of this river and are cognizant of the fact that thousands of Montreal families spend the summer there. Yachting is very popular on this watercourse; however, it is navigable on a stretch of 14 miles only, between Pont-David and St. Eustache-sur-le Lac. Between these two towns, the channel, although narrow in places, is deep enough to accommodate even the largest yachts. In about four or five places, limited dredging and cleaning operations should be carried out. But what is unfortunate is that the yachts sailing this part of the river cannot reach Two Mountains Lake and vice versa. At St. Eustache-sur-le-Lac, there are rapids only a few hundred feet long, which may be sailed at high water only.

The first job to be done would be to improve these rapids. The removal, in the winter time, of some large boulders, which are to be found there and the marking of the channel, however narrow it may be, would be sufficient to allow yachts cruising on lakes St. Louis and Two Mountains to go down Mille-Iles river as far as Pont-David and back again. The removal of the boulders would not affect in any way the water level on Two Mountains lake but would further develop the tourist trade in the immediate surroundings of Montreal.

The membership of the Thousand Islands Yachting Club runs into the hundreds. The club is planning to build special wharves, repair shops for yachts, service stations, etc. The development which would immediately follow in the wake of such undertakings, involving but little outlay of time and money, is readily apparent. First, a first-rate tourist industry; for workers of the locality and vicinity, hardest hit by the shutdown of war plants, a plentiful source of jobs: building hundreds of homes on the islands and on shore, putting up wharves, laying out gardens, lawns, etc. For the farmer, a new market for his produce.

I commend this project to the minister. I know of his devotion to any cause likely to add to the country's might and standing. I know that he will not balk at revamping his plans and at having his department look into this plan to which the hon. members for Montreal and vicinity cannot remain indifferent.

The announcement, confirmed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) that all Canadian servicemen now overseas, numbering about 14,000, will return "sometime before the end of the year" has been well received. I think they should have been brought back earlier. Then, too, Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps time that leniency be asked for the thousand odd deserters remaining in the country. Speaking in this house, early in the session, I suggested that a court be set up, in each military district, for reviewing cases of desertion on their merits.

All desertion cases are not caused by ill will or fear of danger. In many instances, they are based on excellent reasons which the parties concerned, while serving in the army, could not adequately explain, through timidity or for other motives. Other soldiers deserted because their application for farm or compassionate leave came up against the uncompromising attitude of certain senior officers who were die-hard fanatics; others because they were not given proper medical attention when they needed it; others still because their commanding officers refused to understand and to help them, or because the rebuff was tinged with an arrogance which hurt their pride. This is why it seems to me all these cases require special consideration and study. Circumstances must be taken into account. There have been deserters in my district; many rejoined their unit last summer and since then. Their cases have been straightened out. The same happened throughout the country. Detention camps, through the bad name they have acquired, prevented a large number of young men to abide by the law. This problem of deserters should be settled once and for all. More indulgence and consideration should be shown at this time to those who are held in detention or have rejoined their unit.

One hears of a permanent army. The international situation and our geographical position on the American continent might oblige us to maintain one. The military-minded could find a career in the permanent army which could only be organized on a voluntary basis. Compulsion, so hateful in war time, would become simply obnoxious in time of peace.

I have already stated in this house and I repeat that the government should sell or even hand over to private industry the war plants which belong to the crown. The Bouchard munitions factory, operated by the D.I.L. during the war and now temporarily devoted to the needs of the army and the War Assets Corporation, is located in my riding. No final decision seems to have been reached concerning its permanent function. I am too well acquainted with the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) to think that he would drop such an establishment as the Bouchard plant built at a cost of some $20 millions.

The Saint Jerome army camp will soon close down, and the municipality is interested in purchasing this property for industrial purposes. The minister has already viewed the request sympathetically, and for this, he deserves the highest commendation.

Now that the armed conflict has ended, the government should pay municipal taxes on state-owned wartime buildings. Since the outbreak of hostilities, the government has not expended any money in that direction. I ought to point out here that the municipalities where war plants were built played host to a surplus population of which a large majority has now settled permanently within their precincts. The municipalities were required to incur large capital expenditures and to expand especially their water and sewer systems. For this reason, they should receive grants which would be used to improve their municipal services. Such works are still needed; small towns, owing to an increase in population due solely to the war, were compelled to incur large expenditures in order to cope with new and unforeseen conditions.

I am of the opinion that the rents charged by Wartime Housing are too high and as war plants are now closed down, tenants can no longer pay such high rents for their houses. The government should soon announce its policy in regard to the purpose for which such residential centres will be used. Will the municipalities have a priority if the government decides to sell them? Will the government retain them? Will those houses be sold to private parties? It would be interesting to have answers to those questions.

Large areas of land were expropriated for the construction of war plants and especially for their protection. They are no longer in use and represent an idle capital. Would it not be advisable for the Allied War Supplies Corporation to make a survey of all such idle lands to ascertain whether it would not be in order to return them to their former owners?

During the war, the government resorted to publicity in the press, both daily and weekly, to explain the laws and orders by summing them up. That was money well spent.

The war is over, but the laws are still as numerous. Post-war has imposed upon the government, and even upon parliament, very important decisions. Canada belongs to every international organization, but the people are not aware of their aims or purposes. During the war, the government informed the population by means of advertisements. Those of the wartime prices and trade board, for instance, were unique in this respect. All those advertisements served as information and guide for millions of readers. The newspaper is the best means of information. Our wartime information service should now become our peacetime information service. Such an organization could well explain the deeds of the nation and the laws of parliament by means of well-worded publicity, throughout the country, with the help of newspapers which are the best medium for that purpose. It has been proven that publicity is beneficial, even for a government. We should keep up the good work. I wish to make clearly known my position regarding the controversial question of a Canadian flag. I favour a flag, which will be entirely Canadian, that is a flag that will not borrow anything from the emblem of another country, no matter which one.

I feel that the matter should not be discussed from the standpoint of race, origin or history, but solely on the chief consideration that Canada, which has become a nation and is so recognized throughout the world, should have a flag of its own, symbolizing the ideals of all its component groups. A flag is chosen not for one year, but for centuries. I could never, as a member of this parliament, accept a flag of the presence thereon on account of a particular emblem, would leave upon the freedom I enjoy as a Canadian citizen the least trace of colonialism, and which would compel me to have even a partial liking for a symbol not fully consonant with the pride I have for my country.

Such are the remarks I wished to make. They indicate my views on the matters I have touched lightly. The budget announces some relief for the taxpayers after January 1st, 1947. Let us hope that the next budget will go farther in that respect. I should have hoped that more would be done for this year. I have received from my constituency hundreds of cards from people who claim that no tax should be levied on incomes lower than $3,000.

I am told that those cards were distributed by the Quebec section of the Social Credit party. I replied to none of them, because threats and intimidation—two things which I deeply abhor— were resorted to in the last paragraph. Many persons signed them without having read that last paragraph; they found out much later how they had been deceived. It remained to be seen whether the Social Credit members, in this budget debate, would make the same demand. The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) preferred to ask for an exemption of $2,000 instead of $3,000. That party advocates here dividends for the whole population, but its members carefully avoid to tell us how the necessary funds could be obtained. It is much easier to criticize, than to govern. In my quality of member for Terrebonne, I am merely endeavouring to do my duty, in trying to be logical and sincere, in endeavouring to help in every way the people who have elected me, and also in upholding the principles and the ideas they have at heart. I feel that I have not failed in the performance of that task.

(Text):

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in his budget address on June 27 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), speaking about personal income tax, as reported at page 2916 of Hansard had this to say:

> In revising a tax structure so complicated as our present one, it has not been possible to assure that all taxpayers will receive the same relative amount of tax relief.

Then follows this sentence:

> We have, however, tried to make the new schedule as fair and equitable as possible.

I rise to challenge that statement. I have no doubt the minister is convinced, certainly from his point of view, of the correctness of what he said; but we of the C.C.F. feel it is not true to say that the minister's income tax proposals are fair to those in the lower income brackets. That, indeed, is one of the main points of the subamendment which has been moved by this party, and having taken that stand ours is the responsibility of presenting facts and figures to substantiate our position. We contend that there is unfairness to those in the lower income brackets, in addition to the fact that there is no relief this year, on two main counts. The first has to do with the exemption levels, which have been set by the minister at $750 for a single person and $1,500 for a married person. We contend that these exemption levels are not high enough. Our second criticism on the ground of fairness has to do with anomalies in the rate structure and with various inequities to which I wish to draw attention as I proceed.

