Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—The Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament, a copy of which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the continued prosperity that prevails throughout the Dominion. Canada has received many blessings during the past year which call for the expression of our heartfelt gratitude to a kind Providence.

I had the pleasure of visiting London last summer in anticipation of the Coronation of His Majesty, and to meet on that occasion representatives from all parts of the Empire bringing with them assurances of the loyalty and contentment that prevails throughout His Majesty's widely extended possessions ; and though, at one time, fears were entertained that the King's illness would have involved a further postponement of the ceremony, it was a source of much joy and happiness to His Majesty's subjects that his health was so speedily and perfectly restored.

Representatives of this government participated in the important Colonial Conference which was called by His Majesty's Government in connection with the Coronation. The report of the proceedings of the conference, including the documents submitted by the Canadian representatives, has already been given to the public, by His Majesty's Government in London. I feel assured that much good will result from the bringing the leading public men of the great self-governing colonies into direct contact with each other and with the statesmen of the motherland.

The great influx of population into our North-western territories and the very large additional areas of fertile land which are being brought under cultivation combine to further press upon us the need for increased transportation facilities for the forwarding of our grain and other products to the markets of the world, through Canadian channels. The whole question of transportation and terminal facilities continues to occupy much attention, and my government will immediately appoint a commission of experienced men to report on the subject.

A treaty has been entered into between His Majesty and the government of the United States, under which the proper delimitation of the boundaries between Canada and Alaska is to be judicially determined by a tribunal of six impartial jurists of repute.

As a result of the recent decennial census, the representation of the different provinces must be re-adjusted, as required by the British North America Act, and a Bill will be introduced for that purpose.

Bills with respect to the creation of a Railway Commission, the amendment of the Patent Laws, the Militia Act, Chinese immigration, the reorganization of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the settlement of Railway labour disputes, and various other subjects will be submitted to you.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The public accounts will be laid before you and also the estimates for the coming year, which have been prepared with due regard to economy and the rapid growth of the Dominion.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I pray that in the consideration of these matters and in the performance of all the labours which will devolve on you, your deliberations, under Divine guidance, will tend still to increase the prosperity and happiness of our people.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the motion is carried, I would like to inquire of my right hon. friend when the usual explanations will be given as to the ministerial changes ? I think the course pursued last year was that the right hon. gentleman told us that he would give notice of a day, and subsequently he named a day on which the explanations were given.

The PRIME MINISTER. The first duty we have to dispose of is the presentation of an Address to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne. As soon as that duty has been accomplished, I shall be prepared to give the explanations immediately.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Mr. Raymond Préfontaine). If I may be allowed at this stage, I would like to give to the House the following information from Charlottetown, P.E.I., dated March 12th, 1903 :

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. ANDREW T. THOMPSON (Haldimand and Monck). Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada in reply to the Speech from the Throne. At the very outset, Sir, permit me to say that I keenly appreciate the honour which has been done me in imposing upon me this pleasant task—an honour which I feel must necessarily have been intended chiefly for the worthy constituency of Haldimand and Monck, which I represent. Haldimand, Sir, deserves well at the hands of this House—a House standing for the free institutions which we enjoy; for it was Haldimand which returned to the parliament of old Canada, on his coming back from his exile in the United States, that true Canadian patriot to whom we owe so much of our present day privileges, the late William Lyon Mackenzie. Assaulted in Montreal, burned in effigy in Kingston, mobbed in Toronto, it was for our quiet rural constituency to recognize in this man the true flame of patriotism, unadulterated by self-seeking or self-interest; and so, Sir, I repeat, the county of Haldimand deserves well at the hands of this House.

But enough of this ancient history; let me come to the matter in hand. Once more we meet together, Sir, with little to regret, with much to be thankful for, during the year which has flown away so quickly since last we gathered here—with little to regret from the standpoint of the nation, but with sorrow in our hearts for true comrades stricken down by the hand of death—one in the fulness of years, one in the glory of his youth, and all at a time of usefulness to their country—a country which they, irrespective of party, deeply and truly loved. Of national calamities, Sir, I am pleased to say we have had none whatever. No volcanic eruptions have overwhelmed, with inconceivable destruction, whole prosperous communities in one brief day; no earthquakes have wrecked our cities, burying the inhabitants in their ruins; no cyclones have swept over our country, leaving death and destruction in their path; no plague has stricken our people in their thousands with its rapid death; no famine has slowly tortured them to the end of all things human; no war has prevailed in our boundaries leaving in its track burned homesteads and maimed and wretched humanity. By the association of ideas one passes very naturally from the fact of the absence of war in our country to its happy termination in another part of the empire, far-away South Africa. How greatly has our realm increased, Mr. Speaker, within the last few years. Canada is no longer, a number of semi-discordant provinces experimentally strung together by an Imperial Act of parliament, but a nation well knit and well balanced—and more than a nation, a nation within an empire. And so it is that we find ourselves taking the keenest of interest in a war waged on another continent and at a distance of thousands of miles from our shores, and able not only to congratulate England on the termination of her war, but to congratulate ourselves on the termination of our war.

Even were this the proper occasion for so doing, Sir, time would be altogether inadequate for the discussion of the merits of the quarrel between Britain and Boer, which culminated in that struggle in South Africa. This much at least, we may feel sure of—that we, confident in the righteousness of our own cause, were no more confident and honest than our brave foemen, who believe firmly in the righteousness of theirs. And, on this common ground, at least, we may meet and agree—that war is in itself a shocking thing, and its termination on terms favourable alike to conquerors and conquered a matter for heartfelt thankfulness on the part of all of us.

Since the birth of this parliament, now some two years old, Australia has federated. We remember that, on an occasion similar to this, the gentleman who was then moving the Address, referred with pride to the fact that the successful union of our own provinces had, to a very large extent, actuated our fellow colonists in the island continent in taking that momentous step, In Australia, however, they have but one race. In Canada, we are fortunate enough to have two. And so we sincerely hope that, having set an example of political confederation to one part of the empire, we may now, by our historical record, inspire another great part of the empire in such a way that these recently diverse warring races may for the future dwell in peace and harmony in a united South Africa. And here, Sir, let me, very briefly, trace the history of French and English with a view to applying to this case the lessons which we gather from that history. It is but a century and a half ago since these imperial peoples were striving for the mastery with bitter hate. Each called to its aid the savage Indian as auxiliary, and in many a peaceful home women and children fell beneath the savage tomahawk or the bloody scalping knife, as the war-party of the one or the other made incursion in those iron days that are past. We know that after battles more creditable to the participants than these awful cruel forays fought by men brave and heroic, battles fought with varying success, won alternately by one and the other, victory perched on the banner of Great Britain; and, in 1763, by the treaty of Paris, Canada took her place among the family of young nations within the British Empire. What optimist, the most pronounced at that time, but would have prophesied nothing other than a century of strife and hatred, after a war so terrible as that which had just been concluded? But what was the event. In less than thirteen years after that, our French Canadian brothers repudiated with scorn the invitation to join the revolted colonies, and arming themselves to repel the invasion of the Americans, slew their leader below the frowning walls of old Quebec, and planted the British flag more firmly than ever on the ramparts of that world famous citadel. After less than half a century, came the war of 1812, that struggle of the few against the many. Once more our French Canadian brothers sprang to arms, and, under gallant DeSalaberry hurled back the alien foe at Chateauguay, a second time saving Canada to the British Crown. Very shortly thereafter, when our forefathers—then called rebels, now called patriots—took up arms for the achievement of those rights which they felt to be their due, Quebec, under Papineau, was no whit behind Ontario under Mackenzie, and, while both uprisings were for the moment failures, the seed watered by patriot blood has long since borne fruit in our splendid self-government of to-day, a self-government at the head of which sits our honoured chief, a true British statesman of French origin. And so, Sir, I think I may say that following a war so cruel as that I have described, when we find results so highly satisfactory, we are not mere idle dreamers if we look forward to the day when the two races in South Africa will be united as the two races are united here by ties of mutual respect and regard.

Among the chief event of the year that has passed one must give no secondary place to the crowning of His Gracious Majesty King Edward VII. of England, King Edward I., of United Canada. We can easily recall the sorrow that came upon us when we learned so unexpectedly that His Majesty had been stricken down with an illness which threatened to be fatal in its results, and I can assure you, that our loyalty to the King was increased by our sympathy with the man in proportion to this was our joy at his complete recovery, and I can say in all truthfulness that not one in all the long line of British sovereigns ever rode to the Minster with more sincere acclaims than did our King. From the standpoint of military representation, it is somewhat a disappointment to say that Canada was almost unrepresented at the King's coronation. But, for this, the untoward event of the King's illness was alone to blame. Composed of 657 picked men, the contingent of Canada almost doubled in numbers the contingents from the Cape, New Zealand and Australia, and almost quadrupled the forces from any one of these alone. I can assure you that if this contingent did have to come back owing to the fact that when the King's operation in June was announced we were assured on the highest authority that the coronation could not follow until October, it was not time and money wasted, for these men saw and were seen. Everywhere, in London, in Southampton, in Liverpool, they were met by people in huge crowds who turned out to give them welcome—to give them welcome as a demonstration of the feelings which were held toward them because of the achievements of our brave brothers in arms from Canada in South Africa, achievements freshened in the minds of the people by the recent events at Hart's River with which that whole country was then ringing. Now, Sir—and in making the remarks I am about to make I hope I shall not be accused of too plain speaking, or be held to belong too much to that modern school of diplomacy which believes in speaking the truth in the case of nations as well as individuals—I would call attention to the fact that five years ago a contingent was sent to England to celebrate the diamond jubilee of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, and it met with a hearty welcome indeed. But what a difference between then and now! In the former case we found that hospitality was the keynote and that, while the air was friendly enough, it was, to some extent patronizing nevertheless. This came as a surprise to Canadians, because, arguing from the historical record and from race ancestry they knew that they were the peers of any within the broad confines of the empire. But they learned that the English did not know it. Meantime South Africa had intervened, and what a change had come over the spirit of the times. Our English friends had learned to recognize the worth of Canadians, and, with that honesty and generosity which is characteristic of them when they do know, they were not slow to extend to us full recognition for the work our men had done and to give Canadians due equality. And so, in this case, our men had the satisfaction of feeling the new state of affairs, where to some extent at least, in the old days humiliation was their portion. And this brings me to that part of His Excellency's speech which deals with the colonial conference in Great Britain. It would be hard to overestimate the vast importance of the results likely to flow from a meeting of that nature—a meeting called together by the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain to take advantage of the gathering in London of so many leading statesmen from the outlying parts of greater Britain to attend the coronation. The work of this conference fell chiefly under three heads. First, the political relations of the mother country with the colonies; second, imperial defence; third, the commercial relations between the various colonies and Great Britain. With regard to the first, the colonial representatives felt in general, and the Canadian representatives in particular, that the existing political relations were satisfactory in the extreme. Under no conceivable circumstances could we enjoy greater freedom to take advantage of every opportunity to develop our enormous resources, and that for the present at least is all our people crave. In this connection it may be opportune for me to read the opinion expressed by the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain said:

> It would be a fatal mistake to transform the spontaneous enthusiasm which has been so readly shown throughout the empire into anything in the nature of an obligation which might be at this time unwillingly assumed or only formally accepted.

The good sense of that, I believe, must be evident to every one, and I cannot see why the sentiment should not have been carried further and applied to the matter of imperial defence also. This, I know, has been an oft mooted question. Various and many have been the schemes proposed in this connection. One frequently urged and strongly pressed has been the collection of a fund by taxation in the colonies to be handed over to the British government for expenditure, but I believe that such a scheme savors too much of taxation without representation to be popular on this continent where the application of that principle worked so great a trouble over a century ago. What money we have to expend must be expended by our own responsible ministers and by them alone, until that day shall come, which I fear is yet far distant—that day hoped for but hardly to be expected for some considerable time yet—when our own Canadian house is set in order in the matter of defence. The scheme propounded by the British government was the formation of an Army Reserve Corps in Canada, liable to special service across the ocean and specially trained, to be used by the imperial government in the case of war, but only with the consent of the colonial government to which the particular force belonged. At first blush the scheme, subject to that condition, seemed perfectly safe, but after all it was somewhat misleading. What colony would expend large sums of money in the creation of a force for a special purpose and then refuse that force to the imperial government when required? The acceptance of such a proposition would, as a matter of course, mean the granting the use of these men whenever the government which raised the force were called upon to allow it to be utilized. In the case of the South African war, we gave aid freely and spontaneously, but with the distinct understanding that our action should not create a precedent, and that we should be free to exercise our own judgement as to our course in the future. Were it not for that understanding, in what position would we find ourselves? Simply this that in the case of wars declared by the British parliament, in the declaration of which we had no say, which would be forced on us without our consent being asked, we would be in the very anomalous position of forced contribution, the equivalent of having consented to give up some of the rights of self-government which we so highly value.

As one having some experience in the matter of recruiting even for a twelve day camp, may I say, with all diffidence, that the raising of the Canadian quota, which was fixed at 10,000 men, subject to special training—which must take at least three months in every year—would be in busy Canada entirely impossible. I doubt if a tithe of that number of men could be got together to drill that number of months every year. Therefore, I think that our representatives were quite right in not consenting to the scheme propounded by the mother country. And, mark you, Sir, it was refused in no mean spirit, but simply because our representatives felt that they had a knowledge of the local conditions in Canada which the imperial authorities could not possibly have. And in order to convince the House of the absolute correctness of the attitude of our representatives as Canadians, let me read to you the closing paragraph of the memo presented by the Canadian ministers to the imperial authorities last summer. It is as follows:

> In conclusion the ministers represent that while the Canadian government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed, they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purposes of defence in proportion to the increasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures shall be so directed as to relieve the tax payer of the mother country from some of the burdens she now bears; and they have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the imperial authorities and under the advice of experienced imperial officers, in so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self government which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of imperial unity.

With regard to the trade question, our representatives reaffirmed the principle of preferential trade and urged its adoption by the colonies and the motherland, reserving the right, in the event of this change of policy within the empire not materializing, to take such steps as they deemed expedient. I may say, Sir, that while our leaders were sitting behind closed doors, we of lesser responsibilities had excellent opportunities of gauging the political sentiment of the rank and file throughout all parts of the empire—at least from every state, province and dominion in the self-governing parts of that empire—and delighted were we to find that the splendid men from Ceylon and the Cape, from New Zealand and Australia, stand heart and hand with us, seeing eye to eye, willing and eager for a lasting partnership with Britain, but too much of British blood to stand for one moment the slightest imputation of inferiority, building up in each new nation upon the sure foundation of equality a patriotism and a loyalty as wide and as deep as those seas Britannia rules. Tried in the furnace seven times heated these men have proved their worth, worth which ought never to have been doubted, for their blood is of the best, their environment of the best. No slum-bred men they, but for the most part each a laird on his own broad acres, independent of all save law and order and God, like the true British yeomen of old.

Now, I come to the question of the Alaskan Boundary Commission. That commission is intended to deal with the dispute between Canada and the United States regarding the boundaries in that far away part of North America, concerning which both nations are now at variance. At any time the discovery of rich gold deposits in those territories and the consequent inrush of miners might lead to a conflict of jurisdiction which would be most irritating and dangerous to the people of both countries, and therefore we view with satisfaction the appointment of this commission. We wish in Canada to live on terms of peace with the other nations of the world. We do not want one single foot of the territory of the United States, but I say with equal emphasis that we do not want the United States to take one single foot of the soil of Canada, and so we are well content with the scope of this commission which has to do with the ascertainment of what is a matter of considerable difficulty, but after all is only one of fact, and that is the deciding of where the boundary line actually runs. It is true that finality may not after all be reached for the reason that the jurists from each country who are to sit on this comission are equal in number.

But why borrow trouble ? This much at least we know, that the present attitude of the United States, from the standpoint of friendliness, is far different from the position maintained by it for so many years in contending that there was nothing at all to arbitrate. So we say that even should this commission fail, it is quite possible that the door would be left ajar for the entry of some other commission, the results of which may be and we hope will be, more satisfactory.

Now, Sir, for me to sit down with no mention of domestic concerns, concerns which more nearly affect us than those imperial matters on which I have been touching, interesting as the latter are, would indeed, in my opinion, be a mistake. And first let me say a brief word as to the very satisfactory influx of immigrants now pouring into Canada. We have, as you know, vast areas of fertile, habitable land for which we must have a population if Canada is to take her place, as we confidently expect her to take her place, one day among the great nations of the world. But, Sir, in my opinion there is something even more important than the rapid settlement of Canada, and that is the proper settlement of Canada. I would infinitely rather see people coming into Canada belonging to those two great races which hitherto have colonized our land, than to see it filling up with off-scourings from the cities of foreign countries, the very class of people we do not want.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is not only my sentiment, but I believe it is the sentiment of everybody on this side of the House, including the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton), who takes care that our settlers are all of the best. To what class do I refer, in chief ? The settlers that we are after are those able to till the fertile land of the Territories and Manitoba, yes, and of new Ontario and new Quebec, for we must not forget the undeveloped resources of the older provinces in our enthusiasm for the new. These settlers we want, and these settlers we are getting in many cases farmers with some means besides their own strong right arm, means which will enable them more rapidly to make wealth in time to come. And from what places are we getting these settlers ? From the inhabitants of the British Isles and the United States mainly, men living under institutions similar to our own, men speaking the same language, so that in a very few years they will be equally good Canadian citizens with ourselves ; and we will not have to wait, one, two or three generations for the complete assimilation of these people.

Now, Sir, the main and most important question for these new settlers, and for the old settlers too, for that matter, is the question of transportation. To what end the raising of 200 million bushels of wheat in the west unless the farmers there can get that wheat to market in reasonable time and at a reasonable expense to them ? And the very same remark applies to the mixed farmers of older Canada. These men must get their varied products to the seaboard quickly and inexpensively, or forfeit the markets of Britain and Europe. Therefore it is with very great pleasure indeed that we heard the announcement in the Speech from the Throne, that the government of His Excellency will immediately appoint a transportation commission to deal with this very intricate question, for the purpose of its betterment.

I am very glad also that a reference has been made to the Militia Act. Framed in times long gone by, and under conditions totally dissimilar to those of the present day, the Militia Act was very unsatisfactory to the main body of the force to-day, and once more we are made to feel that the old dark days for the militiamen in this country are now gone by, and that at last parliament feels that it can deal without loss of dignity with matters pertaining to the active militia of Canada. For that, Mr. Speaker, I thank the Speech from the Throne.

As to the Railway Commission, that of course will be a permanent tribunal. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council has in times past given tolerable satisfaction; but so great is the increase in our commerce that the work thrown upon that committee is altogether too much, even for their broad shoulders to carry. And so this commission should be appointed, following in this respect the example of other countries, of older countries, which have gone through similar commercial conditions.

Next, I come to a subject which I fear is a very debatable one, the subject of the Redistribution Bill. I hardly expect hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to hail with joy the announcement of the advent of this measure. I feel that it would be impossible——

Mr. MACLEAN. Is it going to be fair ?

Mr. THOMPSON. I was going to say that no matter how fair that measure may be, we can hardly hope to meet all the aspirations and longings of hon. gentlemen opposite, including the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). Therefore I will say this much, at least, that I think the government surgeon will make the necessary amputations and ingraftments as painlessly as possible, and that, true to our Liberal conceptions, we will, as is our wont, try to remove the existing abuses without creating new ones. Further than that I cannot go.

The first reference in His Excellency's speech I had designedly left to the last, and that is the question of the general prosperity of Canada. I have done so because this subject is an extremely pleasant one to all good Canadians, to those both on the right and on the left of Mr. Speaker. First, I think I may say that for the bountiful harvests, for the peace within our borders, for the absence of disease and disaster already referred to, we desire with all reverence to thank the Giver of all good. But in honouring Divinity, let us not forget humanity. Let us remember that, prodigal as nature may be in its good gifts, these gifts may be wasted by a government inactive or slothful, or they may be taken the best advantage of by such a government as Canada is fortunately ruled by to-day. Take the question of mineral lands in the first place. How rich are the mineral resources of this country ? It is Providence that has hidden these riches in the bowels of the earth, but it is the government that has supplied the facilities for using these deposits to the very best advantage. Why, Sir, away up in the frozen Yukon—which, by the way, is now for the first time sending a representative to these legislative halls, a gentleman both able and affable—away up in the frozen Yukon, law and order are maintained as they have never been maintained before in a similar territory under similar conditions ; and for that we thank the government. The miner and his hard-earned gold are as safe in the streets of Dawson City as in any other part of the world. The same remark applies to the outlying camps in British Columbia and in New Ontario. More than this, not only has the government afforded protection to the miners in their industry, but it has helped them in another essential respect by reducing the prices of what they consume, and of the raw material that they use in their industry, by the improved tariff now prevailing. So we say that nature and the government are working hand in hand, the one supplying the ores and the other supplying the facilities.

Next we come to our forest resources. Who, a few years ago, was doing anything for the development of the pulp wood industry of Canada, an industry now running up into the hundreds of millions ? Our spruce forests are not necessarily a disappearing quantity, for the reason that this wood reproduces itself so rapidly that only thirty years have to elapse from seed time to harvest. With regard to lumbering proper, the magnificent prices recently received here in Ottawa for limits in this neighbourhood, are the very best gauge of the prosperity of this great Canadian industry.

The fisheries, Sir, have increased with everything else in Canada, but we cannot look forward to their increasing to the same extent as some other industries because they are very long established and they have been very successfully worked, but even if that is the case I am told that we do not yet realize a fraction of Canada's wealth. We have our magnificent halibut beds, deposits, or banks—which shall I call them, I ask my friends from the sea—I suppose banks, recently discovered on the coast of British Columbia. We know that railways projected to James Bay must soon be built and that when they are built these inland seas will be opened up by the enterprising fishermen of Canada. We know that James Bay and Hudson Bay have an area three times as great as the North Sea and from the North sea in Europe every year upwards of $150,000,000 is taken in fish. We do not know these inland seas as I hope some day we will know them, but we are informed that cod and other fish of value are found there and we hope very shortly to take more advantage of these great seas which we possess. The government have not been idle, for they have provided the fishermen with cold storage for their bait so that they may take advantage of the run of fish all through the year, where before they were only able to work a little more than half that time.

In matters of marine Canada is bound to be a great country because she has large inland and outland seas. Here again prosperity on the lakes is very marked and the Department of Marine and Fisheries are doing everything they can to promote it by improving the harbours and channels and providing better lighthouses and buoys. Coming to manufactures, while we must congratulate ourselves that in the six years from 1891 to 1896 inclusive, the exports of Canada increased in all about $45,000,000, it is a matter for still greater congratulation that in the last six years they have increased by some $80,000,000. We have confidence in the ability of our captains of industry, in the intelligence and strength of the armies of workingmen whom they command, and so we say: On with the good work; go forth and conquer the markets of the world as your British forebears have done in days gone by.

As to farming, which I have left to the last because it is the great basic industry of Canada, in Ontario alone a billion dollar trust, I may say in sincerity, being the representative of an agricultural constituency, that while my heart warms to all the toilers of Canada, it grows warmer still towards the farmers, the men who till the soil. What a splendid prospect is theirs? It does one good to think of it. While the mortgages are going off the farms the bank barns are going on the farms, the savings bank deposits of the farmers are increasing, their houses are comfortably furnished, their children well educated, and we find prosperity everywhere—prosperity everywhere. I am free to confess that the bountiful crops of the past two years, added to a better knowledge of agricultural processes, have in a large measure been responsible for this improvement, but I assert also that the destruction of the cattle embargo in connection with the trade of the United States and the better system of cold storage in connection with our trade with the mother country, have to a large extent supplemented nature in her bountiful gifts and have brought about this better state of things for the toilers of Canada. So, Sir, summarizing the whole matter, we come to this, that our policy after all may be summed up in a phrase now tolerably well known—'Canada for the Canadians,' not Canada for some Canadians, but Canada for all Canadians—Canada for the miner and the mariner, Canada for the fishermen and the lumbermen, Canada for the manufacturer and the farmer with special privileges to none and equal rights for all.

In conclusion, with no war clouds hanging on our boundaries, with no serious domestic questions of race and religion such as we find in the Balkan provinces threatening our domestic peace, with capital and colonists seeking us where before we were the seekers, with waters, mines, forests and farm producing abundantly, with a government strong and united, administering impartially the free institutions of a liberty-loving people, with a king wise and gracious, possessed of a prime minister loved and revered by half the people of Canada, and honoured by the whole, we may well say it is good to be a Canadian, for verily we have a land flowing with milk and honey, and our lines are fallen unto us in pleasant places.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, to quote Monsabré, 'Harmony implies numbers; by itself a note may be sound, it does not give harmony.' Hence that old-time usage which enables me to repeat in my own tongue what my friend, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has so well expressed in his. While I appreciate the honour thus conferred on the constituency which I represent, I realize that the task entrusted to me is rather a difficult one for me to fulfil. I have accepted it, however, counting on the full measure of the indulgence which the House will grant. This, Canada's foremost assembly, should also be the one nearest to perfection. Its members may and should differ as regards points of management, but they are all bound by the same fruitful love for the institutions which govern us.

A policy, to be considered good, need not be accepted by all—including the Opposition. If it were so, no policy could be called good. A good policy is one which ensures general prosperity, and that we enjoy. It cannot be gainsaid that since 1896 our economic conditions have steadily improved. To convince ourselves of the truth of this statement, we have only to consider for a moment the three phases of our industrial activity : Agriculture which supplies the raw material ; manufactures, which transform it, and commerce, which distributes the goods.

And, first of all, let us take agriculture, undoubtedly the primary and most important of the sources of production. For several years past our farmers had been left in painfully straightened circumstances. Those whose property had so far escaped the bailiff's hand, were intent on giving up farms inadequate for the support of their families. The exports of agricultural products, which in 1878 amounted to $18,000,000 had fallen in 1896 to $14,000,000. Scarcely had the Liberals come into power than affairs took another turn ; exports of farm products increased, reaching in the course of the last fiscal year the sum of $37,000,000.

Then, the manufacturing industries, whose ruin had been predicted, found a wider outlet in the home markets, while their exports rose from $9,000,000 in 1896 to $18,900,000.

Internal trade was in a bad way, as evidenced by the number of failures reported ; it is now once more sound and flourishing. Transportation facilities have become inadequate for the requirements of our trade. Shares of our large transportation companies are sold at a premium on the stock exchanges of the world.

As a last result, our export and import trade which, in 1896, aggregated $239,000,000, reached in 1902 the figure of $423,000,000, an increase of $184,000,000 in the course of the six years of Liberal rule, while for the eighteen years of Conservative rule, the outside trade had increased by only $67,000,000.

Last of all, by virtue of the principle that thrift engenders riches and plenty, the putting into operation of all the country's resources, coupled with good business management, has brought about an era of unprecedented prosperity and enabled our Finance Minister to announce each year a handsome surplus.

For that prosperity, we should thank Providence ; without its help, our efforts would have been of no avail. It is a principle which the Opposition have deeply impressed on their minds. However, I fear they are going too far when they endeavour to show that it is solely through Providence, independently of human effort, that these results have been achieved. They who so often taunt the government on account of short memory, forget that in 1877, when this country, like many others, was undergoing a severe economic crisis, the Conservative party took occasion of the condition of affairs to call for a change of rule. They forget also that 1897, when the present tariff went into force, they predicted the direst calamities as the outcome of it.

I do not mean to say, however, that in the mind of the Liberal party, all things are at their best, and that it only remains for the government to rest on its laurels.

Certainly not. We know that dormant waters breed death, and it is only by incessant tossing that the waters of great rivers retain their sweetness and freshness. Our efforts, then, should tend unsparingly to perfect the work without altering the substance. As the ancients said : 'Motus alit, non mutat opus.' The changes or reforms which it would be desirable to bring about are numerous.

The face of our western country is rapidly changing. It is being invaded by a throng of European settlers, and—a fact which should be a matter of congratulation to us—the great neighbouring republic which for so many years boasted of annexing us piecemeal, is now sending to our country thousands of settlers who take over with them some capital and the help of their strong arms.

The sudden increase in the output of farm products explains the inability of railways and inland navigation companies to keep up with the requirements of the trade. The providing of new transportation facilities for the purpose of handling our surplus production and at the same time opening up new districts, is one of the features of the government's programme.

Transportation agencies lose much of their usefulness if they do not provide the service which is wanted or if they exact exorbitant rates. The public will learn with gratification that a railway commission has been constituted, which, it is hoped, will remove all grievances in that connection.

These transportation facilities having been provided in the public interest should be available at all times. Labour disputes in connection with the operating of railways are of interest not only to the shareholders and employees of such railway companies, but to the general public as well. In order that business be not brought to a standstill, it is necessary that the government should provide some reliable system of arbitration.

Then, again, as a member from the district of Montreal I am gratified to learn that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is to be re-organized. The present government has done a great deal to improve the Montreal harbour. They realized that from the very nature of things, Montreal is Canada's seaport. Situated as it is at the outlet of the great lakes, at the innermost point that can be reached by sea-faring vessels, it is the meeting place of merchants from all parts of the world. I am confident the House will be willing to allow the Marine Department to exercise more complete control over our harbour and the great natural highway leading to it.

However satisfactory the state of our internal affairs, we should not lose sight of those international questions which concern us. The most important is, no doubt, the Alaskan boundary question. When, in 1867, Russia agreed to give away to the United States that vast territory of Alaska for 37,000,000 francs, people in Europe wondered what could have induced such action. 'The explanation offered, says Elisée Reclus, was the desire on the part of Russia, then unfriendly to Great Britain, to show her sympathy for the United States, and to lay the foundation for future strife between two neighbouring states.' Two serious disputes have already arisen out of this cession: One relative to the Behring sea fisheries, has been, fortunately, settled; the other, relative to the boundaries, is now pending.

I am sure the House has learned with satisfaction that a treaty had been signed having for its object the settlement of this dispute. Statements have appeared in the newspapers to the effect that the treaty was one-sided, but no evidence has been furnished to support these statements. It has been said that the treaty had not been passed in good faith on the part either of the United States or of the mother country; that in virtue of a secret understanding, the jurists appointed by the United States were not to render any decision contrary to the interests of their own country, while the representatives of Great Britain were to concede everything. However, the provisions of the treaty, as I read them, seem to exclude the possibility of such an understanding. By submitting the question to three jurists from each country who are bound under oath to give their decision in accordance with the facts, neither of the contracting parties could have in mind to deceive the public. To make such a supposition is gratuitiously to insult two great nations. Why should they resort to such shameless trickery, the result of which would be to debase them both in the eyes of the world, as well as the members of the court appointed by them? Could they not have resorted to arbitration? Secret instructions may be given to arbitrators, not to jurists. Such are the reasons which make me believe that the treaty was initiated in good faith. Let us hope that it will be carried out in the same spirit. Let us hope that the press in both countries will show a spirit of fairness and refrain from any attempt at influencing the court.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) who takes special interest in military matters, has recalled an event which has been a cause of rejoicing throughout the country. I refer to the happy termination of the war in South Africa. The best minds were at variance as regards the justice of this war, a point which future generations will be in a better position to decide than we. However, the terms of peace, in the opinion of all, have been such as the world would expect the victor to grant to a courageous foe. The time is no longer when the conqueror could haughtily proclaim: 'Vae victis.' The enemy who has laid down arms is entitled not only to life, but to all that makes life worth living, that is to say, honour and liberty. By doing homage to a fallen foe, by pardoning generously, by closing its ears to suggestions of vengeance and listening only to the voice of mercy, Great Britain has at once regained the sympathy which she had lost at the outset of hostilities; so true is it that justice elevates nations.

That generous treaty was the forerunner of an event equally glorious. I mean the coronation of His Majesty King Edward VII. In congregating so readily to witness this great celebration, British subjects realized that it was not so much the apotheosis of one man for whom they have the greatest admiration, they saw in it the bright symbol of the union which is to bind the king with the nation. Indeed, when the king appeared before his people in Westminster Abbey and was met by that loud acclamation: God Save King Edward, a new compact was entered into. On the one hand there was the king pledging himself to observe the usages of the kingdom; on the other, there was the people of Great Britain renewing their faith in her governmental institutions; there was the people living in the colonies, proud of the liberty and self-government which they enjoy, asserting their loyalty to the British flag. Whatever was of a nature to enhance the friendly relations existing between the colonies and the mother country and between the various colonies, was a thing to be fostered. Whatever would alter the nature of these relations, was a thing to be avoided. Our government understood it so. More than once it had proven its devotion to the mother land; but at the same time as it accepted the invitation to take part in the Colonial Conference, it refused to discuss the question of contribution to the war expenditure of the empire, making clear its determination not to render compulsory deeds which had been accomplished voluntarily. That decision had been made known to the House at the preceding session and no exception had been found to it. Had we consented to share in the wars of the empire, our political future would have been jeopardized. Practically it would have been handing back to the authorities in Downing street the privileges which half a century of struggles have won for us. The wars which England is constantly waging in her various colonies do not concern us directly. We have nothing to do with the government of these colonies, neither are they governed on our account. Nothing could be more in contradiction with the principles of our government than for us to undertake to meet an expenditure to which we have not been called to give our assent. George III. lost his American colonies for having ignored this principle. An ill-fated day it would be when Great Britain would compel us to share in the expenditure incurred in her wars of expansion. British connection would thus become too burdensome and would inevitably be severed before long.

I understand that for the Britisher, who has been only a few years in America, the interests of England remain paramount. But for the great majority of our people, for those whose ancestors opened up the country, for those who can say like the Roman orator 'Here are the footprints of my forefathers,' in a word, for the Canadian-born, whatever their origin, while their loyalty is assured to England, their energy, their prospects, their feeling all centre in Canada, their home their native country.

Such are, Mr. Speaker, the sentiments which the eloquent spokesman of Canada, the hon the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) expressed at the conference. Unfortunately the weariness of a long journey across the sea had impaired his precious health. I am sure I am voicing the feelings of my colleagues on both sides of the House when I say that the whole country, made anxious by the news of his failing strength, rejoices now to find him restored to health and capable of resuming the management of public affairs.

I have then much pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, let me, in the first place extend the congratulations of myself and my friends to the right hon. the Prime Minister on his restoration to health. We are very glad indeed to know that his trip to the south has resulted in so very great an improvement to his physical condition, which was somewhat impaired by the toils, and I suppose also by the festivities, which he had to undergo during the past summer. I may say to you, Sir, and to the right hon. gentleman and his friends, that, however, sharp our political differences may be, no one will rejoice more heartily than my friends and myself at the good news that has come to us of the right hon. gentleman's improvement in health.

Let me also, Mr. Speaker, congratulate the mover and seconder of the address on the very eloquent speeches which they have delivered this afternoon. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson), always speaks well, and this afternoon he was even more eloquent than usual. I do not know quite, to what an extent he was willing to attribute to the present government the fact that we have been free from volcanoes and cyclones in this country during the past year, but I suppose it would be only in line with certain arguments which we hear on the public platform had he announced that our immunity from these evils has been to some extent at least due to the fact that there is a Liberal government in power in this country. I notice that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson), whom I had the pleasure of meeting on certain public platforms recently——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, it is always a pleasure to meet my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) was inclined to give to a certain extent some credit to Providence for our prosperity, but I notice that he put the government a long way ahead, and Providence as a very bad second.

My hon. friend the mover of the address, referred to certain losses which this House sustained during the past year. I think we have to mourn the absence of four members, one on this side of the House and three on the other. My friend, the late Angus McLeod, who has been cut off in the prime of life, was a man who, while he did not take a very prominent part in the debates of the House, held a very high position in the business community of this country, and I believe he had the respect and esteem of every man on both sides of the House. The same is true of my late friend Dr. Horsey ; a gentleman who gave promise of very great ability in public life ; a gentleman who was cut off by a most unfortunate accident in the very prime of manhood, and whose death we on this side of the House deplore as much as our friends opposite. The revered figure of the late Dr. Christie is now missed from amongst us. He was a gentleman whose presence in this House dated from a very long time ago ; a gentleman who was honoured and respected on both sides of the House, and a gentleman whose loss I am sure we all deplore. The fourth hon. member whose absence we have to mourn is Mr. Maxwell, the late member for Burrard. My own personal acquaintance with Mr. Maxwell was not very great, but I am sure that his loss will be felt by the House as a whole and especially by my friends on the other side.

Now Mr. Speaker, with regard to the speech which has been placed in the mouth of His Excellency, I would like to call the attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the fact that there is no reference in that speech to a matter which was considered worthy of mention in the speech of last year. I refer to the proposed conference—not the colonial conference—but the proposed conference between the representatives of the government of this country and the governments of Australia and New Zealand. The speech of last year read as follows :—

I have also pleasure in informing you that the government of Australia and New Zealand have accepted an invitation from my government to attend a conference in London next June for the consideration of trade, transportation, cable and other matters of intercolonial concern, and it is hoped that the meeting may lead to an extension of Canadian trade with those important portions of His Majesty's dominions.

I gather that that refers to an entirely distinct meeting from the colonial conference which had been summoned by the right hon. Mr. Chamberlain ; and I would like to ask the Prime Minister to state whether or not the expectations which were held out in the speech from the Throne last year have been in any way realized, and whether or not any progress has been made in these important matters as a result of that invitation which was extended by this government to the governments of the other colonies which I have named.

As to the colonial conference which has been held during last summer, that indeed, as my hon. friend from Haldimand has said, was an important gathering. I have examined with some interest the report of that conference which has been issued by the imperial government, and I am a little surprised to find that in respect to 23 subjects and motions which were made before that conference either by representatives of the imperial government or of the colonies, Canada took the initiative in not one. It does seem strange that the representatives of this country, the greatest colony of the empire, should sit supine while these matters were being brought to the attention of the whole world ; should not have a single suggestion to make, not one motion to put forward with regard to the very important subjects which were brought to the attention of the empire and of the world at that meeting. I may say that the only motion made by Canada at that conference was a formal vote of thanks to the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain at its close, moved by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this conference has a very important place, not only in the history of Canada but of the empire, and I desire to express my regret that it has been so barren of results in regard to matters in which Canada is deeply interested. In the first place, if there is one subject more than another which it was important to discuss at such a conference, it is the question of preferential trade within the empire. We all know the history of that question in this country. We all know that the Conservative party, as far back as 1892, brought a motion forward in this House affirming the advantages of mutual trade preferences between the mother country and the different parts of the empire. We know the stand which my hon. friends opposite took on that occasion, and we know the stand that was subsequently taken by the party of which the right hon. gentleman is and was then leader. In 1896 the right hon. Prime Minister, speaking for his party, or rather the party speaking through him, told the people of this country that they were as much in favour of preferential trade within the empire as was the Conservative party; and the Liberal party at that time promised to the country, through my right hon. friend, that if they were returned to power they could do as much, and would do every thing that they could to bring about the consummation of that great idea. Well, Sir, what happened? My right hon. friend went to London in 1897, and the government of Canada, speaking through him, told the people of the mother country that Canada did not want any preference in the markets of the mother country. The government is responsible for these utterances, and it is against the government that I now bring this charge. But that is not the last of it. After the Prime Minister had spoken on that occasion, one leading English statesman said that the idea of preferential trade within the empire or of an imperial zollverein was to be approached with all the reverence due to a corpse. Another great English statesman said that after Sir Wilfrid Laurier's utterances he would not touch the question even with a pair of tongs. The Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher), speaking in Great Britain in 1901, repeated the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1897. And last year, when food products were for the first time in many years taxed by the imperial parliament, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked whether or not it was proposed to exempt Canada either wholly or partially from the operation of this tax. The gentleman who propounded that inquiry was told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Canada was not to be exempted because Canada did not desire any exemption. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has a record on this also. My hon. friend caused himself to be interviewed on this subject at a time when Sir Charles Tupper was propounding the idea throughout Canada that a preference of this kind might be obtained, to the great advantage of Canada, and that all Canadians should join together for the purpose of bringing it about, if possible ; and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance expressed himself in that interview as follows :—

> There are three points which Sir Charles Tupper would like to make, but in not one of them is there any foundation for his efforts. He continues to talk about the Conservative party obtaining a tariff preference for Canadian products in England ; that is to say that Great Britain would impose duties on foreign foodstuffs while admitting those of Canada free. This is an old cry with Sir Charles Tupper, but no one knows better than he does that it is arrant humbug.
> Everybody who has had a correct view of English public opinion has been and is still aware that such tariff legislation in Great Britain for the present or the early future is impossible.

Why, within a few months, or within a year at least, after that, the imperial government had done the very thing which my hon. friend said was arrant humbug ; and within eighteen months after that, my hon. friend with his leader in London, was asking the imperial government to adopt that very policy. That does not seem to exhibit a very great degree of foresight on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. The speeches which were made by the colonial representatives at the Colonial Conference have not been published. It has been said by a member of the imperial government that they were suppressed at the suggestion of the colonial representatives. Might I ask my right hon. friend whether or not the Canadian representatives made any suggestion looking to the suppression of their speeches ? It would have been very interesting indeed to know what was the attitude of the Canadian representatives at that conference. How does my right hon. friend explain the fact that the Canadian representatives at the imperial conference adopted a policy with regard to this matter which had been urged upon this House time after time by the Liberal Conservative party, and which this government had called upon its followers to vote down over and over again ? In the session of 1900 Sir Charles Tupper moved a resolution in this House to the effect that Canada would never be satisfied with any policy short of one giving mutual trade preferences throughout the empire. That was voted down by our hon. friends opposite ; and when we proposed a similar resolution in 1901, and again in 1902, it met with exactly the same fate. But let use see what the representatives of Canada themselves proposed at that colonial conference. The report of the conference, at pages 37 and 38, contains the following language, out of the mouths of the Canadian ministers who were present :

Meanwhile the Canadian ministers determined to present to the conference a resolution affirming the principle of preferential trade, and the desirability of its adoption by the colonies generally, and also expressing the opinion of the Prime Ministers of the colonies that His Majesty's government should reciprocate by granting preferential terms to the products of the colonies in the markets of the mother country.

After calling upon their followers in the House to vote down the proposals made by us in 1900, in 1901, and again in 1902, they go to this colonial conference, and propose the very thing they had voted down and derided as a humbug. How did my hon. friend expect to get a preference from the imperial government after telling them in 1897 that we had given our preference to the mother country in return for the splendid freedom bestowed on Canada. How could we consistently, as I pointed out last year, go to the colonial conference and ask for a preference for Canada in the markets of the mother country after we had told the people of the mother country in 1897 that Canada wanted nothing in return for the preference we had given, because it had been given in return for the splendid freedom bestowed upon us. But I will continue to quote the expressions which the Canadian ministers put forth at that conference :

The Canadian ministers desire it to be understood that they took this course with the strong hope and the expectation that the principle of preferential trade would be more widely accepted by the colonies and that the mother country would at an early day apply the same principle by exempting the products of the colonies from customs duties. If, after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the empire, the Canadian government should find that the principle of preferential trade is not acceptable to the colonies generally or to the mother country, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions.

What is the meaning of the covert threat contained in the last sentence ? Will my right hon. friend, when he rises to address the House, or the Minister of Finance, if he speaks on this motion, tell us what is the meaning of this language ? We have been held up to derision and scorn in this House because we attacked the policy of granting a preference to the mother country without asking that there should be a preference to us in return. We have said that that preference should not have been given in pretended return for our freedom, that negotiations should have been carried on for a mutual trade preference throughout the empire, and that all our efforts should have been directed to that end, so that the whole empire, and Canada itself might in that way be strengthened. The jeers and scorn seem to belong rather to our hon. friends on the other side of the House at present.

If, after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the empire, the Canadian government should find that the principle or preferential trade is not acceptable to the colonies generally or the mother country, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions.

That means, if it means anything, that the Canadian government, after telling the people of the mother country that they did not want any preference in the markets of the mother country, have now come to the conclusion that they do want a preference, and, wanting that preference, they threaten the mother country with a repeal of the British preference unless a corresponding preference in the markets of the mother country shall be afforded Canada. It means that if it means anything ; and if it does not mean that, I will be glad if my right hon. friend, when he rises to speak, would be good enough to inform the House and the country just what that sentence is intended to convey to the people of the mother country on behalf of the people of Canada.

There is another matter connected with the colonial conference on which we would like to have a little information from the government, and that information we think we are entitled to. The President of the Board of Trade held certain conferences with the Canadian representatives, and at page 35 of the colonial conference report, we find this :

The result of the informal meetings with the President of the Board of Trade are set forth in the following memorandum :—

As a result of the communications which have taken place, it is understood that the representatives of the colonies hereinafter mentioned are prepared to recommend to their respective parliaments preferential treatment of British goods on the following lines :—

Canada : The existing preference on lists of cent and an additional preference on lists of selected articles—

(a) By further reducing the duties in favour of the United Kingdom ;

(b) By raising duties against foreign imports ;

(c) By imposing duties on certain foreign imports now on the free list.

That is merely a recommendation by the Canadian representatives to the Canadian government. We would like, and I think the country would also like to be informed, whether or not that suggestion has been acquiesced in by the government of this country, and whether we are to expect that that policy will be carried out by Canada ; whether or not it will be carried out without any corresponding preference to the products of Canada in the markets of the mother country, or whether it will only be carried out by Canada on the exemption by the mother country of Canadian food products from the tax which has recently been imposed.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, upon which I would like to say a word. We know that during the last three or four years Canada has been subjected to a discrimination by the German empire. We know that the German empire has imposed upon Canada a maximum tariff, while she accords to all other portions of the empire and to the United States of America her minimum tariff. This matter has been discussed more than once in the House ; it has been brought to the attention of the government ; and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance took the position of almost justifying the action of the German government when the matter was brought up by my hon. friend from Pictou some two years ago. We have pointed out to the House and the country that this discrimination is unfair to Canada, because it is a discrimination imposed, according to the expressed words of the German chancellor, because Canada has granted a preference to the mother country. We have also pointed out to the House and the country on more than one occasion that German goods have been coming to Canada under this British preference with very little value added to them in the British islands. As a matter of fact, under the Customs regulations which were read to this House by my hon. friend from Toronto last year, all that is necessary is to change the label on the goods and add a profit, and then they come to Canada as British goods.

On the one hand we have Germany discriminating against Canada, and on the other hand, we have Germany getting the advantages of the preferential tariff. Now, a very important statement was made, and apparently acquiesced in by the Canadian representatives at this political conference, and I will read it to my right hon. friend and ask him whether or not the Canadian government acquiesced in that statement, and if so, whether it is the view which his government entertains:

In connection with the discussion of preferential trade, the conference also considered the point raised by the Commonwealth government as to the possibilities of the colonies losing most-favoured nation treatment in foreign countries in the event of their giving a tariff preference to British goods. As, however, the exports from the colonies to foreign countries are almost exclusively articles of food or raw materials for various industries, the possibilities of discrimination against them in foreign markets was not regarded as serious, and as the exports from foreign countries to the colonies are mainly manufactured articles it is recognized that if such discriminations should take place the colonies had an effective remedy in their own hands.

Thus my right hon. friend and his colleagues have acquiesced in a statement that with regard to this German discrimination we have an effective remedy in our own hands. During the past three or four years we on this side have pointed out to the government that we have in our own hands an effective remedy. In 1891 we moved a resolution which pointed out that the government of this country had an effective remedy in their own hands, and that resolution was voted down by my hon. friends opposite and no action has since been taken by this government. Neither have we information whether they ever made any protest with regard to this treatment, and I desire now to point out to my right hon. friend that according to the view acquiesced in apparently by himself and colleagues at the colonial conference, this government has the remedy in its own hands, yet it hesitates to apply it. It suffers German goods to come into Canada by the hundreds of thousands of dollars under the British preference, and at the same time suffers Canadian products to go into Germany under the maximum tariff, while goods from all the rest of the empire and the United States go into that country freely under the lower or minimum tariff.

There is one other matter in connection with the colonial conference on which I would like to say a word. The colony of Newfoundland, immediately after the conclusion of that conference, was permitted to enter into negotiations with the United States for the making of a treaty, very similar in its terms to what was known years ago as the Blain-Bond treaty—a treaty under which, I venture to say, the interests of Canada would be very much prejudiced if it should come into operation. I would like to know from the right hon. gentleman what is the view of his government with regard to that. We know that when the Blain-Bond treaty was proposed, there was a strong protest against it sent from Canada to the mother country, on account of which further negotiations were stayed for the time being. Has this government taken any similar steps with regard to the present treaty? If not, does it propose to take any such steps. I think that the government might very much better occupy itself at present in negotiating with Newfoundland for the purpose of rounding off the Dominion by securing the entrance of Newfoundland into our confederation than in idle negotiations with the United States. That colony has important trade relations with many parts of Canada—not only the maritime provinces, but Quebec and Ontario as well. I believe that an arrangement could be made between Canada and Newfoundland which would be for the benefit of both countries, and I would like to see the government beginning those negotiations; and as a preliminary, I think that the government might very well enter into negotiations with the imperial authorities for the purpose of obtaining some honourable settlement of the difficulty known as the French shore question. Canada is interested in that question almost as much as Newfoundland. Canada would be specially interested if Newfoundland would become part of our confederation, and I hope to see that island enter the Dominion before many years. We on this side will give the government our cordial support in any movement to that end, and I hope that this government will take the initiative for the purpose of having this difficulty removed so that the island may enter confederation unhampered by any such difficulty as now unfortunately prevails on its western coast. I do trust that my right hon. friend will be able to give us some information with regard to that particular question, and to assure the House that the government is alive to the advantages which would accrue both to Canada and to Newfoundland by that island becoming a part of this Dominion.

My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has referred to the Alaskan boundary question. In common with every member of this House, I regret the position in which that matter stands at present. The attitude of this government upon it has been somewhat remarkable. Last year we submitted a motion for the purpose of bringing before the House and the country the papers relating to the abrogation of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, and the government took the ground that Canada had no direct interest in the proposed canal across from the Nicaraguan peninsula. My right hon. friend said that Canada had no direct interest in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or in the construction of the Nicaraguan canal—that she had no more interest in that canal than she had in the treaty affecting the Suez canal or in any other treaty between Great Britain and a foreign power. I take issue with my right hon. friend. I say that Canada had a direct interest in the abrogation of that treaty. What interest has the United States in the Nicaraguan canal? She has the interest of her possessions on the Atlantic and Pacific and of the share which she expects to have in the future great trade with the Orient. I leave it to every hon. member whether Canada has not precisely the same interest in that Nicaraguan canal as has the United States. Our interests may be of a lesser degree, but we have great possessions on the Atlantic and the Pacific and we hope to get some share in the great trade of the Orient in the future. I know of no portion of the empire which has a greater interest in this canal and in the abrogation of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty than we have. The attitude taken by my right hon. friend was not that of Lord Lansdowne because in a dispatch to the British ambassador at Washington in 1901, Lord Lansdowne referred to the interests of Great Britain in this Nicaraguan canal and in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by reason of her enormous possessions on the continent of America. The further language of Lord Lansdowne was quoted in the House last year. Lord Lansdowne said:

> Shortly afterwards Lord Herschell intimated that the difficulties with regard to the question of the Alaskan boundary seemed insuperable and he feared it might be necessary to break off the negotiations of which he hitherto had the charge. Upon this Lord Salisbury informed Mr. White that he did not see how Her Majesty's government could sanction any convention for amending the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the opinion of this country would hardly support them in making a concession which would be wholly to the benefit of the United States, at a time when they appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaskan frontier.

My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) brought that to the attention of the government last year. And these are very significant words indeed. Apparently, at that time, the British government had taken a stand that it would not be a proper thing to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without making some provision for the settlement of the Alaskan boundary. Now, I think it is due to the House and to the country that my right hon. friend should state frankly the influences, if there were influences, which led to that change of attitude on the part of the British government. And he should also, and more especially, tell the people of this country whether that change of attitude took place with the consent and concurrence of the government of Canada. I would not have brought myself to believe that the Canadian government had concurred, if it had not been for the language of my right hon. friend speaking for his government, which seemed to indicate that in his opinion Canada had no direct interest in the abrogation of the treaty or in the Nicaraguan canal. It may be that this government has concurred in the abrogation of that treaty without provision for the delimitation of the Alaskan boundary. All I can say is that, if the government has taken that attitude, I believe it merits the censure and condemnation of every true-hearted and loyal Canadian for so doing.

What is the position of affairs? The position is that Great Britain has made a treaty with the United States of America for the submission to six impartial jurists of the question of the position of the Alaskan frontier; three of these impartial jurists to be appointed by Great Britain and three to be appointed by the United States. Well, does my right hon. friend, or does his government, expect that there will be a verdict either one way or the other from a majority of these impartial jurists? What was the idea of the government on that point when it consented to this treaty? For I suppose that this treaty, which affects the boundary of Canada, was not made without the consent of the Canadian government. It is true it does not contain the provisions of the Washington treaty which make it necessary that it should be submitted to the parliament of Canada before it comes into force. Probably my right hon. friend will explain why that provision was not contained in the treaty which has just been made between Great Britain and the United States. The government have seen fit to make this treaty—it was made by the imperial government presumably with the concurrence of the Canadian government—but it is made without any reference to the parliament of Canada, and this parliament is helpless to touch the question one way or the other now that the treaty has been made.

Well, we have these impartial jurists to deal with this matter. And does my right hon. friend feel satisfied with the selection which has been made by the United States of America? It seems to me that the situation is rather an extraordinary one. I do not know, personally, anything about the three gentlemen who have been selected by the government of the United States; but I have a number of quotations from leading journals of that country which point out the fact that these gentlemen have, or at least two of them, prejudged the case. For example, the Detroit 'Tribune' says that the subsidence of opposition to the Alaskan treaty in the Senate is explained by the fact that word was secretly passed around who the American members of the commission would be, and the announcement of the names was a sufficient guarantee that, no matter what the Canadian case was, there was not the least danger that Uncle Sam would lose anything. This newspaper, the Detroit 'Tribune' also says:

> It may be assumed without the slightest hesitation that the convictions of these two gentlemen—(Lodge and Turner)—have been formed in advance and irrevocably. . . . If Secretary Root were to show any disposition to weaken or compromise they would doubtless break up the conference in a row before anything could be lost or gained.

That is the view which an important journal in the United States takes of the situation. Now, one of these gentlemen, Senator Lodge, a very prominent gentleman in the United States, is quoted in a public journal as having spoken as follows:

> The negotiations failed because Canada made claims in regard to the Alaskan boundary which the United States could not accept and which no nation with an ounce of self respect could have admitted. . . In 1867 we bought Alaska and the Russian title vested in us. For seventy years, in round numbers, that title was never questioned. Then gold was discovered. Then England set up a claim in complete contradiction to the treaty of 1825 which had been recognized for seventy years, and a more manufactured and baseless claim was never set up. If we should yield to it there is not a portion of our northern boundary which England could not attack. . . When an attempt was made to revive negotiations last spring, Canada came forward again with her Alaskan claim and President Roosevelt refused to recognize it, as any patriotic American would. . . . No nation can afford to surrender its territory on baseless claims.

Does my right hon. friend regard that as the language of an 'impartial jurist' about to pass on this question between Canada and the United States? Then the Minneapolis 'Tribune,' another leading journal of the United States, said:

> Secretary Root and Senator Lodge are men of high character, but they are not exactly the eminent and impartial jurists contemplated by the treaty. Besides they are connected with the government in such a way as almost inevitably to make them strong partisans of its case. Senator Turner is not even a man of high public character. . . Besides as a border senator, he is committed to the most extreme American interpretation.

And the Brooklyn 'Eagle,' in the forcible language which is sometimes found even in leading American journals expresses its view in this way:

> The chances of convincing American jurists of the rightfulness of Canada's claims are about the same as the prospects of a thaw in Hades.

The New York 'Commercial Advertiser' says:

> Secretary Root and Senator Lodge have been stubborn in believing that Great Britain has no reasonable grounds for claiming under the treaty between Russia and Great Britain any territory other than has been conceded all along. Senator Turner comes from the extreme north-western state where the feeling against yielding any Alaskan territory has always been stronger than in any other part of the United States.

The 'Literary Digest' says:

As there is no seventh commissioner, a deadlock is regarded as almost certain in which case the boundary will remain, until further negotiations, where it now is, and it now is pretty near where the United States claims it ought to be.

The New York 'Evening Post' says:

Mr. Root and Senator Turner and even more, Senator Lodge, lack judicial quality in all this Alaskan dispute. All three in time past have committed themselves unequivocally against the Canadian contention.

We believe that it would be a very fortunate occurrence should trifling indisposition or press of other duties require the resignation of Senator Lodge and permit the appointment of an expert historical geographer.

The New York correspondent of the London 'Times' says:

If he (Lord Lansdowne) has conceded anything he has conceded it with the full consent of Canada, nay upon her urgency, and Canadian views have always had weight, perhaps too much weight, with the British Foreign Office, on purely Canadian questions.

Now, the question is, what do the government propose to do after they have got the matter into this muddle? Why did they not in the first place take a firm stand as Canadian governments in days gone by have taken, and insist that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in which we were interested—because we are interested in the Nicaraguan canal—should not be abrogated until some fair settlement had been made, or at least, until some fair means of settlement had been found for the delimitation of the Alaskan boundary? Why did the government not take that stand? I cannot believe that if the government had taken that stand the treaty would ever have been abrogated as it was. The right hon. gentleman, however, will correct me on that point. But now that a reference has been made of the Alaskan boundary question to six men, what are we to do about it? Does the government propose to concur in the appointment of British arbitrators at all? I venture to suggest to the government of my right hon. friend that that may be a question for serious consideration. If we appoint the arbitrators we know pretty well what the result will be. The very best that we can hope for is an even division, but an even division will leave matters exactly as they are at present, with the United States in possession of the disputed territory, and will leave them in even a stronger position than they are at present, because they will be able to say that the matter had been referred to a tribunal which was unable to determine whether the present boundary was right or wrong. But of one thing I am absolutely certain, and that is that if Canada or the mother country do appoint arbitrators—and I doubt the expediency of their doing so under present conditions—they should not follow the example of the United States in this regard. If we appoint any one we should appoint men who can be fairly and honestly classed as impartial jurists. The fact that the United States have appointed men who do not seem to us to come within that category, is no reason why we should follow their example, because by doing so we would condone the course of the United States in the appointment of its arbitrators, and would place ourselves in the same position the United States occupies.

Now I think that the government of this country might at least have done one thing in regard to this matter which they have failed to do, and that is to take some effectual means of informing public opinion in the United States on this question. One reason why we have had so much difficulty in getting any reasonable settlement with the United States is that nearly everybody in that country believes that this is merely a trumped up claim on the part of Canada. Why did not the government of this country take some effectual means of informing public opinion in the United States with regard to this matter? They have taken a great deal of pains in proclaiming their political propaganda in our own country. If some of that energy had been devoted to making known the Canadian case through the leading journals of the United States, it might have been possible for us to make a better arrangement with the government of that country than we have been able to do. I regret the condition in which this matter stands at the present time. Whatever course the government proposes to take in the interests of Canada, even in the hopeless condition in which the matter finds itself at present, we will give them our cordial support. Upon a question of this kind the whole country should be united; and if the government, by means of a resolution of this House, or by any other means, desires to have its hands strengthened, even at this unfortunate stage of the negotiations, I am sure that I can say on behalf of every man on this side of the House that we are prepared cordially to sustain the government in any such course.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not much more to add. Reference has been made, in the proceedings of the colonial conference, to a proposal by the Canadian government to establish a local naval force. It is not necessary for me to read the quotations; my right hon. friend no doubt recollects what the proposal was. No reference whatever is made to that in the speech from the Throne. I would think it of sufficient importance to have merited a mention in the speech. Would my right hon. friend, in addressing himself to the House, be good enough to give us any information which he may think proper to give at the present time in regard to that matter, so that we may know what we have to expect.

Reference is also made in the speech from the Throne to the question of transportation, and to the fact that there has been a great influx of population into our north-western territories. I visited portions of the North-west during the past autumn, and I was very glad indeed to know that we are receiving a great immigration from the United States of America. We are all delighted to see that immigration taking place. Those people who are coming into that country are good citizens. They are, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has said, people accustomed to govern themselves, people to whom representative institutions are no new thing. I am not at all afraid of the influx of these men to the North-west. I am very glad indeed that they are coming in great numbers, and I hope that their numbers will be increased during the coming year. I hope also that the government will take into early consideration the question of granting provincial autonomy to those great territories in the North-west. Those territories are filling up rapidly, the people are all accustomed to representative institutions, and a great many of them, at least, feel very keenly now that they have not the complete rights of self-government which have been conferred on the people of the other provinces. I regret that no mention of this important question has been made in the speech from the Throne. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior entertains the view that it is not wise at the present time to deal with the question. I do not agree with him, I do not agree with the reasons which he has stated, I do not see any force in those reasons. I hope and trust that notwithstanding the absence of any mention of this subject in the speech from the Throne, the government will upon reconsideration bring in a Bill during the present session for the purpose of conferring complete rights of self-government upon the people of the North-west Territories.

But, in regard to the question of transportation, which is one of very great importance, I find that these words have been placed in the speech from the Throne, in the mouth of His Excellency :

> The whole question of transportation and terminal facilities continues to occupy much attention and my government will immediately appoint a commission of experienced men to report on the subject.

We will be glad to know what is the real significance of these words. Those of us who follow the trend of public affairs in the newspapers know that proposals will be made during the present session for charters to build transcontinental railways and it is also said that applications will be made to the government for subsidies, or other assistance, to aid in the building of these railways. I would like to ask my right hon. friend, what is the significance of these words. Do they mean that the question of these charters is to be referred to the commission; do they mean that the question of the subsidies or other assistance to these railways is to be referred to a commission? If that is not the significance of the language which has been used we would be very glad indeed to know what scope these words have and what is the purport of the measure that is to be brought before the House in that regard.

I suppose it could not be expected that we should have any reference to the tariff in the speech from the Throne, but I may say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we recall the fact that during the past session the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) practically announced to the House and to the country that there would be a revision of the tariff at an early day. I am not placing my own interpretation on his words because the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), speaking afterwards in the same debate said that the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance was a clear warning to every free trader in the country that the tariff would be revised and that the tariff would be raised. Certain events have transpired since then to which I need not refer, but which are intimately connected with fiscal questions. If my right hon. friend would give us any idea as to whether or not the language of the hon. Minister of Finance in his budget speech last year is to be taken seriously, and is to be regarded as an announcement to the country that a revision will be made during the present session, we would be very glad to hear from the right hon. leader of the government on that point. A great deal of the prosperity—of the alleged prosperity —of this country is based upon the fact that our trade has increased. While our trade has very greatly increased since 1896, so has the trade of every portion of the world. I have the figues before me and could give them at the present time if I though it wise. But, our trade may increase in Canada at the expense of our own industries. If a hundred of the leading factories in Canada were wiped out of existence at the present time, the imports of Canada would necessarily show an increase, but it would not at all follow that because the imports of the country were increasing the country was therefore more prosperous. We laid down our platform in regard to this question in 1901 and again in 1902, but that platform did not find acceptance with my hon. friends on the other side of the House. They disagreed with it very strongly and yet they do not seem to agree very closely amongst themselves. We stand on the platform which we laid down in 1901 and in 1902, and if there is not a revision of the tariff upon the lines indicated in the resolutions which we moved we shall again state our views in this House by a resolution during the present session. I am glad to say that we have won a convert even within the cabinet, and that is the youngest member of the cabinet, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine). That gentleman while my hon. friend the Finance Minister was declaiming in favour of a low tariff in the county of Yarmouth, was announcing to the electors of Maisonneuve that he was in favour of legitimate protection to Canadian industries. Now, this is a very important announcement indeed and the significance of his language is all the greater because he included the right hon. leader of the government :

> I am, as I always have been, in favour of legitimate protection to our national industries and like my leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier I will ask and require protection for the interests of the different classes of the population.

My hon. friend the Finance Minister would not be very much pleased with a platform of that kind, if we are to judge by his recent utterances in the province of Nova Scotia, but, of course, so far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned the hon. Minister of Finance may have an entirely different platform, and in the constituency of Maisonneuve I am inclined to believe that he would stand on exactly the same platform as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are one or two other matters perhaps on which a word might be said, but I think I will not take up the time of the House further at the present time beyond this : I am very glad indeed to learn by the speech from the Throne that the government proposes to bring down a measure in regard to Chinese immigration. My right hon. friend, in the campaign of 1896, made a pretty definite promise to the people of British Columbia in regard to that question. He said that the question was not a question in the east but that as far as Chinese immigration was concerned the views of the Liberals of British Columbia would prevail. Well, my right hon. friend has a majority from that province, a very considerable majority indeed —and the views of the members from that province have been pretty freely expressed in this House. Nevertheless, no measure in regard to Chinese immigration has been brought down up to the present time. I am glad that the government are at last taking this matter into their consideration and we shall be very ready indeed to give any suitable measure of that kind our most careful and earnest consideration. The people of British Columbia, or a great many of them, feel very strongly on that subject, and those who have gone from the coast to British Columbia can readily understand that we in the east do not have a real conception of what that question means to the people of that province. It requires one not only to study the question from the reports of commissions and otherwise, but it also requires a visit to the province and a free statement of opinion from the people whom one meets of all classes in the province to understand how earnestly and how vigorously that question appeals to the large and important interests in the province of British Columbia. This speech does not in the least indicate what the nature of the measure is, but when it comes down we will be able to give it our attention and to criticize it if necessary. In the meantime we can only express our pleasure that the government have at last, in the seventh year after they have come into power, seen fit to deal in an effective way, we hope, with this question which is of such great importance to the west.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall detain the House further at the present time. I trust that my right hon. friend will see fit to give us frankly—as frankly as the interests of the country will permit—information in reference to the matters which I have mentioned and I trust especially that in regard to the present position of the Alaskan boundary he will speak openly and frankly to the people of Canada in order that we may know just how we do stand in regard to the people of the United States on the one hand and the imperial government on the other, on a question of great importance to the people of Canada, one which concerns the possible loss of a portion of their territory.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the observations which the speech of the leader of the opposition call from me, I deem it my duty as it is my pleasure to at once thank my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) for the very kind reference which he has made to myself. I also thank his friends behind him for the manner in which they received these observations of his. I am glad to believe that this incident is a further evidence that the amenities of British parliamentary life are of so kindly a nature; and that in the hands of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition they are indeed in safe keeping. I trust it may always be, that we can recognize honourable differences of opinion in this country, and that though we may be divided upon many questions, yet we can be united upon one, and that is a mutual respect for each other. I also beg to thank the leader of the opposition for the observations which he has made with reference to the colleagues which it has been our sad fate to lose during the recess, and I thank him all the more because his kindly remarks have dispensed me from dwelling further on that subject.

I am glad also to join with my hon. friend in the congratulations and the generous tribute which he has paid to the mover and seconder of the address. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) and my hon. friend from St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) are still young members, and although their parliamentary careers have been short they have both taken high rank on the floor of this House. We have heard them before; we knew what they were and we knew what they could do. To-day we have had further cause for admiration, but we had no cause for surprise at what they said and how they said it.

I have, however, to take issue with my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) on the subject, matter of his speech, although as regards its tone and its language I think it was in excellent parliamentary style. On one or two points the hon. gentleman was hypercritical and perhaps even carping. But I must do the hon. gentleman the credit of saying that he is not half so bad as he makes himself out to be when he is speaking from his place on the opposite side of the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has been endowed by nature with a fair and judicial mind, and I readily believe that if he always spoke his own judgment from the seat which he now adorns, he would sometimes revise the opinions to which he gives utterance. But the hon. gentleman belongs to a party which a long possession of power has confirmed in the belief that they were born to rule; and so, regarding power as their own attribute they are ready to believe when they are defeated that they have been robbed of their own. Thus, whenever they have been deprived of power, they are more or less in a bad humour, and like Rachel mourning her lost children they refuse to be comforted.

My hon. friend has asked information from me on certain subjects, some of which are referred to in the speech and some of which are not. He has made an earnest appeal to me to give him a frank statement of the position which we occupy in regard to the Alaskan boundary. I shall answer that appeal in the spirit in which it was made.

At long last a treaty has been made for the settlement of that vexed question which has for years been pending. It is a question of great importance inasmuch as, if not settled, it could lead to very serious and even perhaps to very dangerous consequences. A treaty has been negotiated by His Majesty's ambassador at Washington and the Secretary of State of the United States for the settlement of that question. As to the treaty itself I am bound to say that in my opinion at all events—with the single exception of a very slight blemish to which I shall allude presently—the treaty is eminently fair. The treaty provides for a reference of the boundary to a court to be composed of six impartial jurists of repute, that is to say, the commission has been entrusted with the task of determining what is the boundary as created by the treaty of 1825 between Russia and Great Britain. It is not a compromise; it is not an arbitration; there is no giving and no taking; but it is simply to have a judicial interpretation of what is the true boundary; each party agreeing in advance to accept the boundary has it may be declared, and whatever loss it may give to the other. This is a great victory. I consider, in one way, that we have obtained over the pretentions which have been hitherto advanced by the United States. Up to the present time the United States have refused, steadily refused any kind of reference of that question if the consequences were to entail to them any loss of territory. This is one of the questions which was referred in 1898 to the Joint High Commission. We had it before us on more than one occasion, and we had discussions of long duration with reference to it, but it always came to this at the end: that the United States would not agree to any terms except on condition that the possessions that they have at the present time were made theirs beyond doubt. The question has involved some serious consideration from the fact that it is possible, that the boundary, after it has been delimited by the commission, may perhaps show that some territory which now is occupied by one party really belongs to the other. Take for example the town of Skagway, which is now in the possession of the United States. It is possible that the boundary which is going to be delimited under this commission may show that Skagway does not belong to the United States but to Great Britain. Up to the present time the United States would not agree to any treaty whatever which might place their ownership of Skagway, and similar territories in jeopardy. They wanted to make it sure, that in any event, whatever the result might be, their possessions, including Skagway, should remain in the teritory of the United States. The Joint Commission had proposed in 1898, and in 1899 when we sat at Washington, that as it was a case somewhat parallel to the case of Venezueala, the precedent of Venezueala should apply. The rule which had been laid down by the Venezuealan treaty under somewhat similar conditions to this was as follows:—there were three principles laid down but it is sufficient for the purpose of this discussion to cite only this one:—

In determining the boundary, if territory of one party shall be found by the tribunal to have been at the date of this treaty in the occupation of a subject or citizen of the other party ; such effect shall be given to such occupation as reason, justice, the principles of International law and the equities of the case, shall in the opinion of the tribunal require.

It seemed to us that was a very fair rule, We proposed it to the American commissioners, but they would not accept it unless it were coupled with this rider :

That all towns and settlements on tide water, settled under the authority of the United States, and under the jurisdiction of the United States at the date of this treaty shall remain under the authority and jurisdiction of the United States.

We would not agree to such a condition. This condition has been maintained by the United States from 1899 up to the year 1903; but in the treaty which has been negotiated and signed by Sir Michael Herbert and Mr. John Hay, this rider has been removed; and now the United States go to the arbitration with Canada without any condition of that kind, but agreeing that both parties shall submit to the award which shall be given by those six jurists of repute.

Now, it seems to me that we could not have more than has been given by this treaty. As my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has said, we do not want any territory which is not ours; neither do we want to part with any territory which is ours. We are willing to take the consequences of this commission. We may lose or we may gain. If we lose, we shall pay the consequences; if we gain, our opponents must pay the consequences. This is the position in which we now go before the court to have this question determined. So far as the treaty itself is concerned, or that part of it at all events, there is no point that has been gained by anybody. It has been said by the press that Canada has made a surrender. I am glad to say, and the House will agree with me, that there is not a particle of surrender in this treaty. It is fair and honourable to both parties, and I am more than pleased that our American neighbours should have come to that conclusion. With regard to the composition of the tribunal, the article of the treaty referring to it provides for a tribunal of six impartial jurists of repute, three to be appointed by the United States and three by Great Britain; and therefore we have a fair tribunal. If impartial jurists are appointed on either side, we shall have as fair a tribunal as it is possible to have. I have said there is a blemish in the composition of the tribunal. The only blemish I can see in it is that it is not so composed as to ensure finality of decision. If there were seven jurists, or five, instead of six, there would be of a certainty a majority in any event, and the matter would be finally disposed of ; but as the tribunal is constituted, it is possible there may be three on one side and three on the other, in which case there will be no decision. But even if we have no decision, we shall have obtained what my hon. friend attaches some importance to—the best education possible for the American people, the British people and the Canadian people, as to the merits of this question. But I may say for my part that I do not apprehend any such result. It seems to me that six impartial men ought to be able to come to a conclusion on a question of this kind.

I agree with my hon. friend on one suggestion he made—that if we are to appoint commissioners on this tribunal, they must not be partisans, but they must be the best men and men of the highest character that the British empire can supply. We had at one time reason to believe that on the American side as well as on the British side the jurists of repute would be taken from the bench. We would have been glad indeed if the President had seen fit to take the commissioners from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States.

But now I come to the crucial point of this question, the only one on which at this moment I feel some delicacy about speaking. It has been rumored in the press that the President had selected men who were not judges, and men who, from their previous record, could not be called impartial jurists. I am not aware that Mr. Root, the Secretary for War, has expressed any opinion at all ; but he is a member of the administration of President Roosevelt, and it seems to some of us anomalous that a member of a party who is before the court as a suitor should sit on the bench as a judge in the case. With regard to Mr. Turner, I understand that he has expressed himself somewhat against the Canadian contention. However, I have not seen any word he has spoken except something in the form of a short report in the press. As to Mr. Lodge, he has certainly given utterance to expressions of such a character as to cause some reflection upon the advisability of placing him upon that court. We have made representations to Great Britain upon all these matters. The correspondence in which we have been engaged was concluded only yesterday, and it is not yet possible for me to place it on the Table of the House. Perhaps it is preferable that I should not proceed any further on this question, until the whole of the correspondence can be placed on the Table of the House, so that members on both sides shall have an opportunity to judge of the action we have taken. Therefore I shall not say any more at present, but in a few days I will bring to the House the whole of the correspondence. In fact, I think I shall have authority to lay before parliament the whole of the correspondence which has taken place between the Canadian government and the imperial government from the time the Joint High Commission adjourned in Washington in 1899.

My hon. friend has called upon me also to give information on the subject of trade with Germany. It is quite proper that this desire of my hon. friend should be gratified. He has called our attention to a paragraph which is to be found in the blue-book containing the proceedings of the imperial conference, as follows :

In conection with the discussion of the question of preferential trade the conference also considered the point raised by the commonwealth government as to the possibility of the colonies losing most favoured nation treatment in foreign countries in the event of their giving a tariff preference to British goods. As, however, the exports from the colonies to foreign countries are almost exclusively articles of food or raw materials for various industries, the possibility of discrimination against them in foreign markets was not regarded as serious, and as the exports from foreign countries to the colonies are mainly manufactured articles it was recognized that if such discrimination did take place the colonies had an effective remedy in their own hands.

My hon. friend said a moment ago, if you recognized that you had an effective remedy in your own hands for the unfriendly attitude of Germany, why did you not make use of that weapon ? The answer is obvious. My hon. friend has not forgotten that last year he asked for the production of the correspondence which had been going on for some time between the Canadian government and the German authorities. At that time we were not in a position to bring down the correspondence; it was not complete; but at present it is complete, and we are ready to bring it down, and within a few days we shall lay it on the Table of the House. I may say also that this subject will be taken up again in the budget debate by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. My hon. friend has desired to have the correspondence with the governments of Newfoundland and Great Britain with regard to the new treaty negotiated by Newfoundland with the United States. I shall be glad to bring down any correspondence in the possession of this government, but with regard to the attitude we have taken on the subject, I may say that the question is one that has long engaged our attention and that we have obtained, as the result of our efforts, the assurance that if Newfoundland be allowed by Great Britain to negotiate a treaty with the government of the United States, there shall be no discrimination in it against Canada and that the same treatment given to the American republic shall be given to the Canadian confederation.

My hon. friend also urged that the time is opportune to reopen negotiations with Newfoundland with a view to its entrance into confederation. Let me say that the government of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell lost a fine opportunity of settling that question. At all events there were then negotiations far advanced, and I believe that had a little more generous disposition been shown by Canada to Newfoundland, the question would have been settled there and then. But if Sir Mackenzie Bowell could have settled the question and did not do so, I cannot blame him very much, because so long as the French shore difficulty is not disposed of it, will always be a serious bar to the entrance of Newfoundland into confederation. I think that Newfoundland ought to be a part of confederation. I am prepared at any time to meet the representatives of Newfoundland in order to facilitate that end. But I would hesitate very much, even if it were in my power to complete the transaction, to do so unless this most irritating question of the French shore were removed from the probability of creating mischief in Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think my right hon. friend quite understands me. My suggestion was that this government should take the initiative in endeavouring to have the difficulty settled for the purpose of bringing Newfoundland into confederation.

The PRIME MINISTER. The correspondence will show something of this character, when brought down.

My hon. friend also drew my attention to the question of transportation and asked me the meaning of a paragraph in the speech from the Throne relating to that subject. That paragraph reads as follows :

The great influx of population into our North-western territories and the very large additional areas of fertile land which are being brought under cultivation combine to further press upon us the need for increased transportation facilities for the forwarding of our grain and other products to the markets of the world, through Canadian channels. The whole question of transportation and terminal facilities continues to occupy much attention. and my government will immediately appoint a commission of experienced men to report on the subject.

The question asked by my hon. friend is quite legitimate. There are two ideas involved in this paragraph. In the first place, the rapid filling up of the North-west territories makes it absolutely indispensable that measures be promptly taken for opening up ways of communication into the prairie sections and for the extension of those communications to the sea board. Numerous projects have been placed before us, but up to the present the government have taken no position. The matter is one of too great importance, involving too many risks, involving large demands, for the government to lightly jump into new undertakings of any kind, and we thought it desirable to wait the opening of parliament in order to consult our friends and have the benefit of the advice of parliament before taking any steps. But we give due warning to the Canadian parliament—and I think it is not out of place—that new efforts have to be made by the Canadian people to meet the new requirements resulting from the development of our country. What form we should adopt, whether the government should participate or not, whether the government should help or not, or what should be the form of assistance, are questions which present themselves and as to which we have taken no pledge, and as to which we shall have not only to consult our friends but have the advice of parliament at large. That is not all. There is another sentence in that paragraph to which I would call attention :

> The whole question of transportation and terminal facilities continues to occupy much attention, and my government will immediately appoint a commission of experienced men to report on the subject.

What is the meaning of this ? The House knows that we have expended a great deal of money in order to remove the congestion which is every year taking place at the head of Lake Superior, and provide terminal facilities ot the different ports of the country. We have expended at Port Colborne a great deal and also at Montreal, Quebec and at St. John, N.B. We are asked to spend more money in these and other places. Parliament will be called upon to make new sacrifices. But before we spend any money, whether at Port Arthur, Port Colborne or Montreal, Three Rivers, Quebec or St. John, we think it of the highest possible moment that we should have a committee of experts, the most experienced men the country can furnish, in order to obtain from them a full report as to what is required, so that, before another dollar is asked from parliament, parliament should know exactly what amount is required and how it shall be expended. I think that this is an idea which will commend itself to the judgment of members of both sides.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Will we likely have that report this session ?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is more than I can say. The commission will be announced probably on Monday, but whether we shall have a report this session I cannot say.

My hon. friend devoted a great part of his time to the conference which took place in London last summer. He said that this conference had been barren of results. I do not share that opinion. I do not share the opinion that the conference which sat in London, and at which the representatives of all the self-governing colonies took part, was barren of results. True it was void of such results as were anticipated by those short-sighted men who would cause England to revert to the fatal policy of the eighteenth century, whose aim was to saddle the colonies with burdens which do not belong to them, a policy which carried to extreme limits in that age, brought about the violent separation of the American colonies from the motherland. That conference settled the principle upon which the British empire alone can rest, the principle that the British empire is composed of a galaxy of free nations all owing the same allegiance to the same sovereign, but all owing paramount allegiance also to their respective peoples.

We were invited to discuss three subjects—the commercial relations, the political relations and the military relations which ought to exist between Great Britain and her colonies. As to the question of commercial relations, I do not propose to say much at this time, because I do not believe it can be discussed so well now as later. When my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) brings down his budget—and I hope to be able to say that that will be at an early day—we shall better be able to take up the question which has been referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden). In the meantime, I can satisfy him on one or two subjects as to which, perhaps, he has not all the information he might have possessed. The hon. gentleman says that the Canadian representatives do not appear to have made any propositions to the conference. Sir, we went to the conference without any propositions whatever ; we went to receive and entertain suggestions from the others. But, when we came before that conference we had suggestions to offer and propositions to make. The trade resolution passed by the conference was the work of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) introduced a resolution to reduce the postage on newspapers and periodicals between different parts of the empire, and I am glad to say that that proposal has already been acted upon, and my hon. friend has taken steps to give effect to the suggestion he then offered. The Postmaster General also introduced the resolution, which was carried, to have the metric system adopted throughout the British empire. These, of course, were minor points. Upon the main question at issue, I have only this to say in anticipation of the debate which will take place later on—that the conditions in 1902-3 in Great Britain are not the same as were the conditions of 1897. In 1897 Great Britain had nothing as to which she could make—if I may so say it—a reciprocity treaty ; but now the conditions are changed; Great Britain has imposed a duty on cereals and is now in a position to meet our views, and, perhaps have a reciprocity of trade between Canada and Great Britain. That is the reason why we have spoken differently in 1902-3 from the way we spoke in 1897. We are not flies on the wheel—we move with the times, and, the times having changed, we were ready to take advantage of the opportunity and place our views before the British parliament. Whether they will fructify or not remains to be seen. The new budget has not been presented by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer. In a few weeks or months, we shall see what will take place, and, having seen that, it will be time enough to take a step.

Then, we were called upon to consider the political relations. As to the political relations which exist between Canada and the colonies generally and the mother land, they are perfectly satisfactory, they could not be improved, and any attempt which has been made with a view of improving them has only led to Utopia. I can dismiss this subject without further discussion and go on to say something with regard to the subject which was treated at some length by my hon. friend from Haldimand —the military relations between Canada and Great Britain. There is a school in Great Britain to-day, especially in the official world, whose object for years past has been to bring Canada into the military organizations of Great Britain. The views of that school and their expectations were presented to us by the Right Hon. St. John Brodrick, Secretary of State for War, and by Lord Selborne, First Lord of the Admiralty. But we could not see eye to eye with them, we could not approve their views, and had to propose an absolute demurrer to their contentions. I am aware that there are men, even in Canada, who use the argument that, because Canada is part of the British empire she should take part in the large expenditure necessary to provide the heavy armaments that Great Britain has to maintain because of her dominant position in the world. I can not see the force of that logic. It would imply that Great Britain and Canada were on a footing of equality, whereas we know that they are not on such a footing. Great Britain has powers that we have not. To mention no others, she has the treaty making powers which we have not. And the powers not being co-extensive, the obligations cannot be co-extensive. That argument would imply also that Canada and Great Britain have the same interest in all things. But we know by experience that we have not the same interests. The interests of Canada are divergent from those of Great Britain in many instances. This is seen in the fact that no two of the self-governing parts of the British empire have the same fiscal policy. That argument would imply also that Great Britain and Canada are on the same footing of development. Sir, we know only too well that we have obligations in this country which Great Britain is rid of. As a consequence of our geographical position, the immensity of our territory and the sparsity of our population, we have to assume obligations, to face difficulties and to perform works which in the parent country are left to private enterprise. But though, in all these, the position of the mother country and the colony may be unequal, yet, in the colony there is equal national pride and constitutional jealousy of our rights. This, therefore, makes it absolutely impossible to entertain the proposition made to us. But I confess that we owe it to ourselves as a nation—as we claim to be—to assume our own defence. And, so far as that goes, if we have to spend more money upon military and naval service, I am sure that parliament and the Canadian people will not grudge any sum demanded for that purpose. But, to spend money outside of Canada for military purposes is a proposition that the Canadian people, I believe, are not prepared to accept at this moment. When, in 1899, we took part in the South African war, we did it not under any obligation, not in the execution of any duty which rested upon us—and, to give Great Britain her due, she did not claim it on such grounds either —but we did it simply because we thought it was right and proper to do so. But we refused to be bound for the future, and the position we took then I maintain still.

Now, my hon. friend from Haldimand stated a moment ago that the country was prosperous. He gave us a very splendid picture indeed of the position of Canada on entering the twentieth century. Though vivid, the colours were not too bright in which he painted the extension of our commerce, the development of our agriculture, the increase of our population and the advance of our industries. In all these facts, however, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was judiciously silent. The progress of Canada is an inspiring theme, but it does not appeal to my hon. friend or his followers. If they had to speak of destitution, poverty and ruin, their language would have been jubilant and exultant. But prosperity makes them dumb, whereas adversity would set their tongues wagging with a merry clatter from this time to the end of the session. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition undertook a missionary tour a few weeks ago to a certain part of the province of Ontario. While there he did not speak much on the subject of Canada's prosperity, but he spoke repeatedly on the alleged divisions in the ranks of the Liberal party.

I have no doubt my hon. friend can speak feelingly upon that subject, because he speaks of a party which, during some ten years in the past, exhibited amongst its leaders the proverbial amity that exists between cats and dogs. My hon. friend made a missionary tour some days ago in the province of Ontario, and among the leaders of the Conservative party he was like the last rose of summer, left blooming alone. I do not quarrel with my hon. friend upon that point, because I am bound to tell him that as between Liberals and Conservatives we do not view in the same way the divergencies of opinion that may exist between men professing the same political allegiance. It is a principle of the powerful political organization calling itself the Conservative

Association that all minds must be cast in the same mould, that all wheels must revolve in the same groove, they must act like a flock of sheep, and wherever one jumps the others must follow. We have not the same standard of excellence, that is not the way we do in the ranks of the Liberal party, associated as we are——

Mr. COCHRANE. You can fight like blazes, and it will be all right.

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh yes, we can fight like blazes, and then we peaceably settle our little differences. But we do not fight, as the hon. gentlemen opposite used to fight when they were in the council chamber they used to fight with their naked fists, and the walls of the council chamber could testify of some Homeric battle which took place therein when the hon. gentlemen could not settle their differences of opinion in any other way. My hon. friend, in the campaign which he made a few days ago, professed to be in ignorance of the policy of the Liberal party. I must say that his ignorance is surprising, occupying the position that he does, having been for seven years now, if I mistake not, a member of this parliament. His ignorance surprises me, for the policy of the Liberal party has been on the statute-book for six years. When it was introduced into this House it was discussed and debated, and was assailed by my hon. friend and his followers. My hon. friend has been assailing the Liberal policy for all these years, and must we come to the conclusion that he did not know what he was talking about? It is certainly in the public interest that an hon. gentleman occupying the position that he does should be informed of what was the policy of the Liberal party. Surely my hon. friend knows that on this side of the House there are men who believe that free trade is the soundest and sanest of all economical systems, and there are also men who believe that protection is a preferable principle. If I am told that it is a strange thing that there should be free traders and protectionists in the same party, I would reply that it is the policy of statesmanship to reconcile differences, and out of a diversity of opinions to elaborate a policy which may be satisfactory to the country, remembering that there are no absolute rights in this country, but that all rights are subordinate to the common welfare. But I may also say to my hon. friend, and in saying this I may perhaps claim to be more candid than himself or his friends, that whether we are free traders or protectionists, we are all agreed that in this country and under existing circumstances, it is as inadvisable as it is impossible to have either an absolute system of free trade or an absolute system of protection. Our system was embodied in the year 1897 in a tariff which will live in history as the Fielding tariff. It is well suited to the country, as is evidenced by past experience, and by the unbounded prosperity which the country has enjoyed under it. My hon. friend says that he has a recruit for his views in the person of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Préfontaine). He says the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a protectionist, but if he had quoted the whole speech of my hon. friend he would have quoted that part of his speech wherein he says that in the present tariff there is enough of protection to satisfy him, and to satisfy anybody who looks only to the interest of the country and not to the interest of his party.

But my hon. friend says that we are divided on this question. What would my hon. friend say if I were to show him a man, not a party but a man, who is divided against himself on this question? Will he say it is impossible for a single man to be divided on that question? We can conceive it possible that a party might be divided against itself but surely it is a stranger thing to find a man divided against himself. Well, I have read the speeches of my hon. friend, I had that pleasure for some weeks after I came back from Europe, and I found that my hon. friend is divided against himself on that very question. He has not the same opinion in all parts of the country. I must, however, pay him this compliment, that in order to suit the views of an audience in one part of the country and then suit the views of another audience in another part of the country, he has performed some feats of acrobatic agility of which I did not suspect him capable. Let me quote the words of my hon. friend on this question. Last year my hon. friend gave us his views of what he thought ought to be the fiscal policy of Canada. He is a new leader, and of course he is trying to please all his friends, and he succeeds very well in doing so, I give him credit for that. He wished to lay down a policy upon which he could go before the country and the people, and so he moved this resolution:

This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians.

"Adequate protection." In the olden times it used to be called the National Policy. But it is the same old friend with a new name. "Adequate protection." Well, whether you call it adequate protection or the National Policy, it is still a debatable question as to what adequate protection means. I may say to my right hon. friend that he did not leave us in doubt as to what he meant by adequate protection, for in the course of his speech in support of this resolution, he said this:

We find that our rate of duty on total imports from the United States is about 12½ per cent, and on dutiable goods from the United States 24·83 per cent, while on the other hand, the rate of duty on the total imports of the United States is 28·91 per cent, and on dutiable goods it is 49·83 per cent, or, more than double our rate in each case. As has been already pointed out, the United States has nearly three-fourths of the total importation of free goods into Canada, while Great Britain has to be content with some 15 per cent. One would expect that if we intend to maintain and build up our own products and manufactures against such powerful and tremendous competition as that which we must anticipate from the United States we would fix our tariff of customs against that country on a scale at least as high as is that of their tariff against us.

That is to say, we must have the American tariff. This is adequate protection. Forty-nine per cent is the American tariff, so that in order to be consistent and to build up our industries, we must have a tariff of 49 per cent against the United States. This is the policy of my hon. friend such as it was set forth on the floor of the House, and here in the east. But, during the recess my hon. friend went to visit the North-west. If I may be permitted to say so, I congratulate him for having done so. I have no doubt that the people were pleased to have an opportunity of seeing and hearing the new leader of the party and it was right that he should come into contact with them and right that he should visit these new communities. But, if his friends have reason to be happy over his visit his opponents have also reason to be gratified that he took that course, because, there is no experience like the experience of having to speak before different communities in different parts of the country to show the character of a policy, whatever there may be in it of good or bad. As my hon. friend proceeded westward, as he commenced to sniff the breezes of the prairie, as he inhaled the fragrance of the new ploughed soil, as he gazed upon the immensity of the new wheat fields, as he came in contact with the hardy settler, who has hewed civilization out of the desert, his ideas expanded with the views of the horizon before him, and when he came to Medicine Hat the medicine had already had its effect upon him, and I am happy to say—and I give him my compliments for it—new ideas had already sprouted under his hat. To the people of Medicine Hat he spoke, to the hardy settlers he came to preach the new gospel of the Conservative party, and here is the language he held. You have heard the language he held here on the floor of parliament, advocating a Canadian tariff of 49 per cent against the consumers of Canada. But, that is not the language he held to the people of the North-west Territories.

His policy was one of reasonable protection to all Canadian industries, and he was prepared to say this before any Canadian audience. Competition amongst Canadian industries had resulted in a marvellous reduction of prices, and he did not think the people of Canada would suffer by a moderate protective tariff. The Conservative party was in no way bound up with the interests of the manufacturers and he could tell the people in all sincerity that the Liberal party had received during the past six years, and was receiving support from the manufacturers. He was well applauded on taking his seat.

I believe so, but I do not know that he would have been so well applauded when he took his seat if he had advocated the American tariff of 49 per cent. We can make a comparison between the language he held here and the language spoken to the people of the North-west Territories. What a difference there is between the self-sufficient policy of 49 per cent in the east and the meek, moderate, humble, apologizing, protective policy given to the people of the North-west Territories! It is true the hon. gentleman is still in favour of a moderate tariff to keep the foreigner out so that the manufacturers may be cooped up in a small pit so that they can not viciously cut into each other's prices and the consumer may have the benefit of a lower tariff. Is this the boasted sincerity of the Conservative party when they speak of the policy of protection? It is one thing in the east, it is one thing in the west, and there, Sir, is the condemnation of the policy of the hon. gentleman and the vindication of the policy we have on this side of the House.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend never said a word on an important subject that is mentioned in the speech from the Throne; that is to say, the new Redistribution Bill which must be introduced during the present session. We have to introduce that Bill and we will do it, not of choice, but of necessity. The necessity is imposed upon us by the letter of the constitution. We know from the experience of the past, we know from the history of former Redistribution Bills, that there are several ways of introducing such a measure, but if there be several ways of introducing it there is only one way which ought to be accepted by the Canadian parliament; that is to say, the honest, fair way, so as to give no favour to anybody and to injure nobody. I have here a statement which has been placed in my hands of 42 counties in Ontario which at the last election returned 25 Conservative members and 17 Liberal members, whereas, in these 42 counties the popular vote gave an actual majority as recorded to the Liberal candidates. In these 42 counties 88,365 votes were cast for Liberal candidates and 86,392 were cast for Conservative candidates, showing a Liberal majority of 1,973 votes—result 25 Conservative members elected, 17 Liberal members elected; and majority of votes in favour of Liberal party; majority of seats in favour of Conservative party. That is the fairness of the redistribution that we have had before us for twenty years. The objects of the government in introducing legislation shall be, first, to wipe out the injustices and abuses from which the Liberals in Ontario have suffered for twenty-one years, and next to devise a measure in such terms as to give no favour either to the party in power or to the party in the minority, but to devise a measure, which, whatever may be the question brought before the Canadian parliament at any time, shall make it certain that the views of the people shall upon every occasion prevail and the majority shall rule.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker. I wish to refer as briefly as possible to the address which is about to be adopted by this House in reply to the speech from the Throne. Let me say at once, that I feel convinced that I am but the faithful echo of all my friends sitting on this side of the House when I say that the tone of the right hon. Prime Minister's speech has brought to us gladdening news. I find in it the tone of a man who is returning to health and I am sure that that knowledge which was conveyed to us, and which will be conveyed to the country at large to-morrow will be received with great pleasure by all true Canadians. I am not a medical man, but I have heard it said that the first sign of returning health is a disposition on the part of the invalid to resort to facetiousness and in some of the remarks which fell from the lips of the right hon. gentleman I was pleased to find that indication of a sure convalescence.

We all listened with unfeigned satisfaction to the admirable addresses of the mover and seconder of this resolution. My hon. friend the gallant member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) rose to a high pitch of eloquence, and at times I had merely to close my eyes to see as it were before me a vision such as is depicted in some of Turner's landscapes--lands with clear skies, enchanting scenery, everything flowing with milk and honey. That feeling which I experienced with pleasure was in no sense diminished when I heard the member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers) in the beautiful language of France, describe to us with even greater intensity the prosperity which reigns throughout the country, and the reasons we ought have to be perfectly satisfied and to seek no further improvement in the condition of this country. I remember long ago studying when at school the beautiful work of the Bishop of Cambrai, the Journey of Telemachus to the Isles of Calypso and when I heard my hon. friend from St. Johns and Iberville, my mind was recalled to the admirable description of the Paradisean lands in which Telemachus travelled : gods and goddesses, and everything that goes to make life fair and pleasant. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to my right rudely awoke me from this dream by giving us some considerations which I have no doubt will impress themselves upon the minds of a great many thinking people, and a great many business people throughout this country. Of course that only lasted during the address of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) and I was again plunged into a trance by the satisfied speech of the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. He told us : We have made an admirable treaty in regard to Alaska, we have had a colonial conference replete with excellent results; the policy followed by this government in respect to that legislation which we claim is necessary to make our country what it ought to be, is a perfect policy; absolute harmony reigns not only within the cabinet but amongst all the members of the Liberal party and the government has nothing to do now but to set itself to work to repair the gross injustices which have been done by past administrations. Sir, I would like to join my right hon. friend in that song of happiness and perfect peace, but I think Sir, you yourself, as well as every man in this House is persuaded of that great truth which says : That we must follow the laws of progress; that we have here in Canada a great country with changing conditions; a young country the enormous resources of which have only within the past twenty years become apparent; that we have powerful competitors quite near us; powerful competitors in the old continent of Europe, in every line, industrial, agricultural, artistic. This century has begun an era of progress which is going to lead us to great changes and if we wish to keep pace with the rest of the world we cannot afford to remain satisfied ; we must set our shoulders to the wheel, we must realize our position as a small people in this great country, and we must still unsatisfied move forward, making important changes, and endeavouring by a policy which may be called a national policy, or a policy of adequate protection, or whatever you may choose to call it—we must endeavour to build up this country, to make of it a great commonwealth, and to realize the destiny which it seems to me is clearly pointed out to us by Providence when that great power gave us this immense inheritance. Mr. Speaker, taking the utterances of the two hon. gentlemen who moved the address ; can we say that there is throughout the length and breadth of the land entire satisfaction with the policy of the government ? Can we say that there is that feeling of satisfaction which does not betray throughout this country—not what the right hon. gentleman stated a few moments before he left the chair : That there are free traders and protectionists on the government benches—but that there is throughout the entire country amongst thinking men engaged in business, (not only in manufacturing business but in agricultural pursuits as well) a great desire at the present moment to know what is in reality the preponderant element of that party which as the right hon. gentleman says himself is divided upon a question of vital moment in this country—and, whether we shall have in reality a policy of Canada for the Canadians, or whether this government is going to pursue a course which the right hon. gentleman sums up when he said: That the part of government consists in reconciling and in balancing these divided opinions which he himself admits exists in the ranks of his own party.

On this side of the House there is no difficulty of that kind. I will advert in a moment to this statement of policy, which is consistent throughout—frank and outspoken, and which won the praises, not only of the followers of my hon. friend at my right, the leader of the opposition, but the praises in many instances of numbers of the right hon. gentleman's own followers. The right hon. gentleman states that there are divergent views within his own party in respect to that most important principle of protection. He did not require to make that statement for us to know that that divergence exists, and it has produced within the ranks of my right hon. friend's own party divisions far deeper and far greater than any which my right hon. friend is able to point out on this side of the House. It is not with equal justice that my right hon. friend treats those who are in favour of a strong national policy, and those who on the contrary believe, as some hon. gentlemen who sit on the opposition benches believe, that the present tendency ought to be in favour of a lower tariff, and of admitting, as we claim the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite admits, the great competitors of our own country to a privileged position in our own markets. Mr. Speaker, we have had by-elections, and, speaking for myself, our party has not been as successful in my own province as I would have liked; but we have had the spectacle in the province of Quebec, which I have no doubt has been repeated elsewhere, which the right hon. gentleman claimed with pride as one of the great qualities of the party which he leads. In the electoral district of Argenteuil we had the members of the present cabinet and all their supporters speaking strongly in favour of a reduced tariff. I have not here with me, but I am prepared to lay on the Table of this House the campaign speech of my friend Mr. Weir who led the ministerial forces in the electoral district of Argenteuil; and what did he say in that pamphlet which was spread broadcast throughout the constituency? He stated that the party led by my right hon. friend was a party who remained faithful even to-day to the policy enunciated by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and he quoted the minister's own words, which consisted in a repudiation of every element of protection, and in a condemnation of that policy as being a policy of robbery and scoundrelism. During the very time that campaign was being waged, we had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine), in the division of Maisonneuve, a great industrial division of the city of Montreal, posing before the electorate as a man who would not adhere to any other policy than the policy of protection, and who was prepared at any moment, upon sufficient cause being shown him, to raise the tariff, and who went around begging the names of the manufacturers of the city of Montreal, imploring them to sign his requisition paper, in order, as he said, to show to the manufacturing people and to the workingmen of that important district, that the government were pledged to the protection of their interests, and going so far, as I am informed, as to write letters, pledging the government in certain cases to an increase in the tariff, in order to secure the support of those important elements of our population. Shortly afterwards, if not at the same time, down in the electoral district of Yarmouth, we had the Minister of Finance upholding the policy of a lower tariff, of a tariff for revenue only; and at a great banquet given to celebrate the victory of the free-trade candidate, my hon. friend the member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) reproved the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and condemned the system pursued in the province of Quebec of pandering to the taste of those who wanted to build up once more the national policy, and stated that the result obtained in Yarmouth ought to encourage the party to which he belonged to fly frankly and boldly the colours of a lower tariff and even of a revenue tariff. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that we who sit on this side of the House should point out the inconsistencies of hon. gentlemen opposite, as it is our duty to do; and we shall endeavour to perform that duty in such a way as to give satisfaction. And I will say to the right hon. gentleman that if the improvement in the condition of his health depends on us, we will favour it in every way possible, and we will trust that the example which I hope we shall set patriotically, will be followed by his own friends, and that they will contribute, as we desire to do, to the complete restoration of his health.

But, Sir, it was said by the right hon. gentleman that divisions have existed in past cabinets. It may be so; but I took note of what the right hon. gentleman further said, that those divisions manifested themselves in the council chamber, where, as Lord Melbourne aptly said on a celebrated occasion, they should manifest themselves. But what of the divisions purporting to exist upon that great question in respect of which there is a feeling of unrest throughout the country which it is the duty of the right hon. gentleman to set at rest? The divisions which existed, if they did exist, in the council chamber, have been intensified in the case of our hon. friends opposite, and we had the spectacle in our own province of these gentlemen not settling their differences in the council chamber, but going down when the right hon. gentleman was returning a sick man from Europe, and fighting out their differences, like the pilots of Capt. Marryatt, on the deck of a steamer. We had the spectacle of five ministers going down to meet the premier of this country and insisting that one of their own colleagues should withdraw from the cabinet because he belonged to that phalanx of his party which holds to the view that at present the great duty imposes itself upon all Canadians of determining whether this country is going to get the full benefit of its resources, or whether these resources are to continue being used to enrich our neighbours to the south, and we are to continue being made the slaughter market for the great manufacturers of Europe.

At present, under the preferential clause, we are sacrificed to the great manufacturers of Great Britain. I repeat to-day what I said on a former occasion, when challenged by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to express an opinion on this preferential clause, that if we gave a preference to Great Britain, we should in return have some corresponding advantage in the British market. That opinion, I believe, is held by many others, and that is the policy which my hon. friend the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and myself advocated in this House long ago. Ready and willing as we were to give Great Britain a preference, we were not prepared to grant such a preference as would imperil in any way our own great industrial interests. Take that great industry which is of particular interest to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. In the province of Quebec, owing to the antipatriotic conditions obtained from the local government, our immense wealth of pulp wood, sufficient, according to the calculation of reliable experts, to last over 800 years, is being taken over to the United States. We derive from that great natural resource the smallest amount possible of wealth to ourselves. We get for our pulp wood about $3.50 per cord and in the neighbouring republic, where it is manufactured, the American manufacturers add to that cord of wood the value of $45. And in many instances that pulp comes back to us in the shape of paper. We are entitled to know from the government whether it is prepared to come down with any new policy which would enable our workingmen to get the share they are entitled to out of the profits to be derived from the manufacture of pulp within our own border. When we know that we have immense deposits of iron in this country and that steel billets are being taken over to the United States where they pay a duty of $6 a ton, which is returned afterwards in the shape of a drawback, and that this steel is manufactured in the United States into rods and galvanized wire and afterwards sent back to this country for sale, is it not our duty to insist on the government adopting a policy which will enable the work of manufacture to be done in our own country and change the balance of trade which is at present $70,000,000 against us, with our American neighbour. In the recent campaign in the province of Ontario, when I had occasion to visit the northern part of that province, I was confronted with the fact that mattes of nickel, which cost Americans perhaps $125 a ton, are taken over in immense quantities to the United States, to the refineries of New Jersey, and there given a value of over $2,500 a ton. And it is a fair question for us to ask this government to alter that system and give us in Canada the full benefit of the manufacture and by-products of that great natural wealth, which we share with only one other country in the world.

Throughout the constituencies which I visited during the last by-election, it was stated that we who sit on this side of the House wished merely to favour the manufacturer to the detriment of the agriculturist. But I venture to say that, after my hon. friends who sit on the treasury benches have heard the complaint of the farmers and market gardeners of Ontario and also the similar complaints of the associations of farmers and market gardeners of the province of Qnebec who are coming up next Tuesday to claim the revision of the tariff in respect to their industry, we shall not hear formulated in this House the charges that were made during the last campaign. Then, allow me, in that connection, to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, what have been the results, as regards the agriculturists, of the policy pursued by this government during the last few years. In 1896, we had importations of butter, cheese, bacon and hams, beef salted, pork barrelled, meats dried, and other provisions the products of the fields of the American union, to the amount of $1,288,041. During last year, these importations have amounted to over $2,500,000 from the neighbouring republic. Let me give you in detail one or two of the items to which I have just adverted. In bacon and hams in 1896, we imported from the United States $143,000 worth, last year the importations of these articles, which, I claim, we ought to reserve the full benefit of for ourselves, amounted to over $650,000 worth, in barrelled pork, in 1896, we imported $270,000 worth, and, in 1902, we imported over $580,000 worth. What we claim and what has been claimed in the uniform manner by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, is that the time has come for us not, as my right hon. friend has said, to adopt a policy of 49 per cent protection, and not as he said to preach one doctrine in one part of the country and another doctrine in the far west—we would be acting like hon. gentlemen opposite if we did that—but to preach the doctrine throughout the country, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition did in his memorable tour, of building up our own country, and, if we find a great and powerful community like the United States reaching the acme of prosperity, reaching the height of wealth which they have reached under a high tariff, not to sacrifice our own country to them, but to keep our own resources for ourselves and for our people and to take the means that may be necessary to achieve that end. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has never advocated any other doctrine but that either in this House nor anywhere else; and I am surprised at my right hon. friend speaking as he does. But perhaps he may be excused, because of absence from the country at the time of the memorable tour was made as far as British Columbia by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, for not knowing what everybody else knows and recognizes—that, whatever may be the reproaches cast upon my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) there was one unstinted praise accorded to him by everybody, and that praise was for his sincerity and for the sameness of his professions in every part of the country.

What did the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) say in this House?

> Now, I do not say that our policy should be framed on any principle of retaliation of tariffs——

How is that for my right hon. friend who claimed that the member from Halifax laid down a distinct doctrine of a 49 per cent tariff or any other fixed percentage of duty?

> I absolutely and decidedly dissent from that. I do say that our tariff should be framed from the standpoint of the Canadian people and with a view to the preservation of the Canadian market for the Canadian people themselves.

That is the doctrine laid down by my hon. friend and followed uniformly by every one of us on this side of the House. Does my right hon. friend or any of his colleagues pretend that in his tour throughout the country the hon. member for Halifax, the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition at any time laid down a different principle? Let them, at least, if that is their contention, quote some word from my hon. friend in any of his addresses to the people of this country showing that he proceeded on any different principle from that, or laid down in the passage of his speech that I have just quoted. And, at Victoria, what do we find my hon. friend from Halifax declaring, speaking there as the mouthpiece of those who sit on this side of the House? He said:

> It is a matter of adequate protection——

That is not what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) takes pleasure in sneering at as he sneered here at Sir Charles Tupper's contention that we should have a preferential tariff arrangement with the mother country—but saw fit to entirely reverse his position with great humility and with ashes on his head when he went to the interimperial conference. The hon. member for Halifax, speaking at Victoria, went on:

> That is a policy which is held to be the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. That is the pronounced and declared policy of the people of this country—adequate protection of Canadian industries, a protection which will ensure to Canadians of this country their own markets at all prices and under all circumstances.

