and I jotted it down. It's not often that we do see jokes in college papers, and when we do we should appreciate them. We should do all we can towards encouraging them and helping them along. This was by no means an ordinary joke. It was a joke worth putting into an atmanae, and if I were going to get up one, that would be the first thing I'd put into it. It was a joke worth putting into an atmanae, and if I were going to get up one, that would be the first thing I'd put into it. It was a joke worth putting into an atmanae, and if I were going to get up one, that would be the first thing I'd put into it. It was a joke, I've no doubt, of which anybody would be proud, and well he might be. But I won't keep you in suspense. Here it is. If you have tears to shed them: tears of langhter I mean.

"Cmsar says, in his "Commentarii de Bello Gallico," that all Gaul is divided into three parts; but it seems to us that a certain Young (!) man of this place has the whole three of them."

How is that I call that a pretty good joke. Of course, I may not have it exactly as it was in that paper, but you'l all readily preceive what it's intended for. It was evidently intended as a skit on that Young (!) man, whoever he was.

But that isn't all. There's a good deal of instruction in it. It tells us that Gaul of instruction in it. It tells us that Gaul of instruction in it. It tells us that Gaul of instruction in it. But that isn't all. There's a good deal of instruction in it. It tells us that Gaul existed away back, even in the old Roman days. This makes us interested, and we go and borrow a "Cuesar" from somebody and study it all up. There we find that Gaul really did exist, as the college paper says, but that there wasn't so much of it then as there is nowadays it can be maintained. college paper says, but that there wasn't so much of it then as there is nowadays. WHEREIN IS SHOWN THAT GALL HAS ITS USES AS WELL AS ADUSES AND THAT THE MAN THAT HAS NONE IS THE ONE TO BE PITTED AFTER ALL.

I saw a joke in a college paper once, and I jotted it down. It's not often that we do see jokes in college papers, and when we do we should appreciate them.

Some of them attribute the throat disease to tobacco; others to the paper used in making cigarettes; others still to the head of short pipes.