First, I should like to say a further word about the point at which the minister has set the exemption levels. In his budget address he recognized that there was a demand that those levels be set higher than he was prepared to agree to, and he proceeded to give his answers to those demands. The two main arguments he used were: first, the need of revenue, which he contended could be gained only by dipping into the brackets he proposes to continue taxing, and then he used the argument that one has to be fair between the $1,500 and $2,400 levels as well as between the $5,000 and $10,000 levels.

With respect to the argument that it is necessary to go down into the lower brackets in order to get sufficient revenue, the remarks I intend to make a little later, supported by statistics, will be my answer. I wish to say a word now about this other argument the minister used, which was made in the form of a plausible statement but one that does not stand up when examined closely. At page 2915 of Hansard the minister said:

> We cannot secure proper equity and fair treatment if the exemptions from income tax are so high as to exclude most of those receiving incomes.

Then came this sentence:

> It is just as important to be fair in the distribution of taxation between persons earning $1,500 and $2,400 a year respectively as it is between these persons and those earning $5,000 or $10,000 a year.

The way the minister put that, it sounds like the statement of a principle, almost a moral or universal principle; and when it is put in that language, it appears to carry weight. But the simplest way to test the supposed universality of that principle is to alter the figures. The minister would not have thought of rising in his place in this house and saying it is just as important to be fair in the distribution of taxation between persons earning $500 a year and $1,000 a year as between those earning $5,000 and $10,000 a year. In other words, this principle of equity between taxpayers does not apply right down to the taxpayers' last bottom dollar. It has to start at a certain arbitrary point that makes allowance for the basic cost of living. The minister admits that by setting the levels at $750 and $1,500; and our contention is that in arriving at that arbitrary point he has not given sufficient consideration to the cost of living in Canada at the present time. What I am objecting to is putting it on a basis of principle at the levels chosen by the minister without first giving full recognition to the amount necessary to maintain a decent standard of living.

I now want to turn to the other criticism we make, namely that there are anomalies in the rate structure. In the course of what I have to say I shall deal also with the question of whether or not sufficient revenue could be obtained without going down into the lower brackets. In passing, I desire to say that in arguing clearly within the confines of income tax legislation to-night, I do not want to be taken as admitting that this is the only way to balance a budget. My principal dislike of the financial position of the country at the present time is the more than $430 million a year we must set aside to pay interest on the national debt. This group has contended right along that what we basically need is the nationalization of our financial structure. At the moment we have not that and we have to deal with the kind of budget that is before us, so I shall talk in those terms.

Let us look at the rate structure which the minister has brought down and which he says he has tried to make as fair and equitable as possible. I hope that the courtesy granted from time to time to hon. members to place certain material on Hansard has not been exhausted by the previous speakers, because I have four tables which I have prepared and which I should like to place on the record. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps you might wait until I have described these before you ask the house whether or not unanimous consent is given to place them on Hansard. I may say that three of them are prepared from the two tables which the minister placed on Hansard at pages 2916 and 2917. The source of the fourth one I will indicate when I come to it.

The first table I have entitled, "Net increase in amount of income retained by taxpayers after payment of 1947 income tax as compared with 1945 and 1946." After all, that is what impresses itself upon the Canadian taxpayer, how much greater will be his "take-home pay" as a result of the application of this budget, compared with what it is at the present time. I have listed the income ranges from $1,300 a year to $200,000 a year. Opposite these I have three columns, one headed "single person," the next "married person with no children," and the next, "married person with two children." Those are the categories of which the minister gave examples in his tables.

Under these headings I have put the amount of the net gain realized by, or the net relief afforded to, these various taxpayers. When one looks at this table set out in that manner he will see some rather interesting things. First of all, it becomes obvious that the greater a person's income, the greater will be the increase he will enjoy after the new budget comes into effect. I know that to many hon. members and to some people outside the house the principle has been accepted so long as to have become sacred that to those who have an abundance more should be given than to those who are in the lower brackets and are in real need.

But bearing in mind the lofty principles advocated by this government, such as when it introduced family allowances and when it placed its social security measures before the dominion-provincial conference, it seems to me that more consideration ought to be given to the net position of the people of Canada than is given by the income tax revision in this budget. In addition, one discovers from looking at this table that in a number of cases all the way from $1,500 to $4,000 a year the married person without children receives a greater increase in "take-home pay" or is afforded greater taxation relief than the married person with two children. I have mentioned this to a number of my colleagues. It is so incredible they have felt that I must be wrong, but the figures speak for themselves.

In addition to that, there are a number of instances, at the $1,300 level and all the way up from $5,000 to $200,000, where the single person is afforded greater relief and gets a greater increase in "take-home pay" than anybody else, than the married person without children or the married person with two children. In the face of a situation like that, I did not feel that I could let the minister's statement go unchallenged, although I know he believes it, when he says that he regards this schedule as fair and equitable.

I admit that it is fair to one group, namely, the 550,000 who have been taken off the income tax rolls, but what a shame to have to admit that there are that many people in this country who, if single, are earning only between $660 and $750 a year or, if married, between $1,200 and $1,500 a year.

I move on to the second and third tables which I should like to give to the house. These two are made up from the two tables that the minister gave on the pages I have indicated. My headings on these are, "Amounts by which income tax payable is increased at each level over that payable at a base of $750" for a single person, and "Amounts by which net income tax payable is increased at each level over that payable at a base of $1,500," for a married person with two children. The reason I have worked out these tables is that in considering my first table the minister might say that the anomalies found therein are due to an attempt to correct previous wrongs. So I thought I would look at the rate of increase in the new structure. It will be perfectly clear to hon. members when they look at these tables that the grading up of the rates was steeper under the old system than it will be under the new. In other words, the rate of increase has been slightly levelled off, whereas we contend that as you get up into the higher brackets, the grading should become more and more steep.

My fourth table is made up from figures given by the Minister of Finance but they do not appear in the two tables to which I have referred. This is entitled, "Comparison of rates of income taxation on taxable income in the nearest comparable brackets as between 1941 and 1947." What I have done in this table is to set down in the 1947 column the rates that apply on taxable income according to the budget now before us. In the 1941 column I have set down the rates that applied on taxable income in that year.

My reasons for selecting 1941 to compare with 1947 are several, but the main one is that it was the only year with which one could make an exact comparison because in the years in between we did not have the $750 and $1,500 exemption level. Instead, we had a $660 exemption level, and then allowances were given by deductions from the tax payable for a wife or children. We are now back to a basis which is comparable with that of 1941. The only difference is that in 1941 we had two taxes, the graduated tax and the national defence tax. I have added the average amount of the national defence tax payable in 1941, namely, 3½ per cent, to each of the rates in the different brackets.

An interesting thing that develops from this table is that in the brackets from zero up to $3,000 of taxable income, the rates in 1947 are greater in all cases than were the rates in 1941. For example, in 1941 the rate for the first $1,000 was 18½ per cent. It is now 22 per cent for the first $250, and 25 per cent for the remainder of the first $1,000. So it goes right on up to $3,000; the rate to be applied under the new budget in each case in these lower brackets is greater than it was in 1941. But from $3,000 to $30,000 the rates to be applied in 1947 are in all cases less than those that were applied in the year 1941.

The picture changes slightly between $30,000 to somewhere around $100,000 to $150,000, but in the topmost bracket the rate will again be less in 1947 than it was in 1941.

I might add that 1941 was not the year of the highest income tax rates. I chose that year for the reasons I have already given. Actually it was 1943 that we reached our peak in income tax rates. They went higher in that year for all the brackets, both the lower and the higher. When one compares the rates in 1943 with those in 1947, the brackets from $30,000 up are afforded substantial relief, namely, 17 per cent. For example, the rate was 77 per cent on incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 in 1943, and it is now 60 per cent.

I have worked out the table and presented those figures to the house for two reasons: first of all, to show that the budget proposals now before us afford much greater relief for those in the higher brackets than they do for those in the lower brackets. My other reason for presenting those figures is to support the statement I made when I first rose to my feet; namely, that the minister cannot claim that he is unable to get sufficient revenue without dipping into the lower brackets the way he does in this budget so long as he gives this kind of relief to those in the upper income brackets. If he were really interested in seeing that an adequate minimum amount was free from taxation he should first of all have maintained or even increased the rates on the upper brackets, and only after he had done that would he have any right to dip down as he has done into the lower brackets.