That is real patriotism, and we never contended for any other policy so far as I am aware. I defy my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance to quote a single instance of a speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in which he propounded any different idea. The leader of the opposition came west and I had the pleasure of meeting him and those who accompanied him in the city of Winnipeg. We found out there that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) was not the great Bonaparte of the west that we had been taught to believe him. But what I wish to call your attention and the attention of this House to, in view of the declaration, accompanied with a certain amount of ridicule, made by my right hon. friend the leader of the government, is the language used by the hon. member for Halifax in his reported speech at the banquet which was tendered to him in the city of Winnipeg:

> The policy of the Conservative party was a policy of adequate protection, Canadian protection; and would it not be an estimable benefit if the lead mines, the gold mines, the iron mines, and other industries were developed? His party held no brief from any corporation, he believed that it received less support from the manufacturers than had the Liberal party during the last four years.

I am able fully to confirm that view expressed by my hon. friend.

> He supported protection because he believed it to be in the interests of the whole people of Canada. He wished to have the support of the North-west, but he absolutely refused to ask for that support by advocating a different doctrine to that which he advocated in other parts of Canada, notwithstanding the taunts which had been thrown out by his political opponents.

These remarks, Sir, made by my hon. friend in Winnipeg, in that province which, I am happy to say, is as anxious as we are in the east to build up a great and powerful commonwealth, these remarks he repeated at Lethbridge and everywhere else in the province of Manitoba. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition said also in that province :

So far as our policy is concerned, we are not afraid to avow it in the east or in the west. It is the same everywhere. Our policy is that of adequate protection to all legitimate industries in Canada.

My hon. friend is more than right when he says that he has strong support for that view, which I venture to say will ultimately become the view of all those who desire the advancement of our country. He has strong support for it on the treasury benches where, as stated by my right hon. friend, people are free to entertain any opinion they like, and his mission is to bring them all together, and out of that chaos to evolve something which is satisfactory to the country. My hon. friend the present member from Maisonneuve, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine), whom I am glad to see in his place this evening, stated there that if any man had anything to complain of in respect to the tariff—and his speech was reported verbatim in one of his own organs—or if any legitimate industry could establish a claim for greater protection, he was prepared for his own part to confer with his colleagues in the cabinet and give them all the protection they wanted. The speech from the Throne does not refer to tariff matters specially. Sir, I claim in contradiction to what was said by my hon. friends who moved and seconded the address, that there is a feeling at present throughout the country, of which we would have been glad and the country at large would have been glad, to find mention in that ministerial programme of the session. We would have been glad to see that legislation was foreshadowed to carry out the idea that we must prepare to protect ourselves by law against the invasion of our markets by men more powerful than ourselves, and against the waste of the great natural resources given to us by Providence, and which it is our mission to make the most of as a young people.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot for my own part entirely agree with what my hon. friends have said in regard to immigration. I believe it is in the interest of this country that it should be settled, I believe that we should favour the advent to our country of men who are anxious to form part of our great commonwealth and to do their duty as citizens. But I do not believe in the present policy of the government in regard to immigration; and I would have been glad to hear in the speech from the Throne some announcement of a change in that policy which has been followed for too many years. We spend too much money in bringing people to this country without discrimination as to their character, as to whether they are fit to become inhabitants. For instance, I do not believe that it has been a prudent or proper step on the part of this government to spend so large a sum of money, over a hundred thousand dollars, to bring here a set of people like the Doukhobors, who, while we were travelling in the North-west, were leaving their settlements and picking up rocks, and stones, and stumps of trees, in order to find the Messiah on the plains of the North-west. I believe that most of the money we spend at the present moment on immigration agencies, and there is far too much spent, would be better employed in keeping our own people at home, in preventing the exodus, and in offering facilities to our own people to settle in those boundless and wealthy plains of the west.

Sir, I listened attentively to the right hon. leader of this House when he spoke in regard to the colonial conference. It seems quite apparent from what we find in the English blue-book, and from what we know of the results of that conference, that it has achieved very little of a practical nature. It is no doubt a great advantage for the people of this vast empire, living under the same flag, to confer together, for representatives of the great colonies such as Canada and Australia to meet in conference. But I think that we on this side of the House have a right to expect something more definite as a result of that conference to our own country. Thus, the steps taken by the hon. Minister of Finance and those who accompanied him on that distant mission in so far as the very important question of a preference is concerned, resulted in absolutely nothing. There was no result. I find on page 10 of the English blue-book that :

The representatives of the colonies are prepared to recommend to their respective parliaments preferential treatment of British goods on the following lines :—Canada——

That is ourselves.

The existing preference of 33⅓ per cent and an additional preference on lists of selected articles——

That is what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was prepared, as I understand it, to advocate as Canada's share—the maintenance of the present preference and an additional preference on certain selected articles.

(a) By further reducing the duties in favour of the United Kingdom ;

(b) By raising the duties against foreign imports ;

(c) By imposing duties on certain foreign imports now on the free list.

The real, practical, tangible result is nothing. We have no intimation from the government of any intention of carrying out that pledge mentioned on page 10 of the blue-book nor as to how they intend to implement that promise. There was no question of the embargo upon our cattle, a most unjust measure. Did they attempt, or achieve, anything as regards the removal of that most unfair and most unjust impediment to our trade ? Nothing. No result. It seems to me that our friends might have availed themselves of the opportunity of that conference to urge upon the government of Great Britain some scheme, some plan, by which a great dependency, such as our own, might have had additional facilities, additional means of approaching to the sovereign power when it is a question of concluding commercial treaties in which this country is interested. Nothing in that regard. As regards the Alaskan boundary treaty with which my right hon. friend is so perfectly satisfied, I listened vainly to hear my right hon. friend make a distinct statement as to whether his government recommended that form of settlement of the difficulty or whether they did not do so. Do they recommend it ?" Have they taken any steps to secure upon that tribunal, or commission, or arbitration board, or whatever it may be called, the presence of two jurists at least from our own country, and what steps have they taken to secure that end, if any ; For my own part, Sir, what I respectfully submit to this House in regard to that most important matter is this: It may be that the tract of land as to which the dispute exists is not of very great value, but as far as I have been able to understand the very able arguments uttered and printed in favour of the Canadian contention, we are greatly interested in securing some of those bays which extend into the disputed territory as an outlet to the sea from that great Yukon territory which is known to be so valuable. Now, Sir, do my hon. friends think that, with such a commission as has been named and with, as is intimated to us, the presence upon that commission of two men who may be very estimable American citizens, but who are no doubt one-sided upon this question, they have taken every measure or precaution to protect our interests? The right hon. leader of the government laid great stress upon the fact that in respect to the proposal that when they submitted the Venezuelan difficulty there was a stipulation that the position occupied by those whose interests were adverse to our own would not be sacrificed in any event, and that by his efforts they had secured in the present treaty the obliteration of that obnoxious clause, but, how are we to couple that great claim made by the right hon. gentleman with the statement he made when he touched upon this subject that this commission was a commission of legal men named in order to determine where the limits were ? I ask this House whether if that, being the nature of a commission, it would have been very dignified for us to allow a stipulation to be made in the treaty that whatever might be the finding of the investigating commission, Skagway and such other ports as are at present in the hands of our American neighbours should under all circumstances remain therein. It seems to me that the claim that they have secured a great advantage for us is not one which this House will readily accept, but, what I am anxious to see, Mr. Speaker, is some proof of the steps taken by this government at the time of the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and also when this present treaty was under negotiation, to secure full protection to our rights. I moved, if my memory serves me right, last year, for the production of the correspondence that had taken place between this government and the imperial government in regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and I think I am right in saying that the motion was denied me. When the correspondence relating to that treaty, in which, perhaps, as my hon. friend at my right (Mr. Borden, Halifax) says, we have no practical interest, but, which may have been used as a powerful lever to help a useful solution of the Alaskan boundary difficulty, when the correspondence which will be brought down, as has been promised to my hon. friend, and when further correspondence in relation to this treaty is before us, we will be in a better position to see exactly what steps have been taken to secure our rights in that most important matter.

Mr. Speaker, I confess to some astonishment at the announcement made by the right hon. leader of the government that nothing has yet been determined by the government and that there is nothing which the government can lay before this House in regard to the additional facilities for transportation across the continent which are referred to in a dim and indefinite way in the speech from the Throne. I think I am not mistaken in stating that it is over three months ago that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) intimated to the public that some scheme was under consideration, and it was viewed favourably by himself, to give us a new route across the continent. Since that time we have had discussions galore throughout the press in this country. We have seen the head men of the two great railways existing in this country discussing publicly under what conditions these additional facilities are to be given to the country, and I think it is a fair matter of regret for us to see when we are summoned together that the government of this country, at this present moment, with a prospect of a long session before us has determined nothing definite whatever in regard to these additional facilities and cannot say when the commission, which is referred to in the speech from the Throne, will make its report, or whether the government will wait for the report or not, before it lays a definite scheme before parliament.

My right hon. friend closed his remarks by referring to the necessity of remedying an injustice in respect to the distribution of seats which took place years ago. As a proof of that injustice, he spoke of some of the results of the last federal elections in the province of Ontario ; but my right hon. friend glided with a light step over the far more extraordinary phenomenon presented in the province of Ontario by which a government is returned to power in that province, which as a matter of fact has a minority of over 7,000 of the popular vote. That would appear to be a far greater injustice than anything that has ever happened in the federal arena. Nor did my right hon. friend see fit to refer in any way whatever to the far more deplorable spectacle of recent date, whereby the government of Ontario, in order to maintain its life and existence, has had recourse to methods which are not always discovered, but which we have seen practiced by the Liberal party, not only in the province of Ontario but in the province of Quebec and elsewhere. We have seen them, Sir, in the province of Ontario and elsewhere, maintaining themselves in power by a system of corruption which prevents, odiously prevents the free will of the people from being given expression to in this young country.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). I do not rise, Sir, for the purpose of engaging in a discussion of the tariff in connection with this debate on the address, believing as I do that such a discuison at this moment is premature. I have consequently no criticism to make upon the points made by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier. In many respects, of course, I sympathize with the views that gentleman entertains, but circumstances may arise and are likely to arise in the near future which will convince us that discussion of the tariff, or action upon the tariff is not advisable at the present time. We may find that we have not a proper knowledge of the premises that will exist, and that consequently we are not in a position to take the action which we will be required to take when we know exactly what the conditions are. Should we have a meeting of the Joint High Commission, it is evident to any member who will examine the facts that the result of a meeting of that commission will determine to a great extent the character of the fiscal legislation of this parliament. In case a favourable treaty was obtained with the United States, so far as I am concerned, my views would be quite different with regard to this matter, from what my views would be should the United States persist in continuing the policy that has been in force in that country for the last 35 years. In the latter case I would co-operate earnestly and heartily with my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, and with those who believe as he does in regard to this matter. On the contrary, if the policy of the United States were to be reversed ; if their policy towards this country were to assume a liberal character ; if we were to enter upon fiscal relations with that country satisfactory to ourselves ; then, of course, the policy that I would favour would be quite different from the policy I would favour in the other case. I think it is not profitable or necessary to enter upon or to continue the tariff discussion upon the debate on this address. I do not think that the House is in possession of the information which would put it in a position to deal with this matter, to take action upon the fiscal policy of Canada as it ought to do ; and consequently I pass over the discussion of the tariff question for the reason, that so far as I myself am concerned, I am not able to say where we shall land, what the conditions will be, what will confront us, what course it will be proper for us to take. Our course will necessarily be governed by the conditions that will hereafter arise, and in my opinion we had better wait until these conditions develop themselves. So much for the tariff.

Now, I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I should have risen at all on this occasion but for the desire I have to make a few remarks upon a certain phase of sentiment in this country, and upon a certain disposition manifested in certain quarters in this country which I think is regrettable, in reference to our international relations. It is quite common in Canada to criticise with some severity, often with a good deal of severity, the action of Great Britain with regard to this Dominion. Now, we should remember, Sir, that so far as Great Britain is concerned, so far as we ourselves are concerned, it is a matter of primary importance to maintain good relations with that great branch of the Anglo Saxon family to the south of us. That is especially the case with Great Britain. Great Britain has world wide interests ; interests that do not centre primarily and chiefly in Canada ; but interests that spread over the whole broad face of the world. Great Britain has interests in Canada, and I believe that Great Britain, so far as her policy towards Canada is concerned, has discharged her duty to this country faithfully and in such a way as to merit our thanks and approval. But we may, we naturally do magnify the importance of our own issues and of our own interests. We may, and we do sometimes think that England should sacrifice everything for the maintenance of some comparatively unimportant claim or interest that we think a great deal of. In the past, England has stood by our interests faithfully, in my opinion. In the past I do not think we have just reasons for complaint against the policy that Great Britain has pursued with regard to these colonies or this Dominion. For this reason, I think that England is often unjustly accused of failing to stand by our interests with that persistence and with that disregard of consequences that some expect she ought to do. It is a matter of primary importance to Great Britain, I repeat, to maintain good relations with the United States. We perhaps do not realize how important that is. We do not realize how completely that is a factor governing the position of England and the conduct of England with regard to questions arising between these two countries. Consequently, Sir, we should deal with these questions in a temperate spirit. We should deal with these questions with a full knowledge of the facts. We should deal with these questions, giving to England the benefit, when we are forming our judgment, of their environment, of the necessities that confront her, and of the difficulties that surround her. If we were to do this, perhaps in some cases our judgment would be modified to a very great extent.

In the course of the admirable speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition this afternoon, I noticed his remarks with reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. As the position which my hon. friend took upon that matter has not been replied to, his remarks might go to the country with his assertions uncontradicted. The abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was an unpopular move in the estimation of the Canadian public, no doubt. That treaty had existed for a good many years. It imposed restrictions and conditions upon the United States with regard to various matters that the public men of all parties in that country chafed under. It was a source of difficulty and created conditions of a threatening character. By the abrogation of that treaty Great Britain gave to the United States a free hand in the construction of the Isthmian canal; and, following the conditions which the abrogation of the treaty created, the United States have proceeded to take the initial steps towards the construction of the canal by the Panama route. Now, the question is, had Canada any reason or any right to say to the United States, you shall not construct that canal ? Were we ready to construct it ? Was Great Britain ready to construct it? Was the United States, in offering to construct that canal, trenching upon our rights or upon any scheme we cherished for opening communication between the waters of the Carribean sea, and the Pacific ocean ? We have interests, of course, on both the Atlantic and the Pacific, and if we had been prepared to connect the two oceans by an Isthmian canal, there certainly would have been more reason for our finding fault with the arrangement made for the abrogation of the treaty. The United States possesses fifteen times our population; it possesses more than twenty-five times our wealth; it has vast interests on each coast; and its public men deemed the construction of that canal an essential requisite to the prosperity of the country and its progress in the future. It was a cherished scheme with the American people to open up what would practically be a communication between their territorial possessions on the Pacific and the Atlantic. I was in Washington the day Lord Pauncefote signed that treaty. I called upon his lordship, and he expressed unbounded satisfaction upon having, as one of the last official acts of his life, signed a treaty that was to set at rest a vexed question between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family, and was to render improbable what would otherwise have been probable—friction, bad feeling, or a collision between the two countries.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did he say anything about the Alaskan boundary at the same time ?

Mr. CHARLTON. The two questions were dealt with on their own merits. The Alaskan boundary has been dealt with since ; I will reach that question soon. But I will say, in answer to my hon. friend that Lord Pauncefote was not in a position to dictate to the United States government what their course of conduct should be ; and if they were unwilling to couple the Alaskan boundary with the settlement of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty question, I do not suppose Lord Pauncefote had it in his power to compel them to meet his wishes, and I doubt whether it would have been a politic thing for him to terminate the negotiations because he could not have his way entirely. The two questions stood distinct from each other, and were treated on distinct bases.

With regard to the Alaskan boundary question, as the premier told us this afternoon, the Joint High Commission at Washington in 1899 were unable to agree upon that question. It was the difficulty which broke up the sittings of the commission. The British commissioners refused to continue negotiations unless that question was set at rest. The American commissioners desired to let it stand in abeyance and go on with the other questions which had been referred to the commission. The British commissioners refused to do that, and the commission broke up. We had tentative agreements on many points which would have given this country a fairly desirable treaty. It was a fortunate thing, however, that we did not go on, that the British commissioners terminated the sittings of the commission and went home, because the condition of sentiment in the United States to-day is so much more favourable as regards the question of concessions to Canadian interests, that we shall now, in all human probability, get a very much more favourable treaty than we could have got at that time. Consequently, the deferring of the negotiations before the Joint High Commission will prove to be entirely in the interests of Canada.

With regard to this boundary commission, I was asked by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, if Lord Pauncefote had insisted upon coupling the Alaskan boundary question with the question of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I answer no, he had the good sense not to insist upon it, because, if he had, we would have had complications and difficulties of a character the consequences of which no man could foresee. The question had dragged along for many years. At the time the Joint High Commission was in session, the American commissioners refused to entertain any proposition made by the British commissioners with regard to it. They stood on their contention and refused arbitration. It is true, they did offer to refer the question to jurists, an equal number from each country, but with the reservation that any territory then occupied by the United States—and Skagway was one of the points—should not be included in the reference. Well, the reference has at last been made with that condition eliminated, and we have a reference to a tribunal composed of three jurists from each country. It was supposed in Canada that jurists independent of politics would be chosen by the United States, and a good deal of feeling has existed in consequence of the alleged failure of the President to make such a selection.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Were they not to be three impartial jurists of repute ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. The President of the United States, it is understood, desired or requested justices of the United States Supreme Court to act on this commission, and they refused to act upon it. That is well known.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. How ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will explain to my hon. friend privately how. It is a matter of current report in Washington. That is a statement which I heard from one of the justices of the United States Supreme Court himself. The President was left without the ability to select the members of the commission he desired to select, for the reason that they refused to act. He might, it is true, have selected other jurists. They might have declined to act for the reasons assigned by the judges of the United States Supreme Court, namely, that if they took the position, their functions would not be strictly judicial. But this treaty had not, up to the time when it was ascertained that the justices of the Supreme Court would not act upon the commission, been ratified by the United States Senate. That ratification, it is understood, was secured through the co-operation of Senators Lodge and Turner, and but for their co-operation and assistance it never would have been ratified. Now, the President of the United States was confronted with this situation. A great deal of trouble has been experienced with the United States Senate. Treaty after treaty has been hung up by that body. There are four or five reciprocity treaties, among them the Cuban treaty, which would be highly advantageous to the United States, but their ratification cannot be secured. It requires a two-third vote of the Senate to ratify a treaty, and so far, local and private interests have succeeded in preventing ratification in many instances. The question of the Alaskan boundary the administration of the United States desires to get out of the way. It is a source of irritation and danger and it is highly desirable to have it settled, and in order to get the treaty ratified and the first step taken towards the settlement of the question, it was necessary to get the support of the Senate. I am not in a position to say that Senator Lodge was promised a place on the commission if the treaty should be got through, but from the little I know about politics, no doubt the President of the United States would be anxious to secure the assistance of the only man who could get the treaty through the Senate. The treaty went through, and it is acknowledged on all hands that it went through in consequence of the support given it by Senator Lodge. Well, when the treaty was through, it was claimed that the final result had to be ratified at last by the United States Senate, that the United States Senate was a body with appellate jurisdiction, that the treaty must come before them, and would stand or fall in accordance with their decision, and it was claimed that it was a proper thing to have the body, which had the ultimate and unrestricted jurisdiction in the matter, represented on the commission. Whether that is a good contention or not it is not for me to say, but that is the contention that was made. It was contended that the United States Senate, which is the highest power in the United States, which must ratify every treaty, without whose concurrence no treaty can become law, was entitled to representation upon the Alaskan commission. That contention has been accepted by the United States, and two members of the Senate appointed, and besides these two members, Secretary Root. I do not think it can properly be claimed that these are not all men of high character, that they are not all of them jurists. They may not be impartial jurists.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not suppose that there are half a dozen out of the twenty million able bodied men in the United States who would be impartial on this question. They would all stand on the American contention. But Senator Lodge has expressed opinions on the question. He expressed those opinions in an electoral contest, and my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, knows what weight should be attached to statements made on the stump. He knows they can be put into one shape and then another to meet the exigencies and circumstances. Senator Lodge, when on the stump in Massachusetts, appealed to popular prejudices by making certain statements with regard to the Alaskan boundary question. But he indignantly repudiates the idea that he is not impartial, that he is impervious to reasoning, that he cannot judge the case on its merits after having heard the evidence. I think it would be an aspersion on his character and that we would be entirely unwarranted in supposing this to be the case. I would just as soon trust the question to Senator Lodge as to a member of the United States Supreme Court. In fact I believe he would be more likely to take an impartial view of the case from the circumstances that as his character and his judgment and his methods have been impugned, he would be therefore more desirous to give a judicial and proper decision on the matter. The same language would apply to a large extent, if not to so great an extent, to Senator Turner of the Pacific coast. And as to Secretary Root, I am unable to understand how the slightest exception can be taken to his serving on the commission. The matter, so far as we are concerned, is in this shape. I presume we all desire to have this question eliminated from the great questions that promise difficulties and friction between the two countries. We have in our hands the choice of commissioners, and it should be our duty to select the very best men we have, as the leader of the opposition has said. We want to set the Americans the example of giving the best jurists we have in the British empire to sit on that commission.

Mr. MACLEAN. Why do not they set us an example ?

Mr. CHARLTON. They do.

Mr. MACLEAN. When—in Canadian matters ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that we are in a position to dictate to the United States the course they should pursue or to give an opinion as to who is fit to sit on that commission or who is not. We are dealing with a nation of 80,000,000 people and we are but a nation of 5,000,000 to 6,000,000. Great Britain is anxious to maintain friendly relations with that people, and for us to say that these men are not satisfactory would defeat the consummation desired and put an end to all negotiations. We may regret that men not entirely acceptable to us were not appointed, but it is not for us to say who should be appointed, and we are deficient in the sense of proportion when we suppose that five million people can dictate to eighty million the course they should pursue. Whether we be satisfied with the commission or not, there are circumstances which, in the opinion of the United States, have rendered it proper and desirable and politic to appoint these men on that commission, and we are prejudging the case when we assume that they are not fit to perform the functions and not capable of giving an impartial decision. I am sorry myself that the Supreme Court judges of the United States declined to act. I am sorry the commission is not one that suits our purposes and desires, but it is a matter for the United States to select their own commissioners to attempt to adjust, and I hope and anticipate a favourable and satisfactory result from the appointment of this commission.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition quoted to us this afternoon a large number of extracts from American papers with regard to the character of the commission and the views entertained by the commissioners. Well, I do not attach a very great degree of importance to extracts from American, or Canadian newspapers either, for that matter. Editors, sitting in their sanctums, write with an air of supreme wisdom and authority, but they are often very much mistaken, and I look at the matter from a broader standpoint than the opinion of editor this or that, or any other scribbler in an editorial sanctum, who prejudges the case himself and imagines he knows all about it. Of course I do not intend any reflections on any editor present. Present company is always excepted. But what I say is that these quotations from American newspapers are entirely unreliable and not worthy of consideration.

Mr. MACLEAN. How does the hon. gentleman prove that there is a better feeling in the United States towards Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a self evident fact.

Mr. MACLEAN. In the press, I suppose ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that Canadian papers, even the one managed by my hon. friend opposite, are an exception to the rule. I notice often a tone which I greatly regret—very flippant, cynical and unfair—with regard to things American, which does not elevate the paper in my opinion and certainly does not tend to create good feeling. And that thing, to some extent, has existed in the United States. The tone of the Canadian newspapers I know, produces irritation, and those who desire better relations between the two countries look upon this matter with regret. And I can say, Sir,—and I think that perhaps no person in this House is better able to give an opinion on the subject than myself—that the sentiment in the United States towards Canada is rapidly growing more friendly, and that their ideas as to the relation between these countries have grown broader and more correct during the last three years than they were before, that the knowledge of Canada, the absence of which gave them false ideas, as to the relations of the countries previous to that time is growing. And I believe it is to our interest to cultivate friendly relations and ascertain how far that growth of sentiment favourable to Canada in the United States will lead, and whether the outcome may not be something desirable. If we find we cannot get it, if we find that there is not a feeling in the United States friendly to Canada sufficiently potent to bring about favourable relations, it will be time to take the position that many parties in this country assume it is best to take by prejudging the case now.

So far as the other points made by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier are concerned I do not know that it is necessary to allude to them now. As I said at the outset, I think it is premature to discuss the fiscal policy of this country. I rose, as I have said, for the purpose of correcting what I considered to be misapprehensions with regard to matters that require delicate handling and that can be best understood when regarded in the spirit of fairness and concession.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose speaking at length upon the various subjects that have been brought up in this debate, but I wish to say a few words upon the subject of the imperial conference.

I may say at the outset that the view I take of this matter is just the opposite of that expressed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) and his first lieutenant, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). Both these gentlemen have expressed the opinion that the results of that conference were very poor. Of course one's opinion would depend altogether on the point of view taken at the commencement of the conference last year. Those who founded hopes on the past attitude of the British parliament or the British government, and upon the past attitude of the Canadian parliament or the parliaments of other British colonies, may be disappointed. But those who, all through the discussion of imperial progress that has been going on for the last three or four years, have entertained the hope that the moment will soon come when the true principles of real British imperialism will take hold of the common sense of the people, have no reason to be disappointed. For my part, I entirely agree with these words that have been put into the mouth of His Excellency :

> I feel assured that much good will result from bringing the leading public men of the great self governing colonies into direct contact with each other and with the statesmen of the motherland.

That bringing together has been the means of clearing the clouds, the delusive clouds, that have been raised by the conference of 1897 as well as by the South African war. Colonial statesmen have had reason to see that the only practical British imperialism, as it existed in the mind of Mr. Chamberlain and his associates, meant simply and solely a contribution by the colonies to the British army and navy with a few compliments here and there to satisfy them in return. And British statesmen have been made to understand that we have passed the period of excitement, to which I do not wish to refer now, when popular feelings were aroused to the highest pitch by excited speeches of public men in this country as well as in other parts of the British empire. Then perhaps the British public and the British parliament had been led to understand that we were ready to sacrifice something of our autonomy and self government, and of the respect we owe to the past and the future of our country; but now those delusions have been dissolved by the firm, discreet and dignified attitude of the colonial statesmen and especially the statesmen of Australia and Canada.

In that report which has given so little satisfaction to the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier there are many interesting things. I have read that document with care, and I have found that though, in the resolutions adopted, very little of new policy is proposed for Great Britain or the colonies, yet, a good deal of common sense understanding has been arrived at between the imperial authorities and the colonial authorities. I must, however, express immediately my dissent from one decision which was arrived at unanimously by the members of that conference—and in this I agree with the leader of the opposition. I mean that the discussions of the conference had better been made public at once, and that a full report of the discussion should have been published ; especially when I see that a motion was proposed and adopted unanimously that like conferences should be held every fourth year. If the colonial representatives are to meet the representatives of the British government to discuss matters of imperial interests. I hold that the principle should be laid down at once—at the very least it should be insisted upon by the Canadian parliament as well as by other self-respecting parliaments of the British empire—that no discussion that may have as a result a change of policy of the empire shall be carried on in secret. I think it should be a well understood principle of imperial conference that the people of the British empire at large should know from day to day what is going on among their representatives.

The speech that was delivered at the opening of that conference by the Colonial Secretary is a very interesting one, as all the utterances of that statesman are. And I think it is quite illustrative of what I said at the opening of these remarks as to the real aims of the British imperialists, and the real meaning of British imperialism as it exists in the mind of Mr.

Chamberlain. As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier says, Mr. Chamberlain referred to three main subjects that were to be discussed—the political relations, the military relations, and the commercial relations. So far as the political relations are concerned, he thought that we should allow matters to move very slowly indeed. As to the military relations, he thought the time had come when the colonies should tax themselves to contribute to the British army and navy. But in commercial matters, he thought that Great Britain could do nothing for the colonies unless the colonies should adopt a policy that, admittedly, it would be suicidal for them to adopt.

As I have said, the only resolution that was adopted, so far as political relations were concerned, was one in favor of a conference being held every fourth year between representatives of the colonies and of the British government. I may say at once that I have no objection to conferences being held when they are required. But I say that no Canadian statesman should leave the soil of Canada to represent the Canadian people in any assembly of that kind, without having previously stated clearly to the people of Canada what policy he was prepared to support, what propositions he was ready to make or to oppose. Before leaving Canada on such a mission, Canadian statesmen should have from this parliament a clear mandate to guide them, which should definitely point out what conduct they are to pursue. That is what was done last session by this government, that is what was done by the government of Australia on the last occasions ; but unfortunately that was not done before the conference of 1897.

On the ground of military relations, the right hon. leader of the government stated this afternoon that propositions were made by the British government for contributions by the colonies in support of the army and navy. These propositions were strongly supported by the first Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Selborne, and by the Secretary of War, Mr. Brodrick. The Prime Minister of New Zealand supported Mr. Chamberlain on this occasion and moved two resolutions, found on pages 9 and 27, of the blue book, one referring to the army and the other to the navy. The reply of the Canadian government was exactly what was expected of it by the Canadian people. This afternoon we heard from the member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) the conclusion of that reply, and I will read to the House the first paragraph, which indicates still more clearly the position of the Canadian government :

> The Canadian ministers regret that they have been unable to assent to the suggestions made by Lord Selborne respecting the navy, and by Mr. St. John Brodrick respecting the army. The ministers desire to point out that their objections arise, not so much from the expense involved, as from a belief that the acceptance of the proposals would entail an important departure from the principle of colonial self-government. Canada values highly the measure of local independence which has been granted it from time to time by the imperial authorities, and which has been so productive of beneficial results, both as respects the material progress of the country and the strengthening of the ties that bind it to the motherland. But while, for these reasons, the Canadian ministers are obliged to withhold their assent to the propositions of the Admiralty and the War Office, they fully appreciate the duty of the Dominion, as it advances in population and wealth, to make more liberal outlays for those necessary preparations of self defence which every country has to assume and bear.

To this, Mr. Speaker, no Canadian has any objection to make. For my part I may say that as long as the Canadian government remains within the bounds fixed by themselves on this occasion, they will receive my hearty support. But the course is not yet clear. Every one knows that Mr. Chamberlain is not a man to abandon, upon the first repulse, any scheme upon which he has set his heart. Even recently, during his trip to South Africa where he went to enlighten himself upon some problems which, unfortunately for his country and the honor of the empire, he did not study some three or four years ago, he has thought proper to address what I may call a lesson of warning to the other self-governing colonies, stating that they must realize what their duties are. The Minister of Militia and Defence, since his return from the old country, has clearly stated upon two or three occasions what he thought the duty of Canada was in regard to defence. With the general tone of his argument I agree entirely. I would have no objection whatever to the Canadian government taking hold, for example, of the fortifications of Esquimault and Halifax, and relieving the British government of the expense of defending those fortifications. I have no objection whatever, on the contrary I am desirous that the Minister of Militia and Defence should take steps to put the Canadian militia upon a proper footing, provided always that he sticks to the principle he has laid down himself that these preparations and this expense are made with the sole view of enabling Canadians to defend the soil of Canada. Well, Sir, in the very report we have here, in the paper which was presented to the conference from Col. Altham, Assistant Quartermaster General, we find these paragraphs.

> In the event of war with the United States it is on this Canadian militia that must depend the entire safety of Canada until reinforcements arrive from England. It may, therefore, be concluded that the best way in which Canada can co-operate in imperial defence is by making her militia an efficient force. It is more important that the Canadian ministers should be strongly pressed to take this reasonable precaution than that they should maintain contingents for general imperial service. . . . The strategical position of Canada makes it however, unwise that any very large contingent should be drawn from her defence force unless the strength of that force should in the future be increased. It is suggested therefore that if a Canadian imperial force be organized, it should be limited, for the present, to a brigade division of field artillery and a brigade of infantry. The force might be organized on lines similar to those suggested for Australia.

So we find in a report from one of the officers of the British army, made at the request of the British Minister of War, who was so anxious to obtain a permanent contribution from Canada, that the only safe way in which Canada could contribute to the defence of the empire was by looking after her own militia and keeping her soldiers at home.

But as I have already said, we must not be too confident. True, the wind has changed, and I am glad of it. There are many people now in Canada saying exactly what I said some three years ago. But when we speak of the defence of Canada, even then we should not lose our heads, and should not ask the Canadian people to make a large expenditure of money upon the organization of their militia without having some idea of what that militia would be required for. In one of the speeches that we find coming from the Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Sir Frederick Borden) he has gone a little farther than that. He has gone to the point of saying, if we are to believe the reports of his speech published in the Canadian papers, that not only should we organize a proper militia force for the defence of this country but that we should put it upon such a footing that in case of an imperial war we would have an army ready to go to the defence of the empire elsewhere also.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. Sir Frederick Borden). I was not correctly reported.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am glad to have given the hon. minister an opportunity to deny that report, because it was received with confidence by some people in Canada. Some few years ago General French made a similar suggestion under the inspiration of the enthusiasm then prevailing in the colonies. To quote his own language, he said :

Having had an experience of a dozen years in Canada, and a similar amount in Australia, mostly with colonial forces, I would like to make two points clear : (1) It is idle to hope or expect that any large force of imperial troops, paid at imperial rates, could be raised in these colonies for ordinary garrison work or duties in peace time. (2) It is equally certain that thousands of men can be raised in war time, who will engage for the war at a fair rate of pay.

The real way, in my opinion, to help Old England to keep the flag flying all over the empire is to form war reserves in the colonies. In doing so the specialities of the colonies should be borne in mind. Thus Canada, with her 75,000 sailors and fishermen on the Atlantic seaboard, should provide a large war reserve for the fleet, and probably would do so if the Admiralty, instead of framing cast-iron regulations suitable for Great Britain, would appreciate the fact that the most suitable time to carry out the training of these fishermen would be the time of year when they could not carry on their usual avocations.

According to General French and several other authorities in England, the best way to carry out their scheme is not to go further with a straight demand or request from the colonies and from Canada in particular to supply them either with contributions or an organized imperial corps to be at the disposal of the imperial government; but the scheme is to stir up the spirit of militarism, to increase the number of the militia, to create a large naval reserve, and thereby to have always a prepared ground in order to fill the deficiencies which they find increasing every day in their army and navy. We have seen a delegate from the Navy League of England who came to Canada to organize a branch of the league. Of course, I suppose gentlemen who have been lately in England know that the Navy League is not taken very seriously in the old country; in fact, I might say it is considered a little ridiculous, and therefore I do not think that by joining the league several of our public men have acted very judiciously. But if the matter is going to be no more ridiculous, it is simply because it will become obnoxious. The now avowed purpose of that league is to come and find in the colonies the men for the army and the navy which the people of Great Britain refuse to supply. Seeing that they cannot find among the English and Scotch population the required recruits for the army and navy, their purpose is to come into the colonies to further the sentiment of militarism, to work upon some of that imperial sentiment which was raised by the South African war, in order to find amongst the sturdy population of the colonies what they cannot find at home. Therefore, as far as that matter is concerned, though I do not imagine that great results will come out of it, I regret to see that the names of four of our ministers are connected with it. In one of the reports it was said that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was the honorary president and the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence was the ice-president; in another report the positions were reversed, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence being at the head, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries coming after. Perhaps it is that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not quite ready yet to take the lead of the army and navy and I have no doubt that the league has relied more on the soldierly disposition of the Minister for War. I also find the names of the hon. Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher). I would simply beg of these two gentlemen to wait a little before going into the Navy League. I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice to wait and see what the result will be of the Alaskan tribunal, to wait and see what is the policy of the British government as regards Canadian interests towards the United States, before he shows too much zeal for the British navy; and I would ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture to await the results of our efforts to have the embargo removed from Canadian cattle before he accepts any high position in the navy of the empire.

Mr. MACLEAN. The fishermen ought to be in the navy.

Mr. BOURASSA. I may say that the whole movement, as far as military defence is concerned, and as far as British interests in that defence are concerned, may be summed up as an imperialistic policy as Lord Rosebery put it so well some nine years ago when he left the Liberal party and before he made up his mind to become himself one of the upholders of the imperialistic movement. The British government have trebled the area of the empire and have therefore increased in a great way the burdens of the British people as far as military defence is concerned. The land owners of England stick to the most stubborn and the most antiquated land tenure which now exists in any civilized country. They have been the cause of depopulating the farming districts of England, of sending to the colonies the most energetic and intelligent men of the kingdom, and of dividing the others between the skilled labourers and the inhabitants of the slums of the big cities. The skilled labourers and farm labourers will not enter the army and navy; and therefore the British authorities have to rely on the slums to supply recruits for the army and navy, and British politicians are scared at the idea of adopting the only policy that is possible for an imperial country which is bent upon conquest and the acquisition of territory, and that is conscription. Now, because of the indifference or incapacity of the British people, because of the selfishness of the British land owners, because of the timidity of the British politicians, we, the settlers of the colonies, we, who have so many sacrifices ahead of us yet to make in order to develop our country and to contribute to the real glory of the empire, we would be bound to make up for these deficiencies and to bleed ourselves in order to do what the British people are either unable or unwilling to do.

Now, Sir, as far as the requirements of defence in Canada are concerned, without giving any advice to the Minister of Militia, I simply say this: That as Colonel Altham says, and as any man who is a little observant of the politics of the world would say, the only enemy which Canada may possibly have to confront is the United States. Is the hon. minister, or is any man of common sense in this House, prepared to say that by increasing our militia by 25,000 or by 50,000 men, we are going to lessen the danger of invasion by the United States? We might benefit by that increase for a fortnight or for a month, but when every one knows that the state of New York alone could throw upon the soil of Canada as many soldiers as we could enlist to defend our frontier from Halifax to Victoria, it is just as well we should not lose our heads when we speak of defending ourselves against the United States—even with the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Gourley) and his whole family in the trenches. As to a war with the United States being caused by Canada, is there any government either Conservative or Liberal that would act so foolishly as to bring about such a calamity upon the people of Canada? And so far as the motherland is concerned, when we see that year after year our interests in connection with the United States have been sacrificed by the imperial government in order to secure the friendship of the United States, we need not be too much excited as to the danger of war between Canada and the American republic. Sir, if the day should come when we shall be able to withstand an attack from the United States, it will be when we have developed our resources, and increased our population; and the best way for us to do that is not to induce the young men of Canada to enter the militia or the navy, either British or Canadian; not by expending the money of the people upon military preparations; but it is by devoting every cent we can take from the people to develop Canadian industries, Canadian agriculture, Canadian manufactures, Canadian transportation, thus increasing in so far as we can the population and wealth of the country. That is the best way to contribute to the defence of Canada; it is the best way to contribute to the defence of the empire, and it is the way by which we will prove that we are not only true Canadians, but also true imperialists in the real sense of the word.

Now, Sir, in so far as trade relations are concerned, I may say that I was pleased at the position taken by our delegate at the imperial conference. In his opening address, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain referred in a somewhat patronizing way to the policy which had been adopted by Canada towards the motherland in trade matters. He said that, of course, as a matter of sentiment he was quite happy that Canada had adopted a preferential policy, but he intimated in so many words that he did not care much for it. I am very glad that the Canadian representatives gave the proper answer to the Colonial Secretary when they said:

If after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the empire, the Canadian government should find that the principle of preferential trade is not acceptable to the colonies generally, or the mother country, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions.

The leader of the opposition has found fault with this reply. He says that it was not clear enough, that it did not intimate the course that the Canadian government was going to follow. Well, Sir, it is not too strongly expressed to say that it would have been a piece of impudence on the part of our representatives to announce the policy of the Canadian parliament to the Colonial Secretary without coming back to Canada and taking parliament into their confidence before deciding what course they were going to follow. The language of the reply of the Canadian representatives is exactly what it should have been. It intimated to the British government that under a change of conditions, the position of the British government being different from what it was when we adopted our preferential policy, that the Canadian government would remain free to adopt whatever course it thought best. Of course, I am not in a position of a minister of the Crown, and consequently I may express my opinion more candidly, and so I say that in the face of the declaration of the Colonial Secretary, in the face of the now clear policy of the British government not to sacrifice one iota of their foreign trade in favour of the British colonies, I hope the time is not far distant when we will prove to the British people that we are as much attached to our interests as they are to theirs; and if we do not repeal immediately the preferential treatment of British goods, I hope we will at least come back to the common-sense policy that was adopted by this government in 1897, when they offered the preference to any country which would give in return fair trade arrangements with Canada. That was a true liberal policy. That was a true liberal stand to take, when we said that we were ready to deal on fair terms with any country, foreign or British, that was ready to deal on fair terms with us. Under a wave of loyalty, we changed that policy; but having come back to our senses, we should also come back to that common-sense policy as originally adopted in 1897.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has found fault with the Canadian representatives because they did not bring before the conference the matter of the embargo. I am afraid that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has been too busy lately in the counties of Maisonneuve, Two Mountains, Argenteuil and Terrebonne, to study the report carefully, or else he would have found that the question of the embargo was brought before the conference by the Canadian representatives. At page 41 of the report he will find :

The representatives of Canada desired to bring before the conference the question of the law under which live cattle imported into this country from Canada are required to be slaughtered at the port of landing.

It was considered, however, that the matter was not of sufficient general interest to be dealt with by the conference, and arrangements were made for its discussion privately with the President of the Board of Agriculture.

Therefore, if fault there was, it did not lie with our representatives but with the other members of the conference, who put that matter aside. Of course, I suppose informal negotiations were held between the president of the Board of Agriculture and the Canadian representatives, but the result is, as hon. gentlemen know, that the British minister declared positively and bluntly that he would not change the law, and put Canadian cattle on a fair basis, but that he would still go on stamping Canadian cattle as diseased, when it is a well known fact that Canadian cattle are perfectly free from disease, while British cattle are diseased. But there is something which was not known then and which is known now, and which throws a clear light upon the conduct of the British government, and especially of Mr. Hanbury. That is, that cattle from the Argentine Republic are now admitted to the British market on better terms than are Canadian cattle. Without wishing to hurt the feelings of any members of this House who have found fault with my attitude towards the mother country during the past three years, I may be allowed to ask them : What is the result of our great loyalty ? Where is the return for our great sacrifices, when we see that a foreign government which has contributed nothing else to an imperial war but agricultural products for which they got well paid, is now receiving better treatment from the British government than is loyal Canada ?

But Sir, this is not the only instance which should prove to us that if we want to have our own interests protected we should ourselves look to our own interests and not expect any great favour from the British government. What did we see last fall ? After the treaty of peace was concluded in South Africa, after the British government had pledged themselves to restock the farms in South Africa, 18,000 ploughs were bought from a single manufacturing house in the United States. I ask my good friends, the representatives from Ontario, either on one side of the House or on the other, what they think of that action of the British government, in passing over all the good Canadian manufacturers, to go and ask our American neighbours to help them in re-stocking the farms in South Africa which our soldiers helped to conquer for Great Britain ? We have also seen, in the month of September last, a cattle dealer from the Argentine Republic coming to Montreal and boasting that he with some of his associates had made a contract with the British government for $1,000,000 worth of cattle to be sent to South Africa for the purpose of re-stocking the farms. We have seen also that with a single milling house of the United States the British government made a contract for 75,000 bags of flour ; but we do not hear that any contract has been made with any Canadian house. We have also seen in the papers that since last session our flour dealers made an application to the British government, through the proper authorities, for exemption from the registration duty on the flour shipped from Canada to European ports, and simply passing through England ; just as we allow goods from England to pass in bond through Canada to the United States without charging any duty upon them. But our dealers have still to pay the duty of 18 cents to the British government on flour which is not to be consumed by the British people, but is shipped to the markets of continental Europe. Lord Strathcona applied to the British government, and was told that nothing could be done.

But I think that good will which was to be secured for us by our loyalty was shown in an ironical way when it was announced by some of the Toronto papers last year that the mule camp which had been established in Montana during the South African war, was to be transferred to Canada. In fact, it was transferred, but a few days later peace was concluded ; so that the American dealers had the good fortune of making profitable contracts with the British government without contributing a cent or a man to the war, while Canadians are still waiting for their profits.

I need not refer to the reception which was given to our Canadian officers and soldiers in London at the time of the coronation. We have heard a great deal of that in the press. We have been told, though I hope that before the session is over we shall be informed that the statement is not true, that our representatives on the Canadian contingent were quartered near the Alexandra palace, and that the good Londoners were charged a shilling apiece to see them. I hope at least that we have the proceeds of that show, because I think that they should be used to put up a monument in Canada in remembrance of the great reception accorded to our soldiers in London. We were told also that had the coronation taken place at the time fixed for it, it being delayed unfortunately by the sickness of the King, our soldiers, who had gone there in the expectation that they would parade nobly along with the other representatives of the colonies in London, were going to be used as a police force at the corners of the London streets in order to prevent the rowdies of Whitechapel from obstructing the members of the British aristocracy in passing through the streets. I was told that this was so true that our representatives had to protest strenuously, and that it took them a long time to bring the British officials to understand that our men had not been sent there to act as policemen.

The question of treaties has been dealt with at length, and I am not going to speak at any length upon it. I have already spoken, during the last two or three sessions, on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and on the Alaskan boundary treaty. On the Alaskan question especially, I am not free to say all I would like to say. I merely wish to add this, that taking the situation that was made for us by the repeal of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without any compensation being granted to Canada in the way of a fair settlement of the Alaskan boundary, the Canadian government could not do otherwise than accept the constitution of the tribunal as it is now. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has made a slight mistake in his reply to the Prime Minister. He has stated that the Prime Minister, in accepting the constitution of the tribunal as it is, simply removed from the present treaty the impediments which existed in the Venezuela treaty. But there is something more than that which the hon. member has forgotten or perhaps does not know—that there were not only those impediments in the Venezuela treaty, but that still more impediments were added by the American commissioners on the Joint High Commission—that in the last protocol which has been read in this House by the Prime Minister himself, it was stated that the American commissioners would not consent to any tribunal of arbitration, either of six jurists or of any other number, without the condition that any territory occupied by the United States, not only for ten years or thirty years, but at any time,—such as Dyea and Skaguay,—should remain the territory of the United States, wherever the line of demarcation might be fixed by the tribunal of arbitration. Now, I am not prepared to say that the proposed tribunal will give us satisfaction or that the treaty is the best that could have been secured two or three years ago ; but what I am prepared to say is this, that taking the position in which the British government placed themselves when they denounced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the Canadian government achieved a great success when they secured the removal of the condition which had been fixed by the Americans four years ago.

We must not forget one thing, that the position of England towards the United States is not to-day what it was four years ago. When I am making references to the bad will of the British government towards Canada, especially in connection with our relations to the Americans, I am simply stating the facts as they are. If I were called upon to pass judgment on the policy of the British government, many things could be said in favour of that policy. The government of England and the people of England do not occupy a position in which they can do as they like. The last war in South Africa has not made for Great Britain throughout the world such a glorious and safe position that she is able, for the sake of a strip of territory claimed by Canada, to exact from the government of the United States conditions which she might have exacted some years ago.

And the Canadian people, who did so much to fortify the position of the British government, at the time of the South African war, and the Canadian parliament who supported the British government in its South African policy, must abide by the consequences of that policy. And, if today, Great Britain is not in a position, either from a diplomatic or military point of view, to take a self-assertive policy towards the government of the United States, the people and parliament of Canada cannot have much to say. I have no desire to develop among Canadians any feeling of hostility to Great Britain, but we may as well realize once for all that, so far as our relations with the United States are concerned, it is perfectly useless for us to expect any strong support from the British government. Great Britain is not in a position to give us that support. All our public men who went to London last year, whether ministers of the Crown or ordinary members of parliament, whether in favour of an imperial policy or against it, would, if they were free to speak their minds, admit that their intercourse with British public men has convinced them that the one great object of British policy for many years to come is to secure at any cost the friendship of the United States. When in England myself, I was told by Liberals and Conservatives and even by men close to the government, that it was useless for Canadians to indulge in the expectation that Great Britain would do anything in the way of treaties or trade which would offer the slightest impediment or friction to her relations with the United States. Therefore we may as well at once make up our minds to look to ourselves alone, save what we can and sacrifice what we cannot help.

There is one point upon which I regret somewhat that a resolution was not adopted by the imperial conference. I refer to the subject of martial law and the suspension of the constitution of Cape Colony, which involved the right of the imperial authorities to suspend the constitution of any free British colony. Unfortunately the subject of martial law has not been discussed in this country. It has been a subject of discussion in England, and came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which gave a decision that reversed the hitherto recognized principle of colonial self-government. The agitation for the suspension of the constitution of Cape Colony fortunately was stopped. Although no resolution was adopted by the conference, I was glad to read in the London newspapers that our representatives were consulted as well as the Australian delegates, and that they gave Mr. Chamberlain their straight opinion that the policy of suspension would be most improper. We are interested in that question because it involves the right of the British parliament to suspend or alter in any way the constitution of any British colony. I agree entirely in the opinion of Mr. Haldane, one of England's authorities in these matters, that once a free British colony has been given representative institutions these institutions cannot be altered or suspended by any authority other than its own parliament.

On the whole, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly satisfied with the result of the imperial conference and the position taken by our representatives. That position may be criticised in certain quarters, but the vast majority of our people will say that our delegates did their duty as Canadian statesmen and British citizens. We may differ on many points of the imperial question: we may have differed bitterly on the policy of the government during the South African war, but those days have passed. As my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has said, peace is made in South Africa, and I am glad that peace was concluded on terms that were acceptable. For my part, I am anxious that peace should also prevail in Canada. Whatever may be our theories as regards imperialism, we should all meet on one common ground and that is that our only policy should be to protect our interests against those of any other part of the empire, even Great Britain.

The reaction of Canadian sentiment against imperialism has made itself felt, not only upon this side of the House, but also the other side, and is particularly noticeable on the part of the two leaders of the Conservative party. This afternoon the leader of the opposition referred to the question of Japanese immigration, although he did so in much milder terms than when he spoke in British Columbia. On the 8th of September there was a meeting in Victoria, at which he made a very eloquent and able speech. Referring to the disallowance of the Immigration Act of British Columbia by this government, he said:

> I venture to think that so far as this province is concerned, and dealing with the question of disallowance of your statutes, there is no imperial consideration which should prevail against your views or your wishes, as there was no imperial consideration to prevail against similar legislation in Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand and Natal. Why was not the Natal Act disallowed ? And if there be no answer to this question, why should the federal authorities disallow your Act.

I am happy to see that the hon. gentleman is becoming an anti-imperialist. And as far as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is concerned, I was glad also to see that at two meetings held in the province of Quebec—at St. Eustache and St. Jacques de l'Achigan—he opposed the scheme of imperial defence and protested against any other than trade questions being discussed by the conference.

I hope that this sentiment of Canadianism will prevail on both sides, and that in matters of political and military organization and fiscal policy, the one object we shall have in view will be to safeguard the interests of Canada above every other.

ADJOURNMENT—MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONK. Before the motion passes, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance when we may expect the explanation of ministerial changes which we were told by the right hon. leader of the House would be given after the adoption of the address.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was about to say that by direction of the Prime Minister I am to inform the House that on Tuesday next that right hon. gentleman will make the customary statement of ministerial changes.

Mr. MONK. The reason I ask is that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is obliged to be absent on Tuesday, and if it would be as convenient to make the explanation on Wednesday, it might better meet his wishes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps we might let the matter stand until Monday, when, if it be desired, across the floor, arrangements may be made to meet the convenience of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax). For the present, I would not like to depart from the information that the right hon. the leader of the House gave me.

ELECTION PETITION.—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that I have received from the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada a certified copy of the judgment of the said court in the matter of the election appeal for the electoral district of St. James, by which the judgment of the trial judges in the lower court annulling the said election was affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

And on the appeal from that portion of the judgment of the trial judges in the lower court wherein the appellant has been found guilty of corrupt practices, the judges of the Supreme Court being equally divided on the said question, the appeal stands dismissed and the judgment of the Hon. Sir Melbourne M. Tait and the Hon. L. O. Loranger, declaring that the appellant was guilty of corrupt practices was affirmed.

The trial judges having reported that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in the election, I have, in conformity with sections 48, chap. 9, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, withheld the issue of my warrant for a new election, pending any action to be taken by the House in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the North-west Mounted Police for 1902.—Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Report of the Department of Railways and Canals for the year ended 30th June, 1902.—Hon. Mr. Blair.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended 30th June, 1902.—Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 3) to amend the Dominion Elections Act.—Mr. Charlton.

Bill (No. 4) respecting telephone companies.—Mr. Maclean.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.—PROGRESS ESTIMATES.

Mr. J. CHARLTON (North Norfolk) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 2) to amend the Railway Act as concerns the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of railways therein mentioned, 63 and 64 Vic., chap. 8.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Explain.

Mr. CHARLTON. It refers to grants made upon progress estimates, subsidy grants. It merely asks to have the minimum sum changed from $60,000 to $30,000.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.—TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 5) to amend the Railway Act. He said : The substance of this Bill is that every railway company that gives any facilities to any telephone company shall give equal and the same facilities to any other company applying for them on exactly the same conditions. At the present moment the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and other railway companies in this country have made an agreement with the Bell Telephone Company whereby the latter has a monopoly in telephone entrance to the stations of these companies. I say that is against public policy, it is an unfair discrimination, it is against the spirit of the Railway Act which holds a railway company bound to give all express companies equal facilities. This Bill simply provides that equal facilities shall be given to all telephone companies or persons who desire access to the railway stations of the various railway companies. I would like to know from the Minister of Railways and Canals whether he will accept this principle, especially in view of this fact, that if the government were now to say that they would accept the principle of this Bill a large number of private independent telephone lines would be started all over this country. It would be a great assistance to trade and to the social life of this country if these telephone systems were inaugurated.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CATTLE GUARDS ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This is the same Bill that was discussed in the House last session with regard to cattle guards on highway crossings.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

JUDGES RETIRING ALLOWANCES.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to amend chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes with respect to retiring allowances of judges.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the nature of the Bill?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The object of the bill is to provide that judges of the Superior Court who have attained a certain age, for instance, 75 years, and who have served a certain number of years on the bench are authorized to retire on full pay.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Expropriation Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the nature of this Bill?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This Bill is a reproduction of a Bill introduced last session to enable the government to expropriate in trust a limited estate in property; for instance, if the government wishes to expropriate a quarry only for a limited period of time it will enable the government to do so. If the government give notice of expropriation and afterwards ascertain that the property is not required for public purposes, this Bill wil enable the government to withdraw from the expropriation and abandon the property subject to the usual condition, that it will pay the damages incurred in the interval. Provision is also made to enable the government in the event of a property having been expropriated, to remedy the damages which have been incurred through addition of other works which may be necessary.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

YUKON TERRITORY ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to amend the Yukon Territory Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the nature of this Bill?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. An ordinance has been passed by the local authorities of the Yukon in respect to the summoning of jurors, as some doubt has been expressed about the rights of the Yukon council to pass such legislation, this Bill is introduced to give full effect to it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS—NEW BRUNSWICK.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 10) to amend the Act relating to the custody of juvenile offenders in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I suppose this is in consequence of the recent difficulty in that province?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes, as a result of the Godsoe case in New Brunswick. There is an omission, evidently, in the Criminal Code. In the Criminal Code provision is made for the removal of juvenile offenders from the penitentiary to the reformatory, but there is no provision for the converse case; that is to say for the removal from the reformatory to the penitentiary.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLICATION OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) to amend the Act respecting the publication of the Statutes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the nature of this Bill?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This is merely to make provision for the payment of certain fees to which a certain official is entitled when he is applied to for a copy of a Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMORAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) introduced Bill (No. 12) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Explain please.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This Bill is directed against the immoral and indecent plays and entertainments that occasionally take place in some large cities. It is for the purpose of providing more severe punishments for those who indulge in that pastime, and it is introduced at the suggestion of the recorder of the city of Montreal, and approved by other persons in that city.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the nature of the Bill ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This is to settle a mere matter of procedure. Under the Election Act now it is necessary that the trial should take place in the county where the election is held, and it is at times more convenient that the election trial should be held in the city adjoining the county. The Election Act makes no provision for transferring the trial from a place within the county to a place outside the county, or vice versa. Take for instance the case of the county of Quebec ; if an election takes place in the county of Quebec, which is my own county, and there is a trial, it will be necessary for the judge to sit within the county, whereas, the city of Quebec is immediately alongside of it and has all the conveniences necessary to the holding of a court, and it is to enable that to be done that this Bill is introduced.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There are never any election protests in the province of Quebec?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not now, but then we never can tell what may happen in the future.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked (Translation.) :

Is it the intention of the government to introduce, during the present session, legislation amending the Act respecting Judges of the Provincial Courts, with a view either to increase the salaries of the judges generally, or to equalize the said salaries according to circumstances of residence, cost of living, &c., &c.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick.) (Translation.) In answer to the hon. gentleman, let me tell him that the matter is now under consideration by the government.

TICKET OF LEAVE SYSTEM.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. How many persons have been released from imprisonment under the Ticket of Leave Acts, since the first of January, 1902, to the 12th of March, 1903 ?
2. What are the names of such persons ?
3. Of what offences had they been convicted, and at what dates were they so convicted ?
4. At what dates were they so released from imprisonment ?
5. Have any of the licenses or tickets of leave so granted been revoked ; and if any, how many ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). The information necessary to enable me to answer the first and fifth paragraphs is not now available, but it will be here in a few minutes. As to the second, I do not think it would be in the public interest that the names of the persons should be given. In respect to paragraphs 3 and 4, I think it would perhaps be more convenient if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) would move for a return, because we find it practically impossible to give, within the brief scope of an answer to a question, the information he asks for.

EXERCISE OF PREROGATIVE OF PARDON.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. In how many instances was the prerogative of pardon exercised by His Excellency the Governor General in cases of conviction for offences against Federal or Provincial Laws since the first day of January, 1902, to the 12th of March, 1903 ?
2. What are the names of the persons in whose favour the prerogative of pardon was so exercised during the said period ?
3. Of what offences had the said persons been convicted ?
4. To what penalties had the said persons been condemned ?
5. At what dates were the convictions pronounced against the said persons ?
6. At what date was the prerogative of pardon exercised in each case ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). The answer to the preceding question will practically apply to this one. With respect to the first part of the question, I shall have the information in a few moments; with respect to the second, I do not think it would be in the public interest that the names of the persons should be given; and, with regard to the third, fourth, fifth and sixth parts, a return will probably be the most convenient form for giving the information.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

In view of the judgment delivered on the 15th of December, 1902, by the Supreme Court of Canada, in a case of Michael Power, appellant, and Judson McGriffin, and another, respondents, is it the intention of the government to introduce, at the present session, an Act to amend subsection one of section thirty-seven of the Patent Act, as amended by section two of chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1890, and amended by section one of chapter thirty-three of the statutes of 1891, and amended by section six of the statutes of 1892, so as to provide :—

(a.) That no patent shall be held to have been avoided by reason of the failure of the patentee or his assigns to commence and carry on the construction of the patented invention in Canada, unless such patentee and his assigns be shown to have failed to supply such patented invention on demand duly made to them ?

(b.) That more than one extension of such delay to manufacture may be granted ?

(c.) That extensions of the delays to manufacture and to import, signed by the acting deputy commissioner of patents, be declared to be valid for all purposes ?

(d.) That such intended legislation be declaratory of the law as contained in the Acts hereinbefore mentioned ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). It is the intention of the government to introduce a Bill to amend the Patent Act during the present session, and to include some amendments arising out of the judgment to which my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) refers.

GRAIN IMPORTATIONS THROUGH WESTERN ONTARIO PORTS, 1902.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

What were the grain receipts of all kinds at the Ports of Midland, Depot Harbour, Collingwood, Owen Sound, Meaford, Goderich, Sarnia, Kingston and Prescott, during the season of navigation of 1902 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. William Paterson). When the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Bennett's) question was observed on the order paper, the following telegram was sent to the collectors of customs at the ports referred to :

Wire total quantity of grain of all kinds received at your port during the season of navigation, 1902.

To this we have the answers, as follow :

	Bushels.
Midland	15,017,760
Depot Harbour	12,710,303
Collingwood	2,447,824
Owen Sound	1,794,381
Meaford	2,563,311
Goderich	2,226,660
Sarnia
Kingston	6,848,000
Prescott	97,749

An answer has not yet been received from Sarnia. But I can, perhaps, hand that to the hon. gentleman when it is received.

MANUFACTURE OF WOOD ALCOHOL.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. At what places, if any, in Canada is wood alcohol manufactured ?
2. What is the output of said article, if any, at Longford, Ontario ?
3. Is the output of said article purchased exclusively by the Department of Inland Revenue?
4. Is any person or persons free to embark in such business in Canada ; and if so, subject to what regulations, if any, or restrictions, if any ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). In the absence of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Bernier), I beg to answer the hon. gentleman's questions as follows :

1. So far as the department is aware, wood alcohol is manufactured at Deseronto, Fenelon Falls, and Longford, in the province of Ontario, and at Cookshire, in the province of Quebec.
2. The department has no data as to the output at Longford.
3. No.
4. The production of wood alcohol or wood naphtha is not subject to excise, and any person may embark in its manufacture in Canada.

VALLEYFIELD POST OFFICE.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Has the government finally decided to build a post office at Valleyfield, in the county of Beauharnois ?
2. If not, when was that decision arrived at ?
3. Has the government purchased a piece of land for that purpose ?
4. From whom did the government buy that land, and for what amount ?
5. How long has the person who sold that land to the government had possession of it, and from whom was it obtained by him ?
6. Was the land so purchased by the government the property of Mr. George M. Loy, M.P.?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. James Sutherland) :

1. Yes.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Yes.
4. R. W. Johnston, $10,000.
5 and 6. From the 14th July, 1902; from the then owner, Mr. Loy.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A LAW LIBRARY IN LONDON, ENGLAND.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN moves for (Translation.) :

Copies of all documents, letters, correspondence and papers in connection with the establishment in London of a law library for the use of counsel retained in cases before the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

The motion which I am now making aims at having certain papers laid on the table which concern the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, lawyers and their clients, that is to say, those who are amenable to tribunals and the general public in Canada. As is well known by members of the bar engaged in cases before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England, it is extremely difficult for them to have access to the London law libraries, where they could find proper authorities to bring in support of their cases, to their own satisfaction and that of their clients. With the hon. minister's leave (Mr. Fitzpatrick), I would tell the House I had several interviews with the hon. gentleman on the matter, and there is, I think, in his department, a correspondence bearing on the same. As I said, it is no easy task for members of the Bar visiting London in connection with the proceedings of the Privy Council—and here I refer not only to the lawyers from the province of Quebec, but also to those from the other provinces—to have access to the required law books and judicial reports. True, there are to be found large law libraries at Lincoln's Inn and Temple Bar ; but the trouble is that, for one to have access to such libraries it is necessary to be introduced by a London lawyer or barrister, who is a member of that corporation, without mentioning the loss of time involved in going so far from the place where the Privy Council sittings are held. Now, as to the members of the Quebec Bar, I may say that they experience a still greater inconvenience, and as a matter of fact, it is almost impossible for them, as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is well aware, to have access to the desired law books. That some of those law books are to be found in the large libraries just referred to is quite true ; but the few works one may find there, are only such works as may satisfy the curiosity of a chance reader, or be serviceable to such students as wish to pursue their studies in comparative legislation. So, for instance, I may say that the last time I visited London I noticed that in the catalogue of Lincoln's Inn there were no such works as Dalloz's repertoire, Laurent, Beaudry-Lacantantinerie, and the French Pandects and Sirey. Those works which are of great value, and I may say indispensable to those who have cases to argue before the Privy Council, are not to be found in those libraries. Under those circumstances, it often happens that lawyers are under the necessity of bringing across with them a pretty large library, or else to have the required extracts copied out of those works. In the former cases, it is easy to realize the inconvenience experienced by counsel who are engaged in cases before the Privy Council. Then as to having such extracts as are required for the pleadings copied out of the law books, there is this draw-back that, when they appear before the Judiciary Committee, they experience some trouble in having those extracts accepted by the tribunal ; so that high as may be their standing at the Bar, they are nevertheless open to suspicion. So, I think, under such circumstances, it is highly desirable that a law library should be established by the government in the High Commissioner's office in London ; not a very large library, but one at least in which the best French and English law books would be at the disposal of members of the Bar. Should one find there a collection of the standard works and reports of French courts, it would undoubtedly be quite sufficient. It would also be exceedingly convenient for us to have access to the standard English law books and to the statutes and reports of all our provincial courts as well. I think this would give the members of the Bar engaged in cases before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council ample satisfaction. I do not think the establishment of such a library would involve considerable expenditure, as I have reason to believe, from an estimate which I have been able to control, that $5,000 would cover the whole outlay. Desirable as the establishment of such a library may be from the standpoint of lawyers retained in cases before the Privy Council, I say that to their clients it is a matter of considerable interest, the more so that upon the pleadings of counsel before the tribunals, the issue of the cases argued depends to a very large extent.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). I quite appreciate what my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) has said with respect to the inconveniences which members of the bar who visit London in connection with the proceedings before the Judicial Committee are under, because of the lack of material with respect to our judicial reports. So far as the Dominion government are concerned, we have sent over each year a copy of our Supreme Court reports and Exchequer Court reports to the High Commissioner's office, and we also provide the High Commissioner's office with our statutes. It seems to me that some of the inconveniences referred to could be more properly met by action of the provincial authorities. They are very largely interested in these appeals, and it is, to a large extent, the legislation passed by the provincial legislatures that is subject to appeal to the Judicial Committee. If my hon. friend would take the suggestion I would be very glad indeed, if the local legislatures were moved in the matter, to confer with the attorneys general in the provinces and have an understanding with them for the purpose of remedying the undoubted inconvenience to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). It would be very desirable that the local legislatures should send over sets of their statutes, as far as possible. Also any statutes of Canada that are not there already should be sent over. It does seem strange, considering that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has jurisdiction over about half the world one might say ; that counsel coming from Australia, from Canada and from India, should not have some library there at their disposal. I would like to know whether the Minister of Justice has ever taken up the matter with the imperial authorities. I myself have experienced the same inconvenience to which my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) has referred. For the most part you can get access to these libraries through the courtesy of the English counsel engaged in the case, but even that is inconvenient because it is almost impossible to carry books forward and backward from one place to another which are quite a distance apart. I might remark also that it would seem to us that a body so important as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be a little better housed for the purpose of hearing appeals. That strikes all colonial lawyers on the first occasion on which they are engaged before that body. I understand that there is some talk in England at the present time of having that remedied. At all events it is certainly very desirable, that whether by the imperial government or whether by joint action between the imperial government and the colonial governments, there should be a library placed at the disposal of the colonial counsel who are engaged in causes before the Judicial Committee.

Motion agreed to.

CASE OF ARTHUR BRUNET—DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT, 1900.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency) moved for :

Copies of all petitions, Orders in Council, correspondence, documents and papers in connection with the conviction and imprisonment of one Arthur Brunet, of the city of Montreal, convicted of offences against the Dominion Elections Act, 1900 ; and the pardon, reprieve, or release of the said Arthur Brunet from jail.

He said : A simple reading of this motion will show that it is of vast importance to this House and to the country at large. Hon. gentlemen will remember what took place when Mr. Brunet was elected a member to this House from the St. James Division of Montreal. It will be remembered that a preliminary investigation was held into certain acts of corruption committed at that election and during the course of that investigation it was found that two important witnesses who were to give evidence with regard to the corruption that took place had absconded from the country and had been sent over to the United States. The preliminary investigation, nevertheless, went on, and Arthur Brunet, who had been charged with gross acts of corruption in that election was returned for trial to the Court of King's Bench. It was proved that personators had been hired; that they had been given tickets by the central committee of Mr. Brunet, the late member, to vote at certain polls in the division, and that they successfully accomplished gross election frauds to a very considerable extent. It was also proved that in one poll the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk had been hired and paid money to switch ballots. The consequence of this was that one of the polls, when the ballot box was open, it was found that Mr. Bergeron, the candidate opposed to Mr. Brunet, had only four votes cast for him, that Mr. Brunet had an overwhelming majority, and all this despite the fact that a number of reputable citizens deposed that they had voted for Mr. Bergeron at that poll. In order to better carry out this corrupt scheme it was found advisable to bring whisky into the poll, so that the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk were so intoxicated that they hardly knew what was going on; at all events they did not realize the seriousness of the crime which they were committing. I may state also that an effort had been made by those interested in Mr. Brunet's election to hire young students to do this dirty work, but I am happy to say that although the students were offered considerable sums of money to switch ballots or to personate electors, they had the manhood and the honesty to refuse to be connected with such an outrage.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It was highly creditable to these students that they did so refuse, and I am glad to be able to mention this fact on the floor of this parliament. At the close of the poll one of the leaders of the gang who invented this nefarious system of switching ballots and personating electors, declared openly and publicly that Mr. Brunet's election was sure because the system which had been adopted in this particular poll had been carried out in eighteen other polls, and therefore the Liberal candidate was sure of his election. This showed that it was not an isolated system of corruption at one poll, but that it was part of a general and organized system carried out at that election. Here we had in this election, personation of voters, subornation of perjury, corruption of public officers, and other heinous crimes against the rights of the people. I must say that the press of all political shades of opinion denounced these crimes. Now, Sir, some of the offences which had been committed at this election were punishable, under the Dominion Elections Act, by a maximum fine of $200 and by from six months to two months' imprisonment, and for other offences there is a maximum penalty of three years in prison, a minimum of six months and a fine of $300.

Now, Sir, who was the instigator of all these crimes ? Who was the arch-con-spirator ? Who was the man who hired these unfortunate returning officers and poll clerks to violate the oath they had taken to honestly discharge the duties of their office ? Who had hired these men to telegraph votes; who had induced these men to personate other electors, and who had gone to the students to tempt these young men to commit high crimes against public morality ? It was Mr. Arthur Brunet. To the credit of the province of Quebec be it said that Arthur Brunet was brought to trial, and notwithstanding that some witnesses had absconded, his trial took place, and upon his own confession he was found guilty of three distinct offences under the Dominion Elections Act, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment on each indictment. I am not here to judge whether the punishment meted out to him was sufficiently severe, but I have no doubt that the chief justice who conducted the trial took into consideration all the extenuating circumstances which were laid before him, and so he condemned Arthur Brunet to almost the minimum punishment which the law provides. Be that as it may; here was a man convicted of the most serious crimes; here was a man sentenced to jail for six months for crimes which upon his own confessed he committed. The people of Canada believed at the time that Arthur Brunet had been rightly and properly punished. It was notorious that this ballot switching and personating of voters was prevalent not only in the province of Quebec but in other provinces as well. Not so many years before this House was seized with the question as to whether or not an inquiry should be held into certain election frauds which had been committed in the province of Ontario, and the offences were considered so grave that this House instituted an inquiry with a view of discovering the guilty parties and the extent to which this particular crime prevailed. Therefore, when Arthur Brunet was sent to jail, all good citizens rejoiced that at last it had been found possible to convict a man who was guilty of such crimes against the franchise of the people of this country as he had confessed to. I bear no malice whatever towards Brunet ; I do not even know him. But his offence was serious ; he was caught red-handed ; he was one of that gang of men who are going around, through the length and breadth of this Dominion, stealing the votes of honest men, and preventing the free expression of public opinion upon the administration of affairs in this country. No doubt, as I said before, due weight had been given by the chief justice to all extenuating circumstances when he condemned this man to six months only in jail. Notwithstanding all this, upon petitions which were sent to the government—and this is the reason why I am making this motion—the government thought fit, after this man had been in jail four months, if my information is correct, to pardon him and set him at liberty. Now, Sir, it is important that the House be put in possession of these petitions. The government may seek to shield themselves from responsibility behind the men who signed these petitions ; but those who are entrusted with these matters are given a sacred trust, and they alone have the responsibility of showing this country that a man convicted of such offences as those I have described, must suffer the full penalty of the law, or at least the full penalty inflicted upon him by the courts before which he has been tried. I say the government cannot shield themselves behind the petitions which have been presented to the proper authorities, because any one who has had any experience of such petitions knows very well how they are gotten up and signed. An intimate friend, a relative, perhaps a brother of the accused man, goes about with a petition and asks people to sign it. He uses all kinds of influences and persuasions, and it is very difficult and requires a great deal of moral courage in many instances to refuse to sign the petition. In other instances, a man may be very busy when asked to sign the petition, and instead of entering into a long argument on the gravity of the offence which has been committed, he signs the petition in order to get rid of the man who has approached him. All these facts should be taken into consideration by the authorities to whom the petitions are presented and due weight should be given to the circumstances under which they are signed. But this fact, I say again, cannot relieve the proper authorities from the responsibility resting upon them of maintaining the dignity of the law, and the due severity of the punishment which should be meted out to all who have committed such offences as those for which Brunet was convicted. It was a relief to the common morality and to the conscience of the country when Brunet was caught, tried and sentenced to jail for those offences ; but the community was scandalized when, after having been in jail for four months, he was liberated by the government.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is better than they do in Ontario, where they do not imprison them.

Mr. CASGRAIN. As I said before, a great deal of credit is due to the province of Quebec for having caught this man and convicted him. Another object which I have in moving for the papers in this case is this. It must be made known that those who sign petitions of this kind undertake a grave responsibility, and in this instance I think their names should be placed before the House, so that in future, when people are asked to sign such petitions, they may realize that their names will probably be placed before parliament, and they shall have to take their share of responsibility for the result of their actions.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker, the practice established in England in respect to cases of this sort is not to produce the documents upon which the prerogative of mercy is exercised, and that practice has been also fairly well established in Canada. It was established by Sir John Thompson in a case to which I shall have occasion to refer when the documents are brought down. I think, however, I ought to be under great obligations to my hon. friend for having asked that an exception be made in this case. I agree that this is an exceptional case, and one that ought to be dealt with in exactly the same way as the case of McGreevy and Connolly was dealt with by this House. I think I agree also with what my hon. friend has said as to the propriety of producing the petitions presented to the government. I may say that I did not myself sign this recommendation, though I assume all responsibility for what was done. I think it is advisable that we should have the petitions, because then my hon. friend will have an opportunity of seeing that they were not signed exclusively by persons who support the government, but were signed by persons high in the counsels of the Conservative party, and occupying high positions in this House. I agree with all my hon. friend has said about the propriety of punishing criminals who have been proven guilty of offences such as those which this gentleman was convicted of. But these offences are not new. I myself had occasion in the province of Quebec—and the law reports will bear me out—to prosecute gentlemen who were guilty of even worse offences, in 1880 and 1881 ; but they escaped at that time. Of course, the Liberal party was not in power in the province then.

Mr. HUGHES. Would that have made any difference ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No, but my hon. friend called attention to the fact that when the Liberals were in power, Brunet was punished. I think the proper time to discuss this question will be when all the documents are before the House. It is possible that in this case the government assumed some responsibility, for which they must of course account to the House ; but I think it would be easy to show that the responsibility does not rest exclusively on the heads of the gentlemen connected with the government. I think it will be shown also that there have been other cases equally serious in which clemency was exercised under circumstances less defensible than in the present instance. I ought to say here that Brunet was represented at the time by medical certificates to be in a very precarious condition of health. Men are not sent to jail for the purpose of dying there ; they are not sent to jail to be executed ; they are sent there to be punished, and if a man is sent to jail for six months and medical men testify that his life is imperilled in consequence, it behooves the executive to take that fact into consideration. I ought to say also that in the Court of King's Bench of Quebec at the same time, a man who had been tried for a similar offence connected with a municipal election was sent to jail for two years. I have not the name, but I will get the name. He was sent to jail for two years, and Mr. Brunet, who was tried after him, was sent to jail for six months. Another man connected with the same offence, was tried in the term following, and went to jail for twelve months. All these things will be discussed at the proper time, and we will find out how these inequalities of sentences came to prevail and see whether or not, in view of these inequalities, it was necessary for the executive to occasionally interfere.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Inasmuch, Mr. Speaker, as the Brunet sentence was very much shorter than the sentences in the other cases, it seems to me it was hardly necessary to interfere in this case, whatever might be said of the others. If what my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has said as to the gravity of Brunet's offence be correct, the sentence of six months was very short. And considering what was said in this House some two or three years ago, by my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, with regard to the gravity of offences of this kind, it is somewhat astonishing that, after a six months' sentence had been imposed on this man—a very short sentence—the government should have seemed fit to have shortened that sentence by a period of two months.

I agree with my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, that this case might perhaps be better discussed when the papers come down, but the hon. gentleman has undertaken to discuss it to some extent himself and he must pardon us if we say a few words about it now. The hon. Minister of Justice seems to take a somewhat peculiar view of the responsibility of the government and of himself in this matter. Does he consider that if every Conservative in the city of Montreal signed a petition for this man's release, that would lessen his responsibility one whit ? If he does, he takes a view of the duties of his position absolutely different from that which I entertain. Here is a man convicted of a very serious crime—crime of a character which unfortunately has prevailed very largely throughout this country during the past five or six years, and in reference to which the Prime Minister said in this House a few years ago, that no matter could better engage the attention of our judges than an investigation into charges of that kind, because no fountain could be pure which was tainted at its source.

Well, we have had a criminal convicted at last. Those in Ontario have for the most part, gone scott free. Every criminal involved in the case which I brought to the attention of the House at that time, has gone scott free. The investigation was burked in the committee at that session, and the hon. gentlemen opposite, by their votes prevented its being proceeded with during the following session. My right hon. friend and his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, both arose and said when I first brought up the matter, that no matter could better engage the attention of the House. But they sat dumb the next session when I asked to have the matter proceeded with, and they voted that no investigation should be had. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has never explained his position from that day to this. His leader did get up, at the conclusion of the debate and attempt to explain why he then voted down a motion for an investigation which a year before he had been so willing to grant. We all know the reasons. We all know that the investigation into the West Huron election before the Committee on Privileges and Elections did not have the result the hon. gentlemen opposite expected. We know how they prevented my witnesses being called until their own were summoned, in order that the criminals might be heard first, yet we had proof from the inspection of the ballots and out of the mouths of their own deputy returning officers that frauds had been committed. Certain revelations were made, more particularly with regard to the Brockville election, which made it very undesirable to the hon. gentlemen opposite, that the investigation should proceed further. None of the men implicated have been prosecuted since. There is a Liberal government opposite and one in power in Ontario, and the curtain has to some extent been lifted during the past few days, with regard to certain matters going on in that province. I do not take the view of the Minister of Justice, that he can relieve himself from responsibility by saying he has petitions from any number of Conservatives. The responsibility is not on these gentlemen but on the government. My hon. friend says that he did not sign this recommendation. Are we to infer that he did not concur in it ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not at all. I take full responsibility for it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend must take full responsibility, so long as he remains a member of the government, but it may nevertheless be the case that he did not concur, so far as his personal opinion is concerned, in the recommendation that this man should be released. I do not know that what took place in 1880 has much to do with the position of affairs in 1903. The question is whether Brunet was properly released from custody. We can judge of that when the papers come down. There was something said about his health. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember how they sneered when the question of health was raised in the McGreevy case. They charged collusion, they said that certificates were procured simply for the purpose of releasing this man. I have not read the certificates in the Brunet case, and I do not know whether they afford any justification on the ground of health, but I venture to think that unless there is some very strong justification from the condition of this man's health, no greater outrage was ever perpetrated than to release him from prison before the expiry of his very short term. When the papers come down, it will behoove the Minister of Justice to deal with this matter more fully, because it is one which calls for our most serious attention.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). The hon. Minister of Justice has told us that he did not personally sign the report, but that afterwards he concurred in it. This will throw a flood of light into the Department of Justice and enable us to form some idea of how certain judicial appointments came to be made. There was a time when the Judiciary of Ontario was looked upon with a great deal more respect than it is to-day. But, hon. gentlemen opposite have seen fit to make appointments which have aroused the adverse criticism of not only the party press, even the independent and law journals. Let me quote from the 'Canada Law Times' with reference to one appointment recently made in Ontario. I know not whether the hon. Minister of Justice has concurred in all the demands that have been made from time to time. But let me call attention to what is said by the 'Canada Law Times,' which is certainly not a political journal, with reference to the non-promotion of Mr. Justice Osler :—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid that the discussion upon which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) has entered is not quite in order. The question now before the House is the conviction of Mr. Brunet and his pardon. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to that and would remind him that he is not allowed to discuss any other question on the present motion. It is not the Department of Justice we are discussing, but the pardon of this man.

Mr. BENNETT. With all due deference, I would submit for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, one point which, I hope, may alter your view. The hon. Minister of Justice has made the statement—and it is a very striking statement—that he had not seen or approved the report in question. I do not give his exact words, but—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. Minister of Justice took the responsibility of the action of the government, and I do not think that any necessity arises for discussing on this motion the affairs of the Department of Justice itself. That may come up on some other motion, but not on the one now before the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT. As I understand the statement made by the Minister of Justice, he said that, while, in the first instance, he did not concur in the report of Council, he is now willing to shoulder all the responsibility in connection—

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Perhaps I may be allowed to repeat the statement I made. I may explain, as, perhaps, the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) is not familiar with the procedure, that the exercise of clemency by the Governor General is on the report of the Minister of Justice—it never goes to Council, but goes from the Minister of Justice to the Governor General. In this instance, the recommendation was made in my absence by another minister—I simply made that statement before the House to explain the facts, but I said that I accepted full responsibility.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The report was made by another minister acting as Minister of Justice ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes, and for that report I am responsible.

Mr. BENNETT. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if you rule that I am out of order I shall be obliged to reserve what I have to say for another occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER. It may come up upon some other question.

Motion (Mr. Casgrain) agreed to.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for :

ADJOURNMENT—MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I beg to move that the House do now adjourn. It was stated the other day on my behalf by my hon friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) that it was the intention of the government to give the explanations with regard to recent changes of the cabinet to-morrow. But I understand that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) will be absent to-morrow. If convenient to him, and also to my hon. friend the member for St. Mary's Division, Montreal (Hon. Mr. Tarte), I shall give the explanation on Wednesday.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That will be quite convenient, so far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. And also so far as I am concerned.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORSHIP OF ONTARIO.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Before the motion to adjourn is adopted, I would call the attention of the right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to the present condition with regard to the Lieutenant Governorship of my own province, Ontario. To-day, a great political crisis exists there, and his Honour the Lieutenant Governor is ill and unable to discharge the functions of his office. It is essential that we should have a Lieutenant Governor in the full vigour of his powers at this moment. The discussion as it comes up before the House there—

Mr. SPEAKER. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that on the motion to adjourn which has now been made by the Prime Minister, discussion can only take place on the question whether we should now adjourn or not. The question which the hon. gentleman wants to discuss now, I think is not in order. Such a question could be brought up by special motion for an adjournment, made for that special purpose, but it cannot be brought up on the present motion to adjourn.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think I will be within the courtesy of the House when I point out that there was no order on the Orders of the Day which would enable me to bring up this question. It is a matter of emergency, the Lieutenant Governor is unable to discharge the functions of his office, and the discussion now on in the Ontario Legislature turns on an issue that he may have to decide. I think in view of the fact that his term of office has expired, and that he is unable to discharge the duties of his office, the government should appoint another gentleman to fill the position.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In answer to my hon. friend I have only to say that I do not think he has warrant for stating that the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario is unable to discharge his duties. It is a purely gratuitous insinuation, to say the least of it. The Lieutenant Governor of Ontnario is not physically strong enough to go out of his house, but apart from his physical infirmity, his mind is clear, and his judgment is just as good as ever, and his faculties are entirely unimpaired. I would say moreover that in view of the distinguished career of Sir Oliver Mowat and the high functions he has discharged, it would perhaps be more becoming on the part of any hon. gentleman in this House to speak of him only in a respectful manner.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think the House will allow me to answer the insinuation made by the right hon. gentleman. I have not spoken disrespectfully of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. I have as much respect for him as has the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has only a right to make a personal explanation.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish to make such explanation now. The leader of this House has questioned my conduct in bringing this matter before the House, and has said that I reflected on the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. I have not. I am dealing with the office of the Lieutenant Governor, and the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario to-day is not accessible to the people of Ontario.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. MACLEAN. He is not able to discharge his duties—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. MACLEAN. And it is in the public interest that this question should be brought before the House.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). I desire to call the attention of the right hon. premier to the fact, in view of what has been stated by him in answer to the hon member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario was not able to open the legislature the other day, and his duties had to be performed by a substitute in the person of the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario. Under these circumstances I think it was quite proper that the premier's attention should be called to the fact that another Lieutenant Governor should be appointed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not understand that the hon. member for East York cast the slightest reflection in the world on the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, and I think it was gratuitous on the part of the right hon. gentleman to suggest that he did so. What language of the hon. member for East York conveyed any such insinuation—was it the mere statement of the physical condition of Sir Oliver Mowat ? As you are aware, his condition has been announced by members of the family of the Lieutenant Governor, announced only a few days ago—

The PRIME MINISTER. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I am speaking of a matter which I know. I am not making this statement without the book. I think I know about as much of what I am speaking as did the right hon. gentleman a moment ago when he spoke of the condition of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. Every one respects that hon. gentleman, he has had a great career in public life in Canada, but surely it is no insult to him to say that his physical condition is not at the present time such as would enable him to discharge the very trying duties that possibly he may be called upon to discharge in the near future. No one supposes a statement of that kind involves any discredit to Sir Oliver Mowat. I think the remarks of my right hon. friend were not in very good taste when he undertook to lecture the hon. member for East York as he did. Now, unless matters have changed a good deal within the last few days, it is certain that the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario is in a very week physical condition, there is no doubt about that. We are al sorry for it, we regret that it should be so, but our regret does not alter the fact. Under these circumstances, I consider the observations of my hon. friend from East York were pertinent and in perfect good taste, and I trust the government will take them into consideration.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). I would ask the hon. leader of the opposition to remember that it is a reflection upon Sir Oliver Mowat to say that he would continue to occupy his position if he were unable to perform the duties of his office. My hon. friend says that a gentleman occupying the high position of Sir Oliver Mowat should not continue to occupy that position if he is unable to perform his duties. That seems to be a distinct reflection upon him. Either he is competent to discharge his duties and should continue in the office, or he is holding on to an office that he ought not to retain.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He might be physically so weak that he could not take the matter into consideration at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). It is another reflection on the Lieutenant Governor, I submit, to say that he is holding on to the office under these circumstances.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY (North Simcoe). The leader of the opposition said he was speaking by the book when he said that Sir Oliver Mowat was in such a physical condition that in all probability he would not be able to perform the functions of his office.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I said I knew that he was physically very weak, and that it had been so announced in Toronto by members of his family.

Mr. McCARTHY. He is either in one condition or the other, either in a condition to discharge his duties, or in such a condition that he is not fit to discharge them. If he is in a condition which enables him to discharge his duties, there is no need of calling the attention of the House to the matter ; if he is in the other condition, then he is not fit to fulfil his public duties. I desire to say, speaking by the book, that I have been told by relatives of the Lieutenant Governor that he is much better, that within the last three days his condition has improved, and that he has been writing letters, personal and otherwise, with his own hand. His condition is much improved from that which prevented him from opening the House last week.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 4.35 p.m.

SUPPLY—THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNORSHIP OF ONTARIO.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say, in order to put myself fairly before the House, that I intend to make some remarks followed by a motion, unless the Prime Minister now says that he will move the House into Committee of Supply, when I would rather speak to the question I have in view.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We are going into Supply.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACLEAN. On this motion to go into Supply, I propose to call the attention of the House and the country to a grave condition of affairs that exists in my own province, that of Ontario. A political crisis exists there to-day that is attracting the attention of all the people of Canada. Certain circumstances have been made public which reflect on the moral tone of that province, which reflect on the political tone of that province ; and I say a crisis has arrived in which the honour of the province is involved, in which the honour of politicians is involved, and every one must be concerned in the settlement of that crisis. At the present moment the Lieutenant Governor of that province has exceeded his term. He was appointed about November, 1897 ; his five years consequently are up, and he is holding office, I think, very improperly. Not only is he holding office after his term has expired, but his condition of health, I believe, is such that he is unable to discharge the high functions of his office. Certainly he was unable to open the legislature last week and it had to be opened by commission. After what transpired not long ago in connection with this affair, I think it is my duty now to call the attention of the House to this condition of affairs in Ontario ; and also to call the attention of the House to the record of the hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to that question. On a motion to go into Committee of Supply, in the year 1895, I find that Mr. Mills (Bothwell) submitted the following resolution :

That, in the opinion of this House, section 59 of the British North America Act of 1867, which prevents the removal of a lieutenant governor of a province for five years from the date of his appointment, except for cause assigned, and communicated to the House of Commons by message, was intended to prevent the undue influence of federal ministers in provincial affairs; and the practice which has become prevalent, of permitting lieutenant governors to continue in office for long periods of time after the expiry of their commissions, by which they become removable at any time, without assignment of cause, is an abuse of authority calculated to impair responsible government in the provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. Mills supported that motion by an argument, and I propose to read a few sentences from that argument. He said:

Now, the objection I make to the existing condition of things is that in the case of many of the lieutenant governors of provinces, they have been permitted to hold office for several years after their commissions have expired, and at the moment the commission expires, it is in the power of the government to remove a lieutenant governor without assignment of cause, and without any report to either House of parliament. Now, I say that this is a highly objectionable condition of things. If it is proper during the five years that the commission is in existence that the lieutenant governor should not be removed without adequate cause being assigned, and without that cause being reported to both Houses of parliament, it is obviously improper that the lieutenant governor should continue to hold office after that period has expired. If the government desire that the lieutenant governors shall hold office for a longer period than five years, they should issue to him a new commission, they should put him beyond their power of removal for any subsequent period, just precisely as he was beyond their power of removal for the period for which he was appointed in the first instance. What is the object of the provision of the law? The object is to make the lieutenant governor independent of the government here, and solely subject to the advice which his constitutional advisers may think proper to give him.

Then he went on:—

Sir Leonard Tilley held office in the province of New Brunswick from 1885 to 1893, a period of eight years; so that for three years of his term of service he was liable at any moment to be removed from office by the administration; and therefore, if the administration had chosen to interfere in local affairs, they could have brought pressure to bear upon the lieutenant governor if he desired to continue in office, which was altogether inconsistent with the duties that are assigned to him, under the law to discharge. In 1888, Mr. Schultz was appointed lieutenant governor of Manitoba, and now, in 1895, at the end of seven years, he is lieutenant governor still. For the past two years he has held office by the sufferance of the ministry, he is liable at any moment to be removed without assignment of cause; and that being so, I say that this condition of things has become an abuse which ought to be corrected, and for that reason I put into your hands this resolution.

Then Mr. Laurier continued the debate. And here is what he said:—

Mr. MACLEAN.

The lieutenant governor of Manitoba has for sometime occupied his position by sufferance of the administration, and not by his commission upon which he was appointed. He can be dismissed to morrow and a successor can be appointed to him the day after to-morrow. He may be retained for one day or for one year, just as suits the convenience of the party in power. I ask the Minister of Justice, is that a practice which should be tolerated? The hon. gentleman says that so far no evil has flown from this, but does my hon. friend argue that because no evil results follow from the breaking of a law, that it is right and proper that the law should be broken? Will he maintain that because no evil results have followed that therefore we should go on without any rules whatever. If the provision of the constitution which says that the lieutenant governor shall be appointed for a term of years by commission, can be violated with impunity, and if no evil results flow from such violation of the law, the law might as well be dispensed with at once. But Sir, laws exist in all cases because if there are no laws, abuses may result, and I call the attention of my hon. friend that he has given no reasons whatever why such a practice should be defended. Indeed he has not defended it. His only argument is that no evil results have flown from it and I submit that is no argument at all.

Mr. McCarthy spoke, and I am going to quote a couple of sentences from him:—

It may be felt that when it was brought to our notice that lieutenant governors have been permitted to hold office, after their terms have expired, and during pleasure, and subject to removal of course without notice; that we did not think it of sufficient moment to give it any attention. I therefore desire to say that I believe it to be a matter of the very gravest importance that this provision of the statute should be definitely adhered to. It does not prevent a gentleman who is lieutenant governor being reappointed, for we know that in the case of Sir Leonard Tilley that was done twice or thrice, but what is calculated to degrade the high and important office of the representative of the Crown in the provinces is that he should be in the position that he could at any moment be recalled; and that in that sense he is put in a position to perhaps obey directions from the central body, which in his duty to his province he should wholly and absolutely disregard. The case that has been referred to in the province of Manitoba is a very striking one, and one which exposes the mischief and danger to follow from a continuance of this practice. We are told in this House and we have been told elsewhere, that the gentleman who holds the office is most anxious for reappointment.

I wonder if there is any anxiety in this special case for reappointment.

We were told not very long ago that this gentleman had come to Ottawa for the purpose of trying to be continued in his office and was willing under these circumstances to bargain away his functions and the rights of his province. I do not know whether these charges are true, but this I do know; that the fact that these charges could be made tend to degrade and lower the dignity of the high office which the lieutenant governors occupy. For that reason, and that alone, I think that we should require that the statute should be adhered to, and that the abuse should not be allowed to continue to exist.

Sir Richard Cartwright continued the debate. Let us read a few sentences from his speech :—

In particular I thought that the Minister of Finance, who admitted substantially the correctness of my hon. friend's position, was exceedingly weak when he contended that no man's impartiality, no man's independence was liable to be impaired by the fact that he was a mere occupant at pleasure.

And then :—

There can be nothing more calculated to degrade the office of lieutenant governor than to allow those who hold that office to remain there at the mere pleasure of the ministry of the day. And I am very far indeed from believing that no evils have arisen when ministers, as we have seen on various occasions, hold their office to a certain extent at the mercy of the lieutenant governor, who in turn holds his absolutely at the mercy of the government here. Because no evil has been stated to have occurred, it does not follow that no evil has occurred. . . . Under circumstances such as are occurring to-day in Manitoba to keep in office a gentleman who holds it absolutely and mainly at their pleasure, they will expose themselves very justly to the charge of having interpreted for purposes of their own, the plain intent and spirit of the British North America Act in a manner in no way contemplated by the constitution, and utterly repugnant to the spirit of the constitution ; and their action may produce very grave and mischievous results. . . .

If it is of any use to have lieutenant governors—a thing which may be doubted and which is under discussion at present—if these officers are of any value, if it is desirable that they should be continued, if it is desirable that these petty mock courts should be maintained at considerable cost to the country, then at least the men who preside over them should be independent of the government here, or at any rate only subject to removal under such circumstances as the constitution prescribes. It is an evil—and one which may prove a serious one before we meet again—that the governor of one of our provinces should be in a position entirely fatal to independence ; and this parliament will be false to its duty unless it expresses a strong opinion as to the inexpediency of allowing such a state of things to continue for one hour.

The vote was taken. Among those who voted in favour of Mr. Mill's motion were Borden, Cartwright, Charlton, Laurier, Mulock and Sutherland. Mr. Speaker, I intend to hold these gentlemen to their vote on that occasion. They laid down a certain doctrine in regard to the lieutenant governors, yet, now that they are in power, and the terms of office of their first batch of lieutenant governors are running out—the terms of two or more of them are running out—we find those gentlemen still continuing lieutenant governors in their places under conditions which these gentlemen on a motion of a want of confidence in this House declared were disgraceful. Now what does the right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) intend to say ? I am not here to say anything against the character of Sir Oliver Mowat. I respect his character as I do that of any other man. He has a great record ; and I am not here to throw dirt upon it in any sense. But I am here to say something for the people of this country and for my own constituents, and to demand the vindication of the constitution. And am I to be insulted in this House, when I but ask that the constitution shall be maintained ? Am I to be told that I am going out of my way to make an attack upon the holder of a high office ? Why, those who make such an attack upon me are not defending the constitution ; they are defending the office holder. There is a lust of power in the Liberal party that is something alarming, and the condition of affairs that now exists in Ontario is due to this lust of power and of office. I am well within my rights as I stand here, and I repudiate the Prime Minister rising in this House and saying to me, even though I am a private member, that when I attempt to defend the constitution——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to a past debate.

Mr. MACLEAN. I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker, I did not refer to a past debate. But I am told that I am doing something improper and gratuitously insulting to the holder of a high office. I am doing nothing of the kind ; as I have said, I am demanding the vindication of the constitution. I am asking hon. gentlemen opposite to immediately remove the stigma that they have put upon Sir Oliver Mowat—for they stigmatize him when they keep him in office without renewing his appointment. They must do one thing or the other—they must give Sir Oliver Mowat another term of office, or they must appoint his successor. Most of all, they ought to put his successor in office. I have no objection to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) going to government house in Toronto and setting up one of these 'petty courts' to which he referred in the speech I have quoted. I would like to attend his 'petty court,' if he would be good enough to send me an invitation when he goes to occupy that position. I call on these hon. gentlemen to-day, in view of the grave crisis that exists at Toronto, to vindicate the constitution, to put a new man in office, and not to keep Sir Oliver Mowat in the position in which he is to-day. He is entitled to better treatment. For all we know he may have asked to be relieved of the duties that are devolving upon him at the present time. At all events, the situation is serious, the duty is plain, the constitution has been violated, hon. gentlemen have once again, as many a time, been convicted of being untrue to their pledges, to their professions, to the votes and to the speeches which they have made in this House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House, and yet I feel justified in going as far as I have done out of regard for the honour of my province, and out of regard for the honour of the first man in my province, and I call upon the Prime Minister to tell this House that he intends to put a stop to the condition of things that exists in the province of Ontario at this moment.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have in the first place, to express my regret to my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) that he has not accorded me the usual courtesy of giving me the notice which is generally given when an important member occupying the position which he occupies in this House—I do not know if it is the position of a prominent supporter of the opposition, or the leader of a new party; at all events whatever the position may be, it is an important one—is about to bring up a question of this kind. I regret, as I have said, that he has not given me the opportunity of knowing beforehand that he was bringing up this question. The hon. gentleman has spoken with a great deal of vehemence on this question. He has spoken of the outrage that has been committed upon our constitution. I do not know if I shall do an injury to my hon. friend or not—if I do I beg in advance to apologize, but I do not believe that my hon. friend has read the constitution of which he pretends to be such a champion. I do not believe that my hon. friend has read the clause of the constitution which provides for the appointment of lieutenant governors, because, if he had read that clause of the constitution he would have spoken differently. He would have known that the lieutenant governor is not appointed for five years, that he is not appointed for four years, nor for a term of years, but that he is appointed during the pleasure of the Governor General. He would have known that during five years he is not removable except for cause, and that after five years he can be removed for cause, that he is appointed not for a term of years but so long as the Governor General thinks that it is to the advantage of the public service that he shall continue in office. Let me therefore call the attention of my hon. friend to this clause in the constitution, which, I am sure, if he has read it, he has forgotten it. Clause 59 of the constitution is as follows :

> A lieutenant governor shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor General ; but any lieutenant governor appointed after the commencement of the first session of the Parliament of Canada shall not be removable within five years, from his appointment, except for cause assigned which shall be communicated to him in writing.

And so on. You see, therefore, that within five years he cannot be removed except for cause, but the moment the five years have expired he can be removed at the pleasure of the Governor General. That is all the difference in the world. But, what we called attention to in 1895 was a very different condition of things from that which now exists in the province of Ontario. In 1895 we called the attention of the House to the fact that some lieutenant governors, for one, Sir John Schultz, Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, for another, Sir Leonard Tilley, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, had been allowed to remain, not for days, not for months, but for years, after the expiration of the supposed term for which they had been appointed. In the case of Sir John Schultz he had been allowed to remain in office for two years, and in the case of Sir Leonard Tilley, he had been allowed to remain in office for a longer period, and we thought under those circumstances it was quite justifiable and proper that new power should be exercised and that lieutenant governors should be appointed under a new commission. But, I call upon my hon. friend to show me a case in the long history of confederation, in the thirty-five years during which it has existed, where the lieutenant governor has been removed from office immediately at the expiration of five years during which he has been occupying that position. Such a case is not in existence. It has never been considered to be according to the courtesy of the office that the incumbent should be removed the moment the five years during which he has occupied the position have expired. On the contrary, we have granted, as a rule, to all incumbents of this office some time before we have felt called upon to name their successors. The usual course has been followed in this case. Sir Oliver Mowat was removable when the day expired; the day expired in November—November, December, January, February; March has not even passed. Yet we are told that we must appoint a successor to fill the position, that because the lieutenant governor has been four months in office, an old and venerable man as Sir Oliver Mowat is, immediately as soon as his term of five years has expired we must apply the axe, remove him and put some one else in his place. If Sir Oliver Mowat has not discharged the duties of the office with satisfaction to everybody there might be some cause which would justify the hon. gentleman in making this demand, but the hon. gentleman does not base his case on the fact that Sir Oliver Mowat has now come to the time in which he may be removed without cause, but he states that Sir Oliver Mowat is not fit to occupy the position which he occupies. Why is he not fit ? Has anything been said in the press, in parliament, or anywhere else, against the mental capacity of Sir Oliver Mowat ? Not a word has been said against that. It is known and acknowledged that his mental faculties are bright and keen, although Sir Oliver Mowat is not physically as strong as he was at one time. He is not as young as he was at one time and we all deplore that fact, but I say again, that no insinuation can be thrown against Sir Oliver Mowat, and if Sir Oliver Mowat were physically incapable of administering the office he has too high a sense of honour to occupy the position one day more than he felt himself able to discharge the duties attaching to it. But, if he is occupying the position to-day it is because he thinks he can fulfil admirably the duties which he has in charge. Moreover, it is true, as has been said by my hon. friend, that there is a crisis in the province of Ontario, an important crisis in which the honour or the life of a government is at stake. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, is this the time, is this the moment, when there is a grave crisis in the province of Ontario, to remove from the helm a man of such experience, of such knowledge, and of such unimpeachable honour as Sir Oliver Mowat ? If we were to remove Sir Oliver Mowat in the midst of such a crisis, I think we would be committing a grave crime against the province of Ontario, if we were to take away at this moment the firm and experienced hand that is at the head of power in the province of Ontario to-day, I believe the Conservative party themselves would protest against such a course, and at all events it seems to me that it would be the part not only of courtesy but of duty for the hon. gentleman to wait until that crisis is over before he calls upon us to remove Sir Oliver Mowat from the position which he occupies and adorns. We are familiar with these tactics; we remember them long ago, and this is only another repetition of the cry with which we have been familiar for twenty years that 'Mowat must go.' This is a new version of the cry 'Mowat must go.' How many times did we hear that cry in the old days ? How many times have we heard the hon. gentleman himself and his associates declare to the people of the province of Ontario that 'Mowat must go' ? The people would not sanction such a cry at that time, nor do I believe they would do so to-day. Sir Oliver is not as vigorous as he was, but still he is deep in the affections of the people of Ontario, who would resent any action we would take in following the advice of hon. gentlemen opposite; advice which we shall not follow.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). It is not pleasant for the hon. gentlemen opposite to have their past record thus brought before them, and the dying words of the premier is the best evidence in the world that they do not like to be reminded of their past. The Prime Minister tells us that we are familiar with these cries and these tactics. Yes, we are. They were admirably played for 18 years in this House by the Liberals in opposition. What troubles these gentlemen now is that their chickens have come home to roost, and that no stronger condemnation can be given of their inconsistency than the very position which they have taken to-day. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) distinctly declared that he made no insinuation against Sir Oliver Mowat, but what he denounced was the pernicious principle which these gentlemen on the treasury benches themselves denounced in this House some years ago. Not a word was said disrespectful to the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, but it was said that in view of the most imminent crisis now pending in that province, it is regrettable that Sir Oliver Mowat is at the present time holding his place by sufferance of the present federal government, for it is needless to say that Sir Oliver can be removed at any moment that the government here intimate to the Governor General that he should be removed, and so if Sir Oliver Mowat does not carry out the wishes of the powers here, he is at their mercy. The parallel cases cited were most apropos. They were argued at great length in great vehemence, and with strong logic by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) by the present Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier), by the Postmaster-General (Hon. Sir William Mulock) and by the leaders of the opposition of that date. Will they say to-day that they were entirely wrong, or else that they were insincere. Which horn of the dilemma will they hang themselves on. If they were sincere then according to their own reasoning they made out a good case, and if their case was good then it is equally good to-day. What glaring inconsistency do we not find here ? The right hon. gentleman tells us that the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba was then overholding his office for two years, he points out which is not so in the case of Sir Oliver Mowat. What has the length of time got to do with it ?

Mr. MACLEAN. That argument is absurd.

Mr. SPROULE. Sir Oliver Mowat's time expired last August, and the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba was overholding his office several months longer than that. What has that got to do with the principle at stake ? If it is wrong to hold an office of that kind for two years over the allotted time, it is equally wrong to overhold it for six months, because the same principle is involved. It is not the length of time that is questioned, but it is the system that is denounced. There is no logic in the argument of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister complained that the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) had not given him notice of the question. Well, the right hon. gentleman had a stack of books in front of him from which he essayed to quote, but probably finding that the quotation did not suit his purpose he refrained. Be that as it may, the incident of the books in front of him indicated that he got notice from some source. I do not believe that the Prime Minister, even with all his great ability could, no matter what notice he had, present arguments sufficiently strong to convince the House and the country, that the system which he is carrying out to-day, and which on a previous occasion he and his colleagues denounced, is right now, and was wrong then because the Liberals happened to be in power and not in opposition.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Without in any way endeavouring to controvert the proposition in law laid down by the mover of this motion, I may call attention to the fact that Bourinot evidently takes the same view as was held by the hon. gentlemen opposite some six or seven years ago. We recognize perfectly that while the statute does not say in so many words that the Lieutenant Governor is to be appointed for five years, yet on a fair construction of the language used in the British North America Act, we are led to the conclusion come to by the hon. gentlemen opposite in former days; come to by Bourinot in his work, come to by the late Mr. McCarthy and other prominent parliamentarians: That when a term of office is expressed as it is in the British North America Act, that although nominally appointed during the pleasure of the Governor General, yet within the five years the Lieutenant Governor is practically irremovable, because unless good cause can be shown he cannot be removed. Therefore it is perfectly clear that at the expiration of the term, he stands on a different footing from the footing he held up to that time. The view that strikes me in connection with the matter is simply this: That while in one sense it might be an important matter in this present crisis to the province of Ontario, yet a higher and better view can be taken on the subject.

We are living at present in a time of change. We know that our institutions are as it were on trial, and we know that the permanence of our institutions must to a great extent depend on the manner in which they work out. Now, Sir, if the present Lieutenant Governor of Ontario were a man twenty years younger; if having occupied the position which he has occupied in that province during all these years; while admitting his ability and admitting his integrity as I will without the slightest hesitation—still any man in the province of Ontario who takes a dispassionate view would say, that it was unfortunate, that it was regrettable, that at such a peculiar crisis as this, the Lieutenant Governor should have been one who had been so long and so intimately connected with the party in power in Ontario, and with the gentlemen who are now the leaders of that party.

Mr. SPROULE.