Another reply that might be made by the minister could be that the 1941 rates to which I have referred did not produce in that year the amount of revenue he now needs. I have looked into that, and I find that compared with the gross national product of that year, the total amount of revenue that was obtained from those rates in the fiscal year 1941-42 was not far out proportionately from the revenue that he expects in a full year under these new rates. So I suggest to the minister, accepting the challenge that we who claim that the exemption levels should be higher should have some concrete suggestions to make, not that the sales tax should be extended as was proposed by an hon. gentleman to my right the other night, but that the exemption levels should be raised to $1,000 and $2,000 respectively; that the rates between $2,000 and $3,000 could have been slightly lowered, and that the rates between, say $3,000 and $15,000 or $20,000 might have been left where they were, but that from $20,000 up the rates should have been restored to what they were in 1943. Only after that, if a mathematical computation showed a deficit in the revenue required from personal income taxes, should the minister have thought of going as he has done into the lower brackets.

Mr. ILSLEY: To raise the rates above $20,000 produces surprisingly little revenue, if that is what the hon. gentleman is talking about. Mind you, I am not saying that that is the sole consideration. The sole consideration should be fairness. Comparisons with 1943 and 1941 prove nothing; even with 1946 and 1945 comparisons prove nothing. The question is whether the present tax rate structure is a fair progressive tax rate structure as compared with other income tax rate structures. An examination will show that it is. It shows an even progression all the way up.

Mr. KNOWLES: It shows an even progression but it is a progression not as steep as we had before. And if levelling out that progression as the minister has done makes it necessary for him to impose the taxes on the lower brackets that he has done, I say it is not fair and equitable.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I see your argument.

Mr. KNOWLES: It strikes me that what has happened is this, that in the war years the minister got those in the lower income tax brackets into the way of paying these heavier taxes and there is not now a disposition to let them go.

Before I turn to another phase of the budget, Mr. Speaker, have I permission to put these tables on Hansard?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member permission to put these tables on Hansard?

Mr. HOMUTH: If they are correct, it is all right.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member must have unanimous consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall not raise any objection. But of course there is no admission as to their correctness if we allow them to be put on. If they are incorrect, then, if there is time and opportunity they will have to be answered.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will vouch for the correctness of these tables. Actually a member would be pretty foolish to try to put incorrect tables on Hansard.

Mr. HOMUTH: A lot of incorrect things have been put on Hansard.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, another hon. member to my right was given unanimous consent this evening to put something on Hansard and I think we might extend the same courtesy to my colleague.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you. The tables are as follows:

old age pensions, in health insurance, in full employment, in housing and other much needed projects. Those of us on this side who in the past have spoken of these things and criticized the government for its failure to provide them now find that we do not have to raise the standards by which to compare what the government has done; rather the government stands condemned by its own standards. The government has thrown these ideas out to the Canadian people and given them the hope that these things would be realized in the not far distant future. I remember very well last year getting into a bit of a discussion with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) when I was speaking on old age pensions. He felt I was taunting him unduly when I asked why the increase in old age pensions seemed to be slated for 1948 according to the figures

I now wish to deal with another phase of the matter. There is great disappointment with this budget, principally because it is not a human document. It does not deal with the things that people in this country are really interested in and really need. The government knows what those things are. As a matter of fact it is on record in the proposals that were made to the dominion-provincial conference. The people of this country are interested in social security, in adequate given in the documents presented to the dominion-provincial conference. I even went so far as to ask whether that meant we might look for an election in 1948. The minister did not like that suggestion, and came back at me with the definite statement that these increases in old age pensions would come into effect just as soon as the provinces would agree to the government's proposals. The whole tone of the minister's remarks on that occasion and last year indicated that there was an interest on the part of the government in going ahead with these things, and the people of Canada thought these measures were imminent. But now, with the failure of the dominion-provincial conference, the proposed increase in old age pensions and other social legislation are referred to by the minister in the past tense.

This country is not satisfied to let the government use the failure of the dominion-provincial conference as an excuse. There is almost a feeling that maybe they are glad they did not have to find the money to carry out these social services. I know, for example, that two of the provinces—my own province of Manitoba and Saskatchewan—in agreeing to the government's revised proposals as laid down in the minister's budget, have indicated, along with their acceptance of the proposals, their disappointment. I do not wonder they are disappointed. Look at my own province, for example. Under the proposals which were made last August for an additional expenditure throughout Canada by the federal government of $733 million, the people of Manitoba, on the basis of what our population is in the country as a whole, would have benefited to the extent of approximately $45 million. But under the proposal made by the minister the other night Manitoba's receipts will be only $11·8 million, although the province will have to give up everything it was asked to give up last fall. That amount is more than the government of Manitoba is receiving at the present time from the same sources; it is a good deal for the government as far as balancing its budget is concerned, and the premier of Manitoba says, in his statement to-day, that they have come to the conclusion that such an agreement is better than no agreement at all. But for the people of Manitoba and of Saskatchewan there is the loss of these other things which were provided for in the proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference. It does seem to me that the least the government might do would be to make an offer along the lines of increased old age pensions, health insurance and these other matters to the provinces which are prepared to enter into these agreements. The idea of penalizing all the people of Canada, of depriving them of the things which they have looked forward to, because of the failure of that conference, somehow just does not go down with the people of this country.

The minister said the other night in the peroration of his speech as reported in Hansard at page 2925:

> We Canadians can achieve great objectives if we can agree among ourselves upon those objectives and devote our energies to reaching them. That is clearly shown by what happened in the war.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The Canadian people believe that we are capable of producing an increased quantity of goods and services, on the basis of which we can raise our standard of living and give our people some real sense of security. But this government is giving no leadership in that direction.

I come back to this question of old age pensions. I think on that score alone the government of this country missed a tremendous opportunity to give our people some real sense of security, some definite feeling of hope and confidence about the future, and that its failure on that score is indeed lamentable.

I might say a good many other things critical of this budget if my time permitted, but I see it is fast going. So before I sit down I want to add that, with all the criticisms which the people of Canada are offering about this budget, it could have been worse. If anyone doubts that, all one has to do is to listen to the suggestions which have been made to the government by hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would improve it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not doubt that my hon. friends think they would improve the situation from their point of view. But here are some of the things which have been suggested: higher interest rates, a reduction of corporation taxes, reduction or elimination of the excess profits tax. There has been a campaign for decontrol, which, no matter how you word it or how you try to dress it up, means in the long run imposing burdens upon the ordinary working people of this country, but assistance has been asked for gold mining.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. KNOWLES: Certainly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it not true that your party in Great Britain has abolished the excess profits tax?

An hon. MEMBER: Don't compare the Labour party in Great Britain with the C.C.F.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Labour party in Great Britain has already nationalized the Bank of England and a number of important industries.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, but have they taken off the excess profits tax?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, and are giving to the people of that country some real hope for the future—

Mr. HOMUTH: That is rather doubtful. The next election will show that.

Mr. KNOWLES: —which is what counts and which my hon. friend's party would not offer to the people of this country. I was surprised at the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) that there should be a wider use of the sales tax. That was the most striking Tory suggestion. After all, the sales tax does not impinge according to ability to pay at all. It takes from the low-paid man just as much on what he buys as it takes from the rich. So I suggest that, bad as this budget is, it could have been worse if—

An hon. MEMBER: If you had been in power.

Mr. KNOWLES: —if the minister had taken advice from my hon. friends of the Tory party. The fact is that the bankruptcy of both the old parties in this house is evident. They talk in terms of leadership of the country and of the great future we must have on the basis of what we have done in the past. But budgets of the kind the minister has presented, and suggestions such as those of my hon. friends to the right, simply indicate to the people of this country that there is no hope either way.

An hon. MEMBER: Your way is a dictatorship.

Mr. KNOWLES: Nonsense. I am not one of those who stand here and glibly say that that means that overnight the people of Canada are going to turn to this party.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no; never, never.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You will not live long enough to see it.

Mr. KNOWLES: But, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends of both the old parties—whistling as they are to keep up their courage—know that, step by step, the realization is dawning in the minds of the Canadian people that their only hope lies in their taking control of things themselves, in the full meaning of democracy.

An hon. MEMBER: The very thing that wrecked Europe.