I do not find any fault at the appointment of Sir Oliver Mowat, and while I admit that it was a proper appointment at the time, still I think that had it been possible for the leaders of the government to have foreseen that during his term of office such a peculiar crisis as this would have arisen, I venture to say that out of regard to the opinion of the country; out of regard to the national reputation; out of regard to the stability of our institutions, the government would have designated some lieutenant governor other than Sir Oliver Mowat. If that be the case, how much more is it the case now when he is remaining in office as it must be admitted on the sufferance of the federal government, when this unfortunate crisis has arisen. I am not prepared for a moment to suggest that the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario would not do his duty; I would not suggest that he is not physically and mentally competent to do his duty; but I do say that it is an unfortunate thing for a healthy public opinion in the stability of Canadian institutions and the manner of their working, that just at this time matters should be in the position they are in. I do not know that the hon. gentleman who moved the motion had any intention of suggesting that during this crisis the federal government should intervene. I take it rather that his object was to call attention to an omission on the part of this government in not filling the office of lieutenant governor, an omission which has led to the present unfortunate state of affairs. I do trust that the crisis will so work out in the province of Ontario, that the people of that province may not be hereafter led to think that if the lieutenant governorship had been kept freer from the hands of politicians that perhaps in this peculiar time a different conclusion might have been come to from that which may perhaps be come to. For, Sir, we must not forget that if the persent lieutenant governor should support his present ministers, even supposing he was perfectly right in so doing, and if he were doing what any dispassionate, impartial man would do under the circumstances, still, many people in the province might think, and not unnaturally, that with another man as lieutenant governor, a different conclusion might have been come to. If that be the case, if any large portion of the people of Ontario should come to the conclusion that the influence and the authority of the Crown were in any way affected by such political considerations at a time when the fair fame and reputation of our province is at stake, I venture to say that one of the strongest blows at the stability of our institutions that could possibly be given would be found to have been given.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

The PRIME MINISTER. I know that the leader of the opposition is away on important business. I do not know the assistant leader, and I do not know whether our hon. friends on the other side are ready to go on with the estimates. We are in their hands to proceed or not as they think best.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that they are not ready to go on with the estimates.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then I move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and Committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1903.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the Civil Service of Canada for 1902.—Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Report of Secretary of State for 1902.—Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

INTERPRETATION ACT—SUING RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 18) to amend the Interpretation Act.

He said: This is the same Bill which was introduced last year, and only passed its second reading. The object of the Bill is to make railway companies liable for damage, subject to the civil law in each of the provinces. The Bill was suggested by a judgment of the Privy Council referring to a decision in the province of Quebec under the Civil Code of that province. I will go into further details when the Bill is advanced a further stage.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

PAY OF POSTMASTERS IN MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked:

1. Has the honourable the Postmaster General received the following communications?

Winnipeg, Man., February, 1903.

To the Right Honourable Sir William Mulock, Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Sir,—We, the undersigned accounting postmasters of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, beg to bring to your attention the following statement of facts regarding our work which goes to show that the remuneration is most inadequate, in the hope that you may be able to grant us substantial and immediate relief. We do this the more hopefully in view of the stand you have taken on the question of the hours of labour, etc., of the working man.

1. The postmaster is responsible for the safe handling of many important letters, and valuable parcels. In this country large amounts of money formerly sent by express, are now sent by registered mail, to wheat buyers, to enable them to carry on their business. In many places branch banks remit to, or receive from, the head office, large sums of money. This increases the postmasters' responsibility, and where help is employed, necessitates care in the selection. The money order business necessitates the handling of large sums of money for the miserable pittance of 25 cents per $100. The amount of stamps kept on hand must always be large with the source of supply so far away. In no other line of work would persons be held responsible for the proper handling of such large amounts, with the same possibilities of irregularities and losses, without remuneration at least from five to ten times greater than the postmaster receives for his money order work. In many cases there is added responsibility to the handling of customs parcels for which there is practically no remuneration. The postmaster is expected to provide a roomy, centrally located office, without any regard to the rental which that office would command if leased for other purposes. The necessity for the correct and prompt despatch of all mails, regardless of hours of arrival and departure, is in many instances a very grave responsibility. Understanding that the present basis of remuneration has been in vogue for a quarter of a century or more, we would respectfully point out various increases in work which clearly show that although it may have been sufficient then, it is utterly inadequate now.

Firstly—In connection with newspapers and periodicals we think it a conservative estimate to assume that a family will now receive an average from six to eight times as many periodicals as a family would be receiving twenty-five years ago.

Secondly—The use of the mails as a means of distributing advertising matter is a practice of recent years entirely and the quantity handled is simply enormous and constantly increasing. These increases affect both local distribution and assorting of matter for forwarding to outside offices.

Thirdly—The recent reduction in the rate of letter postage necessitates (in the matter of Canadian and United States postage) an increase of fully 50 per cent in the number of letters handled before an increase of revenue can accrue, or an increase of salary be hoped for. In the case of British and some other lines of foreign postage, the increase in the number of letters must be 150 per cent before we have established a basis for any possible increase in salary. A working out of the figures in this connection will establish that the postmasters are bearing from 30 to 40 per cent of the expenses of the reduction so appreciated by the public. This appears to be an altogether undue proportion.

The introduction of the postal note system has increased the amount of labour out of proportion to the revenue attached. This method of remitting small amounts (chiefly to the city offices) has largely curtailed the sale of stamps which were formerly used. At offices where customs parcels were handled and distributed by mail to smaller offices, stamps are usually sent in payment of duty, and cash is remitted to port of entry, again curtailing the sale of stamps received from the department.

2. An examination into the method of handling customs parcels and the remuneration (even where any is allowed) will reveal the fact that the work actually required to be performed, which is considerable, is practically unpaid for. This is one of the points which we desire to bring to your attention, that unremunerative work of this sort is being multiplied while the revenue of the office is being held down by reduced rates of postage.

3. In a number of the offices, besides keeping the office open throughout the regulation hours, the postmasters are compelled to await the arrival of a late evening train and again in some instances have to get up at five or six o'clock in the morning to despatch a mail, thus imposing unduly long hours of service without any allowance for any class of assistance, to say nothing of a competent assistant. In some offices, owing to the arrival of several different mails the public is entitled to call and demand individual attention several times during the day, whereas the basis of remuneration makes no special provision for this. In places where tri-weekly trains carry the mails, the postmaster is compelled to remain eleven hours a day for six days a week and provide (if he would give the public anything approaching satisfactory service) for a portion of three days a week, one or more duly qualified assistants. His allowance is inadequate for his own support at present cost of living, thus providing nothing for the payment of assistants.

4. In view of the amount of mail matter to be re-sorted and forwarded, the forwarding allowances do not begin to pay for the work done or the extra office room required. Another department with a deficit.

5. The allowance for rent, fuel, and light is decidedly inadequate. In practically every town where the post office is kept in a separate compartment, the room occupied could be leased for a rental in excess of the full allowance for rent, for heating and for lighting. In the town of Morris, the postmaster is allowed $100 for rent, fuel and light. For less space in the same building he receives from the Merchants Bank $350 a year for rent, alone. At Melita the postmaster cancelled a lease bringing him a net annual rental of $180 to use the building for post office purposes on an allowance of $125 for rent, fuel and light. Other similar examples could be cited. Fuel and light are costly here.

6. In the matter of securing proper assistants, we could point out that labour readily commands far larger remuneration in any market than it did a few years ago. To have experienced help available is a severe drain upon the limited exchequer of the postmaster who is unfortunate enough to require it, as nearly all do. Even where help is not regularly required, competent assistance must be had if the postmaster is ever to seek recreation or relief from duty.

7. There is another matter which affects postmasters in the west more particularly, namely, the increased cost of living. This has frequently been brought to the attention of yourself and colleagues in various ways, and we note that already you have conceded the point as in the case of the 20 per cent increase allowed the letter carriers of Winnipeg. In our opinion this does not represent the actual amount of difference, but is a recognition of that difference. In all lines the cost of living has advanced during the past years, while the postmasters are receiving less pay for more work.

8. A comparison with salaries paid in other departments of the public service and even in other departments of the postal service give an idea of our disadvantages. For example. First-class railway clerks receive $960 and mileage, second-class clerks $880 and mileage. In the city of Winnipeg, the assistant postmaster gets $2,000, first-class clerks, $1,500, second-class, $1,320, third-class, $880, and letter carriers, $720.

We do not think these are too highly paid, but an office with a revenue of $2,000 not only absorbs all of one person's time, but requires an additional clerk at least a portion of the year. The postmaster of such an office receives for salary, commissions and allowances an average of less than $700 or less than half the amount received by a first-class city clerk, $100 less than a second-class railway mail clerk, and a trifle less than is paid to the city letter cariers, and out of this modest income he must employ whatever additional help is required and furnish a suitable office and office equipment. In most cases his hours are longer and his responsibilities greater than those of any of the officials referred to. In one town where the train arrived late and departed early, the postmaster until recently received $3.50 per month for overtime, while the railway agent received $19 a month extra.

In view of the conditions and facts set forth above, we would respectfully suggest the following changes as tending to bring about a redress of our grievances :—

1st. That the straight salary allowance be based on 50 per cent on the first $1,000 worth of stamps sold, and 40 per cent on all additional sales. This would barely off-set the loss resulting from the reduction of letter postage. 2nd. That in Manitoba a special increase of at least 20 per cent be allowed to cover extra cost of living. 3. That the allowance for rent, fuel and light be doubled so as to provide a reasonable rent for the office, and a provision for the cost of light and fuel in this country. 4th. That the money order system be simplified so as to lessen the amount of work performed for the small remuneration allowed and also to increase its popularity with the business public, who now object to the restrictions hedging it around. 5th. In addition to the regular and general scale of allowances we would request, that a special allowance be granted for each extra mail which tends to bring the public again before the wicket for individual attention during the day. That the forward allowance be materially increased to distributing offices. That a special allowance be given to postmasters who are compelled to work before 8 a.m., or after 7 p.m. Among the mechanical industries the special allowance for overtime is very marked. That in the case of offices where mails are so infrequent as to have large quantities of mail matter delivered at the office at one time, so that the public convenience really requires the employment of one or more assistants, an allowance be given towards the payment of such assistant or assistants. 6. In addition to the above we feel that there are a number of cases of special minor grievances which we cannot enter into in detail, but in which we think that a little investigation would show that redress could be effected so as to relieve the postmasters concerned without in any way impairing the efficiency and safety of the public service, which grievances have probably continued to exist because they have not been brought to your honourable attention.

And we would respectfully urge that the above matters be duly considered and that a large measure of redress be granted in the very near future. And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST ACCOUNTING POSTMASTERS ASSOCIATION.

Supplementary suggestions passed by executive.

1. That all accounting offices be given an allowance for rent, fuel and light.

2. That twine, mucilage, pens, ink, pencils, etc., for post office use be furnished by the department and not at the expense of the postmaster as at present.

3. That the department make it more clear to all publishers that newspapers must be suitably folded and that they must be addressed plainly. That where labels are used they must be in large clear type, and that if possible uniformity of colour in labels be secured.

4. That a full list of "Suggestions to the Public" be printed by the department and supplied to all postmasters for display in their offices as tending to make it clear that certain regulations are found necessary by the department and are not based on the caprice or convenience of the postmaster. For instance, that stamps and money orders may not be purchased during the distribution of a newly arrived mail, and that money orders and postal notes are not available for purchase after the registered mail closes for an outgoing mail. Also some suggestions as to the age of children who are to be considered as proper persons to receive mail from the wicket.

5. That when instructions are sent out for the weighing of all mails that facilities for such weighing be afforded by the department.

6. That in view of the large sums of money at times in the mails in this country and hence often stored in the post office, and in view of the value of the stamps and the importance of the books now to be kept that safes be provided for accounting postmasters or an allowance be granted to pay for use of same when provided by postmaster.

2. Have the requests and suggestions made in these two documents been considered ?

3. Is it the intention of the government to propose such amendments to the law as will remove the cause of complaint ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock). Such a petition has been received and is under consideration at the present time.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. WARD asked :

1. Has the Department of Railways and Canals issued an advertisement for tenders for the construction of any portion of the Trent Valley canal, between Hastings and Trenton ?

2. If so, when ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair).

1. Yes.

2. Tenders were invited for the construction of the section of the Trent canal between Trenton and Frankford on the 24th of November, 1899.

Mr. WARD asked :

Is it the intention of the government to have any further survey of the proposed continuation of the Trent Valley canal between Rice lake and Lake Ontario, before proceding with the work ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The question is under the consideration of the government.

POSTMASTER AT WHITNEY PIER, N.S.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. Has Peter J. Carlin been dismissed from the position of postmaster at Whitney Pier, in the county of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia ?

2. If so, when was he dismissed, and for what reason or cause ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock). Mr. Peter J. Carlin, late postmaster, without the consent of the department, removed the post office some distance from the old site. It was considered that Mrs. Gallivan's building was a more desirable location and the change was accordingly made.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker. In pursuance of the notice which I gave some few days ago in answer to a question from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), I shall now proceed to give to the House the ministerial explanation which the House expects from the government as to the changes which took place some few months ago in the composition of the cabinet. In these modern days such explanations have not the importance which they had at one time, because, in these modern days, with the methods of publicity there is nothing that I could tell the House of which the House has not already been informed. In the month of September last, whilst I was in Europe, on the continent, I received several communications from Canada calling my attention to the course pursued by my hon. friend the present member for the division of St. Mary's (Montreal), at that time my colleague in the cabinet and then Minister of Public Works. It was represented to me that my hon. friend was pursuing a course which was not consistent with the rules of parliamentary government inasmuch as he was advocating a policy which was at variance with the policy hitherto followed by the government of which he was a member. I thereupon ordered that all the Canadian newspapers should be sent to me in London to await my arrival there on my way back to Canada. When I returned to London from the continent I found these newspapers and on the long passage I had abundant time to acquaint myself with the new situation which had been created by the action of my hon. friend, the then Minister of Public Works, and I had to come to the conclusion that the representations which had been made to me certainly required an investigation on my part. The policy of the government on the fiscal question was laid down for the last time during last session by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in making the budget speech, and on that occasion he made use of the following language:

We do not propose to make any changes in the tariff this session. I do not for a moment claim that the tariff is perfect. I think, that, on the whole, it has proved a very good tariff. Indeed, when we recall the circumstances under which our tariff revision took place, when we remember the very complicated and difficult problem with which we had to deal, we may well congratulate ourselves upon our success in devising a tariff so well adapted to the requirements of the country, a tariff under which Canada has prospered in a greater degree than in any previous period in her history. I have occasionally pointed out the desirability of a reasonable measure of tariff stability. Nothing would be more likely to unsettle business than a practice of introducing frequent tariff changes. Hence, we have resisted applications for many small changes and we think it well to do so to-day. But I would not have it understood that this view can always be held. As time passes, conditions change in our own country and it will be well for us to take note of this, so that we may adjust the tariff accordingly. Nor is that the only reason that might require some change. Conditions arise in other countries of which we are obliged to take account. We do not propose that we shall stand still and that this tariff shall remain unchanged, but we think the time is not opportune for making changes at present.

Then, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance went on to say that at that very moment it would not be advisable to make tariff changes, amongst other reasons, for this reason that we had just completed the census and that we had not yet before us the condition of the industries of the country revealed by the census. Another reason was that at that very moment we were engaged in some correspondence with some foreign countries, amongst others, Germany, with the view, if possible, of bettering the condition of our trade with them, and another reason was that we were engaged to proceed at short notice during the then coming summer to London to engage in the approaching conference, and we knew for a certainty that the tariff conditions which prevailed between the motherland and this country would be examined. These were some of the reasons why my hon. friend, speaking for the government, did not deem it advisable to have a tariff revision and he concluded as follows:

For these reasons we postpone for the present the question of tariff revision. When the moment for revision arrives, the public of Canada may rest assured that the government will undertake the work in the spirit of moderation and caution that has prevailed in their past actions in tariff affairs, avoiding the extremes which almost always find advocates, and having regard to what is best, not for particular industries or particular sections of the country, but for the interests of the people of the whole Dominion.

I have only to remark at this moment that in holding this language my hon. friend was speaking officially, that he was giving the result of the determined policy that for the present no tariff changes should take place and that we would stand by the policy which was then on the statute-book and that this was to be the case until the condition of the country might require us to recommend a departure from that policy. Such being the condition of things and the policy so laid down in the course of that summer, my hon. friend the then Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) and the present member for St. Mary's division of the city of Montreal, entered into a campaign advocating the immediate revision of the tariff in the sense of higher duties and more stringent protection. For the purposes of the present question—for the purposes of the constitutional question which is the only question at present before the House and with which I intend to deal—it was of no circumstance whatever whether my hon. friend advocated an increase of the tariff or a decrease of the tariff. The error; the constitutional error was the same; it mattered not whether he advocated to revise the tariff up or down. The one important thing was that being a member of the administration he was bound by the policy laid down by the member of the cabinet who had authority to speak upon this subject and whose voice had been heard upon the floor of this House in no uncertain tone, and who had laid it down as plain as language could make it: That the government would not under existing circumstances admit of any tariff changes.

I know very well, Sir, and the House need not be told by me, that the gentlemen who are assembled at the council board are not expected to be any more unanimous in their views because they sit at council, than would be expected from any other body of men. It is in human nature to differ. It is in human nature, even for the best of friends; even for men professing the same views politically to differ and to differ materially on some points. But the council sits for the purpose of reconciling these differences—the council sits for the purpose of examining the situation and having examined it, then to come to a solution which solution then becomes a law to all those who choose to remain in the cabinet. It would be a mere redundancy for me to affirm that the necessity for solidarity between the members of the same administration is absolute; that the moment a policy has been determined upon, then it becomes the duty of every member of that administration to support it and to support it in its entirety. It can be possible that a member of the cabinet who assented to that policy may not be convinced that it is for the best; it may be possible that he thinks a wiser course could have been taken. But if he remains in the cabinet, it is because he thinks that on the whole it is better that his views on that subject should give way to the views of others, and that whilst his own judgment is not in accord with the judgment of his colleagues, still it is for the best interest of the country that he should resign his judgment to theirs, and continue to occupy a position in the cabinet.

I am also aware that in some instances—not in many instances I must say—a man speaking upon the impulse of the moment may perhaps be led to take a view which is not the view which would be entertained by his colleagues, but if that remains an isolated instance no serious harm could come of it. An appeal from the Prime Minister to the man who has so spoken is generally sufficient to promote harmony and to make him understand that whether he agrees or not he must come to the view held by the cabinet. But when a policy has been determined upon; solemnly agreed upon and solemnly promulgated to the House and to the people, I need not tell the House—and I think my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) ought to be the first to agree—that under such circumstances it is not only the duty politically of a member of the cabinet, but it is his duty both as a friend and as a member of the party, to stand by that policy. And, if at a later stage he thinks that the policy is wrong, that it ought to be improved, that it ought to be amended; then the battle, or the action is to be taken, not before the public, not before the constituencies, but the reform has to be advocated in the first place in the cabinet of which he is a member.

My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) however did not follow these rules. My hon. friend took another course and I think he will agree with me that the language is not too strong when I say, that he started upon a campaign for the purpose of advocating a policy in favour of immediate revision of the tariff in the sense of higher duties and higher protection. At the banquet of the Manufacturers' Association in Halifax he declared for such a policy. He repeated the same theory at Gananoque, at Chatham, and at several other places. If it had been an isolated expression, not repeated, not followed by any other, I think the evil done, the course pursued might have been susceptible of being reclaimed. But as my hon. friend started upon a campaign and repeated the course which he had first adopted, and made it plain to the country that what he was aiming at was an immediate revision of the tariff in the sense I have indicated against the stated policy of the administration of which he was a member; there was no course for me to take but the course which I thought it advisable to take as soon as I landed in Canada. And as soon as I landed into Canada I came to the conclusion that the conduct and language of my hon. friend made it imperative upon me to take action immediately in that way.

I arrived in the city of Ottawa on the 18th of October. On the 19th, that is to say the following day, I had an interview with my hon. friend and I met him at his own house. The following morning my hon. friend called at my office early in the morning before his departure for the city of Toronto where he was to speak that same evening. The next stage which I had to take in the discharge of my duties, such as I understand them, was to call upon His Excellency the Governor General to acquaint him of the situation and the judgment which I had formed upon it, and then to meet my colleague which I did upon the same day, namely, the 20th. On the following day, the 21st of October, I received by mail from my hon. friend the following letter:

Toronto, 20th Oct., 1902.

My dear Sir Wilfrid,—I feel it is my duty to place my resignation in your hands, and to ask you to be good enough to have it accepted by His Excellency the Governor General.

In the interview which I had with you, you expressed the opinion that I should not have spoken on the tariff as I have done, that the government had not as yet come to any definite understanding on their fiscal policy for the future, &c.

I shall not discuss with you at the present time, the question as to whether I was right or wrong in the course I have followed.

You are the leader of the government, and your opinion, as far as my attitude is involved, must prevail.

You told me that my utterances are causing you trouble. I have no right and no desire to be a source of embarrassment to you or to the party with which I have been connected since 1892.

My views on the tariff are well known to you. I have, on several occasions, stated them publicly in your presence and discussed them often privately with you.

Entertaining the opinion that the interests of the Canadian people make it our duty to revise, without delay, the tariff of 1897, with the view of giving a more adequate protection to our industries, to our farming community, to our workingmen, I cannot possibly remain silent.

I prefer my freedom of action and of speech, under the circumstances, even to the great honour of being your colleague.

Before severing my official relations with you, allow me to express my sincerest hope that you will soon be restored to your health of former days.

You would greatly oblige me by conveying to my colleagues my best wishes for their welfare and their happiness. My personal relations with most of them have been of a pleasant and cordial nature. I hope they will continue to be the same in the future.

Believe me, my dear Sir Wilfrid,

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) J. ISRAEL TARTE.

Immediately I answered in the following manner :—

Ottawa, October 21, 1902,

My dear Tarte,—After having seen you on Sunday last and having expressed to you my well settled opinion upon the consequences of your recent attitude, my first duty was to wait upon His Excellency the Governor General to inform him that I was obliged to demand the resignation of your portfolio.

After having seen His Excellency, I had to acquaint my colleagues of the interview which I had had with you.

In accepting your resignation, it is well to emphasize the points of difference between us.

During my absence in Europe, without any communication with me, and without any previous understanding with your colleagues, you began an active campaign in favour of an immediate revision of the tariff in the direction of high protection.

I regret having been obliged to observe to you that this attitude on your part constitutes a self-evident violation of your duty towards the government of which you were a member.

I repeat to you here what I told you on Sunday : I do not wish to discuss, at this moment, the economic theory of which you have made yourself the champion. This question, however important it might be, is subordinate to one still more important.

If you had reached the conclusion that the interest of the country demanded without delay, an increase of the custom duties, the first thing for you to do as a member of the government, before addressing your views to the public, would have been to place them before your colleagues, with the object of obtaining that unanimous action of the cabinet which is the very foundation of responsible government.

If you had not been able to obtain from your colleagues their assent to the course which you recommended you would have been obliged then either to accept their own views or to sever your connection with them, and then for the first time would you have been free to place your views before the public.

Such was the very simple course which was binding upon you ; but to remain a member of the government, and, at the same time, to advocate a policy which had not yet been adopted by the government, was an impediment to the proper working of our constitutional system, and implies a disregard for that loyalty which all those who are members of the same administration owe to each other and have a right to expect from each other.

I thank you for the good wishes which you express for the improvement of my health, and I will make it my duty to convey to your old colleagues the wishes which you express for their welfare and their happiness.

Believe me,

Yours very sincerely,

WILFRID LAURIER.

The Hon. J. I. Tarte,
Ottawa.

Upon this the portfolio of Public Works being vacant, and also the place in the cabinet occupied by my hon. friend, I asked the assent of my colleagues to my recommending His Excellency—advice which was accepted—to call to be Minister of Public Works my colleague who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Sutherland, and to appoint to the portfolio of Marine and Fisheries the hon. member for Maisonneuve, Mr. Préfontaine, who has since been returned for that constituency.

Hon. J. ISRAEL TARTE (Montreal, St. Mary's). Mr. Speaker, it will be no surprise to the House if I beg leave to offer a few observations to supplement and perhaps to answer the statements which have just been made and read by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. My right hon. friend had been abroad for several months. On his return he reached the city of Montreal on the 18th of October. As it was my duty and my pleasure, I went to meet him and to welcome him. We arranged and agreed that both of us should be in Ottawa on the following day, that was Sunday. On that day he telephoned me that he would come to my house at five o'clock in the afternoon. The right hon. gentleman reproached me—informed me, rather—that some of my speeches made in his absence had annoyed several of my colleagues and were causing trouble to him. He expressed his regret that I should have made those speeches which had been pronounced on the fiscal policy. He thought I should not have taken the position I had taken. I informed him at the outset, that I had no desire to remain any longer a member of his administration—that, in fact, I had waited till he was back in order to hand in my resignation. I then endeavoured to explain my position to him—not, as I told him, with a view to asking to be kept as a member of the cabinet, but to make my position clear to him. I reminded him then, in answer to the expression of his regret at the speeches which I had made, at what he called my new departure, that the speeches which I had made when he was abroad were not stronger, were not as strong, as several other speeches which I had made when he was here and in his presence. I told him that I thought a cabal had been organized against me, and that under the circumstances I was sure he would understand why I had no desire to remain any longer a member of the cabinet. I said to him : "My resignation is in your hands ; you are a sick man ; I am in the best of health ; take my resignation at once, to-day ; do not worry ; appoint in my place anybody that you like ; I will do every thing that I can to save worry and trouble to you." These were the very words I used. The Prime Minister did not agree with that view. He told me that it was preferable to leave things in abeyance till I was back from Toronto, on Wednesday. As he stated a minute ago, on Monday morning, before I left for Toronto, I called at his office, and he told me again that it was preferable to leave matters in abeyance till I was back from Toronto. On my way up, the conclusion came irresistibly to my mind that it was better for all concerned that the situation should be relieved without any more delay. I concluded then not to comply with his wishes, and I dictated to my secretary the letter of resignation which my right hon. friend has just read. Let me read that letter again, as it is of great importance to me that the statement I make to-day should be as complete as possible :—

Toronto, 20th October, 1902.

The Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ont.

My Dear Sir Wilfrid,—I feel it is my duty to place my resignation in your hands, and to ask you to be good enough to have it accepted by His Excellency the Governor General.

In the interview that I had with you, you expressed the opinion that I should not have spoken on the tariff as I have done, that the government had not as yet come to any definite understanding on their fiscal policy for the future, etc.

Believe me, my dear Sir Wilfrid,
Yours very sincerely,
(Sgd.) J. ISRAEL TARTE.

This letter was mailed on the 20th October, in Toronto. It reached my right hon. friend's office, I suppose, about ten o'clock in the morning. At one o'clock in the afternoon, my right hon. friend's answer was taken to my house. I was away. The right hon. gentleman knew that I was in Toronto. My right hon. friend wrote me in French, and I shall read the translation published in the 'Star.'

Ottawa, Oct. 21st 1902.

My Dear Tarte,—After having seen you on Sunday, and having expressed to you my well-founded opinion of the consequences of your recent attitude, my first duty was to call on His Excellency the Governor General, and to inform him that I was obliged to ask you for your portfolio. After having seen His Excellency, I informed my colleagues of the interview I had had with you. In accepting your resignation, it is well to precise the points of difference between us.

During my absence to Europe, without warning me and without any previous agreement with your colleagues, you commenced an active campaign in favour of the revision of the tariff towards very high protection. I regret to have had to point out to you that this attitude on your part constitutes an open violation of your duty towards the government of which you are a member.

I now repeat what I told you on Sunday. I do not wish to discuss at this moment either the value or the opportunity of the theory of which you have constituted yourself the champion. The question, important as it may be, is overshadowed by considerations of much greater importance.

If you had reached the conclusion that the interests of the country demanded without delay the increase of the custom duties, the first thing for you to have done, as a member of the government, before addressing yourself to the public, was to have submitted your views to your colleagues for the purpose of securing a unanimous action of the cabinet, which is the very basis of a responsible government. If you have failed in securing the assent of your colleagues to the new policy which you recommended, you would have had to choose either to adopt their way of viewing the matter, or to part from them, and then for the first time it would have been open to you to address yourself to the public.

Such was the simple conduct which was imposed on you, but to remain a member of the government, and at the same time advocate a policy which has not as yet been adopted by the government constitutes an obstruction to the working of our constitutional system and implies a breach of that loyalty which all those who form part of the same administration owe each other and have the right of expecting one from the other.

I thank you for the wishes which you express for the improvement of my health, and I will make it my duty to transmit to your former colleagues the wishes which you express for their prosperity and their happiness.

Believe me,
Yours devotedly,
WILFRID LAURIER.

To Hon. J. I. Tarte,
Ottawa.

By the direction, I have no doubt, of my right hon. friend, both his letter and mine were handed over to the press. They were given to the press on the 21st, the very same day that my right hon. friend's letter was written. On the 23rd October, I wrote over my own signature an article in 'La Patrie' headed "a word to the country." Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote the following paragraphs, which refer to the letter of my right hon. friend :—

I see that some reproach Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the tone of the letter which he addressed to me.

The Prime Minister is fatigued—harassed—ill. The undeniable harshness of some of his words by no means changes my personal feelings towards him. I have grown old enough to take circumstances into consideration.

The Prime Minister had no right to tell me that I had failed in loyalty towards my colleagues, in using the language which I recently did on the fiscal question.

To this unjust reproach I have the right to oppose the numerous speeches which I made, in the same sense, during the last few years.

I did not organize a campaign in Ontario. I went into that province last year and this summer at the urgent invitation of the agricultural societies, of chambers of commerce, of ministerial members.

I am of the opinion that parliament is the proper place to discuss, at first, matters of this kind. I beg, then, to be allowed to emphasize as energetically as I can my objection to the Prime Minister's letter. I am speaking in all deference to him. I have a great deal of respect and consideration for my right hon. friend. I take direct issue with the statements contained in his letter as it has just been read to the House. Let me quote some of his words again :

During my absence to Europe, without warning me and without any previous agreement with your colleagues, you commenced an active campaign in favour of the revision of the tariff towards very high protection. I regret to have had to point out to you that this attitude on your part constitutes an open violation of your duty towards the government of which you are a member.

I did not commence, I did not carry on any new campaign. I went on repeating speeches that I had made before in the presence of the right hon. gentleman, of many members of the House, and of several of my colleagues on repeated occasions. There was a banquet given by the Manufacturers' Association in Montreal, in the month of November, 1901. I had the privilege of being one of the guests and one of the speakers on that occasion. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) attended that meeting. I was called upon to speak, and in the course of my speech I said :

Shall I be accused once more of being a 'Confounded Protectionist ' if I say openly, as I generally try to say things, that the main dogma of my political creed is ' Canada for the Canadians ?' Canada for the Canadians and for those who want to become Canadians. (Cheers).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN. Cheers from whom ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. From everybody in the hall. I went on :

I say let us be Canadians in our customs laws, let us stand by Canadian capital, let us stand by Canadian industry (hear, hear) ; let us stand by our Canadian manufacturers (prolonged cheering), and we shall, therefore, in every sense be standing rightly. We shall be standing rightly for the labouring classes, for the farming classes, for the manufacturing classes, for we ought to be one, and we are one.

I went on again :

Are the people to depend for all time upon the United States of America, our neighbour ? Our friends on the other side of the line have raised a wall against us, they show no disposition to lower it, and, if I am not mistaken, Sir, I would say that they take us by the throat every time that they can. Now, I want to know why our Canadian custom laws are not to be just as self-protecting as theirs ? I have not been able to see for the life of me, why our laws should not be as protective as those of the United States. We want to advance ; I do not care much about words, I care less about theories ; theories and words have given precedence to circumstances, and I say these are circumstances which we have to confront. I say why should the Americans invade our markets ? They would not invade our market if we can sell to the consumer just as cheap as the American, and I want to know why we cannot. I am not discussing the tariff in detail, I am laying down principles. I say that the first principle for an individual, as for a nation, is to defend himself (hear, hear). In speaking as I do, I know I am speaking for the very large majority of the Canadian people. Now, do not believe, gentlemen, that I belong to a government where every one takes the same view. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has very rightly stated that questions of this kind are generally settled by compromise. I have been brought up a protectionist—in a protectionist school—and I have not renounced my faith (cheers), and I do not mean to renounce it. (renewed cheering). The Prime Minister is a cabinet maker of the first rank and if I were ever to have a government I would try to have all the shades possible represented. You have no idea what a cabinet meeting is like—people fighting like blazes at times.

Let me say immediately that these last words have been, on several occasions, the subject of observations which have no foundation whatever. For, let me assure the House—and I am speaking in the hearing of my former colleagues—that we never had any such fighting as has been described in the press. I was speaking, of course, in a jocular way when I used those words.

The Prime Minister also made a speech on the same occasion. He made, forsooth, a fighting speech—a fiery speech. He said :

In connection with this, there is another feature which is now taking place. I remember, and you remember also, that since the abolition of the reciprocity treaty in 1866, we have sent delegation after delegation to Washington to obtain reciprocity. We are not sending any more delegations (loud and continued applause). But I rather expect, and I would not be surprised if the thing were to take place, even within a few years. I say, I rather expect that there will be delegations coming from Washington to Ottawa for reciprocity (wild cheering). Having learned the lesson from our friends to the South how to receive such a delegation, we shall receive them in the proper way (cheers), with every possible politeness (laughter).

After the speech from which I have quoted, I remained a member of the administration. After that I made several other speeches on the same line, advocating the revision of the fiscal policy of this country on strong Canadian, national lines. Time went on. Delegation after delegation came to meet the government in Ottawa. I generally attended when meeting these delegations. On not one occasion was there a request that the tariff be lowered ; far from it ; on every occasion business men, manufacturing associations, farmers, asked for a revision of the tariff in the direction of higher protection. The government were pressed pretty hard. I know what was going on just as well as any of my former colleagues know. We were hard pressed. The London conference was on. The session of 1902 was called. The situation, as my right hon. friend has said, was discussed. Of course, none of us is free to say what took place in the council, but I remember very well what took place ; yes, and my former colleagues remember what took place too. The result of our deliberations was the statement made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in his budget speech. Let me read it at some greater length than my right hon. friend has read it to the House.. The budget speech was delivered on March 17th, during which the Minister of Finance spoke as follows :

We do not propose to make any changes in the tariff this session. I do not for a moment claim that the tariff is perfect. I think that, on the whole, it has proved a very good tariff. Indeed, when we recall the circumstances under which our tariff revision took place, when we remember the very complicated and difficult problem with which we had to deal, we may well congratulate ourselves upon our success in devising a tariff so well adapted to the requirements of the country, a tariff under which Canada has prospered in a greater degree than in any previous period in her history. I have occasionally pointed out the desirability of a reasonable measure of tariff stability. Nothing would be more likely to unsettle business than a practice of introducing frequent tariff changes. Hence, we have resisted applications for many small changes, and we think it well to do so to-day. But I would not have it understood that this view can always be held. As time passes, conditions change in our own country, and it will be well for us to take note of this, so that we may adjust the tariff accordingly. Nor is that the only reason that might require some change. Conditions arise in other countries of which we are obliged to take account. We do not propose that we shall stand still and that this tariff shall remain unchanged; but we think the time is not opportune to make any change at present. There are several reasons which operate in our minds against entering upon a policy of tariff changes to-day. We have just completed the taking of a census, and while some of the results are available, others of much importance have yet to be prepared. Among these are the returns of the operations of our industries. In considering the tariff in relation to the industries of the country, it is desirable that we should have before us, with ample time for consideration, the industrial statistics of the recent census

That session came to a close. My right hon. friend and some of his colleagues went abroad ; I remained in Canada. After having settled the more pressing business of the Department of Public Works, I started on a tour of inspection, and also in search of information concerning the transportation question to which I had given as much time as I was able to do. Naturally I was called upon to answer addresses and make speeches, and I often expressed the opinion, which I had expressed in the House, that the transportation question and the fiscal policy of this country were intimately bound together. Perhaps on this occasion the storm has come from the west. Speaking at Port Arthur I had under my eyes an interview given by Mr. Greenway, former prime minister of Manitoba, in which he advocated a lower tariff. I said to the large audience before me that in my humble opinion Port Arthur and Fort William, and not Duluth, should be the centres of exchange on the great lakes for the trade between the west and the east. It was that way I was led to speak of the fiscal policy of the government. Mr. Speaker, my speeches, most of them at any rate, have been reported, and I invite criticism of my utterances during the absence of my right hon. friend. I state here that I never said in his absence what I did not say when he was here, what I would not have said had he been in this country. I have acted in perfect good faith. I advocated the policy that I had reason to believe, that I still believe, has the policy of this government before the Prime Minister and my colleagues went away. I did not advocate an increase of the tariff all along the line—and I again invite criticism of my utterances—I went on to say that this country should have, must have, a strong Canadian fiscal policy. That was the gist of my utterances, and I never went further. The right hon. gentleman reproaches me in his letter, and in his statement to-day, with having advocated an immediate revision of the tariff. Sir, the true facts of the case are these—I have already referred to them. The statement of the Minister of Finance last year was a formal promise to the country that during the present session of parliament, then the coming session of parliament, a revision of the tariff would take place. I made bold to say that I would be able to find a clear expression to that effect in some of the reported interviews that took place when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and myself, with others, were present. It was a settled matter. I take the responsibility of saying here that it was a settled matter that a revision of the tariff should take place this session.

I am prepared to take the responsibility of the mistakes I have made. If I have made mistakes I am prepared to pay the penalty of these mistakes, but, I am not ready to stand without protesting with all my energy and from the bottom of my heart under the imputation that I have been disloyal to my colleagues. I cannot stand that. Whatever the position of the right hon. Prime Minister may be, and he has achieved a very high position in this country, his words cannot turn into accuracy statements that are not borne out by the facts. During my right hon. friend's absence I advocated for Canada a policy that would give us the best available means of transportation and a strong Canadian fiscal policy. I do not regret a word of what I have said. I know that I have acted loyally, I know that I have endeavoured to serve my country and that I have tried to serve my party to the best of my ability. I may have made mistakes, but, am I the only man after all who has talked tariff in the government? I have advocated a strong Canadian policy on the floor of parliament and outside of it. Other members of the administration have talked fiscal policy. The Minister of the Interior (Hon. Clifford Sifton) also talked about the tariff, and I suppose that those who hold the view I hold are not the only ones to be excommunicated if any are to be excommunicated for discussing this question. The hon. Minister of the Interior, speaking on the 12th December, 1901, only a few days after I had talked in Montreal, spoke as follows: And this is not the only speech he made on the great desirability of having a lower tariff. I do not blame him. He is perfectly entitled to his opinions. I would like to have the same privilege. He was a minister as much as I was. He said:—

I desire before this representative convention to say a few words to put before you fairly and squarely the position of the government.

The different provinces have different interests and with these presented in parliament, it is impossible to weld them all into legislation.

If we are to have government, harmony and progress we must do in respect to fiscal legislation just what Sir Wilfrid said in regard to race and religion:—

'We must find a common ground upon which to stand.'

If you have followed the discussion in the press, you will know that there is a strong agitation for the purpose of placing a duty on lumber and increasing the duties on agricultural implements and woollen goods.

They say the reason is that they have not sufficient protection. I say it is not. If they cannot live on a 23 per cent tariff they had better shut up.

The government had never decided that if the woollen industry or any other industry in the country could not live on a tariff of twenty-three per cent, they had better be shut up. We had never decided anything of the kind. The government had not pronounced more on the policy of my hon. friend—it had pronounced less, perhaps, because I verily believe it is the intention of the government to raise the duty on woollens. My hon. friend spoke in that way. Well, he has not been excommunicated.

The lumber interests are demanding a tariff of from 20 to 30 per cent.

The lumber representatives come down twice every session to see what influence they can bring to bear to have a duty placed on lumber. Sir Wilfrid sends them to me telling them that I represent the people who do not want a duty on lumber.

The government having arrived at this position on the tariff, the important thing for the people of the west is to stand firmly at our backs and assist us in preventing any encroachment upon the position we have taken.

'Stability and no change' is the policy of the government.

We had never decided that we should not have any change, far from it. The Minister of Finance had announced that there would be a revision of the tariff later on.

The Conservatives are in favour of a very decided advance in the duties of important commodities all along the line.

British preference would be done away with if the Conservative party were returned to power.

Well, Sir, I made those speeches to which my hon. friend has alluded and on which we will have further opportunities to pronounce. On the 4th of September my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, the youngest member of the administration, perhaps, not the least influential, but the youngest member of the administration, gave an interview which was circulated broadcast all over the land in which he took strong ground against any increase in the tariff. It was a signal for personal attacks directed against me in several newspapers of importance. The Manitoba 'Free Press,' which is the personal organ of my hon. friend, the 'Globe,' the Montreal 'Herald' and other papers attacked me very severely. Knowing well the influences that are behind the scenes in the Liberal party, as I should know them, having been six years amongst them—

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Who is behind the 'Globe'?

Mr. BENNETT. Hypocrisy.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I understood at a glance what was going on and I resolved to withdraw from the government at that very time, not because I had differed in the past in many points with the government policy, but, because I felt then and I feel now that when things have come to such a pass that members of the same administration are assailing each other, either in the newspapers, or elsewhere, they must part. It is better for all concerned. I then fully resolved to withdraw from the government, and it will be within the remembrance of some of my former colleagues that at an informal meeting of the cabinet, presided over by Hon. Mr. Scott, the Secretary of State, I told my colleagues of my determination. I consulted some friends who were good enough to take some interest in me. They represented to me that it was better that I should wait the return of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I waited. I have explained the circumstances under which my resignation was placed in his hands. My right hon. friend states in his letter that after having met me at my house on Sunday and on Monday in his office he thought it was his duty to proceed to His Excellency and inform him that he had to ask for my portfolio. Sir, I handed my resignation to my right hon. friend both on Saturday and Monday morning. He asked me to delay, to leave things in abeyance till I would be back from Toronto. I ask him now, would it not have been fair on his part to state at least to His Excellency that if he thought my resignation should be handed to him, that I had handed such resignation to him. It may not have a material effect on the question, but I state the facts as my right hon. friend knows they are.

I said a minute ago that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) had talked of the tariff. A good deal of freedom has been used perhaps by members of the administration. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) has been rather free upon pretty broad questions. Not very long ago he made a speech on the railway policy of the government. When I left the cabinet, the government had not decided to build out of the public exchequer a trans-continental railway. The Minister of Railways and Canals speaking on the 2nd of November, to a reporter of the Sunday 'Sun,' of Montreal in his own house in Ottawa, said this—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me. I never had any interview with that gentleman, and never authorized the publication of such an interview. I was amazed later when I heard that such an interview had been published. I paid no attention to it, but I certainly did not have the interview.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Well, I am amazed at the amazement of the Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. gentleman never took care to state that he never had that interview which was of a grave nature and which has been discussed generally in the press. Of course I accept the statement but I will read the interview just the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear hear.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. If I had chosen to do so, it would have been most convenient for me to deny the reports of my speeches on the fiscal question. Of course I will accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Blair), but I will read the interview for the information of the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not object to my hon. friend reading it, but I say that I had no interview with any gentleman at all representing the Montreal 'Sun' in my life.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The Montreal 'Sunday Sun,' however, published a long interview which took place after a speech which was delivered by the Minister of Railways and Canals at Vancouver on the same lines. I read the speech as I read the interview, and the speech and the interview are built out of the same material. I will perhaps quote the speech later on, but here is the interview :

One of the things that pleased me most of all was that everywhere an almost general, if not, in fact, a general opinion was to be found in favour of a government railway right through to the Pacific coast. The people want such a railway because they are convinced that it is the one great thing that will bring about the equalizing of rates, that will prevent the farmers from continually being at the mercy of the railways. They even claim it as their right to have one, and after seeing what I have of the country I agree with them. There cannot any longer be any doubt that there is a great future before a government railway in that country. As a result of my visit, I hope, as Minister of Railways, to show parliament the necessity for a government railway through the west, for there cannot any longer be any doubt that the future of the Dominion lies greatly in the districts beyond the great lakes.

I say again that this interview is but a repetition of the speech that the hon. gentleman delivered in Vancouver. However he states that he did not have that interview, and I accept the statement.

I fully grant, Sir, that the members of an administration must be agreed on their policy. Now, in the speeches which I have delivered, have I disagreed with the policy for which the Liberal party as constituted to-day is responsible. The right hon. the Prime Minister said on another occasion that the policy of the present administration has been laid down and propounded in the tariff of 1897. I grant that. The Liberal party—the ministerial party as constituted to-day is not responsible for the utterances that may have been made previous to the adoption of the fiscal policy of 1897. But the fiscal policy of 1897 has been supplemented by the statement of the Minister of Finance in 1902, which was, which is for all men of good faith; for the business community who read it, a promise to revise the tariff and to increase the tariff on many lines. That was the promise; the country took it as a promise; I did not advocate anything else. I have advocated a policy for which I am responsible; that is to say the tariff of 1897 supplemented by the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance last year.

I ask : Are then the statements of my right hon. friend's letter fair to me ? I speak here with no spirit of regret or rancour, but simply to put my position right as it is my duty to do. The right hon. gentleman has reproached me for advocating what he styled in his letter, a new policy. I am within the judgment of the House, within the judgment of the country, and within the judgment of history when I say: That I had advocated years and years before to his knowledge the same policy that I have advocated in his absence. Then, Sir, he says in his letter, and he has repeated it on the floor of the House today, that he had informed His Excellency that he had asked for my resignation. I say again that my resignation was in his hands. He had it, but he thought fit to leave the matter in abeyance. Again I ask him whether he has been fair to me. I am, I repeat, within the judgment of the country and of history on these two points.

Sir, I have quitted office without regret. I know that as long as I occupied the important position of Minister of Public Works I endeavoured to the best of my limited ability to do my duty towards my country and my duty towards the party with which I have been connected. My aim has been to promote and complete a system of transportation which would make this country independent of the United States. My aim has been, through a strong Canadian policy, and through the best possible means of transportation, to unite more and more the different parts of this Dominion, and the Dominion with the British empire. I do not say that I have always fulfilled the expectations of some of my opponents in the Liberal party; but I believe that I have left the treasury benches with an honest record. My department has been administered honestly and squarely. I am able to say, without any fear or hesitation, that to my knowledge not one single dishonest act was committed while I was at the head of that important department.

Before taking my seat I wish to thank on the floor of parliament, as I have done elsewhere, the right hon. gentleman for the great honour that he did me when he chose me as one of his colleagues. We are all glad to see him restored to health. So far as I am concerned, whatever the differences of the past have been, whatever the differences of the future may be, I will keep an affectionate souvenir of my relations with him and with most of my colleagues. Let me also thank the members of the House on both sides for the support that I have received at their hands on all the important questions with which my department was connected. I have left in the hands of the right hon. gentleman a report in which I have mapped out a plan of improvements which I had made up my mind to try to persuade parliament to proceed with. That document is a public document. I hope that my former colleagues will take up the various important questions with which I have dealt in that document. I am sure that my successor at the head of the Department of Public Works will give to the transportation question the earnest attention that I have always tried to give to that important national matter.

Hon. Mr. TARTE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend who leads the government sometimes expresses surprise because we on this side of the House do not understand what the fiscal policy of the Liberal party is. May I be permitted to draw to his attention a circumstance that occurred during the recent visit to England of himself and some of his colleagues? One of the admittedly ablest men in the cabinet made an absolute and utter mistake as to what the fiscal policy of the Liberal party was; and I suppose, after that somewhat singular circumstance, we shall not in the future have from my right hon. friend any expression of surprise that we on this side of the House are not able fully to understand what the fiscal policy of the Liberal party is at the present time.

It was well known, Sir, that the Minister of Finance made an important announcement in his budget speech of last year. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) arose in his seat during the budget debate and stated that he understood that announcement to be that the tariff would be revised this session, and would be revised along the line of higher duties; and although members of the cabinet were sitting in the House at the time, not one of them ventured to put aside the interpretation placed upon the remarks of the hon. Minister of Finance by the hon. member for Alberta. I can bear testimony to the accuracy of at least one portion of the remarks of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Tarte), because I myself had the pleasure of being present at that banquet in the city of Montreal to which he has referred, and of saying a few words on that occasion. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister and I responded to a certain toast. The toast, I think, was the toast of Canada; but my right hon. friend's remarks were directed altogether to the question of the tariff, on which he made an exceedingly non-committal speech. It is true, he did venture to suggest to the manufacturers there assembled that the tariff was almost perfect, having regard to the present condition of the country. That remark was met with vigorous cries of dissent, whereupon my right hon. friend, with that readiness which has always characterized him, remarked that there were even spots on the sun, and, therefore there was no occasion for surprise that some gentlemen in Canada might find fault even with the tariff. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance spoke afterwards in response to another toast, and his speech was equally non-committal. He wanted the tariff taken altogether out of politics, and he wanted to have it understood that the tariff as it then existed was as good a tariff as could be had for Canada. His remarks did not find much favour. Then my hon. friend who has just spoken rose and made in the presence of his leader and in the presence of the Minister of Finance, one of the strongest protectionist speeches I have ever heard in my life. My right hon. friend has sought to shake the force of that circumstance by saying that an isolated remark does not call for action by a leader of a government, but that a campaign is necessary. What does my right hon. friend think constitutes a campaign ? Is it not enough that a member of his cabinet in his presence makes a speech which, as distinctly as words could do so, advocated a very great increase in the customs duties of this country ? Was it necessary to make that speech twice or three times in order that the right hon. gentleman who leads the government might be made acquainted with the opinions and the policy of a member of his cabinet ? What does my right hon. friend mean by a campaign ? If he wanted any campaign does he not know that even before he went to the mother country, the hon. member for St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte) again spoke in Montreal and used language, as reported in one of the Montreal papers, as follows :

Our American friends are making tremendous efforts to crush this country. We who are in office know that they are leaving no stone unturned to crush this Dominion, both industrially and commercially.

I have been accused of talking too much, but I may tell you that it is never a crime to speak the truth, and I do not believe in secrecy in public affairs.

There is a crisis at hand. Our American friends are endeavouring to make a slaughter market of this country. In consequence of this attempt let us have a tariff that will protect our natural industries and waterways, that will protect our national trade.

Language could not be very much more explicit. Yet my right hon. friend says that a campaign is necessary. But the position which the right hon. gentleman takes is really the result of an attempt on his part to bind together in the one cabinet men of exactly opposite opinions with regard to the fiscal affairs of this country. My right hon. friend seems to think that such is the highest aim of statesmanship. He seems to think that the ideal cabinet is that which has been described by Mr. Burke in a famous speech —

He made an administration so checkered and speckled; he put together a piece of joinery so crossly indented and whimsically dovetailed; a cabinet so variously inlaid; such a piece of diversified mosaic, such a tesselated pavement without cement; here a bit of black stone, and there a bit of white; patriots and courtiers, King's friends and republicans, Whigs and Tories, treacherous friends and open enemies, that it was indeed a very curious show, but utterly unsafe to touch and unsure to stand on.

Is that the sort of ideal cabinet which the right hon. gentleman has endeavoured to create, because some of the characteristics described by Mr. Burke are not wanting in the present cabinet, if we are to believe my hon. friend from St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte). Has not my hon. friend, in an article replying to a letter addressed to him, and published in the newspaper which he controls, called attention to the cabals and conspiracies against him which had been going on in the Liberal party many years ? Did not the hon. gentleman, in an editorial in his own paper, signed by his own hand, call attention to the fact that one of his own colleagues in the cabinet had paid the rent of a hall where a club met weekly for the purpose of heaping abuse on him ? Does my right hon. friend know any circumstance of that kind ? Is he able to indicate the member of his cabinet to whom my hon. friend has referred ? The country would like some information on that point. My right hon. friend is not able to furnish it, but surely the colleague who took that somewhat extraordinary course might have the manliness to stand up and say that he is the person who did that important work on behalf of a certain section of the cabinet and party.

It is quite evident that the attention of my right hon. friend has not been directed to the utterances of two members of his cabinet, which have been referred to by the hon. member for St. Mary's division this afternoon. We can well understand that on account of the right hon. gentleman's absence, and on account of the enormous number of newspapers he had to peruse when crossing the Atlantic, and by reason of the fact that his attention was mainly directed to the utterances of the hon. member for St. Mary's division, he has not, up to the present, become aware of the utterances of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton). Has the cabinet decided that there shall be no increase of duty on woollen goods or lumber or agricultural implements ? Will my right hon. friend now stand up and say that such a policy has been decided on by the government ? If so, I shall sit down and give him an opportunity to do so. My right hon. friend does not avail himself of the opportunity. It necessarily follows, if his reason for the dismissal of the hon. member for St. Mary's division be correct, that he should, on the adjournment of the House this afternoon, instantly call upon the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) for his resignation. It is a mere matter of forgetfulness that he has not done so already, and I know that my right hon. friend, with that high regard for constitutional principles which he so well expressed in his letter to the hon. member for St. Mary's division, will not lose a moment after the House adjourns in calling on His Excellency and informing him that he cannot any longer conscientiously avail himself of the services of the Minister of the Interior.

And what of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair), who thought, as he said to the people of New Brunswick not long ago, that the resignation of my hon. friend from St. Mary's division would not create even a ripple. Well, did it not create something more than a ripple on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, this afternoon. And what of the very important project which he has launched on the country ? I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether or not the cabinet has decided to build, as a government railway, a transcontinental line across this continent ? Will he get up and declare that any such policy has been decided on ? Again I give my right hon. friend the opportunity to rise in his place and make that declaration if he sees fit. Again he does not avail himself of the opportunity I give him, and therefore there exists every ground for the immediate dismissal of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, who has committed this cabinet to the project of building out of the moneys of this country a transcontinental line across this continent. Not only that, Sir, but it was announced by every Liberal paper in the west that that railway was to be built by this government for the purpose of keeping down rates on other transcontinental railways, and the admiration of Liberals was called up in all our western country because of the magnificent, bold and patriotic course which the Minister of Railways and Canals had announced on behalf of his government. Is there any reason why the right hon. gentleman who leads this government should not immediately proceed to His Excellency and inform him, that having been made aware this afternoon, for the first time, of the fact that one of his colleagues had laid down a policy in so important a matter, which, to use the right hon. gentleman's words, has not yet been adopted by the government, he deems it right that he should no longer avail himself of the services of the Minister of Railways and Canals. If my hon. friend is to be consistent, surely he must deal out the same justice to the Minister of Railways and Canals which he has already meted out to his long, tried friend the hon. member for St. Mary's division in Montreal.

But there are somewhat curious circumstances in connection with the incident which occurred this afternoon. We all know that my right hon. friend who leads the government began his career in public life as a protectionist. He has not, I think, been remarkable for his consistency in public life with regard to trade questions. But he seems to have developed, during the past few weeks, a great love for consistency on the part of public men. His first utterance in public life on fiscal questions in this country was this :—

> What my hon. friend has said as to my protective proclivities is perfectly true, and I do not deny that I have been a protectionist.

His next was :

> Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).
> We have within ourselves the ability to create an industry. If it be shown that we cannot maintain it, unless by legislation either in the way of premium or prohibitory tariff, then I should be prepared to take that into consideration.

And again later on :

> Although nature has been marvellously prodigal in her gifts and has done so much to make this a manufacturing country, we are yet dependent on foreign countries. It is our duty to foster our national industries.

And then in his letter to the late Mr. Bertram in 1896, he said :

> Whether a policy of absolute freedom of trade would or would not be injurious to the manufacturing industries of this country is a question which I will not stop to discuss here. There is no occasion for such a discussion as the intention of the Liberal party is not and never was to establish free trade in this country. * * * * * I submit also that, apart from the community as a whole, the manufacturers have not only not to suffer, but much to gain from the substitution of a revenue tariff for the present system.

And his last utterance, conveyed to this country by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) was this :

> I am, as I always have been, in favour of legitimate protection to our national industries and like my leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier I will ask and require protection for the interests of the different classes of the population.

I have in my hand a number of utterances of exactly opposite tenor given by my right hon. friend during his political life, and a few of them at least I think it is well to bring to the attention of the right hon. gentleman and the country. At the Liberal convention at Ottawa in 1893, he said :

> Let it be well understood then that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection; our ideal is free trade. Their immediate object is protection, ours tariff for revenue and for revenue only. Upon this issue we engage in battle.

Brantford, in 1894, he said :

> I propose that we should follow England's example and open our ports to the products of the world.

And at Quebec, on the 20th January, 1894, he said :

> Gentlemen, the only way in which Quebec can recover its old time prosperity as a maritime city is by adopting the policy of freedom of trade as it exists in the mother country, Old England * * * * * The system of protection has been the bane and curse of Canada * * * * * The Liberal party believe in free trade on the broad lines such as exist in Great Britain.

But he spoke also in the cities of the west. At Winnipeg for example, he said :

> I come before you to-night to preach to you this new gospel of freedom of trade, new—yes—new to this country. New on this continent, new on the other side of the line—the American republic, but not new on the other side of the water, in the Old Country * * * In the American republic you have the line of cleavage which exists between the Liberal party and the Conservative party—the question of free trade.' We stand for freedom. I denounce to you the policy of protection, as bondage—yes bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which the American slavery was bondage * * * * You have to toil and sweat for the privileged masters ; you have to toil for those who use protection which I claim is bondage * * I protest against this policy of protection—protection cannot be attained on any fair principle. What has protection done for your own Manitoba ? Manitoba is a young giant manacled * * * Can you expect reform from those who do not believe in reform ? Can you expect reduction of taxes from those who have always told you that taxation makes a country prosperous ? * * *

I would invite my right hon. friend's attention especially to these words of his uttered two years before he came into power :

Although it will be a hard fight we shall not give in one inch or retrace one step until we have reached the goal and that goal is the same policy of free trade as exists in England to-day.

Now, I mention this to my right hon. friend because I think his memory is bad. He sometimes has cast the reproach upon me across the floor of this House that my memory is not very good. I think from some recent utterances of his that the right hon. gentleman's own memory has become very bad indeed. And, as touching the question of consistency, I would like to call his attention to the fact that, in 1894, he told the people of this country by his speech in Winnipeg that free trade was the goal which the Liberal party was looking forward to, and within eighteen months after that he had written to Mr. Bertram, of Toronto, and told him that no party in the country had the slightest idea that there could be any such thing as free trade for Canada. Does not my right hon. friend think that is a delightful exhibition of consistency ? I have some more of his record here, but I do not think it necessary to use it. Perhaps, if his memory proves bad, I may use it on some future occasion ; but I may tell him that it exhibits as distinctly contradictory statements on important public questions as these utterances which I have just read.

Here we have six utterances, every one of them a strong pronouncement in favour of free trade; here we have six other utterances, every one of them a strong prononuncement in favour of protection. To use the common phrase : You pay your money and you take your choice. Some of these utterances are available for one part of the country, and some for another part of the country. And it is upon principles of this kind that the right hon. gentleman has seen fit to build up his cabinet. He seems to regard it as a great act of statemanship that he has brought within that cabinet men who possess such absolutely different opinions upon vital public questions. Sir, I do not consider the creation of a cabinet on such lines a very high achievement in statecraft. It seems to me rather that the cabinet should contain men who, on all important questions—on all questions of principle at least—have the same ideas and follow the same ideals. I do not think, for example, it a great act of statesmanship, after my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock) had proclaimed, in 1896, on the floor of this House, that the independence of parliament was being sacrificed by reason of the appointment of members of this House to offices of emolument under the Crown, after he had pledged his faith to this principle and had staked his reputation as a public man upon it, that my right hon. friend should succeed in inducing the Postmaster General to remain in a cabinet, which, from 1896 down to the present time, has appointed to offices of emolument under the Crown no less than twenty-one members of this House of Commons. Does not my right hon. friend think that it would be better that the Postmaster General, in this House or elsewhere, should take an early opportunity of stating whether or not he was sincere when he professed these principles in the House and introduced a bill for the purpose of remedying the evil he complained of ? We have a right to believe he was sincere. If he was sincere then, does he adhere to the same principles at the present time ? If not, when did he change, and what was the occasion of that change ? I do not think I am exceeding my duty in bringing to the attention of the House and of the country this instance as an illustration of the wonders which the right hon. gentleman thinks he has accomplished by bringing into his cabinet men of so diverse ideas on great public questions.

Now, the hon. member for St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has told us that the announcement made last session by the hon. Minister of Finance was properly understood by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). It was intended by the cabinet as an announcement to the country that the tariff would be revised, and that it would be revised along the line of higher duties. Well, Sir, what then was the meaning of the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) last year ? In replying to me he called the attention of my right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to his speech in Winnipeg from which I have just quoted. He said that those words when uttered by the right hon. gentleman were true and just words that he believed them to be true and just words still. Does this mean that at the present time the Minister of Trade and Commerce still retains the enmity which he expressed for eighteen years against anything in the nature of protection ? Take every one of his free trade speeches of days gone by, and you will not find in them anything stronger than the pronouncement against protection which was made on that occasion by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a member of the cabinet in this very House. He told this House that protection was inseperable from corruption, inseparable at least under existing conditions in this country. We have the statement on former occasions of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Hon. Mr. Tarte), we have the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), we have statements from other members of the Liberal party, that the present tariff is a protective tariff, and every one knows that it is so. So we have in the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce another illustration of the kind of policy which this party has pursued on the fiscal question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that it is a good thing for this country to have a ministry which either has no policy on fiscal questions, or which is afraid to announce that policy openly and fearlessly to the people of this country. As for the Conservative party, we have announced our policy on the floor of this House over and over again, and I have already pointed out that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) has made a declaration in a manufacturing constituency during his recent election which brings both himself and my right hon. friend who leads the government into the Conservative ranks on that important question. I have under my hand the utterances of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in which he told the people that he like his leader (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was in favour of legitimate protection to Canadian industries. And almost while he was uttering these words, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was telling the electors of Yarmouth that the sole difference between the two parties in Canada was that the Conservative party advocated a higher tariff, while the Liberal party advocated a low tariff. My right hon. friend is not correct in stating that the announcement last session was the latest announcement by the Minister of Finance, because the Minister of Finance has made the later announcement to which I have referred in the county of Yarmouth, in a recent by-election. Now, we have the present attitude of the right hon. gentleman as defined by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries during the recent election, namely, that the right hon. gentleman is in favour of legitimate protection to the industries of Canada. Does my right hon. friend hold to that doctrine to-day? That statement was made two months and a half ago, I do not know whether he entertains the same opinion still, but if he does, it is in striking contrast to that which is entertained by his Minister of Finance who, on questions of this kind, as my right hon. friend has properly said, speaks for the government at all times and on all occasions.

Now, I will not take up further the time of the House with regard to this incident, but I will close by reading to the House an extract from the words of a great Englishman of 50 years ago, with regard to an administration then carrying on public affairs in England; and I would ask my right hon. friend to consider whether these words have or have not an application to the administration which has conducted the affairs of this country from 1896 down to the present time:

> It is an administration totally without principle, refusing to put in practice what it pretends to support in theory, bound together and bound to office only by the vulgarest and lowest motives—the love of place, or of patronage, or of money. If a party be allowed to remain in power without any policy, or, if it have a policy, without attempting to act on it, to ask for support in one place as the friends of protection and to disarm opposition in another by treating free trade as a fait accompli, the people of England will become as indifferent to parliamentary government—at least to parliamentary government on the existing system—as those of France were.

With regard to the attitude of this government on fiscal questions at the present time, those words seem almost prophetic. We have seen Ministers of the Crown, as I have pointed out, within the last two or three months going to different constituencies in this country and advocating different policies. In this constituency of Argenteuil the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Agriculture told the people that this was a free trade government, and if I am correctly informed, they carried on a free trade campaign. My hon. friend for St. Mary's division, Montreal, says, I know not with what truth, that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is a protectionist at heart. I do not know whether that is the case, I do not know whether he is one of those who have fallen under the malign influence of my right hon. friend who leads the government and whether he has therefore abandoned the principles which he has at heart. I understand that at least with regard to some articles in the tariff, he did not shed any tears when the duties were maintained, and when the duty was on one article increased. But these gentlemen have gone into Argenteuil and carried on a free trade campaign. They have carried on a free trade campaign in the county of Yarmouth. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance summoned to his assistance the member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), and the member for Guysborough conducted a thoroughly free trade campaign, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was not far behind him. Then, in the constituency of Maisonneuve, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries conducts an exactly opposite campaign, and tells the people of that constituency that both himself and the right hon. gentleman who leads the government are in favour of protection. Now, which of these gentlemen are we to believe ? My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) has also conducted a free trade campaign in the west, although I believe his ardour in favour of free trade is not as great as it was in 1896. In 1896 my hon. friend conducted a campaign for the late Dalton McCarthy, in Brandon, I believe, and he had posters up all over the town : 'Vote for McCarthy and free agricultural implements.' Lately, however, he has been explaining to the people of that part of the country that really it will not do to take the duty off agricultural implements because to do so would close up certain important Canadian industries. My hon. friend seems to have become confused. He wants the woollen industries closed up unless they can exist under 23½ per cent of protection, but he seems to place the agricultural implement industry on a somewhat different basis. My hon. friend some years ago in the House used a well known expression which he will pardon me if I apply to him to-day. He said, referring to some gentlemen on this side of the House, that he appealed from Philip drunk to Philip sober. Now I appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, I appeal from the hon. gentleman in 1902 to the hon. gentleman in 1896 ; and I trust that some time during the progress of this session he will be willing to make known to the people of this country whether he is in favour of removing the duty from agricultural implements or whether he thinks that duty should remain ; whether he believes it should be increased, if necessary, to protect those industries, and whether he is in favour of the announcement made by the Minister of Finance last year that there should be at an early date a revision of the tariff in Canada along increased protection lines.

Mr. Speaker, I will close with one more remark. What are the facts ? A Minister of the Crown has been removed, according to my right hon. friend, or has resigned, according to my hon. friend from St. Mary's division. At all events, a vacancy has been created in the cabinet. For what alleged reason ?—for the reason that the policy which my hon. friend from St. Mary's division (Montreal) has been advocating for four or five years at least, a policy which I believe he always advocated, had been announced by him in the absence of the right hon. leader of the government during the past summer. Well, under these circumstances another gentleman is appointed to take his place, and the hon. gentleman who takes his place announces to the people of this country practically the same policy as that which my hon. friend from St. Mary's division announced. The Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) shakes his head. Does he say that he did not advocate, in the constituency of Maisonneuve, such adequate or legitimate, protection as would be sufficient to maintain and preserve Canadian industries ? Will he deny that ? No, he will not deny it. Did my hon. friend the hon. member for St. Mary's division go farther ? His position, as I understood it, was this : At the present time we have American manufactured goods coming into this country to the extent of $65,000,000. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is correct in that estimate. The hon. member for St. Mary's took the position which I have taken myself on more than one occasion in this House, that when the inevitable time of depression comes, when prices are lower, when the protection for that reason will be decreased, when the Americans will be slaughtering their goods in Canada, we will stand a very good chance indeed of having a number of our industries crushed out, and for that reason he urged that the immediate revision of the tariff was necessary, because, not only he, but his late colleagues in the government, have been telling the people in this country that they must expect a period of depression at an early day. Then, where is the difference between my hon. friend from St. Mary's division and the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries ? The hon. minister seems to think there is a difference. Will he be good enough—I will move the adjournment of the House if necessary—to stand up in this House and tell us in what respect the policy which he advocated in Maisonneuve during his recent election differs from the policy which my hon. friend from St. Mary's division advocated ? I am not very much in the habit of throwing challenges across the floor of the House, but I do almost feel inclined on this occasion to send a little challenge to the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries n regard to that matter. I do not think that he will accept, and I am certain that if he does accept he will find himself in very great difficulty indeed and that he will sit down without enlightening the House very much as to what the actual difference is. I think when we have this extraordinary state of affairs existing under which one minister of the Crown is, according to the word of my right hon. friend who leads the government, dismissed from his position as a cabinet minister and another hon. gentleman takes his place avowing what I consider exactly the same principles that an occasion of that kind surely would justify an appeal to my right hon. friend to state fully and frankly to the House what the policy of the government is on fiscal matters provided it has any policy. I admit that if it has no policy my right hon. friend is in a hopeless difficulty. I believe he is in that difficulty to-day because I do not think, judging by the course of his party from 1896 down to the present time, that it has any policy at all in regard to the fiscal matters of this country except such a policy as it thinks from time to time will give it a longer lease of power. It is willing to appeal for support to free traders, it is willing to appeal for support to protectionists, and any policy which for the time being will tend to serve its political fortunes, any policy which will give it a longer term of office is the policy and the only policy it is prepared to adopt on any particular occasion. I do not believe, notwithstanding the lessons which my right hon. friend has given us in regard to the best method of forming a government, that this a right state of affairs. The question of the tariff is a great question in this country. Situated as we are alongside the United States of America, situated as we are with enormous resources of our own we are surely entitled to have the government of the day inform the people whether or not they propose to adopt the policy which will give our industries a fighting chance for existence and which will enable the people to develop the resources of this country as they ought to be developed. Not one word has fallen from my right hon. friend with regard to that matter to-day. He says his policy is embalmed in the tariff; therefore, he never can alter an item of that tariff without changing his policy. Surely my right hon. friend will draw some distinction between a policy and the result of a policy as exemplified in the tariff. Is there no such thing as principle which is to be acted upon in fiscal matters? Is there no such thing as a tariff which is adopted because it is a fair result of the working out of a broad principle? My hon. friend the leader of the government has not given the country one ray of light on the policy of the government, he has not given the country one ray of light as to what we may expect in the future. Last year we were to expect a revision of the tariff at the present session. This year we do not know what we are to expect for the present. I conclude by expressing for the future my very great regret that under the very peculiar circumstances which have been disclosed in the remarks of my right hon. friend the leader of the government and my hon. friend the member for St. Mary's division, and which have been accentuated by the avowed policy of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, we have not had a single word from the right hon. gentleman which would give to this House or the country the slightest light as to what the fiscal policy of the government party really is.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) who has just taken his seat has spoken upon almost every conceivable subject except one and that is the subject at issue. The hon. gentleman has travelled the old record, has gone back almost as far as the deluge, in order to discuss questions which are not to-day before the House. The last words spoken by my hon. friend are to the effect, forsooth, that I have not declared what is the fiscal policy of the government. Certainly not! I have done nothing of the kind, and if it be a crime on my part on such an occasion as this not to have given to the country what is the fiscal policy of the government I am guilty to the hilt. But, I ask my hon. friend is it his conception of parliamentary government, is it his conception of the duties of the leader of a great party that when I rise to make the usual ministerial explanation as to the crisis which took place some time ago I must launch into the fiscal policy of the country? My hon. friend knows that there is no sense in that and I must express to him my surprise because his mind is usually logical. How can we expect, on this occasion, when the object of the present debate is simply to make the ministerial explanation as to the reasons why there were changes in the government, that I should make a statement as to the fiscal policy of the government? Yet, at the last moment, my hon. friend makes it a matter of reproach to me that, forsooth, I did not tell him what would be the policy of the government. Let me tell him once and for all to satisfy his fastidious curiosity that the policy of the government is to-day what it was last year when announced by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding). Such it was on the 17th of March, 1902, and such it is on the 18th of March, 1903, and there has been no discrepancy since that time. But, my hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, after having dilated upon diverse subjects which had no more connection with the question at issue than with the man in the moon, made a long speech on what he calls my inconsistency. I must admit to my hon. friend that I have sometimes been inconsistent in my career, and I may tell him that to-day after having had a good deal of experience of life I have not the same ideas which I had when I was a green young boy. In my young and verdant days I was a protectionist as he is to-day, but I have learned since that time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have learned; I have grown old, and I hope my experience is not in vain. In those days of my youth I held the same heresy that my hon. friend holds to-day, but as I say, I have learned. Sir, am I the only man in this House who has changed his views upon fiscal questions? I know that in other countries precedents may be found. Sir Robert Peel grew from a protectionist to a free trader; not a mean authority. Mr. Gladstone grew up to be a free trader from being a protectionist; not a mean authority either. For my part I rather admire the man who has the courage to grow into better ways of action and better ways of thought. But what shall I say of the man who falls from grace ? What shall I say of the man who was once a Liberal and who becomes a Conservative ? What shall I say of a man who was once a free trader and becomes a protectionist ? These things will happen, but it is not for the man who is inconsistent himself to tax me with being inconsistent. I will not be wanting in courtesy; I will not say who that man is, but my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), who has spoken of inconsistency, can perhaps point the moral of the tale.

But, Sir, all this is not relevant to the question; I care not to go any more into it, and I shall come at once to the speech of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works. There is some discrepancy between the versions of what took place between him and me when I came back from Europe. I care not to enter into a controversy as to that, but I will come at once to the defence which my hon. friend made, and it consisted simply in this : That he had not in my absence advocated anything else than he had been advocating all through; that in my absence my hon. friend had stated what he had stated before me publicly on several occasions and in numerous private conversations. As to the private conversations, I will not mention what took place. As to what took place publicly that is a fair ground for discussion. I do not remember that my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) upon numerous occasions took the same line of argument which he did in my absence, although I will do him the credit of saying that on one occasion he took exactly the same line. At the Manufacturers' Association banquet in November, 1901, my hon. friend made a speech which he quoted from to-day, advocating a higher tariff and a higher protection. That was in the month of November, 1901. Sir, I cannot go into cabinet secrets, but the result of what took place in the cabinet was laid before the House. On the 17th of March, 1902, the Minister of Finance made a declaration upon this question, and he stated in this House that there would be no change in the tariff. This was three or four months after my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) had spoken; and now I ask my hon. friend, when having spoken two or three months before and having given his views in favour of higher tariff, and the government having by the mouth of the Minister of Finance declared that there would be no increase in the tariff, was it justifiable——

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The Minister of Finance said 'this session.'

The PRIME MINISTER. Was it justifiable——

Hon. Mr. TARTE. 'This session.'

The PRIME MINISTER. Was it justifiable on his part to take the attitude of advocating a higher tariff ? Sir, it was the duty of every member of the administration, so long as he remained a member of the administration, to remain firm by what had been said by the Minister of Finance and to advocate the policy which had been advocated by him. Why, Sir, where would we be and what would become of parliamentary government, if after the policy of the government has been declared, solemnly declared by the minister who has authority to do so, what would become of our institutions if it were allowable for every member of the cabinet to then advocate any policy which he thought would be wiser than the policy which had been resolved upon by the government. There could be no such thing as parliamentary government under such circumstances. But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) said 'this session.' If it were to be 'this session,' then my answer to the hon. gentleman is simply this : He should wait. It was not to be 'this session,' and he should have waited until the time came for the Finance Minister to make a declaration of the policy of the government. As to the words of the statement of the Minister of Finance upon that occasion, which in the judgment of my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) implied or meant that it was a promise of a tariff revision this year, it is more than I can understand how he draws that conclusion. If the language has any meaning at all, there is no meaning to it but that the government was not prepared to go into a policy of revision then, and that this policy of revision would be taken at the proper time as soon as the circumstances would warrant. The Finance Minister said—and I quote his words again :

> We postpone for the present the question of tariff revision. When the moment for revision arrives, the public of Canada may rest assured that the government will undertake the work in the spirit of moderation and caution that has prevailed in their past actions in tariff affairs, avoiding the extremes which almost always find advocates, and having regard to what is best, not for particular industries or particular sections of the country, but for the interests of the people of the whole Dominion.

Sir, if my hon. friend was not satisfied with this decision—this is my last word to him upon that question; I appreciate the manner in which he has spoken this afternoon, for notwithstanding the differences we have had we have remained personal friends.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. I appreciate all that, but let me tell the hon. gentleman this as a friend : That if he was not satisfied at the position then taken by the government; if, as he says, at a certain moment he had made up his mind to resign from the cabinet, and if as he stated—though I am sorry to say I cannot follow him upon this ground—he had made a statement to members of the cabinet when I was in Europe (first of all I do not conceive how he can mention here what passed in the cabinet) but if my hon. friend had made up his mind to resign, if he thought that the policy which we were pursuing was not consistent with the best interest of the country, then he lost a good opportunity to resign when the Finance Minister delivered his budget speech last session. That would have been the time and the occasion for my hon. friend to have carried out his views. However, the hon. gentleman thought well to act differently. I shall not question his conduct any further. It was with regret I had to take the position which I did take, but I have to say that in my interpretation of the parliamentary system of government under which it is our privilege to live, there was no other course for me to take than the course I did take; and since my hon. friend thought we were not acting wisely to let him have all the opportunity he wanted of advocating the interests of the country as he thought best. But so long as he was in the cabinet, so long as it was his decision to remain as an adviser of the Crown, he could have no other views and no other words than the views announced in the words which had been spoken by the Finance Minister, speaking in the full sense of his duty.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise, with the indulgence of the House, to make a few words of personal explanation. The point I want to make clear is : That I never intended to advocate a policy which I did not think was the policy of the government as announced during last session of parliament. My hon. friend the Finance Minister then said to the House, to the country, to the business men, to the manufacturing community of Canada, that there would be no revision of the tariff during 'this session,' meaning of course last session of parliament. If it meant anything, it meant that during the next session a revision of the tariff would take place. I know large interests which took great risks after having read that declaration. They were losing money and went on losing money with the expectation, or rather the certainty, that a revision of the tariff would take place. And not one of my former colleagues who followed the deliberations closely will rise in the House and on his honour state that it was not understood that we should have a revision of the tariff in that way. It was understood in that way, and, as I honestly believed it, I went on advocating the policy which I had advocated with the knowledge of the Prime Minister.

Now, my right hon. friend says, and very rightly, that we have remained personal friends. The friendship of long days, of young days, cannot be broken by political differences, I hope. He has said that I have been of some service to him. I endeavoured to be so at any rate. When he read my utterances on the other side of the Atlantic, why did he not cable to me that I was wrong ? If he had done so, I would immediately have stopped talking or would have resigned. Why did not the acting Prime Minister, Sir Richard Cartwright, tell me that I was wrong ? If I was wrong, I say it again, why did not the Liberal members who invited me to their ridings and who listened to my speeches, tell me so ? Why did the Prime Minister of Ontario welcome me to his own riding ? Because they thought, as I think now, that I was advocating the policy of the Liberal party.

Now, I may be wrong, but I think I am right. The government will carry out the revision of the tariff in the way I have said—not because I have said it, not by any means ; I am only a very feeble factor in the political arena of this country ; but because they know that it is the right policy. My speeches will be scrutinized. I ask my right hon. friend, now that he has been restored to health, to scrutinize my speeches, not as they may perhaps have been reported to him privately, but as I have pronounced them. I have not said one word more than I would have said on the floor of parliament after the statement of the Minister of Finance last year. If I was trespassing on the proprieties of parliamentary or ministerial life, how is it that he, an old friend of mine, did not warn me ? How is it that he only found that I was trespassing on the constitution when he was on the soil of Canada ?

Sir, I hope that this incident is closed. I have acted in good faith. I do not ask anything else from my political friends than to believe that I have been in good faith. If I have made a mistake, so much the worse for me from a certain standpoint. I am out of ministerial life. I am a private member of parliament. In that capacity I will go on advocating the policy which I think is best for this country. My friends on the treasury benches having the responsibility of being at the head of affairs, I will give them credit for their good faith, as I ask them to give me credit for my good faith.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of engaging in the general debate, for I think that would be out of order, no motion being before the House, and it is only by the courtesy of the House that we are permitted to have this discussion. On the occasion of a formal ministerial explanation, we are properly confined to the constitutional question, and that question has been so fully dealt with by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that I would not think of entering upon it at all. Neither would I think of following my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in his wide discussion of the fiscal question in which we are all interested. There will be a proper time for the discussion of that question ; but, as my right hon. friend has pointed out, we can surely all realize that on the occasion of merely formal ministerial explanations, it is not the time for entering into a general discussion of that character. I would not say a single word but that the attitude of my hon. friend and late colleague, the ex-Minister of Public Works forces me to say a word or two on one point. I have observed that my hon. friend, in defending what we understand to be his mistake, has quoted my speech made in the House of Commons last year as a justification, claiming it as a promise that there was to be a revision in the following session. In the first place, I hold that if he was right in that it is no vindication of his action, because if there is a promise, as there was not, and if there was to be a revision of the tariff, it does not follow that it would be on the lines which my hon. friend has stated at all. But I want to go beyond that. The speech has been read by the Prime Minister, and also by my hon. friend from St. Mary's, Montreal (Hon. Mr. Tarte), and no reasonable man who reads it can find in it any promise beyond the engagements of the then present session. I am not a lawyer, but I understand that good judges agree that it is not well to decide anything beyond what is before them ; and, I dealing last sesion with the events of the session, stated that we had decided that we would make no revision of the tariff that session. What we should do in another session was to be decided when another session came. Whether we shall make tariff changes this session or not is a question yet to be considered. and it will be dealt with in due course. But there is nothing in the speech of March 17, 1902, to justify the statement of my hon. friend, though I know he makes it in good faith, that it was intended to be a promise. I noticed to-day that, feeling apparently how weak that proposition was, my hon. friend introduced another. He stated that he could find in reports of interviews with deputations the statement made by me that the tariff would be revised this session. I want to tell my hon. friend that he cannot find any such statement ; I do not believe it exists, but if it exists, it is a fabrication, for no such statement was ever made. I think hon. gentlemen who know me at all, will believe that I am not in the hablt of making statements beyond what the occasion requires. It was known that I was to speak last session of the policy of the government ; but it is never the part of wisdom for any public man to make engagements as to what he will do in the future until he is fortunate enough to have the light of the future to assist him in his judgment. So I stated last session that, for the various reasons set forth, there would be no tariff changes that session. We did not claim that the tariff was perfect; but as the days rolled on, and as matters should be presented to us under changing conditions, changes might become necessary ; but when those changes should be made, or whether the tariff should be increased or reduced, were questions which were not discussed in that speech at all, and no intelligent person can truthfully say they were. I am just reminded that my hon. friend said that that was intended to be a pledge for this session. I do not wish to differ from my hon. friend. We have been good friends, and I desire, as no doubt he does also, that we should continue good friends, but I am bound to say that that in that respect he is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. If my hon. friend will allow me, would the Minister of Finance undertake to say that he did not tell several deputations to wait until next year ? Will he deny that it was told to deputations, who came here asking for an increase in the tariff, to wait until next session ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I never made any statement which would convey the impression that the government bound itself to do anything with regard to the tariff this year. I have no doubt told deputations that we could not do what they wanted at preseut, and of course, I knew that they would come back next year, and every other year until they got what they wanted. But if my hon. friend wishes to convey the impression that, either directly or indirectly, speaking either for myself or the government, I ever gave any assurance which would bind the government beyond the then existing session, I am bound to tell him that he is entirely mistaken. The object of any statements of mine was to deal with the occasion as it presented itself, and when the future would come, we would deal with that future in the light then before us.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, in the discussion which took place this afternoon we heard a good deal about the loyalty of a member of the cabinet to his colleagues and to his chief. But there was something else which was not referred to, but which I think is equally important. and that is the loyalty of the head of the cabinet to a former member of his cabinet. If there was ever an exhibition of disloyalty to a former colleague, that exhibition was made here this afternoon. An attempt was made, in the explanations offered to the House, to show that, in some way the Prime Minister had dismissed a colleague, when the facts go to show that that colleague the late Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) had tendered his resignation to his chief and that the chief had asked him to hold his resignation in abeyance, that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) went on a journey, and that opportunity was taken to make it appear that he had been dismissed. I think that is one of the most discreditable things in the history of cabinet government of this country. And not only have we seen an exhibition of disloyalty on the part of a chief to his colleague, but we have also seen a case of disloyalty manifested by one member of the cabinet to another. It comes to this, that, as between the late Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) on the question whose view is to be accepted, I am inclined to take the view of the Minister of Public Works instead of that of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding). The late Minister of Public Works has this in his favour—that he resigned to maintain a principle, while the other hon. gentleman holds his position through a lack of principle. There is no possible explanation of his position before us to-day except that he is a free trader by profession and a protectionist by practice. Let me show the evidence on which I charge the Minister of Finance with being unfair to the late Minister of Public Works. The late Minister of Public Works says that it was clearly understood in the cabinet when he was a member of it that there was to be a revision in it and that revision was to be on the lines of protection. The hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) says that that is not the case. The late Minister of Public Works makes of his case but he is not the only witness that we can call. We have the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) also. That hon. gentleman himself is not here, but we have his words, and I propose to read these words. On March 21st, last, discussing this very declaration of policy which the leader of the House says is their policy, the hon. member spoke as follows :

> Therefore when the Finance Minister speaks of changes, he is not referring to changes brought to his notice by the low tariff friends of the government, and consequently he must refer to those asked for by their high tariff friends * * * * Those of us then who are in favour of a low tariff are in a serious position, and I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that in making the announcement which he did, in his presentation of the budget, he has placed every supporter of the government, representing a constituency in which the low tariff idea predominates, upon the defensive in his own constituency before his own friends. It is, therefore, necessary on this occasion that members holding that position should make themselves understood, so that whatever misunderstanding there may be as to the intentions of the government, there should be none as to their position with regard to those proposed changes.

I cite that statement of the hon. member for Alberta as in every way confirmatory of the statement of the late Minister of Public Works. And, above all when we have the fact that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) sacrificed himself for principle while the man who disputed his position refused to sacrifice himself for principle, the weight of testimony is altogether on the side of the late Minister of Public Works. And, if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are guilty of being unfaithful to a colleague, they are guilty also of this—that they sacrificed a colleague because he was a protectionist. That is a thing that the people of Canada will be interested in and will take into account—namely, that a member of the cabinet was sacrificed because he had declared in favour of a policy of protection. The hon. gentleman, so far as we can gather to-day was sacrificed to duplicity. He was a member of the cabinet in which two views were held—in that cabinet there were both protectionists and free traders. The duplicity with which he was treated is far from creditable to the government, and the people of Canada will not lose sight of it. And what about the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) who has lately come into the cabinet? Is he to be sacrificed also ? If what the hon. member for St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte) tells us is correct, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is liable to be sacrificed any day, for he too professes to be a protectionist. He told the people that he believed in adequate protection. He is not only liable to be dismissed, but he is liable to be treated by the leading paper of the Liberal party as the late Minister of Public Works was—and that paper called the hon. gentleman 'The Busy Izzy of the Cabinet.' And what were the relations of this so-called 'Busy Izzy of the Cabinet' to the leader of the party ? If ever there was a man who saved his party and carried his province for the support of his leader, it was the late Minister of Public Works. Yet the reward he gets is that he is sacrificed because the charge is laid against him that he is a protectionist. The Prime Minister this afternoon appealed to the record of Mr. Gladstone and to the record of Sir Robert Peel. We know that both these gentlemen changed their opinions on the tariff question. And the right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) claimed that he had changed his opinion. But there is this difference—that when Sir Robert Peel changed his opinion or when Mr. Gladstone changed his opinion, the whole world knew exactly where he stood. I defy any man to say where the right hon. gentleman is. I ask any man who sits behind him to-day to say where the right hon. gentleman is, whether he is a protectionist or whether he is a free trader. He is everything, he is both, he is nothing, he is what circumstances happen to require. The government is nothing but a cabinet of latitudes and longitudes. The greatest latitude, apparently, was to be allowed to every man on that question. The late minister took the opportunity to avail himself of that latitude.

Now, last session a very interesting spectacle took place in this House. It has been referred to this afternoon, and I again recall it. It was that celebrated speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It reminded me very much of the circumstances attending the falling of Elijah's mantle upon Elisha. You remember the story. Elijah crosed the river and Elisha followed him. And Elijah said: What would you have from me? Elisha answered: I pray that I may have a double portion of your spirit. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was the Elijah, and the Prime Minister was the Elisha, upon whom the mantle was to fall. But we have never yet found out whether the Prime Minister desired a double portion of the spirit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to fall upon him. Indeed the Minister of Trade and Commerce was suspicious of his leader, and he took occasion to tell him so in a fatherly way. This is the substance of what he said: Remember, my boy, you said in Manitoba that protection was corruption, that protection was bondage. Remember that you said the two things must go together, you said that in Winnipeg; and remember that I intend to hold you to it. That is what the declaration meant last year, and it was supposed to be the final deliverance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Somehow the ascension which was to take place about that time did not take place. Why it did not, is clear to-day. But the whole country knows that the Minister of Trade and Commerce suspected his colleague, and others in the cabinet suspected him in regard to this matter, and he tried to hold him to the one view or the other. So to-day their position, if it is anything, is that they believe that protection is slavery, that protection is corruption, that protection is not in the interest of the country.

Now, if these hon. gentlemen did not intend to introduce a protectionist policy or to consider the question fully this session, what did they mean? The late Minister of Public Works certainly thought that they intended to adopt a protectionist policy and to give the country more protection this year. The great question before the people to-day is not one of a constitutional issue, but it is whether there is to be a revision of the tariff, and whether it is to be on protectionist lines. The right hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and like most lawyers he takes refuge in a constitutional issue whenever a question of great public interest is involved. He has always taken refuge in constitutional issues, and always fails to tell the people in clear-cut language what his views are in regard to great public questions of present importance. What do the people of Canada care about the constitutional issue? The people of Canada care everything about the fiscal policy of this country, and they do not want to hear more talk about constitutional issues, and rebukes of colleagues for violating constitutional practice so much as they desire to get a clear-cut statement of the intentions of the government upon this great public question.

Now, there are to be a great many deputations visiting this government from now on. We are told the budget speech is soon to be delivered. Are these deputations coming here to be told, as we have been told here to-day, that a protectionist minister cannot continue in the cabinet? Of what use is it for deputations to come this week, or to come next week, if the only answer they are to get is the one that was given here to-day, that protection is a fraud, that a protectionist minister is deserted by his colleagues and has to be read out of the party? Hon. gentlemen will say that this is a constitutional issue. Sir, the public want more than that, they want a definition. They want more than a statement that there was a constitutional disagreement and that the late minister acted in an unconstitutional way. There is more than a theory, there is an actual fact, involved in this question, and it is incumbent on the right hon. first minister, notwithstanding what he said this afternoon, to say whether he is a protectionist or a free trader, whether he desires to promote the interests of the people of this country, or whether he will simply get rid of the responsibility by saying that he believes in free trade as they have it in England. He cannot escape that issue to-day. The people wish to know what the position of the government is in regard to that question, and particularly do they expect from the Prime Minister a statement of his position in regard to it. Now, I have no hesitation in telling this House, and the people of this country, where I am. There is no trouble about the Conservative party here to-day in regard to their policy, both in regard to protection and in regard to free trade.

The hon. gentleman takes pride in the fact that he has changed his opinion. I thank God that I hold the views my father taught me on this question. He taught me that if a thing is good it is to be adhered to, and to be taught by one man to another, I was taught the principle of protection as being beneficial to this country. No one who holds that view is ashamed to declare it. It is the view that all nations take to-day. The right hon. gentleman makes a nice exhibition of himself when he talks about the humanitarian idea and the brotherhood of man. The principle that rules the world to-day is the struggle for existence between nations. Life is a struggle, both as between men and between nations, and so great is that struggle to-day that all the nations of the world are either protectionists or becoming so. England is becoming protectionist, and the greatest statesman in the British empire, the man who is destined to consolidate the British empire, Mr. Chamberlain, is fixed in the view that the only way to bind the empire together is by a policy of protection. Mr. Speaker, I believe in protection, I believe in a customs tariff, I believe in bounties, I believe in export duties, I believe in reciprocity of tariffs, I believe in the maximum tariff as applied to nations that are unfair to us and I believe in all these things because I think they will make the nation great. I believe in these things because I think they will build up this country as we expect it to be built up. I believe the principle of protection is good for the English speaking people and that it is good for the French speaking people of this country. I believe it is good for the east, I believe it is good for the west, that it is good for the interior, that it is good for the frontier, that, in short, it is the one kind of fiscal policy that is good for all of the country and will build it up. We have the example of the United States, we have the example of all the rising and great countries to-day and that example is all in the direction of protection. No man need be ashamed of protection, or need be afraid to let the people know where he belongs. No, it is the men who are double-faced on this question, the men who are guilty of duplicity, who are guilty of disloyalty to colleagues by reason of this duplicity, that have not the hardihood and the courage to stand up and declare where they are. We, at least, have clear cut views on this question and the people of this country want clear cut views, an out and out explanation, no such exhibition as we have seen this afternoon and no such disagreement as appears to have resulted between the late minister and his colleagues. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House need never fear any reproach in regard to a question of this kind. It has been a painful exhibition that we have had here this afternoon. I do not think we have often seen a similar spectacle, but it was a painful spectacle to see the right hon. leader of the House try to convey the impression that he dismissed a colleague for being a protectionist, when, as a matter of fact, that colleague offered his resignation and his chief at the next moment asked him to hold it in abeyance and then gave the public to understand that he had dismissed him. The whole public of Canada, under these circumstances, will side with the late Minister of Public Works. The whole public of Canada will see that the Liberal party is not to be relied upon on an issue of this kind, the whole country will see that the late member of the cabinet was sacrificed because he was a protectionist and the new Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see, if he is long in the government, that he is liable to be sacrificed in the same way. Cabals will be formed against him and we have been told that cabals exist. I wonder who is the minister referred to in connection with the cabals. I wonder if he came from the North-west. Perhaps before this discussion is over we will know who really was at the bottom of these cabals and who it was that sacrificed the late Minister of Public Works. I see the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir Wm. Mulock) there and he takes all the responsibility of the statements made by the right hon. the first minister this afternoon. Let me read a short extract from a speech made by the late Minister of Public Works in Toronto, less than a year ago, in connection with the United Boards of Trade. The late minister and the hon. Postmaster General were invited to the dinner as representatives of the government and here is the speech made by the late minister in the presence of his colleague. It was on June 5th, 1902, and it was reported in the papers of June 6th. The late minister said:

> We must have a Canadian policy on every line, in every direction. We must have a Canadian tariff. We are not here to discuss the principles of free trade or protection. Free trade may suit certain countries ; it suits England ; another system, the protective system, may suit other countries. I suppose that we have made up our minds to suit ourselves. We have in French a proverb that my friend, Mr. Mulock, who is a French scholar, will understand : 'Charite bien ordonne, commence par soi même.'

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Read it again.

Mr. MACLEAN. Let the hon. Postmaster read it. Here is the translation :

> They must fight their opponents with their own weapons. He could not understand why Canadians were obliged to give markets to a people who raised barriers against them. He had been accused of being an inconsistent man, Mr. Tarte went on. He did not care, so long as he was regarded as a practical man. 'Down with theories ; theories are no good. (Applause and laughter). Business is business. (Laughter). That is to say, if my hon. friends and neighbours want to strangle me, my first duty is to prevent them. Canadians must have a tariff to suit themselves, Mr. Tarte went on. If 25 per cent was not enough-speaking for himself alone—he would have no hesitation in raising it to 30 per cent or 40 per cent. 'I don't care,' he said, amid the laughter of the audience.

The hon. Postmaster General never repudiated that speech on that occasion. Why did he not repudiate that speech on that occasion if he did not think his colleagues in the right ? We have not been told by the hon. Postmaster General that one of his colleagues had been driven out because of his heresy on this question and it is quite evident now that what the ex-minister said this afternoon is true that he did nothing but what he had done all along, that the greatest latitude had been allowed, that he never said anything but what he had said long before in the presence of the right hon. first minister before he went to England. He had made no change, he had only acted at that time as he had acted in the past. But, he confesses that he had found out that his colleagues were not true to the principle of protection and that he intended to leave them. That is the serious fact which is presented to this country to-day. That is the fact that will go to the people of Canada from one ocean to the other that a member of this government was sacrificed by free trade colleagues because he was a protectionist, that he was sacrificed because they did not believe in protection and the lesson which this teaches to all those people who are seeking protection in this country and think protection ought to be employed is that the Liberal party are not to be trusted on this question. It also shows that if the people of this country desire a policy of protection they must go to that party which has always been true to the great national policy of this country.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, in the month of November last past, the newspapers of this country were crowded with information in reference to the withdrawal of the then Minister of Public Works from the cabinet and there was great diversity of opinion as to whether the minister had been dismissed or whether he had by his own free will, quitted the administration. It is quite true that the Liberal press of the country stood to gain by making out that the late minister had been driven from the Laurier government and to that end every means, of course, was taken. In the great province of Quebec, from which both of these hon. gentlemen come, there was a great diversity of opinion as to what the facts really were. I am free to say that after the discussion that has ensued to-day and the statements that have been made by the right hon. leader of the government and the late Minister of Public Works the general public will be as much in the dark to-day as they were then. On the one side there is the clear cut statement of the right hon. leader of the government that having been, as he had been, in the old country, that having been acquainted with certain facts relative to the conduct of the late Minister of Public Works the decision brought about by himself, namely, the dismissal of the minister was arrived at upon his return to this country.

Now, the statement of the Prime Minister is lacking in definiteness. He told us that some one supplied him with newspapers whilst he was in Europe, but he neglected to tell us who they were who were caballing against his colleague (Hon. Mr. Tarte). The Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) and the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) were on this side of the water then, and the pointed remarks of the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte) to-day would lead us to think that he had these two ministers of the cabinet in his eye. It is an accepted theory that there can be no effect without a cause, and considering the relations which have existed between the Minister of Railways and the ex-Minister of Public Works since they were thrown together in the cabinet, it might fairly be said that these relations were somewhat strained. The Department of Railways is intimately associated with the idea of transportation in which the great province of Ontario is deeply interested, but I will be bound to say that the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) might promenade through all the towns and cities in Ontario without causing a ripple, while, if the Minister of Public Works appeared anywhere his presence would be the event of the day. From the first there seems to have been animosity between these two gentlemen. We all remember when the Minister of Railways came to the committee in connection with the Kettle River Valley Bill and there announced that the policy of the government was that the Kettle River Company should be granted its charter. But shortly afterwards the Minister of Railways was forced to admit that he could not get the followers of the government to support him—the reason being because the ex-Minister of Public Works was against the policy of the government thus announced and so the Minister of Railways was defeated and his colleague (Hon. Mr. Tarte) triumphed. We saw what happened in connection with the Intercolonial Railway deal. It was first introduced by the Minister of Railways but it was soon dropped by him and relegated to the ex-Minister of Public Works, who took it in hand. I am fairly within the judgment of the House when I say that in regard to the question of transportation which has been engaging the serious attention of the people of Canada, the Minister of Railways played only a second part. Where was the Minister of Railways when the ex-Minister of Public Works announced the policy of the government as to the construction of the canal system by way of the French River ? Sir, it is patent to us all that a deep gulf separated the friendly relationship which ought to exist between these two ministers.

Sir, the Minister of the Interior made a certain amount of capital for himself in the North-west by his advocacy of a lower tariff, and while the Minister of the Interior was advocating that gospel in the west the ex-Minister of Public Works was busily engaged propagating the high tariff theory in the east. The Minister of the Interior found it necessary to be interviewed by the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' and in it he announced that his policy would in the end prevail against the policy of his colleague (Hon. Mr. Tarte). But if the Minister of Railways and if the Minister of the Interior were placed in an unenviable position, what have we to say of the humiliating position into which the cabinet ministers from Ontario were placed. Last year after the session, when it was announced to all deputations that came here that they might hope for tariff revision, throughout the whole province of Ontario boards of trade and corporations of one kind and another held meetings at which they wished to obtain the views of ministers upon the most interesting of public questions. My hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Ross) was to have a demonstration in the town of Oshawa in his constituency. In Oshawa there is a large carriage establishment, one of the largest not only in the province but in the whole Dominion, and to the humiliation of the cabinet ministers from Ontario, especially the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson), who, one would think, had a special interest in the matter, they were placed aside by the member for South Ontario, they were not invited, and in their stead the member for South Ontario brought forth the Hon. Mr. Tarte, because that minister held a larger place in the public eye. The hon. member (Mr. Ross) passed over the Minister of Customs and the Postmaster General, and he invited the ex-Minister of Public Works to perform the interesting ceremony of laying the corner stone of an addition to the factory of McLaughlin Bros. At the public meeting which was held the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Beith) and the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Ross) were side by side with the ex-Minister of Public Works, and as if to add eclat to the occasion, the Hon. John Dryden, minister of the Ontario government, came along also. Now, what passed on that occasion——

An hon. MEMBER. Money.

Mr. BENNETT. My hon. friend is thinking of Mr. Stratton when he talks about money having passed. This was Mr. Dryden who was present. Here was the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who was not connected with the Finance Department or the Customs Department, who was not even an Ontario minister, here he was invited because he was an advanced protectionist and because the member for South Ontario (Mr. Ross) believed that his presence would be acceptable to the people of the constituency. Judging by the report in the local papers and by the report in the 'Globe' also, the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte) made one of his characteristic speeches prophesying high protection, and the newspapers tell us that that speech was cheered to the echo. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) pointed out that $1,000,000 worth of carriages had been imported to Canada the preceding year, and he told the people of Oshawa and the people from the rural districts there assembled, that if they had more protection for that industry more hands would be employed and greater prosperity would follow. And then we saw the Hon. John Dryden announcing that although he had been a free trader in the past, the light had come to him at last, and he was thoroughly in accord with every statement made by the Hon. Mr. Tarte—and the member for South Ontario applauded. After that there was to be a demonstration in your town of Goderich, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the Minister of Public Works was invited. I am sure that the gentleman in whose constituency Goderich is had something to do with the invitation which was tendered to the ex-Minister of Public Works. Again the Minister of Customs and the Postmaster General were overlooked. Why ? It was because they occupied such an inferior position in the public eye of their own province, that the hon. gentleman from West Huron (Mr. Holmes) thought it better to invite the protectionist Minister of Public Works. At the Goderich meeting the Hon. Mr. Tarte was cheered to the echo. Then there was to be a large demonstration in the city of Brantford to advocate protection of the manufacturing industries. On that occasion there sat at his feet the hon member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) applauding every statement to the echo. Why, Sir, these hon. gentlemen all know that their very existence in nine out of every ten counties in the province of Ontario depends on this very question of protection. This was the unkindest cut of all administered by the citizens of Brantford, for this reason, that the hon. Minister of Customs was a very Ishmaelite in that city, having been driven out from it by the electors, and to his mortification he had to suffer the agony of hearing the ex-Minister of Public Works applauded to the echo in the town in which he had lived almost his whole lifetime. But that was not the only place. In the town of Berlin the ex-Minister of Public Works was brought before the public and again applauded. But perhaps it was in the town of Orillia, which is in the riding that I have the honour to represent, that the Minister of Public Works received one of the greatest ovations given to him in the whole province ; and that must have been gall and wormwood to the hon. Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock), because he was overlooked and did not appear. Take up the public press of Ontario during the past year, look where you will, and you will find reports of receptions tendered to the ex-Minister of Public Works in almost every county in that great province. One can imagine the painful feelings of the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Customs, under these circumstances, in taking up the public prints every morning and seeing how they were being sidetracked by their own supporters, while in almost every public demonstration an opportunity was afforded to the ex-Minister of Public Works to impress himself upon the public as the big man in the cabinet, the power behind the throne, the one who could wield an influence. What happened ? Not only did they show that they were in accord with him, in public demonstrations, but where demonstrations were not held these gentlemen went out of their way to show that they were in entire harmony with the sentiments he expressed. The hon. Minister of Finance this afternoon tried to make out that no intimation was given last session that there was to be a revision of the tariff. Then the ex-Minister of Public Works must have been extremely dense, because he does not seem to have arrived at a correct idea of what the change in the tariff was to be. But I am going to read what another hon. gentleman on that side of the House thought was the view of the administration and what was the promise made. He is a gentleman whose political existence in this House depends on protection being adopted by the government to a greater extent than it is to-day. The gentleman I refer to is the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). In that hon. gentleman's riding the city of Guelph, a city of considerable proportions, depends for its very breath of life on the continuance of a protective tariff. That hon. gentleman as reported in the 'Globe' of the 21st of October last, said :

> There is no concealing, and there is no use in denying, that the province of Ontario is protectionist. There would be no sense in hurting ourselves by mere blind retaliation against the United States. What we must do is to frame our tariff for our interests, keeping in view the fact that from hard experience we are driven to conclude that our American cousins will hit us without hesitation whenever they think such a course to be for their own advantage. I am satisfied that in saying this I voice the general feeling of Ontario without distinction of party.

It will be for the hon. member for South Wellington to explain why he gave utterance to such an expression of opinion as this. Was it due to the fact that he had received an intimation, or had understood, as the ex-Minister of Public Works did, that there was to be a revision of the tariff ? If the cabinet intended that there should be no change in the tariff in the present year, would it not have been more honest and more decent on their part to have told the manufacturers long ago that they need not come here asking for changes ? That would have put an end to the whole business. But, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance to-day, the government stand convicted of giving those people to believe that they were going to make some changes in the tariff, while they intended to do nothing of the kind. Now, until this question is settled by a change of front on the part of either the first minister or the ex-Minister of Public Works, there must continue to be a strong doubt on the public mind as to which of these gentlemen is making statements in accord with the facts. The statement of the ex-Minister of Public Works is that there was a cabal instituted against him in the cabinet, that it has existed for a long time, and that it became so acute in the month of September last that he determined to sever his connection with the government. That statement is corroborated by a statement made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) in an interview with a reporter of the Montreal 'Herald,' which I will now read. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said :

> I unhesitatingly say that the removal of Mr. Tarte will make for the strengthening of the party, and especially in this province, where I verily believe Mr. Tarte has not a single partisan. You may remember the time that Mr. Tarte was taken into the cabinet. Well, I have been all my life on the best of terms with the financial and industrial interests of this country as a public man should who desired the prosperity of the country. When the Liberals were returned to power in 1896 these interests, or the representatives of these interests—expressed to me this feeling : 'We respect Sir Wilfrid, we believe him honest ; but there are certain elements in the cabinet which we distrust ; and this distrust has never ceased.'