Mr. KNOWLES: More nonsense.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps this is not a relevant question. Would my hon. friend express an opinion as to whether this budget is not a more liberal budget in the broad sense of the term—with a small "l" so that we will not raise any argument—than the budget in Great Britain, with a $490 exemption and an abolition of the excess profits tax?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, I do not agree that it is a more liberal budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: And no distinction between cooperatives and other corporations in the matter of taxation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not sure that the minister is correct about the latter, but I will not argue the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then leave that out, but consider the other two. I ask my hon. friend, when he is denouncing this budget, if he does not think it is a more liberal budget, in the broad sense of the word "liberal", than is theirs?

Mr. KNOWLES: Keep the "l" small, and it is a fair question.

An hon. MEMBER: They nationalized the banking system.

Mr. ILSLEY: Someone speaks of the nationalization of the bank. We nationalized ours nearly ten years ago.

Mr. KNOWLES: The budget has to be taken in the total context of the nation's economy, and in the total context of the economy of the United Kingdom there are provisions for social security from the cradle to the grave which are now in effect and the beginnings of a programme of nationalization—

Mr. HOMUTH: Socialization.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, socialization.

Mr. HOMUTH: At last you have admitted it. You have been denying it for years.

Mr. KNOWLES: I came into this party years ago because I was a socialist. That is why I am here to-day.

Mr. HOMUTH: You got into the right crowd, though you have been denying it for years.

Mr. KNOWLES: And that programme of socialization to which I have referred is one which affords a future of hope to the people of the United Kingdom.

Mr. ILSLEY: You think there is no hope here?

Mr. KNOWLES: Not as much as there is over there; not yet, at any rate. As a matter of fact, a good many young Canadians are going back to England, for despite the severity of conditions—

Mr. HOMUTH: And a lot of Englishmen would like to come out here.

Mr. KNOWLES: —they have found the atmosphere over there so acceptable; and, after all, that is what counts—the total picture. And so, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOMUTH: Give him an extra thirty minutes and he will be in deep water.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; I am not asking for any more time, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to rest my case with the answers I have made to the questions of the Minister of Finance. This budget, in its total context, is a disappointment.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): I realize that we are still in an emergency period and I realize as well as any member of the house that so long as that emergency exists we cannot expect the standard of living that we should otherwise expect. We cannot expect it so long as there are multitudes of starving people in the world, so long as there are many without the essentials of life. It would be inhumanitarian of us to expect a high standard of living for ourselves before we have at least made our contribution toward raising the living standard of those people. Despite that fact, now is the time that we ought to be laying down long-range objectives for the time when the emergency is over, and that is my greatest concern. That is why I wish to choose, as the cue for my remarks, the concluding words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), which were also quoted by the hon. member who preceded me. Personally, I consider those particular remarks of the Minister of Finance just about the most important in his whole budget speech. I do not know that it is necessary for me to quote the whole thing. I will read one paragraph in which he says:

> We Canadians can achieve great objectives if we can agree among ourselves upon those objectives and devote our energies to reaching them. That is clearly shown by what happened in the war. Now that the war is over, we have an opportunity to select and to achieve objectives just as challenging, just as exciting as those of war, but of a constructive and progressive nature. I believe that the Canadian people, if properly informed, are prepared to agree, by and large, upon great peace-time objectives and to devote to their attainment something of the same spirit and energy which made our war achievements possible. It is the duty of all of us in government, in business, in labour, in agriculture, to do all that we can now to make possible that agreement upon ends and upon means which will enable Canada in peace to be worthy of the record of Canadians at war.

I think that is an important statement, and I shall confine my remarks on this occasion to a consideration of objectives toward which we should strive once we are through the emergency period, as well as the means whereby we may attempt to attain those objectives.

We heard a great deal a few years ago, as we came to the conclusion of the war, about the new order, a new heaven and a new earth. The only comment I care to make in that respect is that if this budget or the nature of it is to be a sample of the new order, I would characterize it not as a heaven on earth but as a hell on earth. In considering objectives and means of attaining them for the future, I should like to pose a few questions. If we are to have this much-vaunted new earth, this new order, does it mean necessarily that we must throw overboard the whole of the old order, or is it possible that there are things that we ought to preserve from the old order?

Perhaps there are things that we should eliminate from the old order, and perhaps there are things we should add to make the order work as nearly close to perfection as any human institutions can be made to work. I will attempt to answer these questions. What is it that we wish to preserve of the old system? I realize, immediately I make such a remark, that I shall come into conflict with my hon. friends to the right, in the C.C.F. party, but I wish to assure them that anything I may say by way of criticism of them is not intended to be personal. I consider they are fine fellows personally, likable fellows, but unfortunately I must take decided issue with the policies they support. Therefore in discussing the question as to what we should preserve of the old system, I wish them to understand that it is with the policies they advocate that I am taking issue. It is far beyond a personal matter.

During the course of this debate so far almost every member of the C.C.F. party who has spoken, including the hon. gentleman who preceded me, has stated that private enterprise as such is through. I wish to take emphatic issue with that statement and to assert that private enterprise as a principle is as sound as the rock of Gibraltar. The reason, as I have said on many previous occasions, that hon. members of the C.C.F., as well as communists, condemn private enterprise is that they hold it responsible for things for which it should not be held responsible. I say the C.C.F., and all those who condemn private enterprise, are charging it falsely.

What do they say? One of the first things they say is that private enterprise has failed because it does not and has not provided employment. How many times have we heard that stated, in parliament and out of it? We hear the statement made that private enterprise has failed, because it does not provide employment. I say that is a false charge, because private enterprise is not responsible for employment, and should not be held responsible for it. I shall deal at greater length with that point in a few minutes.

Again, our socialist friends say that private enterprise has failed, because it has not effected a distribution of the national wealth and the products of industry. Again I say that is a false charge, because private enterprise is not responsible for distribution and cannot be held responsible for it. Therefore I say that is false charge No. 2.

Again, our C.C.F. friends assert that private enterprise has failed, because it refuses to develop natural resources. Well, certainly if conditions in the pre-war years are indicative of what can be done under a system of private enterprise then no one with reason can assert that there was no development of our natural resources. The country was flooded with goods; everyone was complaining about overproduction; the warehouses and storehouses of our country, from one end to the other, were stocked with goods. Plant equipment was running at half capacity, and even less. Surely there was no indication at that time of a refusal to develop resources. I say that, too, is a false charge.

The socialists claim that private enterprise refuses to plan. Again I say that is a false charge, for observation must indicate to anyone that the method of producing goods on this continent, including Canada and the United States, is equal to and perhaps in many respects is superior to the method of production anywhere else in the world.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that all these charges against private enterprise are false. I consider that one of the strongest reasons that can be advanced as to why the principle of private enterprise is sound lies in the fact that every citizen in this country wishes to exercise that principle for himself. That includes even our friends of the C.C.F. They, themselves, privately and personally, are private enterprisers. They own their own farms and they own their own businesses; they are private enterprisers at heart.

The greatest argument in favour of private enterprise is the fact that each and every one of us privately and personally, in his heart of hearts, is a private enterpriser. We desire the principle of ownership for ourselves; we desire to own our own property, our own business and our own affairs, in our own way, without any interference from the state.

As I have said on previous occasions to my hon. friends in the C.C.F., I consider that aspect of their policy the one deserving of greatest condemnation. As I have said several times before, they follow the policy of making fish of one and fowl of another. On the one hand they condemn profit and the profit motive, private enterprise and private ownership; and yet, so far as their policy is concerned, on the other hand they propose to leave part of the community operating under private enterprise and propose to nationalize or socialize another section of it.

As I have said previously, consistency is the test of any policy. If the profit motive is wrong in principle, if the making of profits is a wrong procedure, then surely it must be wrong for everyone in the community. How can they be right for some merchants, just because they happen to be small businessmen, and wrong for others? I say that glaring inconsistency should arouse the suspicions of the people.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Does the hon. member's party say that everything should be privately owned? Is that his argument?

Mr. KUHL: Personally I would not see any harm in that being so.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Everything?

Mr. KUHL: I do not think ownership of production of anything has anything to do with the distribution of the product. I am not saying, for instance, that if the Social Credit party were charged with the responsibility of forming an administration it would turn the Canadian National Railways over to private ownership. I am not saying that, at all.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: To be consistent, the hon. member would have to say that.

Mr. KUHL: Well, I personally would be prepared to do it, perhaps.

Mr. BRYCE: Would the hon. member be prepared to hand over the post office?

Mr. KUHL: Of course we would get into an argument as to what constitutes a public utility. In that particular, one could draw a line anywhere he wished, as he wished to define it. My hon. friends want to go a good deal farther than the post office. They would want to go right down into the production of boots and shoes, and things of that kind.