From this statement I think it is plain that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was caballing against the ex-Minister of Public Works ; and I have seen a statement in 'La Patrie,' charging the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with having without cessation done all in his power to destroy the influence of the ex-Minister of Public Works in that province. Taking the extrinsic evidence, I think it is plain that there did exist a cabal or mutiny against the hon. ex-minister in the province of Quebec. But be that as it may, there is no doubt that in the cabinet last fall there was not displayed that loyalty or fairness towards one member of the administration which he had a right to expect, and the right hon. first minister owes it not merely to the ex-minister, but to the House and the country to state exactly who the members of the cabinet were who made the complaint to himself with respect to the conduct of the ex-minister. Times have changed very greatly the relations between the first minister and the ex-Minister of Public Works. It will be in the recollection of the public, more particularly in the province of Quebec, that a strong bond of friendship formerly existed between these gentlemen. One recalls an attack made on the ex-Minister of Public Works some years ago by a certain club in the city of Montreal, I think the Letellier Club, which demanded the ex-minister's head. I think it was the Letellier Club which demanded the head of the Minister of Public Works. What did the right hon. the first minister reply ? He replied unhesitatingly that if Mr. Tarte had to go out of the cabinet, he would go too. He raised no question then as to whether the Minister of Public Works was in accord with him or not, but made that reply without reserve. To-day the hon. member for St. Mary's Division (Mr. Tarte) has declared that a state of affairs was existing which the public will readily believe did exist. He declared that nearly a year ago at the Manufacturers' banquet at Montreal, he made a strong protectionist speech, and that the ideas and policy he then enunciated were not disproved by the right hon. gentleman, who was present. If the ex-Minister of Public Works committed an offence last year in making strong protectionist speeches throughout the country, why did not the other members of the cabinet bring these speeches to the attention of the first minister. Was it not their duty to have done so and had not the first minister a right to complain of this omission on their part? The public were left in the dark last fall as to the reasons why the ex-Minister of Public Works left the cabinet, and their doubts will certainly not be dispelled by the ministerial explanations given to-day. They will have to look to the extrinsic evidence for a solution of the question. On the one hand, we have the antagonism existing between the ex-Minister of Public Works and certain members of the cabinet, and on the other hand we have the fact that these discontented colleagues took the premier by the throat and compelled him to give up the head of the ex-minister. But there is this to be said to the credit of the hon. member for St. Mary's Division, that when he found his chief to be in a poor state of health on his return, he acted towards him in a much more decent and commendable manner than did these other gentlemen. The ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) had under his control the party affairs in the province of Quebec and possession of the state secrets of his party. Not one of those secrets has he divulged to the public, but in every way has preserved them inviolate and respected his honour. But there is no doubt in the mind of anybody that, if he chose, he could bring before the public certain facts regarding the government which would damn it in public opinion. Here we have evidence of the loyalty of the ex-minister as contrasted with the braggadocia and swagger of those mutineers who went to the first minister and threatened that if the hon. member for St. Mary's Division did not go out of the cabinet they would no longer remain in it; and to relieve the first minister of the dilemma in which he was placed, the hon. member for St. Mary's Division handed in his portfolio to the right hon. gentleman. The enmity shown towards the ex-Minister of Public Works emanated, I believe, chiefly from Ontario. If it did not, there was certainly abundant reason for it, because if ministers were ever humiliated it must have been the Minister of Customs and the Postmaster General, both from the great province of Ontario, who were tabooed in every city of that province, while the ex-Minister of Public Works was brought into the field in their place and occupied a position far higher than these two gentlemen did together.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I doubt very much if the explanation given this afternoon from the treasury benches will satisfy public opinion. It will not certainly in the great province from which I come. Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say to the right hon. gentleman who leads this House that if he has passed the age of green boys, as he told us this afternoon, there are many green boys in the province of Quebec who will require something more than the explanation given by the Prime Minister to account for the retirement of the ex-Minister of Public Works. Let me briefly call attention to one phase of this singular question which was glided over very quickly by the right hon. gentleman, and to which none of his colleagues saw fit to allude. At the time when the dismissal or the resignation of the ex-Minister of Public Works was being prepared, the right hon. gentleman was in Europe. Who were those who denounced the ex-minister to the right hon. gentleman? They were surely not men sitting on this side, and I would ask my hon. friends opposite, who are not on the treasury benches, if they will be content to remain silent under the suspicion of having, during the absence of the right hon. the first minister, unknown to the ex-Minister of Public Works, denounced his conduct to their leader, and denounced it so artfully and cunningly that the first minister, on his arrival in this country, came to the conclusion that a great constitutional principle had been openly violated by the hon. member for St. Mary's Division, which demanded his immediate dismissal. I doubt whether the public at large will accept the superficial explanations given this afternoon. They will believe that within the cabinet there were men who were plotting the destruction of the ex-Minister of Public Works. And what we are entitled to know is who are those members of the cabinet who denounced the ex-minister. Who are those who, without giving the ex-minister a word or warning, saw fit, by correspondence and obscure denunciation—the secret of which we have not even now learned—to bring about his dismissal. Who are those men and why have they not to-day the frankness to explain their position and conduct? The ex-Minister of Public Works was not always in my province a persona grata with the mass of the Liberal party. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Hon. Mr. Bernier) was never very favourable to him, and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) has been on such terms with the ex-Minister of Public Works for a long time that he was known as one of those who anxiously desired his downfall. Is it in the province of Quebec, is it amongst certain clubs encouraged, maintained, helped along by hon. gentlemen opposite who occupy high positions in the Liberal party that this conspiracy was begun? Or is it in the province of Ontario, where I find my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) the present occupant of that position ? Is it through the influence of the 'Globe' ? Is it through the influence of the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock) ? Or is it possible that the heart of that conspiracy exists in the province of Manitoba and the Northwest, where, it is well known, by every means at his disposal, the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) sought to bring about the downfall and dismissal of his colleague. Or must we leave the immediate vicinity of Montreal and go down to the city of Quebec, where, as is well known throughout my own province, the present Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) was ready to join those who were willing to make efforts to obtain the effacement of the Minister of Public Works. Surely, when the right hon. the Prime Minister tells us that he acted upon denunciations received by him when abroad and verified by documents sent him, we are entitled to know who are the members of this House who played the part of spies and informers on that occasion. After all, will it be propounded seriously here that the utterances of my hon. friend from St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte) were of such a character at that time as to make him so greatly at fault in regard to the constitution, to place him so gravely in error, that nothing but his immediate resignation upon the return of the Prime Minister could satisfy the ends of justice ? Why, Sir, what utterance have we had from the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) ? Has not the latter of these gentlemen, time and again in the west, in public meetings and in the newspapers which served him as organs of publicity, declared that the tariff was out of politics and that it was not to be increased ? What authority had he for that declaration ? Have we not, quite recently, the speech delivered in British Columbia by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) declaring his approval of a scheme for a new transcontinental railway ? And yet have we the declaration from that hon. gentleman that, at the time he made that important declaration he had the authority of the Prime Minister or the cabinet ? I venture to assert, without fear of being contradicted, that, if we turn up the utterances of the Minister of Finance since he introduced the tariff in 1897, we shall find, year after year, in almost precisely similar language, declarations by that right hon. gentleman that for that year at any rate there would be no increase in the tariff. And, if we couple that circumstance with the facts that have been declared here to-day, and not contradicted as far as I am aware, that when that hon. gentleman as the minister particularly charged with the fiscal policy of the government, received a deputation he postponed till another session the satisfaction of their claims, can we blame the ex-Minister of Public Works for having, when invited by his own political friends in the province of Ontario and elsewhere, proclaimed what was well known as his firm opinion, that the policy which he believed in was the one which was believed in in my own province, the policy of Canada for the Canadians and a tariff sufficiently strong and sufficiently high to prevent our being engulfed and ruined by our powerful competitors to the south and other countries ? Can we blame him, under these circumstances for having expressed his own opinion ? And will anybody familiar with the British constitution as it is to-day contend that under the circumstances of indecision which have existed on the treasury benches for many years past and with the reasons which hon. gentlemen have given us this afternoon, he was not entitled constitutionally and equitably to make these declarations of his own belief ? No, Mr. Speaker, I think we must go a little further for the real cause which brought about the expulsion—if it was an expulsion—or the resignation—for they are two totally different things, and the resignation was explained to us this afternoon by that hon. member—we must look a little further than the province of Quebec, and, no doubt, than the province of Ontario. We will look a little further for the real, true, and acting causes of that important movement.

Will you, Mr. Speaker, consider, and will this House consider, for a moment, what a strange position this administration occupies ? The very man who was called upon to replace the hon. member for St. Mary's division in the cabinet, in the constituency which he chose as the one in which he wished to be elected—the Maisonneuve division of the city of Montreal—in words of the very clearest character, in speeches reported verbatim in the paper which supported him in that contest, declared that, so far as the tariff was concerned, his position was too well known to require definition, that he was a protectionist and, if the tariff in its present form was not acceptable to those who had at heart the great industrial interests of our country, he pledged himself—and I believe pledged himself in writing—that he would be prepared to give a sufficient extension to that tariff to completely assure the protection required by our manufacturers in the city of Montreal. What kind of logic is there in such a position as that ? When we take the circumstance that, as stated this afternoon by the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte)—and, as we all know, for it is a matter of notoriety—that, as stated by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) when he visited the province of Ontario a simultaneous campaign was begun against him by the 'Globe' newspaper, the Winnipeg 'Free Press' and the Montreal 'Herald,' I tell you, Sir, it will be very difficult for the public at large to believe that it was the speeches of that hon. gentleman and nothing more that brought upon him the visitation referred to this afternoon by the right hon. premier in giving his explanation. There is something in all this that cannot be joined logically and legitimately under the circumstances. Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman, in returning from Europe, never, by reproof, by admonition or in any other way, called upon that gentleman to restrict his utterances or to give some explanation of them ; but, according to the statement made to us this afternoon, immediately asked for his resignation. The public at large will believe, as we all believe on this side of the House, that beyond that trifling circumstance—because I think I can qualify it as such—there were in the cabinet a set of men, and perhaps some others outside of the cabinet, who had determined that on account of his public profession of these views the late Minister of Public Works should disappear. Sir, they went about it in a very singular manner ; and to the public at large I venture to say that it will appear strange that these men, whom we can suspect but whom we do not know, because they will not declare themselves—these men, instead of warning their colleague, instead of jointly calling upon him to moderate his utterances until the return of the Prime Minister, adopted instead a silent and hidden way of securing such a result that happened the moment the right hon. gentleman returned from Europe. I say that to a large section of the population it will appear that these men, who are probably better known on the other side than on this side, in proceeding in that singular manner, had something else in view than the preservation of a great constitutional principle.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Whether the change of portfolios that followed the return of the right hon. the Prime Minister from the motherland, be for the weal or for the woe of this country, at all events I think that on this side of the House we can congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite and congratulate the country that to-day, through this discussion, we for the first time since 1896, have been able to form a fairly intelligent opinion as to the fiscal policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. When the Prime Minister was speaking this afternoon, and when the Minister of Finance also spoke, for the first time I think we got an accurate definition, not only of what their policy was not, but also of what it is, when we were told that the government had not come to any definite decision as to the future, and that therefore the late Minister of Public Works was wrong in discussing fiscal questions before the country. We were informed by the Prime Minister that after six years tenure of office the party in power have not yet come to any conclusion as to whether protection or free trade is the proper fiscal policy for this country, and therefore they had not formed any plans for the future. Sir, when the right hon. premier, a little later, told us, pointing dramatically to the Hansard of last year, that there, in the speech of the Finance Minister, was embodied the policy of the government, then we at least knew what that policy was. For, Sir, I defy any man to read the speech of the Minister of Finance last session and come to any other conclusion than that the only policy so laid down was that policy of masterly inactivity of lying behind the lines of Torres Vedras, of which hon. gentlemen have been accused before. Why, Sir, the Minister of Finance did not even pretend to shed the faintest light on the vexed question as to whether or not, when the government did come to revise the tariff, they would do it in the interest of protection or of free trade. He told us nothing would be done last year, he told us something would be done in the future, he intimated very clearly that this year is the year that it would be done, because, from the reasons which he gave showing why they could not revise the tariff last year, the only possible conclusion to be drawn was that they would revise it this year. But beyond that opinion, not a word of information did he give. So we find that hon. gentlemen opposite are in this position, that to-day, in the seventh year of their office, they have no other policy than that of masterly inactivity, waiting like Micawber, for something to turn up.

Now, Sir, when the right hon. gentleman was speaking of his policy being embalmed in that speech of the Finance Minister, it did seem to me there was a striking illustration of the difference between the policies of the two parties. The Conservative party, go back as far as you will, has had a policy, be it right or be it wrong, so clearly defined, that every man in this country from one end to the other, knew what it was. Hon. gentlemen opposite not only have failed to decide on any policy, but they seem to think, from the premier down, that the word 'policy' means something entirely different from the meaning attached to it in all times gone by. I venture to say they pay a poor compliment to the intelligence of the people of this country when they refuse to deal with pressing questions, and there is none more important than the fiscal question. Yet they expect these people will go on year after year, and election after election, supporting sixteen or seventeen gentlemen who do not pay sufficient respect to the remaining five or six million people in this country even to tell them whether, when they come to revise the tariff, they will do it on protective or non-protective lines. Let me say this, for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite, who seem to be ignorant of the meaning of protection, that hon. gentlemen opposite to-day, in consequence of the lack of policy, which has characterized their legislation for years, are not in a position to give protection to the people of this country even if they wished. For in protection there are two factors: There is the measure of protection, and there is the stability of protection. Hon. gentlemen opposite can give as large a measure of protection as they like, but in view of the dismissal from office of the late Minister of Public Works because of his advocacy of protective principles, it must be evident that no matter how great a measure of protection they may give the manufacturers of this country, that so-called protection must lack the element of stability, which is just as important a factor as the measure of protection itself. And if we are to see this country grow as we would like to see it grow, if we are to see capital unlocked and expended in promoting the various industries of which this country is capable, it is just as essential that the stability of the tariff should be assured as that protection should be given.

Now, I was rather surprised to hear the Prime Minister defend himself for his change of views by saying that when he was young and green he was a protectionist. If language has any meaning, if the people of this country who are deprived of the right which they should possess of hearing directly from the lips of the Prime Minister what his views are on fiscal questions, if they are obliged to do the best they can with the information given them, surely they can draw but one conclusion from such a description of protection as that, namely, that the Prime Minister is not a protectionist, and that therefore, so far as he has gone to-day, he has adopted the views expressed by the Minister of Customs in the debate last year when he said : We stand for a revenue tariff; and the views expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the same debate last year when he said that honesty and protection were simply incompatible in the administration of public affairs.

Now, Sir, when the Prime Minister referred to two great statesmen of the motherland, it occurred to me that we might draw both a lesson and a warning from the history of those two statesmen. In speaking of the propriety of a public man changing his views, he referred to the fact that W. E. Gladstone and Sir Robert Peel had themselves changed their views. Mr. Gladstone commenced life a Tory, and he ended life a Liberal. Sir Robert Peel commenced life a Tory and ended it outside the party ranks. As I said before, I think there is both a lesson and a warning in the history of these two great statesmen. When Mr. Gladstone went down to his grave he went down as the idol of his party, leaving a name honoured throughout the length and breadth of the empire; a name which the proudest families in the motherland might be proud to bear. And it is to be said of W. E. Gladstone when we come to read his epitaph, that if he had anything to say he so expressed himself that from the beginning to the end of his career the people knew where W. E. Gladstone stood. There was another statesman, Sir Robert Peel, who began his life a Tory and who ended it in the ranks of the opposition party. He left a name very different from that of W. E. Gladstone; he left a name, which, it is agreed by every historian of every school we have in Great Britain, was tarnished and disgraced by his conduct at the time he changed his political views. Sir Robert Peel had a perfect right, as we all will admit, after beginning life as a Conservative protectionist to change his views. If he honestly changed his views it was his right to do so, following up his new information and new light upon the subject, but, Sir Robert Peel did this : Sir Robert Peel, a Conservative, went to the people of Great Britain, asking their support, on the ground that he was a protectionist, and having come into power as a protectionist, he used the power and authority he had got on that ground to introduce an entirely different policy. Will the right hon. Prime Minister study the history of Sir Robert Peel, will the Prime Minister remember the fate that befell a British statesman who, appealing to the people on the ground that he was a protectionist, when he came into power betrayed those who had placed him in office on the ground of his being a protectionist, and will the Prime Minister remember that in this not distant part of the empire, having appealed to the people on the ground that :

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based upon that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours—

And having come into power and finding a protective tariff in which there are 448 items, leaves 244 untouched, increases 54 and decreases 34—will he ponder over the history, the promises, the faithlessness and the fall of Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, naturally, both the House and the country had a great deal of interest in finding out if possible—and I suppose that is the reason why ministerial explanations are a recognized feature in parliamentary life—why our friend the ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) left the government of the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have listened with a very great deal of care to the speeches made in the course of this debate, I have heard the statements made by the right hon. leader of the House and the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works, and I must admit, that, so far as I am concerned, I am yet at a loss to understand why the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works has been required to leave the government. I think, generally speaking, that the country, after reading the report of this debate, and even after a careful perusal of every word of this debate, will come to the conclusion that the true reason for the change in the government has scarcely been unfolded to the House when the Prime Minister has stated that in this matter he was vindicating the proper principle upon which parliamentary government by cabinet can alone be carried on, and that is that no member of a cabinet can, in the country or in the House, advocate views which are inconsistent with the general opinion of the cabinet. Now, that would be a very satisfactory answer and explanation of the matter if it could be made to fit in with all the facts, but, here, we have, in the course of this debate, discovered that not only the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works gave utterance to views in the country or elsewhere inconsistent with the course laid down by the government, but that other representatives of the administration have done the same thing and that while the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works has been called upon to resign on account of these utterances, others, notably the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the hon. gentleman who at present fills the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) are still remaining in the cabinet, although, so far as I can understand, their offence, if offence it be, is precisely the same as that of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. Now, that being the case, I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that the explanation given by the right hon. leader of the government is not sufficient to explain all the circumstances. We know that members of the government and members of the party in the House are very much troubled to understand an expression that has been used by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) when he speaks of 'adequate protection.' It seems to afford these hon. gentlemen an immense amount of difficulty to understand what 'adequate means. I think we have in the course of the explanation made here to-day an excellent opportunity of learning what 'adequate' means; that is by its contrary, because, it appears, so far as I am concerned, that the explanations given by the right hon. gentleman are not adequate. They do not explain all the conditions of the circumstances leading up to the last circumstance why one member of the administration is compelled to withdraw from his position in the administration for doing precisely what other ministers are allowed to do without punishment of any kind whatever. The offence of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works was, that, being a member of the administration and it at that time being determined upon doing nothing in the manner of tariff, he continued to advocate an increase of tariff. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) who filled his place, did not require to run an election; but the position of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was made vacant and the hon. gentleman who had to go to the people in order to have his seat given back to him, committed precisely the same offence, if offence it be, as that charged against the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. In the course of the contest which was necessary in order to reintroduce him to the cabinet he took the same course which had been followed by the ex-Minister of Public Works. He secured a seat in Maisonneuve as an advocate of increased protection and he sits in the cabinet to-day, having, even at the time when the right hon. gentleman tells us the government had come to the conclusion upon this subject to do nothing, advocated increased protection to the same extent although not, perhaps, quite as frequently, as did the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. Can it be possible for us to believe that there is nothing more in this matter than these utterances of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works, or are we not forced to come to the conclusion that the retirement of the hon. ex-Minister was owing to a struggle that had arisen in the cabinet, or in the portion of the cabinet which was left in Canada during the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, resulting in the Prime Minister being called upon to make his choice between the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works and the other members of the cabinet who had determined no longer to remain in the cabinet with that hon. gentleman? We know perfectly well, it has been stated in the most open fashion, it has been circulated everywhere in the press, that a demand was made on the Prime Minister for the scalp of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works, and I must say, so far as the discussion to-day has gone, that I think every reasonable man who listens to the arguments and statements that have been made here to-day will come to the conclusion that it is the true explanation that a struggle had arisen in the cabinet in which one party or the other had to be defeated, and that the Prime Minister, being compelled to make a choice, did make a choice which resulted in the effacement for the time being, or for a long time, I dare say, of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. There is another explanation which may be possible; here, we have the case of a minister, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, advocating protection at a time when the government is said to have decided upon a position of inertia, or stability, by maintaining its present position on the tariff without change; the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is left unharmed while the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works, on the other hand, for precisely the same offence, is called upon to retire from the administration. The offence is the same; the punishment is different. Why is it? It is believed that the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works was marked out for destruction, or else that there must be some difference between the quality of the offence in the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It may be that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not mean what he was saying and the fact was recognized at the time that he was using the license which members of the administration are using all the time by saying that they are protectionists or free traders, as the case may be, and as required for the purpose of carrying elections. A license is apparently given to them for that purpose. On the other hand it may have been believed that the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was honestly saying what he meant, that he was a staunch advocate of protection and that being in earnest he was introducing into the political arena a question which it was inconvenient for the administration to have discussed at that time. It was realized that the Minister of Marine (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine) was ready to talk protection to-day and free trade tomorrow, but that the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) might be relied upon to continue his crusade for the protection of Canadian industries.

There has been in the course of this discussion a wide difference of opinion between the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte) and the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding). The ex-minister pretends that he had every reason to believe that the announcement which was made by the Minister of Finance last session was an indication that changes were to be made this session in the direction of a higher tariff. The Minister of Finance explicitly stated to-day that no such intention exists, but so far as the opinions formed by hon. members are concerned--at least on this side of the House—they are in accord with the construction placed by the ex-minister on the language of the Finance Minister. A great many circumstances which arose in the course of last session indicated that we were to have tariff changes this year. Early in the session the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who has a close relationship with the cabinet, reviewed our commercial position and pointed out that our fiscal policy placed us at a tremendous disadvantage in doing business with the United States. His speech led us to the conclusion, that so far as he could influence the policy of the administration he would persevere in a course which would lead the government of the day to adopt a higher tariff. For some reason, possibly because of an understanding with the premier, the resolution was not pressed to a vote but it might fairly be looked upon as a feeler to discover what was the sentiment of the House and of the country. Here was a member of the Joint High Commission, associated with members of the government to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States, a gentleman who is in the next rank to that of a cabinet minister ; a gentleman who enjoys the confidence of the Prime Minister ; here was that gentleman arguing to show that there was in the Liberal party a strong impression that the present tariff was not sufficiently high to enable us to maintain our position in competition with the neighbouring republic. Then we had the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) advocating increased protection for the industries in which he and his constituents were interested. A thousand times over voices came from that side of the House during that session showing that pressure was brought to bear on the administration not to continue the existing conditions, but to give us higher protection. Deputations came without number, and we had the assurance of the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte) that these deputations were merely put off for the time, were given to understand that the government was not opposed to an increase in the tariff but might under certain circumstances grant it, and were not dismissed hopelessly with a refusal. The impression created on the public mind throughout the country was entirely in favour of the construction placed on the words of the Minister of Finance by the ex-minister. It is abundantly clear therefore that the ex-minister (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was absolutely justified in every utterance he made during the recess, which went to show that the intention of the government was to frame a higher tariff at this session. It seems to me therefore that he did not travel outside of a course consistent with perfect loyalty to his leader and to his party, when he tried to bring forward rapidly the day when a policy of high protection would be entered upon.

Then as to the manner in which the resignation was received or the dismissal accomplished. The hon. ex-minister said, and the premier did not deny it, that he had twice tendered his resignation and that his leader asked him to leave the matter in abeyance until he returned from Toronto. We find however from the premier's own words that so soon as his colleague had left for Toronto he put himself in communication with the Governor General in order to secure His Excellency's consent to his asking the minister for his portfolio. That is almost entirely a personal consideration, and it may be left for settlement to these gentlemen themselves. But there was one statement made by the ex-minister which struck me as of great importance. He stated, and repeated the statement, that if at any time when he was advocating increased protection he had received a request or an order from his leader he would have desisted. He even told the House that if the acting premier had given to him the slightest suggestion that his course was looked upon unfavourably by the cabinet, he would have stopped his advocacy of a high protective tariff. How can we doubt for one moment that when the ex-minister and the premier met in Ottawa the ex-minister did not state to the premier as he tells us he did state : If the course I have followed in your absence has been inconsistent with your views of my duty to you ; if I have said or done anything other than I have said or done in your presence before you left Canada I am here now honestly holding these opinions but ready to desist from the further expression of them, and should I find it impossible to remain a member of your cabinet after giving up that propaganda, I am prepared to retire from your cabinet in an honourable manner. I think, Sir, that this much ought to have been granted by the premier to his colleague ; a colleague who has supported him as we have reason to believe with the greatest power, success and ability—it does seem that the premier should have given this colleague some decent length of time in which to make his exit in a dignified manner instead of pitch-forking him out of the cabinet as he did. Yesterday the Prime Minister told the House that he repudiated the idea that when the term of a lieutenant governor expired his successor should be appointed immediately as if the administration was anxious to get rid of him. Apparently, a lieutenant governor is to have months or even years to make a dignified exit from government house, but a gentleman who has been of the utmost service to the administration, who has probably done more than any member of the cabinet to preserve Canada from that destruction and ruin which an interruption of the National Policy would have brought on all its interests ; a gentleman, who, if I am not mistaken, has been an advocate of protection from the time he entered the cabinet, whose hand may be traced in every word of that tariff under which these gentlemen claim Canada has attained such prosperity—such a gentleman is to be pitch-forked out of the administration in the most unceremonious fashion, and even in violation of a courteous request made to him by his premier that the matter of his resignation should be left in abeyance until he returned from Toronto to the Capital. These, however, are largely personal matters. It strikes me that all we have heard in the course of this discussion tends to convince any reasonable man who has listened carefully to it, and who tries to make all the facts of the case fit in with the explanation offered by the Prime Minister, that we have not had the true reason given for the dismissal of the ex-minister, but it is an evidence of the fact that on this occasion at least, in the absence of the Premier, the members of the cabinet not only fought like blazes, but the end of it was that one of the combatants suffered very serious damage.

Mr. RUFUS H. POPE (Compton). Mr. Speaker, coming from the province of Quebec, I take particular interest in the shuffle that has taken place in the cabinet and in the difficulty that has arisen between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Public Works. Since the days of confederation, the great Department of Public Works has been entrusted to a member from the province of Quebec, and as a rule if not invariably to one of French Canadian origin. Living among the French Canadian people, I can well understand that no kick would come from them on narrow lines ; but it is important to that province, as one of the large provinces of the Dominion, that it should have its fair share of the administration and of the patronage in the government of Canada ; and without wishing to raise the question on narrow lines, I simply wish to enter my protest against the removal of the portfolio of Public Works from the province of Quebec to another province, especially as the first minister called to his aid a man who is supposed to be well versed in public works, who has had large experience in the great city of Montreal, as mayor and leading alderman in that city for many years. Possibly the Prime Minister may have discovered in the administration of those public works in the city of Montreal some cause why he did not care to entrust that hon. gentleman with the larger public works of Canada. Of course, that is not for me to say ; but with the numerous applicants which the right hon. gentleman had for the vacant portfolio, he certainly was not confined to the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine). And it was humiliating to observe that after the services of the ex-Minister of Public Works were dispensed with in such a summary manner, it took something like three weeks to find a man to take his place, so great a factor had he been in the administration ; and after they had discovered him, they felt that they dare not trust him with the portfolio which had been vacated, but they took some of the patronage of the Department of Public Works, and by reconstruction patched up a special portfolio for the new minister. As the ex-Minister of Public Works says himself, he has made some mistakes ; but in my judgment, after hearing the speeches to-day, and casting my memory back over the record of the Liberal party in Canada for 25 or 30 years, I am convinced that the greatest mistake he ever made in all his life was when he joined that gang opposite. I venture to say that if the hon. gentleman could stand up in this parliament untramelled by his oath of office as a member of that government, he could tell a round of stories that would prove that statement to be correct. It is not my intention to take up much time in this discussion. The question has been threshed out very thoroughly, but very unsatisfactorily so far as the explanation of the first minister is concerned. We are left practically in the dark ; but what are we to expect ? The other day the right hon. gentleman made this astonishing statement in parliament, and to the country. He said :

What is my position ? I am first minister in what kind of a camp ? Part of it protectionist and part of it free trade. What is my great duty ? It is to conciliate—to maintain power at all costs by acts of conciliation. True you should have a bold national policy, a great policy of protection ; but I cannot give it to you and retain power. I am not here to lead public opinion. The time has gone by when it is regarded as the duty of a great statesman who is Prime Minister to lead public opinion. Instead of that, it is his duty to knuckle down to it, and reconcile the factions as best he can, in the hope of retaining power in this country at any cost. That is the confession of the Prime Minister, and under these circumstances you cannot expect to get from him a very clear statement of the reasons why he chose to decapitate the ex-Minister of Public Works. While I do not wish to enter into the family troubles of hon. gentlemen opposite, to any great extent, it is well to recognize that the ex-Minister of Public Works was of great service to the right hon. gentleman in the hour when he needed great services, when it was not " Laurier and luck " that carried the day, but when he needed an organizer in the province of Quebec for his special benefit. When I first read the letter which the right hon. gentleman addressed to the ex-Minister of Public Works, I said, it is ingratitude, such as I did not expect from him. The first minister must know better than I do the obligations he was under to the ex-minister. We regretted to see that the right hon. first minister, when he returned to this country, did not enjoy the health which we are all glad to see him enjoying at this moment. He was suffering extreme weakness, and I think he must have been visited in that hour of weakness by that miserable combination who had decided that the ex-Minister of Public Works must go. What did they care about their leader provided they themselves got rid of the hon. gentleman and secured the position he occupied and all the influence that goes with it. As has been shown over and over again, it was not the speeches made by the ex-Minister of Public Works which brought about his resignation. Why, last session we had speech after speech from the other side to exactly the same purport. We had only one free trade speech among the lot, and that was made by a gentleman who has since gone to the Senate to receive his reward as a free trader. He has passed from our midst and gone up above to remain there until he goes still higher. We had a good many speeches from these hon. gentlemen opposite and but one free trade speech among them all. There was not an hon. gentleman on that side, with the exception of the one I have just mentioned, who did not have a jack-knife or harness or carriage factory or horses in the great west or silver mines in British Columbia, or something else down by the sea, which wanted protection. All along the line we had protectionist speeches, not one of these men has been read out of the party, and yet we are asked to believe that the ex-Minister of Public Works lost his position because he attended public meetings at the request of these very men and delivered speeches along the same lines as those to which they had themselves given utterance in parliament. Such an explanation lacks honesty and frankness and is an insult to the intelligence of a democratically governed country like Canada. As to the future policy of the government, that will be precisely of the same indeterminate character as its present policy. You have got a cabinet composed of men holding the most contradictory views upon the vital question of protection. The right hon. first minister has told us that he has protectionists and free traders behind him in about equal numbers. From a government composed of such discordant elements, what else can you expect but a weak policy? And the manufacturers of Canada, the men who are interested in our natural deposits, the men who are waiting for government encouragement in order to develop our natural resources—these men will wait in vain. True, they may now and then get a little something but they will only get a half-hearted policy. We are to-day receiving hundreds of thousands of immigrants from the United States as well as from other parts of the world. There has been no time since confederation when wide-awake, energetic, broad-minded men were more necessary at the helm of state. There has been no time when a strong resolute policy was more required. We must not forget that these people are going into our North-west and that our great North-west is separated from eastern Canada by the rock bound shores of Lake Superior for about 1,000 miles. One would imagine that these were intended to be the divisions of two separate nationalities, and if we are to bring the west and the east into close unity, we in the east will have to adopt a broad national policy. What do these Americans tell us, who are going into our country ? Do they tell us that they have left their own because they are dissatisfied with it ? Not at all, they say that they are proud of the United States, and if they are leaving, it is because they can sell their farms in the United States at $50 an acre and buy farms in Canada at $5 an acre. How comes it that they are able to sell their farms at $40 or $50 an acre ? It is due to the industrial policy of the American government, and if we wish to satisfy these men, if we are to give a similar increase in value to our land in the west, we will have to adopt a similar policy, we will have to adopt a policy that will build up industries in Canada which will rival those that a protective policy has developed in the United States.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). I think, Mr. Speaker, that the House has made up its mind that the reasons given by the right hon. the first minister for the dismissal or resignation of his colleague are exceedingly weak and not acceptable in any shape or form. The ex-Minister of Public Works has thoroughly justified the course he took in advocating a protective policy. There can be no doubt that he had reason to believe that in so doing he was voicing the sentiments and opinions of his colleagues. He had reason to believe that in advocating a strong protective policy, he was paving the way for an increase of tariff, which they desired, to make during the coming session. I shall not go further into the arguments for or against the dismissal or resignation of the ex-minister, but wish to point out that the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. the Minister of Finance have again to-day shown that the policy of this government is one of uncertainty and vacillation. Their chief aim seems to be to keep the country in absolute ignorance as to what their policy really is. Let me give a practical illustration of the effect of this reticence on their part. Last week in Montreal a number of young men, who thought they knew something about finance, formed a combine to buy a very large block of steel stock of Nova Scotia. They got their friends young and old, into the deal to the extent perhaps of some $2,000,000. The reason they gave their friends for inducing them to go into that transaction was that they had the promise of the government to impose a large increase of duty on iron and steel during the coming session, which would make the stock of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company worth 80, 90 or perhaps 100 per cent. These young men were probably perfectly justified in believing that the government were quite capable of going into any one transaction of that kind and favouring one particular enterprise without adopting a broad protective policy for the whole country. Is it not a melancholy thing that after the government have been in power some seven years, they have so impressed the country with the conviction that they have no policy at all, that their friends are easily led to believe that in any one particular instance the government are ready at a moment's notice, and to benefit some of their supporters, to go back on their free trade principles and become protectionists to the fullest extent. The transaction which resulted so disastrously was absolutely and solely the result of this lamentable want of policy on the part of the government. These young men lost nearly half a million of dollars in the operation which they would never have entered into had the government adopted a fixed policy and stood by that policy and not been prepared to change it to suit any particular exigencies. If these young men had been a little older and had a little more experience, they would have known that although they might put some faith in the policy or promises of this government, it would not do for them to back their opinions by their money. They might back it, so far as swearing by it was concerned, but to bet on it, as the racing man says, that would not do—they knew they were liable to fail.

Now, this is, perhaps, all outside the question. But the discussion has drifted to question of policy and of the justification of the ex-Minister of Public Works in his public utterances. I contend that he was justified in giving voice to the views that he expressed. Up to a certain point he had the entire backing of the government in all his statements. He has told us that he was not called down by the Prime Minister or by the acting Prime Minister when the right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was abroad. It was only on the return of the Prime Minister that, all of a sudden, this virtuous indignation arose as to one of the members of the cabinet daring to be a protectionist in the open, and it was decided that there must be this great punishment for it. I contend that it is the duty of the government to let it be known plainly and squarely what its policy is, and that they are only fooling the people and damaging the country by giving such answers as the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister gave to-day. Apparently they want to convince us that they are very clever, that they can receive a deputation of merchants or manufacturers or gardeners and give them such an answer that they will go away thinking that they have assurance of the Minister of Finance or some other member of the government of sympathy with their ideas of protection, while, at the same time, this member of the government is laughing in his sleeve and saying: How nicely I have fooled that deputation, and when they come back next year I can explain to them that what they thought I meant is exactly the opposite of what I really did mean.

Now, the ex-Minister of Public Works repeated what struck me as, perhaps, the most serious statement he made. He said with emphasis: I administered my department honestly. Why is it necessary to make a statement like that? Is a man to take credit to himself for administering his department honestly and doing what he can to prevent the public funds being stolen through that department? Yet, the hon. gentleman made this statement with emphasis, and, before he sat down he took occasion to repeat it with even greater emphasis—that he had administered his department honestly and had tried to let no man defraud it. Was that the reason of his resignation, or had it anything to do with that resignation?

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

And that the Quorum of the said Committee do consist of Twelve Members.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

That the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DRAINAGE ON AND ACROSS RAILWAY PROPERTY.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) respecting drainage on and across the property of railway companies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. COWAN. This is practically a copy of the Bill which I introduced last session and which I explained on that occasion. I prefer to defer further explanation until the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (West York) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 20) to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This is a Bill to regulate the size of milk cans and the quantity they shall contain. I will give further explanation at the proper time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

COST OF CENSUS OF 1901.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

How much has the cost of the taking of the census of 1901 been up to the first day of March, 1903 ? How much is estimated it will cost to complete it ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). It would be much preferable if my hon. friend would put this question in the shape of a motion for a return.

PRICE OF BINDER TWINE.

Mr. BLAIN asked :

Has the government published the prices of binder twine for the current year ? If not, when will they be published ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). To the first question the answer is : No. To the second question the answer is : When the spring trade in that class of supplies opens. The fluctuations in the fibre market have been such for some time past that it is not deemed advisable to fix prices at present.

THE SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCE OF JUDGES.

The PRIME MINISTER (for the Minister of Justice) moved :

That the House go into Commitee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution,

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, with respect to retiring allowances of judges, and to provide that, any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any Superior Court in Canada who has :—

(a.) Attained the age of seventy-five years, and has continued in office as such judge, or as such judge and as judge of any Superior Court in Canada, or as such judge and as stipendiary magistrate of the North-west Territories, for twenty years or upwards ; or

(b.) Attained the age of sixty-five years, and has continued in office as such judge, or as such judge and as judge of any Superior Court in Canada, for thirty years or upwards,

May resign his said office ; and His Majesty may, by letters patent, under the great seal, reciting such judge's age and period of office, grant unto such judge an annuity equal to the salary of the office held by him at the time of his resignation, to commence immediately after his resignation, and to continue thenceforth during his natural life.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved :

That the House go into Commitee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution,

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and to provide that if the period of service includes a fraction of a year less than one-half, the service shall be taken to be the number of years served, not including the fraction. And if the period of service includes a fraction equal to or greater than one-half, the fraction shall be deemed to be an entire year.

2. Resolved, that it is expedient to confirm all superannuation allowances heretofore granted, calculated in the foregoing manner.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to ask the Prime Minister, at how early a date we may expect the Redistribution Bill, which was referred to in the speech from the Throne.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not prepared to say what date we will be ready with that Bill, but it will likely be at an early date. Perhaps to-morrow I will introduce a resolution with regard to the Chinese Bill, and my right hon. friend the Minister of Railways will introduce at an early date his Bill with reference to the Railway Commission.

COST OF CENSUS OF 1901.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). When I put my question which is on the Order paper to-day, the Minister of Finance asked me to move for a return. I asked for that information in order that I might be able to base some remarks on it this session. I do not see why the hon. gentleman should ask me to move for a return when I simply want to know what is the expenditure on account of taking the census up to the 1st of March, 1901, and the estimated expense further. That is a very simple question and the minister should answer it without asking me to move for a return.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My remarks were not intended in the slightest degree to delay the information getting to the House. I can assure the hon. gentleman that when his motion is made there will be no delay in bringing down the return.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I will call the minister's attention to page 44 of the Public Accounts and he will find there, that the information with regard to the cost of the census expenditure has all been included under one item instead of being in a separate column as in the past. That is all the greater reason why the question of my right hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) should have been answered.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If there is any departure from the usual mode I will inquire what the reason is and I will let my hon. friend know.

THE SOUTH SHORE RAILWAY.

Mr. VICTOR GEOFFRION (Chambly and Verchères.) Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to a state of things which he will agree with me demands immediate attention. We have a railway running from St. Lambert through the counties of Verchères, Chambly, Yamaska and Richelieu. That railway has lately been sold to some speculators from New York and other cities of the United States. They paid for it and commenced to operate it, but soon afterwards they became engaged in a lawsuit before the courts in regard to the ownership of the road, and ever since the road has been so neglected that it has become dangerous for the public to travel on it. Some of the employees of the road I know have not been paid for five or six months, and the result is that some sections of the road are left entirely unattended. I received telegrams and letters two or three days ago, and again yesterday, calling my attention to the dangerous condition of the road and bridges, especially at this season of the year. People who have examined it say that if it is not attended to immediately, some very disastrous accident may happen. I need not quote the law to the hon. Minister of Railways. He is familiar with that section of the Railway Act which says that the Minister of Railways and Canals, on being informed that any railway is in such a state as I have described, may send an engineer to inspect the road and make a report, and if the report is unfavourable, the minister shall have power to close the road. I am told also that the engines have not been cleaned for several months. In fact, the whole railway is in such a condition that the public are afraid to travel on it, while the owners are fighting among themselves, and in case of accident we do not know whom to apply to. We have been very unfortunate with that road. The gentleman who first promoted it, got the charter and had the first administration of it, expropriated lands belonging to some well-to-do farmers, and a good many of these farmers have not yet been paid. There is not a better locality in the province of Quebec. This gentleman ran the road for a certain time, not to suit the public, but to suit himself. Afterwards it was taken hold of by Mr. Beauchemin and other gentlemen, who gave satisfaction to the public. We had nothing to complain of so long as they managed the road; but unfortunately they sold it, and since then it has been going from bad to worse. I do not know whether or not there are any subsidies due to this railway; but if there are, I hope the hon. minister will see that those subsidies are not paid until the poor people who have been working for the road without wages for some time, are paid. I would especially mention the manager of the road, Mr. Lalonde, who has done wonders with the little means at his disposal. I hope the hon. minister will see that not a cent of subsidy is paid to the road until justice is rendered to these people.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I understand that my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères complains that the railway from St. Lambert to Sorel is not in a safe condition for traffic, and wishes that an engineer of the department should, in accordance with the law, be sent to go over the road and make an examination of it, and report to the department whether or not the information which has reached us is well founded. I understand that is my hon. friend's desire.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to give me in writing at his earliest convenience a memo. of the particulars in which he has been informed the road is in the condition he states, so that the attention of the engineer would be called to those particulars, when he goes to look over the road, I would be glad to take immediate steps to have the inspection made. The information given to me in that form would be a matter of record, and I think the law contemplates that there should be a written complaint to facilitate the work of the officer in making the examination. I assure him that the department will give the matter its immediate attention.

Mr. GEOFFRION. The whole plant is in bad order; but I will, as the hon. minister suggests, give him all the particulars I have in writing.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, for two years in succession I have moved in the House of Commons for the return of certain papers relating to the late general officer commanding in Canada. In my absence certain garbled and distorted extracts were brought down to the House, while the papers I moved for were reported not to have been found in the Militia Department. For two years in succession the House has ordered these papers to be brought down, and I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia why the order of the House has not been obeyed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. Sir Frederick Borden). I can only say that the return to which my hon. friend refers was, I believe, prepared under the direction of the then general officer commanding. Last year I gave directions that a further return should be prepared and brought down, and I am surprised to hear that it has not been brought down. I will make inquiry, and be prepared to make a further statement to my hon. friend as to why the return has not been brought down.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Governor General's office including salaries, $10,900 ; contingencies, $15,100.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The increases are the usual statutory increases.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Are these statutory increases given generally or only in isolated instances ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They are general. There is no exception where the party is eligible.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does that apply to all the departments ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, the general rule has been to give them to all who are eligible.

Office of the King's Privy Council, Canada—Salaries, $31,875 ; contingencies, $9,300.

The PRIME MINISTER. There are no increases in that item except the statutory increases, with the exception of one junior second-class clerk transferred to the second-class.

Mr. INGRAM. Who was the clerk who was transferred ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. McElroy is promoted from one class to the other.

Department of Justice—Salaries, including one junior second-class clerk at $800, and allowance to the private secretary of the Solicitor General, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $35,390 ; contingencies, $12,370.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The increase is more apparent than real. It is due to a reorganization of the department. When we come to the penitentiary estimates, my hon. friends will see that the increase is more apparent than real.

Mr. BENNETT. As we are now on the items of the Department of Justice, would the hon. minister allow me to put a question to him on a matter indirectly connected with this expenditure ? The principle was laid down by the late Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice, that the government should go outside of the counties where the vacancies occur to find men to fill the position of county court judge. For a long time that principle was acted upon by Sir John Thompson and some of his successors, but it has been ruthlessly departed from by the present administration. Does the hon. minister think it desirable that the vacancies now existing should be filled up by gentlemen practising in those counties where there are vacancies ? That is certainly the course he has followed. Take the county of Huron, Judge Masson had retired on account of illness, and the then junior judge was promoted. It was expected that an outsider would have been appointed judge of the county court, but the government appointed Mr. Holt, who was practising in the county. I am acquainted with Mr. Holt and I know that his reputation at the bar was good, and that he could make an excellent judge. Still he had been a politician in the riding, he was a partner of Mr. Campbell who was long a member of this House, and had been spoken of frequently as a probable candidate for either the local legislature or for the House of Commons. The hon. minister, I presume, takes the responsibility for what goes on in his department. The other day, in the matter of Brunet's pardon, he said that although the recommendation did not come from him, he took any blame that might be attached to it. Is he going now to lay down the rule that these appointments will be made solely with the view of suiting political exigencies ? Because I am informed that in the case of Huron, the county judge was taken from the local bar. I need not go over all the arguments adduced in the past to show why this principle is a pernicious one. In appointing a man from the local bar, you appoint one, who in nine cases out of ten, has been prominent in politics, and the result is inevitable that the people will view such an appointment with suspicion. In Leeds and Grenville also, the county judge was taken from the town of Brockville, and lately in the province of Ontario a number of appointments to the position of county judge have been made from the local bars. If that is to be the policy of the administration, it will be well for the House to know it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I think that the rule contended for by my hon. friend, namely, that county court judges should be chosen as much as possible from the outside bar, is a very wise one. I quite agree that the late Sir John Thompson expressed the view that these appointments should, as far as possible, be made from the outside bar, and that view was concurred in by the different Ministers of Justice who followed him, but if my hon. friend will look over the appointments, he will find that even in Sir John Thompson's time that custom was more honoured in the breach than in the observance. So far as I am concerned, I propose to follow that rule as closely as possible.

Mr. BENNETT. I have here a memo. of the various appointments lately made. Four have been made since the hon. gentleman's party came into power. Mr. Liddell was practising at the bar in Cornwall when appointed to a junior judgeship there. Mr. Reynolds was practising in Brockville and Mr. Holt in Goderich, and we have further, the case of Mr. Monk, who was made a junior judge at Hamilton when practising at the local bar in that district. There is at present a vacancy in the county court judgeship in the county of York. Has any decision been arrived at as to who is to get the office ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not yet, but my hon. friend will realize at once that the rule he advocates would be difficult of application, as far as the appointment to the county of York judgeship is concerned. It might be hard to go out of Toronto to find a man for that position, so that the objections to appointing a man from the district would not apply with the same force to the city of Toronto. With regard to the appointment of Mr. Holt, for which I was responsible personally, that appointment was made at the unanimous request of the whole bar of the county. I realize that because of the sympathy existing among members of the bar, irrespective of politics, there would naturally be a tendency to help one another in a case of that sort, and while that may not appeal very strongly, still it is some justification for departing from the principle stated by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT. No doubt the applicant for judgeship, if prominent in the locality, will have the support of the local bar, who will be anxious to get him out of the way and share his clientele among themselves. What I would like to know is whether from this out there is to be any settled rule with regard to these appointments, or whether each case will have to stand on its own merits ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes, but I would like to qualify that statement by the addition that I think the rule contended for by my hon. friend is a wise and salutary one.

Mr. BENNETT. But not to be followed.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. As far as possible.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This discussion is going entirely outside the resolution. As the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) rose to—

Mr. LENNOX. But is it going outside the resolution, Mr. Chairman ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We cannot, under this vote, if we are to observe the ordinary rules, discuss the policy of the government with regard to the appointment of judges.

Mr. LENNOX. We are dealing with the Department of Justice, surely—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is my decision. The item we are discussing is as follows :—

Civil government—Department of Justice—salaries, including one second-class clerk, $800, and allowance to the private secretary to the Solicitor General, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $35,390.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Justice, and I do not see why this discussion is not perfectly relevant.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Strictly speaking, this does not cover the point, but I have no objection to the discussion.

Mr. LENNOX. I was going to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the statement he made that, as far as possible appointments to the position of county judge should be made from outside the county. I do not see why that rule should not be carried out and men appointed who are not practicing in the county. We are all aware that there are large numbers of persons who are eligible and desirous of becoming county court judges. I was informed the other day that the Department of Justice has a list of gentlemen desirous of taking that position. I understand that the names of some gentlemen have been upon the list for a number of years. Under the circumstances, I fail to understand how there can be any impossibility of securing suitable persons outside of the county. If we are to have the rule at all, we ought to have a full explanation from the Minister of Justice of the reasons for his action in any case where the rule is not observed. In the case of Mr. Holt I understand the hon. minister to suggest that the requisition presented by his brethern at the bar was, to some extent, the reason for Mr. Holt's appointment. But I do not understand the hon. minister to put it wholly upon that ground. I would therefore ask the hon. minister to inform the House specifically what reason was in Mr. Holt's case for departing from the very salutary rule which has been referred to. In addition to the reasons suggested by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) many others could be mentioned against the practice of appointing judges from their own county. For instance, it frequently happens that the person appointed has a large family, including a number of sons practicing at the bar. Or, if his own sons are not practicing, he has nephews or other connections.

This entails serious difficulties, and, at the very least, causes prejudice to exist in the minds both of other members of the bar and the public generally. The expediency of the rule is not questioned, as I understand—it could hardly be questioned. Nor can the expediency of carrying it into effect, except in special cases, be doubted. If, however, there is in any case, a good and sufficient reason against carrying out the rule, surely that reason can be definitely and distinctly stated. I fail to understand that, as yet, the hon. minister has given any reason why an exception was made in the case of Mr. Holt.

Mr. INGRAM. While the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) was speaking. I could not see whether the Minister of Justice assented to what he said. But I take it that the hon. minister has a list of lawyers in the province of Ontario whom he proposes to promote to judgeships. I would like to ask if the name of Mr. Jackson of the town of Ingersoll is on that list.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I would like to gratify my hon. friend's (Mr. Ingram's) curiosity, but I do not think my memory enables me to state off-hand the number of applications I have had. But I may tell my hon. friend that the list to which he refers is one of very long standing and dates very far back.

Mr. INGRAM. If Mr. Jackson's name is on the list, I would suggest that his name be struck off at once. In the case of an appointment I suggest to the hon. minister the propriety of having the Act amended, or some legislation passed by which, if a member of this House is appointed to a judgeship, he shall be precluded from acting on an election trial for five years from the date of his appointment. Such a law, I think, would be in the interests of justice. It has been my painful duty to attend and observe some of the election trials that have taken place recently, and I have never experienced more partisanship in this House than I have seen in some of these trials. These gentlemen should not be allowed to act on an election trial until they have had time to forget that they are partisans.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There have been grievances on both sides. In my own province of Quebec I have never heard of such a thing, but I have heard of such things in Ontario, and I can say that the complaint does not apply exclusively to one side.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not wish to cast reflections on either one side or the other, but, whether regarded from a Liberal or a Conservative standpoint, the position I take is in the interest of the dignity of the bench. I think that if we refer to the election trials, the dates upon which they were supposed to take place, and the judgments which have been rendered as well as the peculiar method in which they are rendered are sufficient to confirm my complaint of partisanship shown by judges on the bench.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would ask the Minister of Justice if any appointment has been made of a county court judge in the county of Grey, or if the junior judge has been promoted?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. None made.

Mr. OSLER. I think that, notwithstanding the explanation of the Minister of Justice this is the proper time to give us the explanation of this increase of nearly $1,500. It is not wise to leave it until some other department or some other item is under discussion. We should have the details now.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am quite ready to give the information. In the first place there is the promotion of a 1st class clerk, Mr. Gisborne, to a chief clerkship.

Mr. OSLER. Where was he before?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. He had been in the department ten or twelve years. He certainly deserved promotion. The statutory increases of $50 each have been given to three 1st class clerks, Mr. Chisholm, Mr. Narraway and Mr. Clarke. Statutory increases of $50 each are given to four 2nd class clerks, Messrs. Mullen, Burpee, Verret and Harris. A similar increase of $50 is given to one junior 2nd class clerk and $30 to each of two messengers. Then we have added to the department Mr. Creighton who was removed from the accountantship of the Kingston penitentiary and brought here not being replaced at Kingston.

Mr. TAYLOR, I believe there are seven 1st class clerks in the Department of Justice and only three of them allowed statutory increases. Why is that?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Every clerk in the Department of Justice who is entitled to a statutory increase has received it. The others referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) have reached the maximum of their class, and of course, they can not be given increases.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if there has not been some delay in the appointment of a county court judge in the province of Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman explain what it was?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is the case of the appointment to the vacancy created by the promotion of Mr. Justice Prendergast from the county court bench to the Superior Court.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I knew that there was a vacancy, and that it has continued for some time. I would like to know during what time it continued, and what was the reason why the position was left vacant so long.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I cannot give just the period of time, but I think it must have been almost a year. During that time the duties of the offices were performed by another county court judge who appeared to be in a position to fill the duties satisfactorily, and so the appointment was not made for some time.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That seems a rather remarkable reason. I suppose that judge is as able now to perform his duties as he was before. If the reason is of any value, it would be a good reason for not making the appointment at all. Is there any political reason ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not that I know of.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then my hon. friend ought to have an assistant. He is evidently not able to discharge the duties of his office. Now, it has been openly charged in the west that this vacancy has remained unfilled for the reason that the gentleman who was slated for the position held a constituency which was doubtful, and this government colluded with the opposition in Manitoba to keep this appointment open and let the public interest suffer for the mere purpose of obliging the Liberal opposition in the province of Manitoba. I see no reason why we should not accept that explanation, unless the Minister of Justice can give us some better reason for his inaction than he has yet given us. There is a vacancy in the office of the county court judge and the vacancy stands for a year. We ask the Minister of Justice for an explanation, and the only thing he can say is that some other judge of a county court was able to perform the duties of the judge who had been elevated to the superior court. Well, surely this government don't want to place themselves in a position of that kind before the country. I trust before the item passes my hon. friend will try—I know it is a big effort—but at least that he will try to give the House and the country some better explanation than he has given up to the present time. We know pretty well what the real reason is, but will he not exert himself and try to put forward some plausible reason, at least ? He has not given any plausible reason so far, and for the sake of the Department of Justice, for the sake of the traditions of that office, I would like my hon. friend to make one more effort.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am afraid I cannot accommodate my hon. friend. He says he knows the real reason and he asks me to give a plausible one. I do not think I can accede to that request.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Perhaps I can throw a little light on the subject.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Thank you.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I hardly think the Minister of Justice is quite frank when he states there was no political reason. I happen to live in the town and in the constituency where the gentleman who has been appointed to this vacant judgeship resides, and it is a well-known fact that it was political exigencies alone which caused that vacancy to remain so long unfilled. Now, I have a question on the Order paper which the Minister of Justice will have an opportunity of answering. I think it was on the 21st of last February, 1902, that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviére) asked the question in this House when the vacancy caused by the promotion of Judge Prendergast to the superior court bench, would be filled; the reply of the Minister of Justice was 'in the immediate future.' Some six weeks after that I asked a somewhat similar question, and the Minister of Justice replied, 'Forthwith, immediately at the close of the session.' Now we have waited anxiously for this vacancy to be filled; and I may just say that the Minister of Justice is hardly seized of all the facts when he states that the judge for whom assistance was required had made no complaint, because that same gentleman, Judge Walker, of Winnipeg, had given an interview to a reporter of a Winnipeg paper stating that he was overworked and actually could not take his holidays. We know that case after case, upwards of a dozen cases, went from one court to another because he was unable to handle them without some assistance. This interview appeared in the Winnipeg paper last fall. Now I will give the reason why this vacancy has not been filled. Mr. Myers, who has been appointed to the position, is a fellow townsman of my own. He had the promise of the position in his pocket since last summer, all his political friends knew that he had been slated for it, he has openly expressed himself in that direction. I do not blame the Minister of Justice, for I know he acted upon the advice given him by the Minister of the Interior, who states that he is going to look after western interests, and who undoubtedly did exercise his influence in order to have that vacancy remain open for Mr. Myers until it was impossible for the vacancy in the local constituency to be filled before the last session of the local legislature. Now, Mr. Myers did not receive his appointment until the beginning of the year, and this rendered it impossible for the local government to have the by-election to fill that vacancy before this last session. So that by the action of the Minister of Justice the administration of justice has been clogged in that province. As I said before, case after case has gone over to the succeeding court; and not only that, but the people of the constituency of Minnedosa have been disfranchised, have not had the privilege of being represented in the local legislature during last session. Here is a local constituency unrepresented simply because the Minister of Justice has not filled that position last summer by the very gentleman who was slated to fill it, and he has been kept in that position until the beginning of this year, when it was too late to have the by-election, knowing that he could not possibly be succeeded by a gentleman on his own side of politics. This, I think, is the true reason, and the Minister of the Interior is fully cognizant of it, if the Minister of Justice is not.

Mr. BENNETT. Since my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Roche) has given the information relative to the appointment that was delayed and has at last been made in that county, perhaps it would be well to let the House know how it came about that Mr. Holt was appointed in the county of Huron, because apparently the Minister of Justice is kept in the dark as to all the facts. I say it is unfair to the Minister of Justice, because he has a high reputation as a barrister, he has a high standing at the bar, and it is rather hard for that hon. gentleman that, on the threshold of making a great career for himself, as Minister of Justice of this country, party exigencies have to be considered on every possible occasion. The Minister of Justice stated with a certain amount of definiteness, when the hon. member for Marquette asked the question last year, that the position would be filled at once. Well, why was not the appointment made? It is plainly evident that it was delayed for one reason, and that was to meet the party exigencies of his Liberal friends in the province of Manitoba. Now let me tell the Minister of Justice the reason which caused that well-known principle of making legal appointments to be broken into in the county of Huron, although perhaps the minister may have had a hint of it. But the minister, of course, had to keep his eyes closed to a certain extent on that question. Now these are the facts of the case: There was a Mr. Cameron asking for the nomination to the local legislature. Mr. Cameron was very anxious to receive it; and at the same time Mr. Holt was very desirous of the nomination, and popular favour was directed towards Mr. Holt. But Mr. Cameron had a lot of facts in his possession, particularly facts in reference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Was he not the Mr. Cameron who had helped to stifle the Cook investigation? Was he not the Mr. Cameron who had all the facts of that case, and was he not the Mr. Cameron who had taken the government by the throat and told them, here and at Toronto, that unless the Liberal nomination were given to him in West Huron all the facts were to be disclosed in relation to that Cook investigation? Perhaps the Minister of Justice may have heard of this. If he did not hear of it, it was well known, not only in the county of Huron, but throughout western Ontario. The fact is, that the Minister of Justice, if he intends to make a reputation for himself, in that high office, has got to assert himself. Let him put these party exigencies to one side, and let him assert himself. He will be called upon, and no doubt he is being called upon to-day in the county of York, and why?—because the junior county court judge, Judge Morgan, is aspiring to the senior judgeship. It is a notorious fact that Judge Morgan has been in the political field in the interest of the Hon. Mr. Davis and that there has been a departure altogether from the way in which a judge should act because he has been doing work for the Liberal party that certainly should never have been done by a judge. He has brought the judiciary of the county into disrepute by the course which he has pursued. We have seen the spectacle, because I was in the county myself, of a statement being made by Judge Morgan in the endeavour to bolster up and help the cause of the Liberal party in the local legislature, which has been used on every platform in the riding, and we have seen the spectacle further of the candidate on the Conservative side declaring that that statement was a tissue of falsehoods and daring the judge to come on any platform and defend it. Yet, party exigencies are behind the Minister of Justice in the endeavour to force his hand and to secure the appointment of Judge Morgan to this position. I hope for the honour of the judiciary of this country that the Minister of Justice will rise above party exigencies in the county of York in making the appointment of a senior judge.

Mr. BOYD. Before that item is passed I really think the hon. Minister of Justice should give some better explanation to the committee than he has given regarding the delay in making the appointment in Manitoba. I do not mind saying to the hon. Minister of Justice that the position he occupies in the eyes of the people of Manitoba, owing to his connection with this case, is not one that he should be proud of. I feel that he has been compelled by his political friends in this House to refrain from doing justice in regard to the appointment that has been complained of here to-day. Mr. Chairman, if we are to rely on anything in this country, must we not rely on the statement which the ministers of the Crown make on the floor of this House? If we cannot believe the statements that are given to us by ministers of the Crown in answer to questions across the floor of the House what can we believe? On two occasions the hon. Minister of Justice stated, and I believe at the time he made that statement he thought he was stating the fact, that the appointment was to be made immediately, but, it is held off to within a few weeks of the meeting of the legislature in Manitoba, until it was impossible to hold an election in the county of Minnedosa and for the reason which has been given by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) the county of Minnedosa was not represented in the legislature of Manitoba during the session just closing to-day. I would ask the honest members at the back of the government if they approve of using the judiciary of this country as a political machine to further the political interests of the party in different parts of the country. If any hon. gentleman on the government side of the House, or any member of the government, will stand up and defend the action of the government in this matter I would be very pleased to hear him do so and the people of Manitoba will be pleased to hear an explanation from the government and especially from the hon. Minister of Justice who stands very high in his own party. I look upon him as a young man who is bound to make a reputation for himself in this country but, it will not be by such explanations as the one that he has lent himself to and which he has given to the committee this afternoon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. Minister of Justice, perhaps, would like to have his memory refreshed as to what he really did say on this subject last year. There was a previous reference which I have not been able to find, but on the 6th of May, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) said :

I believe there is a vacancy at present on the bench of Manitoba caused by the elevation of Judge Prendergast to the Supreme Court bench of the North-west Territories. I think about six weeks ago the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) asked the Minister of Justice if it was the intention of the government to fill that position, and the minister replied that it was the intention to fill that position forthwith. I would ask if the vacancy has been filled, and if not, is it the intention to have it filled at once ?

MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes. It is the intention to fill it in the immediate future.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Forthwith ?

MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Practically. I want to wait until the session is over to be able to give the matter a little more consideration.

The session concluded about the 23rd of May and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice did not make the appointment until—how long ago ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The 3rd January.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the statement made to the committee, which has not been contradicted by the hon. Minister of Justice, is correct, if cases have been standing over in the county court and if the county court judge who has been performing these duties has been complaining that the public business of the country is being prejudiced surely we want something more from the hon. Minister of Justice than we have had already. There have been suggestions made throughout the country that this government has been willing on more than one occasion to deal with questions appertaining to the administration of justice for purposes of political expediency and this is one of the worst examples we have had of it. The Minister of Justice is not able to say one word in his defence. Surely he does not pretend that it has taken a whole year to select Mr. Myers for the position. It has been stated by the hon. member for Marquette, and the Minister of Justice has not contradicted him, that it has been well understood in Manitoba for nearly a year that Mr. Myers was to be appointed to the position and it has also been well understoood that Mr. Myers was not appointed because it was not desirable in the interests of the Liberal party that that particular constituency should be opened. Now, if that charge is correct, and the Minister of Justice has not denied it, I say it is a most disgraceful incident that an appointment to the judiciary should be delayed for months, for nearly a year, in order that a particular constituency might not change its political allegiance, in order that the constituency of Minnedosa might be nominally represented by Mr. Myers and might remain disfranchised during the present session of the legislature of Manitoba. Surely my hon. friend the Minister of Justice had better let this item stand until the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) comes in and gives us an explanation of it. The Minister of Justice does not seem to be able to say very much. Perhaps the hon. Minister of the Interior will tell us something about it. I should think that we ought to have some better explanation of what has taken place, or rather of what has not taken place, before the item is allowed to pass.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The statement as to the inconvenience occasioned to the business of the court because of that vacancy is not absolutely in accordance with the facts as I have them in the Department of Justice. Of course, I make this statement subject to the better information of the hon. member for Marquette who has been on the ground, but I may say to him that Judge Prudhomme was appointed for the purpose of assisting Mr. Justice Walker and I have never, so far as the Department of Justice is concerned, received a single word of complaint in respect to the administration of justice there. If Mr. Justice Walker had any complaint to make it seems to me that the proper course would have been to make it to the Department of Justice and not through interviews in the newspapers. In respect to the delay in making the appointment, I quite admit that when I made the statement here to the House last year my expectation was that the appointment would be made at a much earlier date. I can assure the House, and I am sure that the statement which I will make will be accepted in good spirit; that I know absolutely nothing about Mr. Myers being connected with the constituency of Marquette. I knew he was a member of the Local House but it never occurred to my mind that there was any political consideration in connection with the matter. I may say that I had in my mind another gentleman for the position. There were other names suggested of course, but so far as I was personally concerned I had the name of another gentleman in my mind. My hon. friend Mr. Roche, Marquette), must bear in mind that my knowledge of the bar of the provinces outside of Quebec, must of necessity be extremely limited, and when it comes to the selection of a man to occupy the important position of judge it is necessary for me to get information as to the qualification of the person to be appointed. It seems to me that out of necessity I am in that case limited to a large extent to the opinion of the members of the cabinet who represent the different provinces. If a colleague of mine from a particular province makes a suggestion to me, and if after investigation I find that the gentleman whose name has been suggested is worthy, I have not much else to do than to make the appointment. If his qualifications are such as in my judgment entitle him to the position, then I think the discretion of my colleagues should be exercised as regards the selection. My hon. friends have complained a great deal about the delay. The political history of this country so far as the criticism of the government is concerned seems to begin in 1896 with the hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not want to go back into ancient history. I have no reason to complain so far as I am personally concerned of the tone of the debate, or of the manner in which I have been treated, but at the same time I would remind the hon. gentlemen opposite of the delay connected with the appointment of Mr. Masson to the county court judgeship of Huron, and the circumstances under which the appointment was made. I repeat that I do not want to travel over the records, nor do I wish to apply the tu quoque argument, because I think the tu quoque argument is a very poor one indeed. However, my hon. friend (Mr. Roche) has got all the facts. If I have been remiss in the performance of my duty, I must bear the odium. I do not ask the Minister of the Interior or any other minister to defend me if I make a mistake. I have to take the responsibility for my own acts and no matter on whose suggestion I acted I am responsible for what I have done and I do not ask anybody to defend me. I will rely on the defence which I am able to put before the House, but I prefer to rely on a very broken reed so long as it is my own reed, rather than to lean on a heavier prop supplied by somebody else.

Mr. BENNETT. The Minister of Justice was unfortunate in mentioning the case of Mr. Masson. The facts in connection with Mr. Masson's appointment were that certain legislation was enacted by the Ontario government which would have debarred Mr. Masson from receiving his appointment, but since these hon. gentlemen themselves came into power they have repealed that very legislation, and the evil complained of that there were too many junior judges in the province of Ontario was immediately accentuated by this very government with the result that they were able to fill up a number of junior judgeships.

Mr. HOLMES. The insinuation thrown out by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) concerning the appointment of Mr. Holt is entirely unfounded, and is purely a matter of imagination on the part of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett). If his facts on other matters are not more reliable than in the present case, there is not very much reliance to be placed on his statements. The hon. gentleman said that it was common rumour in the province of Ontario—

Mr. BENNETT. Common rumour is as good as your word.

Mr. HOLMES. As a matter of fact it was not common rumour in the province of Ontario. Mr. M. C. Cameron was brought out by the largest convention ever held in the county. Mr. Holt was never a candidate in the county of Huron. He expressed a desire not to be a candidate. His name had been mentioned but Mr. Holt determined a number of years ago that he would not be a candidate under any circumstances, and so his name was not mentioned at the convention because the people knew perfectly well that he would not accept the nomination. If Mr. Cameron was in possession of the facts, as the hon. member for East Simcoe said, how comes it that our Conservative friends did not elicit the facts from him when he was in the city of Ottawa. They apparently allowed that opportunity to pass. At all events the statement made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that this was a matter of bargain and sale, is altogether a gratuitous insult.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Another distinction between the case of Mr. Masson and the case of Mr. Myers is to be found in the fact that in the former case we have the definite promise of the Minister of Justice last session that there would be an immediate appointment, and in the other case there was no such promise. The Minister of Justice has given no valid reason to-day why that promise was not fulfilled. I have supplied the reason, and that reason he cannot controvert. He says that he had another gentleman in his mind and I have no doubt that the other gentleman that he had in his mind was Mr. Royal of St. Boniface who openly stated that he had the promise of this position. When Mr. Myers heard this he took a hurry trip to the city of Winnipeg, saw some of his leading political friends, read the Riot Act to them, and had political pressure brought to bear on the government of the day so that he was promised that after the mid-summer vacation, which would be in the month of September, he would get the appointment. In the meantime some of these political friends had a little conversation together and had come to the conclusion that it would not be discreet to open the constituency of Minnedosa and Mr. Myers was therefore asked to do without this position until the beginning of the year when it would be too late to have a local election. He did so. This he stated openly as the reason, and in the meantime he made his business arrangements in order that he might accept this judgeship at the beginning of the year. The facts, as I have stated them, with reference to Judge Walker being overworked are undeniable. I do not know what facts the Minister of Justice has in his possession, nor am I going to discuss the propriety of Judge Walker giving an interview in the press. Such an interview appears to have been given, not voluntarily on his part, but at any rate it was clear that case after case was going over from one court to another, and he stated in his interview that it was a physical impossibility for him to get through the cases unassisted as he was. As a result he could not take his holidays and there is no doubt that he was overworked. Any person who lives in Winnipeg or in the province of Manitoba knows that what I am saying in this regard is absolutely true. Now, Sir, this is a most pernicious system. If there is any department of the government that should be kept free from political influences to as great an extent as possible, it is the Department of Justice. It is unfortunate that people who are engaged in cases before the court must have their cases held over from month to month at great expense and inconvenience, simply in order to suit the political exigencies of the government of the day. There is no reason to be seen, nor has any reason been given, why this vacancy was left unfilled for one year, except it be to suit the purposes of the local Liberal party in the province of Manitoba.

Civil government—Department of Militia and Defence—Salaries including A. O. Lambert at $800, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $48,300 ; contingencies, $10,000.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Sir Frederick Borden). I desire to move to reduce this item by $2,000, owing to the fact that since these estimates were made up there has been a chief clerk superannuated. There are statutory increases in this item which amount to $1,490. These are the ordinary statutory increases except in two cases where there have been promotions from one class to the other, and in the third case, that of Mr. A. O. Lambert the increase is $100 instead of $50, because he had been brought to my notice as a very deserving clerk who was receiving only $700 a year. There is an increase of $1,000 in contingencies and it will be in future necessary to take this vote particularly with reference to the increased printing and stationery. I move that the amount of $48,300 be reduced to $46,300.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who was the first class clerk who was superannuated ? Why was he superannuated, and what was his age ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Mr. Benjamin Sulte was superannuated ; his age I think was 62 years ; he had served 35 years or over and he wished to retire on account of ill health.

Mr. TAYLOR. Did Mr. Lambert pass the Civil Service examination ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, but we are increasing his salary $100 instead of $50 and it is necessary to insert that provision in the item.

Mr. INGRAM. Does this item include travelling expenses for the minister ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. I notice that $1,000 was spent last year. I might draw the attention of the members of the government to the fact that there are a few sinners left yet. I remember when they used to find fault with these large items for cab-hire, but they still continue. Perhaps they can justify these items now. I see that the hon. Minister of Militia is down for $96. The Minister of Finance is also down for a handsome little sum.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I shall have great pleasure in explaining the items of my account. I had the misfortune, on the first day of the visit of the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York, to have my leg broken. I was very anxious to attend the different military functions later on, and I got out at the end of three weeks, at considerable risk, and, not being able to walk, I thought perhaps the country would not object to paying my cab-hire.

Mr. INGRAM. And I wish to say that I have no objection to ministers having a reasonable amount of cab-hire. I am simply reminding hon. gentlemen of some of their old arguments.

Department of the Secretary of State, $47,940.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The increases are all statutory with the exception of the increase to Mr. Baker, for whom the Secretary of State recommends an increase of $100. The contingencies are somewhat increased, owing to an additional amount for printing and stationery, due to the fact that the work of the department in connection with the issue of patents has greatly increased, though the number of employees has not increased and the expenditure has increased only to a very slight degree.

Mr. WILSON. How long has Mr. Baker been in the service, and what is the reason he is given this $100 increase ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Secretary of State has given me a memorandum in which he states that the only change in the salaries beyond the statutory increases in the case of ten clerks is an extra $50 to Mr. Baker, who besides being a third-class clerk, is an important shorthand writer, and as such often remains at work till six o'clock and sometimes later.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand the hon. minister to say that the increase of the contingencies is due to printing and stationery. I observe that last year the expenditure for stationery increased $500, while that for sundries increased $1,400. I suppose that is for sealing wax, stamps, etc.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Probably some increase would be justifiable even for sealing wax, according to the figures furnished me by the head of the department. For instance, in 1896, there were 11,071 letters received, while last year there were 29,000. So that if a reasonable portion of the increase should go to sealing wax, it would probably be wisely employed, because it is well to seal these government letters. This is really becoming a self-sustaining department, because the memorandum shows that the receipts of the office, which, in 1896 amounted to $8,776, last year amounted to $35,800, and for the current fiscal year, up to the end of February, $31,000. All this shows that there is a much larger amount of business being done by the department, and the increase of expenditure is small in proportion to the increase of revenue.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery, $40,840.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Secretary of State informs me that there is practically no change in the salaries of this department, though the item seems to show an increase. The explanation is that three clerks, whose salaries were hitherto paid out of the vote for the House of Commons staff, have been transferred to the Printing Bureau, in accordance with a recommendation made by a committee of the House, who thought that these gentlemen were more properly connected with the Printing Bureau than with the House.

Mr. WILSON. Explain the $800 for Mr. Foran.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Foran is the housekeeper of the Printing Bureau, and his salary has been increased from $700 to $800.

Office of the Comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, $12,550.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no increase except the statutory increases.

Civil government—office of the auditor general—salaries, $33,562.50 ; contingencies, $10,000.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This represents the usual statutory increases and also some increases in contingencies which the Auditor General thinks have been made necessary by the growing business of the department.

Civil government — Department of Finance and Treasury Board salaries—The salaries of the staff of the department may be readjusted and appointments made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $52,340.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am asking the House to give me the same privilege which they gave me several years ago with very excellent results; and I can assure hon. members that I shall be as anxious to administer the vote this time as I did before. Lest there should be any misunderstanding, I may say that I have not in my department a single clerk who has not passed the civil service examination. There are a couple of messengers who have not passed that examination. Under the liberty given me before, I employed one or two persons temporarily until the next civil service examination, but required them to pass that examination, which they did. I am endeavouring to readjust the service of the department by putting in a number of young men to fill the places of officers who have been removed either by death or superannuation. It is an advantage sometimes to give some of these young men a little more than the Civil Service Act will allow. Not long ago, we had no bridge between the $400 of a temporary clerk and the $1,100 minimum of a second class clerk. We created one bridge by making the third class or junior second class clerks. But all you can give a junior second class clerk when he begins is $600. Sometimes you can get a particularly good man who is not prepared to go in for $600, but you might get him for $700 or $800. If he cannot be got in this way you will be obliged to appoint him as second class clerk at $1,100. I may mention another case as an illustration. I desired to have in my service a gentleman who had had experience in banking and, naturally, I looked to the banking field for the person. I found a man who had many years experience in the chartered banks. But, of course, he had not a civil service certificate.

Mr. WILSON. How old was he ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Thirty-five or forty—he went into the chartered bank service as a boy. Under the Civil Service Act he could not be appointed for he had passed the age allowed by that Act. But, it will be admitted, that a man with that experience would be admirably qualified for the appointment. That gentleman was appointed, but he has since retired because he found better employment outside. I may wish to renew that same class of appointment, and if I could find a gentleman who had had many years experience in a chartered bank that fact of itself would be ample guarantee of his qualification. But such a vote as this would be necessary to enable me to employ him. I assure the House that it is not my desire, except in some special case, to appoint anybody who has not passed the civil service examination. I value the examination, and my desire is to adhere to it very closely. If the House is good enough to allow me to have the vote in the form in which it is put here, as it did once before, the vote will be administered in the same spirit, and, I am confident with the same result.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This is practically a repeal of the Civil Service Act.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. As respects this department and temporarily. My hon. friend was not present when I began my explanation—

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But I am sure I have heard some things as good in previous years, because they are the same every year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I have not had this every year.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I should be glad to hear something new.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) needs it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On this point I certainly do. For this thing goes on year after year in the same way.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, not in my department.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) Why, we have it in every department every year. The hon. gentleman knows it. Take up the estimates any year during the past five or six years, and you see in the votes for practically every department this same provision, 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' I have brought this to the attention of the government time and time again. It is a most irregular proceeding. The effect of it is that one branch of the legislature repeals an Act of Parliament. For the Senate cannot deal with this provision in the estimates—they must either reject or accept them in their entirety. And so, year after year this branch of the legislature repeals the Civil Service Act. Surely my hon. friend the Minister of Finance can devise some better system. There may be something very new or valuable in the first part of his explanation which I missed. I shall read it with a great deal of care. I must say that I have great doubt that I shall find in it sufficient reason for following in this case the example of other years. I wish to enter my protest against this provision, subject to having my opinion altered by reading what my hon. friend has said.

Civil government—Department of Finance and Treasury Board—contingencies notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $8,510.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, why does this also apply to contingencies ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That point I did not explain, and my hon. friend has not missed anything with regard to it. Temporary clerks and messengers are paid out of this contingent fund. They do not go on the ordinary civil service list. There are two young ladies who have hitherto been employed in another branch of the service who are to be employed in the Department of Finance as stenographers. Their salaries are something less than $900. That is the chief item in this vote.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why must they be removed from the operation of the Civil Service Act ? Why do we need to repeal the Civil Service Act with regard to them. I may be very dense but I confess I do not understand that point so far.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The necessity for this provision here arises from the case of the two messengers to whom I referred who have not civil service certificates. I do not think that it is so important in the case of a messenger as it is in the case of a clerk, and these men are thoroughly capable messengers. The provision is not for the young ladies, both of whom have certificates.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And, so far as the young ladies are concerned the Civil Service Act may remain ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, this covers the case of two messengers who have passed the age limit provided for by the Civil Service Act. They have been in the department for a number of years and are eminently fitted for the position.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then, I do not see why the hon. gentleman introduced the young ladies at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not wish to introduce the young ladies to my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax).

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am obliged to my hon. friend, but I think that after being in his department they can stand almost anything.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand that only those messengers who have passed the civil service examination are entered in the regular list and have their salaries paid out of the salaries vote, but these others must be paid out of contingencies ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Temporary clerks are paid out of contingency fund. The only persons in my department who have not civil service certificates are two messengers who have been there for several years.

Mr. WILSON. That applies to all departments ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot answer for all departments, but it applies to mine.

Department of Inland Revenue—salaries, $37,460.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I must congratulate the Minister of Inland Revenue. I think he is the only one of the ministers who gets along without violating the Civil Service Act. There is an increase of $2,000. Perhaps he will be good enough to explain that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That increase is made up of the following items: Statutory increases, 5 first-class clerks at $50; the names are: J. F. Shaw, J. A. Doyon, T. Westman, Geo. Fowler, R. Quain; 5 second-class clerks at $50 each; the names are: L. E. Hudon, P. A. Hughes, A. McCullough, W. A. Halliday, R. E. Bonchette; 5 second-class juniors at $50, $250; L. G. Roy, B. Chevrier, E. M. Lawless, B. Hagerty, E. Charbonneau; 2 messengers, R. P. Yetts and Napoleon Potvin, one at $20 and the other at $30. In my estimates for next year I propose to ask parliament for two additional second-class juniors. For many years back we have been in the habit of employing what they call temporary clerks. I have two or three in the department who have received salaries under other heads, and I propose to ask for $1,200 more in order to place the salaries of these two second-class juniors at $600 a year, according to the Civil Service Act. In regard to contingencies, there is a decrease of $300; I suppose the hon. gentleman will not blame me for that.

Mr. BENNETT. Last year I asked the Minister of Inland Revenue a question with reference to the purchase of wood alcohol by his department. May I now ask the minister to explain in detail what is the principle of the purchase of this so-called article, wood alcohol.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Some five years ago a contract was entered into with the Standard Chemical Company for the supply of wood alcohol for the department. That contract is still running, and will expire, if I am not mistaken, in July next.

Mr. BENNETT. In order to aid the minister to give the desired information, I will place a few facts before him. In the township of Rama, which is situated in the county of Ontario, there is a concern owned by this Standard Chemical Company, and I find on reference to the Auditor General's Report last year that no less a sum than $22,605 worth of this article was purchased by the department from this company. I am not surprised at the statement made by the minister that a long contract was made with this company. Perhaps before the matter closes the minister will explain the nature of that contract. It is a contract of considerable importance in view of the large sums of money paid by the government to that company. Perhaps the minister knows that the owners of this concern are very prominent Liberals, and in a recent election in that riding the owners of this concern exerted themselves vigorously on behalf of the government candidate. Let me read for the benefit of the minister a statement made by one of the officials of this company, which appeared in the 'Globe' newspaper of March 3rd:

He desired to start his present business before the change of government. He wanted a little help, and went to Ottawa thinking that as an old Conservative he would have little difficulty in his lobbying. He found it impossible to even see several of the ministers on whom he called, and he came away quite disheartened. After the change of government he went down again. He had no difficulty in seeing the ministers, received a fair and business-like hearing, and he found that when the ministers were shown a reasonable proposition and one that was likely to be of benefit to the country, they would assist it. Assistance was promised him, and the result was the establishment of his business in five Canadian towns, and the expense of several millions of dollars. He did not know that the industry would have been started if there had not been a change of government. He thought the government were an honest government, and that the prosperity of the present time was largely due to them. Some manufacturers were complaining that they wanted a higher tariff. This, he thought, was something of a joke. The government would be wise to make no change until they saw some person losing money or going to smash.

Now this statement is made by one of the stockholders of this company, and it is quite plain that having, as he has, the contract with the government, on fair terms, his company are quite satisfied with the tariff. Now, what is the position ? One of the leading members of this company is Mr. Tudhope, the Liberal member in the local legislature for East Simcoe. As this gentleman, Mr. Peuchen, stated, he found it impossible to make terms with the former government for the manufacture of wood alcohol; but when he came down here, the other gentlemen associated with him being good Liberals, he found no trouble whatever in making terms with the government for the production of this article. I find in the answer given by the minister last session, that he stated :

I understand that the price was fixed by the department. The department is entirely free to buy where it pleases.

Now, it is a most extraordinary state of affairs that here a number of gentlemen have applied to the former administration, and on the terms they were proposing were unable to make a contract, but with the new government they very easily made a contract. These good Liberals come down here and by reason of their influence—and a very powerful influence they no doubt had, which they exerted to the utmost—they are able to make a contract with the government without tender, without any public competition, practically fixing between themselves and the minister the price of this article; and if report is correct, the profits on this business are something enormous. What does the minister propose to do with Mr. Smith, and Mr. Jones, if they start a business ? Are they going to have competition with this company, or is this company to have a monopoly of the business ? It is one of those cases that we find going on all over the Dominion to-day. Here are a few favoured Liberals who come into the field, and without any tender, not in the open market at all, as should be the case when public money is being disbursed, these gentlemen are practically given their own price, and the result is that they secure an enormous sale of over $22,000 worth of their product last year to the department. What do they do in return ? Well, the figures of the last contest answer. In this neighbourhood, at the time of a general election, or at all events of a prior election, the powerful influence of this company went for nothing; but now since they are backed up and buttressed by this government, the result is that, with the aid of this bounty, or subsidy, or whatever you may call it, they succeed in increasing the Liberal vote in that vicinity by 100, in round numbers. Then the Postmaster General comes back and says it is a great triumph for a lower rate of protection. One of the greatest changes in the whole riding of North Ontario was made in this very district where a company of friends of the government are paid a handsome subsidy, and where pressure was brought—because there has been pressure brought—of course it is fair to the minister to state that at the time he was not the head of the department. But I think it is fair to the House and to the country to explain how it was possible that, without any competition, the government should give to a party of their friends a contract which enures to the benefit to the tune of over $22,000 in a single year. I think the matter is one for fair discussion and comment; and I ask the minister now to explain what is done with all this wood alcohol, and what is its selling price after it is purchased by the department ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If the hon. gentleman had thought proper to wait until we reached the item which concerns that article, I would have been in a better position to satisfy him with the information he desires to get. I have stated that a contract was made with the Rathbun Company and the Standard Chemical Company about five years ago by which the government was to buy from these firms the wood alcohol needed for the manufacture of methylated spirits. The price agreed upon, if I am not mistaken, was $1.40, with the condition that if the company could not supply the quantity required the department would be at liberty to buy the same article in the United States or elsewhere. The contract has been running since 1898 ; and I am surprised to hear to-day that the Standard Chemical Company, or some members of it, took an active part in the last election campaign. By-elections have taken place, and general elections have taken place since the contract was made, and these gentlemen who are said to have exerted great influence in that section of the country in the last election, do not seem to have exerted the same influence in elections in days gone by. I presume my hon. friend will not hold me responsible for any change of opinion that may have taken place in North Ontario, any more than I would hold him responsible for the persistence of opinion in the province of Quebec. But if my hon. friend desires to have more information with regard to that matter, I advise him to wait until we reach that item later on in the estimates, when I will be glad to give him all the information I have in the department. I may add that under this contract the department purchases every year from the above companies wood alcohol to the value of about $20,000. At the time that contract was made there was no other concern in Canada in a position to supply the government with wood alcohol, except the Rathbun Company at Deseronto, which, I understand, was afterwards merged with the Standard Chemical Company. That explains how it is that this contract was given to the combined companies.

Mr. BENNETT. Now that the minister has thrown a little light on the subject we understand why this company exerted their influence. Some two years ago, I understand, the company did not interfere in the same manner in which they did on this last occasion. According to the 'Globe,' the Postmaster General was present at that meeting, which was addressed by other members of the company, and perhaps the fact that the contract would expire next year might not be renewed on similar terms, was an inducement to that company to act in the way they did, pitching into the fight and muzzling their men as they did on that occasion. Of course the minister is not aware of that. But the fact remains that here is the department making a contract with party friends, without public tender, without public competition at all, a contract for a five years' term; and it is a well-known fact in the neighbourhood that the undertaking has been a very profitable one to those gentlemen. And the fact that the term is about to expire, and that the company were looking for a renewal of the contract will probably explain why they put the screws on as they did in this last election, and brought about such a change of the vote in North Ontario. There was no change in any other district of the county to the same extent, and I think it is reasonable to conclude that the change was owing to the active influence of this company, bonused, or subsidized, or subventioned, or whatever you may term it, by the government.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How is the price ascertained ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I understand that the price agreed upon was exactly the same that we had to pay when we imported the article from Germany. There is almost a prohibitory duty on the same article imported from the United States, $2.50, I think. When the contract was made, that was the only concern in a position to supply wood alcohol.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do I understand that $1.40 is the price at which a similar article could be imported from Germany without paying the duty ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am informed that before the contract was awarded a contract was entered into with a Montreal firm who used to import the same article from France and Germany, and who sold it at $1.40. The same price which we pay to the Standard Chemical Company.

Mr. BLAIN. Is it the intention of the government to ask for tenders at the expiration of this contract ? I think some notice should be given to the public so that other parties may have an opportunity of making offers for the supply of this article.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The department has not yet taken any action as respects that matter. I presume before the session closes we will ask for tenders, but the department has not yet concluded what course to adopt.

Mr. BLAIN. Has there been any correspondence with the company with respect to a renewal of that contract ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Has the manager of the company interviewed the government on that point ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, not to my knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT. I think it is very odd that when one of the gentlemen, in fact, the very gentleman who made that speech was here in the city, in view of the fact that the contract is about to expire and that he must, of course, sooner or later, see the minister about it, he did not call upon the minister.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He called upon me.

Mr. BENNETT. So that the question of renewal went without discussion.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. BENNETT. He must have come down to report the good work he had done at the election.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He had to report to some other people perhaps.

Mr. BENNETT. I think it would be unfair to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that he should have to shoulder this contract, because, when it was made, he was not the Minister of Inland Revenue. The gentleman who apparently took to himself the credit at this public meeting at Longford was the hon. Postmaster General who, according to the report of the Toronto 'Globe' :

> Recalled the interviews he had had with Mr. Peuchen in reference to the establishment of this industry and the promise of the government to encourage it by traffic regulations, and buy, after its establishment, part of the product of wood alcohol for the manufacture of methylated spirits. It was simply the duty of the government to give Mr. Peuchen a fair hearing. They desired no thanks for that, and any other gentleman with an equally good business scheme would be entitled to, and would, of course, receive as careful consideration from them. *

Does the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue echo these sentiments ? I presume he will, but in the first place, I want to know whether he is prepared to enter into a contract for the purchase of an article to the tune of $20,000 without competition. There was no competition when this contract was made, and yet the Postmaster General, with his usual modesty, at this public meeting at the works, took great credit to himself for having made the contract. I think it is fair for the committee to know, and I am going to ask the hon. minister for an answer, because I may not happen to be here when his estimates are taken up, as to whether the minister is prepared to give a similar contract to this company for five years without any competition when the present contract expires ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I may say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) that I have waited, and I will wait two or three months till the expiration of the contract before doing any thing in the matter. I have been informed that some other people want to start a similar business in another part of the Dominion, and if there are other people engaged in the same line of business I will do what we have done in regard to the distillers—buy our supply according to the production of each of these concerns.

Mr. BENNETT. That will be a very encouraging reply to give to gentlemen who wish to engage in this business. It is quite as vague as the promises made by the government to the manufacturers of this country. The hon. minister states that he will wait until the contract expires and then pronounce his ultimatum as to whether there are to be tenders called for and competition invited in the purchase of this article. How does the hon. minister expect that any person else is going into the manufacture of this alcohol if he is not to know until the expiration of the contract what the minister's policy is ? Does not the hon. minister think that it is due to himself to state what his policy is, because, after all said and done, this $22,500 which is paid during the year to this company, is not the personal money of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. It is the money of the people of Canada. What does the hon. minister propose to do next year ? Is he going to buy this article from the company without any competition ? Would it not be better for him to say frankly, so that if any person else wishes to engage in the manufacture of wood alcohol he can at once invest in the necessary plant, that there will be competition in the purchase of this article ? Is the hon. minister prepared to go that far ? I have reason to believe there are other people who are anxious to engage in the sale of this article, but knowing the influence of these gentlemen who are behind this concern, they have reason to believe that if they had this article to sell they would not find a purchaser in the Inland Revenue Department, because the rule must prevail, as it has prevailed for the last five years, that the purchase of this article should be made from this company exclusively. Here we have the hon. Postmaster General stating that he had arranged with this concern, that they were to be encouraged and that their output was to be taken, or a part of it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I challenge the statement.

Mr. BENNETT. I will simply read for the benefit of the Postmaster General, as he was not in before, the statement made at the meeting at Longford, where these works are situated, as reported in the 'Globe' of March 3rd :

> Sir William recalled the interviews he had had with Mr. Peuchen in reference to the establishment of this industry and the promise of the government to encourage it by traffic regulations, and buy, after its establishment, part of the product of wood alcohol for the manufacture of methylated spirits.

Nothing more definite could be said than that.

> It was simply the duty of the government to give Mr. Peuchen a fair hearing——

Mr. Peuchen did not care for the fair hearing ; what he wanted to get was a standing contract that would guarantee him for five years the privilege of selling this article to the government. It stands on a par with the arrangement made by the government with the American Bank Note Company—first making a contract and then establishing the concern. Before this industry was established he made that arrangement with them. The department is bound down under a contract without competition, to take wood alcohol to the extent of $22,500 a year, and the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue goes farther ; he says that to-day he will not state publicly that he will purchase this article by open competition, but if there is another establishment doing business in Canada, he will see if he cannot do business with them. Surely it is unfair to use the public money in this manner, and the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue owes it to himself to state that no more contracts for the purchase of wood alcohol will be made without open tender in competition.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I quite recollect the interview I had with the gentleman who was engaged in promoting the industry some years ago and at the meeting in question I narrated as accurately as I could remember the events of the occasion. I stated that this gentleman and Mr. Thomson called upon me in Ottawa as a minister, though the matter was not in my department, and told me that this was a very important industry, that it had scarcely an existence in Canada then, and that it was entirely suitable to Canadian conditions. They showed me that out of raw material which we have in such lavish quantities in Canada, valuable products could be obtained. I was convinced of the usefulness of the enterprise and stated to them that it being so suitable to Canada, the industry was deserving of all reasonable encouragement. As to my saying to them that we were going to take the output, I suppose that mistake arose on account of the reporter having to condense the statement. Mr. Peuchen and Mr. Thompson spoke and they may have given their views to the press.

They may have said how they had been aided by the government in bringing their industry into existence, and if they stated that they stated what was perfectly right, proper and justifiable. They felt very grateful to us that we had given an intelligent hearing to their application. Mr. Peuchen told us that he at one time was a Conservative, that he came to Ottawa during the regime of the Conservative party, that he endeavoured to lay his case before them, that he did not even get a courteous hearing; that in fact a hearing was refused him. He said he went away having lost all sympathy for the Conservative party because of the treatment extended to him on his attempt to submit to them an industry entitled to fair consideration. That is what Mr. Peuchen stated publicly.

Mr. COCHRANE. What has that got to do with it?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He stated publicly that was the treatment accorded to the enterprise by the late government, and the very opposite treatment which was accorded by us is what has secured for us the good will of that enterprising concern that is now establishing these industries in Longford, Deseronto and Compton and perhaps other places, employing I do not know how many men and spending perhaps $150,000 or $200,000 a year amongst the people.

Mr. CLANCY. What was the nature of Mr. Peuchen's request?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not state that Mr. Peuchen made any request.

Mr. CLANCY. The Postmaster General said Mr. Peuchen had a hearing and that his request was granted. What was his request?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. When Mr. Peuchen spoke to me on the subject he laid before me in a general way the advantage to Canada of an enterprise such as he proposed to embark in. As to the particular form of encouragement to be given him, I do not remember what it was, nor as a matter of fact did I ever have occasion so far as I recollect to interest myself in the matter after that interview. I was impressed with the idea that it was an important enterprise especially adapted to Canada, and I am of the opinion still; but it did not happen to be necessary for him I suppose to enlist my active services because I have no recollection of ever having interviewed any minister on his behalf in any respect whatever. I gave him what sympathetic encouragement I could and if he had desired any assistance from me at a later stage, I would be pleased within proper limits to have extended it to him. My connection with the matter began and ended I think with the interview which I have alluded to.

Mr. BENNETT. As the Postmaster General was not in the House a while ago, I will read to him what Mr. Peuchen stated at that meeting. Mr. Peuchen does state in effect that his proposition was not received favourably by the Conservative administration and I can readily believe that. Here was a company coming to the Conservative administration and asking to have what is practically a monopoly of the manufacture of wood alcohol in this Dominion. Mr. Peuchen says that he asked for this monopoly and he was refused it by the Conservative government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He does not say that. He says he could not get an interview. He never asked for a monopoly.

Mr. BENNETT. I will read what he stated.

> He desired to start his present business before the change of government. He wanted a little help and went to Ottawa, thinking that as an old Conservative he would have little difficulty in his 'lobbying.' He found it impossible to even see several of the ministers upon whom he called and he came away quite disheartened.

It is plain that he wanted a little assistance as he puts it, and he thought some lobbying would do it, but what he desired was to get a hard and fast contract with the Department of Inland Revenue at that time for the sale of his product at his own price, and he tells us quite frankly that he could not get it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That he could not get an interview.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. minister need not be so facetious about a person not being able to see a cabinet minister. Why there are times when some of the ministers of the present day won't see one another; we had an exhibition of that yesterday. I have no doubt whatever that Mr. Peuchen found it impossible to make the bargain with the Conservative ministers which he made with the present Liberal ministers, because the arrangement which he wanted then and has now received was a preposterous arrangement. Mr. Peuchen says:

> After the change of government he went down again. He had no difficulty in seeing the ministers, received a fair and businesslike hearing, and he found that when the ministers were shown a reasonable proposition, and one that was likely to be a benefit to the country, they would assist it. Assistance was promised him and the result was the establishment of his business.

According to the Minister of Inland Revenue the assistance to be given was that this company was given a contract for the sale of their product. The Minister of Inland Revenue tells us that this Mr. Peuchen was here the other day and after Mr. Peuchen made quite a change in that constituency he comes down for his reward and the Minister of Inland Revenue tells us that his reward is to be that for the next five or ten years this company is to have a monopoly for the sale of this article. Does the Minister of Inland Revenue believe that in view of the approaching expiry of this contract, it is not a good business proposition to call at once for tenders for the sale of this alcohol. Is not that the proper way to conduct public business. The Minister of Inland Revenue knows well that it is, but apparently he is being held up by this company and has to give them the contract.

Mr. MACPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this wood alcohol. I am fairly well conversant with the prices which prevailed for this article prior to the present arrangement being made by the government. At one time the wholesale price of wood alcohol to the public was $2.25, but we are able to buy it now for $1.35. I may also say that the consumption of wood alcohol has increased possibly three times what it was before. The general public, at all events in the part of Canada I came from use wood alcohol in large quantities and this arrangement made by the government has reduced the price practically one-half to them. I think I am not going too far when I say that if the Minister of Inland Revenue was able to make arrangement whereby the price of wood alcohol was reduced by one-half, he is deserving of every commendation. So far as I am personally concerned, I have spent thousands of dollars in the purchase of wood spirits, and to-day I am able to buy for the same price nearly double the quantity that I bought formerly, and able to give the general public the benefit of this decreased price.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Postmaster General said that when Mr. Peuchen came down here and introduced himself, there was no other industry of the kind in Canada. Now, I wish to contradict that statement right here and now. Wood alcohol has been made at Deseronto by the Rathbun Co. for years, and they supplied the late Conservative government with it. When the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Hon. Mr. Costigan) was Minister of Inland Revenue, I went with Capt. Carter time and again to the department to urge them to take larger quantities than they were doing, because they were then importing a certain quantity from Germany. The Rathbun Co. offered to supply it at the same price as the price in Germany without any duties added, and they claimed that they ought to have some protection on this article. The Rathbun Co. are making wood alcohol yet; and yet the hon. Postmaster General tries to make the people of this country believe that by his entering into this corrupt bargain with a Conservative in order to get him to support the Grit party, he is helping to establish a new industry, whereas the fact is that it is an old industry.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think I am correct in saying that until I heard Mr. Peuchen speak the other night, I was not aware that he had a contract with the government. What my hon. friend means by talking of my making a contract I do not know. I think he ought to explain, or not make such a statement. Mr. Peuchen made a contract with the government some years ago, but under what circumstances he did so I do not recollect. Certainly it was not made with me. I do not suppose there was anything wrong in the contract; I presume the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue can explain it. Nor did I say that the industry of wood alcohol had not before existed in Canada. I said that Mr. Peuchen pointed out to me the importance of the industry treating wood in the way they proposed to treat it. He produced some figures showing the extent of the industry in the United States and the great importance of such an industry in Canada; but whether or not it had a footing in Canada before, either in a sickly or a healthy condition, I am not aware. My impression is that it was proposed to put the industry on an extensive footing by the Peuchen and Thompson enterprise.

Mr. BENNETT. I want to call attention to one remark the hon. Postmaster General made that night, according to the statement that appeared in the 'Globe.' The statement is that the members of the government, and the hon. Postmaster General was one of them, promised assistance to this industry.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When was it?

Mr. BENNETT. I presume it was five years ago, when he came down here. That assistance was not by way of bounty, because there is no bounty payable for the production of this article. What was the assistance that was promised? According to the statement of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, without any public competition, without asking for tenders at all, a hard and fast bargain was entered into with this company to take a great part of its product. What has been the result? That under the arrangement made, this company has had an exclusive contract with the department; and the worst of it is that the Minister of Inland Revenue, in face of the fact that next year the department will, probably require $25,000 worth of this article, and in view of the fact that this contract is soon to expire, is not prepared to tell the House that he proposes to call for tenders for the supply of this article, but he says that when the contract expires, he will then make up his mind what he will do. Surely he does not expect that other companies will go into the enterprise when he practically informs the House that this company will have the contract for all time to come.

Mr. HEYD. It appears that the government have entered into a contract whereby wood alcohol, which was formerly made in Germany, is now made in Canada. I do not think they should be condemned for that. According to the statement made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), although wood alcohol is made in Deseronto, in order to induce the late government to buy it, the manufacturer had to get the whip of the Conservative party to intercede for him, and through his influence they bought some part of this man's product at the price they were paying to Germany. That was the condition of affairs apparently at the time the present government made a contract with a concern which established an industry in Canada for the purpose of converting wood by-products into alcohol. The result has been a reduction in the price to the community and the establishment of a new industry in the country; which is something for which the hon. gentlemen opposite ought to congratulate the government. What plan will ultimately be followed only time and circumstances can determine. But hon. gentlemen have no right to assume that a dishonest agreement will be entered into because the agreement that has been entered into has inured to the benefit of the people of Canada by reducing the price of wood alcohol and introducing a new industry into the country.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue what he does with this wood alcohol.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I find a very interesting item in the Auditor General's report bearing on this matter. It appears that the Minister of Inland Revenue is buying some $20,000 worth of wood alcohol from the Standard Chemical Company without any competition. I find that in 1896 we bought $19,000 worth of wood alcohol from the Rathbun Company without any competition; but there is this important difference between the two cases: at that time we paid $1.60 a gallon, while under the present arrangement we pay $1.40 a gallon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understood the hon. gentleman from Burrard to state that the ordinary price in Canada now is $1.35 per gallon and that the price is now one half what it formerly was.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He referred to the methylated spirits, and not to wood alcohol pure, if I understood him rightly. I think he mentioned methylated spirits.

Mr. BENNETT.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. He did not do so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was discussing what I understood the hon. gentleman to have said. I would like to know what the total production of the company is and the cost.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We cannot ascertain what is the total production of the concern. I may say that when that contract was made, there were only two firms manufacturing that article—The Standard Chemical Company and the Rathbun Company. They both amalgamated, no doubt in order to secure the contract. The price given before was from $1.40 to $1.60. The contract was entered into five years ago. I do not care whether the parties were Liberal or Conservative. My impression is that Mr. Rathbun was a Conservative and so was Mr. Peuchen. The contract was given them because there were no other manufacturers of that article in the country. We could not get people to enter into the manufacture of alcohol for the sake of securing a contract of $1,500 or $2,000.

Mr. BENNETT. $22,000.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Would my hon. friend have a little patience? I have said that gentlemen have approached me and asked if I would give them the contract provided that they would engage in that business. I said no, but they might go into the manufacture of that article and I would do with them as I did with the distillers. I would give each manufacturer an order according to his production and buy from each at the current price.

Mr. OSLER. The objection raised is that this contract, which is about to expire in two months, is to be renewed with the same parties in order to prevent others from tendering.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. OSLER. The only fair way would be to advertise now for tenders, so that others might have the right to compete. Let me tell the hon. minister what perhaps he does not know, and what may explain why the present contractors are so anxious to have their contract renewed. A very large German firm is now investigating with a view of manufacturing wood alcohol by a new process, which has been accepted by the leading chemists in Germany and by which it could be manufactured at one-fifth its present cost. It is therefore only natural those people who have the contract to-day should be anxious to renew it for another five years. But it is not fair to the country that such a contract should be renewed. There is every reason why the government should advertise for tenders and let the public know two months in advance.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I would like to ask the Hon. Minister of Inland Revenue if he has any data to show the price of wood alcohol in other countries ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I could not say.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does the hon. minister not know that the price which the government is paying is abnormally large ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It may be, but we have no choice.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Did the Hon. Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) make any pledge to the Standard Chemical Company that the contract would be renewed or did any other Minister of the Crown make any such pledge ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose we shall all have to rise one after another and give an answer. I have offered no pledge.

Mr. BLAIN. Has there been any change in the duty since this government came into power and about the time the contract was entered into ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. CLANCY. The tariff of 1896 on wood alcohol was $2.25, but this free trade government made it $2.40. We have now the secret of Mr. Peuchen coming down and interviewing the government. The government did not turn a deaf ear to his request. He got a contract and he also got security that the Germans would not be allowed to send any alcohol in at the same price. I think that the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Finance might have taken the House into their confidence an hour ago and given us the inner history of this contract.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman's explanation is very ingenious, but there is a little bit of an anachronism about it. The interview took place a few years ago and after the tariff of 1897. The tariff was revised in 1897, and I understand the Minister of Inland Revenue to say that that contract was for five years and has not yet expired. Therefore, it cannot date further back than 1898. Therefore, it cannot be earlier than 1898.

Mr. CLANCY. Quite so, but you are more generous than the hon. gentleman anticipated. First Mr. Peuchen got in advance of the tariff, and then he came a second time and got the sole contract.

Mr. BELL. As I understood it, the sale of methylated alcohol is entirely in the hands of the government. Now, what is the price at which the government sells ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. A dollar ten.

Mr. BELL. What is the proof strength ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Sixty-six or sixty-seven over proof.

Mr. BELL. Is it the same now as in 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is a little stronger.

Mr. BELL. What percentage of wood alcohol is added to the ethyl alcohol ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BELL. Is that alcohol proof strength?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Sixty-five over proof.

Mr. BELL. Then it is sold at a dollar ten?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. A dollar ten for grade No. 1, and $1.40 for grade No. 2.

Mr. PORTER. The evil effects of the course which has been pursued in the department in dealing with this matter are very apparent from the discussion which has taken place. Wood alcohol, it has been stated—in fact it has been admitted by the Minister of Inland Revenue—was manufactured in Canada before the Standard Chemical Company obtained a contract from this government. It was manufactured, to my own personal knowledge in Deseronto, by the Rathbun Company. As Canadians with their money invested in an enterprise, they had a perfect right to be allowed at least opportunity of free competition with any who might come against them. But we find that this has not been allowed. The contract was made with the Standard Chemical Company, and the Rathbun Company were not given an opportunity of applying.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I beg the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Porter's) pardon. I stated only a moment ago that the contract was given to the Standard Chemical Company and the Rathbun Company, and that they amalgamated.

Mr. PORTER. What I say is that the contract was let without tenders being called for, and it was given to the Standard Chemical Company. Of course I accept what the hon. minister says. But notwithstanding that, the facts are that, after this contract was given by the government, the Rathbun Company leased their works and concern to the Standard Chemical Company. And why ? Because they were driven out of business by the action of the government in dealing in this matter. And the unfairness of the action of the government will become more apparent when I point out the fact that the lease which was taken from the Rathbun Company after the contract was given by this government does not expire until after the contract now existing between the Standard Chemical Company and this government expires. What position is the Rathbun Company in to-day to enter into competition with the Standard Company? The Rathbun Company are Canadians who have established themselves in this country. And are the Standard Company Canadians? They are importations from the United States to a large extent. This is not fair treatment, nor is it good principle for the government to go upon to give these contracts without open competition by advertising for tenders.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Porter) is in error in saying that the personel are from the United States.

Mr. PORTER. I did not say entirely—they are largely from the United States.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know the whole personel of the company. The only two I know are Mr. Peuchen and Mr. Thompson, of Longford.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman is forgetting Mr. Tudhope.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know whether Mr. Tudhope is in it or not. But, even so, he is a good Canadian now. He has cast in his lot with us and has been here for years, and he rendered excellent service in North Ontario.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. It being six o'clock——

The PRIME MINISTER. It was understood with the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) that we would not sit to-night. Perhaps it would be well to let this item pass and adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER. If hon. gentlemen opposite wish to sit to-night I have no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR. Carry out the agreement with the leader of the opposition, and let the House adjourn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This item has no relation to the subject we have been discussing. The Minister of Inland Revenue has stated that this question would come up in its proper order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. Another item will come up upon which the subject which the committee has been debating can be discussed.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I think that is perfectly right.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. PORTER.

Motion agreed to.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 21) to Amend and Consolidate the Law respecting Railways. He said: Mr. Speaker, I made a statement to the House a year ago, when I was introducing a Bill similar to this, which I think was a fairly comprehensive statement of the objects and purposes of the proposed legislation. Inasmuch as I would wish to confirm and be understood as repeating what I then said, I would refer hon. gentlemen who may desire to avail themselves of the reference, to Hansard of last session, page 2431. I do not wish to extend my explanatory statement to any greater length than is necessary ; but there are some things which I shall perforce be compelled to repeat.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think it would be as well for the hon. gentleman to make a fairly full statement. There are a good many new members in the House, and it may be a little difficult for all of us to refresh our memories in the way he suggests.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I wish to convey to the House as complete a view of the general scope of this legislation as I can. The Bill is substantially the same as that which was introduced last session. There have been a few changes, but those changes, I think, are not material and do not essentially affect the main principles of the measure as introduced last year. I think the Bill has been simplified, it has been considerably condensed, and in its general reconstruction a good deal of thought has been given to it in order to perfect it in every possible way. The proposal is, as it then was, to abolish the existing Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and to substitute for that body a railway commission composed of members independent of the government, independent of parliament in a practical sense, though not in the broadest sense, and capable, as we think and hope they will be, by experience and ability, of making thoroughly effective the legislation we are now proposing to place on the statute book.

There are various kinds of railway commissions, as hon. members know. Commissions have been constituted in other countries, not possessing any controlling or executive power, but of a purely advisory character. Other commissions have been created, particularly in some of the colonial dependencies of the Crown, which have had under their management and control the government railways in those colonies. Commissions have also been established—and it is to this type that the one we are proposing to constitute will belong—not for the purpose of operating railways themselves, but for the purpose of exercising control over the operation of railways, in regard to rates, the manner in which the trains shall be equipped, the manner in which crossings shall take place, and generally the manner in which the public shall be protected in the use of the railways.