Mr. HANSELL: They want money enough to ride on the railways.

Mr. KUHL: So far as nationalization is concerned, what difference does it make whether or not the government owns a business? The Canadian National Railways are publicly owned; but one cannot ride on those railways free of charge, any more than he can on the Canadian Pacific. Nor can one ride free on Trans-Canada Air Lines. If one may judge from what my hon. friends contend, it must follow that because things are nationalized we would get those services a good deal cheaper, and perhaps even free of charge. But there is no indication of that at the present time. Then, so far as effectiveness of administration is concerned, I contend that private administration is infinitely better than public.

At this point I should like to elaborate briefly on what I have described as false charges, the first of which was that private enterprise has failed, because it does not provide employment. I hesitate to repeat many of the things I have said on previous occasions; but despite the fact that I have repeated myself hon. members continue to say that the purpose of private enterprise is to provide jobs. As I have said before, so long as they are going to insist upon that statement, I shall continue to insist that that is not the purpose of private enterprise. I have already said that the charge that it does not provide jobs is a false one, because it is not responsible for employment. That is where our Liberal and Conservative friends fall into the socialist trap. They assume on behalf of private enterprise the obligation to provide jobs; and they know right well it cannot be done, that private enterprise cannot absorb all the people of the nation to the extent of eight hours a day or more. Surely they must know that from past experience. Yet they accept that responsibility; and when the C.C.F. come along and say, "Well, look what happened in the days before the war; we had private enterprise and look at the unemployment," my hon. friends of the Conservative and Liberal parties have no answer; they simply sit there and take it. They should have an answer, but they never will until they have the social credit answer, which is that private enterprise is not responsible for employment. The only function and purpose of industry is to produce goods, whether it takes few or many man-hours.

The other day I placed on record a quotation with respect to objectives, on this subject. I am going to do so again, and I am going to continue to do so until the thought penetrates the understanding of hon. members. I am going to quote Major Douglas once more.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Who is he?

Mr. KUHL: Major Douglas is a man who has concentrated more thought, more intelligence, more vision and more realism in one sentence than the hon. member has in all the speeches he has ever delivered. In his book entitled "Monopoly of Credit", Major Douglas has this to say on the subject of industry and employment, at page 116:

> In attacking an engineering problem the first point we settle, with as much exactness as possible, is our objective. No engineer observer of the discussions which take place in political and lay circles on the industrial problems of the present day can fail to be struck with the fact that the problem itself is rarely stated with any clearness. For instance, the paramount difficulty of the industrial system is commonly expressed as that of unemployment. Therefore the suggestion involved is that the industrial system exists to provide employment, and fails. Those who are engaged in the actual conduct of industry, however, are specifically concerned to obtain a given output with a minimum of employment, and in fact, a decreasing amount of employment. Consequently, those who are talking about industry and those who are conducting industry have in their minds objectives which are diametrically opposed and incompatible.

In view of what the Minister of Finance has said about agreeing on objectives, I think this is one statement on which he should meditate seriously. As I said only a few days ago in accordance with this statement, we are presuming to attempt to go in two opposite directions at the same time on this subject of employment. On the one hand, we do everything possible to encourage the substitution of more and more power machinery, better machinery, more efficient machinery, and before long we are going to use atomic energy. On the one hand, we are doing everything we can to displace the man-hours of work, and we have achieved a great deal in that respect in a very few years. Yet on the other hand, what do we find? People continually suggest and urge that we must put people to work. On the one hand, we are putting them out of work; on the other hand we say we must put them to work. How is it possible I say, to go in opposite directions at the same time? To my Liberal and Conservative friends all I wish to say on that score is that, unless they are prepared to alter their attitude on this subject of unemployment, they must expect the socialist charge which is laid against them. Therefore I say that, to be reasonable and logical, it should not be suggested that private enterprise is responsible for providing jobs for anyone, because it is responsible for production only. So that I say we should concentrate on the matter of production and forget about the jobs, whether it takes jobs or not. The thing we are interested in is production, no matter how many or how few jobs it gives.

The second charge which I have said I considered false is the charge that industry refuses to develop the natural resources. I have pointed out already that in the days prior to the war we had a virtual flood of goods. We had so-called overproduction, though actually it was underconsumption, which I think indicates beyond the shadow of a doubt that private industry produces goods in superabundance. I grant that industry wants to sell at a profit, but who does not? Do my hon. friends in their businesses refuse to sell at a profit? Do they sell at cost? I say the profit motive is sound and legitimate. The profit system is not only a profit system; it is a profit and loss system. That is one aspect my hon. friends of the C.C.F. do not emphasize very often. Perhaps they have never invested money in an oil well, or anything like that. Profit is a reward for enterprise and risk, and I say those who are prepared to exercise enterprise and take a risk are entitled to a profit. As far as motives are concerned, I say we are all actuated by the profit motive, including my friends of the C.C.F. Each one of us is actuated by a profit motive; and I think it is unwarranted presumption on their part to assume this "holier than thou" attitude that only those who are not C.C.F'ers are actuated by a profit motive.

The only disability with respect to profit as such is the fact that it constitutes a mathematical impossibility. A profit is merely an addition to the price without a corresponding amount of money going into circulation. In other words, if a profit is not monetized it does not exist as money, and the only way it is monetized to-day is through debt money. So we have debts created corresponding to the amount of profit charged into the goods we must purchase, and I say that is the only disability in connection with profits. They are not monetized properly. True, they are monetized through debt money, but that need not be. If all the profits charged into goods, regardless of what they are, were monetized completely, then the consumers could purchase them completely.

Then I said private enterprise was being held guilty, because it does not distribute the goods. I repeat that it should not be held responsible for the distribution of goods. True, to the extent that labour is involved and wages paid out, distribution is brought about, but complete distribution cannot be brought about through incomes paid out of industry. Those in the Social Credit group have brought forward that premise on many occasions; and on that premise the proposals of Major Douglas rest. I repeat: No individual industry or industry collectively distributes as much in purchasing power as it produces in the prices of the goods. That is not because there are excess profits. It would not make any difference whether the profit was a small percentage or a large percentage. The fact remains, and it can be proved by examining the books of any institution, whether it be a peanut business on a street corner or a million-dollar corporation, that every business institution generates more in prices than it does in income. Consequently it is not possible for the people to buy all the products of industry as a consequence of the incomes they derive out of industry. Raising wages will not help; it simply adds to the prices by raising costs. Another solution must be found.

Another point which our C.C.F. friends make in charging private enterprise is that it refuses to plan. I cannot conceive of any more need of planning than to go ahead and produce. That is all the planning required so far as my intelligence leads me to conclude. I have already said that there is plenty of evidence that Canadian and United States industry is equal or superior to any system of production in the world.

I assert that a planned production such as socialists advocate is a totalitarian concept. Our system does not bog down because it is not planned by government bureaucrats. Our C.C.F. friends have made the statement frequently that the war effort was what it was because it was planned. I take issue with that. There was a certain amount of planning, but I say the success of our war effort was due, in a far greater measure, to the fact that there was a guaranteed market for everything produced. There was no difficulty in selling anything that was produced, because there was plenty of money afloat; in fact there was too much. I say it is not necessary to be concerned about planning production. What we must do is to concern ourselves about consumption. If consumption is taken care of, production will take care of itself.

It is unnecessary to abolish the private enterprise system merely because of the abuses to which it is exposed and its inherent deficiencies. In my opinion the best means of dealing with monopolies is to remove the incentive for creating monoplies, which is the lack of purchasing power on the part of the general public. There is not enough money to go around. Therefore there is a mad scramble to get every dollar before the next man gets it and hence an incentive to buy up your competitor because of limited purchasing power. If there were purchasing power in circulation equivalent to the price value of goods, consumers would be able to buy everything that was produced, no matter at what price. Therefore everyone could stay in business.

Our Conservative friends have been advocating the removal of controls. They have been quite insistent about that and I have a great deal of sympathy with them. Personally I have not yet made up my mind completely on the subject, but if it leans in any way it is in the direction of removing controls. The problem my Conservative friends would be faced with is the problem I have outlined. Even though controls are removed, the system would not be self-liquidating. It does not generate enough purchasing power to buy back its own product. Merely lifting the controls in order that we may have great production is not going to solve the problem of distribution. Industry cannot bring about its own distribution. The system is not self-liquidating.

In conclusion, I should like to say a few words about the means of achieving this objective. The Minister of Finance suggested that we must strive for unanimity as to the means. I wish to indicate in what way I agree with the means being used and in what way I disagree. First, I wish to say a few words in connection with the dominion-provincial conference. From what he has said, the minister has left the impression that it would be impossible for the dominion to discharge its responsibilities as it should without securing greater taxing powers than it has. I am not familiar with all the details in connection with that, but as a general principle I would disagree.

The provinces have come in for a great deal of criticism and have been blamed for wrecking the conference. It all depends upon the point of view of the critic, whether he is a centralizer or whether he is a decentralizer. Anyone who believes in centralization will naturally blame the provinces, because he will want to see greater and greater controls at Ottawa in the central government. Those who believe in decentralization naturally want the rights of the provinces to be preserved. I suggest that the dominion does not require any additional powers whatsoever to discharge all its responsibilities. I say the dominion has enough powers now under the British North America Act to discharge everyone of its responsibilities without expecting the provinces to surrender anything. I will go as far as to say that the dominion could carry out its obligations with respect to the people of Canada without any taxing power whatsoever except for the purpose of withdrawing redundant credits.

I know many will say that is taking in a lot of territory, but that is merely because they have a wrong conception of the purpose of money and of what the relationship of money to wealth ought to be. I say that if the dominion government would exercise the right which it has in connection with money it could avail itself of all the money it needed. According to section 14 of the British North America Act, currency and coinage are a distinct responsibility of the dominion government. Instead of exercising that crown prerogative, the various governments of Canada since 1867 have delegated piecemeal this most sacred of powers to the private banking institutions.

On previous occasions I have quoted Abraham Lincoln on that score, and I should like to do so again in order to indicate the tremendous significance of the power which a government has when it exercises its authority over the creation and issue of money. Abraham Lincoln is credited with having made this statement:

> The government should create, issue, and circulate all the currency and credit needed to satisfy the spending power of the government and the buying power of consumers. The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of the government, but it is the government's greatest creative opportunity. The people can and will be furnished with a currency as safe as their own government. Money will cease to be the master, and will become the servant of humanity. Democracy will rise superior to the money power.

The important sentence is, "The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of the government, but it is the government's greatest creative opportunity." If the dominion government were to retrieve that right and exercise it, the whole system of taxation could be abolished forever. If that were done there would be no need for centralization or nationalization and most of the problems would solve themselves automatically. I say the dominion government, by refusing to exercise this power and by not permitting the provinces to exercise their powers, is assuming a dog-in-the-manger attitude and one which certainly should not be tolerated in this country.

My final word, Mr. Speaker, is this. I suggest that we can agree on objectives nationally, provided that we accept the objectives which we suscribe for ourselves personally. If we do that, I believe that we can really unite on national objectives.

Mr. G. R. WEBB (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in expressing my views on the budget, after hearing a number of hon. members throughout the week, some praising and some condemning it, it is not my intention to praise it because I do not find enough in it to warrant praise. On the other hand, it is not my intention to condemn it in its entirety, although in many ways it falls miserably short of what was expected by the Canadian people in the way of tax relief.

In this budget I believe that the minister has made a sincere if niggardly effort to apply modern thought to the use of taxation. By that I mean that the budget takes tentative steps at least to go beyond the traditional usages of raising money and influencing sentiment and support. It would almost seem that a gesture is being made to influence the country's economic trend and the financial position of the individual to counteract the inflationary tendencies which are now so evident. This, of course, I consider a step in the right direction in the use of taxation, and it is encouraging to see that the government leans that way, although, mind you, there is a very long way to go before this gentle sway becomes a marked movement or a definite policy.

Not being an economist or financier, I do not propose to deal in detail with much that calls for what might be called higher criticism of the budget. I leave that to those far better qualified than myself, and it has been done ably already by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) but as a business man I want to direct the attention of the government to certain matters of principle closely affecting, and effecting, our national welfare and individual living.

I suggest that our national problem is threefold, and that the government has done little or nothing to solve its three main parts. First, there is the urgent need to help primary industry, namely, agriculture, fishing, mining, lumbering and the like. Second, there is equally urgent demand for encouragement and incentives for secondary and processing industries which use the products of primary industries; for the services which depend upon the activity and prosperity of both these groups; for the business that devolves from them. Lastly, there is the uncertain position of the individual citizen whose whole life and future depend upon national prosperity based upon sound economic principles carried out through sensible policies.

Primary industry, to my mind, is the base of our national economy. Prosperous primary industry releases enormous potential buying power to absorb the output of industry, the functions of the services and the activities of business. It brings prosperity to the individual. As a representative of a constituency vitally interested in agriculture, I want, with reservations, to give some credit to the government for its recognition—belated and inadequate as this recognition is—of the need to give practical aid to farmers. It is at least a move in the right direction. The wealth of this country is directly founded on primary industries, of which agriculture is the most important part, for it supports approximately one-third of the population of this Dominion of Canada. Other primary industries support another great fraction. The secret of all-round national prosperity is to assure that the greatest buying power of those engaged in primary industry is released.

Hon. members may wonder why I am talking so much about primary industry and industry and business. I am particularly interested in it for various reasons. One important reason is that it employs so many individuals in this country and it is so important to their welfare. Business must be strong and secure. If the top gets too heavy for it, or if the foundation is insecure, the whole structure will collapse. Furthermore, any prosperity that is not built upon this basis, and is not in proper relation to it, will come tumbling about us, for it is unreal and false, and a dream from which there will come a dreadful awakening.

The primary industries of Canada receive nothing like a fair share of the national income. Those engaged in them work hard for long hours, and they work under conditions that would stimulate organized labour into general confusion. Yet, because they are conscientious, and because they have a sense of responsibility, those who bear the brunt of primary industry—yes, those who produce our real wealth—are left to fight the battle of life pretty much alone. They are practically forgotten so far as government assistance is concerned. Our basic industries, upon which Canada must build for the future, are penalized at every turn, and this budget does practically nothing to rectify the grave injustices under which they labour. What is even more important and tragic, there does not seem to be any real indication that the government recognizes the desperate seriousness of the situation as it affects Canada and every Canadian.

I charge that the government has ignored the need to develop and assist primary industry, and that it has lamentably failed to use its taxing powers to build a solid foundation upon which to erect a secure and prosperous Canadian economy. It has done nothing to release the enormous buying power of those engaged in our basic industries. It has done very little to help those who produce our real wealth to attain better living standards and to have their fair share of the national income. I suggest that the little which has been proposed in this budget to better these conditions has been taken in a large measure from the politics and programmes advanced by the Progressive Conservative party, which has laid down as a fundamental principle that agriculture and primary industry generally must be encouraged and must be assured of their share of the national income. I can only hope that the government will find further inspiration in the policies of this party and will venture to do something realistic to support and encourage basic industry, of which agriculture is a most important part.

I have suggested that the government has done little for Canada's primary industries. If this be true, and I believe it to be, the government has certainly done nothing for the secondary and processing ones, for services and for business, which are a second part of our national problem. Nowhere in the budget can I find anything which is constructively helpful to business and industry. I must say this, that both business and industry must have encouragement to carry them through this critical period. We speak of this as a time of reconversion. This is a misnomer. We are not returning to pre-war status, and we shall never get back. We are in the throes of what might be termed a type of revolution. We are moving steadily away from the economic, social and political pattern of the past. The grave responsibility for the direction in which Canada moves rests upon the government. I only wish that I could have more confidence in the skill and knowledge which chart our course. We need leadership as never before. We need a carefully thought out, coherent and coordinated plan, and this government has given us none of these. The government drifts with every wind of temporary expedient to satisfy certain groups. There is no real programme or policy; and this budget is an example of its lack of intelligent planning. In this modern world, with its complexities and interrelated dependencies, there must be a plan to lead us and guide us. Nothing in national planning is of greater importance than taxation, properly used. It touches everyone. But the government is not using it intelligently. As I have already said, it has made only a nominal gesture toward helping primary industry. In fact, I cannot see where it gives any immediate help to industry and business at all.

As I see it at this time, secondary and processing industry, services and business generally, are hard hit and suffering from the unrest and insecurity inevitably attendant upon revolutionary changes in thinking and conditions. However, as good Canadians we must go on producing; our services must be maintained; business must be kept in motion; all must be given incentives to carry on until conditions stabilize.

[Mr. Webb.]