In constructing this Bill, we have naturally availed ourselves of the experience of those countries in which railway commissions of this kind have been established. In Great Britain a railway commission was established first as far back as 1873. Some material and important changes took place in the constitution of that commission, in the direction of enlarging and extending its powers, in 1888, and it practically exists to-day as it was then constituted. In preparing this Bill, we have availed ourselves of the experience of that railway commission. We have also turned our attention to the legislation which has been adopted in the various states of the union, as well as the general legislation of Congress. We have also, as the House knows, availed ourselves of the results of the inquiries which were made by a special commissioner appointed by us for the purpose, Mr. McLean, who made to the government two reports upon his inquiries in the United States and his investigation of the existing railway troubles in Canada. We have based some of the provisions of the Bill upon the results at which he arrived —we think correctly—in his study of these various problems, and we have sought generally to turn to useful account the best features of the legislation of Great Britain and the United States. It has been found in the mother country that the operation of the railway commission, though not removing all troubles, and though not a complete and effective remedy for all difficulties, has been on the whole fairly satisfactory. Mr. McLean points out that it has exercised a useful influence for the prevention of arbitrary exactions by railways, that it has been recognized as an unbiased arbiter in railway disputes, and that it has much improved the position of shippers. The defects generally recognized are defects which are incidental to the legislation and the lack of hearty co-operation on the part of the judiciary of the country. In the United States similar defects and others have been discovered, which he points out. He says that there political considerations play a great part in the choice of commissioners, even when they are not elective, and they are elective in a great many cases. He says the term for which the commissioners are appointed is too short ; in none of the states it it more than five years, while in many it is less. Another defect admitted by thoughtful men is that the salaries paid to the commissioners are too low, and in consequence it has not been found possible to secure men of the quality required, by training, experience and general fitness, for the successful operation of these commissions. He says—and this is a question which has attracted a great deal of attention in the United States, and has been discussed in a great many works treating of the subject—that frequent appeals and the enormous amount of litigation arises in connection with the working out of their scheme, been most detrimental to the successful operation of the measure. Litigation springs up on all sides and in respect of all questions. The judicial interpretations of the various clauses of the law and the judicial decisions in respect of the findings of the commission upon the question of facts, have been so conflicting that practically the powers of the commissioners are absolutely nullified. In this connection, an eminent judge of the United States Supreme Court, Judge Harlan, says: 'The Inter-State Commission has been shorn by judicial interpretations of the authority to do anything of an effective character.' It has also been pointed out that the American legislation respecting the inter-state law was arrived at by a compromise between the transportation interests on the one hand and the producing interests on the other, and apparently there was no fixed aim in view in the establishment of these tribunals. One side probably contended that there was no need at all for such tribunals, and the other side insisted that it was imperative in the public interest that they should be established, and between the two a compromise was reached whereby, while these tribunals were established, they were not endowed with powers which all agree are imperatively necessary if they are to do effective work. But notwithstanding the defects admittedly existing under the system in force in the various states of the union and the United States as a whole, many men who have studied railway questions believe that these railway commissions have done much good. Mr. Blanchard, a well-known authority on railway matters, points out that the following good results have been achieved through this legislation:

1. It has secured more publicity of rates.
2. It has lessened open rate wars.
3. It has tended to equalize long and short haul rates.
4. It has exercised beneficial warning or police powers.

Meaning by that, that the provisions incorporated in the different railway bills imposing penalties for the omission to do or for the doing of certain acts has had a most salutary effect, by acting as a warning to companies that if they violated these conditions they might be made suffer the consequences.

5. It has silenced much unjust clamor against the railways.
6. It has been mutually educational.
7. It has been judiciously administered.
8. It has benefited the smaller shipper.
9. By obtaining a better classification it has afforded a more uniform basis for rate making.
10. Its statistical work has been of great value.
11. It has exercised important supervisory functions in regard to the application of automatic couplers and safety appliances.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all these objects are aimed at in the present Bill, and in order that we may if possible successfully achieve them, in the face of difficulties which will constantly arise, we have strengthened the hands of the commission we are constituting. We are investing it with larger powers, we are giving it more executive authority, and we have in this respect perhaps gone beyond any legislation which has been passed in any other country up to the present day. The commission, under this Bill, will exercise all the powers which are now vested in the railway commission of the Privy Council. We propose to constitute a court to consist of three or five members. I confess to a personal preference for three, but I do not assume that my judgment is necessarily sounder than that of others, and I invite an expression of opinion from hon. members on both sides on this point when we come to discuss the subject in detail. Therefore we leave the number in blank for the present. It is proposed that the commission shall be constituted a court of record. The tenure of office is to be a term of ten years, and each member is eligible to re-appointment. We have fixed an age limit of 75 years, beyond which no person can remain a member of the board. The Bill which we submitted last year contained, and the present Bill, when printed, will be found to contain a clause providing that the members of the commission are only removable on an address of both Houses of parliament to the Governor General. This, on full consideration, we concluded to change, and although the Bill when it is distributed will contain such a clause, it is an oversight which will be remedied in committee. We propose that the members of the commission shall be removable in the same manner as the lieutenant governors of the provinces, namely, by the Governor General in Council, for cause.

We confer upon the majority of the board the power of deciding any question, but one member of the commission may make an order, providing the case or the matter is not one of a contentious character and is not opposed. We propose also that the meetings of the board may be migratory. The board may move from place to place, provided, however, that such meetings can only take place with the approval of the Minister of Railways for the time being.

We leave the salaries of the commission open for the present, and will make a proposal to the committee when we reach that stage in the consideration of the Bill.

I now come to an important feature of the Bill, the importance of which you will have recognized in view of what I said a moment ago as to the unsatisfactory experience in the United States by reason of the facilities for litigation on all sorts of questions under their system. We propose that the commission shall be the absolute judges of both law and fact, subject to two exceptions. The commission will be absolute judges as to the facts, only subject to appeal to the Governor General in Council. They will be absolute judges of the law, except when a question of jurisdiction arises, which of course it would be quite impossible to restrict in any way, but they may state a case to the Supreme Court in the event of any question of legal importance arising.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. At whose instance is the submission to be prepared, at the instance of the litigants, or at that of the board ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would be prepared by the board—the board would submit the legal question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think the hon. minister does not understand the object of my hon. friend's (Hon. Mr. Haggart's) question. Will either litigant or both litigants have the right to have a case submitted, or will that be done only in the discretion of the board and on its own initiative ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In the discretion of the board, just as it is in the discretion of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to-day ; we have made no change in that respect.

Following the clauses I have just referred to you will find a variety of sections, very much in the order in which they appear in the existing Railway Act, dealing, first, with the construction of railways. These clauses will be found between 176 and 205 ; and, except where, we think, they have been improved somewhat, are very much the same as the existing legislation. We have made the usual provision in this Bill for the inspection of railways, and have made similar provision, with immaterial amendments, as respects the operations of railways. We now come to the question of tolls, in respect of which there has been a material change. The provisions that we incorporate in this Bill with regard to the control, supervision and regulation of tolls are, in large measure, adapted from similar provisions in the English and American enactments on the subject, so far, of course as the provisions would be applicable to this country. We carefully provide against undue discrimination, undue preference and advantages of any kind. We have incorporated here provisions regarding the long and the short haul. We think we have adequately and completely protected shippers, and all those who use the railways, in the enjoyment of equal facilities. We have directed attention in the Bill to the question of through traffic, both within Canada and from Canada to and from other countries. We provide for a uniform freight classification. The powers we give to the board include power to alter the freight classifications, so that they may be not only uniform, but that they may be more equitable and just to the shipper. In framing the clauses with regard to tolls, we have exercised all possible care. The provisions have been drawn up after consultation with men who have had long practical experience with respect to railway tolls. And, while we have endeavoured in a proper way to protect the rights of the transportation companies, we have assumed absolute and complete control with regard to what their rates shall be.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is a very important statement, and this provision seems to be the principle one of the Bill. Does the Bill give the commissioners absolute power of determining and fixing tolls ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. Short of that, we do not see how the commission can be successfully worked. That is one of the things which has occasioned no end of trouble in the United States, and we think that in any other way it would be quite impossible to avoid the same experience in this country.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. If there is no objection on the part of the hon. minister to the asking of questions at this stage, I would be glad if he would say whether this would apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government railways ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The fixing of tolls, so far as relates to the Canadian Pacific Railway is subject, as the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) knows, to some limitation in a part of Canada, according to the generally accepted interpretation of the act under which that company was chartered. We presume we cannot interfere with their rates until they are paying a dividend up to ten per cent. In the other parts of Canada the Canadian Pacific would be subject to this law as all other railways. We have not provided that the government railways shall come under the jurisdiction and control of the Commission any more than they have come under the control of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. We leave the law exactly as we find it in that respect.

Mr. INGRAM. Then the government railways may do as they like about rates ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The government railways have always been able to do that, in the sense which, I suppose, the hon. gentleman means. Of course, the government railways cannot do as they like ; they must do as the people or the government likes.

Mr. INGRAM. Then, in the matter of rates, how is the uniformity to be secured, if the government railways are not under control ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have always had uniformity on the government railways.

Mr. INGRAM. But not uniform with other lines.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is not possible to secure absolute uniformity on all railways. In fact it is not possible to secure uniformity on any one very extensive railway, because its freight is carried over different parts of the system under varying conditions. You do not have uniformity on the Canadian Pacific, and never can have, though the Canadian Pacific were clearly subject to the operation of the law throughout its entire system.

Mr. BARKER. Will the hon. minister tell us why the government railways should not be under the control of the commission just the same as other railways ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am willing to discuss that question when we reach the clause under which it arises. I would have precisely the same reason for continuing the law as parliament had for enacting it in that form and for continuing it when the law was revised in 1888. The reasons are cogent and, I think will be so regarded by the committee when the subject comes to be discussed in detail.

Mr. McCREARY. I would like to ask how this provision will affect a case in which a province, for a consideration, has made a bargain with certain railways for the control of their rates ? Would this Railway Commission supersede the legislation of the province ? What powers would the commission have in such a case, for instance, as the bargain made by the province of Manitoba last year with the Canadian Northern Railway with regard to the control of rates ? Would the commission have the power to override that legislation or vary it ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. McCreary) is asking me to express an opinion on a question which would require more thought than I could give it at this moment as I am standing on my feet. Probably it would be wiser to call for professional opinion to see what these agreements are, and ascertain the facts, before expressing any very decided view upon the question. I think perhaps I can afford my hon. friend some information which will be of use to him even in this connection. This board constituted by parliament would of course have to be advised as to any legal obstacles that may arise in respect of the exercise of its powers in any given case ; and if it should transpire that there were existing agreements such as my hon. friend points out, which would make it illegal for them to make regulations affecting tolls contrary to the terms of any such agreement, they would not exercise their power. They have the widest possible power to arrange and to apply their schedules to any portion of any railway, or any particular portion of any particular district, and not apply them to any other portion of that district. So I think any difficulties of that kind can be overcome easily, and it would not militate against the general efficiency of the Bill if a difficulty did arise such as my hon. friend has pointed out.

We provide for the greatest possible publicity in the matter of tariffs. I think it will be found when sections of the Bill come to be investigated, that every reasonable means has been provided whereby the public can be made acquainted with the rates they will be called upon to pay for transportation, speaking generally, on any of the railroads of the country. Of course, we know there are two great divisions of railway tariffs, freight tariffs and passenger tariffs. We divide freight tariffs into three classes, the standard, the special, and what we call the competitive. As the law stands at present, the schedules of tariffs emanate from the companies. The law provides that a by-law of a railway company must be passed setting forth the tariff which it proposes to get authority to impose upon its traffic, and the Governor in Council may either approve of that by-law, in which case it goes into operation, or he may refuse approval, and withhold assent until such time as a by-law is submitted to him containing a tariff of tolls which he can approve. After all is said and done, the tariff which is thus settled and approved is a maximum tariff ; it is not a tariff to be imposed by the railway upon its traffic ordinarily, because in practice it is always in excess of the tariff rates which are charged. That system will cease to be in operation when this Bill becomes law. The companies will propose their tariff, the board may say : We will not approve of that tariff, but we will approve of such and such a tariff, and they may prescribe what that tariff shall be. We have given it that power; and that tariff, as I have said, will be a standard; that is to say, the general tariff in operation upon such railway or portion of such railway as the board shall determine. Neither more nor less than the rate so fixed shall be charged, unless or except there has been submitted and approved one of the other two classes of tariffs, a special or a competitive. Conditions may exist, the carriage of certain classes of goods may be called for, such as coal, lumber or grain, in regard to which it is the custom of railways, and that custom will continue, to make special tariffs, and if these tariffs commend themselves to the board they will go into operation. Competitive freight tariffs deal with reduced charges for any class of the general freight classification between points which the board may deem it advisable that such competitive tariff shall apply, but shall not be subject to the clauses respecting the long and short haul. Special and competitive tariffs may be amended at any time, or may be supplemented at any time, by the railway companies, and tolls for these specified commodities or between any points——

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. By the commission ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Under special conditions, circumstances or emergencies, that tariff may be changed, but it is not to continue in operation one moment longer than is necessary, and the board shall have power to disallow it. Nobody, I apprehend, wants to hamper the great railway interests of the country; we do not want to do that; and we know there are constantly ocassions arising when offers of particular merchandise are made with which railway companies have to deal at once, and will have no time to prepare and submit a tariff for the consideration and approval of the board. The companies are to have power to make such a tariff and to apply it in particular instances, immediately advising the board of what they have done, when the board may approve or disallow such tariff.

Mr. BARKER. What will occur supposing they disapprove of what has been done?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What has been done cannot be undone. We make this provision to avoid uncertainty on the part of shippers. It is also provided that they shall have three days' notice of any reduction of rates and ten days' notice of any increase of rates. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have stated fully the respects in which we have introduced changes regarding the control of rates. We now pass on to the other provisions in the Bill which are not of so much interest, and which are almost in all respects identical with the clauses of the General Railway Act.

Mr. W. R. BROCK (Centre Toronto). May I ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, before he passes on, whether he is giving this commission control of the granting of charters to railways, or whether its recommendation will be submitted to the Railway Committee to be acted upon by the Railway Committee, and also may I ask the hon. minister if this commission is to have control of canals as well? I listened carefully to what the hon. minister has said, but I have not heard him say anything about canals. Canals may become the rivals of railways. Another very important means of carrying trade at the present time and which is growing all the time are tramways. Will the commission have control of freight and passenger tramways operated by electricity or otherwise, and are these powers included in the Bill? Some of our railways are part rail and part canal, or part waterways and part steamship carriage; would this commission have the same control over all these means of carriage that you are giving it over railways, or are you reserving these for the control of another commission, or to that of the Privy Council?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend (Mr. Brock) has asked me several question and I will try to answer them in the order in which he has asked them. He has first asked whether any provision is being introduced in this Bill giving power to the board to control the granting of charters. I may say to him that we have made no such provision. Later on, before I resume my seat, I intend to call the attention of the House to that question and to another, and cognate question, that might be discussed and considered while this Bill is going through. This provision and the other one that I shall mention later will be provisions of a very drastic character, and I did not feel like pressing upon my colleagues in council the inclusion of these two clauses in the present Bill; and yet they are railway questions of importance and I thought it would be very fitting at all events that the attention of the committee, when they were considering the Bill, should be brought to them, that they might become subjects of discussion; and it might be that such an opinion would be evoked from the committee that clauses embodying the sense of the committee on these subjects could be included in the Bill. I have drafted a couple of clauses relating to these matters, and later on I will call the attention of the committee to them. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) asked me another question as to whether this legislation included tramways. I may say that we did not have it in mind to include control over tramways in preparing this Bill. There is another question which I am afraid has escaped me for the moment.

Mr. BARKER. The question as to part rail and part water routes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In regard to the question of the control of canals by the board, we have not suggested that. There does not seem to me very much analogy between the subject of railways and that of canals, not so much as to make it desirable that the commission should be invested with any duty in respect to canals.

Mr. COWAN. May I ask the hon. minister whether it is the intention to bring the operations of express companies under the control of the commission? For instance, in shipping carloads from the fruit districts, over a railway, would the commission be empowered to exercise control over the rates charged by the express companies?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) will find abundant power to regulate rates as respects express shipments of all kinds. If he thinks these provisions are wanting in any respect we will be very glad to hear from him on the subject.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Would the hon. minister allow me to ask him whether there will be any appeal from the decision of the commission? I was not here and I did not hear any reference to that point.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte)

was not here when I mentioned that there is an appeal provided for in the Bill from and against any and all decisions of the board to the Governor in Council. That tribunal was thought to be the most useful to which to make an appeal for many obvious reasons. There is an appeal now to the Governor in Council from the Railway Committee. It is perhaps just as well that I should say that in the few years I have been connected with the Railway Committee that power has only been availed of on one occasion, and it is to be hoped that it will not be found very frequently necessary to appeal from the decisions of this board. Perhaps I might as well refer to the other subject just at this moment which I had in my mind and which relates somewhat to the question which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) asked. I had in my mind two questions which we have not undertaken to deal with in this Bill, one as to the exercise of control over the granting of new charters or the location of new railways. That power has been conferred by the legislatures of some of the states—one or two, at least, to my knowledge—but I think it has been rather in the form of an advisory authority. The duty is cast upon the commission to advise the state legislatures in respect of any applications for the construction of new railways, and in other instances the power has been given to the commission to grant or withhold, even after the charter has been granted, a certificate which is called a certificate of public necessity, or something of that kind. without which certificate the company chartered to build the railway cannot proceed with its work. It will appear, of course, upon the surface, that the object of such legislation is to prevent the unnecessary duplication of railways, to prevent their running, perhaps, too close to one another, or running parallel with each other, when the public interest will be best served by there being either no other railway or by its being located elsewhere, at some convenient or sufficient distance from the existing railway.

Mr. INGRAM. Then why should the charter holders, having a time limit in which to commence and complete the railway, be interfered with in that way ? That would affect the time limit to commence and complete the line of railway after it had been chartered. Parliament grants the right to construct a railway and fixes a time limit.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is much to be said in favour of the proposition, and I am not going to say that there is not a good deal to be said against it. I was merely pointing out, with the view of inviting discussion later upon this subject, that this was one of the powers which have been conferred upon railway commissions in other places but which it is not proposed in the present Bill shall be conferred upon this commission.

Another direction in which legislation has taken place elsewhere is in giving railway commissions power to exercise a very careful supervision and control over the excessive issue of stock and bonds by railway companies. There seems to me, speaking individually only, to be very much in a proposal of that kind to commend itself to parliament. We know perfectly well that in the experience of the past few years, at least, although companies which have charters from parliament and are authorized to issue very large quantities of stock, very rarely indeed has any of the actual money been put into stock or has gone into the construction of these roads. The stock is given, I suppose, perhaps, to enrich the bonds, or distributed as favours among friends or used otherwise than as a means of raising the capital to put into the undertaking, and it seems that it is very desirable, if parliament thinks it well to proceed with this Bill, to consider whether or not there might not be some tribunal, and if so why not the railway commission, to look into, watch carefully and supervise the expenditure upon these railway undertakings, so as to be able to restrict the undue and excessive issue of their bonds or shares of capital stock. These bonds, this stock distributed among the public, received as a gift or bought at perhaps a low rate to-day and sold at a little higher rate to-morrow, as the prospect of the railway may improve financially, get into the hands of the holders at an enhanced price and they become a legitimate charge upon the traffic of the railway, and become sometimes a burden upon such traffic and an unnecessary burden, it seems to me. It is my own opinion that we whould be acting in conformity with public opinion if we turned our eyes in the direction of legislation of that kind.

I have endeavoured to state as fully as I could, without being unduly tedious, the general scope and in some respects the particular details of this Bill. It has been framed in an honest endeavour to put before parliament a Bill which should be effective in its operation. If the country desires, as I believe it does, that there should be a tribunal constituted for the purpose of exercising a large measure of control over the railways of the country, I think we would fail in our duty in responding to that demand if we did not give to the tribunal we are creating, ample power to enable them to carry out the purpose for which they are created. When you come to read some of these clauses it may seem that the powers that are given—if they are pressed to extremity of their literal meaning ; if an interpretation is going to be given to them by the board right up to the limit which their language would bear—it might seem that you are giving to the Railway Commission power which would enable them to crush the railways or to do serious injury to the business interests of the country. While that may be so, it must be borne in mind that you must give in the language that you employ, larger powers than you intend to have exercised in order that you may insure a sufficient measure of power to the body which you are investing with these responsibilities. It is because of this, that it is of the first importance when we come to constitute the tribunal itself; when we come to determine upon the qualifications which are necessary in order that the measure generally may be successfully worked out; that we shall exercise extreme care in making these selections. It would not be possible for me, and it would not be perhaps becoming for me at this stage, before parliament says there shall be such a tribunal constituted, to undertake to state in any definite way just what the ideas of the government are as to the personnel of the board itself. We are fully conscious that it will be necessary that there should be represented on that board a man of large legal experience who has had some knowledge of the trend and bearing of railway questions, who has followed railway legislation generally. There should be a man who should have technical knowledge of the working of railways and railway tariffs also upon the board. This is very important. It is regarded as very important in the United States, and after the long experience they have had in that country I presume their judgment may be taken as fairly sound. Outside of these two qualifications I apprehend that a wide latitude might be exercised by the government in its choice. I have noticed recently in the public press that some opinions have been attributed to me with regard to what the constitution of the board ought to be and what ought to be the avocations of the men who are appointed on it. I must say that I have been quite misunderstood in these reports. If any person has had any conversation with me in respect to the subject I have not gone any further than to state in the most general way anything with regard to the technical and legal training required. Beyond that, I think the general business interests of the country should be represented; and chiefly and prominently among these must always come the interests of the great farming community of Canada; an industry which in its importance far surpasses that of any other industry; far surpasses the manufacturing and commercial interests great as they are and great as they will continue to be. But while that is the case it is at the same time absolutely true that the farming interests and the manufacturing and industrial and general commercial interests are a common interest after all. A man, no matter what his particular occupation might be who had a business experience might well be taken to be qualified to fill a place upon this board provided that he has a sound judgment and a calm and independent mind. In considering this, bearing in mind that it is the strength and pressure of the public opinion which has been aroused by what the farmers of the country have felt to be their particular grievance; having regard to the enormous extent of these interests not only in eastern Canada, but growing with such tremendous rapidity in our great west, I am satisfied that I speak with the approval of all my colleagues when I say, that the selection which we will make to occupy a place on this board, particularly in respect to the business interests of this country which are connected with transportation, will be such a selection as will commend itself heartily to the approval of the farming community, and will insure, as far as possible, the promotion and protection of their interests.

Mr. BROCK. I notice that the hon. minister has not stated that the commission is to have any power to deal with labour difficulties and strikes which affect railways very materially. Is it intended that these are to be dealt with in the compulsory arbitration Bill which I understand is to be introduced?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have not incorporated any provisions of that kind in this Bill. There would be difficulty in doing so. I can point out one, which however I do not consider to be by any means the most considerable. You are constituting a commission which will impose very onerous and responsible duties on the gentlemen who compose that tribunal. They will have no sinecure, I can assure you. The duties they will have to discharge will be multifarious, and I think, at all events in the inception, whatever it may be found possible to do later, it would not be wise to hamper the action of the commission by attaching to it such duties as the hon. gentleman alludes to. Then there is another reason. It has not been found practicable so far, under the conflict which exists between provincial and federal legislation, to do very much, if anything, in the direction of compulsory arbitration; and if you are to rely, as I think you will have to rely, almost entirely upon the friendly intervention of a conciliatory board, for the solution of these labour difficulties, it would not be well to ask the commission to assume duties of that character. Such a board should always have upon it a direct representative of the labour elements themselves; if they are to have confidence in its decisions, they must have some choice in the composition of the board. Another reason, and perhaps the conclusive one, is that my hon. friend the Minister of Labour has a Bill which he proposes to submit to parliament this session touching that very question.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if he has made provision in the Bill to give the commissioners power to deal with all questions relative to water which is necessarily carried beneath the railways ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). Will they have power also to deal with railway crossings in towns and villages, and all matters of that kind ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). Will they have power to deal with the long and short hauls ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask one question. I did not care to interrupt the hon. minister as he was proceeding with his speech. He spoke of appeals to the Governor in Council on some questions of fact.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. On all questions of fact. All orders of any kind made by the board may be appealed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it to be in the nature of an appeal pure and simple or in the nature of a re-hearing ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I take it that would be very much as the Governor in Council himself would determine. The Governor in Council under this Bill would have complete and absolute jurisdiction to revise any order or decision of the board. We have hitherto had, I think, only one instance in which an appeal was carried to the Governor in Council, and in that instance we forwarded from the Railway Committee of the Privy Council the shorthand notes, which contained a statement of everything that had been said, the arguments addressed to the committee and the evidence taken ; and I think some of the gentlemen wished to supplement that evidence, and they were permitted to do so. The same thing would be done in the case of an appeal from a decision of this board.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I should have thought there would be a necessity for some specific provision in the Bill with regard to that. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one more question. Apparently the power to control rates does not extend to the Canadian Pacific Railway, at least to a very considerable portion of the system of that company. Under the circumstances referred to by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary), the same thing might be said of the Canadian Northern, which stands in very much the same position as the portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway referred to by the hon. minister. Then, there is the Intercolonial Railway as well. So that we have three great railways in Canada as to which there will be no control of rates by this commission ; and will not the fact that there is no control over the rates on these three railways hamper the commission very much in its dealing with the rates on other railways ? I do not profess to have any great practical knowledge of railway matters ; but it occurred to me that the control of rates would not be nearly so effective under these circumstances as it might otherwise be, because how will this commission be able to control the rates effectively on one railway when it has no power whatever to deal with the rates on another and a competing railway ? It seems to me, with due regard to what the hon. minister may say on the subject, that will be a great handicap on the commission in regard to the control of rates, which, as the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals says, is one of the most important features of the Bill. However, I do not propose to discuss the Bill at this stage, and I merely make this suggestion for the purpose of asking the hon. minister to direct his attention to that particular point when he comes to move the second reading.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. So far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, my hon. friend would not, I am sure, anticipate that any conflict is likely to arise with the decisions of the commission in respect of rates, because I have never heard any one allege that the rates charged on the Intercolonial Railway are of such a character that they would have to be reduced in order to conform to the rates prevailing on other lines.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, we are making this Bill for the future, are we not, as well as the past ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, and I think the experience of the past affords very good ground for inferring what will be our experience in the future. I would say, in regard to the condition pointed to in the first instance by my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. McCreary), I understand that the nature of the agreement between the Canadian Northern and the Manitoba government is this : The Canadian Northen binds itself not to impose a higher rate than the specific rate mentioned in that agreement in respect of its traffic which, of course, so far as the jurisdiction of the Manitoba legislature is concerned, would be limited to the province of Manitoba. The exercise of the powers of this commission are not therefore likely to bring it into conflict with any contract made between the provincial government and that railway. While the hon. gentleman was speaking, the thought presented itself to my mind that the only question that would arise would be as to whether or not the Canadian Northern was imposing too high a rate. Well, there could be nothing in this contract which would entitle that company to claim that a reduction in rates was beyond the jurisdiction of the railway commission or this parliament and that they could therefore not properly be asked to submit to the jurisdiction of the railway commission. The railway commission might cut down its rates and the Manitoba government could not complain in that case, though it might complain if the rates were put up. I do not think therefore that the case is one of practical difficulty.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this Bill fully at its present stage. Last session, I heard the hon. gentleman explain the Bill he then introduced, but a good many of its provisions have escaped my memory and I am not as well prepared as I might be to discuss the subject. However, I shall look into the matter and be fully posted on the second reading of the Bill. But what strikes me first in the appointment of the commission is the question as to what powers we can give it. The hon. gentleman has told us that in the United States certain powers were given the commissioners, but that it has been found impossible to get their decisions carried out by legal enactments. That is no doubt perfectly true to a considerable extent. No doubt the work of the commission in the United States has become simply of an educational character, but in that respect it has had a great deal of influence on railway companies, because when the railway commissioners draw the attention of the public to anomalies in the charges of railway companies to differences in rates at different points and to other abuses which the state and inter-state commissions were intended to prevent, the very publicity given to these abuses has the effect of bringing about their correction. That is, after all, the strongest power which the commissioners have in the United States. The hon. gentleman says that in his Bill he has vested the commissioners with greater power than is given similar bodies in Great Britain and other countries. I cannot speak with authority on that point, but it seems to me that the shortest possible way of settling the question would be for the hon. gentleman to state to what railways this Bill will apply. It is not intended to apply to the Intercolonial Railway and it cannot apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Nor will it apply to these railways which the hon. gentleman mentions in the province of Manitoba, nor can it apply to any railway which has a local charter. There is also another series of railways to which it will not apply. It cannot affect any railway which obtained its charter before a certain date—I forget the year now—before the Railway Act was amended, because these railways were given their charters under the condition that their rates could not be interfered with until 15 per cent was being earned on their capital stock. If that be the case, this Bill can apply to very few railways in the country. I may be wrong in my contention that the railway commission will have no power over those railways which are solely under the jurisdiction of the local governments and receive their charters from these governments; but I think that I am right. In order to bring such railways under this Bill, we would have to declare that they are works for the advantage of Canada. If I am right, I would ask why should we appoint such a commission? Why spend so much money for the purpose of fixing and controlling rates over a few railways that would come under its jurisdiction? We cannot interfere with the Canadian Pacific Railway charter because that company has an express contract with this country, and it would be an act of confiscation to alter that contract without compensation. It is true that we may pass a Bill giving us the right to exercise that power, but that is not what I understand the hon. gentleman proposes to do. If I understand him rightly, he proposes only to give this commission jurisdiction where he can do so without interferring with any vested rights. The Canadian Pacific Railway have an understanding with this country, under which their rates are fixed and they contend that we cannot alter those rates so long as the condition of that contract is not accomplished, which provides that until the company earn a certain percentage on their capital per year, their rates cannot be interfered with. That is their contention, and I am inclined to think that they are right. I think that every railroad which received its charter prior to a certain date has a moral right, nay more, a legal right, has a virtual contract of this country which we are in honour bound to carry out, and any act of ours in contravention of that right, any act of ours which will interfere with the rates they have a right to charge, would be an act of confiscation.

There are many ways in which perhaps a commission might be of use. It might be useful in settling those difficulties which come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman proposes that the proceedings before the commission shall be the same as those before the courts and shall carry costs. I suppose these costs will be imposed according to some schedule drawn up by the commission, and similar to schedules in other courts of law.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What then did the hon. gentleman mean when he said that costs would apply?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We propose that the same system shall continue that now obtains in the Railway Committee, namely that the costs be left to the discretion of the commission. The fact that we are constituting this commission a court of record, is not tantamount to setting up a judicial tribunal in the ordinary sense. We are simply giving authority to the decrees which they may pass.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understand that the power to allow costs will be the same as that now held by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understood that the object was, in view of the ease with which questions might be brought before that tribunal, to allow this power of mulcting a party in costs to prevent bringing what are called litigious actions.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think we have only given costs in two cases in the last six or seven years.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I presided over that committee for a number of years, and never allowed costs in any case.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have allowed only fifty dollars or so in one or two cases.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. No matter who these commissioners under this new law may be, I do not think the commission will be any more responsible or intelligent or better able to deal with the questions coming before it than is the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. There is one change made in this Bill with which I quite agree. Commissioners were to hold office the same tenure as judges and to be removable only on an address to both Houses of parliament. The hon. gentleman now intends to give the Governor in Council power to remove these gentlemen.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. For cause.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Of course. But no officer has ever been removed by the present government, except 'for cause,' according to the Minister of Railways and Canals and others. But the 'cause' may be very slight in some cases. But I believe in the power of removal, and I think this is an improvement in the Bill. As I have said, there are a good many things in which the commissioners might exercise power. One is as to the issue of stock and bonds. Of course, they cannot prevent that issue, because the company is given the power in its charters. But they can exercise a supervisory and educational power, as is done by the commissioners in the United States. Of course, if an issue were illegal, it would be bad and void. But they can inform the public of any excessive exercise of the power of issuing stock or bonds. As I have said, it is not my intention to discuss the Bill in full. We shall have an opportunity on the second reading and when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) whether, if a charter were granted with a provision that the use of the bonding powers shall be subject to the approval of the commission, the commission would not be able to control such powers ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Certainly they would. They can do that now—they can alter any charter or cancel any contract. Their power is supreme in these things, the only condition being that it shall be done specifically, otherwise the interpretation would go against them in the courts. Of course, if, as my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) says, it were embodied in an Act of parliament, that would be sufficient. But how could you embody it ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. To whom do I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) to refer when he says 'they' have the power to do these things now ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I mean the parliament of Canada. It has absolute power to control. We have the power of eminent domain, and can even take a man's property without giving him any consideration in return. Of course, that is never done, but still the power is vested in us.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In whom ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I mean in the parliament of Canada, in the people of Canada, in the Dominion of Canada. When I say 'we' I am speaking in that sense. When I said 'they' had the power, I referred to hon. gentlemen opposite as representing the majority and exercising the power of legislation and government.

Mr. INGRAM. I may have misunderstood the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals in his explanation and in some of the answers given to questions that have been asked. We know perfectly well that one of the chief reasons why the people have demanded this commission is the exorbitant character of the rates charged by certain railways. In answer to a question as to the long and short haul, the hon. minister has stated that this commission will have the power to remedy grievances with respect to exorbitant rates. But, in answer to a question by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) the hon. minister was not clear as to whether this commission would have the right to interfere as to the rates on certain local railways. How, then, can they effectively remedy grievances with respect to rates ? We had every reason to hope that this new Bill would cover not only railways but tramways as well. There is a strong belief throughout the country that a large number of tramways will be constructed to accommodate the farming community and to serve as feeders for the trunk lines. But this Bill does not give the commission power to deal with the rates on the tramways. Next we find the hon. minister stating that, though this parliament is the highest in the Dominion, and clearly has the right to grant charters to railway companies, yet, even after parliament has granted such a charter, this commission may take the company by the throat and say: You shall not construct that railway until we furnish you with a certificate authorizing you to do so. I for one, as a member of this House, would not feel like so stultifying myself in matters of that kind. Parliament should retain the right to grant or refuse charters, but, once the charter has been granted on the condition that the railway shall be commenced within a certain time and finished within a certain time, the company should be free from interference with regard to that matter by any of the parties whatever. This and other objections, I think, will fairly be raised to this Bill as I find it now. I have not read the Bill, but have only listened to the explanations of the hon. gentleman, and consequently I am not in a position intelligently to discuss it at this stage, but I hope at a later date to have something more to say about it. In the meantime I may say to the hon. gentleman that he has his hands full in promoting a Bill of that character in this parliament. He will find a great many serious objections to it, and a great many differences of opinion. So far as I am concerned, however, I should be glad to assist the hon. gentleman in any way that I can, though my assistance may not be worth much, in making this a workable Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the House go into Committee on Tuesday next to consider the following proposed resolution :—

That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next, to consider the following proposed resolution :That it is expedient to amend the 32nd chapter 63-64 Vic., "An Act respecting and restricting Chinese immigration," by providing :

1st. That a tax of $500 shall be imposed on every person of Chinese origin entering Canada.

2nd. That the person in command of, or in charge of, any vessel or vehicle, bringing Chinese immigrants into Canada shall be personally liable to His Majesty, for the payment of the said tax, with respect to any such immigrant carried by such vessel or vehicle.

Motion agreed to.

THE MANUFACTURERS' DELEGATION TO THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question; and in order to make my question plain I will quote from the government organ in the city of Ottawa, the 'Free Press.' I notice a report in that paper that a deputation of manufacturers waited upon the government and asked for higher protection. I will quote a short paragraph :—

The Prime Minister promised full consideration of their request. He advised them, however, that they allow their proposed tariff schedule to be made public. Mr. Fielding informed them that any other course would injure their case. He had letters from many manufacturers warning him against the request of the association, and urging that the tariff be left as it stands at present.

I ask the Minister of Finance if he has any objection to lay those letters on the table that he received from manufacturers.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). In the first place, I desire to point out to my hon. friend that the only organ which the government has in the city of Ottawa is that valuable publication known as the 'Canada Gazette.' For whatever appears in that quarter we are willing to be held responsible. In regard to the other matter, there were some of the papers referred to which I will be pleased at a later stage, or perhaps at an early date, to lay on the Table of the House. The report is not exactly in line with what I said. I said I was aware that a number of letters had been written, some of which I had seen in the hands of members of parliament, taking exception to the proposed action, or what was supposed to be the intended action of the Manufacturers' Association. I stated that I also had some communication myself adverse to what was understood to be the proposals of the Manufacturers' Association. Some of those papers that are not of a confidential character I shall be glad to bring down at once.

Mr. INGRAM. In the words of the hon. gentleman, why are some of them confidential ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have received a great many representations from different parts of the country on the tariff question, from time to time, which have been offered and received in confidence. Where the representations relate to the material facts of a man's private business, it might be very inconvenient to have such things made public. In many such cases we have received information in confidence and have kept it accordingly. But where a proposal is made to impose a particular rate of duty on a given article, I think that is not a matter that should be received in confidence, and that we should be free to make it public. That is the view I expressed to the Manufacturers' Association.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN CATTLE IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House again go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Before you leave the Chair, I wish to give notice that I will move on Tuesday next, or on the first day thereafter when the House is moved into Committee of Supply, the following amendment :—

That in the opinion of this House there is no justification for the application of the Diseases of Animals Act of Great Britain to Canadian cattle.

That Canadian cattle at the time of the passing of said Act and ever since have been free from all contagious diseases.

This House is of opinion that the application of the said Act to Canadian cattle has an injurious effect upon the cattle trade of this country.

This House regrets that the representatives of Canada at the colonial conference utterly failed to obtain any redress or promise of redress for this grievance.

This House further regrets that this government has not succeeded by more vigorous protests, or by other effective steps, in finding means to obtain the removal of the existing unjust restrictions on the sale of Canadian cattle in Great Britain.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I would suggest to my hon. friend, though that is a question for him to consider, whether it would be wise to move that as an amendment to Supply. The whole subject is likely to come up, and by bringing it up in the form of an amendment to Supply, unless he has some special purpose in view, he restricts the discussion and obliges us to confine ourselves to that particular form. If that is his purpose, I cannot object. But if the object is to broaden the whole question, he can find another form of bringing it up. Still, if he proposes to put it as an amendment to Supply, I cannot object to it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman forgets that last year this very course was adopted, and the government acquiesced in the proposed amendment. I do not know if my hon. friend has any special purpose in view further than that which the hon. gentleman had in view who made a similar motion last year. He is adopting exactly the same course as was adopted last by an hon. gentleman opposite.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But my hon. friend forgets that when the motion came from this side of the House, possibly the hon. gentleman who moved it was more likely to accept an amendment to his amendment. But, if an hon. gentleman moves a similar amendment on the other side of the House, I am not sure that he would be so ready to accept any kindly advice we might give him. However, that is for my hon. friends opposite to consider.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Department of the Interior—Salaries, including E. Deville at $2,800, W. F. King at $2,500 and Otto J. Klotz at $2,300, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $119,029.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir Wm. Mulock). The hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) is not able to be present. He is arranging to go to England, and he asked me to take his estimates for him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I suppose he is going to England notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be good enough to give us some detailed explanation why this provision is necessary in this item ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The increase is $3,332.50, and it is made up by the balance of the increases and reductions. The total increases are as follows :

			$1,350 00
		Increases.....	$4,682 50
		Decreases.....	1,350 00
		Net increase.....	$3,332 50

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not understand in what respect the Civil Service Act is repealed, or why it should be repealed.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am informed that in the case of Messrs. King and Klotz the maximum salary is $2,400, and they are being allowed $150 in excess of the maximum. Mr. King is connected with the new observatory and has an important addition to his labours which are of a very responsible and technical character. Mr. Klotz has been employed in connection with the Alaskan boundary, and the hon. Minister of the Interior thinks his services should be recognized accordingly.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the country is very fortunate in being able to retain such distinguished men as I know Mr. King and Mr. Klotz to be in their profession, and it seems a little peculiar that the advances in salary to these gentlemen are so small in comparison with the very large increases that were made in the salaries of two other officers, unimportant as compared with them. I think one of the gentlemen to whom I refer is a chief clerk, and another a registration clerk, and they had $400 added to their salaries a session or two ago. No doubt their duties were increased by the administration of the Yukon, but theirs are largely clerical duties and it is satisfactory after all to find that men who have scientific training and who are so able and prominent in their professions as Mr. King and Mr. Klotz are to receive some recognition, though, I must say, in proportion to the recognition given the other gentlemen, they have not been fully rewarded even yet.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Would my hon. friend (Sir Wm. Mulock) be good enough to tell me if J. D. Bollard, who is mentioned as receiving $850 is the gentleman who is in Paris now ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He is not the same person.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. May I ask where this gentleman is located ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the immigration office in Ottawa.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why is not the Civil Service Act amended so that eminent gentlemen such as those mentioned can be retained in the service without requiring the repeal of the provisions of the Act ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot say why the Act is not amended. I suppose if the Act in time is found not to be sufficient to meet any situation that may arise, and if that becomes quite clear, the House will be possessed of the information and will amend it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That has been quite clear for the last six years, ever since I have been in the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There are only a few cases.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Only a few cases ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). In comparison with the whole Civil Service list.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It does seem a most absurd thing to keep that Act on the statute-book and to repeal it piecemeal each year in the estimates.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Special merit has to be taken into consideration.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It might be done occasionally in a very exceptional case of special merit perhaps.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Why is it that the hon. gentleman changes the theoretical organization of the department ? It does not seem as if he requires any more of a staff for the purpose of accomplishing the work, but he wants five more second-class clerks and one more first-class clerk. The hon. minister ought to maintain his theoretical organization approved of by council, and under no circumstances, unless of the gravest and most serious character, change it. And why he has changed it by adding five second-class clerks and one first-class clerk to his staff I do not know.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There may be a different number of clerks in the different classes but there is only one additional clerk in the total number.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I know that perfectly well. What I complain of is that the theoretical organization of the department has been changed and there ought to be some grave reason for doing that. There are less in the third class, five more in the second class and one more in the first class. There ought to be some reason for that change other than favouritism.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. All these changes have been made on account of length of service, increased duties and efficiency. The hon. gentleman will not stand in the way of promotion for merit.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes I do. The country requires a certain staff for a certain organization and because a clerk is efficient and has attended to his duties is no reason why there should be a larger organization than is absolutely necessary to carry on the business of the country.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If there are a number of young men as junior second class clerks, getting small salaries, and if they are promoted to a higher rank because of merit, surely my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) would not object to that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I insist that the first duty of the government is to see that the organization necessary for carrying on a department should not be increased. That is all the organization that is required for the efficiency of the department, and the government are not justified in unnecessarily increasing the organization even if it be for the purpose of increasing the salaries of deserving clerks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The expression 'increasing the organization' would convey that the number of clerks has been increased, but as the hon. gentleman knows there is only one additional clerk. It is not to be expected that a number of meritorious young men are always to stay at the same salary. Surely if the minister sees that some of these young men who have made excellent clerks are at small salaries for a number of years he ought be able to promote them.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I wish to ask when was Mr. Bollard appointed in the department ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was appointed in 1884.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Has he been in the department since ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Was he not sent to the Yukon for some time ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am informed that he never was sent to the Yukon.

Mr. CLANCY. Are there any statutory increases included in this increased vote ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am informed that in every case where a clerk was eligible for the statutory increase it has been granted to him.

Mr. CLANCY. Are we to understand that the Postmaster General and his friends have receded from the position they took at one time, viz., that no statutory increases should be given, or are these increases given under the system adopted by this present government on recommendations made by the favourites of the department ? When the government took office they set their face against statutory increases except as a matter of grace on the part of the minister for the time being. Has the Postmaster General abandoned that policy and will the civil servants in future receive their statutory increase under the Civil Service Act, as they did in the past ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In all these cases the services of the clerks were such as to entitle them to these increases. The labourer is worthy of his hire and is being paid accordingly. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) will not object to our taking advantage of this privilege in the law to ask parliament for this vote.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has given a beautiful explanation. I asked him if he had abandoned the policy of refusing to give statutory increases unless it suited the sweet will of the minister, and he evaded that question. Now let me ask him again : Has the government abandoned the system they found in operation when they came into power and which was that unless there was some substantial reason why a civil servant should not receive his statutory increase he was entitled to it by law.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We propose to give an increase to those who are deserving of it. If my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) can show that these men are not entitled to their increase we will be glad to hear from him about it.

Mr. CLANCY. It is scarcely worthy of a minister of the Crown to give such an answer as that. The minister is bound to give this committee all reasonable information, and he has not the right to ask a member on either side of the House to show cause why a civil servant was or was not entitled to an increase. I was going to say that the hon. minister was 'dodging' the question, but although that might be substantially true it may not be parliamentary. I trust the Postmaster General will give all reasonable information to this committee as he is bound to do.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know what more I can say. The government are proposing to give these increases to the officers named because they deserve them. There is the statute and there are the officers, and we are exercising the privilege which the statute confers upon us.

Mr. CLANCY. We have obtained that much information from the hon. gentleman —there is a statute. The hon. gentleman disregarded the statute in the past. I would like to ask on whose recommendation these increases were made.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. All these increases are based upon the recommendation of the deputy minister.

Mr. CLANCY. Have those who have been advanced passed the civil service examination in every case ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, all those referred to.

Mr. CLANCY. When were these recommendations made ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Some time last December, a short time before the deputy minister went away. He went into the case with the minister, and made the recommendations.

Department of Indian Affairs, $66,610.

Mr. INGRAM. Who are the chief clerks in the Indian Department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There are four chief clerks : John D. McLean secretary, at $2,400 ; D. C. Scott, accountant, at $2,100 ; S. Stewart, assistant secretary, at $1,950 ; R. Rimmer, law clerk, at $2,050.

Mr. INGRAM. Have there been any changes in the chief clerks in this department for some time back ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The last change was the appointment of Mr. Rimmer in 1898.

Mr. INGRAM. Did he get the maximum salary then, or did he start at a lower salary and receive increases ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Rimmer was appointed in 1898 at a salary of $2,000 a year. Since then he has had one increase only, of $50.

Mr. INGRAM. Is he entitled to an increase the same as the others ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The maximum, as the hon. gentleman knows, is $2,400.

Mr. INGRAM. There must be some reason why he has not received the annual increase since his appointment.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is not a case of a man entering the service as a junior and spending several years before reaching his present position. He got $2,000 at the time of his appointment, and I am informed that the minister thought he should remain at that salary for a short time until it would be wise to recommend an increase.

Mr. INGRAM. Then I understand that this gentleman was appointed in 1898 and was paid $2,000, which he was not entitled to. Is that the general rule followed in all departments ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no rule on the subject. He was appointed a chief clerk and law officer, a more or less technical position, at $2,000. There is no question of being entitled until parliament votes the money. Since his apointment he was recommended for one increase which made his salary $2,050, and he is now recommended for another.

Mr. INGRAM. The point I want to get at is if these increases are to be given by a sliding scale, who has a right to recommend them from year to year ? There surely ought to be some principle governing these cases.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose the increase should be based either on merit or take place automatically. I think the view of this government is that there should be an exercise of judgment on the part of the minister in the case of high-priced officers. In the case of low-priced officers, I think, expressing my own opinion, that the increase should be given automatically, unless a man disqualifies himself from receiving it. You can hardly compare the case of a law clerk with the case of a secretary performing a different class of work altogether. Each case should be judged on its own merits.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How many different departments are under the charge of the Minister of the Interior ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Department of Indian Affairs, the Department of the Interior and the Geological Survey.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has that system been found to work well ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. So far as I can see, it has been most satisfactory for the last six years. I cannot speak as to before that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman (Sir William Mulock) was not so careful as to his speaking in former years. If the system of having three departments under one cabinet minister works so well, might I ask the Postmaster General, or my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when we may expect that reform of which we heard a good deal before 1896—the period concerning which the hon. Postmaster General is so unwilling to speak—the reduction of the number of cabinet minister from 14 to 7. We can all remember how in those days a gentleman very prominent on the other side, now Minister of Trade and Commerce (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), advocated that policy. and perhaps I had better address myself to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce unless my right hon. friend would like to deal with the question himself.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I never expressed such an opinion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will observe that he is repudiated by his leader.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). My right hon. colleague has merely said that he never expressed that opinion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Which is tantamount to a repudiation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is your inference.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is perhaps in return for the somewhat taunting speech which the Minister of Trade and Commerce made last year, in which he recalled to the right hon. gentleman the fact that he had made a very strong free trade speech in Winnipeg. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will remember how he turned round to the leader of the government and said that the words he had used at Winnipeg were very excellent words at the time and would be very excellent now. We on this side rather felt for the leader of the government on that occasion. But since the right hon. gentleman who leads the government will not take this matter up, perhaps his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will. My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce belongs to a cabinet which has fourteen members drawing salaries and I do not know how many without portfolio. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was strongly of the opinion in the olden days before 1896, that seven cabinet ministers being enough for the United States should be quite enough for Canada. It would be interesting to know whether or not he is still of that opinion, and if not when and why did he change it. We have it from the Postmaster General, that this system of having three departments under the one minister works excellently well. Why not take the department of Trade and Commerce and Customs and Inland Revenue and place them all under the control of the Minister of Customs ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. And Public Works also ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend from St. Mary's Division (Mr. Tarte) has always a valuable suggestion to offer. Why not throw in the Department of Public Works ? This would give my hon. friend the Minister of Customs a somewhat wider scope for the splendid energies he is wont to exhibit on all occasions. I offer this suggestion particularly for the approval of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who no doubt will take this occasion to urge on his leader and colleagues the advisability of the change. If seven ministers were sufficient for Canada six or seven years ago. they ought to be now, just as they are in the United States.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman has not quoted me correctly. As a mere matter of personal opinion, I do not object to state that I have not altered my opinion which I have expressed several times to the effect—not that I think we should follow the American system—but that I greatly prefer the English system. Speaking academically, of course, I would rather have the number of cabinet ministers reduced and have a very much larger number of junior officials similar to the under secretaries of state. Theoretically considered, I think that that is a far better system than the one we have fallen into. It is scarcely worth while at this time of day to recall the reasons which compelled us to inaugurate the present system at the time of confederation. They were political rather than reasons of business. My experience has confirmed me in the view that if we were free to act—which unfortunately we were not—it would have been better for all of us if we had a number of under secretaries and a more moderate number of cabinet ministers. That is my individual opinion and the hon. gentleman is welcome to it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I suppose this is only one of the many instances in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is suffering, and suffering in silence, from the fact that the ideas he so loudly and strenuously advocated when in opposition have not been adopted by his colleagues with whom he is compelled nevertheless to co-operate. There are many other things, I dare say, on which, if we could induce the Minister of Trade and Commerce to unbosom himself, he could similarly enlighten us, but we have not gained much information on the question as to whether the present number of cabinet ministers is to be increased or decreased. All we know is that a very prominent gentleman in the cabinet is convinced that the cabinet is too large, and that we have more ministers than the country requires. But he dare not venture to urge that the number should be reduced even to the extent of one. It seems to me that the right hon. the first minister should take the House into his confidence and tell us to what extent, if any, he sympathizes with the views of his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That hon. gentleman has been frank. He tells us that he still holds the view that there are too many ministers of the Crown, and the country is interested in knowing from the first minister whether, despite the views of his colleagues, he is not only not going to reduce the number of cabinet ministers but on the contrary proposes to increase them. If we are to place any credence in the well authenticated rumours which were used in order to encourage the hearts of the faithful in the west and to serve election purposes, another portfolio is to be created—that of the Minister of Mines. At one time, the Minister of Mines was to be taken from the province of British Columbia, but lately, during the Yukon election, the country was informed that the government candidate in that election, if successful, was to be chosen for that position. I think that the right hon. gentleman, who, I am glad to see in his place ought to satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the public on this question. He ought to let the country know whether he proposes to reduce the number of his colleagues or whether he proposes to add to that number by appointing a Minister of Mines.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I should think that, by this time, having been for some time in public life, my hon. friend (Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) would cease to attach much importance to rumours. For my part, I am a little older than he is, and I have ceased to care what rumours may be. I do not think that parliament should care much or lose time in seeking to ascertain whether any given rumour is true or is not true. Governments have their own way of acting, and that is by official method ; and, so long as no official action is taken by the government there is nothing to find fault with. But I see that my hon. friend, not having anything serious to criticise in the action of the government, wishes to criticise in advance. He wishes to know whether we intend to appoint a new minister, and, in case that may be done at any time, he indulges in criticism in advance. So far, nothing has been done in the way of increasing the cabinet, it seems to me he is simply borrowing trouble in worrying over the matter. I would suggest to him that he should not allow his sleep to be disturbed by matters of that kind. It will be time enough to worry when the government presents any such proposition. But, so long as they do not do so, I cannot see why he should criticise.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. All this sounds very pretty, Mr. Chairman. But, of course, there is nothing in it. The Prime Minister, with the support which the country seems to be blindly giving him of late, can afford to be jaunty and light-hearted about these things, and to tell us that the people have no right to be curious. But it is not so long ago that such questions as I have referred to were made to do duty in the interest of the Reform party, so called. Take for instance the case of my old colleague, Col. Prior, formerly one of the members of this House from Victoria, B.C. He happened to join the Conservative administration and to hold the position of Commissioner of Inland Revenue, a subordinate position in the administration but not in the council. And the party which the right hon. gentleman then led made a great deal of capital out of the implied slight to the province of British Columbia—that it had been so long denied representation in the cabinet, and at last its representative had been given a position in the government but denied a place in the cabinet. From that time on, the right hon. gentleman's representatives in British Columbia have been assuring the people there that it is only because of the Chinese immigration question, that it is only because the right hon. gentleman is so engrossed with this, that or the other question of, perhaps, great importance, that he has not been able to carry out his heart's desire, which, his lieutenants assure the faithful in that part of the country, is to have British Columbia represented in the cabinet. So, these are not altogether rumours, but are statements which do duty and make votes for the right hon. gentleman. This is the time to air the rumour, if the right hon. gentleman will allow me to refer to it as such, and have it either punctured or confirmed. Let us know whether these people who pretend to speak with authority have the slightest reason for that pretense, or whether they have been simply pleasantly spoken to by the right hon. gentleman, as I have been. Shall we tell them, when they assure us that the province is to be directly represented in the cabinet, and that Senator Templeman's position without portfolio is an earnest of the intention of that government that soon there will be a member sitting at the head of a department, that there is nothing in it—that it is only rumour ? Or shall we say the same when we are told that the member for the Yukon (Mr. Ross) is to be the happy man ? I dare say it is embarrassing to the right hon. gentleman to be asked to take the House into his confidence. It may be very inopportune for him to explain the situation of the government now. But, surely, speaking as one of the committee on the country's business to the head of the government, I have the right to ask, and to press the right hon. gentleman to say whether there is anything in the statements that have been made and largely circulated throughout the country ; or whether they are, as he has suggested, mere rumours. If he wishes to convey the idea that these matters have been the subject of rumour and nothing more, that is an answer to the question I have put. And, if that be so, then are hon. gentlemen opposite prepared to make good their profession of reducing the number of ministers instead of increasing them ? If, on the other hand, they have been seriously considering the appointment of a Minister of Mines, whether in the person of a representative from British Columbia or of the representative from the Yukon, it is clear that they intend to depart in this particular, as they have in so many others, from their past professions.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has at all improved his position. I must say that I decline to recognize any rumours whatever.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They are only rumours then ?

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend quotes any word of mine or of any of my colleagues, I am ready to answer. friend quotes any word of mine or of any thing to say as to where they originated or on what authority they were circulated, I decline to be bound by them or even to answer any questions with regard to them. If, for instance, Senator Templeman has said anything on the subject, or if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) can trace anything I said, his question will be a proper one. But life is too short for one to hold himself responsible for what appears in newspapers about one. I do not think that when the hon. gentleman was in the government he held himself responsible for what appeared about him in the newspapers or for rumours of any kind. The hon. gentleman spoke of a wish of my heart not being realized. I must say that that has happened more than once—I have failed to realize things that I had very much at heart. And this may be one of those things—I do not say it is not. The hon. gentleman has not made out a case, and if he wishes to draw me in this way, I am sorry to say he is hardly likely to succeed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) does not always hold himself bound even by the statement of his colleagues. I referred him to a statement of his present colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and he refused absolutely to be bound by it—repudiated it at the very outset, and left my poor unfortunate friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to struggle with the matter as best he might. I think I am justified in saying one thing on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has struggled with the situation, as best he could, from 1896 down to the present hour, seeking to have the number of his colleagues reduced to seven, but not at all desirous of having the reduction commence with the Department of Trade and Commerce. But he will not stand any further additions to the cabinet. I want to say that distinctly on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has made up his mind on that point—the cabinet has grown as far as he will stand. If the Prime Minister attempts to add to the members of the cabinet, I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce will strike. I think I have the right to say this in justice to my right hon. friend (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) because he does not appear to be inclined to say it for himself.

Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that he would be glad indeed to see the cabinet reduced to the number of seven, if we were free to reduce it. When did we lose our freedom in that regard ? I think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister boasted of our glorious freedom in England, and gave up for that boast our chances of preferential trade with England in 1897. We have that glorious freedom, at least, have we not ? Let me direct the attention of my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the fact that we can reduce the number of departments at any time, we are perfectly free in that regard. We have just as much freedom now as we had when he made that pronouncement in 1895. In what respect has our condition changed with regard to freedom ? I do not quite follow the observations of the hon. gentleman ; perhaps he will make the situation clearer to the House than it is at present. But coming back to what the Postmaster General said a moment ago, we are in this position, that a gentleman occupying the position of cabinet minister and acting as Minister of the Interior, tells us that the system of working three very important departments together, requiring a great deal of labour and attention to details, answers perfectly well, and is in the best interests of the country. Well, does not this declaration made by one of the right hon. gentleman's most important colleagues, justify us in asking whether the government has any idea of carrying out a system of that kind. My right hon. friend seems to think that he is not obliged to give any answer to this question because the word rumour has been mentioned. Let us dismiss the rumour altogether. I think, however, there was something more than a rumour, because these allegations were made on public platforms by gentlemen speaking in the interests of the Liberal party in a recent election. However, let us dismiss the question of rumour. Here we have a declaration made by a gentleman who now holds an important position in the Liberal party and in this government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a declaration never repudiated, so far as I am aware, by my right hon. friend. Then we have the declaration of the Postmaster General that the system under which the pledge of the Minister of Trade and Commerce might be carried out answers excellently well in the interests of the country. My right hon. friend thinks he gets rid of all that by saying that there is nothing more than a rumour. Now, let me ask why it is that a policy which the Minister of Trade and Commerce pledged himself to the people of this country years ago to carry out, if I remember his words correctly, and which his colleague says now would be in the best interests of the country, is not carried out by this government. I think my right hon. friend ought to treat this matter more seriously than by dismissing it on the ground that is a mere rumour.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce can well take care of himself, as perhaps the hon. gentleman opposite will find if he persists in his attempt to draw him out. Let me relate as a warning to the hon. gentleman a story told by the late Hon. Mr. Huntingdon in this House, under somewhat similar circumstances, for the benefit of an hon. gentleman opposite him. A little boy received a present of a jack knife, and, with it he tried to carve his name upon the hind quarters of a mule. Some time after the doctor had tried to put his nose into shape and reduce the swelling of his eyes, the little boy said to his father : 'Pa, do you think I will ever look as nice as before ?' 'No,' said his father, 'but you will be a darn sight wiser.'

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my right hon. friend feels obliged to compare the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a mule, that is his own affair. He says the Minister of Trade and Commerce is well able to take care of himself. I entirely agree with that, and I believe he is also able to take care of a good many persons who are nearly related to him. I do not know but that the same observation could be applied to the leader of the government of this country. Now, we have had a very interesting discussion with regard to this matter, I do not know whether my right hon. friend feels pleased with it or not. He has not seen fit to make a declaration of the policy of his government with regard to it, but he has seen fit to treat a great question of this kind in a flippant manner instead of giving such an answer as might be expected from the leader of the government. Does my right hon. friend think that this flippant way of dealing with a matter declared to be of so much importance by one of his own colleagues, is really what the country expects of him ? Does he think that by telling some stale story he will get rid of public responsibility in this regard ? I do not think that his method of dealing with a matter of this kind is consistent either with public interest or with the dignified position which he holds. The Postmaster General has made a very important statement here to-day. He says that the system of working three great departments under one minister of the Crown answers very well indeed.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not lay down any general proposition. The hon. gentleman asked whether the combination of the Department of the Interior, the Department of Indian Affairs and the Geological Survey under one minister had worked satisfactorily. I said that so far as I knew it worked satisfactorily last year. I did not say that other departments could be grouped together. There are departments and departments.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have this to say to the hon. gentleman, who I am sorry to say has not as good temper as he might have, that I thought the whole discussion was in the nature of banter. But if he wants to have an answer from the government on this great question of policy as to what ought to be the constitution of the cabinet, I think he will agree with me that the present occasion is not well suited to a discussion of that kind where we are only discussing the estimates of the Department of the Interior. If he desires, however, to ascertain the views of the government with relation to the constitution of the cabinet, which might be a very proper and important question to discuss, if he will give us proper notice we will be glad to gratify him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am glad to find that the right hon. gentleman is willing to deal with this matter in a fairer tone. It may be that some notice should be given to the government, and I am willing to accept that suggestion. In view of what he has said, I will take a further opportunity during the session, after proper notice, of asking the right hon. gentleman to state his policy on this question.

Mr. SPROULE. I should imagine that the Prime Minister had been reading very carefully the Gamey debate in the local House, for I notice that that little story of his has been given down there. I thought that the late Joseph Rymal had patented that story, but since he has died, I suppose the Prime Minister thought there could be no objection to him using it after it had been used in Toronto. But, what I rose more particularly to draw attention to was the fact that the right hon. leader of the House speaks of not being held accountable for rumour. The present government have surely something more than rumour to work upon ; they have the resolution which was moved in this House and supported by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time when it was proposed to establish the Commissioner of Customs and the Commissioner of Inland Revenue, which, they said, was increasing the number of the departments and they thought it their duty to protest strenuously against it. Then, we have the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues enlarging these two commissionerships into full fledged ministerial departments and he took one of them himself. That was much more than rumour and not only that but they made it retroactive so as to enable themselves to collect a salary for the year which was past and gone. That was not rumour. That was dealing with facts which took place in this House and therefore is ample justification for referring to the matter and especially in view of the fact that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has occupied the position ever since and must have assented to it before Council or otherwise it could not have come before the House notwithstanding the views he held in regard to it before he became a cabinet minister in the present government.

Mr. HACKETT. Before you declare that item carried, Mr. Chairman, if we are discussing the question of cabinet ministers, I want to say one word for the province of Prince Edward Island. Almost since the time of confederation, we have had a member of the cabinet representing that province. A short time ago, when Sir Louis Davies was removed from this House to a higher position, a gentleman contested the constituency which he had represented in his stead. A good deal has been said here about rumour. The right hon. leader of the government has said that he cannot be held accountable for rumour. I can assure him that I attended meetings during the contest and it was held up to the electors of West Queen's that if they elected the gentleman who now represents that riding he would be a cabinet minister. There is no province that requires more to be represented by a cabinet minister that Prince Edward Island owing to its isolated position, and owing to the fact that we are shut out for a long time in the year from communication with the mainland. There is no province that has a greater right or is more deserving to be represented in the cabinet than the province of Prince Edward Island. We have suffered this year for the want of representation in the cabinet and we are likely to suffer longer. I see that the hon. member for West Queen's (Mr. Farquharson) sitting now at the left of the right hon. leader of the government, he has not yet been appointed to the cabinet, and I would urge upon the right hon. gentleman that if he wishes to do justice to the province of Prince Edward Island he should see that hon. gentleman is elevated to the proud position of a member of the cabinet, the promise of which induced many electors to vote for him.

Some resolutions reported.

QUESTIONS.

WHEAT SHIPMENTS FROM PORT HURON AND FORT WILLIAM, &c.

Mr. BENNETT asked:

How many bushels of wheat were shipped from Port Arthur and Fort William during the season of navigation of 1902, and the destination of same (by water to other lake ports) from said ports?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). In reply I beg to say:

Wheat shipped by vessels and destination of same during season of navigation, April 11th, to December 5th, 1902, from the ports of Fort William and Port Arthur.

Pt. Huron	827,293.20	869,945.20	1,697,238.40
Total bush.	23,551,643.20	12,126,873.30	35,678,516.50

On account of the elevator at Port Edward being burned, the elevator at Port Huron was used for the 1,697,238.40 bushels, which eventually came back to Canada, so that the real shipment to United States was only 11,893,487 bushels, and the total to Canadian ports would be 23,785,029.50 bushels.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). The hon. gentleman asked last week for the total receipts at the various ports. I was not able to give the receipts at Sarnia, but on subsequent inquiry I find that they amounted to 3,884,391 bushels during the season of navigation of 1902. I would also state that in the answer I then gave with reference to the port of Goderich, there was an error. The receipts were given as 2,226,660 bushels. They said 3,226,660.

JUDGE MYERS.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette) asked :

Was the Minister of Justice correctly reported in 'Hansard' of February 21, 1902, when in answer to a question as to when a successor to Judge Prendergast would be appointed, he replied 'in the immediate future ?'

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement contained in 'Hansard' with respect to the appointment of Mr. Myers who was appointed the 3rd of January, 1893. I am informed that he was at the time a member of the local legislature for the electoral division of Minnedosa, province of Manitoba.

FREE RURAL MAIL DELIVERY.

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin)—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

Is it the intention of the government to introduce a system of free rural mail delivery in any part of the Dominion during the present year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. James Sutherland). In the absence of the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock) I may inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson) that the matter referred to in his question is under the consideration of the government.

CONTRACT FOR 25,000 TONS STEEL RAILS.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. To whom was the contract for 25,000 tons steel rails, to be delivered in June, 1903, given?
2. At what prices ?
3. Who were the other tenderers ?
4. What were their prices ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The contract for these rails has been awarded to a Glasgow firm and the contract itself has been sent forward for execution, but has not yet been received. Until the contract itself has come back executed, it would not be in accordance with the custom in these matters to allow the names of other tenderers to transpire. I should be very glad to inform the hon. gentleman who has made the inquiry as soon as we receive the contract executed, so that he may repeat the question.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING PRIVATE BANKERS.

Mr. McGOWAN asked :

Is it the intention of the government to introduce any legislation at the present session regarding private bankers, so that the transactions of such bankers may be made more public than at present, and enable depositors to ascertain their financial strength ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). It is not in contemplation to introduce any legislation of the character mentioned in the question. Persons who call themselves private bankers stand in the same relation to the public as any other business persons.

COST OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

How much has been paid to date in connection with taking the census of 1901 ? What further sum will be required to complete the census of 1901 ? Has the expenditure in connection with that service been completed ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). In answer to the latter part of the question, I would inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), that the expenditure has not been completed. The remainder of the question is covered by a motion before the House, in response to which the information will be promptly brought down.

RESIGNATION OF THE WARDEN OF ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. Morin—asks (translation) :

1. Has Dr. Duchesneau, Warden of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, given in his resignation ?
2. If so, has the government accepted it ?
3. If not, has the Minister of Justice, or any one belonging to the Department of Justice, had any interview or correspondence with the warden of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary on the subject of his resignation ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. H. M. Carroll). (Translation.) The answer to the first and second questions is : No. As to the third question, I would say that there has been no official correspondence or interview on the matter.

3. For what service or services were the said respective sums paid to the said P. D. Tyerman in each instance ?

1. Who is the person, or who are the persons, in charge of and responsible for the printing of the electoral lists?

2. In the case of errors of addition or of omission of the names of electors on the electoral lists at the King's Printer's, who is the one to be held responsible for such errors?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The King's Printer prints the lists as received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. If any errors occur in the printing, the King's Printer is the responsible officer.

W. W. FITZGERALD—HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the government, or any member of the government, and W. W. Fitzgerald, of Grenfell, Assa., or any one in his behalf, regarding his homestead and pre-emption, which were cancelled.

He said : I am not familiar with the facts in this case, and, therefore do not propose to say anything about it. I only desire to get the correspondence so as to satisfy Mr. Fitzgerald that everything was regular, as he seems to think it was not. I have made inquiries in the department, and so far as I know, everything was done regularly. Mr. Fitzgerald wishes to get the correspondence, and therefore I make the motion.

Motion agreed to.

COST OF TAKING THE CENSUS.

Mr. TAYLOR—by Mr. Sproule—moved :

For a return showing the total cost of the taking of the census for 1871, 1881 and 1891. Also, the amount paid on account of the taking of the census for 1901, up to March 1, 1903.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I move in amendment that the following words be added :

Also a statement showing the nature of the information given in the census of 1891 and in that of 1901, and the mode of remuneration of the enumerators on each occasion.

Mr. J. CLANCY (Bothwell). I desire to avail myself of this motion to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to what seems to be a growing evil in this House, namely, that when we ask a short question the information answering which it is within the capacity of a clerk to prepare within ten or fifteen minutes, we are told on this side of the House that we must wait for a return ; and when the motion is put upon the paper to bring down that return, though it would probably not involve a great deal of time, the hon. gentleman rises in his place and proposes an amendment that involves considerable work, thereby delaying the information which the House is entitled to. I just desire to say to the hon. gentleman that I do not think he is treating this side of the House fairly. I can understand that there are many cases where questions may be asked upon both sides of the House in relation to which a return would better give all the information required, but that involves a great deal more work. But I want to say to the hon. gentleman that the question asked by my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and the one subsequently asked by myself, do not involve much work. If the hon. gentleman expects to get along with the work of this House—and we on this side desire to aid him in every possible way—I can tell him that he is not pursuing the right course in order to accomplish that object. I repeat that the hon. gentleman's refusal to give the answer from his seat in the House rather than oblige members on this side to ask for a return, which may turn out to be quite a lengthy one, is unfair, and is narrowing the rights and privileges of the opposition of this House. I hope the hon. gentleman will reconsider his position, and that he will give me the information that I have asked, specially in view of his amendment just made to the motion of my hon. friend from Leeds, which adds a great deal of work to the original motion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The point of the hon. gentleman's remarks is that this amendment is going to cause considerable delay. If it should so prove, my hon. friend's position will be justified ; but if the information is promptly brought down, I do not suppose he attaches much importance to the form in which it is brought down. I can promise the hon. gentleman that there will be no unreasonable delay.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to say what day that return will be brought down ? The reason I ask is because the information is important, and we should have it at once.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot fix a day, but I will promise the hon. gentleman the return will be prompt.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I would just remind the hon. gentleman that it is necessary the return should be prompt, because there are items in the estimates which we wish to discuss with those figures before us. Therefore the Minister of Finance will see the importance of furnishing to the House the statement at the earliest possible moment. His amendment, of course, will necessitate a great deal of delay.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Practically no estimates touching this subject will be proceeded with until the information is brought down.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the House whether it is the intention of the government to introduce a general telephone Act this session, as was promised last session.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask the hon. gentleman to give notice of this question.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 8) to amend the Expropriation Act (the Minister of Justice) read the second time and House went into Committee thereon.

On section 1.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me to be a new principle to introduce into the expropriation power, under the general power of eminent domain, which is given the government to exercise. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will explain whether there is authority in any other country to exercise this power to the limited extent that is proposed now. The government have the power to take property where it is essential in the interest of the community upon giving a fair remuneration for it, but, I have never heard of the power being given to exercise the right of expropriation for a limited period. There may be some other countries which exercise this right and there may be a precedent in England for it but I have never heard of such legislation before.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Mr. Chairman, I am not aware that there is such leglislation in England, but a Bill similar to this was introduced into this House a few years ago and passed. It was rejected in the Senate because the Bill made the law applicable to cases then pending in the courts, and of course, that was a departure from the general principle which the Senate could not sanction, and as a result the Bill was withdrawn. There is nothing, in my judgment at all events, more natural than that the government should have the right to take a property for a limited period of time, if the uses for which the government want the property are sufficient to justify them in exercising a limited control over it. Take the construction of a public work in the vicinity of a quarry, for instance; we want to build a lock on a canal, why should it be incumbent upon the government to expropriate the quarry and to retain it for all time to come when in all probability we only require to use the quarry for one or two years? Why should the government not have the right, if they are willing to pay for it, to take the property for any limited time the government desire, to use it for that time and after the expiration of that time to allow it to revert back to its owner? It seems to me it is a very wise principle in legislation not to encumber the government with the property after it becomes useless and after they have used it for a certain period of time. I want my hon. friends to understand that the object of the Bill is to enable the government to acquire the use of property for a limited period of time, that is to exercise the right of expropriation for a limited period, at the expiration of that time the property to revert to its owner, the government paying for the damage the man may have suffered during the time that the government had used it. There is nothing unjust or unfair in that proposition as it appears to me.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman must see at once what is involved in that? How is it possible when you make the expropriation, to know the user of it that you intend?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. You are obliged to state the time for which you require it.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. How are you going to be able to say whether you are going to take ten yards of stone from a quarry or a million yards of stone at the time of the expropriation?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. You are obliged to do that in expropriating permanently. When you are going to expropriate permanently you know the property you are going to expropriate and the judge assesses the value of the property. The elementary principle is to determine the quantity of stone you are going to take. I have had experience with cases of this kind.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman entirely misunderstands my argument on the question. When you expropriate for the use of the government and exercise the government's right of eminent domain you know the value of the property.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. How do you know?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It can be determined by arbitration. The right of eminent domain should not be exercised except it is in the interest of the Crown and the people at large. You know the value of a property; it is possible to determine it, but how is it possible to determine beforehand what the user would be of a quarry which the government is going to take for a limited period. We will, for instance, require the use of a property for two or three years and the government only intend to take so many yards of stone out of it. To exercise the right of expropriation you want to know how many yards of stone you will take out of it or what the user will be. It is impossible to know this at the time of expropriation. I doubt very much the power of this government to exercise this power to a limited extent. It may be that as you can exercise the power to the fullest extent and can expropriate absolutely, you also have the lesser power of taking possession of the property for a year or two, but, the anomaly occurs that it must be impossible to tell the user what the government intend to make of a property for a short time when expropriating it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has suggested no serious difficulty in the working out of the provisions of this Bill. I agree with him that at present the government has no power to expropriate any limited interest in property and that is the reason why the government is seeking power from parliament which has the right to confer that power. If we find it necessary in the carrying out of any public work to acquire an interest in property for a limited term of years, or a limited interest in any sense, we are asking parliament to allow us to do that, in the public interest.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why should the public be benefited at the expense of private individuals ? Why should my property which is expropriated for a limited time be ruined and then that the government should have power to throw it back on my hands ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman evidently objects to the principle of expropriation altogether.

Mr. COCHRANE. No, I do not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is as unjust to take a man's property from him altogether as to take it for a limited term.

Mr. COCHRANE. There is a difference. If you take a piece of my property for all time to come the arbitrators can settle what that property is worth, but no arbitrators could settle the value of a property that the government was only going to take for a limited time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) evidently does not believe that there can be any equitable expropriation of private property for public uses, or else he would not suggest that objection. I say that it is just as much of an outrage to take a man's property altogether as it is to take it in part. Suppose a public work is going on and that you want to place the necessary plant on private property during the two or three years that the work is going on. You can judge how long you may want to use that property and you will be careful to expropriate it for such a time, or if you do not expropriate it for a sufficient length of time you would have to expropriate it later on for a further term. You are bound to compensate the owner of that property for any damage he will suffer, and if he is compensated to that extent what has he to complain of ? Why can it not be as easily estimated what damages the owner of a property will suffer if you take it for two years as if you take it for ever ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is exactly the point.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Suppose you want to take a dwelling house for ten years, is there no way of ascertaining the just amount the owner should receive for that period.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. There is no trouble at all in a case of that kind.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then there is no trouble at all in any case. Now in the case of a quarry—suppose there is a quarry right alongside a public work and that it would be in the public interest to expropriate only a part of that quarry ; assume that that quarry is equipped with all the necessary plant for its working ; assume that the government wants to expropriate one quarter or one half, what difficulty would there be in the way of estimating the value of that part of the property which the government wanted to expropriate. Surely the owner would be paid full compensation to cover any injury he would suffer. Unless this committee can be convinced that no method can be devised by which a property owner can have just and reasonable compensation for the limited interest you are taking in his property then there can be no objection to this Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE. But you are dealing with a quarry that has already been opened. There is a difference between the expropriation of such a quarry and the expropriation of a quarry that has not been opened.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What is the difference ?

Mr. COCHRANE. The difference is that when a quarry is opened there is no damage other than for the material you take out of it, but if you expropriate land on which to open a quarry and you pay perhaps for only one fifth of it, you will destroy it for all time to come for any other purpose because it might be that no one else would want to use that quarry but the government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has answered his own objection. If it were found impossible to estimate fairly the amount of damages that would be done to a quarry that is not opened, then the owner can claim from the tribunal all the compensation he could possibly suffer, and unless the government is able to bring evidence to show that he does not suffer full damages they would have to pay the bill ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the object of your Bill then ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The government would take a portion of that quarry sufficient to give it enough stone to suit their purpose, and it would have to pay for it. There is no danger that any one who has his property taken is not going to get all the compensation he is entitled to ; the danger is the other way.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister says that if the property owner does not know what user the government is going to take of the expropriated property, he can ask the fullest damages possible. Why not take the whole property, then ? The owner should receive payment for all the value put upon the property. The trouble of an expropriation for a short time is the difficulty of knowing the damage or the value of the user.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That is for the court to determine.

Hon. Mr HAGGART. Suppose a property is covered with timber, and it is necessary for the government to take the timber off the land for two or three years.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. You cannot do that under the Expropriation Act.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes, you can. It is an absolute expropriation of the property for the term for which it is taken, to cut timber or to do anything else with it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Timber is not real estate once it is cut.

Hon. Mr HAGGART. It is real estate when it is growing on the land. The stone in the quarry is also part of the real estate. The minister sees the absurdity of the proposition in regard to timber, but he says the Act does not apply to that. Why does it not apply to that just as well as to the stone in the quarry or to the soil ? The application is the same. If the property is expropriated for a term of two or three or five years, it is as absolute an expropriation as an expropriation forever. How is the party whose land is expropriated to know whether the government is going to use the whole of the quarry or only a portion of it ? He can only know the amount he is entitled to when the government abandons it. No legislature in the world has ever before made provision for the partial exercise of the right of eminent domain. I never heard of it either in the United States or Great Britain. There is only one way to exercise the right of eminent domain or of taking the property of an individual for the purposes of the Crown, and that is to take it absolutely and pay for it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I do not know that it is necessary to discuss with my hon. friend the question of the partial exercise of the power of eminent domain ; but I want to point out that when it is desired to expropriate property for the purpose of public utility, the first thing a government has to do is to give a notice containing a description of the property and having attached to it a plan of the property which it is intended to expropriate. At the same time, it is necessary for the government to deposit the amount of money which is considered to be the fair value of the property taken. If you want, for instance, to expropriate a quarry which has not been opened, the first thing necessary is to ascertain the quantity of material contained in the quarry, otherwise it is impossible for the government to estimate or the court to determine how much the compensation should be. Before the amount to be paid by way of compensation can be determined, it is necessary to ascertain the extent to which the government is going to benefit and the extent to which the individual is going to be prejudiced. If the government wants a part of the quarry—one half or one third or one fourth—it is as easy for the government to determine what the value of that portion is, as it is to determine the value of the whole. I put it to the common sense of the House whether it would be right for the government in case they want to use a quarry for the purpose of extracting 100 or 200 cubic yards of stone rom it, to be obliged to expropriate the whole quarry in perpetuity, and after they have extracted what they require, to have the property lie useless on their hands ? Is it not more fair and equitable for the government to say, we want that quantity of stone, for that we are prepared to pay, and after we have paid for that, then the property reverts to the orginal owner. To what extent is the original owner prejudiced ? From his quarry so much stone has been taken, he has been paid for the quantity so taken, he has been paid for damage caused by the expropriation. He has not suffered any loss, and the property remains on his hands. Is that not more fair and equitable than to require the government to expropriate the whole property ?

Mr. SPROULE. Could not the government dispose of the quarry ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. In what way could the government, under these conditions, dispose of a quarry to benefit the public ?

Mr. COCHRANE. What good would the property be to the owner after it had been destroyed for all time to come ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. If it is destroyed for all time to come, he gets the full value of it.

Mr. COCHRANE. You do not know what damage you do till you are through with it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. If you do not, you cannot expropriate. It is for the government to make out their case.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose the government required a few cords of stone, and upon the basis of that the compensation was fixed ; but it turned out that they required three or four times that amount.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. They would have to pay for it.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the arrangement be according to a schedule of prices ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No. My hon. friend must bear in mind that when the government or anybody representing the government enter on a man's property for the purpose of expropriating it, it is incumbent on the government to determine the limits of the property they require. They are looked upon as trespassers and the courts require them to describe the property they wish to take, they cannot go an inch beyond that description. If the government expropriate 300 or 400 yards of stone, when that quantity is exhausted they are obliged to leave the property or give a new notice of expropriation, because the expropriation is always held to be for the benefit of the party from whom it is expropriated.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. By the wording of the hon. gentleman's Bill, he may expropriate a limited estate in the property of any individual. He may expropriate a property for sufficient length of time to take 300 of 400 cubic yards of stone out of it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The limit would have to be described in the notice for expropriation. In that notice you must inform the court what you intend to take, and are bound strictly by its terms. There is no rule more firmly established than that you cannot go one inch beyond the limit of your notice.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is as to boundary but not as to the estate.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You have the right to occupy during a given term, and during that occupation you take out a certain quantity of stone.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Not under the power of eminent domain.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are changing the law.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You are establishing the principle of absolutely expropriating for a limited term and for a limited purpose. You are to have absolute property only for the purpose of taking out a certain quantity of stone.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Let me give a case which has actually occurred. In connection with a public work, it is necessary to put a guy on an adjoining property, and that guy is only required for the purpose of a derrick or putting up a pier. Why should you be obliged to take that piece of property for all time when you only required it for two or three months and it was absolutely useless to you afterwards ? Let me put another case, and one that has occurred within my knowledge. You have a quarry some distance away from the construction you are building, as in the case of the Quebec bridge. To get to that quarry you have to pass over two or three pieces of property. You only want the right of way while you are constructing your bridge, after your bridge is finished, the right of passage is absolutely valuless. But under the law you have to expropriate those pieces of property for all time. Would it not be fair that you should simply pay the owners for the use of their property during the time you required it and then hand it back to them. Is it fair that you should have to buy that property for all time ? It seems to me that the fairness of the rule asked for is quite evident.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I beg to differ from the hon. gentleman. I could understand his argument with reference to an easement, for instance, for the purpose of building a dam, or some other public work, but that case is provided for in most of the local acts of the local legislature.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not at all.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. In some cases it is.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. We have not got it with us in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The fair way when a government wants a property even temporarily, is to buy it out, and then resell it when no longer required. In what different position would the government be at the end of the term, if it held the property, than that in which the owner would be when the property reverted to him? I could understand the argument with reference to easement but cannot understand it with reference to real estate. When you exercise the power of expropriation, you should, exercise it absolutely. After you have no use for the property, it is just as valuable to you as to its former owner. Let it be sold and recoup yourselves in that way just as the former owner would have to do.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot understand why my hon. friend should say that the only fair way is to take the whole property. Fair to whom ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. To all parties.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Fair to the owners whose property you are taking ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What constitutes fairness ? Is it not fair to give a man all that the user of his property is worth ? Can there be anything fairer than to pay a man all he can reasonably ask ? If you want your neighbour to allow you the privilege of using a piece of his ground for a short time. Would it not be fair that he should say : 'Pay me for the time I have it and I will give it to you.' Would it not be equally fair for the government to say : 'Give me the use of your property for a certain time and whatever is fair I will pay.' The amount of compensation is determined and the government pay for it. Is there any unfairness in that ? It simplifies procedure, saves public money, does not take anything out of the pockets of anybody and justice is done all around.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It is an excessive power which the government exercises—that power of expropriating property for public purposes and the owner is not bound to part with his property to the public except on certain conditions. One of these is that it must be required for the use of the public generally, and the conditions under which he may be compelled to give up what is his are very limited in most countries which enjoy a constitution. Unfortunately they are not so limited under the constitution we have in this country and the constitution of Great Britain. That power of expropriation is one which comes down to us from the Roman law, and is never exercised except in its absolute sense of taking the property and paying for it in full. There has never been any such thing known as a partial expropriation, or taking a man's property for the part of the time and then returning it to him. When you want to use his property, take it and pay for it, and when you no longer require it, it is just as valuable to you as to the man from whom you took it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman then objects to the principle of expropriation ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I do not, but I say that the principle of expropriation is only justified in extreme cases. The exercise of that right was very limited under the Roman law. It is also limited in the United States and in every country in the world except here and Great Britain. It is supposed to be exercised only in one manner and only for the use of the public and in the public interest. A property may be expropriated but only on condition that the owner shall have a fair consideration and that it should be expropriated in a fair manner and absolutely taken and paid for in full. But we are here extending the power of expropriation by providing that property may be expropriated for a month or six weeks or even only a few days in order that you may run a tramway through it to some quarry ; but if you want to do that you should buy the property absolutely and pay the owner for it.

Mr. WRIGHT. According to the last argument if the government were to build a railway through a man's farm the government would not only have to buy that portion traversed by the railway but the entire farm.

Mr. BROCK. I think the government are endeavouring to legislate in a way that is going to give them and all future governments a great deal of trouble. The hon. minister speaks of expropriating a quarry. Surely he must know what a quarry means. Very often they expropriate land in which there is a good quarry. But it is only made valuable by being opened up. Would the government buy it, open it up and so make it valuable, and then, having paid a considerable sum for it give it back to the previous owner at a valuation ? This would open the door to an amount of corruption in connection with property of that kind that the government probably does not foresee. It is easy to work the surface of a quarry; but if an enormous quantity of stone were wanted, they would have to go very deep. How are you going to have the value calculated ? I suppose the owner of a quarry, like any other owner, owns to the centre of the earth. How, then, are you going to get at the value ? It seems to me that, if the government are going to open up and put quarries into working shape and then get rid of them, the legal department of the government will be kept busy. I cannot understand the reason of the proposition. Cannot the government buy stone as an ordinary contractor buys it ? Why do they wish the power of expropriation—unless it be that they have their eyes on some quarries they wish to buy. It seems to me it is no argument in favour of this expropriation proposal to say that stone is necessary for the building of a bridge or something of that kind. There are any quantity of quarries from which the hon. minister can get the material under contract at competitive prices, and so buy his stone a great deal cheaper than any government can get it by proceeding in the manner here proposed. I say this is a method which will cause a great deal of trouble to the government and loss to the public. If the government take powers of this kind, how can they refuse to incorporated companies the same power ? I do not know where the thing is going to end, but I can see that it will lead to great difficulties before it is ended. The government had better let the matter drop where it is, and buy their stone as the private companies do that are buying stone and building important works on the most economical principles.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is evidently the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Brock's) opinion that the government ought to allow itself to be held up by anybody who happens to have a quarry in the vicinity of a public works. That is the principle that has prevailed up to the present time, but we cannot sanction it any longer.

Mr. BROCK. I think they will hold the government up just as much under this power of expropriation. Is there only one quarry in the country ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There may be only one in the vicinity of a public work.

Mr. BROCK. Why, their name is legion. You can get stone laid down at public works cheaper than the government can get it by this expropriation method.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I suppose this is limited to government expropriations—it does not extend to railway companies.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This is an amendment to the Expropriation Act, but that Act is sometimes made applicable to railway companies also.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is what I thought. So, you give this power not only to the government but to the railway companies ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, only to the government.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No, my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Haggart) understood me perfectly. This Expropriation Act is applicable, in the first instance, to public works. If you incorporate a railway company or a company to carry on any other public enterprise, you may make the Expropriation Act applicable to that company. Parliament may grant that power or it may not—it is for parliament to exercise its discretion in that matter.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. But does that power extend to railways which have charters at the present moment ? Some of them, or all of them, have the right——

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Under the Railway Act—

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. They have the right to exercise this power of expropriation just as the government have. Will this extention of the power of expropriation apply to those railway companies that already have charters ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Surely it must. To make applicable to them the Expropriation Act is to make applicable to them not only that Act but any amendments to it.

Mr. CLANCY. I am at a loss to understand how the Minister of Justice can reconcile his own arguments on this subject of the expropriation of a quarry. Let us suppose a case : Suppose the hon. gentleman owns a quarry contiguous to the site of a proposed public work. Suppose that that quarry has no value except as a source of supply of stone for that public work. The government would naturally say : We only want a portion of the stone, and so we will expropriate a quarter of the quarry. But, the value of the whole quarry is in what is taken for that public work. How, then, will the damages be fixed ? Would the government take all that is valuable in the quarry, pay for only a portion of the value, and leave the valueless part in the hands of the owner ? Is the hon. minister prepared to say that that would be a fair proceeding ? The hon. minister, as I understand him, says he would return the quarry to the owner because it is of no value. But it is of no more value to the owner than it is to the public. The only object in expropriating a quarry under such circumstances is to benefit the public by securing stone cheaper than it could otherwise be secured. But why should the individual owner yield a right he possesses merely because of the accident of the location of a public work ? If the government expropriate a quarry, they ought to pay every cent it is worth to place stone there from the nearest rival quarry, no matter what the distance may be. The value in the property belongs to the individual and not to the country, and, if the public take the property they should pay full value for it. Then, I do not see that the Bill provides for any prospective profits, but merely for damages. I shall not argue that point because I am not a lawyer. But I do not see just what the effect of that clause would be. The only actual damage that the owner could claim would be that sustained through the taking of a quantity of stone from his quarry, leaving out of account the whole value of the quarry under the Expropriation Act. I cannot see how the hon. minister can reconcile the exercise of such a power with the fact that the government will have taken the whole value of the property.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I think I should have to leave the court to assess the damage. That is entirely beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the hon. minister (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) any case in mind by which we might judge more definitely of the effect of this clause ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I mentioned a moment ago the case of Stewart and the Queen, the case of a quarry, from which it was necessary to take a certain quantity of stone. Nothwithstanding that we only took a small part of the stone of the quarry, the government was obliged to purchase the whole quarry, and it now remains absolutely useless, so far as the government is concerned, as a public work. There is the other case, where a public work was separated to some extent by a strip of land from the quarry, and it was necessary in order to get it to pass over a man's property by a tramway. This work at the outset would last perhaps a year and a half, but in order to pass the tramway over this property and get to the quarry, it was necessary so the courts decided, to expropriate this narrow strip of about seven feet. Surely this property, once the public work was completed, became absolutely valueless to any one save the owner of the property. But you cannot expropriate the right of passage over the property ; it is necessary to expropriate the property itself. That is a second case. Then there is the third case I mentioned a moment ago, of a guy that was used in connection with the construction of one of the piers of a bridge. It was necessary to put up a guy in the vicinity of the pier. My recollection is that the piece of property upon which this guy was put was not required for more than five or six weeks. But in order to put up that guy it was necessary to expropriate the property itself for all time, and once expropriated, and once the guy was removed, the land was absolutely valueless for the purpose of the public work. Now, was it reasonable that the government should be obliged, under these circumstances, to take that property for the mere purpose of putting up a guy ? Was it necessary to take that property for all time ? Was it not fair to the individual, as well as to the public, that he should be paid for his property for the time during which it was in use, and after it reverted to him in the condition in which it was before, was it not right that he should take the property back again, when he had suffered no damage whatever except the right of user that was vested in the government for a limited period, as I have stated.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I understand it, if this Bill becomes law it will in ordinary course apply equally to private railway companies as well as to the Crown. There is usually a provision that some of these clauses should be made applicable to a private company ; that is not an unusual provision. Does not the Bill make the provisions of that Act applicable to private railway companies ?

Hon. Mr. FITZPATRICK.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No, I think not.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My recollection is that there are expropriation clauses applicable to private companies.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I think the Railway Act contains a provision for expropriation.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then the hon. gentleman means that this should be confined to cases where public works are going on ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I understand it, this is a principle that is now being introduced for the first time into the legislation of any country. It is not found in the English legislation.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. When the hon. gentleman says it is being introduced for the first time in any country, he is wrong, if he goes back to the Roman law.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have not gone back to the Roman law. But I say, speaking subject to correction, that this is a unique piece of legislation. The hon. gentleman points out that it is confined to the government expropriation, it is not contemplated that this power should be given to private corporations. His argument is based on the idea that the Crown might well have this law, but it is not proposed to give the same privilege to private corporations. Now, the fact that no such provision has existed hitherto, does it not suggest that hitherto this has not been considered a reasonable right to vest in any body, whether in a government or a private corporation ? The hon. gentleman sees the distinction between a railway company as such, and the government as such. The fact that there has been no such provision hitherto, and that there is no such provision in the English law, seems to me to indicate that it has not been considered fair and reasonable. In other words, if the government or any public body proposed to take my property, they should not take it for a day or two, there should not be a mere chaffering about a few pence, but the property should change owners, and the arrangement should be completed once for all. They should either take my property wholly, or leave it alone. That seems to be the principle, at any rate, on which we have gone hitherto. Without having given it much consideration, it seems to me a very extraordinary power. The hon. gentleman admits that it is not a power that should be given generally to public bodies. The one body that could best afford to pay for the whole thing seems to be the one that is most concerned. I think it is well worthy of consideration whether we should go that far.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The hon. gentleman will remember that this Bill was considered a year ago and passed by the House, but when it reached the Senate it was rejected, because it was found there that the Bill was applicable to a case that was then pending, the case of Stewart. Now, it is as we go along and acquire experience that we discover the difficulties that exist in our legislation, and it is the practical experience of these difficulties which makes it necessary now and then to amend our legislation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not present when I mentioned a moment ago several cases calling for this legislation. Take, for instance, a public work being constructed in the neighbourhood of a quarry, which is separated from the public work by a strip of land in the possession of a private individual. That strip of land is not needed in any manner, near or remote, for the purpose of a public work ; but in order to reach the quarry from which the public work is separated by this strip of land, it is necessary to construct a tramway. The tramway is constructed from the quarry to the public work crossing, over this strip of land. Probably this strip of land may not be required for more than a few months ; in the case in question, I think it was required for a little over a week. Now, a man, to get to his quarry, is obliged to expropriate that propriety, to buy it and take it for all time, and when he has ceased to have any use for his tramway, the property is of no value to anybody except to the man from whom it has been taken, a strip of land seven feet wide.

Mr. CLANCY. Why does the hon. gentleman confine his Bill to that class of cases ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am not confining my Bill to any particular class of cases ; but there are hundreds of these cases. Now, I will put this case to the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Surely, under these circumstances, it is eminently unfair that the government should be obliged to pay for that property, after allowing to the person who owns that little strip of land, not only the value of his property, but the resulting damage which he may claim as having suffered because of his property being cut in two, for instance, as in the case in question. He says, one piece of my property is cut off from the other, and you have damaged my property by so much. After a time the property returns to him, but it is of no value to any one but himself. If the government sought to dispose of it, no one would buy it. The piece of land in question is about an acre and a quarter in length and a few feet wide. Take the other case I mentioned, where you are erecting a pier, or a lock of a canal. It is necessary to erect a derrick ; in order to put up the derrick you have to place a guy, and you have to put that guy beyond the property you require for the purpose of the public work. You have to go on to an adjoining property belonging to an individual, and you cannot go there unless you take that property, or except you treat with the owner individually. We know that frequently people may be somewhat cantankerous and that when the government are building a work in a locality their property is looked upon by some of them as a sort of gold mine to them, and they say that if we make any use of it at all we must expropriate it absolutely. Surely, that is not fair. It should be within the option of the government to say : We want that property for five, six, seven or eight months, we will pay you fairly for the use of it for the time during which we use it as the Act provides.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no very strongly pronounced views on this question, but this occurs to me and I submit it to the hon. Minister of Justice, that the cases mentioned by him must after all be exceptional in which the government cannot make a fair arrangement for the temporary use of property. Take the case of railway construction by the government and by private companies—there are very few of these cases that the hon. gentleman will be able to cite as having given rise to the necessity for this legislation and I think it is not a safe principle to legislate for exceptional cases. If I remember my hon. friend's argument, it is this : Why should not the government be in a position to make such an arrangement as this ? Why should they be fastened down with a property in fee when they only wish it for a short time ? That argument seems to apply not merely to cases of the government but to those of railway corporations, and yet, I understand, that the hon. gentleman spoke as if this privilege should be confined to the government only.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The answer is perfectly obvious. The intention is to amend the Expropriation Act. We have to have some system in our legislation. If at any time in connection with the incorporation of a company it is found desirable to give that company the powers that the government have those powers can be incorporated in the Bill for the incorporation of the company. Then, there is the power exercised by parliament in respect to a particular corporation and exercised in the light of the conditions under which the incorporation exists. The discretion is vested in parliament and that discretion is only exercised after having a full knowledge of the facts concerning the corporation which shall exercise these powers.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That argument is fair and reasonable as it stands and yet I understand the hon. gentleman carefully guards his words by saying that the government have submitted this legislation from the government point of view in regard to public works and in no way commits itself to the principle that this would be a proper power with which to vest railway corporations generally.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That will be for parliament to decide. We have not reached that case yet.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But if the hon. gentleman is not able to say that this principle equally affects these private, or quasi public works the illustrations which he gave with so much unction to show the reasonableness of this proposal from the government point of view seem to be rather diminished in force when he will not say that he will take the same ground in regard to public works in the hands of private companies. The hon. gentleman will see that this is a very extraordinary power to give the government. He mentions one particular case in which the government had experienced some trouble and difficulty and in which the people have possibly suffered some extraordinary expense. I do not think the hon. gentleman is able to make any other reference than that of the Stewart case to which he refers as a ground for the adoption of legislation a parallel for which is not found on the statute-book of any country.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will realize that there is a vast difference between conferring powers of this description on a private corporation and giving them to the government, because, after all, it is to be presumed that the government will exercise greater discretion in using powers of this sort, than a private corporation might. The government after all are subject to the control of parliament, and if an injustice is committed they would have to account for it, while in the case of a private company there might be a more arbitrary exercise of this power than that which would take place under the government. In so far as a private individual is concerned where is the difference in principle between expropriating a property for the purposes of public utility in its entirety and expropriating for a limited period, provided the individual whose property is being expropriated receives notice, because then he is in a position to say that the compensation which the government offer is adequate or it is not adequate, and if it is not adequate he goes to court and then he stands in absolutely the same position as the government. When he goes to court the court determines as to whether the government have offered an adequate compensation for the limited right of expropriation. It is a mere matter of the court determining the extent to which the property has depreciated, the extent to which he is going to suffer damages and the court will give him compensation which will be determined so far as he is concerned according to the same rule and on the same principle as if the government were expropriating permanently.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is it not a fact that private railway companies have these temporary powers now ? I find in an Act passed last session that railway companies may go on land temporarily, pay rental for it for a number of years, or take for all time just as they wish. It seems to me that this Bill is taking a somewhat similar power for the government. Surely the government are entitled to that power if private corporations have it at the present moment.

Mr. GOURLEY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if there is any precedent for this Act in imperial legislation ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not that I am aware of now.

Mr. GOURLEY. Well then I am opposed to it, on the ground that in England, which is a thickly settled country, this question must have arisen a thousand times. These very same difficulties that the hon. Minister of Justice has pointed out, must have been experienced there. There must have been a thousand hardships of a similar kind in a thickly settled country like England, and if they have not considered it expedient in a country like that to give these limited expropriation powers I do not think that we should adopt this legislation. I agree with all that the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has said. I have listened to the debate with an open mind and I have come to the conclusion that if they have no limited powers of expropriation in England there ought to be no limited powers here ; because the question must have arisen a thousand times. The more the debate goes on, the more I am convinced that limited expropriation is unjust. There is no court that can assess damages caused by limited expropriation. The court can assess damages, for absolute expropriation, because it is simply a question ultimately of the value of the land, but, sir, if you enter upon a territory under the powers of limited expropriation, no court can assess the value of the land. Take the case the hon. Minister of Justice has put ; he wants to enter upon my land and put a guy upon that to connect with his works. He wants to exercise that right, for a number of years, and he says he should have the right to expropriate my land for the purpose for six years. Supposing I have a chance to sell that property six months afterwards at what I consider a very advantageous price, I am debarred of the sale because the government has the use of the property for six years. It is the most extraordinary and unjust principle that I ever heard propounded.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. If the government took it for all time to come what would be the difference ?

Mr. GOURLEY. That is all right ; because the court has said what the proper value of the property is for all time, and I have the money in my pocket. That is just and right, but, if the government enter upon a property for a limited number of years the owner cannot sell it during the term of that occupation. Suppose the value of land goes up, that the land becomes very desirable a year or two after this guy is placed upon my property, and I can sell it, I am debarred from so doing. When he takes his guy away six years after, the land has fallen in value, and I am injured very seriously by the Crown, and there is no remedy for me. I thought at first that this might be a fair proposition, but since listening to the discussion, I am convinced that it is a most unjust measure. Speaking as a lawyer, I speak to lawyers on the other side, and say, that if there is no precedent for this legislation in England, which is a thickly settled country and where these hardships must have arisen thousands of times in a more aggravated form than here, then I say that we should not pass such legislation. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice, that he should not address this House, which is largely composed of lawyers, with this argument as to hardship. Every judge, I have heard, in a court of law, who introduced the doctrine of hardship in order to get over the just principles of the common law, has made a spectacle of himself every time. Whenever a judge gets weak and wants to avoid the law and the evidence, he commences to talk about hardship, and then he makes a law for himself, and it takes us years to get it right. I hope that the lawyers of this House will therefore see, that when the Minister of Justice comes here and talks 'hardship,' they should vote down the Bill at once.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gourley) if there are any foolish judges in the province of Nova Scotia ?

Mr. GOURLEY. I do not want to be asked that question ; but I will say that we have very foolish decisions given at times whenever a judge attempts to avoid the sound principles of the common law, by saying that this is a peculiar case of hardship in which he must not be governed by the principles of law, but by the rule of thumb.

Mr. SPROULE. The dangerous thing in this Bill would be the extension of it beyond the right of the Crown. If this amendment be in future incorporated in private Bills it will tend to harass the private individual more and more, and place him at the mercy of corporations who, for little or nothing, want to use his property for a limited period of time. If the right was absolutely confined to the Crown, it would not be so dangerous, but if it is extended to private corporations, it may become very objectionable indeed.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This amendment is applicable exclusively to the Expropriation Act and the Expropriation Act has exclusive reference to public works.

Mr. CLANCY. Did I understand the Minister of Justice to say that the Bill applied exclusively to public works ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. So far as the individual property owner is concerned, what is the essential difference between giving that power to railway corporations and exercising it by the government ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The power given to the government is assumed to be exercised with greater regard for the rights of individuals than if it were vested in a corporation.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the Minister of Justice think that it is a good principle to lay down ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes If parliament wishes to extend the powers conferred on the government by the Expropriation Act to private individuals, parliament may do so, but for the time being parliament has vested that right exclusively in the government. I understood the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) to say that last year an Act was passed conferring this power on private corporations.

Mr. MACLEAN. You passed an amendment to the Railway Act under which private corporations have got these powers.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is only for the purpose of making an approach to a quarry.

Mr. MACLEAN. That is the very case which is cited here, and I say that in that amendment of last session we have given this power already to private companies.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Act of last year is only of a very limited nature, although I am not prepared to say that it might not go further. The Minister of Justice is now asking parliament to confer upon the government this added privilege in the prosecution of public works. It is but a very moderate extension of the right of eminent domain, and it is limited to the power in respect to which this right originated. My hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. Gourley) surprised me a little, because he is a very right minded gentleman when he allows his mind to have fair play. He said that because in England they had not passed legislation precisely like this, therefore we should not pass it here. Well, they have something to learn from us occasionally in England. We do not restrict our legislation here to the legislation passed in the old country. We are trying in the colonies to make experiments in the way of legislation, and our experiments are daily commending themselves to members of the imperial parliament. I am at a loss to understand why the hon. gentleman should tie his hands in this particular instance, because the imperial parliament has not moved in this direction first. He says that this question must have arisen in numberless cases, and if it had arisen, the necessity of it would have impressed itself on the public mind there, and they would have had something of this kind drafted in the interests of the country. But the conditions in England are not at all similar to the conditions here. The government of England is not building railways or canals or bridges or public works, as we are. The government are doing here many things which are done by private enterprise in England, and in that country circumstances will not arise to call for legislation such as this. I think my hon. friend will, on a moment's reflection, see that he is going to hamper himself very materially in respect to advanced legislation in Canada, and that he has somewhat hastily declared himself as opposed to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The condition is limited exactly as I argued it to be in the first place. I understood the Minister of Justice to state that the government have the power of expropriating lands for a specific purpose, and abandoning them afterwards. There is no such provision in the Bill. There are only two ways in which the limited expropriation can be exercised; you may take the land for a limited time only, but not for any specific purpose, and you have the fee simple of the land for the time you take it; or, you may exercise the power of expropriating a limited estate for all time, not for a term of years. I asked the hon. gentleman if he could amalgamate the two, so as to make a limited estate for a limited time? He told me no, you must take the land for a limited time, or you must take a limited estate. The time for taking the land is limited, but where you exercise the power of taking the limited estate, it is not limited. Then, I contend that under the clause, you have no power for finding out the amount you have to pay the individual when you take the property for only four or five years. If my contention is right, when you want to expropriate a person's land for any purpose, what possible means has the court of knowing the value of the user for four or five years during which you are in possession of it?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This Bill was drafted by a very competent draughtsman, for the purpose of meeting the very case which my hon. friend has put, and I leave it to any lawyer in the House to say whether it does meet it or not.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. All I can say is that the language of the clause will not convey the meaning which the hon. gentleman says it does, to a person with an ordinary English education. I contend that, according to the ordinary interpretation of language, the limited interest or estate does not apply to the land that is expropriated for a limited time.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I will state the case which I intend to cover by these words. The government give notice of their intention to expropriate a piece of property, say for a rifle range; and after they have given notice, with a plan of the property attached, they discover that the property, or the full extent of the property covered by the notice is not required. Then they must give notice of their intention to abandon expropriation proceedings, or that, instead of taking the quantity originally described, they intend to take a smaller portion, or that, instead of taking the property in its entirety, they intend to take a limited interest in the estate.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Suppose that before the abandonment takes place the original owner has the opportunity of selling his property at a great advance but is prevented by these expropriation proceedings, I do not see any provision which would entitle him to compensation for the loss of that opportunity.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. At first blush I would be disposed to say that the owner would undoubtedly have the right to compensation. Suppose the government gives notice of its intention to expropriate, and pending the expropriation proceedings, the owner has an opportunity to dispose of his property but is prevented from doing so by this notice of expropriation. The government then find that they do not require the property and give notice of their intention to abandon the expropriation proceedings. I should say that they cannot do so without compensating the owner for the damage done him by causing him to lose the opportunity of selling. But we might leave that clause over for the purpose of further discussion.

Mr. LENNOX. Take clause 2, it reads:

2. Whenever, from time to time, or at any time before the compensation money has been actually paid, any parcel of land taken for a public work, or any portion of any such parcel, is found to be unnecessary for the purposes of such public work, or if it is found that a more limited estate or interest therein only is required.

This is put in the alternative. Might not both conditions apply?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The clause has to be considered according to the law as we have it now, which merely provides for the expropriation for all purposes. That paragraph with reference to limited estate is intended to apply to the Act as amended by the previous section we have just passed.

On section 3,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. These sections 2 and 3 read together would meet the difficulty suggested by my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), but I am willing to consider the matter and put the difficulty suggested before the draughtsman, who is more familiar with the details of the Bill.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am quite content with that.

Sections 2 and 3 allowed to stand.

On section 4,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That seems perfectly reasonable. It is intended to give the government the right to remedy by some new work any damages that may have been caused. For instance, in the construction of a canal, you may separate the highway from some residence in the vicinity, but you may also remedy that by constructing a bridge. In assessing the damages, the construction of this bridge would have to be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister gave an instance of using a piece of property for the purpose of erecting a guy. That would give you the right of entry and you might take down the fences, &c. Who has to put them up ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That would be a matter for compensation which would be determined by the court.

On section 5,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That section is probably the most far reaching of all those in the Bill. I would like to have it stand over until we come to consider section 2. It cuts out the right of the individual to take damages against the Crown.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Oh.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I have an open mind on the subject and want to have the whole matter thoroughly discussed.

YUKON TERRITORY ACT.

Bill (No. 9) to amend the Yukon Territory Act (The Minister of Justice) read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). My hon. friend is aware that jurors must be, of course, in the North-west Territories as elsewhere, British subjects. But the majority of the inhabitants in certain portions of the North-west Territories are not British subjects. Under the application of the North-west Territories Act, the same individual is called upon to perform the duty of juror three, four and five times. The intention is, under this Bill, to give the Yukon Territory Council power to make an ordinance regulating the selection of jurors in such a way, while adhering to the rule to have only British subjects as jurors, a man cannot be called upon to serve out of his turn.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You do not intend to give them power to make an ordinance that foreigners may serve ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Of course not. The fact is that doubt has arisen as to the right of the Yukon Council to pass such an ordinance, and this is merely to confer such a right upon them to make the matter clear.