I submit that the budget does not give this help. Instead, it maintains crushing taxation that is unrealistic and paralyzes production. It discourages venture capital, and I believe hon. members all know what I mean by venture capital. It handicaps business and industry against research and development. It is based upon the mistaken idea that all Canadian business has enormous reserves that will more than offset current losses due to the vacillating policies of the government. It would seem that the minister must be bewitched by the oft-repeated assertions of some hon. members who hold that to be a "capitalist" is to be a "millionaire", which, of course, is entirely wrong. This sustained crushing taxation is dangerous in the extreme, and it is made more so—and that is saying a very great deal—by the government's practice of yielding to pressure groups. Production is being paralyzed; venture capital is frozen; industrial growth is a gamble; export development, which is so important to us, is retarded; day-to-day living for individuals is uncertain; prices are rising. These are all directly attributable to the government's failure to have a policy and the courage to stick to it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you, how can industry and business plan for the future when they do not know, or have no definite assurance of what lies ahead?

It is evident that the government has no real understanding of the situation and that it has no plan or programme. Loyal industry, and essential industry, are penalized. The budget does practically nothing for them. It even takes away the hope of making profits to recover losses.

I maintain that industry and business must have help and encouragement. Their tax burden must be lightened. They cannot go on operating under present unrealistic taxation and price controls. Production is blocked by the government's policies. If we had full production we should have less threat of inflation, because there would be an outlet for available money. There are too few goods for sale to-day. The solution is to have increased production and this solution is made impossible by the government's policies. Lack of production through present policies results in increased production costs, and in labour unrest and unemployment. Once industry and business feel that there is hope for the future; when the government "gives the green light", production will increase and unit production costs will decrease. This will allow business to recover some of its present losses. At the same time—and this is most important—increased production will give wider employment and provide the real answer to labour unrest. Our national labour difficulties and problems are, to some degree, directly traceable to the government's policies toward all industry. To stifle production is to raise the banner of labour trouble; to speed production is to bring about industrial peace and understanding.

Many thousands depend for their livelihood, directly or indirectly, upon industry of one sort or another, and the stifling of production, due to present government policy, is jeopardizing their security and holds the menace of substantial unemployment. Returned service men and others, setting themselves up in business and putting their gratuities and savings into store rentals and other overheads, are finding themselves in an untenable position owing to lack of merchandise to carry on, through no fault of their own. Such a situation cannot continue; it simply leads to financial disaster.

Before leaving this subject, I want to emphasize one other point. This new era into which we are moving is one that demands research by industry to enable it to keep up with competition in the rest of the world. There is no industry that I know of that can go on in the same old rut and operate successfully. Research costs money and yet it is essential. Government policies are forcing these people to limit research, which simply means that Canada will, in the end, fall behind other countries or become somewhat of an economic dependency of those which have had the foresight to encourage research and industrial expansion. I cannot imagine that is what the government wants; and I give it credit for a greater sense of national independence.

The future of Canadian business is the responsibility of this government. I ask what it is going to do to help stabilize and promote our business and to provide incentives for expansion.

The failure of the government to take proper action to assist business in the broadest sense of the term will, inevitably, work hardship upon the average citizen whose living is dependent upon them. We are already caught in the outer whirl of a spiral of inflation that is lifting living costs and promises to lift them higher in spite of the government's fine sounding talk about price controls.

Speaking generally, I believe Canadians fall into three groups: (1) Those who have some control over their income through their association with organized labour or through their ability to negotiate individual wage increases; (2) those who are engaged in primary industry, of which agriculture is a most important part, and are being penalized by the government and for whom little is being done; (3) those who live on so-called unearned income such as rentals, income from investments, endowments, pensions and the like. All stand to suffer from rising prices, and this fact is obviously recognized by the government by its action to raise the income tax exemption from $660 to $750 for single persons and $1,200 to $1,500 for married persons, effective in 1947. These exemptions should have been higher, and the best that can be said for this action is that it shows a realization that prices are on the upgrade—but it is only words. There is need for immediate help for individuals. This trivial increase in tax exemption will not help the individual taxpayer until he pays his 1947 taxes in 1948, which we must admit is extremely belated. It makes no special provision at all to help those who have no control over their incomes, which are steadily diminishing in buying power through no fault of their own. All these exemption increases could have been effected by sound government action in cutting unnecessary extravagance.

I should like to see how those who framed the budget would get along on the earnings of the average wage earner, out of which must be paid unemployment insurance dues, insurance, medical expenses, et cetera. What is there left to live on? It may be possible to eke out existence, but that is not living. What is there for recreation? For education of children? For savings against hard times? There is very little. Canadians are entitled to enough untaxed earning power to enable them to provide for some measure of self-security so that they can be free to build their own future and look forward to leisured, untroubled retirement on the results of their own work and thrift. As it is, this security, this living, is made well-nigh impossible because of the burden of taxation laid upon them.

Much has been said about security—the government says that it provides security. And what a security! We are a free people, or at least supposed to be. We boasted of that during the war when, with that as theme, the government refused to inaugurate conscription of man-power. Now that we have peace, the government is ready to repudiate freedom, and force this free people to a very low level, dependent upon the red tape and bureaucracy of the government for doubtful security. Why should those among our people who work hard and honestly be compelled to sacrifice their own security so that those who are unwilling to work shall be looked after on an equality basis? This is neither justice nor democracy.

I make special plea for those who are now living upon unearned income because they are the grain between the lower millstone of fixed income and the upper millstone of rising costs that bear down more heavily upon them all the time. I ask the government to think of the many thousands of such persons who are trying to maintain a decent standard of living in the face of inflationary price increases; of those who have looked forward to a time of leisure after years of battling and strife and economy; I ask the government to think of widows who are trying to raise their children as God-fearing citizens and in decent living standards; of the old; of so many who have no way to voice their plight and who are ridden over roughshod by a government that seemingly cares only for those who threaten action. Is this democracy when the quiet people are forgotten? Or is this an age of expediency when might is right and the only way to self-protection is by vociferous declamations.

Canadians deserve protection against rising costs. One way to give this is to raise the exemption for single and married persons respectively, and to correct the surtax level for unearned income. It is the least that the government can do.

It is vitally important that Canada maintain the standard of living of her people and not allow any section of the population to be dragged down. Our unearned income group is important to the country, and in all fairness to these people they deserve, and I claim for them, these exemptions.

As matters now stand, we penalize thrift and make retirement almost impossible. Yes, we penalize thrift. Maybe that is the underlying reason why the government does not practise economy itself. Certainly this budget does not show much evidence of economy and, looking around us, we still see government extravagance that knows no bounds.

Thrift is a principle of prosperity. The government preached thrift all through the war. Now let us practise it. One way to make our national revenues go farther is for the government to practise efficiency and economy within, by curtailing extravagance. Doing this would set an example to the country. But present government extravagance is only making conditions worse; it sets a bad example when it wastes money. If prices of essentials are to be held down, then let the government take a lead by holding down the cost, and price, of government. It is time that drastic action was taken to effect economies in governmental activities. Duplication of effort; multiplicity of commissions and boards; swollen staffs and all the rest of the extravagance found in government operation is being paid for by primary industry and the man on the street; by secondary and processing industry; by services; by business; by Canadian citizens—yes, paid for by everyone except the government that spends the money.

The budget that is presented to us should show economies in government operation; it should give help to agriculture and all primary industries, and assurance of a fair share of the national income; it should give incentive and hope to business and industry; it should relieve the tax burden from individual citizens. It should do these things. It does not do them, and I submit that, until it does, the government has failed miserably in its duty to the people of this Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WILFRID GARIEPY (Three Rivers) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the budget debate owing to the nature of the discussion and in view of the right I have to submit my ideas on the various propositions that are now before the house.

Speaking for the first time in this parliament, I deem it proper to use my mother tongue. I believe it is not too late to tender congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, and to your assistant the honourable member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) on your elevation to the posts you now respectively occupy and on the admirable manner in which you are discharging your functions.

The clerk of the house is not here at the present time. I should have liked to tell him that I think I voice the feelings of all the honourable members in complimenting him for being so hale and hearty, in spite of the fact that he has recently reached the age of seventy. Doctor Beauchesne is a credit to this parliament; he is a credit to his race, because he has succeeded in mastering all the intricacies of parliamentary science, and has become an authority on British institutions. I say that without any hesitation for quite a long time ago, we both graduated together from the same college. Here is a further coincidence: one of my fellow students at the law school of McGill university, Hon. Justice Thibaudeau Rinfret, recently came to this building in order to give the royal assent to certain bills, as substitute for the governor general.