Bill reported ; read the third time, and passed.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Bill (No. 10) to amend the Act relating to the custody of juvenile offenders in New Brunswick (The Minister of Justice), was read the second time, and House went into Committee on the Bill.

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Under the law as we have it now, it is competent for the Governor General to order a boy who is confined in the Dorchester penitentiary to be removed to the Boy's Industrial Home. But it is not within the jurisdiction of the Governor General to have a boy who is confined within the Industrial Home removed to the penitentiary. The object of this Bill is to give that power, on the recommendation of the Attorney General of New Brunswick.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the Governor General, under this Bill, have the power to order the transfer of the boy for any different term from that for which he was originally sentenced ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No—the same.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This clause seems to read peculiarly. It gives the Governor General power to order the removal of 'any boy who is imprisoned in the Boy's Industrial Home under sentence for an offence within the law of Canada, and for a term of years for which he might have been sentenced' and so on—not for the term he was sentenced, but 'might have been sentenced.'

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The Governor General clearly can not do that. Once a sentence is passed it is beyond the power of the Governor General to increase it. If there is any doubt as to the wording of the clause, I will have it looked into.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, parliament can give power. It might be that a boy had been sentenced for the minimum term provided for his offence, but, apparently under this, it would be possible for the Governor General to order his removal, not for the term of his actual sentence, the minimum, but for the term for which he might have been sentenced, the maximum.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I do not think that could be, but we will make it clear, if necessary. If my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will read the whole section, he will see that it authorizes the Governor General :

> On the application of the Attorney General of the province of New Brunswick, cause any boy who is imprisoned in the Boys' Industrial Home under sentence for an offence within the law of Canada and for a term of years for which he might have been sentenced to imprisonment in a penitentiary, to be transferred to the Dorchester penitentiary for the remainder of his term of imprisonment.

If a boy is sentenced for less than two years, under the law he cannot be moved to the penitentiary. But if his sentence is one which would have justified the sending of him to the penitentiary he can be transferred from the Industrial School to the penitentiary for the remainder of his term.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That quite meets my point.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. A boy may have been sentenced to the Industrial Home for a period of five or six years, but, probably, the judge would never have thought of sending him to the penitentiary for such a long term. Why should the government take power to transfer him to the penitentiary for a term for which the judge would not have sent him there ? I do not think that is right.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This is the law which exists with respect to boys in the Industrial Home in Nova Scotia. And in New Brunswick boys may be transferred from the penitentiary to the Industrial Home. Suppose that a boy is in penitentiary, and it is found that, instead of being benefited he is being contaminated by contact with criminals. It is surely well that he should be removed to the Industrial Home, and the Governor General, on the application of the Attorney General of the province, may order that removal. But, take the other case. A boy is in the Industrial Home, having been there for a period of time for which he might have been sent to the penitentiary. But it is discovered that he is a boy of such a character that, instead of benefiting, he is contaminating the others. Is it not equally right, for the sake of the others, that such a boy should be removed to the penitentiary ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You are giving him a new punishment without a new trial.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is merely a different place of punishment.

Bill reported ; read the third time, and passed.

IMMORAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

Bill (No. 12) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892 (The Minister of Justice), read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). This Bill has been prepared and introduced at the suggestion of those who are responsible for the municipal administration of some of our great cities. It appears that in some of our larger cities there are performances now being given which have a demoralizing effect on the youth of the community, and under the law as it stands, it is not possible to reach them. The object of this Bill is to reach such performances as I have alluded to.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the meaning of ' indecent and immoral ?' These words might bear a different interpretation in the minds of different people. Some persons may look upon a thing as indecent where others do not. The punishment is very severe. It gives extraordinary powers.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I have provided that the powers are to be exercised in the discretion of the magistrate. This matter has to come before the courts, and the definition of indecent or immoral must necessarily depend to some extent on the mind of the individual who is called upon to judge the case. I know a good many sections of the Criminal Code in which those words are used, but there is no definition of them, because every man knows what is indecent, and every man ought to know what is immoral.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is just the trouble. We know that at the present time there is a large class of the community who think that all modern novels and all modern plays are, to use the language of this Bill, indecent and immoral. For myself, I do not hesitate to say that I think these persons hold very extreme views. Merely because there are events in a play, or in a book, that are such as would not be taught in a Sunday school, but which are meant to illustrate the condition of society through the ages, is not a sufficient reason for suppressing them. There are a great many people, and their opinions are entitled to weight, perhaps a majority of well meaning people, who, in my opinion, go to extremes in this matter. They see all sorts of things which they think ought not to be permitted. In some of the eastern cities, I believe there are people who paste over certain portions of placards which they consider immoral, but which in other centres, in England for instance, are considered legitimate. Reputable and high class actresses have had their likenesses placarded over with these slips, on the ground that such likenesses are indecent. Well, there are judges and judges, juries and juries; and one cannot tell what view may be taken in any district. It seems to me that the tendency of this Bill is to drive us back, in some districts, to a state of puritanism for which there is no reason under the sun. To me this seems at the moment a short cut, and a very dangerous cut, to reach a right end. Of course, the object that underlies this Bill must commend itself to every member of the House. We do not want immoral plays before the public, and we do not want indecent plays. But I venture to suggest that there will be a difficulty in the administration of that law, whether it is in the hands of a judge or a jury, and it will possibly keep away some of the very best talent that every one ought to want to see in the Dominion. I fear it will have the effect, in some centres of Canada, and according to the view that may be taken by the counsel who will advise as to the prosecution, of keeping out of the country what would really be a benefit to that very class that the promoters of such legislation as this have in view. No one wants to keep out a high class actor. Yet we must remember that in all the best plays of the present day there is perhaps in a strict application of the word, something that might have an indecent tendency. There are references in books, as there are in conversation and in newspapers, revealing modern society which might be called indecent. In what I am saying I am giving my own experience, that some of the very best citizens in this country, in order to reform society all at once, press upon parliament legislation that is too extreme, and is calculated in the end only to frustrate the good objects they have in view. I desire to caution the committee in this respect. While this clause is going through—no doubt it is framed all right—I hope hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity of considering just how far it will go. We do not want to drive out of the country the best talent who are now producing modern plays that might come under the category mentioned in this clause, in the minds of some persons.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I quite appreciate what my hon. friend says, and the danger that would result from a too close construction of the words 'immoral and indecent.' My hon. friend must bear in mind the law which we have on the statute-book. By reading section 179 of the Criminal Code you will find that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who > Publicly sells or exposes for public sale, or to public view, any obscene book or other printed or written matter, or any picture, photograph, model or other object, tending to corrupt morals.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a strong term. We do not want obscenity, whether produced by talent or not. I think that is a far stronger word, and is less susceptible to misunderstanding than these words 'indecent or immoral.'

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. If I understand my hon. friend, he would not have any objection to substituting the word 'obscene' for 'indecent or immoral.'

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, I think it would then be a safe piece of legislation.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the hon. Minister of Justice wishes to devote his energy to the amendment of the Criminal Code surely there are other ways in which he can direct his attention to it with profit to the public. If there is anything that the public require to be protested against, and the Criminal Code appears to be the only thing that will protect them, it is some kind of legislation for dealing with the encroachments of great companies like the coal combine. There is something being done against the public that calls for a cure and the only cure is the Criminal Code. Look at the effect in this country of the great coal strike in the United States. Combinations were formed between our coal dealers and the railway companies, especially the railway companies of our own country, to the injury of the Canadian people, creating a coal famine in this country when no coal famine really existed. If the hon. Minister of Justice wishes to tackle something that ought to be tackled he should put something in the Criminal Code that will put a stop to such enormous evils as this. I intend later on to bring this subject to his attention and I would say to him now that instead of taking up our time with these trivial matters he should place something before us dealing with the question to which I have alluded.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) will remember that this question does not bear on the question under discussion.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think I am quite within the discussion in saying that the hon. Minister of Justice instead of taking up our time with consideration of immoral plays might better give the House an opportunity of discussing some of these great evils.

The PRIME MINISTER. Bring in a motion to that effect.

Mr. MACLEAN. I have no objection to this Bill if the hon. gentleman thinks it is necessary, but I hope he will deal with the coal combine and put a clause in the Criminal Code that will stop such practices as I believe those connected with it have indulged in.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) considers it a trivial matter to deal with an indecent or obscene play.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is the other trivial?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. We will see in its time. I beg to move:

That the words 'indecent, or immoral,' be struck out and that the word 'obscene be inserted in lieu thereof.

Motion agreed to.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE moved:

That the words 'indecent or immoral' be struck out and that the word 'obscene' be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Chairman, I do not see why you strike out the word 'immoral' because there is a difference between 'obscene' and 'immoral.' The play might be immoral and yet not obscene.

The PRIME MINISTER. This is the language of the code and it is better to keep to that language.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Department of Customs—Salaries, including R. R. Farrow at $2,150, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $45,000.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). I ask leave to strike out all the words after 'salaries' in the item. There has been a mistake in the preparation of the items and the accountant's salary of $2,150 has not been included so that I will have to bring in a supplementary estimate for his salary.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to make some observations on the frequency with which the words 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act' occur in these estimates. I find that out of twenty-five items these words appear in eighteen. Now, the Civil Service Act was passed for the good purpose of regulating the qualifications of those who enter the service, and providing that they should have a fair remuneration which would be increased from year to year. I can understand that in the application of such a law there necessarily would be some rare exception. But these exceptions are growing greater and greater every year until in fact the exceptions have now become the rule. Surely it would be more creditable to the government to repeal the Civil Service Act completely or to amend it, rather than they should go on constantly violating it. It has become almost a scandal that there are so many flagrant violations of this Act by the government.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I would point out to the member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) that there are thirty-four officers included in this item, and the words 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act' would only apply to Mr. Farrow, the accountant.

Mr. SPROULE. I know that, but we are entitled to some better explanation from the government. Year after year we get some flippant answer when we inquire about this. until it has come to be that the Civil Service Act is almost entirely disregarded by the government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We do not agree with the hon. gentleman that there is any abuse existing. We believe that the Civil Service Act serves a good purpose, but there are exceptional cases that can only be dealt with in an exceptional manner. The hon. gentleman says that out of twenty-five items, in eighteen of them these words occur. That may be correct, but let me point out that in the Department of Militia there are thirty-three officials and the words only apply to one out of that number. Is there any abuse in that? In the Department of the Secretary of State there are twenty-six officials and the words apply to one official only. In the Department of Printing and Stationery there are twenty-seven officials and only one exception made, while in the Department of the Interior there are ninety-six officials and only two exceptions made. The hon. gentleman will see that there are not numerous exceptions, and even if there should be these words in connection with the items of every department of the government it would not follow that there was an abuse. It should only mean, and I hope it does only mean, that in one or two exceptional cases in a department these words are put in for reasons which of course must be explained to the House. I do not think there is any abuse: I do not think there is any reason to repeal the Civil Service Act. In ninety-five per cent of the cases the general rules of the Act remain, and it is only to a small number in proportion to the total number of civil servants to which these words apply.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Finance will admit that these words occur ten times more frequently in the estimates now than they did formerly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think so.

Mr. SPROULE. I have not made a precise count but I believe I am within the mark when I say so. If the civil service could be managed formerly within the four corners of the Act, why are the exceptions so numerous now? Look at every department of the government in these estimates and you will see that some civil servant gets an increase "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act." That certainly leaves the impression that either the Act place, it was intended to prevent him getting outside of the Act more and more every year. All the conditions were considered when the Act was passed. It started the civil servant at a fair salary, gave him a reasonable increase from year to year until he reached the maximum of his class, and then provided for promotion. Every thing reasonable is provided in the law and the constant violation of it is without excuse. The Act, in the first place, was intended to provide that the qualification of the civil servant should be such as to ensure his being a good and useful officer. In the second place, it was intended to prevent him getting salaries from two or three sources, because it had been found in many cases that the salary voted in the estimates was no indication of the whole amount an officer was paid. To prevent abuse in this respect the Act provided that his whole salary must be shown in the vote; and where a rare exception occurred, as in the case of a civil servant who, from technical knowledge or special qualifications, would be required to do some work outside of the department to which he belonged, then something additional might be paid to him by saying 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act;' but these exceptions were intended to be very few. Now they are becoming very many, and a great abuse is growing up, showing that the Act is not fulfilling the expectations of the House, and the government should either amend it or repeal it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. As my hon. friend has referred to the Department of Justice, I may state that I had in my department Mr. Blackadar, clerk of records, who received the maximum of his class, $1,400. The minimum salary of a junior second-class clerk is $600, but by paying $800 I can get all the duties performed for which Mr. Blackadar was paid $1,400. All that my hon. friend points out is perfectly true, but providing the House is informed of what we are doing and the House exercises control over it, no very great harm can come to the service.

Mr. SPROULE. I need not remind the hon. gentleman of what occurred in the Department of Militia. The man who became a defaulter was brought in without having the qualifications which the Act called for, and we know what the result has been, though I do not attribute it exactly to the Act. But it shows the necessity of keeping within the Act, and if it is necessary to depart from it in special cases, let us provide for them by amendment to the Act and not by constantly setting it aside.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I notice that there is to be a new assistant commissioner, a new chief clerk, and two more junior clerks. Who is to be the new assistant commissioner, what is the necessity for his appointment, and what is the necessity for another chief clerk?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The increase in the item now under discussion is $3,310, which will be increased to $5,460 when I bring down the supplementary vote for Mr. Farrow's salary. Of this increase, $2,800 is for the assistant commissioner. I think it will be apparent to hon. gentlemen why this appointment is made if they consider how greatly the work of the department has increased. In years gone by we had an assistant commissioner, who I think was Mr. Watters. After he left, the office was not continued, but I have felt that it was only due to the proper working of the department and in the public interest that we should have an assistant commissioner. The chief clerk referred to is Mr. Bremner, who gets the statutory increase of $50. Then, the hon. gentleman asks about the eight first-class clerks. One of these, Mr. Watson, it is proposed to raise from a second class clerkship to a first class.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What salary is he receiving now?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. $1,400. He will receive $1,800. He has shown special aptitude in taking supervision of the statistical department, which, as the hon. gentleman knows, was a comparatively small branch of the service in the city of Ottawa, but which has become large owing to the work which was previously done at the ports being now done at headquarters. This has enabled us to get out our trade reports monthly. Then, Mr. Morin, a first-class clerk, is to be promoted to a chief clerkship, but as his salary is at the maximum, $1,800, it will remain the same.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Is Mr. Watson the senior clerk?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman state what clerks he goes over that are his seniors ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Watson goes to $1,400. He has $1,150 now. There is another clerk getting $1,150, two getting $1,200, one $1,250, three getting $1,400 and one $1,350. If you go by promotion, of course there are gentlemen getting larger salaries than he, but he is recognized as having peculiar fitness for the position. He has taken charge in a larger measure of that department, and it does not seem right that a gentleman who is really supervising those who are getting higher salaries should not have a salary somewhat befitting the position.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Does the Act allow you, where a party is not at the maximum of his class, to put him in another class where there is a vacancy ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think so.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman has not told us yet who is to be the assistant commissioner.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have a gentleman in my mind whom I thought of recommending to my colleagues. He is at present in the service.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Is he a chief clerk ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, his name is Mr. Bain.

Mr. CLANCY. The Minister of Customs has told the committee that the necessity arises from the increase in the work, but that is no explanation. The volume of the work may greatly increase without creating any necessity for an office of that kind. The increase is simply in clerical work which any clerk of ordinary capacity can do. Unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to show that the character of the work has been changed and that the change necessitates the appointment of an officer of that kind, he is without any excuse for fastening another officer on the public service. It would be much better to increase the salaries of those already engaged and who are doing clerical work. The position of commissioner is one of pure supervision, and his responsibility is very considerable. The commissioner or deputy head must be a man of ability and training and should be well paid. But the hon. gentleman now proposes to fasten another officer on the department on the plea that when Mr. Watters was there, there were two commissioners, or rather a commissioner and an assistant commissioner. But in the days when the hon. gentleman was filled with economy, he told the House that he had dispensed with an assistant commissioner because such an officer was not needed. Now, however, he says that an assistant commissioner is necessary because the volume of work has increased. But I do not think that excuse can be accepted. An increase in the mere volume of the work would not necessitate the appointment of an assistant commissioner, but only an increase in the character of the work to be done by ordinary clerks.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I should be very glad indeed to give the details concerning the work if I could, but I would ask the committee to consider whether, on the face of it, they cannot see that when the business has increased to the extent it has, we must expect to get a little additional help. We have not increased the staff very much. I must give my predecessors the credit which I gave them when criticising their administration from the opposition benches. It was generally recognized that the department was economically managed both by Sir Mackenzie Bowell and by Mr. Wallace who succeeded him, and when we consider that the trade in six months now is equal to what it was in the twelve months when we took office, when we consider that the number of entries has nearly doubled, and that there are more ports, and a larger transit trade and more business altogether, I think the House will agree with me that the commissioner ought to be in the position of occasionally being able to leave his office and visit the principal ports and keep in touch with what is being done. If I had the hon. gentleman in my department and could show him the increase in the work, I think he would be satisfied.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman gives us as one reason that there has been a large increase in the number of entries and in the volume of business. But surely he does not pretend to say that the commissioner makes a single entry or touches a pen in connection with that part of the work to which the hon. minister refers. The hon. gentleman might just as well ask for an increase in his own salary because of the increased work in his department. The cases are precisely parallel. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman thinks he should have an increase or not, but I can say that there is no more reason for the appointment of an assistant commissioner than there would be for increasing the hon. gentleman's salary. The increased volume of business does not entail on the minister more work than he had to attend to when he first took office, although I will admit his responsibility must have increased. I admit the responsibility; but the work to be done by reason of the increased business in the department is, 99 per cent, I venture to say, a class of work that could be done by any efficient clerk. The hon. gentleman knows the growing tendency under our system—and I am not going to impute the blame to this government any more than to any former government—to fasten upon the public service men who have no sound claim to the positions to which they are appointed. No man has any claim in himself to be employed in the public service—the public interest is the only ground on which such appointments should be made. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, is quite convinced that he has a very worthy gentleman, whom he wishes to place there. During the time I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have never once attacked the salary received by an official. My belief is that Canada must first secure good service, and Canada has no more right to demand good service at less than its worth than any individual employer has. Therefore, we are bound to give fair remuneration to the men who are absolutely necessary. But we only minimize the chances of proper advance on the part of the men of merit, if we chuck into the service men who are not needed, I venture the opinion that the hon. minister has not made out a case to justify the change he proposes.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria). I do not think there is any class of people in the Dominion that are so poorly paid as the officials in the departments of the government. We speak of the prosperity of the Dominion, but we are apt to forget that prosperity increases the expense of living, so that this prosperity has not been of much advantage to these officials. I think it very desirable that the Minister of Customs should be able to leave his office oftener than he does to visit the principal ports of the country and see how the work is conducted there. And if the minister himself cannot always make those visits I think the commissioner of customs should be sent around from time to time to examine the different ports. When I was collector of customs, a position I occupied for fourteen years till my friends opposite thought it not in their interests that I should be there any longer, the Minister of Customs, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, used to visit our port and spend days and days there. I speak with some knowledge when I say it is very desirable that either the Minister of Customs or his commissioner should visit the most important ports and see how the work of the department in those ports is carried on. The men who grow up in the different departments of the public service have their minds run into one groove, so that they become unfit for any other positions than those they occupy. They have not the slightest hope of ever being profited by anything until Providence shall take them away to a better country.

Mr. BELL. What are the initials of the Mr. Watson whom the hon. minister proposes to raise ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. His name is John Archibald Watson. He was appointed in the summer of 1891.

Mr. BELL. Was he appointed as a second class clerk ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He is in the second class clerk list.

Mr. BELL. Was he originally ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think he has been in the second class ever since I came into the department.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. When the hon. minister, in presenting his estimates, has to announce an important change like this—I am not saying he is not perfectly justified in making it—altering the theoretical organization of his department, he ought to be prepared to give the reasons for the change. I notice, from the statement the hon. gentleman gives us, that the gentleman whom he intends to appoint assistant commissioner—though he may be deserving of the position—only entered the service in 1896. He is now, I think, a first class clerk receiving a salary of $1,500 a year with an allowance as private secretary. The hon. minister must consider the demoralization of the whole staff when he takes a man, who only entered the service in 1896, appoints him a first class clerk and then promotes him over the heads of even the chief clerks and makes him assistant commissioner. There must be some strong reason given to justify such a course. We want something more than the mere bald statement that there is an increase in the work of the department. The hon. gentleman should, as I have said, be ready to give us reasons for this change in the theoretical organization of his department and he should be able also to tell us what are the special qualifications of this gentleman who is to be thus put over the heads of others and appointed assistant commissioner.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has mentioned one point which removes an objection by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). That hon. gentleman seemed to think we were bringing a new man into the service. That is not the case—this is the promotion of a man who has been six or seven years in the service.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not raise that objection and did not inquire as to that point. I objected to the nature of the hon. gentleman's (Hon. Mr. Paterson's) explanation, whomever it might apply to.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) spoke of our wishing to bring some one into the service. But it seems I was wrong as to what the hon. gentleman said. I have already explained that I wished to ease the work upon the commissioner so that he may have liberty to leave his office and visit the principal ports, and, when he is in the office I wish him to have an assistant whom he may consult. It is desirable, also, to have one who can take the commissioner's place when he is absent. At present, a chief clerk must be called in to fill the place. As to promoting a man over the heads of others the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has administered a department and he knows that it is quite possible that a man may be found who, though not so long in the service as others, has developed a perculiar fitness to fill a certain position. And, when he found such a man, I am sure he did not hesitate to give him the position. The gentleman I have mentioned, who is to receive this appointment if the House pass the salary and my colleagues approve, is not excelled by any one in the service in his grasp of the business or otherwise better fitted for the position. I think that any one who knows him will agree as to his qualifications. And, reverting to the question of promotion over the heads of others, the hon. gentleman must remember that the commissioner of customs, of whom I desire to speak in the highest terms and whom I regard as one of the most faithful officers in the service, was not in the civil service at all, but came from outside and was appointed at the very head of the department. I am bound to say that experience has justified the selection of that gentleman. The work has been well done indeed. The work that that commissioner renders is greater than hon. gentlemen opposite, not acquainted with it as they are expected to be, have any idea of. Now with reference to the remark of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) who complains that the commissioner has not more work. He seems to think that he sits in his office and that all he has to do is to say to a certain clerk, Do this, and to another one, do that. Why, these clerks have to consult with him in reference to the business, correspondence has to be conducted, and letters written. And though he does not do merely clerical work himself, he has to be consulted with regard to it, and any one who visits his office, I venture to say, will find that he is a very busy man. Therefore, I desire an assistant commissioner, in order to relieve him somewhat of his too onerous duties, and who will take his place when it is necessary for him, in the public interest, to visit some of the larger ports and transshipping points, as I think he should do much oftener. I need not say more. I think if the hon. gentleman was administering the department he would be of the same mind as myself. I need not go into further details. I state the broad fact that the work has increased to such an extent that help is needed, and I am asking for a first-class clerk. The hon. gentleman complains that he is to be put over the heads of others. I grant you that this Mr. Watson we propose to raise is going over some others; but in the judgment of the commissioner and of myself he has special aptitude for the position he is filling at present, greater than some others that are there, and for that reason I am asking the committee to grant an additional salary so that he may take his rank as a first-class clerk. It seems only fair and right, since he is in a position like that, supervising other first-class clerks, that he should not be paid a salary inferior to that which they get.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we should have some other items of information before this vote is passed. I see that the Civil Service Act provides that

> The Governor in Council shall from time to time determine the number of officers, chief clerks, clerks, messengers and other employes that are required for the working of the several departments in each division of the civil service.

They should determine that from time to time. Have the Governor in Council determined that in that department another chief clerk is necessary? Because, if not, it is done in violation of the Act.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, and there will have to be an amendment to the Customs Act passed in the House before this office is created, and it will come, of course, by consent of the government.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me you are starting at the wrong end of the business. You first vote the salary, and then you go to the Governor in Council to set you right. According to my understanding of the law, the Governor in Council first have to consider whether the work there necessitates an additional chief clerk. And the Act provides that after that is done the salary for the additional chief clerk can be voted.

> All appointments to the civil service shall be during pleasure, and no person shall be appointed or promoted to any place below that of a deputy head unless he has passed the requisite examination and served the probationary term hereinafter mentioned.

I notice that in most of these cases there is no satisfactory evidence that they have served their probationary term in one class to entitle them to be moved into another, and it requires an Order in Council to move them in violation of the Civil Service Act.

> A first-class clerkship shall only be created by Order in Council.

That Order in Council has not passed, and we are providing a salary for a chief clerkship before we know that one is needed, before the Governor in Council have exercised their judgment as to whether one is needed or not. It seems to me the hon. gentleman is going to work entirely in the wrong way.

A chief clerkship in any department shall only be created by Order in Council, passed after the deputy head has reported that such an officer is necessary for the proper performance of the public business in the department, stating the reasons on which he has arrived at that conclusion.

Then the concurrence of the head of the department is required. Then it is provided that a first-class clerkship should only be created by Order in Council, and a second-class clerkship also by Order in Council. But in every one of these instances the first or theoretical part, as the hon. member for Lanark says, must be determined by Order in Council according as the need of the service requires these additional clerks; and that is done after careful examination, and after recommendation by the head of the branch, sanctioned by the Deputy Minister and by the minister himself. But here the first thing we do is to vote the salary upon the statement of the minister that the work is increasing there. I think his course is radically wrong.

The salary of a clerk on appointment or promotion to any class shall begin at the minimum of such class.

In nearly every instance we are violating that provision of the Act. They do not commence at the minimum, and they start the salary above the minimum. In other respects also we are violating the Act, because we take clerks from one class and promote them to another before they have reached the maximum of that class.

No salary shall be paid to any member of the civil service whose appointment or promotion, or whose increase of salary after the first day of July, 1882, has not been made in the manner provided in the Civil Service Act in force at the time of such appointment, promotion or increase.

In every one of these instances we are violating the law, in other words, we are voting these sums outside the Act entirely, we do so saying 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' Therefore I say I was justified in taking strong exception to the abuse that has crept into the departments.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But you must have the provision made before the Order in Council is formally passed.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, you cannot appoint a person to that position with a salary unless the House has sanctioned the grant.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister is entirely wrong. His first duty is to change the theoretical organization of his department on recommendation of the deputy head, and get an Order in Council, assigning reasons for it. Then there is a reason for parliament voting the salary. You cannot appoint a party to a position until the salary is voted, or at least if you do appoint him, you cannot pay him the salary until it is voted. The first duty of the minister is to get his deputy head to concur with him as to the necessity of a change in the theoretical organization of his department, then get the approbation of his colleagues in council, and the sanction of the Governor. When he has got that, he comes here and asks us to vote the salary. Then when the minister says that the deputy head did not pass the examination——

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That he was appointed to the position without examination, or without passing through the lower grades.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, not examination.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well, he was appointed to the position without passing through any lower grade to the deputy head of the department and the hon. minister knows that the Civil Service Act does not apply to the deputy head at all.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not apply to the deputy head.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. And there are several other offices that are exempted and the hon. minister must remember—it was stated again and again—the reasons why. There must be some offices in the country at the disposal of the government of the day as a reward for political services and as a reward to men of ability in the House for services to their country. Among them are the deputy headships of the departments, the postmasterships in the different towns and cities and the collectorships of customs in the different towns and cities. The justification that he has given is no justification at all because the reason does not apply in this case. He does not come to the House and tell us that he has the approval of the Governor in Council for a change in the theoretical organization of the department as the Civil Service Act requires. He should be prepared with all these reasons to give to the Committee and particularly to tell why it is that the theoretical organization of his department is changed and whether it is changed with the approbation of the deputy head of the department.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. When the hon. gentleman says that I have not the sanction of the Governor in Council for this act he is mistaken. Council agreed to this; it would not have been in the estimates if they had not agreed to it. It is the salary that is being asked for. This officer cannot be appointed until the salary is provided for and he cannot be appointed until an Order in Council has passed appointing him; but, I am asking meanwhile whether the committee will sanction the payment of a salary to a person to be appointed to the office who must be appointed, of course, by the Governor in Council, and who will be.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister is trying to impose upon the Committee and upon me. He says that he has the sanction of the Governor in Council for the estimates brought down and therefore that he has his sanction for the change in the theoretical organization of his department. But, the Civil Service Act requires that the deputy head of the department shall approve of the theoretical organization and that there shall be an Order in Council passed approving of it. Does the hon. minister say that anything of that kind is done and does he say that because he has the consent of the Governor in Council to the bringing down of his estimates and presenting them before the House he has the approval of the Governor in Council for this appointment ?

Contingencies, including $1,750, which may be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $10,355.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I beg to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) to the fact that the contingencies are to be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. I understood the hon. minister to say that the whole of the contingencies are intended to be paid in that manner.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I did not express any opinion. My hon. friends must explain that for themselves I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I understood that the hon. minister said, when I mentioned contingencies, that it was not intended to apply to the Civil Service Act.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I certainly did not say anything of the kind. If I said that I was mistaken.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well then I mistook what the hon. minister said, but he must see that the vote for contingencies applies to everything under that head and that the Civil Service Act does not apply.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, the explanation is this : There is an amount voted for contingencies and in that amount is included $1,750.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Why do you not put it so in your estimates ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think it is so stated.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Not at all ; it is nothing of the kind. Put it plainly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know how the hon. gentleman would word it. Contingencies, including $1,750, which may be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. There is a comma after $1,750.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is only the $1,750 to which the Act does not apply.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the comma is struck out that is the way it reads.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Strike out the comma and it may be so. Contingencies, $1,750, which may be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act—if that does not apply to the whole of the contingencies I know nothing about the English language or construction of it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is not intended.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well then, put it in the form in which it is intended.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. $1,750 is the amount out of the contingencies that may be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well then, change it so as to make it clear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Strike out the comma ; strike out the comma.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, strike out the comma. I have explained before that the way in which this $1,750 came into the estimates was that a first-class clerk who had been drawing $1,750 a year became ill. He took a trip for his health, I think, to the North-west and, unfortunately, on his way, he died. Between the passing of the original and supplementary estimates this took place. When we came to the supplementaries I dropped the vote for a first-class clerk of $1,750 and took a vote for that amount, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. I then got two men for the $1,750 that the one man had got before and the money is being used in that way. It has passed now for two or three years in that way.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Let me suggest this amendment : Contingencies, of which $1,750 may be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I accept that ; perhaps it is better.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. minister did not explain who these two second-class clerks were. Have they been taken out of those who have been temporary clerks in the department ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The two second-class clerks are in the service now,

Mr. Schofield, who has been there for six years is getting $600 a year and Wm. Wall, who has been in the department for five years is getting $550. The first of these was paid out of the Board of Customs vote—that is the outside vote. The salary of the other has been paid out of contingencies, the item under consideration now. Instead of one being paid out of the Board of Customs vote and the other out of contingencies they become second-class clerks and their salaries are provided for in another item.

Mr. CLANCY. I see that the contingencies stand at the same amount notwithstanding that this clerk was paid out of contingencies formerly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, I leave the contingencies at the same amount because I am afraid we will have to use the extra amount. But, the total, as the hon. gentleman will see, of the advance for the department of contingencies and salaries combined is $5,460. I beg to move that this item be amended so as to read: 'Contingencies of which $1,750 may be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.'

Item as amended, agreed to.

Department of Public Works—Salaries, $47,550.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The small increase was on the recommendation of the deputy; there is no change in the staff, and notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

Mr. CLANCY. Was there no change in the personnel of the staff?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. None whatever; it is going along in peace and harmony.

Department of Railways and Canals—Salaries, including J. W. Pugsley at $1,800, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $45,950; contingencies, $8,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the explanation of this increase?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The net increase in the vote this year over last year is $800. That is made out in this way: We have allowed the usual statutory increases, which amount to $750. We have increased Mr. Pugsley's salary $100 and we have promoted Mr. Little, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Wright—Mr. Little from a second class clerk to a first class clerk. Mr. Little was appointed in the service in 1881 as a third class clerk; promoted to a second class clerk in 1900. He has been performing the duties in the accountant's branch previously done by the assistant accountant. He is a faithful and industrious officer and we have promoted him to the first class. We have promoted Mr. Bell from a junior second class to a second class clerk, and we have promoted Mr. J. P. Wright from a junior second class clerk to a second class clerk. These three cases involve an increase over the salaries which they now receive of $550. We make provisions for two junior second class clerks which will add $1,200. The total increase caused by the staututory increase and by the additions to the salaries and promotions which I have mentioned will total $2,600. We have one first class clerk less whose salary was $1,800, leaving a net result of $800 as an addition to the appropriation.

Mr. SPROULE. Had these clerks reached the maximum of their class in each case before you promoted them?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. When did Mr. Pugsley come into the service and why do you have to say 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act'?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Pugsley entered the service in 1880; he was appointed third class clerk in 1883; he became a second class clerk in 1890; he was promoted first class clerk in 1896; he has been clerk of the Committee of the Privy Council since February, 1896. The increase will make his salary $1,800.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. If the minister looks at the estimates he will see that he is voting the same number of first class clerks as there were last year. There must be some mistake if you have one first class clerk less now. Your estimates are wrongly printed as presented to the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are only asking for the amount of money that we require.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. minister states that Mr. Pugsley is promoted to be a first-class clerk; yet there were ten last year and there are only ten now. So that one seems to have disappeared.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There are only ten now including Mr. Pugsley.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister stated very definitely a little while ago that he had dropped one first-class clerk—in other words, that he had one less now than he had last year. I ask the minister to tell us definitely how many he had last year and how many he has this year.

Mr. SPROULE. Which one did you drop?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot tell you. My memorandum does not show.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that the minister is making some additional junior clerkships and one additional first-class clerkship. Did he first get the consent of council to this increase, as the Act provides?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the Governor in Council undoubtedly assented to the appropriation being asked for the increase. That is all that has been done.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the hon. minister is doing in his department what has been done in the Customs Department—commencing at the wrong end. The Act provides that the Governor in Council shall first determine how many clerks are required for each department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They determined on that when they agreed to the estimates.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not complying with the Act at all. They must first provide for the number in the different classes; and after that the salaries are voted, when they are recommended by the head of the department. But it appears this has not been done in the department of the Minister of Railways nor in the department of the Minister of Customs, and I presume that the same practice has been followed throughout the various departments. Therefore the Civil Service Act has been entirely ignored by the government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think my hon. friend's remarks are based upon a misconception. His argument is that you must first create the clerkship before you come to the House for a vote. My hon. friend is mistaken. The Civil Service Act distinctly declares the reverse. Section 15 provides that a chief clerkship in any department shall only be created by Order in Council passed after the report of the deputy, after the concurrence of the head of the department in such report, and after the salary has been voted by parliament. These various conditions must first be complied with before the Governor in Council creates an additional clerkship. The same rule is carried down to a first-class clerkship. Section 17 provides that a first-class clerkship can only be created by an Order in Council passed on a report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, setting forth the reasons for creating the office, and after the salary has been voted by parliament. The same condition applies to a second-class clerkship. In each of these cases before the Governor in Council can grant an additional clerkship, parliament must first have provided the money. The first step is to get the appropriation from parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the provision of the Act to which I refer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I take this from the Act as published in the civil service list, dated 1902, and which contains all the amendments.

Mr. SPROULE. I refer to section 6:

> The Governor in Council shall, from time to time determine the number of officers, chief clerks, clerks, messengers and other employees required for the working of the several departments in each division of the civil service.

What I complain of is that the Governor in Council have not brought their judgment to bear on this at all. The minister at the head of the department has simply found it necessary to put on another man, and asks us to provide for the salary before the Governor in Council have decided whether the requirements of the work call for another man.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Governor in Council can only consider the matter after parliament has voted the money. It can do nothing with regard to creating offices until the appropriation is voted.

Mr. SPROULE. How can you determine how much money you want before determining what number of clerks you require? You must do that before asking us to vote the money.

Mr. LENNOX. The House is entitled to have the opinion of the Cabinet before any proposition is submitted to it to change the organization of any department. We are entitled to have first the recommendation to the minister at the head of the department made by the deputy head. That recommendation ought to be on record. Then the matter should be brought before the Governor in Council and considered, and it is only on the approval of the Governor in Council that the minister at the head of the department has a right to ask parliament to vote the money. This is not a mere matter of form. We are entitled to have the guarantee and pledge of the Governor in Council that the necessity exists for the change. More than that, until the Governor in Council has determined that there is a necessity for an increase, the minister at the head of the department cannot estimate what amount of money he will require. It is a very serious neglect of the primary conditions upon which we are called upon to vote the estimates that, not in one department alone, but in all the departments, this very important provision of the Civil Service Act is ignored.

Mr. SPROULE. What I said is further substantiated by the subsection 2 of section 6:

> If the number of employees then attached to any department in either division is greater than the number allowed to the department as herein provided, the Governor in Council shall name the persons to fill the several offices; and the remainder shall be supernumerary clerks without being eligible for increase of salary, of that class respectively in which they rank, and shall so remain until promoted in the manner herein provided or until severed from the service.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Assuming the hon. gentleman to be right in his interpretation of the Civil Service Act, it would have no application to the present case. Taking it for granted that before the change of government, such subjects had been dealt with precisely as the hon. gentleman says they should have been, the number of employees authorized by the Governor in Council was 28. After I came into the department two vacancies occurred, and these were not filled, so that we have had but 26 permanent employees in the department instead of 28. Therefore, according to the interpretation of the hon. gentleman, since the Governor in Council decided that 28 permanent clerks were necessary for the proper organization of the department, and since there are now only 26 there, we have the right to ask for the appointment of the other two, without again going before the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You do not increase the junior second-class clerks by one ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I promote and leave a junior second-class clerkship vacant.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You have one less second-class clerk and the same number of first-class clerks. And the junior second-class clerks are the same number as before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We will have two new appointments of junior second-class clerks to make according to the deputy minister's statement.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. minister assumes that once the Governor in Council has exercised his judgment as to what the number ought to be, the department meets all requirements by providing either a fewer or a larger number in the future.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are not proposing to go beyond the number.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman says that so long as he keeps below the number that is all that is necessary. But the Act provides that the Governor in Council—not the department—shall determine from time to time, and the Governor in Council has not been consulted from the first. The hon. minister does not think it is necessary for the Governor in Council to exercise his judgment so long as he keeps below the number which the Governor in Council authorizes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not interpret the Act as the hon. gentleman does. I think that the view stated by the Minister of Finance is the correct one. But, without assuming that all these performances would have to be gone through with any ordinary case it is not necessary in the present case, for the reason that, what they may reasonably have for the purposes of work of the department will not be exceeded by the votes I am now asking for.

Mr. SPROULE. Was this department changed in any way of late years—was any additional work put upon it or any work taken away ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No division of the work, but the work has grown greatly.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister seems to think it necessary that the number of clerks stated in the written brief he has presented should be appointed. But he must get the consent of His Excellency and state it in the estimates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He has.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The estimates placed upon the Table do not show that. We have no information that His Excellency has given his consent. Here is the statement showing that there were ten first-class clerks last year, and he wants ten ; there were five second-class clerks last year and he estimates for six this year ; there were six junior second-class clerks last year and he wants six this year. The hon. gentleman will find this in the details at page 20 of the estimates. The department has furnished wrong information to the Finance Department and they have got the consent of His Excellency which is not in accordance with the requirements of the Act. The hon. minister must get it corrected.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am satisfied with the amount stated in the estimates—I do not want any more.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. minister quite sure that the statement he gave, which shows that one first-class clerk is dropped, is quite correct ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My statement shows that, as compared with last year there is $1,800 which is not required this year, and, therefore, we do not carry it over to the 1903-4 estimate.

Mr. HEYD. Why is it not required ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not understand. But I am not asking for it.

Mr. CLANCY. Who is the first-class clerk who is dropped.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot find that we have dropped any. We have just as many as we had last year.

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. minister will look at page 20 of the estimates he will see that there is an increase of $50 for chief clerk, recording staff, and another increase of $50 for chief clerk, correspondence, and $50 for chief clerk, law clerk. Then, in the estimates for second class clerks there is an increase of $1,150. These a total increase of $1,300. Then, in the case of junior second-class clerks there is a decrease of $500. By deducting the decrease from the increase, we get the difference of $800 provided for in the estimates, without any change in the chief clerk. If the civil service list gives anything like a correct account, then, Mr. Pugsley was a first-class clerk last year and was now raised from the second-class.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He was a first-class clerk last year.

Mr. CLANCY. But the hon. minister said he had been raised. If the hon. gentleman will examine the estimates he will see that of first-class clerks there are four at $1,800, two at $1,600, three at $1,550 and one at $1,400.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Four at $1,800, one at $1,650, two at $1,550, and one at $1,500.

Mr. CLANCY. According to the item there does not appear to be any at $1,650. But according to the civil service list—I would refer the minister to page 168—Mr. Pugsley seems to have received $1,650. The figures do not seem to be correctly given in the estimates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Pugsley is put down in my memorandum as having received last year $1,650. There were four who received $1,650. There were four who received $1,800 according to this statement.

Mr. LENNOX. Including J. W. Pugsley.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, he got $1,650 last year. Two clerks, Mr. Chubbuck and Mr. Ross, received $1,550; and three, Messrs. Devlin and Payne and another Mr. Ross, received $1,550.

Mr. CLANCY. The estimates show three at $1,550, instead of two.

Mr. LENNOX. And four at $1,800, including J. W. Pugsley.

Mr. CLANCY. It would be well for the hon. minister to send the figures back and have them corrected. It is clear he has not been handed an accurate statement.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister must correct his estimates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I really have no correction to make. I want $45,950 on account of salaries, exactly as stated in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. When we vote an amount en bloc, it is understood that it is to be appropriated in the manner indicated in the details given in the estimates. But the hon. minister wants it voted and himself left free to apply it according to his memorandum. The House will not do anything of the kind. It should be spent according to the details in the estimates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I quite agree with that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Let the minister take it back and have it corrected.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not discovered anything to be corrected. I will read them over. In the estimate there is $6,000 for the deputy minister and the chief engineer; in my estimate it is $6,000. In the estimate there is $2,400 for the secretary of the department; it is the same in my memorandum. In the memorandum Mr. Maynard gets $2,150; the same in the estimates. In my memorandum the law clerk gets $2,100; the same in the estimates. Then the chief clerk of correspondence, Mr. Dickenson, gets $1,850; so in the estimates. Then there are four first-class clerks getting $1,800 each; there are two who get $1,600 each; three who get $1,550 each; one who gets $1,400. These amounts make $16,450, exactly what I find in the estimates. Then you come to the second-class clerks. One gets $1,400, according to my memorandum; one gets $1,350, one $1,250, one $1,150 and two $1,100 each. Now these amounts sum up $7,350, as shown in the estimates. Then of junior clerks, there are two at $950, one at $800, one at $750, three at $600 each——

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Only two here.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Add up those amounts, and I think you will find they are correct.

Mr. BENNETT. There are two in the printed book.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Because one of these is made a second-class clerk who was junior last year. I find I did make a mistake. There are only two at $600. I was including the allowance for the private secretary. That makes the sum $4,650, as shown in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister is correct now, but his statement to the House before was incorrect and misleading.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have been making the same statement all along.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister said there was one second-class clerk less. There is the same number this year as last year. He stated also that there were two more junior second-class clerks. There is exactly the same number this year as before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, we are one short, and we are promoting.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman shows the House that the whole increase amounted to $2,600, and that there was one first-class clerk dropped who was getting $1,800, which left a difference of $800. That was the hon. gentleman's first statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And that is correct.

Mr. CLANCY. That is not correct. The increases are only $1,300 actually, and the decreases are $500, which leaves $800 net increase.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You cannot figure that out. I quite understand that the hon. gentleman is disposed to be jocular. But the amount is to-day as I stated, $800 more than the appropriation of last year. The way that is ascertained is as follows: $750 for statutory increases; $100 increase for Mr. Pugsley, who gets $50 increase and $100, which brings him up to $1,800. There are three promotions amounting to $550, Little, Ball and Wright; two junior second-class clerks to be new appointments, $600 each, amounting to $1,200. The summing up shows an increase of $2,600. As I said before, less a first-class clerkship appropriation not used, $1,800, leaving a net increase of $800. That is the memorandum which I have.

Department of Marine and Fisheries, $79,050—Salaries, including R. E. Tyrwhitt at $950, and L. Bance at $1,400, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $67,050.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the absence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Préfontaine), I may say that the increase is made up of forty statutory increases at $50 each. In regard to Mr. Tyrwhitt, when I was at the head of the department, I sent him to take charge of the hydrographic survey of the North-west, a post of increased responsibility and expense. I allowed him an increase of $100 a year, but when the matter came before the Auditor General, he took exception to it as not being a legal payment according to the Civil Service Act. So we are asking the House this year to vote him the increase that was voted last year, to make his salary $900 for the coming year.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister will make the amendment the same here as in the other cases, so as to remove all doubts as to the salary being excepted from the Civil Service Act.

Contingencies, including L. Charbonneau at $500, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $12,000.

Mr. SPROULE. I see that there is an increase in contingencies.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last year there was a vacancy in the department requiring the appointment of a messenger. I asked the House to give me a vote so that I could secure an active, intelligent man as a messenger. The vote was granted but the Auditor General would not pay the salary because the name of the person appointed was not in the vote, so that the messenger, L. Charbonneau, has been appointed and paid by Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. How long has he been in the service?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About one year. The balance of the increase is owing to the increase in the telegraph service, an additional amount of $3,500 being placed in the estimates. In other years we have been obliged to apply for a supplementary vote. We shall not want a supplementary vote this year, as this amount is provided for in these estimates.

Public buildings, Ottawa—Astronomical Observatory, $45,000.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Would the hon. minister be kind enough to tell me how that matter stands now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Chairman, I may say that the work is going along fairly well, perhaps, not as fast as we would like, but the foundation is completed and a great deal of material is on the ground ready to make good progress during the coming season.

Mr. SPROULE. Where is the building located?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On the experimental farm.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether the plans are the same as those that were prepared when I was in office?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Just the same.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. May I ask also who the contractor is?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Viau.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. What is the amount of the contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Seventy-four thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. When is the work going to be completed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract calls for the completion of the work on 25th June, 1904.

Mr. SPROULE. How much of the money that was voted last year has been spent and what advancement has been made in the work ? I see there was a vote of $15,000 last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. During the first six months of this year there has been paid $3,387.45. The estimate of the architect is that about $13,000 will be spent between now and the 30th of June next.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The minister is asking only the amount that he thinks will be spent during the year, and next year he will come down for another sum of money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Correct.

Mr. SPROULE. Was this work let by contract to the lowest tenderer ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let by contract to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. SPROULE. And it is to be finished in 1904 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. June, 1904.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the hon. minister to say that it will cost about $74,000. Does that include equipment ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Including equipment it will cost $93,400.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the object to transfer the observatory from Toronto down here, or is this to be an additional one ?

Mr. CLARE. If the work calls for $74,999 and is to be completed on the 25th June next, why is not the whole amount placed in the estimates ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is on the 25th June, 1904.

Mr. SPROULE. I was asking the hon. minister if it was intended to do away with the observatory at Toronto.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think this interferes at all with the observatory at Toronto. This is under the direction of the Interior Department and it has been in existence in Ottawa for a great many years. There will, of course, be a great improvement in the service, in the building, accommodation and equipment. But, it does not interfere with the observatory at Toronto. The observatory at Toronto, I think, is in connection with the Marine Deparment and it serves a different purpose altogether.

Mr. CLARE. As the estimates we are now passing are for the year ending June, 1904, why not put the whole amount in ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand my hon. friend's point now. The foundation of this work is completed and the chief architect estimates that this $45,000 is all the contractor will earn during the time for which we take this vote. The building is not expected to be completed until next season, though the contract requires it to be completed on the 25th June. The chief architect estimates that the contractor cannot earn more than $45,000 in the coming year. That means that he cannot complete the work within the time specified.

Mr. CLANCY. It means that the contract will not be completed on the 25th June, 1904 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. minister give any information as to what astronomer is to be in charge and whether there is any person supervising the work who is possessed of the technical knowledge necessary to provide a suitable structure for the purpose ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is not connected with the Public Works Department, but as I happen to know, I do not object to giving the information. Mr. King is a gentleman that I believe the House has a great deal of confidence in and he is at the head of this work. There is no contemplated change in the staff, so far as my information goes. The staff is perfectly satisfactory and from the reports I have seen it has received a great deal of praise from some of the older countries that spend a great many thousand dollars on this service.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that the Mr. King who has been surveying the international boundary between Canada and Alaska ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Who is the clerk of works for that building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. P. Canty is his name.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I know him very well.

Ottawa—Branch of Royal Mint, $50,000.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Would the hon. minister explain how that matter stands ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am afraid it is standing still. It was decided by the department under my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte), to place the building on the government property near the Printing Bureau. The Militia Department which has control of that property raised some objections, and I believe that information was received from the authorities in England, that in building a mint for the reception of minting plant you require to have a very solid and exceedingly level surface. Therefore some difficulty was found, outside of the objection of the Militia Department, towards occupying the site chosen. That has occasioned delay. I hope that delay will not be much longer. I think that on the same property, probably on the other side, we will be able to find ground enough to carry out the plan prepared by the department when my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was minister. The same plan is in every way satisfactory if we had a suitable site. I hope to have a report to-day, but at all events I will have it in a short time and I think the chief architect will report that we can have a level site on the other side.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Do I understand that it will be the same site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, on the other side.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. When I left office these objections had not been raised.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Why, it is on solid rock.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In order to get a level surface, there would be a good deal of cutting down necessary and much expense would have to be gone to, and it would not give an opportunity for driving around as laid down in the plan. When I went to the department I found that nothing had been done and I asked for a report. So far as I can say at present, if the other site is found satisfactory, it will be adopted.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I cannot understand where that other site is. I may say at once that when I left office no objection of the kind had been raised The bottom is rock and there can be no possible objection on the ground of solidity.

Mr. BENNETT. There has been an earthquake since.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The Minister of Finance and myself had agreed as to the site and I cannot for the life of me discover why the English authorities, who had approved of the plan when I left office, raised the objection since. I would like to have some more knowledge as to the nature of these objections because I cannot understand them at all. Indeed I do not know where the present site can be and perhaps it is only fair to ask that the item should stand until we have more information about it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is three years since this vote was first taken and when I went into the department I endeavoured to have the work go ahead. The country and parliament is committed to it and I believe it is an important work in the interest of the country. Of course if the House wishes to renew this vote I shall submit the plan.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The reason why the work did not go on so rapidly as it will perhaps go on now, is that the Minister of Finance asked me to delay until he returned from England. That is the reason why the contract was not awarded but as to the site it was decided upon when I left office. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr Sutherland) does not accuse me of losing time. The plans were prepared, they had to be sent to England to be approved of, and the Minister of Finance asked me before his last trip to England not to give the contract before he came back.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There seems to be a contradiction in the statement by the minister. First the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was told that there had been a change in the site, and it would now appear that there has been no change in the site.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) is correct in what he says. He had commenced proceedings with the view of building the mint on Nepean Point, close to the Printing Bureau, and he had gone so far as to call for tenders. He was good enough to make a delay until I could return from England, and on or about that time objections were made by the Militia Department, and perhaps from other sources as to the suitability of the site, and it was proposed to look for a new site. I am aware of the site which my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) has in his mind, but as it includes some private land, perhaps we would not be wise in indicating at present where that land is until it is under option. I do not think any business man would think it wise to announce that we were going to buy a certain piece of property until we had that property under option.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. When I left office the government had chosen a site on government ground. I want to emphasize that fact. Of course if the minister tells me that he has good ground for asking that the item should go through I will make no more objection.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Might I ask the Minister of Militia and Defence what are his objections to the site in question. Of course, if it is against the public interest, I do not wish him to answer.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have no objection to say that after the plans were matured it was found that very much more ground would be required for the buildings than was at first supposed, and that it might interfere with the use of that ground for military purposes in future. If for instance there should ever be a military depot at Ottawa it might be a convenient site for such a building. I had a careful report made upon the matter by the then General Officer Commanding and I addressed a letter to the Minister of Finance suggesting that there should be delay until the whole question could be considered.

Mr. BIRKETT. This being the third time that this vote has been placed in the estimates for a royal mint at Ottawa, it seems to me that I should now ask the Minister of Public Works, if the government intends building the mint this year. If I am correctly informed the Minister of Finance is not in favour of building a mint because he says that the mint will be an absolute loss to Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BIRKETT. The Minister of Finance is reported as having so stated. I wonder if I am correct or not in that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I wonder if my hon. friend will give me the source of his information.

Mr. BIRKETT. Yes I will.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the earlier stages there was some debate about the advisability of our having a mint but for several years it has been the policy of both sides of the House that a mint should be built.

Mr. BIRKETT. Well, I will read it. On the 15th of May, 1899, Mr. Fielding made a speech in the House of Commons against the establishment of a mint in Canada. His speech will be found in 'Hansard' for 1899, pages 3112 and 3113. Mr. Fielding said :

> I am well within the mark when I say that a well equipped mint would turn out in one month all the copper and silver coins required in Canada in the whole year so that we would have an establishment with one month's work, and eleven months' idleness.
> Were we to adopt this policy we would lose a considerable part of the profit we are now enjoying—that is the profit out of the coinage.
> Were we to convert all our gold into coin we would find that we had no use for it.
> There is no profit in the minting of gold.
> Not only is there no profit, but there would be absolute loss.
> It would be a waste of money to have a Canadian mint.

In the face of that, I think it is my duty, as one of the representatives of the city of Ottawa, to ask the Minister of Public Works if it is the intention of the government to establish a mint in Ottawa or merely to keep this vote dangling before the eyes of the electors from year to year ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. When the hon. gentleman stated that he had been informed by somebody that the Minister of Finance had opposed this mint vote, he was mistaken, because he had not been informed, but was reading from an old debate dealing with the question of a mint under entirely different conditions from those which exist to-day. We are not proposing to establish a mint in the manner which was then under debate, but a branch of the royal mint of England, which will mint not only the coinage of Canada, but also the sovereign of the British Empire from Canadian gold, an entirely different proposition. So that my hon. friend is reading from an old story, under conditions which have vastly changed, and his zeal on behalf of his constituents has certainly not been so great as it ought to be when he is giving a turn to my remarks entirely unwarranted by the experience of the past three years.

Mr. BIRKETT. I am certainly indebted to the hon. Minister of Finance for the information he has given; but I did not misquote him.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say the hon. gentleman did.

Mr. BIRKETT. My information is correct. The statement was made by the hon. gentleman, and he never contradicted it. If there was no profit in minting gold three years ago, where do you expect to get the profit now ? I merely want to know, on behalf of my constituents, whether it is the intention of the government to establish this mint or not, or whether they intend to keep this $50,000 vote dangling before the electors until the next election comes around?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman says he did not misquote me. I do not accuse him of misquoting me. He is reading from a newspaper report of what occurred three years ago.

Mr. BIRKETT. No, I am reading from 'Hansard.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, it is not my practice to delve into those old records unless I have some special reason; but my recollection is that I stated then that if we could arrange to establish a branch of the royal mint, and not simply a mint for Canadian currency, that might be worth while. When he says he is obliged to me for the information I have given, he need not thank me, because I did not give him any information that has not been before the House for a long time, and if the hon. gentleman has not discovered it until now, he is not as wide-awake a representative of the city of Ottawa as I had supposed he was.

Mr. BIRKETT. I have had it in my possession for three years, so that I am not so slow after all.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the very fact that the item has been voted for three years is a very good reason for the hon. member for Ottawa asking the question he has, especially in view of the information which we have now that the government has not even selected the site for the mint. I wish to ask what is the estimated cost of this mint.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A very full estimate has been made. It is estimated that it will cost at least $275,000, or perhaps, when fully equipped, about $300,000. I may say to my hon. friend the member for Ottawa that since this policy was decided upon, no member of the government has had the slightest intention of delaying the work of putting up the building. So far as the Finance Minister is concerned, during the few weeks that I have been in the department, he has bothered me with regard to it, both in writing and personally, on several occasions. I am making every possible effort to have the work commenced, and I hope, if this vote meets the approval of the House, that when the supplementary estimates for the coming year are brought down, I shall be able to give full information as to the site, and as to what additional amount will be required in order to enable us to go on with the building during the year 1903-4. By that time we ought to be able to advertise for tenders and to know exactly when we can go on with the work.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister of Finance has given a curious excuse for his change of opinion. Three years ago he held exactly the opinion stated by the hon. member for Ottawa. He has had the item in the estimates for three years, so that it must have been only this year that he has received the consent of the imperial authorities to establish a branch of the royal mint. Why did he ask for a vote two years ago, without having that consent, and when he held the opinion that the mint was entirely useless ? It is only this year, as I understand, that he has received the authority of the imperial authorities, to do what he proposes to do.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Who said that ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understood that you said it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say anything of the sort.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister, in answering the objections of my hon. friend from Ottawa, stated that when he made his statement three years ago he had a different opinion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I did not.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. And that because of the authority he has received from the imperial authorities, another state of affairs exists. When was it he got the authority ? Was it last year, or the year before ? It could not have been the year before, because it was then proposed not to build this mint in the city of Ottawa, but in Vancouver or somewhere else in British Columbia, for the purpose of minting the gold mined in the Yukon and keeping it in our own country.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend has the unhappy faculty of understanding a great many things that nobody says. I certainly did not say any of the things the hon. gentleman attributes to me. As to when the authority of the imperial government was obtained, when the Act of this parliament was passed to establish a mint, it was distinctly stated that it was to be established in Ottawa; it was never proposed to put it anywhere else. The whole matter was threshed out in this House at that time, and the Act passed two years ago was to establish not a purely Canadian mint, but a branch of the royal mint.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that it was claimed during the election contest in the Yukon that if a supporter of the government were sent here, there would be a chance of having the mint established at Dawson. It was also stated in British Columbia when I was out there that it was desirable to have a mint at Vancouver, therefore it was necessary that the government should be supported in that quarter. Down here in Ottawa, I presume the same thing was dangled before the people so as to show them it was very desirable the government should be sustained. Why, the party opposite have been making use of this question in various localities. Certainly some one has been deceiving the people, and the fact that we have been voting the money three or four sessions and not spending any part of it gives colour to the belief that the whole thing is kept open for political purposes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not see how any one could pretend that the site for this building was to be elsewhere than in Ottawa. The grant was taken for a mint at Ottawa. The Act was passed for the establishment of a government mint at Ottawa, and no member of the government has ever proposed that it should be anywhere else than in Ottawa. All this political scheming exists only in the imagination of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPROULE. The fact that you are not spending the grant is sufficient to give rise to the suspicion that you are using this item as a bait for political support.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Suspicion ever haunts the guilty mind.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. It took some time for the plans to be got ready as that kind of work is new here. After the plans were prepared they had to be sent to England, and we wrote, I do not know how many times, to get these plans back before we could get them. In England they do not do things so quickly as my hon. friend would like to see them done here. We lost a great deal of time before we could get the plans back. Tenders were asked for, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who was going to England, thought it was better that he should consult personally with the imperial authorities before anything further was done, and that was why the contract was not awarded. I may be mistaken, but I am afraid that the choice of a new site will require the making of new plans. The plans were prepared for the site at Nepean Point, and no objection was then raised to that site. There was some talk about that piece of land being required for military purposes but we got over that difficulty, and tenders were called for.

Mr. CASGRAIN. When were tenders called for ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. About five months ago.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Had an agreement between the imperial authorities and the Canadian government been arrived at then ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Yes, we had full authority then, but the Minister of Finance was anxious to see the imperial authorities again. The arrangement for the site however was final, because I called for tenders and I am afraid that if a new site be chosen new plans will have to be prepared.

Mr. BIRKETT. In connection with this item, there is another item of $200,000 which was formerly voted for the new geological museum at Ottawa. It was twice voted by this House but I do not see it in the estimates this session.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is in the estimates. In 1901 we passed the Act, entitled an Act respecting the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Mint. That Act, it is provided, may be cited as "The Ottawa Mint Act, 1901." How in the face of that anybody can say that the government at any time entertained the idea of putting the mint anywhere else, is something I cannot understand.

Mr. CLANCY. In view of the statement made by the ex-Minister of Public Works, that the consent of the imperial authorities had been obtained and tenders called for, why did the Minister of Finance ask for further delay until he could see the imperial authorities.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was calling for tenders during my absence and I suggested that the contract should not be awarded until my return. I desired to consult the imperial authorities—not to obtain their consent, because that had been given—but about some matters of detail. I asked my hon. friend to be good enough to hold over the tenders until my return and he was kind enough to do so.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the hon. gentleman raise any question with reference to the foundation not being good, because the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Sutherland) lays special stress upon the fact that the building would require a very solid foundation, thereby implying that the site already selected was not sufficiently solid.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not say that. I may have said that the building required a solid foundation but the site referred to by my hon. friend is perfectly solid. It required however to be levelled and the surroundings levelled.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. If I understand the objection, it was that the ground was not broad enough. As to that I am not prepared to say anything except that when I left office the ground had been found sufficiently large. Of course this is a very important building, and the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works have a perfect right to choose a better site if one is to be found.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Is it possible for the hon. Minister of Public Works to tell us what proportion of land belonging to individuals and what proportion belonging to the government will be taken for this site.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot give that at present.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. And how many thousand feet more would be required.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall get that information.

Mr. BIRKETT. I see an item of $50,000 for the Victoria Museum, but surely that is not intended to replace the geological museum ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We will reach that in a moment.

Mr. BIRKETT. I asked why the $200,000 which was twice voted for the geological museum was dropped. Two years ago I was given to understand that plans had been prepared for a building which was to cost $1,000,000. Has the Department of Public Works any plans for this museum, for which $200,000 was voted two years ago ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When were the $200,000 voted ?

Mr. BIRKETT. In 1901-2, for a new geological museum at Ottawa, and that was estimated as one-fifth of the total cost.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. That amount was voted, but when we found that it could not be spent we simply reduced it. There was no use voting a large amount in the estimates when it could not be spent ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There were only $50,000 voted in 1901.

Mr. BIRKETT. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. My present colleague (Mr. Belcourt) told me distinctly that he had the plan of this building at home in his own residence and the building was to cost $1,000,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. When was that ?

Mr. BIRKETT. 20th October, 1900. Are those plans still in the possession of the government ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. When was that ?

Mr. BIRKETT. In 1900—on the 29th of October. I want to know if these plans are still in the possession of the government?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course, I am not able either to affirm or to dispute the reports heard by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Birkett) outside. But there is one point upon which I have information. He stated that there was an item of $200,000 for this purpose in the estimates of 1901. I have those estimates before me, and I find this item :

Victoria Memorial Museum, $50,000.

I will send the volume over to the hon. member (Mr. Birkett) and from it he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. MACLEAN. Sufficient has come out in this debate with regard to buying more land, to justify us in calling upon the government to lay before the country a plan for acquiring land in Ottawa for the purposes of government on a comprehensive scale. Every now and again a proposition is brought up to buy land here or to rent it there for the purposes of the government. The time has come when a large block of land should be acquired in Ottawa for government purposes. That land could be acquired for a reasonable price. It ought to be got now ; the government should cease this tinkering way of acquiring land here or there at heavy prices and against the public interest. There is opportunity for jobbery in every such deal.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the minister if it is the government's intention to locate this mint according to the plans now in the possession of the government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My information from the chief architect is that the plans are quite satisfactory. They have been approved by the British government. And I am perfectly frank in stating that, when I get this vote, if then my colleagues approve, the work will be gone on with as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Has the whole site or only part of the site been bought ? Of course, if I am indiscreet in asking that question, I shall not press it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) and the House will see that it would be indiscreet of me—holding the views I do, and intending, as I do, to ask council and this House to endorse any action we may take—to answer that question now. I agree with my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) that it is in the public interest that these important national buildings should be erected. If my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Birkett) objects to their being erected here, I know other places that would be glad to have them. In my humble opinion they ought to be at the capital. I agree with my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) and what he proposes I hope to do at an early date—to make a report showing the best locations for these buildings and to purchase land which will be sufficient for years to come.

Mr. BROCK. The impression made upon the mind of the ordinary business man, I should think, would be that we might call a halt in this matter of a mint. It has been before us a great many years. We had expressions of opinion from very high authority, even so high as the Minister of Finance, that a mint in this country is not needed, and is, in some respects, undesirable. It would certainly cost an enormous amount of money. For the life of me, I cannot understand what advantage Canada is to get from it. I think we should get far more advantage out of the proposal of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) of buying a large block of land at one transaction upon which buildings could be erected suitable for the purpose of government, the whole to be carried out according to some comprehensive plan. The great objection I have, not only as a member of this House, but as a business man, is to the cheese-paring way with which this thing has been gone about, not only during the last six or seven years, but during the last twenty or thirty years. When this magnificent building was put up—then was the time to have acquired an immense amount of property ; it would have been very valuable to the country now. But, having missed that opportunity, we should not go on making the same mistake year after year. I would suggest the Minister of Public Works to call a halt in this very matter we are discussing, and let us see if we cannot work it in with the larger scheme to the advantage of the country. I do not believe the business men of Canada have got into their minds what advantage a mint is going to be to the country. We have done and are doing a good deal for glory ; let us do something for profit and for business reasons. The city of Ottawa is of great importance we all acknowledge. But, if we are to have a mint there are other business centres in this country. This is business, not politics. There is the city of Montreal, very near us, and the city of Toronto, not very far away. Then we have Vancouver in the west, which has the advantage of being much nearer the gold producing country than Ottawa is. As to making money, we know that large amounts are being made here, and many people in the city of Ottawa are becoming enormously wealthy. If a little daylight is let in, I think we may find that we are getting too many money making institutions in the city of Ottawa. Let the government take the country into their confidence in this matter. We find that the site looked upon as good not five months ago is now regarded as inadequate. How will the whole question be regarded ten years from now? The government should take this matter seriously, and not go about it as if they were speculators on the stock exchange. Surely it must be a serious matter, seeing that it has occupied attention for three years. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Birkett) who is a good business man, does not understand what you are trying to do. Is it politics or business? I think the time has come when we should stop driving at politics and settle down to business. The government do not seem to regard these matters seriously. The Minister of Finance particularly, in his jaunty fashion, plays battle dore and shuttle cock with these questions. But he cannot do it all the time. The country is waking up, and I think we shall wake up the government and compel them to treat public affairs seriously and not answer, as the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did the other day when he was asked a plain business question, with a ridiculous comical story. The government are being watched from one end of the country to the other. Let them turn their eyes to the west, and they will see their friends in power in the province of Ontario being arraigned before the people. These things cannot be turned aside with a jaunty sneer. This matter of erecting a mint in Ottawa may be treated by the government as a small matter, but the country cannot be humbugged about it all the time. The Minister of Finance may meet a committee in this city and, with his cleverness, appear to turn them down. But the only effect is to send emissaries throughout the country who feel that they have not been fairly treated. And I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the time is coming when there will be a change.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BROCK. The very laugh, the very sneer I hear from the other side emphasizes what I say. Hon. gentlemen opposite know it. There is not a man coming from a constituency in Ontario who does not know this, and there is not one of their supporters from Ontario who does not tell them of it. They are trying to withstand a movement that has been helped on by the action of the late Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) who honestly tried to voice what is the real feeling of the country and what would be best in the interest of the country. The Minister of Finance, I claim, is turning this thing down, and he is turning it down to the detriment of his friends and the party to which he belongs. I am not here to make an excuse for the hon. gentlemen opposite, I will be glad to see them turned down. Now, Sir, I submit that a matter of this kind, although it appears to be small, is really of great importance, as showing the trend of opinion in this country. It is significant that a matter can be brought up here year after year for three years, and that the whole country can be misled, moreover, that the very city in which this building is supposed to be built can be misled. I think we are justified in concluding that the government have not been honest in this matter, and that they are now endeavouring to hoodwink the people of this country in connection with this mint.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I must defend what I have done in the past. I think I am on fair ground in saying that the government, while I was a member of it, did not purposely lose any time. As I said, the plans had to be prepared here first, and then they had to be approved on the other side. That took time. But tenders were asked for before I left, and were received, and if there had been no change in the site the work would be going on now.

Mr. BROCK. The change of the minister was the principal thing.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Now it may be well that the committee should realize thoroughly what that royal mint means. We have been discussing it in the past. I, for one, would have been glad to have a Canadian mint, but after discussion it was found that perhaps that would not be practicable. It was resolved to have a branch of the royal mint, which means of course that the superior officers of the institution will not be Canadians but Englishmen, the imperial government will appoint them. Practically this institution would not be under our care and control.

Mr. BROCK. Do the imperial government pay anything towards it?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. No.

Mr. BROCK. Oh, Canada pays the bill.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. On that question as on all others, my motto is Canada for the Canadians. But I fully realize that it would not be practicable or possible to have a purely Canadian mint. The idea of the Minister of Finance was to have a royal mint so that we might work for the imperial government. But on the other hand, we would have to pay for the institution though it would not be under our care and charge. That is about the size of it, and it is just as well that we should look the matter straight in the face. The government have decided on that policy, and I am equally responsible for it. But as the government have not moved in the matter, it is just as well perhaps that we pause over the position as we find it to-day. I must give the Minister of Finance this credit, that he has always been anxious for the work to proceed, and it is not his fault if the work has not progressed more rapidly. We pushed the plans in England as quickly as we could. Of course if we are obliged to buy a new site, it will cost a large amount of money. Land is not given free in this capital of ours. If the original site has been condemned—well, later on when the proper time comes, I shall desire to know the reasons why it has been condemned. I went carefully over the ground again and again with the chief architect, as well as with other able men, and we thought that the site was a very proper one indeed, otherwise I would not have consented to it.

Mr. BIRKETT. The Minister of Public Works made one or two remarks which I think are a little unkind, and he attributed opinions to me which I do not hold. He said that the member for Ottawa (Mr. Birkett) did not wish to have the mint built in this city, that there were plenty of other places anxious to get it. Now the member for Ottawa did not say one word against putting up any building in Ottawa, but he did ask why the building had been abandoned, and why, after this vote had been repeatedly taken, nothing was done. Surely I would be the last man in this House to say a word against one dollar being spent in Ottawa. I want to see all the money possible spent in this city, and I do not like to have any one insinuate that I am not anxious to see that building go on. The fact is that I see no reason why it has not been gone on with. The vote was taken three years ago, the plans are prepared, the site chosen is excellent. I do not see why the site should be changed, and in my opinion there is no reason for any change.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course I only spoke in a jocular manner. The hon. gentleman referred to the vote of $200,000, he was mistaken in that, for I looked back three years and found the same vote, $50,000. I myself am in favour of building the mint in Ottawa, and sincerely desire to see the work go on as quickly as possible. There is no intention on the part of the government of delaying it any longer than is necessary.

Mr. BIRKETT. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Could the minister say whether a proclamation has been issued by the imperial authorities establishing a branch of the royal mint in Ottawa ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot say as to the issue of the proclamation, but arrangements have been made between the imperial and Canadian governments for the establishment of a royal mint. Whether the proclamation has been actually issued I do not remember at the moment; but I am clear in stating that all the arrangements have been made between the two governments to authorize the establishment of a mint at Ottawa, in accordance with the Act passed unanimously by this House.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The Act was predicated upon proclamation issued by the imperial authorities and published in the Canadian 'Gazette,' establishing a branch of the royal mint at Ottawa.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think that would prevent our going ahead. I am not sure the proclamation has been issued, I almost think it has not, but it would be issued the moment the mint has been established and put in operation. However, there is no misunderstanding, there is perfect agreement between the imperial and the Canadian governments, and the correspondence on the subject was brought down at a previous session.

Mr. MACLEAN. When does the hon. gentleman think this mint will be established and in running order ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Minister of Public Works can best answer that.

Mr. MACLEAN. I mean the other arrangements after the building is erected.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Just as soon as the building can be erected.

Mr. LENNOX. Instead of regretting the delay that has occurred, I think it is rather fortunate that delay has occurred. I think a good deal could be said about this, and a great deal of thinking could be done about it. Now, we have had a great deal of discussion as to the question of the necessary public buildings at Ottawa and as to the sites for them and it surely does occur to the government, as it has occurred to many hon. members, that we do not want one public building in one part of the city and another public building in another part and thus have them distributed around through the city of Ottawa. There ought to be some definite and complete plan as to where the public buildings which are likely to be required in the next half century will be located. Now, we are met with the difficulty at the present time that there is no site for this building, and that because—and it may be a very good reason—it is contemplated by the government that they may have to purchase some private property, it is not expedient at the present time to take the committee into their confidence and tell them where that site is to be. That, I can understand is perfectly reasonable, but, at the same time, I think it is probably a good reason why this item should not be pressed at the present time. I do not think—and in this I differ from a great many hon.

members who have spoken—that there is any great urgency in regard to this matter. If I understand the hon. Minister of Public Works aright, he suggested, during an early part of the discussion, that probably he would have a report from his chief engineer to-morrow. Was I right ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, within a few days.

Mr. LENNOX. I thought he said to-morrow; however, within a few days. I know I cannot prevail very far upon the government and probably as a new member my views are not entitled to any great weight, but I would suggest that in view of the fact that we are liable to have this report in a few days and as there is no great urgency in passing this item at the present time, it be allowed to stand over, if it meets with the concurrence of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and that we take it up again when we have more information than we have at the present time.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let me say that I must insist upon pressing this vote if we are to make any progress at all. This matter has been before the House for three years at least, and I think it was unanimously admitted by both sides of the House that it was in the interests of the country that this work should go on. Perhaps, unexpected circumstances have arisen to create some delay, but it is better to have some delay than to make a mistake. If the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) understood the conditions at all he would see that this building should under no circumstances be put in a situation near the other buildings used for parliamentary or public purposes. You would not want a factory with a wall around it like a gaol placed in the beautiful park around this building for instance. We should have our geological museum and such other national buildings as we require near each other if we could get a plot of land under reasonable conditions that would answer for some years. At the same time, no one would think of establishing this manufacturing industry on the same ground as that occupied by the class of buildings to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. It must be isolated.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think that when the supplementary estimates are brought down, I shall be prepared with full information upon this subject.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. On this subject ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On this subject.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. If the money is voted it is to be expended on a building in Ottawa ?

Mr. LENNOX.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. It is stated that this amount has been voted three times without any objection. The hon. gentleman must know that he is asking this vote under entirely different conditions from those that formerly prevailed. It was voted the last time on the express condition that the site which had been selected was to cost nothing. Now the hon. gentleman comes down and asks for this vote without being prepared to tell the Committee, and the Committee has not insisted on knowing, what the building would cost, but, surely, the hon. gentleman will not expect the Committee to vote a sum of money blindly when it can be delayed for a few days and when the Committee does not know how much will be involved in securing a suitable site, information on which point may change the minds of the Committee entirely as to whether we should undertake that work or not. I understand that work to be one more of national pride than of absolute utility or necessity for Canada. The first impulse that seized the House was that we should have a Canadian mint, not because we absolutely needed it but from a sense of national pride. We have been forced to abandon that position and to take another position. Now, so far as the benefits accruing to Canada from the standpoint of dollars and cents are concerned, we have not even from the hon. Minister of Finance any encouragement to hope that our position will be materially changed. We are told that if we had a Canadian mint it would not be in operation for more than one month in the year, but what assurance have we, when we are taking another mint upon ourselves and investing so large a sum of money—and it is a British mint, not a Canadian mint, separately as was understood in the first instance—of the necessity that has arisen under which we should give the hon. gentleman this vote until we see the question somewhat worked out ? I think the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) is quite proper in suggesting that Canada can live without a branch of the imperial mint for another year. Now, the question is that if there is one established in Canada, will it be in Ottawa ? That seems to be a settled question, and I think the hon. gentleman can well afford to allow that vote to stand. We do not know what complications will arise in connection with the new site that may change the mind of parliament entirely, because the hon. gentleman is asking the vote under new conditions.

Mr. LENNOX. Just a word, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. minister in regard to my not appreciating the point that this building, possibly being surrounded by a wall, or probably surrounded to some extent by a substantial iron railing, or paling, should not be in close association with the buildings here. I quite apprehend that point, but the point I wish to make clear is that there should be some relation of the public buildings, one to the other, that it is not desirable that we should have certain public buildings here and the mint in an entirely different part of the city, unconnected as a matter of view, even, with the present location. I have too much of an eye for architectural beauty and the fitness of things to desire to see it even in the place where it was proposed, at one time, to erect a statue to our late sovereign the Queen—at the entrance to the public buildings here. I do not propose that it should be upon this plot of ground at all, but I do consider that when we were discussing the question before that it was pretty well understood a site had been fixed upon, and that while it was an isolated site in every way appearing to be suitable, was well within the view of the public buildings we have here and was to form part of a group of buildings proposed to be erected at a considerable cost. I say again, and I say it much more urgently than before, that I think it is not only the courtesy we should expect from the hon. minister that he should allow the matter to stand over, but it is the right of the representatives of the people, having regard to the changed conditions that have arisen, to ask that this item shall not be pressed at the present time. Let me be as distinct and definite as possible. I want to say here that having regard to the changed conditions I shall feel it to be my duty, at all events, to protest in the most vigorous way by vote, or otherwise, against this matter being pressed whilst the people's representatives are not in a position to know where the building is to be placed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are not discussing, or we should not be discussing, to-night, the wisdom or unwisdom of establishing a Canadian mint. After several years of discussion on this subject the parliament of Canada came to the conclusion unanimously that it was a wise measure to have ; not a Canadian mint as was originally proposed, but a branch of the royal mint. I stated to my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Birkett) that if he had read that interesting speech of 1899 carefully he would have observed that at the very time at which I dissented from the motion then made respecting the establishment of a purely Canadian mint—in that very speech I suggested that if an arrangement could be made with Her Majesty's government for establishing a branch of the royal mint, that would give larger employment than a purely Canadian mint, that would probably be a very desirable arrangement. That arrangement which I then suggested was afterwards carried out. This was fully understood when parliament unanimously adopted that Act, and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was one of its most cordial supporters. Therefore, we are not discussing to-day the wisdom of establishing a branch of the royal mint in Canada. I admit it was to some extent a matter of national pride, but national pride is not less to-day than it was two years ago. If we are open to complaint at all it is not because we have adopted the policy of building a branch of the royal mint, but because there has been some delay. I see no reason in the world why we should not proceed with this vote so that if there has been delay in the past there shall not be delay in the future. We have unanimously adopted the policy of having a mint, my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Brock) voted in support of it and he must not go back upon himself. I want him to be consistent. I want him to stand to his guns ; he supported the royal mint here only a few years ago for national and imperial reasons, and I do not want him to be less national and less imperial than at that time. I think I am correct in stating that when the proposal was made to establish a mint the question of the site was not then considered essential.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes it was.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will not contradict my hon. friend, because he may have looked it up and I have not ; we can see about that later. I do not think the question of site was at first considered essential, but it came up later. Without stating now where the site is to be, I am quite satisfied that the cost of the land will not materially change the situation. I can not go further than that. I can assure my hon. friend who has raised a doubt on that point, that from what I know as to the progress that has been made in getting a site, the cost of that site will not be a reason for changing our policy respecting the mint.

Mr. BROCK. I stand up Mr. Chairman, again to justify myself. The Finance Minister has charged that when this mint was proposed I strongly favoured it. I strongly favour everything still that tends to imperial interests as well as Canadian interests, but even suppose I have changed my opinions in regard to this matter I can say as the Prime Minister said the other day that I have been green in my youth and that I have a right to change my opinion. But let me say, Sir, that I have not changed my opinion. I agree with the opinion of the Bank of Montreal, that it is a bad business, that it will be a losing business, that there is no profit in it, and if I led the majority of this House to carry me with it I simply did what the Finance Minister did himself.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let us stand together then.

Mr. BROCK. I contend that the establishment of a mint in this country will redound to the financial loss of this country, and if that be the case, it is not beneath the dignity of the Minister of Finance to recede from his mistake when he finds he has made one.

I do not see why I should drag Canada into a serious loss of $100,000 a year merely for the sake of national pride. We can distribute our national pride much more profitably in another direction. We can assist our great empire to which we belong much more liberally than we are doing at present, we can spend our money much more profitably than by spending it on a mint which the Finance Minister is going to take to his own particular glory instead of the national glory of this country. So far as my opinion goes, now I advise the members of this House to move very slowly in this matter. It is not merely the expenditure on the building that we have to consider.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. How much will it cost a year ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The Act of Parliament provides for an annual expenditure of $75,000.

Mr. BROCK. But the Minister of Finance told us that he was making a profit by having the silver coined in England instead of here, and to that $75,000 you must add the loss which we incur in that regard. But you forget the patronage there is in connection with such a department. Why bless your heart they can keep Ottawa solidly Reform for years to come with the patronage they will have.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BROCK. I would ask the members of this House to be very careful about adopting the financial schemes of the Finance Minister. He will allow his financial ability to be directed in any way that will keep him where he is. This country knows it ; we have all recognized it. It has been impressed upon me personally ; it has been impressed on this side of the House and I think the members on the other side of the House are impressed too. Therefore, I would ask gentlemen who have an interest in this country, and I think we all have, I would ask them to vote down this scheme even supposing we go back on our record. We have the advantage of the opinion of the First Minister that it is justifiable under certain circumstances to go back upon our record. I am not ashamed of changing my opinions if I change them in the right direction, and the right direction at the present time is to sit upon an expenditure of this kind. We are floating upon the crest of that wave of prosperity which the Finance Minister spoke of some years ago. He knows as well as any man in this House, and the sensible level headed business men of this country are warning him every day that we are approaching a time when things will not be as prosperous. We are not only putting up a mint now, but we are putting up a building in which we are going to carry on a very losing business. There is no need for it at all ; there is not a bit of glory in it ; we are perfectly satisfied with our present currency and the manner in which our coinage is at present turned out. Gentlemen I ask you to oppose this Canadian mint in every possible way, and I do ask the Finance Minister to have the grace, once in his life, to acknowledge that he has been possibly wrong and to let this thing drop.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have no objection to admit that I may be possibly wrong sometimes.

Mr. BROCK. And you are wrong now.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I have to disagree from the hon. member (Mr. Brock) with regard to this expenditure. He objects to it because the expenditure may be directed in such a way as to keep the present government in power for many years. Thank goodness, the application of the money is not in their hands at all. It has to be paid direct to the Lord Commissioners of the Treasury in England.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What becomes of the patronage story ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It is the patronage part of my hon. friend's argument that I object to.

Mr. BROCK. They will fix that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Even the officers are to be appointed by the imperial authorities. The Act provides for an annual expenditure of $75,000 to be paid into the hands of the Lord Commissioners of the Treasury in order to meet the salaries and contingencies of that department. My hon. friend (Mr. Brock) need have no fear that it will be expended so as to injure any political party. I am with the hon. gentleman opposite that the mint should be erected in Ottawa. But I do not know that it will be a great success financially, or that a large amount of money will accrue to the country because of it. I heard the objection of Mr. Clouston, of the Bank of Montreal, as to the establishment of the mint, but I think it was predicated on the establishment of a Canadian mint. Under the new circumstances, I do not know whether there will be a profit or a loss ; but I think there will be no great loss of money, after all, in the establishment of this institution, as we have the assurance of the hon. Minister of Public Works that it will be built in Ottawa, and that after the building is completed the expenditure, in the shape of patronage, in the appointments to the different offices in the mint, will be in hands that will not exert a corrupt influence on the electors of Ottawa.

Mr. BROCK. Notwithstanding all that has been said, I beg to move that the item be struck out. In doing that, we shall be on the safe side for Canada, at any rate.

Amendment negatived : Yeas, 6 ; nays, 47.

Victoria Memorial Museum, $50,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is a revote, as the House knows. My own personal view is to recommend council to purchase a block of land that will be sufficient; and before I ask for any money to go on with this building, that will be reported to the House.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. In other words, no site has been chosen as yet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the necessity of a new press gallery in this chamber. The press gallery is crowded, and the press boys would like to have some more accommodation. If my hon. friend will kindly give his attention to my request, I shall be very much obliged indeed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may say that in view of the improvement which was made last year, giving so much satisfaction to members of the House, I think it will be proper to ask for a supplementary estimate to continue that improvement on the other side, and I will ask the architect to report what accommodation can be given to the press gallery.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is the unanimous opinion of the members of this House that the construction of a national museum is of the very greatest importance at the present time. I am not so much concerned about the construction of a mint; but so far as the geological museum is concerned, it seems to me that we are flirting with calamity to allow the precious records of this country to be kept in an old building which is liable at any moment to be swept away by fire, and I think the minister cannot act too quickly in securing a site and going on with the construction of a new building.

Mr. SPROULE. I am entirely opposed to the principle of voting a large amount of money year after year without knowing when it is to be used or whether it is to be used at all. It is a very unsound and pernicious principle, and I respectfully submit that the ministers ought to be prepared to give the House more information than they do as to whether the money is intended to be used or not. If it is not to be used we should not be asked to vote it, and if it is, then they ought to be in a position to give us some particulars about it. The hon. gentleman says the site is not yet selected. Is it intended that any portion of the vote shall be expended during the present year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I approve in a general way of the remarks of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). In regard to this particular vote, I believe the desire of the great majority of the members of this House has been expressed by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan), that some provision should be made for such a building as he has spoken of. Before we proceed with the work, I will bring the fullest possible information before the House, and I hope to give the full cost.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. There were two or three sites in view when I left office. If I may be allowed, I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should not be cheeseparing in this matter. This is a very important building, and it should be located on a site that would do credit to this country. A few thousand dollars more or less for the purchase of a site for such a building should not be considered for a moment. I had first contemplated locating the building in the Major Hill Park, over the pond there; but on reflection, and after having consulted some of my colleagues, I made up my mind that that would not do. I had another site in view, a very fine site indeed, and one which I thought would not be too expensive. It would not be in the public interest to say where it is.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Would it be convenient to the buildings?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. In all the big capitals of the world the public buildings are not together. It is out of the question to suppose that we can locate all our buildings in the same locality. It seems to me that a building of this kind should have an ornamental site, and I do not think the House will object to the purchase of a fine site, even if the price is a little high.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not wish to be understood as opposing the expenditure. I am opposing the principle of asking the House to spend money without knowing what we are committing ourselves to. The hon. minister says that if we vote this item he will give us the information later. But, if we should object afterwards to vote any more money, we will be met with the statement that we had committed ourselves to this expenditure long ago.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My intention is to bring down all the details, and we will let the item stand.

Some resolutions reported.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY — SIR WILLIAM MULOCK'S SPEECH.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at the head of the government to a despatch in the morning 'Citizen' of to-day, purporting to give a report of a speech by Sir William Mulock at the banquet of the Young Men's Liberal Club in Toronto. The report reads, in part :

The event of to-night's banquet of the Young Liberal's Club was the speech of Sir Wm. Mulock pleading the justification of a bonus to the Grand Trunk Pacific or any line of railway projected to unite eastern and western Canada, running through the, as yet, unsettled 1,000 miles in northern Ontario. Any railway which traversed this unprofitable country was entitled to public aid, for it would be helping to build up Canada nationally by providing an all-Canadian route for the output of the western provinces. The fact that a line from Winnipeg to Quebec would be so much shorter than to Boston or any other Atlantic port was emphasized and the need of dealing with this question before trade settled down into an American chanel was pointed out. The incapacity of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian Northern Railway to handle even the present output was noted and the need to provide transportation facilities to keep pace with the advancing tide of immigration was taken as an axiom.

Evidently the government have some policy on this subject, as emphasized in the speech from the Throne. I wish to know from the right hon. gentleman what is the policy of the government—or is he prepared to state it at present ?—with reference to the transportation question and the assistance to be given to the Grand Trunk Railway or any other enterprise proposing to open up the north-west. I wish to know whether a part of that scheme is to build a road from Quebec to connect with the new line in the north-west.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have not seen the report which my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) refers to. Perhaps I had better wait until Sir William Mulock returns, when he can speak for himself. I do not know whether he has been accurately reported or not. As to the general question of the policy of the government, when the government has framed a policy it will be its duty to bring it down to parliament at once. But upon the general question of transportation, I think that it is of pressing need that we should have more means of communication between the east and the west.

Mr. SPROULE. If you were to apply the same principle as you did in the case of the ex-Minister of Public Works, he ought to get out.

SUPPLY—EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou) moved in amendment :

That all the words after 'that' be struck out and the following substituted :

That in the opinion of this House there is no justification for the application of the Diseases of Animals Act of Great Britain to Canadian cattle.

That Canadian cattle at the time of the passing of said Act and ever since have been free from all contagious diseases.

This House is of opinion that the application of the said Act to Canadian cattle has an injurious effect upon the cattle trade of this country.

This House regrets that the representatives of Canada at the colonial conference utterly failed to obtain any redress or promise of redress for this grievance.

This House further regrets that this government has not succeeded by more vigorous protests, or by other effective steps, in finding means to obtain the removal of the existing unjust restrictions on the sale of Canadian cattle in Great Britain.

He said: It will be, Mr. Speaker, in the recollection of hon. members that this matter was dealt with at the last session of this legislature by a motion made at the same stage of the proceedings, as the present. It has since engaged a great deal of attention among the agriculturists of the mother country and quite recently it was brought to the notice of the imperial parliament by an amendment to the address. Last session this House unanimously passed a resolution proposed by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and the hope was then expressed that this proceeding would strengthen the hands of our representatives at the colonial conference and enable them to secure some relaxation of the regulations which are so injurious to the cattle trade of this country. No doubt the history of this question is familiar to every one, but it may nevertheless be well to recapitulate it. Canadian cattle were admitted to the markets of the mother country until 1892, under the careful supervision of the British Board of Agriculture. In 1892, owing to the suspicion that disease existed in one animal, which formed part of a cargo of Canadian cattle, the regulations were changed, Canadian cattle were required to be slaughtered at the port of entry, the ports to which Canadian cattle were admitted were limited to six in number, and all imported Canadian cattle had to be slaughtered within ten days from their arrival.

At the time when this suspected case of contagious pleuro-pneumonia was reported and declared to be that particular disease by the veterinary authorities of the Board of Agriculture, it was maintained by the authorities on this side and by some very eminent veterinary authorities in the mother country that the animal suspected of pleuro-pneumonia was infected only by the common catarrhal pneumonia, which is not at all contagious or dangerous. That view was presented to the British authorities by the Canadian government, and various arguments were urged to show that the cattle of Canada were healthy and that really no cause existed for excluding them from the inland markets of the mother country. Lately the arable farmers of Scotland, who are intensely interested in this matter, have been agitating very strongly for the repeal of the obnoxious legislation. They quote the authority of the gentleman who purchased the animal suspected of being diseased. He bought the cow in question in October, 1892, and shortly afterwards all the cattle upon two of his farms, on which this animal had been from time to time, were slaughtered by order of the British authorities. But in not one of these animals so slaughtered was any trace of disease found. Furthermore a general order was passed requiring the slaughter of all the animals in the cargo of which that cow formed part, and in no case did any of these animals show any trace of pleuro-pneumonia. Nor was the slightest trace of the disease found in any of the animals with which the one suspected had come in contact. Prof. Williams, who is perhaps the most eminent authority in Great Britain on these matters, did not agree with the government experts. He held, and so did Mr. Clark, veterinary surgeon of the Perthshire county council, that there was no pleuro-pneumonia in existence among the animals imported and that none of the animals which had come in contact with the supposed diseased animal had given any evidence of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia. Furthermore I see, on the authority of the farmers who waited on Mr. Hanbury, president of the Board of Agriculture, that a portion of the lung of the suspected animal had been removed and is still in existence at Edinburgh, in the custody of the veterinary authorities there, which is in itself sufficient evidence to show that it was a mistaken diagnosis which led to the exclusion of Canadian cattle. Mr. Clark also says, speaking of disease among Canadian cattle:

I never met with a case of contagious or infectious disease in one single instance and this including that most prevalent disease, tuberculosis.

Now, Sir, the cattle of the mother country are not as free from disease as those of Canada. The statistics given as to the condition of the cattle slaughtered at Glasgow show that among 46,784 animals home bred cattle slaughtered at Glasgow, under inspection of the veterinary authorities, tuberculosis existed in 6,332 cases, making an average of 13·53 per cent of infected or diseased animals. At the same time among 49,881 Canadian and United States cattle which were slaughtered, there were found no cases of pleuro-pneumonia and but 66 cases of tubercular disease, or only 13-100 of 1 per cent. In addition to this corroborative and accumulative evidence showing that the cattle of Canada are and have been perfectly healthy, Mr. Hanbury, president of the Board of Agriculture, himself admits that there is no disease existing among Canadian cattle. On the 9th of October, 1901, when receiving a delegation of agriculturists, in Edinburgh, he made the statement that in his opinion there was no disease in Canada. And on February 27th of this year, he declared in the House of Commons that he had admitted for months past that Canada was free from disease, but nevertheless he was convinced that if the people of Great Britain were to keep out disease, the Act of 1896 must be maintained in all its completeness. Mr. Hanbury in a variety of ways and at a variety of times has tried to justify the position taken by the British government and persists in declaring that his government will not relax the regulations excluding Canadian cattle from the mother country. The importance of this matter to the Scotch farmers is so great that a very strong agitation is being carried on by them to have these regulations relaxed. They have met Mr. Hanbury in large numbers, and have urged upon him the fact that they are being injured in their business by the embargo laid upon Canadian store cattle. The main point in Mr. Hanbury's reply to that delegation was that in this matter he, as a member of the Board of Agriculture, and the Board of Agriculture as representing the government, had no power to make any change, or to do anything for the agriculturists of Scotland. He says that they are acting under the terms and carrying out the provisions of an Act of the imperial parliament which they cannot repeal. He further says that he doubts very much if the government of Great Britain to-day is strong enough to effect the repeal of the Act. Substantially, what he has said to the agriculturists who are interested in this matter is that if they wish to have these regulations altered, or the regulations which they consider injurious cancelled, it is necessary for them to bring pressure to bear upon the government of Great Britain through the parliament of Great Britain ; and they have invited the co-operation of their fellow subjects in Canada in this work. It is largely upon that ground, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is now being brought to the notice of this House. It is important to Canada that we should have this trade, apparently, because the exports of Canadian cattle to Great Britain have in the past been very extensive.

I have already mentioned the fact that the interruption that occurred to the traffic came in 1892. I will read to the House the figures representing the value and extent of the trade from the year 1892 to 1901, these being the years in which I find these figures tabulated in the Year-book, a volume which is accessible to all the members of the House. It was in 1892 that the difficulty about this trade began.

Year.	Head of cattle exported.	Value.
1892....	101,426	$7,481,613
1893....	99,904	7,402,208
1894....	80,531	6,316,373
1895....	85,863	6,797,615
1896....	97,042	6,816,361
1897....	120,063	6,454,313
1898....	122,106	7,403,990
1899....	115,476	7,129,430
1900....	115,056	7,579,080
1901....	119,050	8,028,476

Now it is evident that this is a large and important branch of exports for the people of Canada, and anything that tends to diminish the price at which these cattle sell in the mother country, means exactly that much of a loss to the shippers from this side of the Atlantic. These cattle that are taken across to Great Britain are practically of two classes. First of all, there are those that are not fully fattened or ready for the butcher, which are called store cattle ; the other class are those in which the farmers of eastern and south-eastern Scotland are so largely interested, and for which they are pleading at this time to have fully admitted into the markets of the country. Probably during the later years of this measure, shippers from this side have sent over more fully matured and ripened cattle, and have thereby in a measure avoided the loss that would occur by having their cattle slaughtered at the point of debarkation. However, a circumstance that affects all the cattle going from this side of the Atlantic, is that in crossing the Atlantic they are liable to more or less rough usage from the bad weather, and are liable to arrive in the ports of the mother country greatly injured ; and it being necessary to slaughter them within ten days from the time of their arrival, they are frequently slaughtered and placed upon the market in such a condition that it is impossible to realize for them anything like the value which they possess if the purchasers, farmers and others on the other side, were permitted to buy them and put them upon grass, or feed them otherwise for a month or two during which they could recover condition, and would command a much higher price in the meat markets of the mother country.

The arguments that have been advanced by Mr. Hanbury, with whom the people and the government of this country have had to deal with reference to this matter, have been somewhat various. They were mentioned in the discussion which took place last year ; and at that time the hon. the Minister of Agriculture spoke of one of Mr. Hanbury's arguments as positively preventing the consent of the British government to the course proposed, that is, that the treaties in existence between Great Britain and other countries would absolutely prevent Great Britain from giving better terms to Canada, without at the same time admitting all other countries to share in the same benefits under the provisions existing in most of the treaties requiring the mother country to give to all countries included in the treaties the better terms which she gives to any one country. The Minister of Agriculture thought last year that the plea of Mr. Hanbury that the government was prevented by the better terms clause in the treaties from making this concession to Canada, had been abandoned by Mr. Hanbury. Still, I find that in his arguments advanced to the agriculturists of Scotland, dealing with this question, in October, 1902, he again recites the very same reasons why the cattle of this country could not be admitted into the mother country, because if that was done, it would be necessary to admit the cattle of all other countries as well.

Now it is generally supposed that the plea which has been made that these cattle were shut out of Great Britain because disease existed in this country, has been abandoned. It has generally been supposed that was not the real reason which existed in the mind of Mr. Hanbury and which led him to persist in excluding Canadian cattle. It has been rather suspected that it was a measure of protection, that by excluding Canadian cattle on this plea he practically secures an advantage in the markets of the mother country for the breeders and feeders of the mother country. In reference to that matter, the experience of the feeders, those men who have arable farms in Scotland and buy store cattle and fatten them upon their own farms, shows that they do not agree with Mr. Hanbury. They seem to think they are being injured to quite as great an extent as the people of Canada by reason of the fact that they are prevented from buying store cattle from this country to feed upon their own farms. Latterly, I see that Mr. Hanbury, in speaking on this matter, practically maintains that if Canadian cattle are to be admitted into Great Britain, it is going to prejudice the position of the breeders of store cattle in Great Britain.

Now, if the mother country chooses frankly to adopt that as a measure of protection, I do not feel that we as a people who are disposed to shape our legislation so as to give our own producers an advantage in the market, would be in a very good position to find fault with them. But that is not the ground upon which Mr. Hanbury based his case in the speech delivered by him in the Imperial House of Commons on the 27th of February last. From first to last he cast an aspersion upon the cattle of Canada, contending that if they were not now diseased they are liable to be diseased at any moment, and that it is imperative, if the people of Great Britain are going to preserve their herds from disease, that they must shut out the cattle of Canada. While Mr. Hanbury has abandoned the plea that Canadian cattle are diseased we still find him appealing to the British House of Commons against the admission of Canadian cattle on the ground that it is impossible for English cattle to be kept free from disease if Canadian cattle are admitted. That seems a most absurd proposal by Mr. Hanbury, because the figures I have cited show, that whereas the cattle of Great Britain are largely diseased; whereas they are admitting thousands of store cattle from Ireland a large percentage of which are diseased, on the other hand the cattle of Canada are absolutely free from disease. You will find in the reports of our Department of Agriculture, that Dr. McEachran our inspector reports on the cattle sent from Canada to England year after year, that no contagious disease exists among them. On two occasions Dr. McEachran reports that probably in no other country in the world is there such complete absence of disease amongst cattle as there is in Canada. In face of that condition of affairs; in face of the fact that cattle in Great Britain do show tuberculous disease; in face of the fact that the cattle imported from Ireland are, on the evidence of these Scotch farmers, not healthy or vigorous or profitable; in face of all that, Mr. Hanbury appeals to the British House of Commons to support the legislation now in existence, and he maintains that it is impossible to keep cattle disease out of Great Britain unless they debar Canadian cattle. It would be just as reasonable to argue that the clear pure water of a spring going into a river which was more or less polluted, would pollute that river, as to maintain that the admission of one hundred thousand healthy Canadian cattle to mix with the more or less diseased cattle in Great Britain was going to introduce disease amongst British herds. It is perfectly clear that the ground upon which so far the government of Great Britain, as represented by Mr. Hanbury, have rested their case to keep our cattle at a disadvantage and to inflict a loss upon our shippers, is absolutely without foundation. Mr. Hanbury made the statement in the course of his speech: That it is impossible to know whether there is disease or not in the countries whence these cattle have been sent to Great Britain. That statement is entirely at variance with the condition of affairs in Canada where the most careful inspection is made of every animal shipped, and where successive governments have asked the government of Great Britain to send their own veterinary inspector to Canada to satisfy themselves in the most absolute manner that no disease existed, if they are not content with the report of the Canadian inspector. In face of all these facts it seems to me that we in this House of Commons should express our entire dissatisfaction with the existing state of affairs. I find amongst these Scotch farmers a very general disposition to represent the case of Canada as one which deserves special consideration. Several of them referred to the great sacrifices made by Canada for the empire; to the manner in which Canada has shown herself disposed to come to the assistance of the mother country and not to spare either blood or treasure in rendering that assistance. These men of our race in the motherland seem to think that it is only fair that Canada should receive some special consideration, or at least should not be unjustly discriminated against in this manner. In the light of this, and in view of the fact that we have an unassailable and impregnable case it seems to me that if there is an unanimous expression from this parliament that this obnoxious restriction should be removed, the government of Canada ought to be in a position to press this matter very forcibly upon the government of the mother country. Last year this House passed a resolution similar to this, and one hope expressed at that time was that the gentlemen representing Canada at the colonial conference would be enabled to gain something for the benefit of our country in regard to this matter. It was thought that when Canada gave that concession in tariff matters known as the British preference, that if we were going to make concessions to the manufacturers of the motherland, the government of Great Britain might be asked to make a concession to the agriculturists of Canada in conection with our cattle export trade. That was not done. I find that at the colonial conference this matter was referred to, but apparently received very little attention, and so far as we can learn it was relegated for settlement to Mr. Hanbury, the president of the Board of Trade; the very gentleman who told the Scotch farmers in Edinburgh that he had no power to deal with this question and that any action taken in connection with it must be with the sanction of Great Britain supported by the House of Commons. At page 41 of the report of the proceedings of the colonial conference this reference is made:

> The representatives of Canada desired to bring before the conference the clauses of the law under which live cattle imported into this country from Canada are required to be slaughtered at the port of landing. It was considered, however, that the matter was not of sufficient general interest to be dealt with by the conference and arrangements were made for a discussion privately with the president of the Board of Agriculture.

Thus the matter was referred to that same Mr. Hanbury, who, at that time and more recently still, has said that it was utterly impossible to grant this request. No report, so far as I know, has come to this House as to what may have occurred in the course of the referred discussion which was to have taken place between the representatives of Canada and the President of the Board of Agriculture, and probably it will be to our advantage now to learn from the members of the government, to what extent this matter was discussed with Mr. Hanbury, and what the result of the discussion was. If I had known more exactly, before the notice of this motion was given, what had transpired at the colonial conference on this subject, it would probably have been better that a motion had been made for a report of the conference or what took place between the Canadian representatives and Mr. Hanbury. That information we may have from the members of the government present. On this explanation of the position in which the question stands at present, the attitude of Mr. Hanbury and the attitude of the government of Great Britain, so far as we can know from public information, I will rest the case at this point, simply moving the motion of which I have given notice.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the time and the circumstances are at present favourable for the discussion of this question; and if my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) feels it his duty to press this amendment, I shall have to ask the House to reject it, for two reasons. The first reason is that the method and manner and terms of the resolution unmistakably mark it as a vote of non-confidence in the government. We accept it as such, and we ask those who are supporters of the government in the House to join us in taking that view. The second reason is that a motion passed this House within the last few days calling for the papers on this subject. My hon. friend, without waiting for the production of those papers, endeavours to precipitate a discussion to-day. I think, until those papers are brought down, the House is not in a position intelligently to discuss it. When they are brought down, if it be found that the government have not in every respect pressed this matter on the attention of the imperial authorities, then there may be need of some further action in the House. But, until that motion has been responded to, as it will be at an early day, by the production of the papers, I submit that the time is not favourable for a discussion of this question.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has given the very briefest, and it seems to me, the flimsiest reasons why this question should not be discussed to-day. What are they? First, that the time and the circumstances are not appropriate, because of the absence of the papers. If we were living in an age of the world when we had not the public press, which dishes up everything fresh on our tables in the morning, that might be regarded as a sufficient reason; but, in view of the fact that we are so well informed with regard to what takes place, not only on the continent of America, but in the mother country, it cannot be said that we are without sufficient information to enable us to deal with this question. Therefore the present time cannot be inappropriate. Then, the hon. minister regards this motion as one of non-confidence; but when a similar motion was proposed by one of his own friends at the last session of parliament, it was considered quite appropriate then. If it was appropriate then, how can it be inappropriate now, when moved in exactly similar circumstances? If the government accepted the motion then, without regarding it as a motion of want of confidence, they can accept this motion to-day. They have not the opportunity of putting up one of their own friends for the purpose of defending the government for delay; but the hon. minister calls on his friends simply to vote down the motion as one of want of confidence. It seems to me that is about the very worst excuse the government could offer. The hon. Minister of Finance has not applied himself to the subject at all, but just calls upon his silent majority—I will not call it as his friends used to do on this side of the House, the brute majority—to vote it down. Now, this is a very important question, one in which the great agricultural class of our country especially have a great and direct interest. It is of sufficient importance to engage the most careful attention and the most active services of the government and their friends, whether they are at home or abroad. The history of the matter has been very well given by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell). In 1892, it was said that two head of cattle reached England affected with pleuro-pneumonia. One was taken over on the 'Monkseton' and the other on the 'Huronian.' The result was that the embargo was put on, and in 1896 a Bill introduced and passed prohibiting the importation of Canadian cattle into England or Scotland, unless they were slaughtered at the port of debarkation within ten days after their arrival. The embargo was put on for the purpose of keeping out disease and maintaining the sanitary condition of cattle in that country. It was claimed in Canada, as well as in Scotland, that there were no justifiable reasons for putting on the embargo, as there were grave doubts whether the cases in question were cases of pleuro-pneumonia or not. Professor Williamson, of Edinburgh, one of the greatest authorities on the subject in the world, declared most positively and emphatically, after careful examination, that they were not cases of pleuro-pneumonia. At that time, the government of the day in Canada were attacked most fiercely for having failed to get that embargo raised. The contention of the opposition at that time was that it had been put on owing to the laxity of the Canadian government regarding the enforcement of the quarantine regulations between Canada and the United States. I remember very distinctly that the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Wm. Mulock) for a whole afternoon in this House arraigned the government in a most voluminous way, going over the whole history of the case; and several other hon. gentlemen opposite joined him in the most energetic and sarcastic fashion.

It was claimed that this great injustice was due to the failure of the late government to do its duty. Afterwards in 1896 a law was passed by the British parliament preventing the importation of Canadian cattle. Before that year there was only an Order in Council, but that Order in Council was afterwards converted into an Act of parliament. The government opposite came into office in 1896. Have these hon. gentlemen shown themselves sincere in the charges they made in 1892, that this embargo of our cattle was due to the lax quarantine regulations which were then in force between this country and the United States. Had they been sincere, they would have endeavoured to make these regulations more stringent and prevent the possibility of any disease being imported from the United States or elsewhere and thus be in a position to appeal with greater force to the mother country to remove the embargo. Did they do that? No, Mr. Speaker, they did exactly the reverse. And in what little they did, they have been entirely unsuccessful. It is true that at intermittent intervals they have written to Mr. Hanbury, president of the Board of Agriculture of England, asking that the embargo be taken off, and the invariable answer they have received is that their request will not be complied with. The plea given for this refusal is that the British government desire to keep the herds of English cattle free from disease, but we have at last the admission from Mr. Hanbury himself that he does not believe contagious disease exists among Canadian herds, so that the only plausible excuse for putting on the embargo and maintaining it has really no existence, according to Mr. Hanbury himself. Why then is the embargo kept on? Judging by the information we have, we can only come to one conclusion, and that is that this embargo is simply a measure of protection for the English and Scotch farmers who desire a better market for their own cattle, and is not intended to prevent the importation of disease at all. We are justified in coming to that conclusion by the reply given by the president of the Board of Agriculture to a deputation which waited on him in Edinburgh in 1902. He said that the Order in Council had been converted into a solemn statute passed unanimously by the House of Commons, but that the statute was passed at a time when a most vigorous agitation was kept up which led to the conclusion that there was real danger to the herds of Britain in the importation of Canadian cattle and when that agitation was not met by the vigorous opposition that might have been expected. He then went on to say:

> Therefore although Canada may be free at the present moment—and I honestly admit that I think it is—I told the Canadian minister so myself, and I am perfectly willing to repeat it to this deputation—I think the United States are also free; these are the two countries sending in their animals for slaughter, and no country which was not supposed to be free from disease would be allowed to do that. There is another reason in addition to disease, though connected with disease, which I am bound to say weighs with me, and it is this. Given the fact that, although a country may be free from disease, you can never guarantee the continuance of that freedom from disease, what would happen if the importation of store cattle, say from the two countries free from disease at the present moment—Canada and the United States—were to be allowed? The first thing that would happen undoubtedly would be that the price of English stores would naturally fall to the price of the stores sent over from Canada and the United States.

Therefore the real object of Mr. Hanbury was to protect the English and Scotch farmer and not to keep out disease. What effort has the present government made to have this embargo removed ? So far they have made very little effort indeed. True, from time to time, they have written some letters. From time to time the Minister of Agriculture has made some slight representations to Mr. Hanbury, but all they have done has resulted in nothing. We have very strong evidence that contagious disease does not exist in Canada among our cattle. We have the evidence of veterinary surgeons who have been making reports from time to time, ever since 1892, to the government of this country that no contagious disease of any nature dangerous to cattle exists in Canada. We have the evidence disclosed by the slaughter of every animal of the herds of Canadian cattle, over 1,000,000 in all, in England and Scotland since 1892. In no one instance was there any trace of contagious disease. We are therefore right in assuming that there is no danger to be feared from the importation of Canadian cattle in the mother country. We have the evidence of Mr. Hanbury himself who declared that he does not believe that the disease exists in Canada at present, nevertheless we have not yet had any relaxation of this embargo. When the present government took office they declared that the embargo was imposed because of the carelessness of their predecessors in not strictly enforcing the quarantine regulations between us and the United States. But what was the first thing done by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) ? The first thing he did was to relax those regulations. He did the very thing which he and his friends declared most emphatically should not be done. They had declared that instead of relaxing we should make these regulations more stringent and enforce them more strictly, yet no sooner did they take office than they did the very reverse. Will that convince the Canadian farmer that this government have his interests at heart ?

Before 1892 we had the present Minister of Agriculture declaring that anyhow the British market did not amount to very much, and I am bound to believe that he entertains the same opinion still, if we are to judge him and his friends by the half-hearted methods they have made to relieve this country of the embargo.

But who are aiding us in our efforts to get it removed ? Mr. Hanbury has stated that 95 per cent of the British people were opposed to it. In answer to that I point to the fact that petitions were presented to the British government, signed by people representing no less than 8,000,000 consumers and feeders and handlers of these cattle, who are interested in having this embargo removed. We have also an ally in the Scotch farmers and feeders who are using every effort to convince the British government that their policy in this respect is a mistaken one and they ask us to help them. They say to us : Our interests are identical in this matter; make a greater effort in your country and we will in ours, in order to force conviction upon the British parliament that no necessity exists for this embargo and that it will be eminently in the interests, not only of the Canadian people but of the Scotch farmers and the Scotch and English butchers and the British consumer, to have this embargo raised. We have able allies; they are willingly joining us, they are energetically joining us, and they wish us to make a greater effort.

A short time ago we had the colonial conference, and the Prime Minister was there with many of his friends. I think the Minister of Finance was there, and the Minister of Agriculture also. One of the important subjects discussed was the trade relations between us and the mother country. And what representations did these hon. gentlemen make there with regard to this important question that showed a desire on their part to get the embargo raised ? I do not know that either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture broached the subject at all. So far as the papers informed us, we have no means of knowing that they said a word regarding it. Is that an evidence of their being alive to the interests of the Canadian farmers ? Here was a splendid opportunity to make such representations—and to back them up with facts that were within their reach—as might have enabled them to secure the raising of this embargo. But, so far as we know they did nothing. They treated the matter—I was going to say with silent contempt, but perhaps that would be going too far.

On another question, I wish to say a word. Why is not the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) here to enlighten us on this question ? I have noticed a fashion which has obtained of late years in this House, which, I think, ought to be put a stop to as soon and as completely as possible. Whenever a session of parliament commences, two or three or more ministers at the head of important departments, who ought to be here to answer questions put to them, absent themselves. Our Minister of Agriculture is in Japan, I believe. Last session he was away somewhere else. I do not know what he may be doing. He may have gone upon a very important mission. But I think he could have taken some other time of the year to go rather than during a session of parliament. It is currently hinted, whether true or not, that ministers are conveniently absent to avoid troublesome questions which might be brought to the attention of parliament in which their departments and the government are vitally interested.

If that be the reason, we had better know it, and we had better change the system at once. It is a matter of great importance that, during the session of parliament, ministers should be here to answer questions put to them. At present, two important ministers are absent. The other is the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton). It may be true that he is away on an important mission; but it seems to me that, either some abler man might have been sent in his place, or he might have chosen some other time to go, and take pains to attend during the session. We ought to break up this custom of ministers being absent when parliament is in session. They should be here to give us the information necessary to enable us to discuss intelligently questions which are brought before the House. But, when we ask questions, we are told: In the absence of the minister, the information cannot be given, but it will be given when the minister comes back. But by the time the minister gets back the session is over, and the opportunity to bring out the information for the benefit of the public is gone. For the reasons I have given, I think I am justified in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). And I hold that the government should not put forward the pretext that this is a want of confidence motion. They could accept it if they liked. But this plea is only a pretext on the part of the government. When they have no other way of bringing their supporters solidly together they call upon them to vote the motion down on the ground that it is a want of confidence motion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). This motion may be a want of confidence motion in the government; but what we have seen here to-day is certainly an exhibition of want of confidence on the part of the government in themselves. They are not prepared to justify their record in this matter and I do not believe they can do so, for their record is one of utter lack of vigour. They have said that they are in favour of an imperial preference. But, if we, as a country, expect preferential treatment from the motherland, we must ask for it. If we are to sing the song of imperialism, as we have heard it sung in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, that song must be honest, it must be genuine. And hon. gentlemen opposite have not been genuine in their expression of imperial sentiment. They go to the colonial conference, being called there to discuss imperial questions and imperial trade; and when they reach there they declare that they have not a single suggestion to make. If they desire to attain anything, certainly that is not the way to attain it. If the government go there to discuss questions in which their country's interests are concerned, there must be some vigour in their presentation of their case. Is there any evidence of vigour in the statement of the case presented at that conference by hon. gentlemen opposite? On the contrary they went there with nothing whatever to say. The people of Great Britain, if they are to give us a preference, expect us to ask for it and to make out a case. If we say we are imperialists and that we are prepared to feed the empire—and I believe Canada is prepared to feed the empire—we must say so; and, not only that, but we must say that we are willing to assume our responsibilities with respect to the maintenance of the integrity of the empire. I do not agree with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who says that, in some ways we are British, but we must not say it—certainly we must not express it vigorously. We are British and our wish is to build up the empire and to trade with other portions of the empire. But when you say you wish to trade with the empire, you must also say that you are prepared to take part in vindicating the integrity of the empire.

But hon. gentlemen opposite have not taken that position; on the contrary, as was pointed out the other day and was stated by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) who has just sat down, they had not a thing to suggest at the imperial conference. I believe that a vote of thanks was the only proposal they had to make. What can the farmers of Canada expect to accomplish, if they send representatives to discuss matters in that fashion. As a party, hon. gentlemen opposite have never tried to promote the trade relations that might have been promoted. They profess to be free traders, and yet their energies, whether in opposition or in power, have been devoted to extending our trade relations with the protectionist United States. Of all people, hon. gentlemen opposite, the professed free traders, should have done all they could to build up trade relations with the mother country. But they have seen no salvation except in closer trade relations with the United States, a country antagonistic to us, a country that is trying to get into the British market ahead of us. Is it any wonder that when a proposal of this kind is brought forward, their only course is, not an attempt to justify their record but to plead: This is a vote of want of confidence in us. I hope to see the trade relations between Canada and the mother country largely extended. I believe that extension is coming. But, if it is to come, it can only be through our presenting a fair case and saying to the empire: Give us a preference in trade, and we will do our share in maintaining the integrity of the empire. That has never been said by hon. gentlemen opposite. But the people of Great Britain expect us to say it. What was the burden of the discussion in England yesterday? It was that the colonies should be prepared to do their share toward the defence of the empire. That is the sentiment that is ringing through England to-day. I am sure that the British public are prepared to give up some of their free trade ideas if they can find that the colonies are prepared to join them in some kind of trade relations involving an inter-imperial preference. It is to be had, it can be worked out, but it must be worked out vigorously, and by men who have confidence in the measure. Not only have we heard the confession made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) the other day, but we have heard the Prime Minister say in this House that he did not think it was worth while to go into the question of the inclusion of Newfoundland because of the troublesome French shore question. Sir, statesmanship does not consist in avoiding questions because they are troublesome, statesmanship implies that you must approach a question with a vigorous determination to overcome difficulties, then you will accomplish something. But all the satisfaction we get to-day over this question is that we are told it is a vote of want of confidence in the government. Wait till the papers come down, and something will be done, sooner or later.

I know that the sentiment of the people of this country is that the empire must have inter-imperial trade between its different portions, concessions must be made by one portion in favour of another. Not only that, but the different members of the empire must be prepared to do something one for the other, and when we go to London in that frame of mind, when we say that we are of the empire and wish to trade with the empire, that we as Canadians can feed the empire, then I believe we will make great progress in attaining the end we have in view. As I said before, the people of the empire are beginning to realize more and more that the empire is a unit, and it must be independent of the outside world for its food supply. I believe the empire can be independent, and that she can rely on the colonies, and above all she can rely on Canada for her food supply, her animal food as well as the cereals she may require. She will ultimately look to this country for that supply, but she will never do so until the representatives of this country go to London with a clear policy and say to the mother country: We expect something from you; we give you something, and we want something in return. One of the weakest confessions that was ever made was that trade preference which we have discussed so much in this House. Its weakness consisted in the fact that while you give something you say you do not want anything in return. I say the Canadian farmer does want something in return. He believes that if he gives he must get, on equal terms. When hon. gentlemen adopt that policy and show that they are in earnest in promoting trade within the empire, when they say to the home government: You are shutting out our cattle to-day, and we ask you to take down the bars, especially as there is no reason for keeping the bars up, then I believe we will get something. But until there is a vigour in our policy, until it has a Canadian ring and spirit in it, and also an imperial ring and spirit in it, we shall make no headway. I believe I speak for the Canadian farmers in saying that they are convinced this government have been negligent all through in dealing with these matters.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). I was in hopes some member of the government would explain the position in which we stand in reference to this question, and would tell us whether proper efforts have been made with the British government to show them that there is really no necessity for alarm in allowing the importation of Canadian cattle, because there is absolutely no disease in Canada among our cattle. That is well understood, then why should the British government refuse to admit our cattle? I think if this government would put the question in a proper shape, and tell them most emphatically that the people of Canada are unanimous, the British government would reconsider their action. Mr. Hanbury, of course, represents the farmers of that country, and before the views of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) are carried out he must make an effort to change the government of Great Britain. He must go and talk to the British parliament the way he is talking to us. He must tell them that the people of Canada are willing to pull down the bars and let everything that is manufactured in England come into Canada, the same as we are asking them to let all our products go into England. Then I think he will have some grounds for making a convincing argument and not before. I think this government ought to be most emphatic in representing to the British government that there is no disease among Canadian cattle. I think we have a right to hear from the government as to whether they have been active in making such representations, whether it is possible for them to change Mr. Hanbury's decision. There is no doubt that there will be a change in the British government pretty soon, because in every election that takes place in England nowadays the government are losing, for the reason, in my opinion, that they have adopted a high protective policy in placing a duty on flour and wheat. Mark you, there will soon be a change of government in England. As a farmer, I think we should show the British people that we want to trade with them, that we want to feed them, and feed them cheaply.

I have been across the Atlantic with Canadian cattle that I raised myself, and I know there is a loss of from $10 to $15 on the price of those cattle on account of the necessity of slaughtering them in British ports. These cattle sometimes, as they go off the ship where they have been fed, deteriorate in price probably to the extent of $10 or $12 on board ship. If these cattle could be bought by grazers and fed, we would lose not more than two or three dollars, but as it is we lose from $10 to $15. I think the farmers of Canada ought not to send cattle there that are not thoroughly finished, and these cattle ought not to depreciate unless they go off their feed on board ship. Our farmers should not send stockers, we do not want to send stockers, we want to finish our cattle, and then if we have to kill them on their arrival on the other side, there is not so much depreciation. I do not think that our farmers will be satisfied unless this government makes a strong effort to induce Mr. Hanbury to remove the embargo. They have seen Mr. Hanbury, they know him well enough, and if they would use upon him some of the persuasive eloquence they use at home, I think they could convince him that we are entitled to have our cattle admitted freely.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). I desire to offer a few observations on this question which has been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell). It seems to me the government has dealt with this important question in a very high-handed manner. Here is a resolution which certainly interests the whole of Canada. We heard this question discussed year after year when the party which is now on the opposite benches occupied the government side of the House. The opposition of that day contended that the reason why this embargo had not been removed, was the supineness of the government of the day. We all know that the people of Canada were asked to condemn the government because they did not make greater efforts to induce the imperial authorities to relieve us from this embargo. Now, Sir, we are told that we should wait, that the papers have been moved for, and that they will soon be before the House. Well, if I mistake not, the papers on this important question were moved for some time last week, and unless they are very voluminous they should already be before the House so that we might discuss this question with connaissance de cause, knowing all the details, knowing what the representatives of the government did at the time of the imperial conference, and what they have done since. This question has been before the British public for a long time, it is before the British public to-day, and it seems to me it is the duty of the government to bring down these papers to the House as soon as possible. Unless these papers are so voluminous that they could not be copied in time they should have been brought down a day or two after they were asked for and the government is at fault there. What are the two points upon which my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) rests his argument and his condemnation of the government upon this question ? He says, first :

This House regrets that the representatives of Canada at the colonial conference utterly failed to obtain any redress or promise of redress for this grievance.

I have before me the blue-book brought down in the imperial House which contains the deliberations of the colonial premiers and I find upon this question simply this :—

The representatives of Canada desired to bring before the conference the question of the law under which live cattle imported into this country from Canada are required to be slaughtered at the port of landing. It was considered, however—— —that the matter was not of sufficient general interest to be dealt with by the conference and arrangements were made for discussion privately with the president of the Board of Agriculture.

I want to call the attention of the House to this :—

That was a question of grave importance for Canada. It had been a question of such grave importance in the opinion of the party now in power when they were on this side of the House that they called condemnation down upon the Conservative government for not securing the removal of this embargo on Canadian cattle. Turning to the preceding page I find :—

In addition to the commercial matters, of which previous notice had been given, two subjects were brought forward by the metric system of weights and measures, and the question of the postal charges on newspapers and periodicals.

I take it that the question of the embargo on Canadian cattle was of far greater importance than the adoption of the metric system or the question of the adoption of a reduced rate of postage on newspapers. But the gentlemen who represented this country before the imperial conference devoted their time to the consideration of this resolution which was passed.

That it is advisable to adopt the metric system of weights and measures for use within the empire, and the Prime Ministers urge the governments represented at this conference to give consideration to the question of its early adoption.

I fail to see why this other question of the embargo on Canadian cattle was not just as important as the question of introducing the metric system into Canada. It is very well theoretically to introduce the metric system into Canada ; it may be an important subject to those great men coming from all parts of the empire to deliberate upon, but what our representatives who were sent over had to do was to represent the interests of Canada and they should have impressed upon the other gentlemen who were there—their colleagues in this imperial conference—that for us, in Canada, this was a more important question than the introduction of the metric system, or the introduction of a system by which British newspapers would come in at a smaller rate than they come in at now. I realize that these two questions, the question of the metric system and the introduction of British newspapers at a lower rate of postage, are important subjects, but where was the right hon. leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when this other question came up? Surely, with his persuasive eloquence, which we all admire so much he could have brought these other gentlemen if he had tried very hard to look upon this question as one of the gravest subjects which could be brought before the imperial conference. Of course, at that time these gentlemen, and particularly those who represented the British government at the imperial conference, said to themselves: Why should we disturb our minds over this question? It is only a question of trade between Canada and the empire. We know that the Canadians upon this point will give us everything we want without asking anything in return. That is what they thought in their own minds. They simply said: We will refuse this as we have before refused a preference in trade matters because these gentlemen from Canada will say nothing, they will go home contented and tell the people that they obtained the metric system and a reduction of postage on newspapers and the people of Canada will swallow all this and say: What a good government we have and what splendid representatives we had at the imperial conference! But, there is something more. The motion goes on to say:

This House further regrets that this government has not succeeded by more vigorous protests, or by other effective steps, in finding means to obtain the removal of the existing unjust restrictions on the sale of Canadian cattle in Great Britain.

It seems to me that it is due to the members of this House that we should have some other reply from the government than simply: Wait until the papers are brought down! I say, with all due deference to the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), that it looks as if he were not in a position to tell the House what steps the government has taken in this matter. It looks as if he were not in a position to defend the course which has been taken. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) is now away and I emphasize what my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said a short time ago that it is unfortunate that two hon. ministers who are charged with the administration of two of the most important departments in the government should be absent at this very time. Why was it so absolutely necessary that the hon. Minister of Agriculture should go to Japan just when this House was going to open, when the public knew and when the members of this House and when the government knew that most important questions relating to his department would be brought before the House and that the only reply we will be able to get—and in this I am not speaking at all in any spirit of hostility to the hon. Minister of Finance—will be that the hon. Minister of Finance will get up and say: You will have to wait until the hon. Minister of Agriculture gets back, or until certain papers are brought down. This is not the answer which we should expect from the government; it is not the answer which we have a right to have from the members of the government on this important question. They know what these papers contain, or they should know, they know what efforts have been made, if efforts have been made, by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in the direction of relieving us from this embargo. They must have deliberated upon this question in Council, it cannot be a secret, it is a matter of national importance to us all and we call upon them here to say what they have done. We call upon them to get up and frankly state to the House that they have taken such and such measures that they have communicated with the imperial authorities within a very short time, that they have done something at all events to relieve us of this just cause of complaint. It looks as if the hon. Minister of Finance did not know what has been done, or that nothing has been done at all by the government. Well, it is time for this House to know what has been done, it is time for the farmers of this country, for the cattle dealers to know if this government have really done anything in the direction which is indicated by the motion. If they have not done anything I say this House stands in judgment upon them and that they should be condemned by the House, because, when they were in opposition, they condemned us time and time again for not doing what they said we should do and if they have been following in our tracks they should call down upon themselves the same condemnation which they so many times directed against us.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have just a word of answer to give to the very reasonable request made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) a moment ago. He says that the government should give an answer as to the efforts that were made when we were in England during last summer to remove the grievance of which he complains and which is now before the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) has called the attention of the House to what took place at the conference. The matter was brought up by the Canadian ministers at the conference. The hon. member for West Elgin will find in the blue-book which has been brought down by the British government the proceedings in this respect. As my hon. friend knows the discussion was not given out but a simple summary of what took place and that he will find at page 41.

The representatives of Canada desired to bring before the conference the question of the law under which live cattle imported into this country from Canada are required to be slaughtered at the port of landing. It was considered, however, that the matter was not of sufficient general interest to be dealt with at the conference and arrangements were made for its discussion privately with the president of the Board of Agriculture.

My hon. friend has just stated that the matter seemed to have been treated with some levity. That is not a fair inference to draw. The reason why it was not taken up at the conference was that it was a matter which interested Canada alone, and that is the difference between it and the question of the metric system or the question of the postage on newspapers, both of which interested all the colonies of the empire, whereas the question of the cattle embargo interested only Canada. As a result of our representations the extract which I have read shows that the matter was considered by the conference, but was not taken up, and it was determined then and there that it should be discussed between the representatives of Canada and the Board of Agriculture. This was done. The Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) was not in England then, but the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir Wm. Mulock) who takes a deep interest in agriculture was deputed by myself and my colleagues to discuss the matter with Mr. Hanbury and the Board of Agriculture. A few days ago this question was brought before the House on a motion for the papers by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). These papers will be produced not later than this week. I hope that before next Monday they will be on the Table of the House, and then the House will be in a position to determine whether or not we have fulfilled our duty. Until the House has been placed in possession of that information it seems to me that it is not fair to ask that this motion should pass. My hon. friend (Mr. Bell) was appealed to when he gave notice of this motion, not to bring it in as an amendment to Supply because in such a form we could not amend it. The hon. gentleman has thought fit to pursue another course, and he is quite within his right. The delay in bringing down these papers has not been unreasonable; we are only in the second week of the session; we shall have these papers within a few days, and it certainly would have been more in accord with the rules of fairness and justice if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) had given a reasonable delay for the papers to be brought down. However, without waiting to know what has been done; what are the efforts that have been made and what has passed between the representatives of Canada and the British Board of Agriculture, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) asked the House to vote that the representatives of Canada at the colonial conference have utterly failed to obtain any redress, or attempted to obtain a redress for these grievances. That we might have been censurable for having failed to try to do a thing would perhaps be reasonable, but to blame us for having failed after we did try is not in accordance with the rules of fair-play. The words of the amendment are:

This House further regrets that this government has not succeeded by more vigorous protests, or by other effective steps, in finding means to obtain the removal of the existing unjust restrictions on the sale of Canadian cattle in Great Britain.

If when the papers are brought down the House is not satisfied with the efforts which we made, perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) might have occasion to renew his motion, but in the absence of these papers and without the House knowing what has been done, it is not to be expected that the House should pass such a motion as this. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has told us that this is not a motion of want of confidence, but if it is not such a motion, what is it? There are some motions which may not in terms imply want of confidence, and not this government but other governments, have accepted them when moved as this motion has been. But here it is stated in so many words that we are censurable, and to adopt that would be like turning the other cheek to be smitten. We have no option in the matter. It is a motion of want of confidence for not having obtained what it is said we might have obtained.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He appears to be more anxious to condemn the government than to get our cattle into Great Britain.

The PRIME MINISTER. I agree with my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Blair) that hon. gentlemen opposite appear more anxious to condemn the government than to have the embargo removed from our cattle. Some reference has been made to the fact that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) is not in his seat. I agree that as a rule ministers ought to be in their place in parliament—members ought to be in their places in parliament and ministers still more so. But there are reasons sometimes why even members cannot be present here—I do not wish to be personal and I make allusion to no one in particular. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is in Japan on a good errand. We have sent exhibits to the exhibition which was opened there recently. We hope that we may be able to develop our trade with Japan and we thought it of the greatest importance to have the government of Canada represented so that we may get our share of the trade which is growing between the Orient and the Occident. That is the reason why the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat to-day. The Minister of Agriculture will be back at an early date. I hope the session will not last until the snow is again white on the hills, but at all events, long before prorogation, the Minister of Agriculture will be in his seat to answer all questions that may be put to him. I hope he shall bring us the good news from Japan that he has profitably occupied his time, and the result of his trip will be fruitful of good to this Dominion.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). The Minister of Finance has called upon his followers to vote down this amendment in the most summary manner possible, and bear in mind that it is an amendment which affects the interests of a very large portion of the people of this country. It is strange that even to this day we have not had the papers with reference to the colonial conference laid on the Table. Immediately that the British parliament met the papers were laid on the Table there, and were it not for that, this Canadian parliament would to-day be in absolute ignorance of what took place. There is no excuse for that. We know, thanks to the papers being laid before the imperial parliament, that this question of our cattle was at the colonial conference relegated to a conference between the Canadian representatives and the president of the Board of Agriculture. Surely those papers ought to be brought down and laid on the Table of the House. This House would have no knowledge that anything of the kind occurred between those gentlemen and the President of the Board of Agriculture, if we had not got hold of the papers which were laid before the Imperial House of Commons. We know that there has been a conference on the subject, and why are the papers not brought down ? The right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Finance tell us to wait for a week or two. We have waited. On the first day of this session a notice was put on the paper by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and a motion was carried on the Monday following, I think, for those papers. But without that motion, or any motion, the first duty of the government was to inform the House of the proceedings of the imperial conference and to bring down the papers and lay them on the Table. Why has there been no effort made by the representatives of Canada, after all that Canada has done for the empire to bring pressure to bear on the people of England, through the imperial government and the House of Commons, to have this embargo removed ? Mr. Hanbury has stated incidentally in the House of Commons that the embargo is really for the purpose of protecting the growers of store cattle in Great Britain from the importation of cheap cattle from Canada. What has been the result of this imperial conference, which afforded the most glorious opportunity the people of Canada and of the different colonies had of making some arrangement with the people of Great Britain, either in the form of preferential trade or in the form of a removal of the embargo of cattle going into the country ? The only things accomplished were on the subject of measures and the subject of postage on newspapers going to England. There is another thing which the government have forgotten to bring down. The member who laid the papers on the Table of the House of Commons in England, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, stated that he would have been glad to publish the whole of the proceedings of the colonial conference, but that the views expressed by the colonial premiers were omitted, in deference to the opinions of some of the gentlemen concerned. Were those the opinions of our premier ? What was it that was omitted from the proceedings of the conference as published, which would have been willingly published by the imperial authorities but for the request of the colonial premiers that it should not be published ? We have a right to a statement from our representatives at that conference, as to what they proposed, if they proposed anything, outside of what was laid before the imperial parliament. At any rate, we had a right to the bare papers which were laid before that body. The right hon. premier and the hon. Minister of Finance object to the mode in which my hon. friend from Pictou has proceeded. Is it not the same mode in which their own friends proceeded a year ago, when a motion in almost the same terms was moved by the hon. member for Labelle, and adopted by the government as the expression of their opinion on this subject ? Here is that motion:

> That evidence having been furnished to the British authorities, proving that there is no justification for the application of the Diseases of Animals Act (Great Britain) to the cattle of Canada, this House regrets that the provisions of this Act continue to be applied to Canadian cattle, thereby preventing the sale of Canadian animals in Great Britain on fair terms, and injuring the cattle trade of Canada in all foreign markets. That this House hopes the government of Canada will avail itself of the opportunity afforded by the approaching imperial conference in London to urge upon the British government the removal of this unjust restriction on the sale of Canadian cattle in Great Britain.

This motion was accepted by the government as a correct expression of their views in the matter, and was agreed to unanimously by this House for the purpose of strengthening their hands. The present motion is brought forward for the same purpose—to strengthen the hands of the government and to inform the people of England that the people of Canada, by the voice of their parliament, are unanimous in the position they take on the subject. For these reasons I think the hon. Minister of Finance has adopted a very high-handed method of dealing with the motion of my hon. friend from Pictou.

Hon. J. ISRAEL TARTE (Montreal, St. Mary's). Mr. Speaker, we have an undoubted right, I think, to complain of the way in which we have been treated and are being treated to-day by the imperial authorities. The imperial authorities know well that Canadian cattle are not diseased ; there cannot be any doubt as to that ; and still they brand our cattle before the world as being diseased. We all feel that this is not fair.

There are in all parts of the world, people who are afraid to call things by their right name. In England they want to protect their farmers ; this cannot be denied ; and still they want to call themselves free-traders. If they want to protect British cattle they should say it in so many words, instead of branding Canadian cattle as diseased, when they know that our cattle are perfectly sound. I have only one word to say on this question. I believe that every government in Canada is bound to do what they can on questions of this kind, and I verily believe that this government has done everything it could. It has not succeeded any more than its predecessors did ; no government in the same circumstances could succeed. There is one lesson which perhaps the Canadian people should learn ; there is one leaf from the British book which they could read with advantage. John Bull, when his interests are at stake, can take care of himself. We should do the same thing. When our own interests are at stake, we should take care of our own interests. I have nothing more to say. I believe my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) has done well to call the attention of the House to this question. On the other hand, I do not know whether the feeling of the House is not in the direction of not voting for this motion. The papers have been called for ; there has not been any delay, after all ; we have been here only for a few days. When the papers are down, if they show that the government have not done what they should, it will be time for us to act. This question is one of great importance, and if my hon. friend's motion be defeated, as no doubt it will be, that might have a bad effect. We voted unanimously last year, and I will be perfectly prepared to vote again for an address such as was called for in the motion of the hon member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). That motion was not one of censure at all. If a motion should be presented asking for an address or a protest to the imperial parliament, I should be disposed to support it, but this is a motion of censure, and made before the papers asked for have come down. I think that after having drawn the attention of the House to this matter, my hon. friend would be consulting the judgment of parliament and be within parliamentary propriety in asking leave to withdraw his motion.

Mr. JOHN SHERRITT (North Middlesex). I would like, Mr. Speaker, to offer a few remarks on this question, which interests every farmer and cattle raiser in the Dominion. I do not think there is any question before the House of more vital importance to our people generally. A good deal of agitation has taken place throughout the Dominion with reference to many matters, which sink into insignificance compared to this question of slaughter of Canadian cattle at British ports of entry after they have been there but a few days. I am a farmer myself and know something of the losses sustained in having to ship cattle hundreds of miles by rail and then put them on board steamers for the old country, where they are apt to land in a very bad condition, and where they must be placed on the market within ten days after their arrival. It seems to me that it would not be out of place, from the standpoint of a farmer, if this government would arrange to have our cattle allowed to remain another ten days before being slaughtered. I know from personal knowledge of the business that if they were allowed to remain at the port of entry an additional ten days, that would mean millions of dollars to the people of this country. The cattle arrive in a condition which is not the most favourable. They arrive feeble after having been knocked about on the ocean trip and not fit to go on the market, and besides the present regulations place the butchers of the old country in a position to round up the market. If there is a large amount of cattle landed, all these butchers have to do is to wait until the ten days are up and then they can get our cattle for whatever price they have a mind to offer. I think that a great mistake was made by the people in this country in the past. By shipping stockers I think we made a great abuse of the privilege we formerly enjoyed, by shipping a great many thin cattle which it would have been a great deal more profitable for us to feed at home. There must be something wrong about the business when we ship the cattle and then send over feed to fatten them. The House will agree with me that it would be an advantage to Canadian farmers to be placed in such a position that they would not be so liable to be rounded up on the British market and forced to sell at any price offered. I would suggest therefore that we should endeavour to get an extension of ten days added to the time our cattle are allowed to remain on the market before being slaughtered or sold. I am not here to censure the government. They may have done the best they could, but the result has not been satisfactory. If there ever was a time in the history of this country when our representatives should feel independent, or at least when they should feel that they have a right to ask and to expect, if not favours, at least what they are entitled to, it is now. When we consider what we have done in South Africa, when we consider that the blood of our sons is filtering in the sands of South Africa, we should feel that we are in a position to-day to ask for at least that which is to some extent our right. A few days ago I was in Montreal, and I noticed that a great many United States cattle were there which had been shipped from New York, and which were being fed in our cattle yards, previous to being exported to the old country. When we find our American cattle feeding in our yards in Toronto and Montreal, I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they do not think that we are endangering our chances of getting a better arrangement with the mother country. Should there be any disease in the United States, we are exposing ourselves to the danger of having that disease communicated to our own cattle. We buy our stockers out of the same yards where American cattle are allowed to be fed and we put these stockers on our farms, so that if there is any disease in the American cattle we are running every risk of having that disease communicated to our own cattle. It seems to me that a reform is urgently called for in this matter, and I would urge it upon the consideration of the government and at the same time impress upon them the necessity of making the most strenuous efforts to have the embargo raised, or at least have the time in which our cattle are allowed to remain in the ports of entry, before being slaughtered, extended.

Mr. HENRY CARGILL (East Bruce). As a farmer and representing a farming constituency, I feel bound, Mr. Speaker, to give whatever aid I can to have the injustice to which the Canadian cattle trade is being subjected in the English market, removed. I do not think there is any subject which can engage the attention of this House that is of more importance to our agricultural community. Volumes of evidence have been produced by the speakers who have preceded me, and further evidence can be produced to show that our Canadian cattle are free from disease. I do not think that the freedom of our cattle from disease is really disputed by any one. Whatever reason may be assigned by the British government for excluding our cattle from the British market or placing an embargo upon them, there can be no doubt that the real reason is the desire to protect the British farmer. I regret exceedingly that the rules laid down for the guidance of this House preclude a vote being taken on a resolution of this kind, and any time should be opportune for discussing such an important resolution. I think it is to be regretted that under our rules an important resolution such as this cannot be introduced and freely discussed on any occasion, and I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, the advisability of considering some amendment to these rules which would enable us in this House to discuss a resolution of this character without having it side-tracked by the government. I think that on a question such as this both sides should be unanimous. It is very important that we should adopt some rule which would allow free discussion and a free vote, irrespective of party politics, on a question of this kind, on any occasion when a member of this House thinks fit to bring it up.

My hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. McGowan) says that the embargo placed on Canadian cattle entails a loss of $15 per head upon the cattle exported to the British market. This being the case, there is an almost incalculable loss suffered by the farming community identified with this interest. My opinion is that it is not in the interest of the Canadian farmer to export stock cattle. I know that the farmers in this country who have succeeded are the farmers who have finished their cattle and exported them ready for slaughter. The government should allow this resolution to pass unanimously, for such a movement, at this particular time, would have a very salutary effect upon the imperial parliament. I trust the Prime Minister and his colleagues will take this matter into their serious consideration. If they do not allow this motion to pass, I trust that, when the papers are brought down, a motion will be framed and passed unanimously by this House expressing the desire of the Canadian people to have this embargo upon their cattle removed.

Hon. WM. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I would like to appeal to the good sense of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) and suggest to him the wisdom of withdrawing his motion at this time. After the correspondence is brought down, which we are promised will be in a few days, we can judge what the efforts of the government have been for the removal of this embargo, and perhaps it may be possible to prepare a resolution upon which both sides of the House can agree, to be presented to the British government. It seems to me that that would be the best way of dealing with this subject. The importance of the matter, of course, is well known to both sides of the House. If we are to succeed, we are most likely to do so by uniting. In all fairness to the government and to himself and to the purpose he has in view, it would be better for my hon. friend from Pictou not to press the motion at this time.

Mr. JOHN McGOWAN (Centre Wellington). I think all will agree that this is one of the most important questions that has been brought before the House for some time. I regret that the matter has been brought forward in the way it has been. I would prefer that it had come before the House in a form which the government would accept. I recognize that there is more or less a vote of censure upon the government in this motion. I would suggest that my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) leave it open until the papers promised us have been brought down. Then, if it is found that the government have been derelict in their duty, I would certainly join him in censuring them. But until the papers are before us, I would much prefer that it should not be made a party question. Speaking for the province of Ontario and, I believe for the whole country, I venture to say that it is most important that there should be unanimous expression of opinion upon this question.

Mr. NATHANIEL BOYD (Macdonald). The question under discussion, is, possibly, of more interest to the people of Manitoba and the North-west than to those of any other part of Canada. Next to their grain crop, this cattle trade is the most important to them. I brought this matter to the attention of the House last session. And I must say I was rather amused, this afternoon, at the regret expressed because the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) was not here. Last session, when the discussion on my motion relating to the question took place, it was shown by the correspondence that had passed between the Minister of Agriculture and the clerk of the legislature of Manitoba that the minister did not know what was going on about it. He sent a telegram to the clerk of the legislature saying that he did not understand that a certain regulation passed by the imperial government was in existence. In other words, he said he did not understand that the imperial authorities were adding to the protection they had been giving to their cattle growers for some time past. It was shown by the correspondence I read in the House that the call for tenders for the beef for the imperial army contained a clause distinctly stating that the beef must be British-grown, showing that they had adopted a species of protection of the most intense character. And our Minister of Agriculture was not aware of it. So, as to his being in Japan, he might as well be in Gibraltar or anywhere else for all he knows of the question, or for all the good he could do us by being here. There are two points with respect to this matter that I would like to emphasize. The hon. member for St. Mary's (Hon. Mr. Tarte) mentioned one particularly when he made reference to the imperial government saying that there was disease amongst our cattle. That, Sir, we deny. And we find fault with the imperial authorities because they decry the health of our cattle and so interfere with our trade. It was the duty of our representatives when in England to deny that with no uncertain sound. It would not have detracted from their dignity if, even in advance of the papers being brought down, they had told us in what emphatic manner they had repudiated this assertion on the part of the British authorities. The other point is that we wish to show that the British people are protecting their farmers and to draw this to the attention of our free traders in this House—and they are getting fewer every year; the government is passing them up to the Senate.

Now, Sir, those are the points I wish to bring out. There is no disease amongst our cattle, we repudiate it, and we wish to say to the people of Great Britain that we are well aware of what they are doing. They are protecting their farmers and others who are raising cattle in the British isles. Those are the points we wish to bring out. When my hon friend from Wellington (Mr. McGowan) tries to make the question as easy as possible for the government, let me tell him and others that were not in this House some years ago when the Postmaster General and his friends rang the changes against the government of that day, and found fault with them in season and out of season for not doing what it was pretended they should have done, finding fault with them for doing just what this government is doing now and in my opinion, doing it much better than the present government. I think it ill becomes the Minister of Finance to take such a decided objection to the motion of my hon. friend from Pictou, and to say that it was a clear want of confidence in the government. Now the hon. member for North Middlesex (Mr. Sherritt) brought out an important point, and that was the great loss to our Canadian producers from the fact of their having to kill these cattle ten days after they are landed in the old country. That is really where the great loss to the producers of Canadian cattle comes in. I think the least this government should have done to impress upon the imperial authorities, and to impress upon Mr. Hanbury, because he is the gentleman who apparently takes the most decided stand against our request, that there is no disease amongst our cattle. I do not think the government have done what they should have done, and they have not done what they claimed our friends should have done when we were on the other side.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I merely rise to protest against the way in which the Minister of Finance, by a mere wave of his hand, puts this question aside and tells his followers that they must support him because it is a motion of want of confidence. Motions made on going into Supply, the hon. gentleman knows, are more or less motions of want of confidence. The reasons the hon. gentleman gave are very extraordinary, they are of such a kind as Mr. Hanbury will take notice of, and will not encourage him to grant our request. They will in fact furnish him with weapons to resist our demand, because he will be able to say that so little notice was taken of the matter in the Canadian parliament that the question was put aside until the correspondence came down. I venture to predict that the correspondence will disclose one thing very clearly, namely, the weakness of the Canadian representatives at the colonial conference. We were told by the First Minister that the reason this question was put aside was that they did not consider it of sufficient importance to be taken up by the colonial conference, because it was a matter affecting Canada alone. Why, the right hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that one of the weapons used by Mr. Hanbury is that if Canadian cattle were admitted, the cattle of all other countries would have to be admitted on the same terms. Now in what position do we find ourselves ? It has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Pictou, and by other gentlemen in this debate, that the question was put aside because it was not thought of sufficient importance to be taken up. Who suggested that it was not of sufficient importance ? Certainly it could not have been the Canadian delegates. It was a most natural suggestion to come from a government who has taken so arbitrary a position, and it was the duty of our Canadian delegates to protest against taking any such position. The people of Canada will regard that as a complete abandonment of our position. What was the proposition that followed ? That a better way of attaining the object would be to have a conference with Mr. Hanbury, the gentleman who had set his face against reason, against argument, against fact in his determination to exclude Canadian cattle. I say the period is past when we in Canada should feel called upon to convince the British government that there is no reason why Canadian cattle should be excluded ; the period has now arrived when the people of Canada should enter a protest against the arbitrary position taken by the British government. Mr. Hanbury is pleased to say that possibly there may be disease in Canadian herds in the future. Now there can be no more absurd position for a gentleman occupying his right rank to take as a pretext for excluding Canadian cattle. Mr. Hanbury and every other intelligent man knows that Canadian herds are free from disease, and have been for years. Now it has been pointed out by several gentlemen on this side of the House that Mr. Hanbury is adopting this course as a measure of protection to the cattle raisers of the United Kingdom. He declares himself that to admit Canadian cattle would be to destroy largely the interest of cattle growers in a portion of the United Kingdom. That is plain.

Now let us remember that the Canadian representatives at the colonial conference were prepared to abandon a question that seems to me to overshadow all others. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they think there is a single gentleman in this House who will contend for a moment that the question of the metric system, important as it is in itself, or the question of reduced postage upon newspapers between Canada and Great Britain, are questions that, both together, can be weighed against this question affecting the raisers of cattle in Canada. Why, the idea is absurd. We were told on a former occasion by the Minister of Customs, with a tear in his voice, that we had touched the hearts of the British people, that while we had not a legal preference we had still better preference in the hearts of the people of Great Britain ; and he instanced the case under discussion to-day and declared from his place in this House what a weapon that preference would be with which to go to the British public and ask for the removal of that unfair restriction. As I said at the beginning, I merely rose to protest against the attitude of the Minister of Finance, who has given a most trivial reason for setting this question aside, namely, that the papers were not brought down. Surely those papers have been in the departments for a long time. They must be in the Department of Agriculture, or at least in some other departments where they are easily procurable. The hon. gentleman should have laid these papers on the table before this time. He did not have to get the consent of the imperial authorities before he could do so. He might well have anticipated the anxiety of the people of this country on this great question, and have been prepared to treat it on its merits rather than to take shelter behind a pretense that this motion was a want of confidence.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria). For a number of years, up to a period four or five years ago, I used to bring this question up annually. When I was in England in 1897 I discussed the matter with a number of prominent people there, and I found that they would not under any consideration entertain a proposition to allow Canadian cattle to enter on any better terms than they were giving us. In other words, it was a straight policy of protection to the British farmer as against Canadian and American cattle. I pointed out at that time that they could protect the farmers to a much better extent than by shutting out our cattle. If they examine the freight rates from almost any part of Ireland, from almost any part of Scotland and from even the midland districts of England from the large centres they will find that the freight rates on cattle to the central markets of Great Britain are almost as much as they are from parts of the United States of America to the British islands and that by looking into the regulation of their own freight rates they may protect their own farmers to a much greater extent than any injury that would accrue from allowing our cattle in. It has been said by a very eminent English statesman within recent times that British diplomacy —all diplomacy in fact—consists of personal influence, personal intrigue and personal unscrupulousness. I refer to Sir Edward Monson, British Ambassador at Paris. I have to say, here, that as a Canadian I do not intend, so far as I am concerned, that Great Britain shall be allowed to blacken the character of Canadian cattle by saying that tuberculosis and other diseases exist in this country merely in order to carry out their usual policy of intrigue. Let them come out and declare that they are going to protect their own farmers and it would be fair to our people if they do so. I want to point out to the Britisher that, when he taxes Canadians he should put us in all respects on an equal footing with Russians, Germans, Frenchmen, and the nations of Europe. Canada does not cost the people of Great Britain one dollar in taxes, while these European nations impose a heavy tax on the people of Great Britain. I demand that we shall receive better treatment from Great Britain or that we shall find out the reason why. We believe that we should have better treatment in regard to our cattle, and that we should have better treatment in the markets of Great Britain. I do not see why the government cannot accept this resolution. It declares that this House regrets that no conclusion was arrived at on this subject. Surely the ministers, or some of them, regret that no conclusion was arrived at. I must correct my hon. friend from Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) in stating that these gentlemen crossed the water and brought nothing home with them. My hon. friend forgets that two or three of them came home with those titles that they formerly spoke of as tin-pot titles. One thing the conference has accomplished, at all events, is that it has enabled some of these hon. gentlemen to get some of their old tin-pot titles. I trust the ministers will take this into their serious consideration and that if they do not arrive at the conclusion to vote for the resolution upon the present occasion, at an early date they will take such steps as will result in impressing upon the British government that Canadians realize that they have done about as much as they intend to for the old land until the statesmen of England are prepared to treat us better than they treat the Russian, the German, the Hottentot and the citizen of every other nation in the world.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the discussion of this question for a great many years in this House and I am bound to say that this discussion, in so far as it has been taken part in by hon. gentlemen on the government benches to-day, has differed from any that I have ever heard in this House before. In defence of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher), I must say, in his absence, that he was more frank when this question was discussed in this House last year than hon. gentlemen have been on this occasion. Now, Sir, the people of Canada believe this is a very serious question and one which should be seriously considered by both parties in this country, whether Conservative or Liberal. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, last year, when he was asked to produce the papers in connection with the embargo in the motion presented by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said that the correspondence was very slight, that there was very little correspondence to produce, but that at a later period he would bring it down. But, what did he say in the meantime ?—that he had been in the old country, that he had discussed the question with the British Minister of Agriculture, that he had been in Edinburgh, that he had discussed the question with a large number of people living in that locality and that the British Minister of Agriculture did not dispute the statement of the hon. gentleman when he said that Canadian cattle were not diseased. The answer that Mr. Hanbury gave on that occasion was something like this:

> Hon. Mr. Hanbury said that while he was quite ready to admit that Canadian cattle were perfectly healthy. . . . disease might break out among them at any moment and in such a case the reimposition of the old embargo would be a difficult matter as it would cause greater disturbance in the trade and make the condition of affairs worse than if a settled policy were followed.

That was the statement that Mr. Hanbury made on that occasion. What followed ? He said in Edinburgh that:

> So long as he remained Minister of Agriculture he would neither make nor advise any change in the law.

The ministers representing the Canadian government in England have been at the conference. The right hon. leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated that this matter was not of sufficient importance for the conference to deal with. If that is true, if the conference viewed it in that light, surely the ministers from Canada had an opportunity of discussing this question with the British Minister of Agriculture, or with the English government. If the government had made it a point that an important question of this kind should be discussed with the British Minister of Agriculture, or with other gentlemen representing the English government, and then, if they had discovered that the English government were not prepared to amend the law, that they were not prepared to admit Canadian cattle, what would be the use of wasting time discussing the removal of the embargo from Canadian cattle in Great Britain? If that is a settled policy of Great Britain on this question, it is simply a waste of time to discuss it here. Let our ministers be frank with us and say to the House that the British government are not prepared to change the law and that it is useless to look for the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle. Has Canada anything in her possession that would be of advantage to Great Britain ? Is there anything by which Canada can enter into some arrangement with Great Britain and by which Canadians can have the advantage of sending their cattle to Great Britain ? If this could be done, I think it would be a long step in the right direction, but to pursue the course we are pursuing now is simply a useless waste of time in my judgment, and nothing will be accomplished.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, as I come from a part of the country where thousands of dollars are invested in the cattle industry, I thought it would not be out of place to make a few remarks on this question although I cannot hope to add anything of an original character to the debate. We had a resolution during the last session introduced by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) which was intended, as he stated, to strengthen the hands of the government in the endeavour at the inter-imperial conference to bring pressure to bear upon the imperial government in order to have this embargo removed, and as far as we can learn from the public press and from the other documents at our disposal nothing transpired at the conference to show that the government took those steps that we Canadians expected they would take as our representatives. They seem to have screened themselves to-day behind the plea: Wait until the papers are brought down and then you will see whether anything in our actions should merit your condemnation or not. There would be no impropriety in the members of the government, who had this conference with Mr. Hanbury, explaining at least the gist of what arguments were brought to bear on him, and then we would be in a better position to know whether to condemn the government or not. Since the resolution was passed in the House last session, Mr. Henderson, of Scotland, the representative of the Canadian Cattle Importation Association, has been in Canada, and he has spoken before our Boards of Trade and other bodies who are interested in having this embargo removed. Mr. Henderson has urged that strong resolutions should be addressed by the Canadian parliament to the imperial parliament, and he has stated his own opinion that it is useless further to approach Mr. Hanbury after the remarks that gentleman has made on the question.

The Prime Minister read to-day from an imperial document, a statement that the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock) was delegated by the Canadian government to interview Mr. Hanbury. If there is any member of this government who could fill this mission with least grace it is the Postmaster General, because as the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has shown he was the member of the Liberal party who from this side of the House condemned the Conservative government for relaxing the quarantine regulations between the United States and Canada which was alleged to be the reason why the embargo was levied in the first place; and he is now a member of a government who did away with the ninety days quarantine thus allowing the free intermixture of the cattle of the United States with the cattle of Canada. Mr. Hanbury now admits that there is no disease among our Canadian cattle, but he says it would not be advisable to remove the embargo because it would injure the trade in Irish cattle. Evidently he has an eye more to Irish votes than he has to doing justice to Canadian cattle, and in that respect Mr. Hanbury is probably playing the politician rather than the statesman. Mr. Hanbury has ventured the opinion that Canada is not a loser, because we can fatten our cattle and get more per head for them than if the embargo were removed, but I take it that our Canadian people are better judges as to whether we are losers or gainers, and if you consult practical cattle exporters such as the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike), Gordon and Ironsides and others, they will tell you that we are heavy losers by reason of this embargo. At the present time our cattle are admitted only at the port of Glasgow in Scotland, at three or four ports in England, and at no port at all in Ireland. They have to be slaughtered within ten days after landing, and as the hon. member for North Middlesex (Mr. Sherritt) has pointed out, the beef deteriorates on the passage across, and having to be sold merely to local butchers without competition, only the lowest price can be obtained. If other ports were opened and this embargo removed, not only the local butchers but the butchers from all over Great Britain would be present to purchase our cattle and competition being keener the prices would be better. I believe also that no cold storage facilities are provided at the ports of entry, which is a further loss to us. Mr. Henderson who is a practical man has estimated, notwithstanding Mr. Hanbury to the contrary, that there is a loss on our cattle of from $10 to $15 per head because of this embargo. It has been pointed out to-day that one million Canadian cattle have gone to England since the embargo, and at the lowest estimate of $10 per head that means a loss of $10,000,000 to Canada. In his interview with the Winnipeg Board of Trade, Mr. Henderson stated that 8,000,000 consumers in England were in favour of the removal of the embargo and that they were supported in this by a large section of the British press, and by a large number of the members of the House of Commons. I will not say that the abolition of the quarantine between Canada and the United States is a bar to the removal of the embargo on our cattle in England, but if there be a suspicion in the minds of the English people that there is disease amongst United States cattle, our quarantine regulations would have to be more stringent than they are at present in order that the British embargo might be removed. It has been stated by the Prime Minister that John Bull never mixes up sentiment with business. I quite agree. The embargo on our cattle is an evidence of it. He has in profound words of wisdom in trade matters said: That business is business, and sentiment is sentiment, and business is no more sentiment than sentiment is business. John Bull looks out for No. 1, and he thinks all the more of any son of his who does the same thing. I do not think we are standing in our own light either commercially or sentimentally when we inform the British government that so far as Canada is concerned we are granting a preference of 33⅓ per cent on imports from England, and that she should grant a preference, or rather do us justice in removing the stigma which is now placed on Canadian cattle by condemning them before the whole world as diseased. We do not ask any preference for our cattle over the cattle of any other country which is free from disease. We are told in England that they cannot remove this embargo from Canadian cattle without removing it from American cattle as well, and we might as well say that Canada should have a fiscal policy universal to the whole world and should not give a preference of 33⅓ per cent on British goods. In view of the fact that we have already granted Great Britain a preference, it is natural for us to expect that our cattle should be admitted to the British market when they show a clear bill of health. It has been proven beyond peradventure that there is not any disease among Canadian cattle, and now that Mr. Hanbury has been forced to admit that no disease exists, why should not the embargo be taken off unless it be retained as a system of protection—unless Mr. Hanbury is practising protection while he is preaching free trade exactly as our government is doing in Canada. We are therefore only calling upon the Canadian government to do their duty when we ask them to show stronger reasons why we should not pass this motion condemning them. I think, Sir, that they could without any impropriety tell us what took place between the Postmaster General and Mr. Hanbury, notwithstanding the fact that the papers are not yet on the Table of the House.

Mr. EDWARD HACKETT (West Prince, P.E.I.) This question is of great importance to the farmers of Canada, and as I am a farmer myself, I take a great interest in it. A great deal has been said with regard to the sentiment in Great Britain towards Canada and the loyalty and patriotism of the people of Canada. We are all proud of what Canada has done in connection with the trouble in South Africa ; and after our young men have shed their blood on the veldt of South Africa in upholding the British flag, and after Canada has granted a preference in her markets to the products of Great Britain, the government of Great Britain should at least show a preference to our cattle in their markets over those of foreigners. Instead of that, they have been insisting on protection to the farmers of England against the farmers of Canada, and at the same time, as my hon. friend says, blackening the character of the products of Canada. If we are going to have a united empire all round the globe, then the people of all parts of the empire should be treated in the same way. Some hon. gentleman has stated that Mr. Hanbury wishes to protect the Irish cattle. Sir, the Irish people have done no more for Great Britain than the people of Canada, and there is no more reason why the cattle of Ireland should be protected than the cattle of Canada. Why is that embargo not removed at this time ? A year ago we were told that we should have a short session because the premier of Canada and the local premiers were going to England to have a great colonial conference for the purpose of advancing the interests of Canada. For that reason we made the session short. The premier has said this evening that the session may be so long a one that the snow may whiten the ground before it comes to an end. If it does, it will be because a large amount of government work was left over from last session to allow these gentlemen to go to England to take part in that conference. What have they accomplished ? Somebody says they were looking after tin-pot titles. I do not know that they have brought many back. The premier of Prince Edward Island went to attend that conference, and it was stated in the government organ of that day that he would come back as Sir Arthur Peters. He did not, however. He came back as plain Mr. Arthur Peters.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HACKETT. Before recess, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out the importance of this question. We know in general that stock raising is the principal part of the farming industry, and that in order to effectively promote that industry we should have the right of entry on the English market, the same as British subjects all over the United Kingdom. Since recess there has been placed in my hands the Montreal 'Star' in which there appears the following dispatch :

London, March 24.

The statement of the Secretary of War, Rt. Hon. St. John Broderick, in the House in reply to Mr. Alfred Davies, shows that the War office still excludes Canadian beef from the army contracts.

That, I consider, a very unfair policy. Why should Canadian beef be excluded ? The people of Canada are just as loyal to the British flag as those of the United Kingdom, and while we are willing to shed our blood for the British flag, the British people should at least give a preference to Canadian beef over beef from the Western States. I would ask that this resolution moved by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) should be adopted by the government without division. Our Canadian farmers are the mainstay of the Dominion. They are the men who provide the bread and beef for the people of Canada and who also ship a large surplus to other countries. They therefore should be looked upon as the first people to be protected by the government of this country. I see by the Year-book of 1901 that the value of our exports to Great Britain amounted to $8,000,000. Well, if we were allowed equal privileges with the people of Ireland and Scotland, if our cattle were admitted into the markets of Great Britain without being subjected to this embargo, our exports would amount to $1,000,000 more in the year. That is something worth contending for, and I trust that the government will see the importance of adopting this motion and allow it to be adopted unanimously.

Before recess I said a few words about the trip made to England by our ministers to attend the coronation festivities. Their expenses were paid by the Canadian people and our people were entitled to expect some results. We supposed that when the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of each of our provinces attended the conference of premiers of the whole empire at London, they would bring back some tangible result. But, Sir, they came back with nothing. The only thing they accomplished was the passing of some resolution with regard to weights and measures, but not one single thing in favour of the Canadian people did they accomplish. There was one result, however, from the trip which was worth noting. During their absence, the ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who was alive and active to the interests of the Canadian people, was advocating what should be done to promote our wealth and our prosperity, but when these gentlemen returned to Canada the right hon. the First Minister asked the Minister of Public Works to resign. Why did he ask him to resign ? Simply because the ex-minister was advocating the interests of the Canadian people. We are told by the hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches that they cannot reply to the motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) because the Minister of Agriculture has gone to Japan. Is that a reason which we ought to accept ? Why should ministers of the Crown, who are paid to reply to questions of this kind, be unable to reply because one of their number happens to be in Japan ? I say that the gentleman who is at the head of so important a department as that of Agriculture should be here to answer the questions put to him by the representatives of the people, and when he is not here he is derelict in his duty. I trust the government will allow the motion of the gentleman for Pictou to pass without a vote because it affects the interests of a large part of the population of Canada. Should this matter come up in the imperial parliament what would they say ? They would say : You divided on this question in Canada which shows that you have different opinions concerning it. This is not a motion of want of confidence, Mr. Speaker, but a motion in the interests of the Canadian farmer, and I trust the government will take that into consideration and allow it to pass without calling for a vote.

Mr. HACKETT

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I see that the right hon. the leader of the government is not here, but in his absence I would make a suggestion to his hon. colleague the Minister of Finance. The opposition desire to get the unanimous opinion of the House on the important matter brought up by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell). But as the Finance Minister has declared that he will call upon his friends to vote down the motion and as he has promised to have the papers laid on the Table in two or three days, I would suggest to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) that he should withdraw his motion in order that he may have an opportunity, when the papers come down, of renewing it should they not be in accordance with his opinion. We do not want to prejudice the matter at all, it is not a question of private politics, we have no desire to make political capital out of it, our only desire is to have this embargo removed, and therefore with the consent of the government I would suggest that my hon. friend, if the government will consent, should withdraw his motion, reserving the right to renew it on another occasion when the papers are before the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The government can have no objection to the hon. gentleman withdrawing his motion.

Mr. SPROULE. On the understanding that the hon. gentleman will not be estopped from dealing with the same subject on another occasion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Whatever is open to the hon. gentleman within the rules of the House, he is free to do. I am not aware of anything which would prevent his bringing the matter up again. But that is a matter that will have to be governed by the rules of the House.

Mr. BELL. The leader of the House in his place to-day stated that he thought these papers would be laid upon the Table in the course of this week. In that case, if the government will—as I have no doubt they will—use diligence in giving us these papers at an early day, as I would much prefer that the resolution would be prepared that would be unanimously supported, I would ask leave with the consent of my seconder that I withdraw my motion.

Amendment withdrawn.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I would like to ask what is the earliest day when we could expect the Redistribution Bill.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The Bill is in a very advanced stage. I would not like to fix a definite date for its introduction, but I can promise that it will be introduced very shortly.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Before the motion for Committee of Supply is put, I would ask the Minister of Justice if it is the intention of the government to introduce a general telephone law this session ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) asked that question before, the leader of the House suggested that there should be a formal notice. The Prime Minister is absent at the moment, but if the hon. gentleman will put a notice on the paper it will be a reminder, and an answer will be given.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think this is sufficient notice, and the next time the Committee of Supply is moved for I shall press for an answer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman cannot get an answer if we have not one ready for him.

VACANCY IN ST. JAMES DIVISION.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention and that of the House to a matter of very great importance to the city of Montreal. I refer to the vacancy in St. James division. We have had the announcement in the speech from the Throne that very important matters in connection with the transportation question and other matters of interest to the city of Montreal are to be brought up this session. I think it extremely desirable that this important division of the city of Montreal should be represented without delay in this House, as its interest in these questions is so great. You, Mr. Speaker, have, no doubt, issued your warrant, and an election can be had there in time enough to have here from St. James division a representative who will be able to sit and deliberate upon these important questions. Besides, the division having been represented as it has been for the past two sessions, and in view of other circumstances to which I need not refer, it is but right and proper that an election should be had there without delay and the division represented. I do not think it should be necessary to insist at length upon the urgency of this matter. I live in the division and have a vote there, and I know that the electors of the division are extremely anxious to be represented in the present session. I would ask the government if it is the intention to have an election there without delay.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) is, no doubt, aware that there has been a special finding in that case, and a report that there was a general system of bribery in the election. Under these circumstances, the question arises whether the warrant should be issued direct by the Speaker, or whether it should not be taken cognizance of by the House itself. There are several precedents on the subject, and we must consider them.

Mr. MONK. I was not aware that there was such a report.

Mr. SPEAKER. As my name was brought into the discussion, I may inform the hon. member (Mr. Monk) that I was prevented from issuing my warrant because a report was made that a general system of corruption had prevailed in the election. Section 48, chapter 9, of the Revised Statutes seemed to cover the case and to prevent my issuing my warrant.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to bring it before the attention of the House ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is a matter to be considered by the House, not by the Department of Justice.

Mr. MACLEAN. When will it be brought before the House ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. At the proper time.

THE BUDGET.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I see by a report in the Toronto 'Globe' that it is likely that the budget speech will be made on Thursday next. Is there any intention on the part of the Finance Minister to——

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The report is not correct. An announcement will be made, as usual, a couple of days in advance.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE—LORD ROSEBERY'S SPEECH.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I do not know that this is the best time for bringing up a matter to which I wish to refer, but I think I shall be in order in doing so. I notice in yesterday's paper a cable despatch, part of which reads as follows :

> The Earl of Rosebery will to-morrow move in the House of Lords : 'That this House expresses its approval of the establishment of a council of national defence and earnestly hopes that the first efforts of such a council will be directed to the adjustment of national armaments, to the naval, military and financial conditions of the empire.' Lord Rosebery will then probably make an announcement upon the question of colonial contributions, probably urging that it is necessary for the colonies to send members to the House of Commons, and reform the Lords as the necessary preliminary.

Has the Minister of Finance any information he can give us as to any correspondence going on between the government here and the colonial office regarding this question ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have no information, I am afraid, that I can give my hon. friend. I need hardly remind him that Lord Rosebery is not in the imperial government. He speaks from the opposition side. Whatever views he may have, he would hardly open official correspondence with the government of the Dominion. However, I am hardly in a position to give the hon. gentleman any information upon the subject.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Public works, chargeable to income—public buildings, Nova Scotia—Halifax, new public buildings, $60,000.

Mr. MONK. Would the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) have any objection to leaving this item over until my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) returns ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. Mr. Sutherland). I have no objection, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) desires it. But I do not think this is a debatable item.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is not a new item, but it is to provide for the continuation of the work upon a building begun a year ago.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The building is under contract, and $60,000 is what the architect estimates will be spent during the coming year. This is in addition to $50,000 already voted. All particulars and details with regard to the building have already been given. Besides, if desired, there will be another opportunity to discuss the matter.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think the hon. member for Halifax would wish to have it kept over.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Generally, what is the explanation of the item ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is for a public building at Halifax, the contract for which was let on the 30th June last.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the building for —a post office ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Customs house and general offices.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect of the department has made a careful estimate, and he thinks that $60,000 is all that can be expended on this building.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the total amount ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $250,000 is the amount of the contract. The total amount expended to the 31st of December was $43,874. That includes the site.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. CLANCY. When does the contract call for the completion of the building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On the 15th of September, 1904. Of course the balance we are asking for will be for the fittings, &c. The contract is given to the lowest tenderer, M. E. Keefe, of Halifax.

Quarantine station, Lawlor's Island, $1,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is for repairs.

Public buildings, New Brunswick—Richibucto, $10,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This building is under contract for $9,716. The contract was made on the 15th of November, 1902, and the building is to be completed by January, 1904. The balance is required for heating, boilers, fittings, &c. The total cost is estimated by the architect at $15,000. It is a general public building for post office, custom house, &c.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What was the statement of the Minister of Public Works last year as to the probable cost of this building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not got that information. I will be pleased to look it up and bring it down. The total cost estimated by the architect, including everything, is $15,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. There seems to have been a vote of $5,000 last year. What was the promise made to the House as to the probable expenditure ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say what statement was made last year. I will make a memorandum and find out, if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. CLANCY. Who is the contractor in this case ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. James Reid, Sydney, N.S. He was the lowest tenderer.

Mr. CLANCY. Has there been any change in the plans with regard to that building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am informed that no change has been made in the plans and specifications as they were first send out.

St. John, immigration building, $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to provide for the foundation, and to make some alterations required in the St. John immigration building. Representations were made by the city, by the steamship companies and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that there was not room enough to accommodate immigrants landing at St. John, and it is necessary to make these improvements for their accommodation. I may explain that we are putting a third story on the present building, and increasing the fire protection. The third story is estimated to cost $10,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What was the total amount expended on those buildings ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The amount previously expended was $35,517. It is a pretty large building.

Mr. SPROULE. Did you expend the money voted last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Could the minister give us an idea of the probable number of immigrants that will land there ? I thought they usually came by Halifax.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not got a summary of the number that have arrived. But we had communications from the Immigration Department that it was necessary to increase the accommodation for second-class passengers. The Elder-Dempster Steamship Company expect to land at St. John 2,000 immigrants per week for the season of 1903. The Allan Steamship Company, whose boats arrive on the same day as the Elder-Dempster line, also expect to bring large numbers of immigrants.

Mr. SPROULE. The present year ends on the 30th of June.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That means for the present season. They were urging that this work should be done early this season. We have also communications from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company urging improvements.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The present building is a great deal too small. A few weeks before I left office, I went down there and saw myself that the size of the building ought to be increased. It was built too small at first.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am sure that we are obliged to the hon. member for St. Mary's (Hon. Mr. Tarte) for the information he gives us, and which it is almost impossible to get from the Minister of Public Works. It is a good thing that the hon. gentleman is in the House, because otherwise we would be pretty much in the dark as to what is going on in that department.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I do not mean to convey any new information, but as I was Minister of Public Works when that increase was decided upon, I thought it would be no harm for me to tell what has come to my personal knowledge.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is what I said. We are thankful to the hon. gentleman, and the House is pleased that we have him here to give us information that we cannot get from other sources.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have been only a short time in the department, and I am pleased indeed to get any information from the ex-Minister of Public Works, or any other member that is able to give it. I am most anxious to give all the information provided for me by the officials of the department.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The House is well aware that the Minister is new in the position, and he is no doubt doing his best. Are these immigrants expected to remain long at these seaports ? Do they not push right through, and should not facilities be afforded for expediting their departure from the seaports ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a certain delay at these landing ports. I have satisfied myself from the information given to me by the steamship companies and the railway companies, as well as by the immigration agent responsible for the report which he makes to the department, that this increased accommodation is really necessary. I may say to the committee that when we consider the number of people arriving and likely to arrive during the present season we will see that they can hardly be properly accommodated even when the increased provision that we propose is made. There are on the way now on one of the Allan ships 1,800 immigrants who will arrive at St. John, and the Elder Dempster Company inform us that they will be bringing about 2,000 immigrants a week. Therefore, the accommodation which we propose to provide will scarcely provide for the large numbers which are coming, and I am informed that it is really necessary.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understood from the hon. minister that the total cost of the improvements would be $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The balance.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Then, the total amount of the improvements will be $22,000, $10,000 last year and $12,000 this year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

St. John quarantine station—water service, drainage, heating, &c., $8,000.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Would the hon. minister be kind enough to tell us what steps have been taken in reference to this water service ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vote of $8,000 is to provide fresh water to the quarantine stations on Partridge Island. It is necessary to carry the water main across the channel from the city to the different quarantine buildings. The estimate has been made by the chief architect.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the total amount required ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This work is estimated to cost $24,000. I have all the items here if the hon. gentleman requires them.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It seems an enormous sum for drainage and the connection of the water works with these buildings.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it has been a costly work, but I think the committee will agree with me when I say that it is very necessary that these unfortunate people who are quarantined there, some ill and some not, should be supplied with drinking water.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Is the quarantine station on Partridge Island ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the distance over which we have to carry this pipe to connect with the quarantine station ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The main is 5,400 feet long to be carried from the city across the channel.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether he will ask for tenders, or whether he intends carrying out the work himself with his own officers ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am informed that an arrangement has been made with the city of St. John to do that part within the city and the balance will be done under contract let by tender.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I would like to ask the hon. minister what part he intends doing himself ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About three-quarters of the expenditure will be for work done by the department under tender and contract.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. What kind of work does my hon. friend want to make a contract for—the laying of the pipe across the harbour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Let me draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the enormous expenditure for a purpose of that kind. Twenty-four thousand dollars would furnish a small town in Ontario with a water works system.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I am informed by the deputy minister that every effort has been made to procure water in other ways. Tests were made for artesian wells and it has been found that this is the only system by which they can get a plentiful supply.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Will there be an extra charge for the water in addition to the cost of these works ?

Mr. SPROULE. Is the city of St. John paying any part of this expenditure or do we pay it all ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think there is any reason why the city should be called upon to pay for any part of the work. It is entirely for the benefit of the quarantine station.

Mr. SPROULE. We get the water from the city water works ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any understanding as to a permanent arrangement and as to what charge shall be made for water by the city ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, we will pay $252 per annum.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that for a length of time or for one year only ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is by the year for the present; there is no fixed time.

Mr. MONK. Did I understand the hon. Minister of Public Works to say that the installation of a water service and a drainage system at the quarantine station in St. John was going to cost $24,000 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. MONK. I think, under the circumstances, the committee is entitled to some more details. It seems an immense sum to pay to supply the quarantine station with fresh water and a system of drainage. Even $5,000 would do a great deal but $24,000 entitles the committee to some details as to how that sum is going to be expended. We are absolutely in the dark as to the details of the expenditure, and it appears such a large item that I think we ought to go into the details.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I do not know that there is any other information that can be desired which can be given by the department. If my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) wants a detailed statement of every item as estimated by the architect I will be very pleased to bring it down and give it to him. I have not these details here, but in a general way I have given the fullest possible explanation and all the information that is in my possession.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend has given no explanation at all. In view of the largeness of the item, $24,000 for providing the quarantine station with fresh water and a system of drainage, I would like to know how much of this is going to be spent in plumbing, for instance? If there is to be a pumping station to pump the fresh water how much of this sum goes for that?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The water will be taken from the city water works, so that there is no pumping station required.

Mr. MONK. I never heard of such an amount as $24,000 to provide such an establishment as this with water and heating and drainage. What sum is to be applied under each of these heads?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The building, is already heated, but a pipe 5,400 feet long has been laid from the city of St. John, through the channel to the island, and the excavation is very expensive. A careful estimate of the cost of the work has been made by the chief architect, and he says it cannot be done for less than this sum. Last session $17,000 was voted but that was found insufficient, and it was deemed better to wait until enough money was voted before going on with the work.

Mr. MONK. I must say that we find very great difficulty here in getting proper details in connection with large items of expenditure. No school board, no municipal council, not to speak of an individual, would say that the amount here asked to vote for this purpose, is at all within a reasonable limit. We had better postpone this vote until we get those details which any ordinary administrative body would be entitled to. I have no desire to delay the business of the House, but I do say that this item should not pass until we get sufficient information.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I agree that the fullest possible detailed information should be given on every vote, but I think the information given with regard to this vote is full and sufficient. It is most inconvenient to allow these items to stand, and I will suggest to the hon. gentleman that if he is not satisfied, then at a later stage I will bring down the detailed statement made by the chief architect, if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I cannot agree to that proposition, because on many occasions we have been told that detailed information would be brought down afterwards, and for one reason or another we have never seen it. Here we are asked to vote $25,000 under the heading of water service, drainage, and heating, for a quarantine station, and I am in the judgment of the House when I say that this appears at first sight to be an exorbitant sum to ask for such a purpose. The minister cannot tell us how much of this money goes for water service, how much for drainage and how much for heating. Surely, with his deputy minister at his elbow, he ought to be able to give information on that point. I am again in the judgment of the Committee when I say that we have not had a single satisfactory explanation to enable us to pass this vote.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I also am in the judgment of the Committee when I say that it has never been customary in this House to ask for the number of nails and the number of feet of lumber which enter into the calculation of the architect. I think I have given the fullest possible explanation in a general way, and I have proposed to the hon. gentleman that if he is not satisfied I will bring down the detailed information later. Why, it would take tons of paper if we were to bring down full details in connection with every departmental item, such as this.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What information has been given already?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell me what information he would like?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I asked the minister to distinguish between the cost of water service, the cost of the drainage, and the cost of the heating, and he was unable to do so. The minister tells us that it is unusual to ask for such information. I have not been in this House so long as he, but my parliamentary experience extends from 1886, and I can say that not only is it usual but that it is the rule to ask and to obtain such detailed information. While the Hon. Mr. Tarte was Minister of Public Works, when these details were asked for they were always given and given cheerfully. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) knew everything that was connected with his department, and the same rule should be followed now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The same rule is being followed. I think my hon. friend gave every detail at that time, and I do not think it could be expected that that should be given over and over again, especially when I have promised to bring down full details of the estimate made by the architect for the work.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. When I left the department the position was this. The department had tried to dig artesian wells, and a great deal of money had been spent without getting water, although the experts had told us that we could get water easily. Then it was suggested that a system of surface water could be arranged for. I went down during the month of August, and it was not very difficult for me to make up my mind that that suggestion had no sense whatever. The only practicable means of getting water for a quarantine station is to lay a pipe across the bay, a distance of 5,000 or 6,000 feet at least, to connect with the city of St. John water system. It is a very rocky place.

Mr. CASGRAIN. How much would that cost ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. It would cost $20,000 or $25,000 at least.

Mr. MONK. Then we are not voting enough.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Of course, I have not the details. I had Mr. Shewen, our chief engineer, make a complete report on the matter. When I left the department that report had not been received. It is very important that we should have water at the quarantine station, and I am very much surprised and sorry that we have not sooner provided the accommodation that we should have there.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). One would infer, from the hon. gentleman's remarks, that it was proposed to bury the pipe in the rock. Surely that is not the intention. It might rest on the bottom of the bay.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. When my hon. friend who has just spoken rose, I was about to rise for the purpose of making a statement of the facts so far as I know them, and they entirely correspond with the statement made by the ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte). The problem of obtaining a water supply for Partridge Island has been a very serious one indeed, and has given to all who have been interested in the matter a great deal of anxiety and concern. I am personally acquainted with the efforts that were made in the direction stated by the ex-Minister of Public Works, which efforts failed. Partridge Island is simply a rock where no water has been found or is likely to be found.

Mr. MONK. What is the distance from the city.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. About a mile across the west channel of the harbour.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. About 5,000 feet.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The water supply is obtained from the western or Carleton side of the harbour, in connection with the public supply, and I do not believe it will be possible to secure such supply in any other way than that now proposed by the Department of Public Works. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) spoke as if this were a very large expenditure to be made in an unimportant locality.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He rather spoke of the place as not being of special consequence. Of course, if it were in the city of St. John, my hon. friend would at once admit that any reasonable expenditure for any proper purpose would be justified ; but he spoke of the work on this island as if it were not a matter of great importance. I can assure him that a quarantine station at that point is an absolute necessity. Hundreds and even thousands of people are brought into the harbour of St. John, largely immigrants, for the west, and it is of the most vital consequence to the health of the people of Canada that proper precautions be taken there, and that a thoroughly equipped station be established there. What has been done has not been done without much consideration on the part of all who were interested in the matter. I think that the sum named in this estimate is a very moderate and reasonable sum, if it is found to be sufficient to cover the actual outlay. I do not wish to speak on that point, however, because I have no special knowledge to qualify me to do so ; but I am sure that my hon. friends who criticised this item rather severely——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, I am glad to hear that they did not, because I think it will be found, on a searching investigation, that there is no vote asked for in these estimates which is more justifiable or necessary than the one now under discussion.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has spent some time in eloquently answering a charge which was not made. No one questioned the probable necessity or utility of this work; there was no criticism, so far as I know, on that point at all. The point of criticism, as the hon. minister well knows, was that the hon. Minister of Public Works was unable to give any information. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) stated specifically the items on which he asked for information, namely, the water service, the drainage service and the heating, and I am sure that my hon. friend will agree that the committee should be put in possession of this information. The hon. Minister of Public Works is pleased to say that he will bring down the information after we have passed the item, and if it is not found to be satisfactory he will consent to a rehearing of the case. Surely my hon. friend would not propose a course of that kind in this House. Where would it end ? He knows that we could not do that kind of thing. He knows that without the consent of the House the case could not be heard again. If the hon. gentleman would give us the information, we would be under no necessity of putting these questions to him. I am going to take the liberty of asking again what is the cost of the heating and the nature of the heating, what is the cost of the drainage service and the character of that drainage, what is the cost of the water service, whether there is a contract with the city of St. John and what is the nature of that contract, how long is that contract to continue and what sum is to be paid. Those are very reasonable questions and it is no severe criticism to ask the Minister of Public Works for the information.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I thought that I had answered the most important of the questions the hon. gentleman put, but I find that the department are a little short in some of the details we should have with regard to this expenditure. The item is somewhat misleading. This $12,000, I understand, was for the purpose of putting in a water pipe under an arrangement with the city. The pipe has to be extended down to tide water, and we agreed to pay two-thirds of the cost on the report of the engineer, our share being some $4,000 out of $6,000. I would prefer having the item stand until I can have an opportunity of sending to the department for further details.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Before the hon. minister leaves St. John harbour, I would take the liberty of drawing his attention to another point. I understand that the Public Works Department is charged with the care of the historical landmarks of the country. At the mouth of the River St. John is old Fort Latour, built in the very early days of the settlement of North America by the Huguenots, and one of the most interesting landmarks of the country. I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways that an appropriation should be made to keep that old fort in a state of preservation. I am sure that the descendants of the old Huguenots, who were the first French colonists in that portion of British North America, will be greatly pleased if the government should do so.

Mr. SPROULE. To how much water is the quarantine station entitled for this $200 a year ? Is any arrangement made for the use of this water for protection against fire ? If the city have the right to sell this water at a high price, we should not pay such a large share of the cost of laying down the main. The city is getting a good return for its disbursements and we ought to know what we are getting for ours.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I find that I have not the report from the engineer in charge at St. John, and would ask that the item be allowed to stand.

Item allowed to stand.

Dominion buildings, $3,000.

Mr. CLANCY. Was that expended last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it is the usual vote for general repairs and the full amount was expended.

Dominion public buildings, maritime provinces, renewals, repairs, &c., $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is the same vote asked for a number of years.

Mr. MONK. That is not sufficient explanation. We are entitled to know every year how the money is to be expended. If we put a new furnace last year in a building, we require to know what we are going to do to that building this year and should have a statement showing how that $12,000 are to be expended.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a general vote for repairs to public buildings throughout the province. It would be quite impossible to tell just what repairs would be required for the coming year, for unforeseen conditions will arise. We can only account for the money that was voted in previous years, and my hon. friend knows that that is given in the fullest detail in the Auditor General's Report. I can give the hon. gentleman the details of expenditure for the past year.

Mr. MONK. I do not require that, so far as I am concerned. But I would like to know how this sum of $12,000 is divided.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that, if the annual vote were too large or too small, the minister would have to explain why he asked for so much, or would be obliged to ask for an increase. For the past year, for instance, I have a list here of repairs running from 75 cents to $800, and applying to twenty or thirty public buildings throughout the province, and amounting in all to about $7,000. That left a balance of $5,000 unexpended. The deputy minister informs me that this $12,000 is about the usual amount required from year to year for the maintenance of the different buildings throughout the province.

Mr. INGRAM. Do these repairs cover furniture ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, we have a separate vote for that. This is only for repairs to the buildings themselves.

Public Works—chargeable to income, public buildings, Quebec—Dominion public buildings—renewals, improvements, repairs, &c., $12,000.

Mr. MONK. Would the hon. minister tell us how this is divided ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a pretty long list, but I will give my hon. friend the expenditure so far this year, which amounts to $11,988.

Mr. MONK. What I wished to know is not how this money was expended last year, but how this estimate is made up—what amount is allotted to the different parts of the province. A board of school commissioners, for instance, will provide a certain amount for repairs at each school. What I want to know, in two words is what is the hon. minister's basis of calculation in making up his estimate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The estimates are not made up in the way suggested by the hon. gentleman. They are made up on the basis of a number of years' experience. Showing what is likely to be required for the repairs of the public buildings in the province. Owing to special causes, much more may be required in one place than in another. For instance, we spent in the Aylmer public building this year, $166 ; in Hochelaga, $404 and in Drummondville, only $8. The committee will easily see that the necessity for repairs arises from causes which cannot be foreseen. The method of the department in the past has been to get the vote which experience has shown to be necessary.

Mr. MONK. If that is the system adopted, I believe this is the only administration throughout the country, the only public body where such a system is followed. The hon. gentleman thinks what has been spent in the past is a guide for what he shall ask in the future. He tells us we have spent $166 on the Aylmer building. I suppose he counts on the same amount next year. Does the hon. minister mean to say that, before this item is made up those in charge of the different buildings are not required to send in an estimate of the repairs that will be necessary ? I venture to say there is not a board of school commissioners, nor municipal body throughout the country where such a plan is not adopted.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman says he has had great experience in school and municipal bodies—

Mr. MONK. I did not say that, but I was speaking of what everybody knows to be their method.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I have had experience in both, and I take issue with the hon. gentleman. Every one can understand that there are certain unforeseen contingencies which involve expense and which must be provided for. In the case of the department, if any repairs are required at the first of the fiscal year, no doubt, reports will have reached the department from the officers in charge of the different buildings. But, suppose a roof leaks, or a pipe bursts, or a door breaks, we cannot know of these things in advance of preparing the estimates. The estimate is made up, I think, in the only business way for places of this kind. We do not expend the money unless it is required. In some cases balances are left over, while, in other cases there is an over expenditure which must be justified and a vote given to cover the amount.

Mr. MONK.

Mr. LENNOX. I entirely disagree with the statement of the hon. minister as to the mode usually adopted by public bodies. Of course, there must be a certain amount provided to cover unforeseen contingencies. But, that we are to be guided entirely by the past, is certainly not a correct system. As has been said, it surely would be expected that the department would ascertain from the parties in charge of the respective buildings what sum each of them would require. A very strange condition of things otherwise would arise. The government is not entitled, as I understand it, to expend the public money unless it is voted by parliament. Unless the information is collected on which to base a careful estimate, we are not in a position to take a fair, business view of what is required within the time the estimates cover.

It may arise that the estimate may be too large, it may just as well arise that it may be too small. Suppose that some of these buildings require extensive repairs, more than have been required for several years, that a large building in some part of the province of Quebec requires reroofing, involving an expenditure of several thousand dollars of this appropriation. Is it a business principle that the department is to close its eyes to this necessary information, and come down here without the first glimmering of knowledge as to what is required in that behalf ? It may well happen that a building which has been used as a public building of the Dominion may be abandoned, or that the repairs have been so extensive that no others may be needed upon it for a long time. I submit that what we are entitled to from year to year is an investigation by the department, and that the result should be placed before us, some general information as to the condition of public buildings and the amount necessary for their repair, judged by their condition at the present time. In addition to that, I admit that provision should be made for contingencies that are unforeseen. We should not discard the past altogether, and judging by the past we can form some opinion of what may be required from year to year. Until we have such an investigation from year to year, and the result laid before parliament, the department is not doing its duty by this Committee or by the people whom we represent.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There is another item where provision is made for repairs. This is simply an item for unforeseen expenses in the various buildings, of which there are 37 or 40 in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman will see that it is not a very large amount, considering the value of the property, and the number of buildings for which this general vote is asked to provide for contingencies. In cases where we know that considerable repairs are required, we ask for another vote and the department give the details for which it is required. Cases do arise, as the hon. gentleman says, every year where unusual damage is done by some heavy storm, for instance, and where the department has to expend more money than has been voted. In such case we account to parliament for the extra expenditure when the House meets again.

Mr. LENNOX. Probably I did not make myself clear to the hon. gentleman, but the item itself is clear. It comes exactly within the lines upon which I addressed myself to the committee. 'Dominion public buildings, renewals, improvements, repairs, etc.' I submit that the Minister of Public Works has not explained away the difficulties that arise in the statement he made that he judged of the necessity of $12,000 by the fact that for several years we have had $12,000 expended.

Grosse Isle--Quarantine station, $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will give the details as furnished by the department in regard to this work. It is carried on in accordance with the estimate submitted by the Department of Agriculture. Disinfector for hospital, $2,000; building for bathrooms, $1,800; building for office of surgeon and vaccinating rooms, with four rooms upstairs for non-contagious cases, $2,600; fixing eighteen doors, $18; wire work over baths, $50; bath pipes, $30; smallpox hospital, $40; ventilation, $75; drain to the hospital for water supply, $300; repairs to disinfecting building, $387; repairs to police headquarters, $872; official quarters, $2,000; hydrants, $180; whitewashing, $800; walks, $795; incidentals, $353. As the Committee knows, a very large expenditure has been made during the past year at this station. I am informed by the deputy minister that this sum is expected to complete these improvements that are being made in the quarantine station.

Mr. SPROULE. If I remember correctly, it is only a few years ago that we made a similar apparatus for disinfecting.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That was for a general building, this is for the hospital.

Mr. LENNOX. Could the minister tell us how much has been expended up to the present time?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry to say the department has not furnished me in this memorandum the total amount expended at this station.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a distinct recollection that for a good many years past we have been spending heavily at Grosse Isle quarantine station, which suggests that the work could not have been mapped out along intelligent lines at first, otherwise we would not require to make these improvements from year to year. We were assured a few years ago that the heavy expenditure then required was intended to complete the building. Every year we have the same answer: This is to complete. But we have no guarantee this will complete. Last year we were asked for $10,000, and this year for $12,000. If I remember right, we needed more than that the year before. However, it appears to be going on and I have listened to items being read out which seem to be very much as they were before even to the laying down of the walk. Here is nearly $2,000 for the official quarters. These quarters must be lavishly furnished and very extensive when $2,000 are required to furnish new quarters there after we have been called upon to make these improvements. I think there is either a reckless expenditure or there is something unbusinesslike in the way the money is spent, because we ought to reach a finality some time and we ought to know what this station will cost.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The $2,000 is for a new building. The only information which I can give to the Committee is that this station was established about 1845. The deputy minister informs me that it had gone very much to wreck and that in 1892 the rehabilitation of the whole establishment was commenced. We have spent, up to the present time, about $200,000. I quite agree with my hon. friend that in laying out a work like this if a full, detailed statement had been given and the expenses known it probably would have been better. The deputy minister informs me that this about completes the work as a quarantine station.

Mr. SPROULE. Who is in charge of the quarantine station now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course, that is in the Agriculture department. Dr. Martineau is at the head of the station locally.

Mr. SPROULE. Dr. Montizambert is at the head of the service.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. The statement is made by the hon. minister that this about completes the work. What other work is there in contemplation that will be done and what is the probable cost of completing it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Chairman, this estimate is based on a request made by the Department of Agriculture. We do not expect any further requests for improvements to be undertaken there. If any are received, they will, of course, be closely scrutinized. In connection with a large station like this there would be from time to time some expenditure required, but I trust that for the present there will be no further improvements of a permanent or substantial character. I visited the station myself last fall and I must say that very great improvements have been made of a very permanent kind and I should think—I can only give the information furnished me by the department—that we should expect no further requests for a large expenditure at this station for some time to come.

Mr. CLANCY. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the $12,000 voted last year had been all expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

L'Assomption—public buildings, $10,000.

Mr. BROCK. I see that last year $5,000 was spent and that this year $10,000 is to be expended. Would the hon. minister tell us what the population of L'Assomption is ? The item says 'public building' but it must be for buildings, because, surely, there would not be an expenditure of $10,000 on one building in a place like this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I regret I could not hear all the hon. gentleman said, but I understand he asked the population ?

Mr. BROCK. Yes, for the population of L'Assomption.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the town of L'Assomption there is a population of 1,665 and in the adjoining parish there is a population of 1,275.

Mr. BROCK. What kind of buildings are those that are being put up ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The building is to be a two and a half storey brick with stone dressings—I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) wants to know what the building is for ?

Mr. BROCK. Yes, what is the purpose of it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a general public building for the post office, &c.

Mr. BROCK. A town hall, or fire station? Surely, it is not for the collection of customs dues in L'Assomption ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Sometimes large customs dues are received in small places. I think, however, this is mostly to be used for a post office.

Mr. BROCK. In a town of 1,600 inhabitants, does it not strike you, Mr. Minister, that $15,000 in two years is a very large sum to spend ? I think there must be some mistake. Are they county buildings ? Is it the county of L'Assomption that this building is to be erected for or is it a village building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Their municipal constitution down there is different from ours in Ontario. It is more for the town and the parish surrounding it that this post office is furnished.

Mr. BROCK. Does the Dominion of Canada, because there is a difference in the municipal organization, supply municipal buildings in Quebec ? Are the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to supply the wealthy province of Quebec with municipal buildings ? I think there must be some mistake ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not say a municipal building, I said a post office. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Brock) is right in insinuating that the province of Quebec has public buildings in small places any more than the province of Ontario has. If there is any rule it has, perhaps, sometimes been violated ; perhaps, occasionally, for some reason or other, we have built public buildings in places where the population and revenue were rather small. The Committee must try and stick to the rule that the revenue and population should be taken into consideration in erecting public buildings. This rule has not been violated any more in Quebec than it has in other provinces.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to ask the hon. minister if a contract for this building has been let, what is the amount of the contract, and what the purpose of the building is.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract has been let and it is for a post office.

Mr. LANCASTER. What is the amount of the contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $10,000.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would like to ask the hon. minister what the revenue of the post office is at L'Assomption. My reason for asking is that I see an item following, No. 119, public building at the village of Alexandria, $17,000. I suppose that also is for a post office. I would like to get an idea whether it is the policy of the government to erect $17,000 post offices in villages throughout the different provinces. We have one in L'Assomption costing $15,000, and one in Alexandria costing $17,000, and I would like to know what the rule is in regard to post offices in villages of that size ? It seems to me that the revenue must be very small in a village the size of L'Assomption or Alexandria. While I am asking the question I would like to ask also whether these buildings are to be used for any other purposes than that of the post office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It would be used for all Dominion purposes : customs, inland revenue or any Dominion service. The general policy of the government has not been changed in this respect from the past. It seems to have been the will of the majority of the House that at least in the chief town of a county there should be a public building erected. Parliament perhaps had not as due regard to revenue as it might have had. In this case the revenue is $942.

Mr. MORIN. The government has certainly not much regard for the revenue received from a town in which they erect a public building. This building will cost more than $10,000, and the population of L'Assomption is 1,605 people. Now, if the government is going to put up a public building in every town of that size which will cost $10,000, where are they going to end ? In my own village we have a court house, a recording office, and a public building, and it is better entitled to a Dominion post office building than is L'Assomption. The government is very extravagant and if they keep on at this rate it must end in failure. I cannot conceive of any other town in the province of Quebec where this expenditure would be so wasted as in the town of L'Assomption.

Mr. BENNETT. When the Liberals were in opposition they prided themselves most on their undying hostility to what they called the plan of endeavouring to purchase constituencies. You yourself, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), being in the Chair, are of course prevented from speaking, but if you had the opportunity I have no doubt that you would denounce this departure from the old time Liberal policy. I am sure that the member for West York (Mr. Campbell) would also vehemently protest against this vote were it not that his appetite has been appeased by a similar grant for one of the towns of his own riding. But there is one gentleman on the opposite benches who does owe it to a constituency in the province of Ontario to move that this item should be struck out, and that gentleman is the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson). There is the town of Owen Sound, which has a revenue of $15,000 compared with $940 in L'Assomption, and Owen Sound has no public building. On a certain memorable occasion when the unkind electorate of South Brant sent the Minister of Customs to seek a haven of rest in North Grey, the town of Owen Sound was kind to him. His supporters promised that Owen Sound would be liberally dealt with in the matter of a post office building. It has a population of 10,000 but it gets no post office, while Alexandria, with a population of 2,000, and L'Assomption, with a population of 1,600, are to have post offices built at the public expense. How ungrateful is the Minister of Customs ? Will he not protest against this vote ? Will he not rise in his place and denounce this invasion of Liberal doctrine which he preached in opposition but which he does not practice in office now. As the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Morin) has asked, where is this principle to end ? Are constituencies to be bribed when they return Liberal supporters, and are they to be punished when they do not ? Alexandria, in a riding represented by a Liberal, gets a post office; Bowmanville represented by a Liberal, gets a public building; Clinton, a small town in a Liberal riding, gets a post office ; Cobourg, where they have already a public building, is to be subsidized with a grant towards an armoury, and Guelph is to have a generous grant also for a public building. I remember that when the present Mr. Justice Lount was a member of this House, he went to North Grey to support the Minister of Customs, and he announced as the policy of the Liberal party that warm justice and cold justice would be dealt out in the future; that the Liberal constituencies would get warm justice and the Conservative constituencies cold justice. Owen Sound took the Minister of Customs in and gave him rest for his weary feet, but where is its reward ? Let it be known to the country that the policy of the Liberal government is that friends will be rewarded and enemies punished. The Minister of Finance got a public building for a small town in his constituency and the Minister of Militia got a similar building for a small town in his constituency. They set the example.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Since the hon. gentleman has referred to a town in my constituency, I may say that a vote was taken under the Conservative government to build a post office in Kentville, situated in the county which I have the honour to represent. It so happens that the county of King's afterward elected me, and next session the Conservative government dropped the appropriation out of the estimates. When the Liberal party came into power we had the post office built.

Mr. BENNETT. If that riding estimates that the real reason for returning a representative is whether or not there should be a little public money spent in it, I am quite willing that should be taken as a gauge of the intelligence of the people. It is not only the initial cost of a building that has to be considered. There must be a caretaker, at a salary of $400; there must be fuel at a cost of $200 or $300 more, and so throughout the ridings that return Liberal supporters this expenditure will go on. If towns like Owen Sound and other important centres have the hardihood to oppose the government then they can rest assured that Mr. Justice Lount's principle of warm justice and cold justice will be their reward. It is not the Minister of Public Works alone who is responsible. The whole government pass these estimates, and the whole government is to blame. I remember on one occasion during a session of the late parliament, a grant was made in the riding of East Peterborough to build a dock on a creek, and the hon. member for that riding, who was a government supporter, defended it on the ground that there had not been any money spent in that riding before. Perhaps these grants may have that same sort of argument to back them up, and nothing else.

Lévis public building, $5,000.

Mr. MONK. What is this sum for?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is towards putting up a public building in the town of Lévis.

Mr. MONK. Has the site been acquired?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. The department has been negotiating with the Department of Railways in the hope that that department may be able to provide a site on land owned by the Dominion. Lévis is a growing place and is entitled to a building.

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend knows that the town of Lévis is almost all situated on the hill, and if the post office is located on a portion of the land belonging to the Railway Department, the people will have to come down from the top of the hill to visit the post office. There must be something wrong here.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. My hon. friend ought to be more frank and explain the matter fully. He knows that those who have business in Lévis come down by the roads leading to the ferry, and therefore the most convenient place for a public building would be in the neighbourhood of the Intercolonial station. The board of trade of the town of Lévis made representations to that effect.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I take issue with my hon. friend, and I would like to see the petitions of the board of trade which represented that the public building of the town of Lévis should be situated at the bottom of the hill. My hon. friend and all others who are familiar with the town of Lévis know that it extends from the brow of the hill very far back, that a large portion of the population live on the brow of the hill, and that only a few stores are below the hill near the Intercolonial station. If my hon. friends says there was a representation from the board of trade of the town of Lévis in favour of such a site, they are in a better position to know than I am; but I would like to see that representation. The public buildings of the town of Lévis, as my hon. friend knows, are on the hill. The town hall is on the hill, and if it is convenient to have the town hall there, it would be convenient to have the post office there also.

Mr. TALBOT. I would ask the hon. member for Montmorency to be kind enough to tell the House where the market of the town of Lévis is—on the top of the hill or below it?

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There are two markets, one below, a very small one, and the larger one on the brow of the hill, near the church.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A deputation from the board of trade of the town of Lévis, in addition to their written request, visited me at my office in Ottawa a short time ago and urged the selection of this site as in their opinion most convenient for the town. There were present Mr. Carrier, the president of the board of trade, and four or five others. That is the reason of the delay.

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend probably knows that Mr. Carrier's store is at the bottom of the hill, and that is the reason he wanted the post office there.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I happened to be present at the time, and this Mr. Carrier is not the merchant at all, but is connected with Carrier, Lane & Co., and a supporter of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. CASGRAIN. His factory is down there also.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. His factory is there, but when he visited the government, he came to make representations on behalf of the people of Lévis.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If my hon. friend says there is a petition from the board of trade, I would be pleased to see it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall be pleased to have a copy of it sent to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MORIN. I do not doubt what the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Justice says; yet it does not look reasonable. They have a post office in Lévis close to the station. Then they have one on the top of the hill, on the main road leading south. Are the people of Lévis going to close their post office on the top of the hill and go down to the bottom of the hill to get their mail? It does not look reasonable at all. In the town of Lévis there are four post offices. There is a post office half a mile from the station, near Mr. Couture's store, and do you mean to say that he and others have signed a petition to have that post office closed and a general post office placed at the bottom of the hill? I have no doubt that some people want a good post office near the station, but the rest of the people know nothing at all about it. I know a good deal about that town, and I would like to see some of the people send another petition here. If the people of Lévis find out that a petition has been sent here, asking for a post office at the foot of the hill, you will have another to the contrary pretty soon.

Mr. LENNOX. I understood the hon. minister to say that the proposal is to get a site on some land belonging to the Intercolonial Railway. That being a government railway, I apprehend that there is not much difficulty in ascertaining quickly whether it will be proper for the Railway Department to part with that land or not. This I find is a revote; the money was appropriated last year. If the ministers are in harmony—of course, we sometimes think they are at loggerheads, and one will not speak to another—how is it that it has not been ascertained up to the present time definitely, whether or not that site is available ? The minister ought to able to tell us what is the difficulty or where the hitch is; so that if we are not going to have that site, we may get another.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will be pleased again to explain to the hon. gentleman. I was asked how this matter stood. The board of trade of Lévis visited Ottawa and made representations to us that this site would be suitable. It turned out that it was on property belonging to the Department of Railways and Canals. We have referred to the chief engineer of railways to know whether or not we can get the land. If we can, it will save considerable expense in the way of securing a site which will be satisfactory to the people.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand that instead of the Intercolonial Railway being in a position to dispose of any land, they are anxious to extend their territory.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They do require more land, but it is represented that at this particular place they could spare the small amount that we require.

Mr. LENNOX. When did the Public Works Department apply to the Railway Department to see if they could get this land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Three weeks ago, when the deputation came up from the town of Lévis.

Montreal examining warehouse—additions and alterations, including fittings, furnishings, &c., $15,000.

Mr. MONK. I see that we spent $15,000 last year on this same building, and this will make $30,000. How did we spend the $15,000 last year, and what is intended to be done with the $15,000 this year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last year we put an additional storey on the annex. The masonry and brickwork cost $5,650; carpentering work, $3,167; plumbing, $400; heating apparatus, $3,800; concreting roof, $1,200; plastering repairs, $525; tile floor, $700.

Mr. MONK. Then you have spent $15,000 adding a story. What is this further expenditure for ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is besides all the remodelling and furnishings inside.

Mr. MONK. Two years ago you spent $10,000 painting, kalsomining and whitewashing and repainting the third story of the customs warehouse. The following year you added another story. You spent nearly $10,000 finishing the inside and then spent $15,000 the following year adding one more story. Why are you now spending another $15,000 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Two thousand dollars are due on the contract for the furnishing and fittings. The passenger elevator will cost $4,000; lighting fixtures, $3,000, and incidentals, $1,000. This will complete.

Mr. MONK. Is all this work done by contract ? I notice that always the same contractors get the work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Every item appears to have been by contract.

Mr. MONK. Were public tenders asked for ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They were not advertised for but a number of contractors were asked to tender.

Mr. MONK. It is a great pity that in Montreal, where we require so much for other improvements, we should spend in three years $40,000 on repairs that, as far as I can judge from the Auditor General's Report and the minister's explanation, appear to have been made wrong side up. We began in 1901-2 completely repairing the customs warehouse, painting, finishing, kalsomining and whitewashing the interior of the building. The following year we tore one-half of the building down in order to put up another story. This year we are going to destroy partly the work we did last year. But what I want particularly to draw attention to is this : This work is done without carrying out the principle of advertising for tenders through the press, and it is always the same men who get the work. Before we vote the $15,000 for next year, we should have the hon. gentleman's assurance that tenders will be called for through the newspapers published in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In small appropriations such as this, the advertising would take up the greater part of it. Divide up this into different items and advertise them in the different newspapers for tenders, and you will find that the cost of advertising would take up a considerable expenditure of the appropriation. We ask for tenders from those who are in the trade, and we get all the tenders we would by public advertising and at much less cost.

Mr. MONK. It is contrary to law that you should undertake a work of $15,000 without advertising for tenders. In the next place, the reason given by the hon. gentleman is surely not serious. All the minister has to do, in order to give the public a chance to compete, is to advertise three or four times in the papers published in Montreal, stating where the specifications can be examined. If he does this he will realize an immense saving. We have expended $40,000 in the examining warehouse in Montreal, and I am sure the work could be done for half the price. For my part I would ask the minister to give his pledge before we vote this $15,000 that tenders will be advertised for in the papers.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have been looking over the items and I see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) is right. I shall be prepared to advertise the work for which this $15,000 is voted.

Mr. BARKER. I think this question of advertising or sending out circulars should be discussed in the House. It appears, from the Auditor General's report that the matter has been under discussion during the past year. The Auditor General has called attention to it and has taken the advice of independent counsel as to how far the government has the right to go. I understand the conclusion arrived at to be that where there are only half a dozen people in a particular trade in the Dominion, as, for instance, builders of railway cars or locomotives, it may be proper for the government to send circulars to these people asking for tenders. There is no object in spending hundreds of dollars in advertising where a few circulars will answer the purpose. But, that where there is a general trade, as, for instance, the building trade, the government has no right under the statute—it would be unlawful—to let contracts without advertising in the press. It seems to me absurd for the minister to say in the case of an item of $15,000 that it will cost more than the item to advertise. It ought to cost but a very little sum. If the advertisements were put in the papers of the city of Montreal, I am sure there would be many builders competing for the contract. I only rise to call attention to the facts, because it seems to be the general practice of the government to do as was done in this case.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I undertake to say that that has not been the general practice since I became the head of the department. In practically every case, even the cases involving small amounts, I have advertised in the papers. But there are special cases to be considered. It is very easy for the hon. gentleman to talk, but one of the items in this case, for instance is an elevator. I believe there are only two elevator manufacturers in the Dominion, both in Toronto. There may be one in Hamilton, though I am not sure.

Mr. MONK. There are two in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, even so—we have a list of the people in the business and would send these specifications and ask for tenders. Could we do any better if we advertised ? If we put the advertisement in one paper, at once there would be a howl that it did not go into all. I have carried out the rule of advertising for tenders to the fullest extent, and I intend to do so, unless there is some change in the Act. But I think the department should have more latitude in these small matters, because of the delay and expense and because the public are not so well served as if we were to apply to the reputable people in the trade for tenders.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) takes the exception I put to be the rule in his department. If you want an elevator it may be proper to send out a circular to the few manufacturers in that line.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This $15,000, as I explained, is made up of small items like that. We have to advertise each separately.

Mr. BARKER. Of course, every extension of a building involves a number of small items.

Mr. MONK. Where there is a large quantity of repairs, as in the present instance, they might be given to one contractor. Or repairs generally might be advertised under specifications which show the details. I believe we spend too much money in advertising for government work. If the law was that repairs, and even more extensive works to be done by the government, should be advertised in such places as the post offices all over the country, people who wish to tender would go there to look for such advertisements and there would be an immense saving. Of course, that is a matter of administration. But where we see the government spending $40,000 to repair the examining warehouse in Montreal, and when we know what a miserable post office we have, one quite inadequate to meet the requirements of the city, we begin to look with a little caution and to wish that greater care should be taken in the expenditure of public money.

Montreal public buildings—improvements, alterations, repairs, &c., $8,000.

Mr. MONK. I would ask the minister if he has given consideration to this city of Montreal post office. I have called attention repeatedly in this House to the condition of this building. We are erecting public buildings in very insignificant places all over the Dominion, and yet, in the city of Montreal we have a post office which is absolutely inadequate to the wants of the city. It is a great deal too small and quite insufficient in many ways. I believe the government has had under consideration for several years a scheme by which additional accommodation might be given in the Montreal post office. The hon. minister, no doubt, is aware that the government pays a very large amount of rent in Montreal. I do not know the amount, but I feel satisfied that it is more than sufficient, if it were capitalized, to give us in Montreal a large post office, where all those government offices now occupying rented premises, could be installed, and where the ministers themselves, when they come to Montreal, would have suitable rooms for the transaction of public business. I do not know if the present minister has given his attention to that subject, but I think some arrangement might be arrived at by which, by spending even less money than is actually spent, we could have a suitable public building in Montreal for the post office and other public buildings as well.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The matter has received some attention since I have been at the head of the department. The Post Office Department have recommended a new system in dealing with the mails in large cities, where they think the service can be more efficiently carried out by the establishment of branch offices. They think that especially in large manufacturing centres it would be better to take the mails from the station, as they do now at Toronto and Montreal, directly to the branch offices. In the city of Montreal it is intended to have a public building at some distance from the present office, which will relieve the congestion in the head office.

Mr. MACLEAN. Regarding public buildings in large cities, I wish to direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that great progress is being made in architecture, and commercial and business reasons now decide the style of architecture rather than outside appearance. Architects will now give you a building that is expressly adapted for the business that you have in view, and I hope that hereafter the department will devote their whole energy, especially in the large cities, in adapting their public buildings to the business they are destined to serve. In Toronto we have a custom house which is a very florid piece of architecture, but is deficient in light. The public have to go up a large staircase in order to do business, there are no elevators, no telephones or anything of that kind. I hope the department will follow the example of the corresponding department in the United States and make their public buildings suited to the purposes, with all modern conveniences, and especially with an abundance of light. These improved buildings are now being erected in all advanced countries. They have got rid of this idea of monuments, and florid architecture, and sculpture, and are putting up purely business buildings where utility is the chief end in view.

Mr. MONK. Can the minister state about what amount the government pays in rents in the city of Montreal ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Public Works Department are not paying rents for all the departments, so we cannot give the information at the present time. But it is an important subject and I am going to have the amounts made up in Montreal and some other cities, and will give them to the Committee.

Mr. BELCOURT. Since the attention of the minister has been drawn to the post offices in Montreal and Toronto, I would like to join the chorus of hon. gentlemen opposite and direct the attention of the minister to the post office in the city of Ottawa. This capital city is growing rapidly, proportionately more so perhaps than any city in Canada. The post office was built many years ago, and for a long time it has contained in addition offices for the customs, the inland revenue and the Ottawa Improvement works. Business is certainly in a very congested state in the Ottawa post office, and when the minister is looking into this question I hope he will not forget the capital. Of all the cities I am acquainted with, Ottawa has the greatest need of additional accommodation.

Mr. PUTTEE. Since attention is being drawn to public buildings in the large cities, I wish to call the attention of the minister to the fact that probably the most urgent case in the Dominion is the post office building in the city of Winnipeg at the present time. This may not be the proper time to speak of that subject on the estimate that is before us, but I would urge the minister to give his attention to Winnipeg, and hope that he will be prepared when the estimates for Manitoba are reached to announce his intentions of providing buildings adequate to the demands of the public services in Winnipeg.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I fully recognize the importance of this question. As the country becomes more prosperous no doubt additional facilities will have to be provided in all the large commercial centres. In regard to Winnipeg, I have had a careful report prepared and will have to ask the House for money to enlarge the building there. The situation in Montreal depends, as I have explained, somewhat on the policy of other departments. I believe it is the intention to build branch offices so as to relieve to some extent the central office. The same remark may be applied to Ottawa. I endorse everything that has been said by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) with regard to architecture. I think if he will look at station 'C' built by the chief architect of the department, he will admit that it is a very decided improvement, and will give better satisfaction to the public than a more expensive building. There is no doubt that as regards the large commercial centres the question of increased accommodation will have to be met, and at a later stage I will have to submit some particulars to the House, and perhaps ask for a vote of money for this purpose.