I take pleasure in mentioning these names because a dishonest campaign, waged both in the press and by public speakers, seems to be seeking to spread in my province the belief that in the capital of Canada, one element only has its say; that the civil servants all come from only one province, only one race; however, when one takes pains to look for them, one finds French Canadian names everywhere such as, for example, at the supreme court, Hon. Justice Robert Taschereau; at the exchequer court, Hon. Justice E. R. Angers. This morning I went to the printing bureau. There, I found a former citizen of Three Rivers, enjoying the status of deputy minister, Mr. Edmond Cloutier. There is also Mr. Jules Castonguay, director general of elections; Mr. Felix Desrochers, parliamentary librarian, another of my fellow-citizens, born a short distance from Three Rivers; Mr. Gustave Lanctot, dominion archivist, a deserving and talented historian; Mr. Arthur Thivierge, member of the civil service commission; Mr. J. E. St. Laurent, at the national harbours board; Mr. Georges Bouchard, joint deputy minister of agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, this list of mine is possibly incomplete but the war having come to an end a year ago, and now that we are reorganizing the economy of the country, I trust that this government will see its way clear to appoint more of our people as deputy-ministers, or to spending departments, that have to do with management, with the spending of public moneys and with construction.

I must however pay particular tribute to the right hon. prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, for his recognition of our people's ability by appointing, for instance, former Justice Alphonse Turgeon ambassador to Belgium; Mr. Jean Désy to Brazil, Major General LaFlèche, former minister of National Defence, ambassador to Greece; Mr. Henri Laureys, a most worthy Montreal teacher, to Peru; Mr. Pierre Dupuy, another fellow-citizen of note, ambassador to Holland; General Georges-P. Vanier to old France; and Mr. Emile Vaillancourt, our friend of the good old days, to Cuba.

All of them owe their appointment not to favour but to their ability, their qualifications, their grasp of the day's problems. They have been appointed by the government to represent us throughout the world. I am proud of it and I wish to remind my province that under the present system, our leaders are imbued with the spirit of freedom rather than ostracism. When our own people possess the required qualifications, they are placed at the helm without hesitation.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to mention a particular matter. I come from the riding of Three Rivers. The city bearing that name was the second town founded in America. It is the most French in the world. Being catholic, its people follow the teachings of His Holiness the Pope, who was a guiding light during the war years and is now a beacon in peacetime, whose efforts tend to solve the grave differences arising at present. Moreover, he is a temporal ruler since the settlement with Mussolini on the question of authority. Therefore, I believe the time has come for Canada to send a representative to Rome, according to the example set by a great many nations throughout the world.

Incidentally, I wish to hurt no one, but my next observation may be rather unpleasant. This is a free country, and I do not intend to prevent civil servants from expressing their opinions, acting as they see fit, or defending their ideas. I wonder, however, if it is fitting to use my money and the taxes which I pay as well as those which are collected from my fellow citizens to pay the salary of a deputy minister who as lecturer and propagandist, disseminates throughout the country and even across the continent opinions and ideas contrary to all that we hold dearest and for which my conscience has but the deepest contempt. He is entitled to do as he pleases, but is there no limit beyond which civil servants are prohibited to behave as Doctor Chisholm has done recently? Since we are discussing the budget and the spending of public money, we must as far as possible use Canadian funds to pay those who serve the country, and I hope that the government will appoint Doctor Chisholm to some post other than that of deputy minister in the department of health.

I would refer now to a law passed a few days ago which was submitted to us by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) whom I deeply admire. I knew him in years gone by, before he became a member of the cabinet, even before he became a member of parliament. As a matter of fact, he never considered at that time the possibility of entering public life. By his own means and by his own talents, he has risen to an important position which commands the respect of all. Well, I ask the Minister of Labour not to crush the present unemployment insurance commission. I asked him not to dismiss its chairman, my fellow citizen, Mr. J. A. Trottier, who has always performed his duty conscientiously. He has always treated the public fairly and courteously, and he deserves a great deal of consideration. I trust that there will be no change in the set-up of that board.

I apologize for mentioning such matters, but it must be borne in mind that I belong to a minority and by their very nature minorities are timid and fearful. Indeed when the rights of a minority are encroached upon, it is lost forever, unless unforeseen circumstances enable it to recover the lost ground. We are compelled to fight inch by inch and foot by foot to defend the little we have preserved.

I notice that some hon. members seem surprised. They recall—as stated in the parliamentary guide—that I was elected as an independent, with the clear-cut explanation that I was of the Liberal school, that I was steeped in the Liberal tradition, and that I was in principle favourable to the government of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There are two kinds of independent members in this house: the independent members who always vote against the government of the right hon. the Prime Minister, and the independent members, like myself, who are ready to follow Mr. King as long as Laurier's pupil remains faithful to the programme, to the teachings and to the principles of Laurier, whom I have loved as a father and as a leader.

Mr. DORION: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GARIEPY: Yes.

Mr. DORION: Could he name independent members who always vote against the government?

Mr. GARIEPY: Will you please repeat your question?

Mr. DORION: The hon. member should give the names of those independent members who always vote against the government.

Mr. GARIEPY: You are one of them.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Everyone knows, and particularly the hon. member for Three Rivers, that what he has just said is false.

Mr. GARIEPY: Mr. Speaker, such a debate will not enlighten anyone. The opinions and the conduct of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) are known throughout the country. I do not hide my own views; I often spoke about nationalism and I do not repudiate it for it is a doctrine which has its good points. Nationalism never hurt the country, except once in our history. That was in 1911, when the so-called nationalists stabbed Laurier with the help of the Toronto Tories' finance, thereby disastrously concluding an alliance against the prosperity, the development and the progress of this country.

To my mind, the ideas of the official opposition party are unsound. They wish to Canadianize the province of Quebec, as their leader (Mr. Bracken) has said. We have no need of such a doctrine to be Canadians. We have for a long time been and we are still Canadians. Speaking in Quebec, the leader said, "Give me a Cartier." Quebec will answer, "Give me a Sir John A. Macdonald." Men like Macdonald and Cartier no longer exist. The Progressive Conservative party's doctrine reminds me of a crazy quilt. It is a mixture of an imperialism and a nationalism of doubtful qaulity, of a narrow provincialism and extremes of various kinds, that is somewhat similar to a Ku Klux Klan because I have often heard it said that the Anderson government in Saskatchewan was partisan of those who form to-day His Majesty's loyal opposition. For the benefit of those who would like to know what that means, I shall refer to the July 10, 1946, issue of La Presse where a correspondent from Quebec who visited Saskatchewan, wrote as follows:

> In Saskatchewan the French Canadians have had to endure vexatious measures under the Anderson government, besides other difficulties preceding and following their enforcement. Thus, the laws of that province forbid members of religious orders, both men and women, to wear religious habits or any religious emblems; they forbid the hanging of crucifixes on class room walls; they allow the teaching of French for a period of one hour a day only and merely permit that catechism be taught, one half-hour after school hours, when the pupils are tired and inclined to pay the least attention to the instructions.

Mr. HEON: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. GARIEPY: Yes.

Mr. HEON: Has any government of Saskatchewan, which succeeded the Anderson administration, changed the situation mentioned by the hon. member?

Mr. GARIEPY: Mr. Speaker, I shall not waste what little time I have in discussing other matters. I have but a few moments left to utter my remarks on federal policies and I cannot use part of them to answer the question that has just been asked. I shall merely add that to my mind the habit of a sister of charity, the cassock of a priest, are just as sacred as the uniform of a nurse of the Victorian Order or the uniform of a British soldier.

In the province of Quebec we were faithful to the teachings which were instilled into us in so far as communism is concerned. In our universities and our schools, long before the recent events took place, we had erected a bulwark against that nefarious doctrine. I have in my newspaper clippings an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette, the Tory sheet of Montreal, lauding Stalin, Russia's hero.

In keeping with those teachings, our province, once war had been declared, held fast and accepted all sacrifices in men, in munitions, in food and in money. In my modest town of Three Rivers all victory loans exceeded their objectives. Everyone, the rich as well as those of average means, responded to the appeal. In regard to the war itself, my youngest son volunteered and spent five years overseas, under enemy fire. We have accepted all that, Mr. Speaker.

(On motion of Mr. Gariepy the debate was adjourned).

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