Mr. MACLEAN. So far as I can gather, this new system of distributing the work of the post office and centreing it around the railway stations instead of taking it all to one building, is in the right direction. It will facilitate the handling of the mails and correspondence and, considered in its purely business aspect, the system cannot be expanded too soon. I am glad to hear the minister say that hereafter he will have the commercial and business aspect more in view in erecting or enlarging public buildings.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works if I heard him correctly when he put the question whether there were elevator works at Hamilton. I desire to tell him that the largest elevator works in Canada are established at Hamilton.

Mr. THOMSON (North Grey). May I ask the hon. Minister of Public Works, when he is looking up the amount that is paid for public buildings in Montreal and Toronto, to procure similar information concerning the town of Owen Sound.

St. Hyacinthe—public building—addition to, &c., $12,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to ask the hon. minister for some explanation in regard to the public building in St. Hyacinthe. There was $12,000 spent last year, or rather $12,000 voted last year and $12,000 is asked for this year. I would like to ask the hon. minister if the $12,000 voted last year was expended or is this a revote? What are these additions which are to be made to the public building at St. Hyacinthe?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is a revote.

Mr. LENNOX. It does not say so.

Mr. MONK. No, it is not a revote.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It should state so. The deputy minister informs me that this sum was voted last year and that none of it was spent, and that this is a revote of the same amount to be expended upon addition to the building there to provide for the excise.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What is the public building for in St. Hyacinthe? I suppose there is a post office?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There was a building erected in St. Hyacinthe, if I remember well, about 15 years ago, which has been used for the post office and customs house. About three years ago the division of St. Hyacinthe was enlarged. The excise service is in the same building and there are two or three rooms occupied by the gas and electric inspection service. The building is not sufficient to accommodate all the services. The revenue has increased; it has doubled, or trebled, and a new building is going to be erected next to the present post office.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is a very satisfactory explanation, but what I would like to know is why it was that the work was not begun last year. Can the hon. gentleman give a reason for that?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There was delay in procuring the site as there was some difficulty in the Department of Justice about the title. The matter was just settled two weeks ago.

Mr. CASGRAIN. From whom was the property purchased?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The first intention was to make an addition to the old building, but as the site was not found convenient the Department of Public Works thought it proper to buy another piece of land. The property was owned by Jule Laframboise, or rather by his wife, formerly Miss Buckley.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. LENNOX. Has the item been amended?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no amendment necessary.

Mr. LENNOX. I submit there would require to be an amendment. The item appears as if $12,000 had been voted last year and that $12,000 is being voted again for the year 1903-4. If it is a revote it should appear in the first column and the item would require to be amended so that it will appear that we are only revoting that amount and not adding $12,000 to the vote of last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was perfectly correct in stating the amount voted last year, but I am mistaken in saying that this is a revote of the same amount. Four thousand dollars has been paid for the site and the chief architect says that the cost of the building will be about $15,000 or $16,000. This would leave the balance of the $12,000 after paying for the site and $12,000 additional.

Mr. LENNOX. Do I understand that we are to pay $12,000 in all or $24,000 in all for this building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $24,000 in all.

Mr. MONK. Will that finish the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That will complete the work.

Thetford Mines—public building, $8,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. May I ask the hon. minister what kind of a public building he is putting up at Thetford Mines ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The total cost is estimated by the chief architect to be about $10,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. May I ask what kind of a public building the government is erecting at Thetford Mines ? Is this a post office, custom house, or excise office or is it a mint ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is used for a post office and custom house.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I want to call your attention to the fact that the population of Thetford Mines, according to the last census, is 1,605. Yet, you are spending $8,000 for a public building in that locality. I know that there is Thetford North and Thetford South but the population of Thetford South is only 600. Thetford Mines is in Thetford North and the population is only 1,600. In a place of this importance are we going to erect a public building which will cost $12,000 ? I cannot see what you are going to put in the post office or the custom house.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am pleased to say that the revenue warrants this very much more than some that have been voted. The postal revenue is $2,405, and the customs duties are $3,544, so that the revenue is very good.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether a site has been acquired ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, the deputy informs me that a site has been procured.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. How much has been paid ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $1,900.

Mr. SPROULE. From whom was the site acquired ? Was it given by the village, or the town, or bought outright by the government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site was purchased from King Bros. of Quebec for $1,900.

Mr. SPROULE. How much land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. 50 x 100 feet.

Mr. BOYD. The hon. minister gave as a reason for the expenditure in Thetford Mines that there was an income of $2,405 from the post office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And a customs revenue of $3,544.

Mr. BOYD. And you are spending something like $12,000 in that place.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $10,000.

Mr. BOYD. For the whole province of Manitoba the estimates only include $5,000. I will read to the minister a few of the towns in Manitoba and the North-west which are left out in the cold, because the members who represent these constituencies seem to be backward in drawing the attention of the government to the post office revenue derived from them. Boissevan, a growing town, has a post office revenue of $2,651, but we don't hear the member who represents it asking for a post office in that town.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is he ?

Mr. BOYD. The Minister of the Interior; he is away. Take the town of Carman, in the county of Lisgar, which has a post office revenue of $3,440, and we are spending nothing there, and the member for Selkirk (Mr. Stewart) does not protest. The town of Deloraine, also in the constituency of the Minister of the Interior, has a revenue of $2,281, and there is no expenditure there. There is the town of Carberry, with a revenue of $3,335, and there is no expenditure there. There is the town of Neepawa, with a revenue of $4,135 and no expenditure ; the town of Selkirk, represented by that stalwart gentleman (Mr. McCreary) has a revenue of $2,193, and there is no expenditure there. The town of Souris, with a revenue of $2,728; the town of Virden with a post office revenue of $2,926, and also a large revenue from customs, is to have no expenditure. Then we come to Edmonton, in a constituency represented by a supporter of the government; its revenue is $6,039 from the post office, and there is no expenditure in that growing place. It is the same in the town of Lethbridge, which has a revenue of $4,524. The town of Moosejaw, that can scarcely accommodate the immigration flowing in there at the present time, has a post office revenue of $4,427. It is represented by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott), and we do not hear a protest from that gentleman because there is no expenditure in that town. It is most unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that I have to get up to speak of these things. Surely, in the great province of Manitoba and in the North-west Territories, towards which the eyes of the world are directed now, $5,000 is not sufficient for public buildings, when the little town of L'Assomption with a post office revenue of $465 is to have $10,000 spent on a public building. The town of Prince Albert, represented by another stalwart supporter of the government (Mr. Davis) is to have no expenditure made there. Why do we not hear from him ?

Mr. BENNETT. He is building railways.

Mr. BOYD. The town of Yorkton has a revenue of $2,410 and there is no government expenditure there. I could continue to point out, Mr. Chairman, that there are twenty-three post offices in Manitoba with a revenue of from $1,000 to $2,000, and fourteen towns in the North-west Territories with a revenue running from $1,000 to $2,000 that I have said nothing about.

Mr. BENNETT. You throw them in.

Mr. BOYD. We will make a job lot of them. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the Minister of Public Works, who is a particularly good friend of mine, will admit, that it is most unfortunate that I should be compelled to become the champion of these towns in view of the fact that they are represented by stalwart and outspoken Liberals, who are usually here to speak for themselves if not too embarrassing to the government. I trust that when I come here next year I will not have to accuse the Minister of Public Works of neglecting these growing towns.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Mr. Boyd) has referred to the small vote for incidental and unforeseen expenses in the province of Manitoba. Now as a matter of fact there is $12,000 voted for Quebec and Ontario, $12,000 for the maritime provinces, and I think the committee will agree with me that considering the number of buildings in Manitoba the vote of $5,000 is comparatively large. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyd) that the department over which I preside could not think of putting up small buildings in the towns he has referred to. In view of the great progress and prosperity of that country, I have no doubt that in a short time they will require very much larger buildings than we would be able to give them at present. They will have due consideration when the time comes.

Valleyfield public buildings, $15,000.

Mr. MONK. How long is it since this building was determined upon ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is two or three years since this vote was first taken.

Mr. MONK. Is there any correspondence between the local authorities and the department with regard to the selection of the site.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The deputy minister says that he does not remember of any.

Mr. MONK. Perhaps the ex-Minister of Public Works could give the information.

Mr. BOYD.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I know Valleyfield very well and before determining on the site I paid a visit to the town. There was practically only one site available. There were other pieces of ground but they were not fit for such a building. The population of Valleyfield is to-day about 15,000, and if things go on as they have been going on within five years it will be a city.

Mr. MACLEAN. Provided the tariff is alright.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Well, it is to a large extent due to the fact that the tariff on cotton has been kept all right. I may say that I am responsible for the choice of the site.

Mr. MONK. When was the site decided upon by the department ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I paid a visit to the place with one of my officers, and chose the site without telling anybody. I then instructed Mr. Dandurand, who is the agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway for land purchases, to purchase the site. Let me say immediately that the site formerly belonged to the sitting member, but it was not bought from him. It was the only site available for a public building there, all other available sites having been bought in the rush of business. I instructed Mr. Dandurand not to say a word to the sitting member, but to take an option on the site. It had been sold previously by the sitting member to a man named Johnston, if I remember rightly. Mr. Dandurand took every possible precaution to secure the site at a reasonable price.

Mr. SPROULE. What price did he pay ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I do not remember exactly ; I lost sight of the transaction. But it was conducted all through by one of the ablest real estate agents in Montreal, and I think everything was done uprightly.

Mr. MONK. When did Mr. Dandurand close this transaction ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I think it was closed after I left office. But I gave instructions and was responsible.

Mr. MONK. The hon. minister might tell us at what date the transaction was closed ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Order in Council was passed on the 22nd of November, 1902, authorizing the purchase from R. B. Johnston for the sum of $10,000. The land is 77½ feet by 160 feet deep.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The Bank of Hochelaga has bought a property there which is not worth half as much as this property and has paid a great deal more. I know we have made a good bargain.

Mr. MACLEAN. Speaking of this question of sites, I would like to throw out this suggestion. If the policy is to be continued of giving public buildings to all these small places, at least put the onus upon them of supplying the sites. That will be a buffer between the government and the demand of these small places for public buildings. I believe it would often have the effect of preventing their construction ; and in cases where it did not, the country would at least be saved the cost of the site.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Who is this R.W. Johnston ? Is he in the employ of the government.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He certainly is not in the employ of the Public Works Department. I am not acquainted with him.

Mr. MONK. When was the money paid ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was paid on the joint order of the agent of the government at Valleyfield and Mr. R. B. Johnston.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Is it R. B. Johnston or R. W. Johnston ? In the answer given by the minister the other day it was R. W.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The memorandum of the deputy says R. B. Johnston.

Mr. MONK. When was the money paid ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The date of the cheque is not stated here. There was some delay in the Department of Justice after the Order in Council was passed ; but so far as the deputy minister can remember, it was about the end of January.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I instructed Mr. Dandurand to secure the site without the knowledge of the sitting member. I suppose Mr. Dandurand arranged with Mr. Johnston so that he might purchase the site from Mr. Loy without Mr. Loy knowing that it was being purchased for the government. Mr. Dandurand did not let anybody know for whom the site was purchased. All who know Valleyfield know that my hon. friend could have sold the site at a greater price than we paid. Property is going up there by leaps and bounds.

MOTION AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

Copies of all correspondence, &c., between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Town Council of the town of North Sydney, or any other person or persons, respecting the right of way and construction of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from North Sydney Junction to North Sydney.—Mr. Johnson (Cape Breton).

CORRESPONDENCE, RE NEW TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Hon. J. ISRAEL TARTE (Montreal, St. Mary's) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or Mr. C. M. Hays, per William Wainwright, or any other person, in relation to a new transcontinental railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I would ask my hon. friend not to press that motion at this stage of the session. Communications chiefly verbal have taken place between the government and the parties representing the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, but no definite conclusions of any kind have been arrived at. Matters are still under discussion. So it would be quite impracticable for us to bring down any correspondence. until a later stage, which we will be glad to do during the present session.

Mr. EARLE.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I will accede to the request made by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and will not press the motion now.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). A public policy with regard to this proposition was announced yesterday in Toronto, therefore I think the correspondence is ready and should be brought down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will invite the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. With the consent of the House, I will withdraw it if the hon. gentleman says it is in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Until we have the promise of a ministerial statement on that question, I object to the withdrawal.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The matter will be fully dealt with at a later stage of the session. We shall make a ministerial statement on this question.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We should have it pretty early. I suppose a later stage will mean within one month.

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not say that, because we will have to come to a conclusion upon the application. At all events, in due time the whole thing will be brought before the House.

Mr. MACLEAN. The practice heretofore has been to bring down these railway subsidies at the tail end of the session, and I object to that. They ought to be brought down early in the session, and if there is a government policy on the subject, without correspondence, the House ought to be put in possession of it. The complaint was raised here yesterday that we do not get public papers in this House unless we ask for them. It was shown in connection with the colonial conference that the papers were immediately presented in the British parliament, but so far the only access we have had to those papers has been through reports coming from the old country. I take this occasion to say that the government are lax in bringing down those papers, and I hope they will improve.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Until any correspondence that has taken place is ready for submission to the House, it would be unreasonable to ask that it should be brought down.

Motion withdrawn.

SOUTH SHORE RAILWAY.

Hon. J. I. TARTE (St. Mary's, Montreal) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the government, or any department, and the officers or managers of the South Shore Railway, during the last twelve months. Also, copies of all representations that may have been made to the government in reference to the working of that road.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I present this motion in order to call the attention of the House and especially the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) to the very unsatisfactory state of affairs which we all know in Montreal and in the South Shore district. The South Shore Railway Company has received, I suppose, about $1,000,000 in subsidies. I do not think I am very far from the truth in giving that figure. Still, the government do not seem to have any means of obliging the present owners of the road to work it in any satisfactory way. The road is worked to-day just to keep it alive. There is no service. I know as a matter of fact that there is nothing that can be called a railway service. This is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs and I would beg to call the special attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to what is taking place now. The road passed, last year, into the hands of foreign capitalists—so-called foreign capitalists—who came before the House and the Railway Committee of the House with big projects. Well, they went to the wall very shortly afterwards in New York. The same men to-day hold the road. God only knows what took place in reference to the South Shore Railway. The number of deals that have taken place in reference to that road are unknown. However, this is not the time to discuss questions of that kind ; I only want to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals once more to the state of affairs that is existing now and I hope he will find means to put an end to.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Mr. Speaker, before the motion is carried I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to the very unsatisfactory state in which the railway law is in regard to an insolvent railway company. I know for a fact that what the hon. member for St. Mary's, Montreal (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has just said in reference to this railway is absolutely true because I have had occasion to represent some of the parties who are interested in that company. Now, when a claim is urged against a railway company of this kind there is nothing in the law by which a creditor can have his claim recognized and recover under the statute. It is true that in the province of Quebec some years ago legislation was introduced granting the power to a creditor, or to the government, if the government had given a subsidy to the railway, to sequestrate the road, or to put it in the hands of a sequestrator, who, in another province, would, I suppose, be called a receiver who could operate the road for the advantage of all concerned. But, the difficulty was encountered that when the road had been declared a road for the general advantage of Canada, it was a question whether the statutes of the province of Quebec could apply to such a road. The constitutional question was raised in the case of the Hon. Mr. Nantel against the Baie de Chaleur Railway Company. Some of the courts of Quebec decided that the law as passed by the provincial legislature was not only constitutional but that it also applied to a railway which had been declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. The question was raised whether this decision was a sound one and it was taken to the Supreme Court. Unfortunately for those who are seeking an authoritative decision upon the point the Supreme Court did not pronounce because of some understanding between the governments, or the parties ; at all events, the question was withdrawn and it was not submitted to a judicial decision. I do not see, myself, why the Winding Up Act should not be applied to railway companies just the same as to any other companies. If it were there would be, as in the case which is now before the House, a very speedy remedy for those creditors who have claims against railways and who cannot enforce them in the present state of the law.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker, proceedings upder the Winding Up Act must necessarily be very complicated but if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) will refer to the statutes of 1899 he will see an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act which provides for these cases. I will point out the Act to him. It is 62-63 Vic., cap. 44. I think that Act will meet the case in hand now. I have had some opportunity of considering the question recently and my own view would be that if this does not quite meet the case we might amend it so as to make it applicable to the case in hand. But, I think the Act goes far enough.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have looked into that Act and I have tried to make it apply to questions arising just as this one has arisen to which I have called the attention of the House, but I do not think it is workable under such circumstances.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any objection whatever to the passing of this motion. I may say in regard to what my right hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has stated that, to-day, there is an engineer on behalf of the government making an inspection of that road.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The road is not safe, I understand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) called my attention the other day to the unsafe condition of the road, as it was represented to him, or as it was known to him and I immediately gave instructions and an engineer is now on the spot. In regard to what the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has said I would say that it is not by any means an easy matter to legislate practically in the direction which he suggests. In 1899 we had the subject up and threshed out and I think the very best experience and knowledge in the House was brought to bear on the question. In view of the difficulties which have occurred and which the hon. member for Montmorency has mentioned, the judgment of the Superior Court of Quebec was found to be such as to leave the law in quite an ineffective condition. The subject was brought up here, a Bill was introduced and it was amended, altered and changed so that it was then thought that possibly it would cover the particular case which has been mentioned. I understand now that it has been found the case was not sufficiently covered. I will be very glad to co-operate with my hon. friend to any extent in my power to remedy the existing law but I fear that owing to the conflict of legislative authority he will find it a somewhat difficult question to handle.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH-EASTERN VALLEY AND UNITED COUNTIES RAILWAYS.

Hon. J. I. TARTE (Montreal, St. Mary's) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence received by the government, and of all answers made thereto, concerning the South Eastern Valley Railway, and the United Counties Railway. Also, copies of all reports that may have been made regarding the actual condition of such railways.

He said : The South-eastern Valley Railway which runs from Iberville to Sorel is at the present time closed up and is not being operated. It goes through a very important section of our country and it is a great pity indeed that such a thing can happen as the closing of this railway. This road has been heavily subsidized both by this parliament and by the provincial parliament, and it would now appear that neither parliament has any remedy at its command or can interfere in the matter. The road is closed. Perhaps there is a lesson to be learned from the existing state of affairs on that railway. We are bonusing railways right and left, but when there is an emergency we have no control over that. I repeat that this road is closed to the great detriment of the trade of that part of the country and to the great detriment of the farming community. I am not aware whether the Minister of Railways has tried to do anything in the matter. The South-eastern Valley Railway is in the same hands as the South Shore Railway. These people have no money and no backing, but still they find ways and means to hold properties of that magnitude, and apparently we are powerless to interfere with them. It seems to me that such a state of affairs calls for the serious attention of this House, and it is to achieve that end that I have made this motion.

Mr. VICTOR GEOFFRION (Chambly and Vercheres). I am glad that my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has come to my support in the motion which I made a few days ago. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House when I spoke of the question, but at any rate he has practically repeated what I said.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I want the papers.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Yes, I say that I am glad that you have arrived at the same conclusion as I have on the question. I stated to the House, that especially the South Shore Railway was in very bad shape. The hon. member (Hon. Mr. Tarte), says we have no remedy. I think we have. I think the railway law is quite clear on the subject. If the Minister of Railways is at any time informed that the road is not properly managed, or that it is dangerous to travel over the road, it is his duty to send one of his officers to inspect the road and make a report, and on that report the minister has the right either to force them to put the road in order or to close up the road. When the road is closed, then any creditor, or any person interested can ask to have the road put into the hands of a sequestrator and administered in the public interest and in the interest of the creditors. So far as that part of the road which traverses my county is concerned, I have already taken steps to see that if it is not put in proper condition it shall be closed, and I shall then apply to the courts for the appointment of a sequestrator to administer the road in the public interest and for the benefit of the creditors. I am informed by the Minister of Railways that already there is an officer of the department on the road making that inspection. When the report is made we will take means to have the road properly managed if the company itself does not want to take action. I cannot speak from personal knowledge of the other roads mentioned by my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) because I have not made a study of them as he has, but I repeat again, that in reference to the South Shore Railway we have already taken action, and as soon as I am informed that there is danger on the road, I will take the proper means, and the only means to have the remedy applied.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I may say to my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte), that as a matter of fact there is no correspondence whatever in the department of at all recent date; the only correspondence we have, took place at the time of the granting of the subsidy and refers exclusively to that subject. There is no manner of doubt but that the condition which the hon. gentleman refers to is a serious one, but I question whether, even if there had been correspondence it would have tended to assist us in solving the difficulty which exists. The road is not being run—not as I understand it because it is unsafe to run it; it is not that the road is not in a fit condition, but it is that nobody connected with it in any way finds it to his interest or advantage to keep the road in operation. That is the real reason I apprehend why it is not operated. It is not because legal difficulties have occurred which we might legislate away. I do not understand that to be the cause; but it is simply that in granting the subsidy in aid of this road, parliament has not given assistance to an undertaking of sufficient merit in itself to justify its construction. That is apparently the difficulty. It is not only in this particular locality that we have cases of that kind occurring. I am happy to say there are not a great many roads in the same condition, but there are others. Now and then a road is closed down; business has fallen away; nobody will be responsible for the wages; the men leave the employment of the road, and the road stops. There is no remedy, as it appears to me. If anybody can suggest a remedy he will possess a great deal more ingenuity than I possess. What I mean to say is that there is no practical remedy. It cannot be suggested that the government would assume the responsibility of bearing the cost of running the roads that are thus unprofitable to companies. That cannot be done. Now, what is the remedy? If my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) can suggest any remedy, I think he would find a ready disposition on all sides to give to his proposal every possible consideration. Unfortunately it is the case that such roads do now and then stop until something occurs to revive business or to encourage some one to take them up. I again say that there is no correspondence in the department except with reference to the subsidies, and if the hon. gentleman would like to have that I will be glad to furnish it.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Let me say at once that the minister is altogether wrong in his supposition that the South Shore and the Eastern Valley Railways are going through a country where the trade is insufficient to maintain them. That impression is altogether wrong. This railway runs through a fertile and wealthy country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then, why is it not done?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. My hon. friend has just asked me if I have a suggestion to offer. I think the suggestion which would naturally present itself to any government would be to see first that the subsidies are properly applied. If the subsidies are diverted from their proper use, those who build the road and those who exploit it afterwards are short of funds. I do not mean to make any insinuation. I only state what I believe is in the mind of any public man of experience; and in these two cases I do not hesitate to say that it is within the knowledge of those who know anything of affairs in the province of Quebec, that the subsidies have not been properly applied from the start. When this parliament votes money the government should see that the money is applied for the purposes for which it has been voted. If that had been done in this case, I firmly believe that the road would have been to-day in full working order. The reason the road is not working is not because there is no trade, but it is because the road has fallen into the hands of people whom I may call schemers, speaking without any offence to them at all—men who have no money. Could not this be prevented? Is it not possible, when this parliament votes hundreds and thousands of dollars by way of subsidies to any railway, to provide that the road shall not change hands without the government being informed, or being in a position to prevent it falling into the hands of people who have no money to exploit it? I call the attention of the House to the position of these two railroads. In both cases large parts of the subsidies voted by this parliament and by the Quebec legislature have not been employed as they should have been. Nor are these the only cases. I might refer to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, about which we had a great deal of trouble, and for just the same reason. I do not make any party reference, because that railway was built under the Conservative regime. This is no party question; it is a question of public policy. This House should not vote any more railway subsidies without taking the means to see that those subsidies are properly applied.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question? I understand that this road is not now running and has not been for some little time. Is my hon. friend's object to have this road run? It has not been built in my time, so far as my memory serves me. Suppose there is something we could do in the future to see that the subsidies granted, if any are granted, shall find their way exclusively into the construction of the road. Is that going to help towards getting the present South-eastern Valley Railway into operation?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Is the whole of this road not operating or only a portion of it?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. The whole road from Iberville to Sorel is not running and has been closed for two months. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways asks what we can do in this case. I do not say that I can make that road run. It is not for me to make it run. I am a private member of the House. The government of the country are responsible for the conduct of public affairs. I do not know whether there is any law under which the Department of Railways and Canals could interfere. I am not prepared to argue that point at all. All I know is that it is within the knowledge of all the members from the district of Montreal that this road is of great importance, and that the subsidy has been misapplied. If I call the attention of parliament to the matter, it is to prevent future mistakes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Let me ask my hon. friend one more question. Is he aware whether or not the people who own this road are financially strong and responsible ?

Hon. Mr. TARTE. My hon. friend can judge of their financial standing. They are the same people who came before the Railway Committee last year headed by Mr. Meyer. They failed in New York and they have failed here. These are the same group of men who are fighting to-day over the ownership of the South Shore Railway and the South-eastern Valley Railway. There are all kinds of complications into which I do not mean to enter at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not sure, if the people who own the road were financially responsible and could be made to answer to any judicial tribunal in damages, whether or not, under the contract of subsidy, they could be held under an obligation to operate the road, or else have the road taken from them, and be made subject to damages besides. I am not sure as to that. But if they are not financially responsible, it is perfectly clear that there would be no remedy whatever in such a case as my hon. friend states.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, enough has come out of this debate to establish two things : that not only is there a responsibility on the government to try to compel the owners of this road to operate it and serve the public, but there is also a responsibility on the government to take steps that hereafter such things will not recur. I believe that a large part of the subsidies voted to railways in the past have not been applied to railways, but have been exploited by men who have become rich by those means. The whole tendency of legislation in this country is in that direction. We grant franchises, powers, subsidies of money and land, and we do not make provision for performance or against malversation of funds; and it is high time that he had in this country legislation of that kind. We have an ex-minister of the Crown saying now that our policy in the past has been wrong, and ought to be corrected. He is saying that to old friends of his; and that being the case, I hope there will be an improvement this session; and if any money is granted, though I do not wish to see any granted, I hope steps will be taken to protect the public, and when franchises are given, we shall take some kind of contract for performance. We have given banks great powers and privileges, but have never taken the means to compel them to serve the public. Nor have we done so in the case of railway companies or telephone or telegraph companies. Until recently the banks did not think it was incumbent upon them to try and serve the public, and for many a day, when asked to establish agencies here and there, they said that they were not in that business and there was no way of compelling them to do so, so that many towns had to do without banking facilities. To-day, however, that trouble has disappeared because the banks happened to be competing for business. But what I contend for is this, that when we give these franchises, we should take some means of compelling these people to carry out their obligations and serve the public and not allow them to divert the funds supplied by the public into the hands of private parties.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I am told that on those roads there are several dozen cars loaded with perishable freight. This is a very lamentable state of affairs.

The PRIME MINISTER. No doubt a most lamentable condition of things exists in that section. The road has been closed for perhaps six weeks, but I will call the attention of my hon. friend from St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte) to the fact that though it is a matter of notoriety that this road has been closed five or six weeks, this is the first information we have of the fact. The road traverses a very fertile section of country, quite capable of supporting a railway. No doubt the law is imperfect and should be amended in some way so that precautions may be taken, when we are giving assistance to railway construction, to obtain some assurance that not only the road will be constructed but that it will be operated.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Gaspé). I am informed by a letter received from Quebec this morning, that the Quebec government has taken an action in this connection, and a petition is to be presented to-day or to-morrow to the Superior Court at Montreal, to have a sequestrator appointed.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). This discussion, Mr. Speaker, affects much more than simply the road under consideration. Session after session we vote large subsidies to railways. Session after session we take money in this way out of the public treasury and put it into private hands. The ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has told us that he knows, and all the members in the district in question know, that the subsidies have been diverted, misapplied and wrongly used in the case of these two roads. There is, Sir, a deep seated suspicion in the public mind that the whole subsidy system is rotten. It comes from rottenness and it makes for rottenness, and it seems to me that when a matter of this kind is brought up by a member of this House, an ex-minister, one who was but recently in the cabinet, the government are in duty bound to give it their special attention. What has been said this afternoon should be made the subject of strict inquiry, and I hope the matter will not be passed over.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I have always thought that one of the great evils is the unlimited power we give companies to bond and to mortgage their roads. A subsidy is in some cases misapplied and not put into the road, sufficient care is not taken to see that every dollar of subsidy goes into the road, and the consequence is that with these additional obligations resting on it, no corporation can afford to buy the road out. Its debt is so heavy that its earning powers will never pay the interest on the money invested, and the road consequently cannot be operated at a profit. If we are to start at the root of the evil, we must be more circumspect in giving powers to bond roads, and we should also see that these bonds are sold at par, and that every dollar arising from the sale of the bonds and every dollar of subsidy should be spent on construction and not diverted into the hands of unscrupulous people, who care not what will be the result to the public provided they can only get their hands on the public money.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). When were the subsidies paid these two roads? It was rather surprising to hear the Prime Minister declare that although those railways have suspended operations during the past six weeks, the matter has not been officially before the government. When were the subsidies paid these two lines?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). Before my entry into the department. I do not recollect that these contracts were made during my day. I think they were not, but perhaps the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) will recollect. I think the dates were 1892, 1893 and 1894. I may say further that when these subsidy contracts are entered into, the contractor is required to complete his work up to a certain standard; and when he does that, he gets his subsidy. It might be that, under some conditions, he would be paid by ten mile sections upon progress estimates, but always with the necessary guarantee that the work should be completed before the subsidy is fully paid. When the contractor has completed the road and earned his subsidy, it would be extremely difficult for us to impose on him some further check as regards what he does with the money. It may be that he got advances from the bank. Certainly the money must have come from somewhere to build the road, but when the contractor has complied with his contract there is no alternative with us but to pay. I think that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has laid his finger upon the source of the difficulty. It is the issue of stock and bonds in unlimited quantities and the distribution of this stock and the sale of these bonds at nominal figures, and not at all because the money given by way of subsidies does not go into the road.

Mr. MONK. I asked the question because I was under the impression and still am—that some subsidy was paid to the South Shore Railway within the last five years.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was not speaking of the South Shore. This motion has reference to the South-eastern Valley.

Mr. MONK. I am speaking of the South Shore, and of a bridge in connection with that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman meant that, he is right.

Mr. MONK. Because the rumours referred to, as to much of these subsidies having been frittered away, have been rife in the city of Montreal and throughout these districts for the past five years, and I think there must have been payments made during that time. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) that it is high time the House should take some steps to investigate the manner in which these subsidies have been paid and disposed of.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The manner in which subsidies were paid when I was at the head of the department was this—after the vote was granted by parliament the money was paid when the road was completed in ten mile sections. These conditions, if I remember well are now altered. The rule, I believe, allows the minister to make advances on progress estimates in many cases.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. In some cases, I think.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is one condition in which progress estimates are paid, and it was done as the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) will remember in order to cover the case of large expenditures being made in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass. It made a limit of $60,000 to be paid on progress estimates.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I thought the payment of progress estimates had been applied to other roads. Under the old rule, upon the report of the officer of the department being made that a ten mile section of the road had been completed, a payment on account of subsidy was paid. If I remember well, a part of this Great Eastern Railway was let to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they ran that part of it from Iberville to the St. Lawrence, but abandoned that portion which ran to Sorel, doing so on account of the fall of a bridge somewhere on the road. It being run for some time, there was a vote, and I think the money was paid since the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Blair) became Minister of Railways.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Haggart) is mistaken. There are two roads. One is over the Yamaska River Valley and the other over the Richelieu River Valley. The hon. gentleman is speaking of the South-eastern Valley Railway, which runs from Iberville to Sorel.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understood that either on the South Shore or the South-eastern there was a vote for a bridge since the present Minister of Railways took office.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. For the South Shore—yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. And the payment has been made since the hon. gentleman come into office. However, I agree with the Minister of Railways; I do not see what possible remedy there is when a road is built, and the owners do not find it in their interests to run the road——

Hon. Mr. TARTE. Will the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) allow me one moment?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. In the case of the South-eastern Valley, that part of the road has been amalgamated with the Rutland Railway, an American concern. I am informed by a member of the House who is on the spot that he has learned on good authority that the earnings of the South-eastern Valley and the South Shore Railway are sent up to the Rutland Company, instead of being used in working the road. That is a very serious state of affairs, and surely it ought to be possible to put a stop to it.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is the point I was trying to work out. I had an idea that a portion of this road was valuable and that it had been amalgamated with some other. I thought it had been taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway and part of it abandoned by them. It appears, however, that it was the Rutland road. There is a remedy in that case. Where only a part of a road subsidized is taken over by another, that part being valuable, it might be made a condition that, in order to secure a portion, they must work the whole undertaking, unless they get authority from the parliament to abandon a portion. But where a whole road is abandoned, as the hon. Minister of Railways says, I do not see that there is any remedy for it. I do not see what action the government could take or what law could be passed to prevent a difficulty of that kind. But what interests me particularly about it is that this was one of the grand schemes in connection with the Meyers syndicate. They must have some monetary connections in this country, some capitalists who are interested, and who have at least a part ownership in the stock and bonds of the road. It would be very interesting to the House to know who these capitalists are and whether their connection with this concern makes it likely that, some way or other, the undertaking will be put upon a good financial basis. Perhaps the ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) would be kind enough to inform us who are the capitalists on this side of the line interested in this undertaking.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I do not know of any Canadian capitalists interested in the South Shore with Mr. Hodge and his partners. Of course, there are creditors of the two roads, large sums of money due. But Mr. Hodge and his partners or his principals—I do not know whether he has any partners with him—have managed to get possession of the South-eastern Valley Railway, the United Counties Railway and the South Shore Railway. There were two groups of men interested. They have amalgamated, as the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) will remember. But the two sides are fighting as to the way they have amalgamated. Now the South-eastern Valley Railway is detached from the South Shore Railway and attached to the Rutland Railway. I say again I am informed by a member of parliament, who is not well enough to stand up here and say what he would like to say, that he has it on good authority that the earnings of the Canadian mileage are being sent to the American concern; yet the creditors are not paid, the road is not being worked, and the population are really suffering for lack of railway service. It seems to me that the House can find a remedy for such a state of affairs. The earnings of a Canadian railway should not be allowed to go to keep alive an American railway. If the state of affairs I refer to is true—and I believe there is no doubt about that—something should be done.

Mr. CHARLES H. PARMELEE (Shefford). I do not think my hon. friend from St. Mary's division (Hon. Mr. Tarte) is quite correct, though he is in absolute good faith in the statements he has made. So far as regards the South-eastern Valley Railway, I am informed the Rutland has acquired running rights over it and is working that portion of the railway by reason of that arrangement, and has a regular train service, though the Quebec Southern, which virtually owns the line from Lacolle to Sorel is not in operation. I have listened to this discussion with interest. I know that it is a great hardship to the farming community that they have been deprived of a train service for the last six or seven weeks. There has been a great deal of disagreement and litigation. The people in possession of the United Counties Railway have been a set of schemers and railway promoters, and I have no doubt it is true that a very large portion of the subsidy has been diverted from the railway enterprise, leaving it in the position in which it is today. It is true that the railway runs through a fertile section of the country.

But unfortunately the products of that portion of the country, which is an old settled country, are somewhat concentrated, and do not afford a very heavy traffic; the traffic itself is comparatively light. Now it may be that that road, operated upon business principles, and by honest men, might be made to meet expenses. I know there has been a time in the history of the United Counties Railway when the traffic would hardly pay the cost of the axle grease. A good deal has been said about what the government might do to remedy this state of affairs. I remember that three or four sessions ago the Minister of Railways and Canals, at the instance of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Meigs), introduced into this House an amendment to the Railway Act, giving effect, if I remember correctly, to an Act of sequestration passed by the provincial legislature which required the confirmation of this parliament, as railways of this kind have been brought under the General Railway Act. Now the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) says that the provincial government is contemplating action of that kind. Their position would be very much stronger had the amendment which the Minister of Railways and Canals introduced three or four sessions ago—

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Did that Bill pass?

Mr. PARMELEE. It passed the Railway Committee and passed this House, but when it went over into the other Chamber, at a time when the Liberals had not secured a majority there, it was promptly killed. So if any one is responsible for this state of affairs, I think there is where the responsibility belongs. Now I do not think, unless something of that sort is done, that it is possible to relieve the situation to any great extent. It is useless to talk about subsidies, because subsidies are granted to secure the building of a road, but they cannot go further and secure its operation. In this case, with fair business management, if this road could be sequestrated and passed over into the hands of good railway men who would run it as a business enterprise instead of a speculative scheme, I think it might be made to pay. I think that the government has done all that it is possible to do to protect the interests of the people who are suffering from the unfortunate condition in which that enterprise stands.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I would be sorry to be misunderstood. I did not mean to say that the South-eastern Valley Railway is closed. I know it is working with the Rutland Railway. What I said was that the United Counties Railway is closed.

Motion agreed to.

EARLIER SESSIONS OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. NAT. BOYD (Macdonald) moved

That this House is of the opinion that this parliament should be called for the dispatch of business on or about the last Thursday in November of each and every year.

He said : I fully understand the importance of this motion, and can anticipate the many objections that may be raised against it. Much can be said for and against the English system that we are following, and also there may be a difference of opinion with regard to the United States system that has been suggested. Now, regardless of what may be said in support of or in opposition to either one of these proposals, I think I am well within the opinion of this House when I say that the manner in which the members of this House have been treated by being called here at this most untimely season of the year, is not by any means in the interest of the members themselves, or in the interest of the country at large. As to the composition of this House, it is well known that the vast majority of the members of this House are men actively engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, farmers, merchants, lumbermen and business men. Whether it is wise in the interests of Canada that the electors should continue to select men of that class, or that they should select them from the wealthier classes, remains to be seen, but up to the present time they have selected for the most part members of the former class. Such being the case, I think I express the opinion of this House when I protest against the date at which we have been called together this year. In proposing this resolution I have no party end in view, and have no purpose of finding particular fault with the party in power, because governments that have preceded this one have been at fault in the same respect. At the same time, I feel confident that if this motion is voted on freely by the members of this House on both sides, it will be sustained. Now I do not believe that any government should be permitted to seek only their own convenience in fixing the dates, because that is largely what they are doing when they change the date and delay it month after month until we are brought now to a very busy season of the year. Any man in business, whether he is a farmer or not, loses his spring business, and is bound to suffer for the balance of the year. Now that being the case, what right has any executive of this House—because that is what they are—to offer as a pretext, it may be that the Auditor General's report is not ready, that the public accounts are not ready, that the departmental reports are not ready ? Why are they not ready ? The public pays for getting them ready, and those who are in charge of government business can easily see that they are made ready in proper time for an early session of parliament. Why, Sir, every member of this House and every intelligent elector knows very well that the reason of the delay is not owing to the reports. It is more likely, Mr. Speaker, that political exigencies are the cause. It may be some by-election, or some similar excuse, of which members of this government and of past governments are well aware. Such being the case, I think the date that I have suggested is not an untimely one. If this House should meet in the last week of November the Address could be disposed of, important measures of the government could be submitted and legislation could be well advanced by the time of the Christmas holidays. The important Bills of the government could be printed and laid on the Table and hon. members could take the same with them to their homes during the recess, consider them, come back after the holidays and proceed with the business of the House in a careful and intelligent way not having their minds distracted by having their attention divided between their duties here and their private business. I may say that the views that I have given expression to here are not new to this House, and that they are not new to the Liberals of this House. I propose to quote from the leaders of the Liberal party in the past to show you that they held views very similar to those I hold at the present time, and I may add that the remarks of these gentlemen were delivered at an earlier date than the present one. I will quote from a speech delivered by the leader of the Liberal party during the session of 1886, as contained in vol. 1, page 8 of the Official Debates. The leader of the Liberal party at that time was the Hon. Mr. Blake who then said :

> The first observation I have to make is one I made a session or two ago, on the same occasion ; that is, to express a regret at the late period of the year at which we are discharging this, our initial duty. I express that regret with stronger feeling, because it was announced to us by the First Minister, last session, or the session before, that we were to meet earlier in the future, because we have for some years been meeting much earlier than we are now meet——

Mr. MACLEAN. What was the date of that utterance ?

Mr. BOYD. February 26th, 1886. That is earlier than we are now meeting.

> —and because there was a general understanding and pledge to a January meeting ; I do not mean to say a pledge that was not to be broken if a great public emergency should call for delay, but certainly a pledge that ought rigidly to be observed, unless there was some great emergency of which we have not heard as yet. It is to the public interest that we should meet earlier, because this is the period of the year which will best enable the legislators of the country to discharge their duty and best enable the people of the country to discharge their not unimportant part in connection with the business of legislation. As soon as the spring opens, both we and they are distracted with other things, and therefore it is a material thing for us, circumstanced as this business country is, that we should have a more distinct understanding, if such be possible, that our session should not commence at what I regard as an unreasonable time.

This was almost a month earlier than we have been called together for the present session. That is the opinion of a man whose opinions, I think, are respected even to this day. But, Mr. Speaker, I may say we have the opinion of the present right hon. leader of this House at a somewhat later date and I think Liberals will agree with me in saying that the opinions that were then expressed hold good to-day. I will now quote from 'Hansard' of 1894, Vol. 1, page 30. He was criticising the speeches of the mover and seconder of the address, Sir James Grant and Dr. Lachapelle.

Mr. MACLEAN. At what date ?

Mr. BOYD. The House met on the 15th March, just three days later than it met this year. He said :

> For instance, the hon. gentleman has not said a word, nor did the hon. member for Hochelaga, as to the late and inconvenient season at which parliament has been called. I am sure that this is a matter which the hon. gentlemen cannot approve. It has been the unwritten law of Canada for a great many years past, that parliament should be summoned at an early period in the year, at the latest, towards the end of January. The reason is obvious. In this country we have no privileged class. All the members of this House, with scarcely an exception, are engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, and it is an object of paramount necessity that after having discharged their duties to the country, they shoud be able to go back to their ordinary business pursuits, about the opening of the busy season. In years past, I say, it was the unwritten law of Canada ; still, this year the government have departed from that law. They waited, and waited, and waited, until the opening of the busy season was in sight, before summoning parliament, and as to this, not a word of explanation has been offered. Why, we might have expected, at all events, that the gods who rule over our destinies would have come down from the sphere which they occupy in majesty, and give us a word of explanation.

Now, I submit these very carefully considered words to the attention of the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and I trust whatever action he and his government may be disposed to take in regard to this, what I consider, most important question that he will keep in remembrance the words he then uttered when he was on this side of the House and I trust that he will not forget that while he and his party are on that side of the House at the present time the day may come, and it is sure to come, when they will be on this side of the House. It is the duty of any government in legislating to bear in mind what are the best interests of the country and to so conduct the public affairs. Now, it is not necessary for me to remind the right hon. gentleman of the great disadvantage that the people coming from the more remote parts of Canada suffer in this connection. Coming here thousands of miles and being kept here in all probability four or five months to a very great number of men, as the right hon. gentleman knows, it means financial ruin, and I call upon the right hon. gentleman, considerate as he usually is, to bear that fact in mind. It is all very well for those members of parliament whose homes are within a hundred miles of Ottawa in Ontario and Quebec, who leave here every Friday evening, go home to their business, stay there Saturday and Sunday, and come back on Monday, but the members who are 2,000 or 3,000 miles from home—what about these gentlemen? Should they not be considered? The majority are here and to that extent they rule, but I wish to warn the government and the members of this House that the day is not far distant when this condition will be reversed. I do not think it is necessary that I should say any more. I am not submitting this question, as I think my remarks will show, in any party sense, or in the hope of obtaining any party advantage. I am submitting it in a fair and impartial manner and I leave it to the judgment of the House if I have asked for anything unreasonable. The date I have suggested, I think, is a reasonable one and a great deal of business could be done at a season when very few people are busy. The business of the House should be well moved up at the holidays, and an adjournment had for a reasonable time allowing us to get back to our business. It should not be as it has been in the past, ruinous to many men who have spent some years in this House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not find fault with the observations which have fallen from my hon. friend (Mr. Boyd) though he will pardon me if I take exception, not so much to his statements as to the innuendos they contain. There has been a tacit law in this House existing for a great many years, that parliament should meet towards the end of January or perhaps the first week of February, but not at the period mentioned in the motion. This tacit law was at one time more honoured in the breach than in the observance, but the present government has observed it within all reasonable possibility. If the record of this government is examined it will be found that this is the first year in which parliament was summoned at a later period than the first week of February, which is the period, generally understood at which parliament should open. This year parliament was summoned at a much later period which I will frankly admit must be a great inconvenience to the members generally. The departments are not responsible for this; the Auditor General is not responsible for it, but I my own self am responsible and I throw myself upon the indulgence of the House. Circumstances to which I need not refer compelled me to be absent not only from the capital but from the Dominion for the best part of the month of November, all December, and part of January. I came back from the south about the 10th of January and it was not then possible to summon parliament at the usual period. I repeat that I am alone responsible. I was in such a condition that I could not attend to business. As soon as I came back we applied ourselves diligently to work. Parliament was summoned, and I can claim, I think that at no period was the business of the government so complete and so ready as it was this year for the consideration of members when parliament opened. In this way we endeavoured to atone for what was certainly a departure from the rule which has been observed in the past and which ought be well recognized. For my part I have no objection that the calling of the session at the end of January or the first of February should be a well recognized law of parliament, but in the speech of Mr. Blake quoted by my hon. friend, Mr. Blake admitted that there may be some cases in which an exception might take place, and I think that the members of the House on both sides will perhaps admit that this year, at all events, there was some reasonable ground for the government departing from the well understood rule. But, if we are to have a rule of the House to regulate the opening of the session of parliament, I am not prepared to accept the period which the hon. gentleman has mentioned in his motion, namely the last week in November. I doubt very much if this would be acceptable to the great majority of the people of Canada. The motion has been seconded by a friend of mine (Mr. Stewart) and I may with safety conclude that the period suggested in it would be acceptable to the people west of Lake Superior. I doubt very much if that period would meet with the approval of the people of the east of Lake Superior. Taking it all in all I think that the understanding that parliament should be summoned at the end of January or the first week in February would best accommodate all the people of this vast Dominion. There is such a variety of climates in our great country, which to some extent regulate the opening of the business seasons in different parts of the Dominion at different periods of the year, that it would be impossible to accommodate all members exactly. While I am not prepared to agree to the motion, I think if it were to be generally understood that parliament would meet about the last week in January or the first week of February, I would be quite prepared for my part to agree to such an understanding.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I was under the impression that the late date at which parliament had been called this year was no doubt to some extent due to the illness of the right hon. gentleman, and for that reason I made no reference to it in the debate on the Address.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). However, I want to say to my right hon. friend that he is mistaken in his dates when he refers to the opening of parliament since his administration came into power. On one occasion we met here on the 6th of March, and on two other occasions we met in the later part of February, instead of the first week of February. If my right hon. friend looks up the record he will find that his government has departed more from what he calls the tacit law, than he now imagines. It is very desirable in the interest of all of us that parliament should begin its work as early as possible after the first of the year, and I see no reason why it should not do so, considering that all departments of government are well supplied with an efficient staff, that the public accounts should be made up, and that the government if it gives proper attention to the business of the country should be ready to meet parliament at the beginning of the year ; to the uninitiated member of parliament it does seem a mystery why year after year the opening of parliament is delayed until the middle or end of February or the first week of March. When we do commence parliament early in the year, it has come under the observation of every gentleman that there has been a great waste of time during almost every session since 1896 because the government is not ready with its business. It seems to me that it only requires ordinary business methods and intelligence to remedy this, and that in future at least members of parliament should not be subjected to the inconvenience of late sessions, and to delay because of the unreadiness of the government when there is an early session. My right hon. friend refers to the readiness of the government to proceed with business at the present time. I readily admit that the government went into Supply very early this session, but a number of important measures have been referred to in the speech from the Throne and we have yet no intimation from the government as to the date at which some of the most important of them will be brought down. I would remind the Prime Minister that in 1896 he laid down the doctrine that the redress of grievances such as is sought in some of these measures was a condition precedent to any Supply being granted. I would suggest to him that it would only be fair to the House, and particularly to this side of the House who have to fill the role of critics, that we should have these measures before us at an early date. I see no reason why the papers with regard to the Alaskan boundary should not have been laid on the Table on the first day the House met. The right hon. gentleman told us in the debate on the Address that they would be brought down at once, but they are not down yet. When they are brought down they should be printed and that will cause further delay. Then, the correspondence promised respecting negotiations with the colony of Newfoundland should be brought down at once and I would suggest that they should be printed and placed in the hands of members. If these things were done it would facilitate business. Then, the only information we have had up to the present time with regard to the colonial conference is that which some of us have been able to obtain from the blue-book issued by the imperial government. This Canadian government has given no information whatever as to the attitude of the Canadian representatives at the conference, and I can well believe that there is some information which the Canadian government desires to give to the House and to the country which is not contained in the imperial blue-book. In any case that blue-book is not available to all members of parliament as it should be, nor is it available for the public who want to know about the proceedings at that conference.

There is one matter which is touched upon very lightly indeed in the blue-book issued by the imperial government, but which is of great importance to this country, and that is the correspondence and negotiations which took place between the representatives of this and the imperial governments with regard to the embargo on our cattle. I had not the pleasure of being present in the House yesterday, but I understand that in the debate on this subject it was suggested that the matter had better be discussed after the papers are brought down. But why were not the papers placed on the Table the very first day of the session ? It was said, I understand, that the Postmaster General had had some negotiations with Mr. Hanbury. Why were those papers not on the Table when the session opened ? It is matters of this kind that tend to delay the business of the House, and in regard to which the government might make a very great improvement on the methods they have pursued in the past.

As to the particular date which has been selected by my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd), I dare say that it might suit some members very well and not suit others so well. There is probably no conceivable date which will absolutely suit every member. I understand that the object my hon. friend has in view is more particularly to have the business of parliament begun at an earlier date in the year or at a late date in the previous year, so that we might not be kept here during the summer months on business which ought to be completed by the middle of March.

Hon. WM. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Parliament has been called at a later period owing to circumstances which could not be avoided, but I would suggest to the hon. the ministers not to give dinners during the session, not to have any at homes or nonsense of that kind, and let us continue to attend to business until 12 o'clock every night. If we will do that, we will get away at the usual time. Then it will be necessary that the members from Ontario and Quebec, who are in the habit of going home at certain times, should remain in their places, if they want to have the work done properly. The work may be delayed very often because of their absence. Let us get right down to business and have no more nonsense and we will get through sooner than expected.

Mr. D. A. STEWART (Lisgar). I must say that the calling together of parliament at so late a day puts us to great inconvenience, especially those of us who come from the west. As the business of this country goes on increasing our sessions will no doubt be longer, and this year we may possibly be here until the snow flies. It is a very serious matter for those of us who are engaged in the business of farming to have to leave our farms during seeding and harvest time. Further, as the west is growing, it is likely that the representatives from the west to this House will be increased and will no doubt be mainly drawn from the agricultural class. That is another reason why I am in favour of the motion of the hon. member from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd). I must say that I was pleased to hear the remarks of the right hon. the leader of the government concerning the unwritten law that parliament should meet early in January. And the reason why I support the resolution is that it gives hon. members an opportunity of expressing their opinions, independent of party considerations, as regards the period when parliament should be called together.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). I gather from the tone of the debate so far that it is the general desire of the House that we should meet earlier in the year or even late in the fall. We from the west are very much inconvenienced in having to spend the best part of the year in Ottawa attending to public business to the neglect of our own, but there is another feature of the case to which I would like to refer. I hope that the government will consider the advisability of changing our present system of meeting at night. I hope that they will look into the European and the American system, and that such a change will be made that our daily meetings may take place at an earlier hour in the day and be closed before the dinner hour, so that we may not injure our health by these long and tedious night sittings. Our committee meetings could well be held in the evenings or earlier in the morning. If that change were adopted, if our daily meetings were begun at an earlier hour and closed before dinner, the same amount of work would be performed and perhaps more in the day than is now done, and not so much time would be lost. No doubt owing to the fact that there is no limit to our night sittings, hon. members are tempted to take up more of the time of the House than they would do if they knew that the sitting would have to be closed at a fixed hour. I hope that this question will be looked into and that a change may be adopted before long, and I have no doubt that such a change would not only promote the physical well-being of hon. members but also expedite business.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). This question of the date of convening parliament is certainly one of very great importance to every member of this House. The circumstances that led to the late meeting of the House this year may fairly be considered unavoidable, but we have been in the habit of meeting at a date so late as to inconvenience the great majority of members. It is my opinion that we should not meet later than the second Thursday in January. The congress of the United States and the legislatures of the forty-two states of the American union all meet at fixed dates. In none of these commonwealths is there any uncertainty as to when congress or the legislature will meet, so that the members can make their business arrangements during the whole year with a definite knowledge as to when they will be required to attend to their legislative duties. The importance of this business men can thoroughly appreciate. The element of uncertainty and doubt as to the meeting of the legislature, whether it may be early in January, late in January, early in February or late in February, is a difficulty and a source of annoyance and loss. Even if the date were a late one, if it were known months ahead, the member could make his calculations and arrange his business accordingly; but that is not the case; there is always a degree of uncertainty. We are not taken into the confidence of the government. Very often the government is influenced by circumstances that might arise from time to time. If we had a fixed date of meeting, the members of the government would accommodate themselves to such an arrangement, and I verily believe that in doing so their own convenience would be consulted, and the business they had to submit to parliament would be attended to more promptly, satisfactorily, and easily to themselves than it is now. Of course, as the premier has said, exceptional circumstances may arise under our system of government, and I do not know that it would be a judicious thing to have the meeting of parliament fixed by statute at an unalterable date, as in the cases of the legislatures of the various states of the American union and of the national congress. Still, we could arrange to have the meeting of parliament early in January unless exceptional circumstances arose, and if they did, they would be more likely to lead to an earlier than to a later meeting of the House.

With regard to our meeting at three o'clock in the afternoon, I have always considered that practice a piece of absurdity, unbusinesslike, detrimental to the health of members, and demoralizing in its effect upon the conduct of members when it leads to late night sittings.

An hon. MEMBER. What ?

Mr. CHARLTON. If we were to meet promptly at twelve o'clock or one o'clock, and have five or six solid, uninterrupted hours for business before six o'clock, the business of the House would to a large extent be prosecuted without night sittings, and it would be quite easy to have the meetings of the committees earlier—say at nine o'clock. Let the Speaker take the Chair at twelve o'clock, leave it at six o'clock, and follow the English rule that under no circumstances should a sitting go past midnight. When the hour of twelve arrives, the Speaker rises, takes his hat, and says : 'It being twelve o'clock, I leave the Chair.'

Mr. CASGRAIN. Everybody goes home.

Mr. CHARLTON. Everybody goes home. We would very seldom have a night sitting. It would certainly be an arrangement much more reasonable, more conducive to health, and I believe more calculated to lead to a prompt and satisfactory despatch of business than the system we have been following since confederation. It is very difficult to disturb old established usages. We have fallen into a rut, and it is very difficult to get out of it ; but if we take this matter in hand and govern ourselves by commonsense considerations, we shall have no difficulty in arranging our sittings in such a way as to enable us to do the main part of our work in day-light, between the time the Speaker takes the Chair, and the time he leaves the Chair for dinner. These views I have entertained for a great many years. I have felt that the meeting of this House after eight o'clock in the evening, prolonged sometimes till two or three o'clock in the morning, is almost criminal in its effects on the health of members. It has broken down the health of many men who have been members of this House. It is a practice which I think we should seek, in the interests of all, to remedy and reform.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). As a representative of one of the western constituencies, I would like to say that if the meeting of parliament could be called together as early as November, or at the latest December, it would be a great convenience to members representing constituencies west of Lake Superior. We occupy a different position from that of most members from the older provinces, in this respect, that as the House does not sit on Saturday, they can go home on Friday evening, and remain home till Sunday night or Monday morning, and have an opportunity to look after their business, whereas it is an absolute impossibility for us representing western constituencies to go home during the whole course of a session of this House, because it would take us three or four days to make the journey each way. The summer months are those in which we have the largest amount of business to attend to, and when the House is not called together until the middle or the end of March, it practically means that we have to spend the whole summer at the capital, and leave our business to go to the dogs. I do not know that I would be in favour of having the date of meeting fixed by law, because I suppose circumstances might arise which would prevent the government calling the House together at any fixed date. But I would like to impress on the government the necessity of trying to call the House together a little earlier than was done this year, because it is almost impossible for western members to put in five or six months here during the summer.

Mr. A. A. LEFURGEY (East Prince, P.E.I.) I would like to add a few words to the remarks which have been made on this motion. I am in entire sympathy with the motion of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd), in favour of parliament meeting at an earlier date. I am not wedded to the date fixed, the last Thursday of November ; but it certainly would be in the interest of the members to have parliament called a month or two earlier than has been the case in the last two or three sessions. The winter months are certainly the most advantageous time for the representatives of the people to be present here, when the business of the country is not so active as it is during the spring, summer and fall months, and there seems to be no reason why parliament should not be assembled one or two months earlier than has been customary. The members of this House are not all millionaires. They are men engaged in the various avocations of a growing country, and they require time and opportunity to carry on the different phases of business in which they are engaged, and that time is certainly not in the spring of the year, when the whole business of a growing country like this is opening up. It is all very well for hon. members who live within four or five hundred miles of the capital. They have an opportunity to leave on Friday, remain at home over Saturday and Sunday, and consult their business managers or attend to their professional duties, then return in time for the business of the House on Monday. But for members who live in Manitoba, the Northwest Territories or British Columbia, or in Prince Edward Island, or Nova Scotia it is a matter of impossibility to go home and return in less than a week. So business interests of these members are, to a great extent sacrificed. That would be largely overcome if the House met two or three months earlier. As was pointed out by the seconder of this motion, the west is growing rapidly, and we are going to have a larger representation from that section. Moreover the representation of the west will be drawn, to a great extent, from the farming class. These men must be called here earlier and enabled to get through their legislative duties in good season, or their business will suffer. I think the government should take this motion into consideration, and, in the future, do everything possible to have the business of the session brought forward at an earlier day.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). I have an admendment to the motion, as follows:

It is the opinion of this House that this parliament should be called together not later than the first Tuesday after the second Monday in January in every year.

I have always been an advocate of the members of this House being allowed to know at what period they would be called upon to meet. I think that the time I have suggested, the first Tuesday after the second Monday in January—I have not said the full of the moon—would be the proper time. The Christmas holidays would be over, and people would be free to come here and attend to business. I do not see why the government should not accept my amendment, nor why all the members of the House should not support it. We all admit that it should be known at what time we are to meet, and we all admit the winter is the best time for the session for both farmers and business men. We shall remove difficulties from the way of the government, and we shall relieve the government from the invidious duty of choosing the time of session if we pass this amendment. I do not think I need say more, but I hope that all will vote for my amendment.

Mr. SEYMOUR E. GOURLEY (Colchester). I would not vote for any amendment of the character of that proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson). We wish to have in this country constitutional government, and constitutional government puts in the hands of the Cabinet the right to call parliament at any time they think best. Besides, to adopt the hon. gentleman's amendment would be to copy too closely the constitution of the country to the south of us, which is the worst jumble in the whole civilized world to-day. But, while we want constitutional government, yet constitutional government has always been found consistent with the wisest and best government in the world. Speaking in behalf of the maritime province members, I think there should be a well known time when parliament should be called, subject, of course, as in the case of the present session, to delay when circumstances arise to make it necessary. I think the explanations given by the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with reference to the present session are ample, and I am perfectly willing to come here late in view of the peculiar circumstances of the present case. But this is exceptional, and we should have a time fixed when it should be well known that parliament would be called, subject to some exigency such as we have this year. Now, the question is, what that time should be. Some say it should be January. It strikes me that that is too late. The members who come from the maritime provinces want to get through the session of parliament by the last of April. Any member engaged in mercantile or agricultural business would prefer to get through his duties here by that time. It would be impossible to open parliament at the beginning of January and get through by the end of April. Therefore I think there is great wisdom in the proposal of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) that the session of parliament should open in November. We could open parliament, the principal Bills could be introduced and a large part of the business brought forward before the Christmas holidays. We could then adjourn feeling that practically all the business was before the House and before the country, and, after the Christmas holidays we could meet, carry the business through intelligently and prorogue before the 30th of April. I think that no date could be fixed after the beginning of the year when we could meet and finish business by that time. A man can stay here in winter, with the winds howling outside, very comfortably, and attend to the work of parliament. But in the hot days, when all outside is so inviting, one cannot give the attention to the business of the House that he ought to do. Moreover, if a man feels that his business is going to pieces at home, he cannot give undivided attention to his duties in parliament. So, with all due deference to the explanation of the Prime Minister, I think parliament should meet before the close of the year. It may have been well enough to have parliament called about the last of January a few years ago. But with the business coming before us in this 'growing time,' and now that Canada has become a nation under the inspiration of hon. gentlemen opposite, we must have longer sessions. Therefore, while January might have been well enough in the old Conservative days, when Canada was not a nation, it will never do under existing circumstances. I concur in the proposition that we should meet in November, when there would be ample time, if the session proved unusually long, for the members to get away by the close of April. I support this motion, and I hope the government will not take an illiberal view of it, but will endeavour to adapt themselves to an earlier date, and will settle on the last Thursday in November as a practice. I think that would be better than to fix the date by statutory resolution such as has been proposed, because that would be copying the worst system of government in the world.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). While this question is under discussion, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what has become of the promise he made when we had the last summer session. He told us that as long as he was a member of this government we would have no more summer sessions. At that time we were called on the 6th of March.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). I do not remember what promise I made, but I do cordially concur in the statement that we ought, if possible, to meet as early as we can, at the end of January, or the beginning of February. But it is not always possible, and no man knows that better than the hon. gentleman, for the government to carry out that project. I may remark, however, that when I had the honour of being Finance Minister, I delivered the budget speech very early in the session, and if the hon. gentleman will look over the records he will find that the budget speech was always delivered within ten days or a fortnight after the House met. I have no doubt but that my hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Fielding) will be perfectly ready to do the same, if he can get the co-operation of the hon. gentlemen on the other side. However, there are difficulties, I may say, in this country in getting ready much before the 1st of February. This is becoming a very extensive country, with widely extended operations, and I doubt, if you make the fiscal year terminate on the 1st of July, whether you can expect to get the various public documents in readiness for parliament before the 1st of February, certainly not before the middle of January, so far as my experience goes. But I can tell the hon. gentleman that so far as I am personally concerned, I will strive earnestly to bring about as early a meeting as possible.

Mr. MONK. I wish to endorse the suggestion which has been made by my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), and which I think can be carried easily into effect at once. I believe the time has come when we must make some alteration in the hours of sitting of the House. Reforms have been made in the United States and different countries of Europe, as well as in England, although in England different habits prevail from those that obtain in this country. But even there they have made a reform in regard to the twelve o'clock rule, which has been alluded to this afternoon. It seems to me that, if it were possible, we should sit from three to six o'clock, and come back at eight; especially ought we to avoid, in the season which we are now approaching, the practice of sitting in the House until two o'clock in the morning, or even later. I approve of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Provencher that we should sit, for instance, from two o'clock until six, and have committee meetings in the morning, and if necessary at night, and perhaps special meetings in the evening. That would be a beneficial reform, and acceptable to all the members of this House. I think it could be carried into effect during the present session, at any rate, a set of rules to that effect could be framed and brought before the House for discussion. Some change, it seems to me, is absolutely necessary in the present hours of sittings in this House. As regards the suggestion made in the main motion of my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd), I do not know to what extent it meets with the approval of all our farmers from Quebec. But speaking for myself, I think the date suggested by him a very good one. It would enable us to get well into the work of the session before the Christmas recess, and during the Christmas recess we would have occasion to consult our constituents on some of the measures already submitted to the House; and upon returning here after a short vacation, we would be in a better position I think to expedite the work of the session and get away at an early date. I see no reason why we could not have the report of the Auditor General at a much earlier date. I think if we had that report before us ten days before the meeting of parliament, or three or four weeks before the Christmas holidays, the work of the session would be greatly shortened, and it would meet the convenience of members in almost every instance. I do not think it is possible by statutory enactment to fix the date of the meeting of parliament. Of course it might be done, but strictly speaking it would not be constitutional, if I may say so. But if the sense of the House is taken upon the main motion, and if the House says that the time suggested by my hon. friend is satisfactory, I do not see why the government should not make the change and break away from old habits and customs. Everything is changing, and I think the time has come to improve the hours of sittings of parliament, as the rest of the world is doing.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that as the fiscal year ends the 30th of June, it would be inconvenient to call parliament together in the fall, because the departments would not have time to make their reports. Now, I say that it is a mistake to end the fiscal year on the 30th of June, the fiscal year should be made to conform with the calendar year. We now end the fiscal year in the middle of the most busy season of the year, which we break into two parts, and I believe it would be far better to have the reports end with the calendar year. If we did that, there would be no trouble at all in having a fall session, because there would be ample time to have those reports ready.

Mr. W. ROSS (South Ontario). Before this question is put I would like to say a few words in regard to the motion. So far as I am concerned, it would be practically impossible to attend a session of this parliament in November, unless I was compelled to do so. We have had the explanation of the Prime Minister of the reason why parliament was delayed this year, and we are all thoroughly satisfied with that. But I really think that the best time for parliament to meet is about the middle of January, that seems to suit every one, and we could get through the business of this House in about ninety days. That would let us out by the first of May, at any rate, and would give us ample time to do the business of the country. We should be called together in good season. I appreciate the difficulty of the western members and of the eastern members, that has been referred to. But after all, speaking from my own standpoint, it would be physically impossible for me to come here in November, therefore I wish to enter my protest against meeting at that season of the year.

Mr. BOYD. The motion I submitted to the House is not the same as the amendment of the hon. member for Elgin. I do not fix a date, I say on or about, whereas the hon. member for Elgin suggests a specific date. Now I ask whether any valid argument has been used here to-day against an earlier meeting of the House, or at least against a meeting in the fall. There is no denying the fact that henceforth, as this country keeps growing, it will be impossible to transact all the business in less than four months, or four and a half or five months. I have watched for some years past and during the years I have been here the last month of the session is all hurry and bustle and push business through when it should get a great deal more consideration and attention than some of the business that has been disposed of in the earlier part of the session. The hon. gentleman who last spoke says that the business of the House may be done in ninety days. I wish to tell him that it is impossible to do it in ninety days. This country is becoming entirely too large to think of doing its business in ninety days. I have given this matter very careful consideration. I have not brought it to the attention of the House thoughtlessly, but I have done it with the expectation that the business which this House has to do will occupy four or five months. Such being the case, if the leader of the government is prepared to consider the business men of the country, the merchants and farmers and especially those who come from the extremities of the country, it will be necessary to call the House earlier, about the time I have suggested. In regard to the proposition of the hon. member that we should specify a date, the objection that I raised and which is one that appeals as I know to a great many members, will not be overcome because we will then be carried into spring.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, if I were to state my own personal view of the matter, I must say that I would very much prefer that the House should meet in November and December and then adjourn over until the first of March and sit during March and April. The two worst months in the year in this part of the country are January and February. Ottawa is very cold at that time and the travel in January and February is most dangerous in Ontario and Quebec at that period of the year. I can quite see that a fall session in November and December and a recess until March and April might suit the convenience of a very large number of our members. However, I think enough has come out of the debate to suggest to the right hon. leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that he ought to be prepared, either now or at a later stage, to suggest that a special committee to be composed of the leader of the government, the leader of the Opposition, the Speaker, and perhaps other members of the House be appointed to consider if some practical rule cannot be laid down as to the suggestions made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière). I am in favour of earlier sessions in the day as against these late sittings. I do not know what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) says about the social gaieties interfering with the business of the House, but at any rate I can say that there has been great neglect of the public business after dinner time. There are often not more than ten or twenty members in this House after dinner. There are very few members of the government present sometimes and the public business is not being transacted as I think it ought to be. But, enough has come out of this discussion to suggest the appointment of a committee and I hope that if the right hon. leader of the government is not prepared to do so at the present moment, he will after consideration be in a position to suggest something in that direction.

Amendment (Mr. Robinson, Elgin) negatived.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House and with the approval of my seconder, I would beg to withdraw the resolution. I think the object has been attained. I know well enough after the opinions that have been expressed by the right hon. leader of the House, what the result will be. I have been long enough in this House to understand what usually happens after the leader of the House speaks in the manner in which he has spoken this afternoon. However, I trust the views submitted will so impress themselves upon the minds of the members of the government that they will give the matter the serious consideration that we believe the subject is entitled to. I wish, with the permission of the House, to withdraw the resolution.

Motion (Mr. Boyd). withdrawn.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Board of Civil Service Examiners for the year 1902.—Hon. W. S. Fielding.

CENSUS OF 1901.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inquire of the hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), as I understand he is acting Minister of Agriculture during the absence of the minister, if he has brought down the return that I moved for on Monday in reference to the amount expended for taking the census of 1901.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It has not been brought down. It will be brought down promptly.

THE FRENCH EDITION OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). (Translation.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a point which I think is of great importance. The matter I am referring to is the backward state of the translation of the departmental reports from English into French. I think these reports are not translated in due time. I understand that a certain time must be allowed for the proper translation of those reports ; but, after all, I think the work could be done in a more expeditious way. Being given the fact that those reports have to be prepared by the officers of the various departments and handed over to the printing bureau long before the meeting of parliament, I do not see why a prompter delivery of the French edition could not be ensured.

Owing to the backward state of that translation, we are placed in this awkward position : that when people who are interested in what is published in these reports apply to us for copies of the same, as the French edition is not yet available for distribution, we have to send them copies of the English edition.

Mr. BOYD.

Now, it would be easy for us, in support of the statement I have just made, to call to witness the hon. gentlemen who, in reply to those who apply for copies of the French edition of the departmental reports, have to tell them that the French edition is not yet published, and that a long time is likely to elapse before it is available for distribution to the public. I quite understand that, in the case of the translation of the reports of our debates as also in the case of the numerous returns which are brought down and laid upon the Table of this House during the session, it is difficult for the translating staff to catch up with the work. But, as concerns the departmental reports, the position is quite different. So, I wish to urge upon the right hon. leader of this House the desirability of his taking the necessary steps to have the French edition of the reports referred to, laid upon the Table of the House, from the very opening of parliament.

ALASKAN BOUNDARY TREATY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a statement made in the press of the country in regard to the recent convention respecting the Alaskan boundary. I asked the right hon. gentleman whether the treaty had been made with the assent of the government and he omitted to give me any answer during the debate upon the Address. The following passage appears in an important journal in this county which is supporting the government :—

TO WHOM WE OWE IT.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, says the St. John 'Sun,' 'admits that this country cannot expect a fair verdict on the boundary question from the three United States commissioners,' and it asks: 'Then what is the good of the reference at all ?'

Then follows the editorial comment :

The 'Sun' apparently forgets that it was not Sir Wilfrid who made or even proposed the Alaska boundary reference. We owe that good gift entirely to the esteemed government of the United Kingdom whose chief aim in existence appears to be the cultivation of 'friendship' with the United States by running a 'hand-me-down' shop for their benefit in Canada. If our 'friendly' neighbours do not see what they want in sight in the Dominion, they have a standing invitation to ask for it, and are given permission to carry it off on their own terms.

I am not adverting to the fireworks part of this editorial, but merely to the one point which seems to be suggested rather than explicitly stated : That this convention respecting the Alaskan boundary was not made with the consent or approval of the government of Canada. I think we have a right to know from the government whether or not that is a fact, and I have no doubt that my right hon. friend will see his way clear to make a statement in regard to it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I thought, Mr. Speaker, that in the debate on the address I made it perfectly clear that the government of Canada had been consulted with regard to the terms of the treaty. I thought I had made it clear also that we had assented to the treaty, not because we found it perfect, but because on the whole the terms of reference were perfectly fair. There was no advantage on either side, and that was the reason why we removed all objections that we had had hitherto. For the first time, in the negotiations which took place between Great Britain and the United States and between Great Britain and Canada in the Joint High Commission; for the first time the terms of reference proposed were such as could be accepted by Canada. We were not satisfied with the composition of the tribunal—not that we objected to the tribunal itself, but simply because the tribunal was so composed as that it did not ensure finality. That was the only objection we had, but the terms of reference being satisfactory, the character of the court, with an exception being also satisfactory; especially in this that it provided that the questions between Canada and the United States should be determined by impartial jurists of repute. We thought we had there all guarantees that the case of Canada would be properly adjudicated upon. But in the debate on the Address, I said also that it was a different matter as to how the treaty, which in itself was perfectly fair, was to be executed. I pointed out that there were objections taken to the commissioners which we learned from the press and upon authority had been selected by the government of the United States. I am sorry to say that at this moment the government is not yet in a position to bring down the correspondence which has taken place upon this particular subject. It is all ready, and I am in hopes that at an early date it may be placed on the Table of the House. All I can say at present is, that if the correspondence is not already on the Table of the House it is not because of any fault of any authority on this side of the Atlantic. We hope, however, that very shortly, the whole of the correspondence which has taken place upon the making of the treaty itself, and the selection of the commissioners will be placed before parliament. We hope further, that all the correspondence which has taken place between the two governments since the adjournment of the High Commission, in 1899, will also be placed upon the Table of the House at an early date.

SUPPLY—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask why the somewhat unusual practice of going into Supply on Private Members' day is being followed during this session?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). For the reason that we have exhausted the Order paper for private business, and we have come to Government Orders. That is the only reason, and it seems to me it is a good reason. If we want to reach the blessing of a prorogation within any reasonable time, we might as well take government business for the rest of the day.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I would be ready to go on with my public Bills to-day if they had been printed in both languages. I have been here every day this week waiting to see them printed, but so far they are only printed in one language, and under the rules I cannot go on with them.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is no fault of mine.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, the government is responsible for the way the public documents are printed, and therefore the government is to blame.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I have a Bill of ten lines long which was introduced last year and printed in both languages, and which I introduced at the beginning of the session this year, but it has not yet been translated. It is a most important Bill, and like my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean), I am ready to go on with it. Why is it not translated and printed in both languages?

The PRIME MINISTER. The printing may be to some extent in the hands of the government, but the translation is not. My hon. friend had better address himself to the officers of the House.

Mr. MONK. Surely the government is responsible for the conduct of the business of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is a rule of the House that private Bills should be handed in eight days before the opening of the session. The work has to be done carefully, and as a matter of fact this rule of the House has not been complied with, as most of the Bills were not handed in at the prescribed time. We have only one translator, and when all the Bills come in together, there is necessarily a little delay.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I have a Bill of four lines long that was introduced the second day of the session, and it seems strange that it should be kept back so long, because I am sure that the Bill to which I refer came in before the other private Bills.

Mr. MONK. May I ask if it is the case, as I have been informed, that there are some translators who are drawing salaries and who have not come up here yet to attend to their work? I have been told that is the case, and the names have been given to me.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not know of any.

Mr. S. HUGHES (North Victoria). I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the first minister to a cablegram which appeared in the papers last night in reference to the fact that Canadian beef is not allowed to be supplied to the British troops at the present time. I would suggest that when the papers are being brought down, that any data in connection with the army contracts in reference to the supply of Canadian beef may also be brought down at the same time.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like again to point out that the practice of going into Supply on Private Members' day has not been heretofore pursued during the sessions I have been in this House. Having regard to the fact that there are important government measures which have not been brought down yet, we must protest against departing from the rule which has prevailed during previous sessions. I do not at all wish to obstruct the business of the House, but at the same time I do not want to depart from customs which have been deemed good enough for us in the past, unless some special reason can be shown for that departure.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). I would like to draw the attention of the House to this fact: We do not object at all to the business of the government proceeding; but there are a certain number of very important government Bills on the Order paper which might be proceeded with if the ministers were ready. There is one measure, for instance, in which a great many people, not only in this country, but in the United States and England, who hold Canadian patents, are interested. An Act has been prepared on the subject, but I humbly submit that it should have been ready for submission to the House on the very first days of the session. Some hon. gentlemen opposite know, the Minister of Justice and the hon. gentleman who represents the Minister of Agriculture, who is in charge of the Patent Department, must know, that the decision given by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Power vs. Griffin, has absolutely done away with jurisprudence with respect to an important section of the Patent Act. There are hundreds of patents affected by this decision, which was to the effect that no second extension of time can be given to people who have not imported their patented inventions into Canada during the time prescribed by law. Heretofore extensions of two years have been given from time to time, either by the Commissioner of Patents or by the assistant commissioner. The decision of the Supreme Court has done away with that practice, and as a result has invalidated hundreds of patents. I believe, from an answer given to a question of mine by one of the ministers at the beginning of the session, that it is the intention of the government to introduce an Act not only to amend the Patent Act in this respect, but also to give a retroactive effect to the law—remedial legislation, in fact. This is an important question, and I humbly submit that the measure should be brought before the House and passed as soon as possible, in order to remedy the great evil which has been done to the holders of patents by the unexpected decision of the Supreme Court. I do not at all criticise that decision. It is probably right, but it is altogether at variance with the jurisprudence held on this subject ever since the late Dr. Taché gave a decision on the subject twenty years ago. There are other important Bills on the Order paper which could be dealt with if the government were ready. They are not ready; so that if we make any observation on the motion to go into Committee of Supply, it is not because we are not ready to look into the measures which the government have promised to bring before the House. All we say is that we are not prepared to go into supply now, because we have not been able, during the short time the House has been sitting, to read the reports which have been brought down since the opening of the session. For instance, it has been physically impossible for us to study the Auditor General's Report sufficiently to enable us to criticise with adequate knowledge the items as they come up. I do not think this is quite fair to this side of the House, as it does not afford us the opportunity of dealing with the items in the Supply Bill in the way we are entitled to do.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I do not think that any remarks implying that there is any lack of readiness on the part of the government to go on with the business of the House, are justifiable. I venture to say that there never has been a time, certainly not in recent years, when the business of the government has been more ready for the meeting of parliament. The public documents have been brought down with great promptness. There are more public documents and reports on the Table of the House to-day than is usual at this period. We are still at an early stage of the session, it is true; but if owing to the speedy disposal of questions and motions, or owing to delay in translation, which I think should not occur, because I think we should have officials enough to attend to that more promptly, but that is not the fault of the government—if for these various reasons we reached Government Orders early in the day, and did not proceed with business, the people would ask, what is parliament doing? The people, I am sure, will be glad to know that the routine business is disposed of quickly, and that we are ready to attend to the business of the House. The voting of the supplies is certainly important business of the House, and I am sure we should not be reproached with causing delay. When delay occurs, it is usually because we are asked to put something aside to suit the convenience of hon. members opposite. I think it would be a pity if at this time we adjourned at six o'clock, when the government are ready to go on with business.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance whose duty it is to see that there are enough translators? Is it not the government's? We are not responsible.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not say that my hon. friend is responsible, neither are we. These matters are in the hands of a committee of the House to a great extent. The officials of the House are not servants of the government, but servants of the House, and we among others have a right to complain if they do not attend to their duties.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to know why the government do not go on with the Act to amend the Act respecting the Publication of the Statutes, which is printed in English and French; also the Act to amend the Controverted Elections Act, which is also printed in English and French?

The PRIME MINISTER. I will answer my hon. friend. That is a fair question, though he takes a different ground from what he took a moment ago, when he said we were not ready to go on with the business. On the contrary, the Order paper is full of the business of the government. There are four or five subjects on which we are ready to go on. There is, for instance, a resolution of the Minister of Justice with respect to retiring allowances of judges; another of the Minister of Finance with respect to Civil Service superannuation; another by myself with respect to Chinese immigration. The reason we do not proceed with these matters to-day is that to-day not being a government day, we intended to proceed with them to-morrow, because we thought it would be more accommodating to members to have such important subjects taken up on regular government days, when they would expect them to be brought up. But we thought, as we have exhausted the business allotted to private members to-day, it would be proper to devote a few hours to discussing the estimates, with which the members are more or less familiar. But if hon. members say they are not ready to go on with the estimates to-day, we do not wish to press them, and are willing to adjourn if hon. gentlemen opposite so desire.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well, then, go on.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

At six o'clock, Committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

St. John, N.B., quarantine station—water service, drainage, heating, &c., $8,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. James Sutherland). There was some criticism last night with reference to our spending so much money on furnishing water for this quarantine station. On examining the papers, I find a telegram to the Agriculture Department to be transmitted to the Department of Public Works, saying that the water supply was entirely inadequate and that the situation demanded relief, and that it would cost over $1,500 to provide fresh water for that station during that season. The reason for that is that the water has to be carried by boat from the city. I have here a detailed estimate of the cost, material and work for the water service for this quarantine station:—

250 cubic yards earth excavation.. ....$	100 00
3,500 lineal feet, extra heavy, 6 inch. wrought galvanized iron pipe....	5,964 00
176 flexible screw couplings, galvanized.	1,056 00
30 days service of a diver....	600 00
30 days hire of lighter....	120 00
30 days hire of tug.....	600 00
Ropes, anchors and gear.....	300 00
Labour, laying pipe across channel....	300 00
900 cubic yards rock excavation....	2,700 00
1,765 lineal feet, 6 inch cast iron pipe, 56,480....	1,412 00
2,000 pounds lead for joints....	100 00
2,500 pounds special castings.....	125 00
Labour, laying pipe, gaskets, also coal, &c.....	225 00
Six hydrants....	100 00
Stop cocks and blow-offs.....	75 00
Contingencies.....	2,223 00
	$18,500 00
Work to be done by city of St. John..	4,725 00
	$23,225 00

The city of St. John is laying a portion of this work from the present terminus of the water service to the island, and the government has agreed to pay two-thirds of the cost, which would amount to $4,735. From the information we now have, we will save money annually through having this pipe put in.

Mr. TAYLOR. Are these supplies being bought by tender?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS Tenders will be invited for the whole work. The estimate is made by the chief architect of the department and it is to be hoped that the work will be done within that amount.

Mr. MONK. Is a six inch galvanized pipe to be laid from the city of St. John to the island.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. MONK. In that estimate I see $2,223 for contingencies. I have not the special knowledge required to criticise the estimate, but $18,500 seems a very large amount for the laying of water pipe from St. John to this quarantine island a distance of some two thousand feet.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. It is more than that. What has been done with reference to the heating system ? I called the attention of the chief architect to the fact that the heating system was over the heads of the people in their beds and had a very bad effect. Has anything been done to remedy this ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend took an appropriation last session for the purpose of making that improvement. The chief architect says a change has been made and is satisfactory.

Mr. BROCK. I think there is a matter of greater importance than looking into details in connection with this quarantine station. Last year we voted $17,000 in this connection and this year we are asked to vote $8,000 more. Will that be the last ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The estimate of the department is that this will complete the work.

Alexandria public building, $10,000.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would like to know if a site has been procured, and if so, from whom and when ? I do not want to object particularly to a public building in the village of Alexandria, if it be the policy of the government to build post offices costing some $17,000 each in villages having a population of less than 2,000. Looking at the census of 1901, I find that Alexandria has only a population a little over 1,900. I think that the total number of families in the village is 378. It seems to me that to spend $17,000 on a post office in that village, where the gross revenue is only a little over $2,500, from which you will have to deduct the expense of management and caretaking, will be anything but a profitable investment. However, as I said, I do not wish to make any objection. It is in the county adjoining that in which I reside, and it is no doubt the most important town in that county. But it seems to me a very large expenditure on a post office in a small town. I would like to ask if the land has been acquired and tenders called for for the building ; also will $17,000 complete the post office in the village of Alexandria ? If the land has been acquired, from whom was it purchased ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site has not yet been procured nor the contract let.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I would urge upon my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) to give special consideration to the question of ventilation in public buildings. This has not been attended to as it should have been. Before I left office I called the attention of the chief architect to this point in several instances. I feel also that greater attention should be given to protection against fire. Many of our public buildings have no system of fire protection whatever. The chief architect is a very painstaking officer. I take this opportunity of stating that there is not a better officer in the Department of Public Works. But he has too much work to attend to, and I would call the attention of the minister to the need of giving the chief architect more help, more efficient help.

Mr. SCHELL. I desire to make a remark or two in answer to the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Pringle). The hon. gentleman gives the population of Alexandria as 1,900. I may say that a special census of the town was taken last year, showing that the population was over 2,800. And, since that time Alexandria has been erected into a town.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What was the population by the regular census of 1901.

Mr. SCHELL. It was 1,911.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has it increased 900 in that time ?

Mr. SCHELL. It has. And, more than that, it has grown that much more during the past year. It has grown to such an extent that, within the last year the Union Bank has put up a building and now has finer bank premises than there is in the town of Cornwall. The Bank of Ottawa also has built a bank upon the opposite corner. The town of Alexandria is growing to-day at a rate exceeded by very few towns in eastern Canada or any part of Ontario.

Mr. BROCK. I would point out to the hon. Minister of Public Works, as he has not selected a site in Alexandria, that he is apt to meet with difficulty when he seeks to buy land in a town growing at such a rate as we have just heard of. It seems there has been an increase in one year of 25 per cent, and now there is a further increase of a like proportion. I think the hon. minister will have to add to this estimate, for he will hardly be able to please the people of Alexandria with anything like the money fixed by this vote.

Mr. SCHELL. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) that there are two sites under consideration, one at $2,000 and the other at $2,500.

Mr. BENNETT. How much land ?

Mr. SCHELL. One lot is 66x90 feet; I do not remember the size of the other.

Mr. PRINGLE. I took the trouble to look at the census of 1901, and I find that the population given for Alexandria was 1,911. There were 359 houses in the village and 378 families. It is very extraordinary if the population is increasing at the rate of considerably over 30 per cent a year. I know it was a very ambitious village and anxious to be incorporated last year. It had a special census taken and became incorporated. I would like to know if the village of Alexandria volunteered a site for this public building. I understand they are a very liberal community and would have no hesitation in providing a site. We heard nothing about this public building from 1896 to 1900, when Glengarry was represented by Col. R. R. McLennan. It is only within the last year or so since my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Schell) was elected that this thing has been heard of. There are a number of villages in that section, for instance, Morrisburg, a larger village, which, no doubt, would be very anxious to see a good post office erected. If it is the policy of the government to build $17,000 buildings in towns having a population of less than 2,000, I have no doubt these other towns would be very anxious to have them built.

Mr. BENNETT. Is the proposed site a corner lot ?

Mr. SCHELL. One of the lots I spoke of is a corner lot, the other is not. Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Pringle) appears to be very much worried over this building and over the fact that nothing was done from 1896 to 1900. He knows very well, and I believe that many of the members of this House know the reason why there was no word of any post office during those years. In 1891 it was decided that there should be a Dominion reformatory built in Alexandria, and a vote was passed in this House to provide money for its construction. Before the change of government came, in 1896, the work upon that building was stopped, and when the new government came in they decided that this Dominion reformatory was unnecessary. They did not proceed to build that reformatory as it was then proposed, for what reason I shall not discuss. The fact remains that the site remained unused, and the material collected was left there. When it was decided not to build the reformatory, the people of Alexandria asked that some building should be erected there. The farm land upon which the reformatory was to have been erected, which had been bought for the benefit of some friends of the late government at more than double what it was worth, was sold. And I expect—that is the understanding, or consideration, to my mind—that the returns from that property will go back into this building. The people of Alexandria expect this post office in lieu of the great reformatory they were to have had.

Mr. PRINGLE. I am very glad to get that explanation. We see now that the post office is not to be built because the public service requires it, but simply to please the people of Alexandria, who have been deprived of a reformatory for which a grant was passed during the time of the late government. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Schell) admitted very frankly that the consideration for the erection of this building was the doing away with the reformatory. I am pleased to get that explanation, that it is not on account of the public requirements, but simply to satisfy the people of Alexandria for having taken the reformatory away from them. I cannot conceive that it was for any public requirement, because the revenue from that post office was very trifling, and the building is not a necessity. However, we understand the matter now. The hon. gentleman tells us that there was a property bought at double its value. Well, I am informed that it was bought at a reasonable value, and was sold to some friends of the hon. gentleman for less than half its value.

Mr. SCHELL. That property was bought for the purpose of a reformatory, and Mr. McNeill sold the property for $2,700 to one of the political friends of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. That party sold it to another political friend for $3,700, and a few weeks afterwards that political friend sold it to the government for $5,000. That is the transaction that took place in those days, that is the way they did it. When the government had possession of it, they advertised it for sale, and the best offer they got was $1,800. I advised that the property should not be sold at that time on account of the general depreciation in value all over the country, and it was not sold. They kept it until, I think, the month of December or November last, when the property was sold for $2,800 cash, after some of the buildings on it had been removed. I consider the property sold at its full value, sold for a higher figure than it was disposed of in the first instance when it was proposed to build a reformatory. There are other things in connection with this transaction. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Pringle) says he understands the reason now. Well, I have been very frank in the statements I have made, and they are the actual facts.

Mr. GOURLEY. This discussion ought not to have imported into it any reference like that made by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Schell), because we must remember that this county was represented by a strong man, Col. McLennan, when the Conservative party were in power, and he was not able to get a post office. Now, however, we find that a large and costly post office is to be put up there. But there is one redeeming feature about it. I recollect a year or two ago, shortly after the publication of the census, one of my French colleagues reflected upon the Anglo-Saxon race in Canada—that they were not producing more children. Well, I am proud to say that there is one redeeming feature about this county which seems to justify the vote. It appears that there were 357 families in the county of Glengarry, and since the census the population has increased nearly a thousand ; so that during eighteen months every family must have had triplets. Glengarry is a Scotch county, and therefore we may congratulate ourselves that in this county at least the Anglo-Scotch race is not degenerating.

Mr. BENNETT. The case is somewhat different from a case we had last night. The contract has not yet been let, neither has the site been purchased. Now the hon. member for Glengarry states that a lot was offered to the department at $2,000, and having a frontage of 66 feet, that means $30 a foot. From the fact that one of the most desirable and eligible sites in this thriving town of Alexandria is only worth $30 a foot, I think the minister will hesitate whether to go on with such an expenditure. What is the minister going to do, backed up by his associates at the Council board ? I find on reference to the report of the Postmaster General that the postmaster of that town is allowed now for rent, light and fuel, $120 a year. Now is the minister going to invest the large sum of $17,000 in that building ? That is the proposition, and we know it will mean $20,000 before it is finished. When we consider the site at $2,000 it means about $100 interest on the money invested. Now add to that what must be added in every one of these public buildings, the annual maintenance, add the charges of the caretaker, and I suppose he will not sell his services for less than men are paid in other places, and that means a cost of $400 a year. I do not know whether there is in this enterprising town an electric light, but assuming there is, that light will cost another hundred dollars. Then let us add to that the sum of $175 or $200 a year for heating, and we find a grand total of $1675 a year as the actual cost to this country. Surely the Minister of Public Works is going to hesitate before asking the country to incur an annual expenditure of upwards of $2,000 a year where to-day we are getting a sufficient service for $120 a year. The hon. gentleman who represents that riding does not show that the present accommodation at this post office is inadequate. If it is inadequate then it behooves the Postmaster General to ask the postmaster there to make the needed enlargement. Are we going to lay down the principle that in a town of less than 2,000 people there is to be an expenditure every year of $2,000 to maintain a service that is now carried out for $120 ? No doubt the Minister of Public Works is beset by party exigencies, and I concede that he has made out a fairly strong case. Now how does the hon. member for Glengarry compare to-day with the gentleman who preceded him ? Col. McLennan was not able to impress upon the late Conservative administration the necessity of a reformatory in that part of the province, and had his wishes prevailed with the present government a large building would have been erected there. But the hon. gentleman who now represents that riding has no such large ideas. I have no doubt the establishment of a large building at this point would have served very useful ends, but he says : My constituents will be satisfied with securing the expenditure of a smaller sum of money. And if the hon. gentleman gauges the intelligence of his constituents in this way, I am sure no one else will grumble. The Minister of Public Works is laying down this principle to-day that he is going to saddle this country with an annual expenditure of $2,000 to meet a service that is now carried on for $120. I say he should hesitate. He cannot make flesh of one riding and fish of another. Surely he is not going to say to the Conservatives that because they send a Conservative to this House they cannot have a public building ; and he is not going to say to the Liberals on the other hand : Provided you send a representative to support this administration you can have a public building.

Mr. BRODER. As the government propose to establish a post office in the small town of Alexandria, I think it my duty to speak for the town of Morrisburg. It is easy to understand why the hon. gentleman is anxious to have this post office built at Alexandria. There is no doubt what is the real reason when hon. gentlemen opposite got into power in 1896. There was material on the ground to build a reformatory, and they saw fit to take it, and now offer these people a peace offering in the shape of a post office. It is not a post office, it is a peace offering. The town of Morrisburg has a revenue of something over $3,400, while the town of Alexandria, with all its prosperity, has only some $2,600, then there is a double reason why the town of Morrisburg ought to have a post office and custom house. They have a rented building for the custom house as well as for the post office. There is a stronger reason why Morrisburg should have a public building. If you want a stronger reason I am sorry to say that I can give it to you in the fact that there is a large Grit majority and if there is any shrinkage in the town that is the reason for it. There is the strongest reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should do something for their friends in Morrisburg and I do not suppose that they would care who the medium was if they got from their friends here what many of them would like to see—a reasonably valuable building. We do not ask more. If Alexandria is worth $17,000, Morrisburg ought to be worth $20,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite have gone away from a settled principle which was generally adopted in this country of not erecting these buildings in places of less than 5,000 population. That was the generally adopted rule. Whenever it was departed from for any reason whatever by the party in power, the Liberals, who were then in opposition, raised a terrible storm in this House. Now they are as quiet as mice. Why are these hon. gentlemen going so far away from one of their settled principles? They have found out that human nature was just the same in 1896 as it is in 1903 and no man understands this better than the hon. Minister of Public Works. He is going to settle with his friends in Alexandria. They ought to have the building that was proposed to erect previous to 1896, when Col. McLennan was the member. The government did not erect this building because they were afraid that some credit would attach to Col. McLennan and his friends, but now that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Schell) is very anxious that something should be done to settle the account it is proposed to proceed with this building. That is what this is for. It is not being erected in the general public interest. The hon. member for Glengarry does not even say that it is in the public interest. There is not a man in that county who says that the general interest demands any such building.

Mr. SCHELL. They all do.

Mr. BRODER. Not one. The hon. member for Glengarry says that the town has increased 1,000 in population in one year. What is the cause of it? There have been no new factories built at Alexandria; there has been an addition made to the carriage factory that would add perhaps 50 people to the town and no more. There has not been the wonderful expansion that the hon. gentleman talks about. Have hon. gentlemen opposite any plans of this building showing the estimated cost? If they have they have not been laid on the Table. They ought to be laid on the Table. We do not know anything about the size of this building, or the shape of it, and hon. gentlemen opposite do not know anything about the size of it.

An hon. MEMBER. And they never will.

Mr. BRODER. This committee ought to have some information in reference to the building we are going to erect, and a full statement of the estimated cost. If we vote $17,000 this year you may want $17,000 more next year, because Alexandria may grow a thousand in population before next year, and you will want to add to the building. For a post office in a small village like Alexandria, $17,000!—Well, there are 500 towns in this country that have equally good claims upon hon. gentlemen opposite if this is the rule they are going to adopt, and if it is they should surely let the country know it. Now, I venture to say that $2,000 for a lot in Alexandria of the size mentioned by the hon. gentleman is an enormous price. There are a great many towns that would give a desirable lot to erect a building upon if the government would give them a $17,000 post office. I venture to say there is not another town in eastern Ontario which would not be glad to give you a site for a public building. We will give you one in Morrisburg free and if you are going in for good bargains, you never will have a better chance. This Alexandria business is not a good bargain. This is the settlement of an old account; hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to repudiate it, but the town would not allow them to do it, and so they have to come to time with the cash. I want to speak in all seriousness, and to say that I have a right to demand some consideration for the town of Morrisburg. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think it is badly represented, but that is the people's business; it is not your business. I say it is fairly well represented, and I demand our rights in this matter.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Mr. Broder), I think has made out a strong case for the town of Morrisburg. I would not like to say, however, that the people of that town are badly represented after the able speech that the hon. gentleman has just delivered. My hon. friend is mistaken when he says that it is the usual custom to lay the plans of proposed buildings on the Table. The custom has been first to take a vote, and then, according to the vote, the architect makes a plan suitable to the place in which the building is to be erected.

Mr. SPROULE. I would just say in regard to these post offices, that I have thought for some years past, and I referred to it last year, as I do again now, that in all towns where they want public buildings there should be an effort made to get these towns to give the sites free. I know that several towns in Canada have offered sites free in the past, while in others large amounts of money have been paid for sites. I do not think that such should be the case. If an enterprising town is anxious to get a public building, it will usually be found willing to provide the site, or, at least, to bear a portion of the cost of the site. I think the government ought to endeavour to get a site from every town that requires a public building. I am not in favour of putting up expensive buildings in small towns. I have always thought that where we could get accommodation for the post office, or the custom house, or other public service, at a very much less cost than the cost of erecting and maintaining a public building, we should not put up public buildings. If it is a fact that in the town of Alexandria you could rent a suitable place and pay for rent, heating, lighting and everything about $300 a year, while, on the other hand the interest upon this proposed expenditure and the cost of heating and lighting will be somewhere between $1,200 and $2,000 a year, why should you expend this amount for maintenance in addition to having a large debt hanging over you for the erection of a building? It is not good business to do this. In most of these places there is no provision to prevent the destruction by fire of everything belonging to the service. There is no safe, or vault or anything but the plain building. Yet, we go to the expense of erecting a building and saddling upon the country a permanent debt involving an annual charge for maintenance of three times that which would be incurred by renting a building. We have this expense imposed upon us from year to year, because the government thought fit, either to strengthen the position of their friends, or for some other purpose that we do not know, perhaps for the purpose of carrying elections, to saddle the country with a heavy permanent expense without receiving anything in return. The government ought to consider this, and I think the country ought to know what an expenditure of this kind involves. It is not a good business transaction. I am sure every one will agree with that. I can go into Ontario towns by the dozen that are larger than Alexandria, that do more business, that have a larger gross revenue from the post office and that have never yet asked to have a post office built. I think that when a principle is adopted it should be applied to the whole country instead of picking out a favoured locality here and there, a small town here and another there, and let places twice or three times as large go without the advantage of an expenditure of this kind. I do not think this is right. The government, when it puts up a large and costly building and saddles the country with a permanent expense as well as a permanent debt, when the same conveniences could be supplied by renting a building for less than one quarter the money required for erecting a building, is not doing the best that could be done for the country.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Chairman, before we leave this interesting subject of establishing post offices in the Dominion, I desire to call the hon. minister's attention to another deserving town. I hope I shall be able to get the minister's attention, because if I succeed in getting his attention for a few minutes, I have no doubt I will be rewarded by having an appropriation made for this town which is very much a parallel case to the case of Alexandria.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. What is the population?

Mr. LENNOX. The population is not over 1,500 or 1,600, and in this respect I regret to say that it has not increased with the rapidity of the town of Alexandria. It is a steadily growing town. They have the average number of births from time to time, but I do not think there has been such a rapid increase in the population as in the case of Alexandria. I refer, of course, to the town of Alliston, in the south riding of Simcoe. I want to be perfectly fair with the government and not take away from them any credit they are fairly entitled to. I will admit at the outset that the government have done pretty fairly for Alliston already. It is true that we have never had, in the south riding of Simcoe to my knowledge, one dollar expended on any public work. It is quite true, too, that we have never asked for the expenditure of one dollar on any public work, but the government have done something for the residents of South Simcoe and particularly of Alliston. In the neighbourhood of Alliston there resided Mr. Joseph Whitesides, a very respectable farmer and a candidate in the last election, who has been appointed postmaster of the town of Aliston, and it is on this account that I am so anxious to secure for the town of Alliston a post office. It is pretty nearly a parallel case with Alexandria. The net revenue for Alexandria is $1,595.78 and the net revenue for Alliston is $1,437.98. In urging this matter with all due earnestness, I call the minister's attention to the fact that this is the only way in which you can get public money into the riding of South Simcoe as far as I know. Almost any where else there are a variety of things on which you can spend public money, whether it is in the interest of the country or not, but in the riding of South Simcoe there is nothing on which you can expend public treasure except to build a post office in Alliston. It is true we have harbours; we have a little spot—I do not know if it has a name—on the south shore of Kempenfeldt Bay, which closely resembles the port of Hawkestone, on the other side, in which the government has built a dock. I have not seen my way clear to ask the government to expend any money upon a dock on the south shore, although I have been urged to do so by the way of equalizing the expenditure on the Hawkestone dock. I hope the minister will pardon me for urging this, perhaps too persistently, but having regard to the fact that the postmaster, who has been to some extent rewarded, has not all the accommodation he is entitled to; having regard to the fact—I know the minister will not overlook this—that South Simcoe has always returned a Conservative; having regard more particularly to the fact that there is no other means of expending public money in the riding; I hope the minister and the Cabinet will take this matter into their serious consideration, and will in the supplementary estimates put in an appropriation for a post office in the town of Alliston.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the item is adopted I hope the Minister of Public Works will state in reply to the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Pringle) what the policy of he government is in regard to this matter. To say the least of it, it is not a businesslike way in the expenditure of public money, to select a little town here and there over the country and to spend $17,000 or $20,000 for a post office in it. If it is a good policy for the town of Alexandria in the public interest of Canada, it is a good policy I suppose for every other town of like importance. I have urged upon the government during the past two sessions that some definite principle should be laid down with regard to public works of this character. It is only right that the minister should state what the policy of the government is. Is it the policy of the government that in towns of this size there shall be a public building costing $17,000 or $20,000 for a post office alone. If it is not the policy of the government, why is an exception made in this case ? If it is the policy of the government, why is that policy not carried out in regard to other towns ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I can remember that for a great many years when in opposition we demanded from the Conservative government to know their policy with regard to the erection of public buildings. Probably, in some cases we are not as careful as we might be to avoid following the example of our predecessors in office. I said last night that if we went into this policy of erecting public buildings at all, the principle town in each of the counties has a very strong claim. You can look at the records since confederation and you will find that previous governments have erected public buildings in towns which would compare very unfavourably with the town of Alexandria. There may be something in what my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) says, that the government is perhaps everywhere saving large expenditures of money by stopping what they consider to be unnecessary works in the public interest, and spending a very small amount instead. With regard to the policy of the government at the present time, I am not in a position to announce any particular change. Each application will no doubt be considered upon its merits. Previous governments having erected public buildings all through the various provinces, those places which have not had a public building feel very much agrieved at what they call the injustice done them in comparison with other places. That rule applies whether they are supporters of the government or not. My hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) says there is only one thing the government could spend money on in his constituency and therefore he wants a post office. That being the case in many rural constituencies they would appreciate very much if a nice public building were erected in the county town which they take so much pride in. I live in a rural constituency and in the chief town of my county we had a very strong claim for a public building. In that town the revenue derived justified the erection of a public building, but although demands were made it was always refused by the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden) and his friends when they were in power. I am quite willing to admit that there is great difficulty in satisfying the country with regard to any policy on this matter. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) has the great honour of living in a large city and we expend hundreds of thousands of dollars, I might almost say millions of dollars on public buildings in that city. We are asking now for a vote of $250,000 for a public building in his city and it will cost a good deal more than that before it is ready for occupation. Those of us who represent rural constituencies like my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) and myself find that our people are not altogether well satisfied that all these large expenditures should be made in the city constituencies. Whether that is defensible or not from every standpoint, the fact remains that every member in this House from a rural constituency, be he Liberal or Conservative, knows that his friends do take that view, and they look for some recognition of this kind. This is one of the largest places in the constituency. It is an old established, growing and prosperous place. And the people feel that in view of what has taken place elsewhere, they are entitled to a public building. The cost of the building will be kept within the amount of the appropriation. It is not my intention to ask for a further vote to complete this work.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I hope that my hon. friend did not seriously put forward the proposition that because some previous government made appropriations which might not be defended, that is any reply for him on this occasion.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a good deal of human nature in man.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend's statement of the policy of the government is a frank statement that they have no policy at all beyond political exigencies. They have no policy except to erect public buildings wherever they are demanded by political exigencies. That is a very frank statement on the part of my hon. friend. If his explanation means anything at all it means that whenever political pressure is brought on the government, the government will take that into consideration and expend public money provided the pressure be only strong enough. I do not think that that is after all a very high standard of public administration. I do not know that my hon. friend would so regard it himself. I am not criticising him personally, but the policy and the system, and I must say that he has been remarkably frank. Is that the way in which the government, who are trustees for the people, and who are spending, not their own, but the money of the people, should deal with public revenue. Suppose they were to apply to the public expenditure the principle on which any ordinary corporation conducts its affairs, would they not have some policy with regard to expenditures of this kind ? Would they not be able to announce to the public, as private corporations do to their shareholders, some policy regulating these matters ? But no, my hon. friend fails to do this. He frankly confesses that the government has no policy and simply confesses that the government puts up these public buildings wherever they think the expenditure will do political good. In all seriousness, apart from party politics, I think the government should announce some policy. They are not spending their own money but that of the people, and they are spending it as trustees of the people, and certainly it does not seem at all satisfactory in the public interest that they should spend that money for the reasons given by the Minister of Public Works to-night.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand and Monck). I come from a town which I consider a very good one indeed, but which certainly has not the population which the hon. gentleman would consider entitled it to a public building. It has a population in the neighbourhood of one thousand, but some few years ago, in the days of the late government, there was expended there the sum of $14,000 public money in the erection of a post office. On that occasion no request was made to the town to supply a site free of expense. The government in those days did not act on that line and should not to-day. If the government require a lot for a public building, they should pay for it and not encourage the bonus system of putting up buildings in towns which gave a bonus in order to obtain them. I may say that that post office has given satisfaction to the people of the town and that no caretaker has been required for it, which rather contradicts the anticipation of an hon. member opposite that the post office in Alexandria would necessitate a caretaker at a cost of $400 per annum to the people. As representing a rural constituency, I heartily agree with my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). His case and mine are very much similar. We have no very large towns in our constituencies, but is that any reason why all the expenditure of public money should be made in the cities and large towns and none in those constituencies which do not enjoy such large centres. The city from which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition comes—the most excellent city of Halifax—had an expenditure, in the days of the late government, of I believe $350,000 on a drill shed alone. I am not going into the argument as to the utility of expending so large a sum in that connection, but merely wish to point out that our large cities have been given, at the public expense, extremely fine public buildings and should not object to small places getting a far less share of the public money. Besides we should not consider merely the population of the town alone, but also take into consideration the fact that it is a center of a district, and the whole population of that district ought to be taken into account. We are asked by the hon. leader of the opposition to apply the same principles as would be applied by a private business corporation, but we know very well that we cannot apply those principles to the same extent in administration of public affairs. These public buildings are not only intended for the transaction of public business but also to beautify the localities in which they are built.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Now my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has got a principle and a policy laid down for him, and that is the policy of beautifying the different localities. I think on the whole that that is a superior policy to the one announced by the hon. minister. I am glad at all events to commend it to the Minister of Public Works for what it is worth. But I was not making any distinction between cities, towns and villages, but was simply pointing out the necessity of our having a policy in this matter. According to the very frank statement of the Minister of Public Works it is not the public interests which governs, but political exigencies, and these public buildings are not erected on any settled policy at all, but simply as they are necessitated by political pressure. I am quite willing that my remarks should apply to Halifax or any other place just as much as to any town or village in this country, and I should think that would be evident to any hon. gentleman who listened to what I said.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) would look up ancient history and see how long this House was held up by the opposition of that day, when the late government brought down a proposal to spend money on the erection of a post office at Cayuga, he perhaps would be convinced that he was rather rash in his remarks and rushed in where angels fear to tread. No people could possibly have condemned the government in stronger or more vehement language than his friends did for the building of that very post office, and now he comes forward and offers that as a defence of the conduct of the present government for doing likewise. If it was wrong in one case, it must be wrong in the other, and in proportion as the hon. gentleman commends it now he condemns the conduct of his friends in the past. He must be careful to inform himself of the history of the past before he takes such a position as he has taken to-night. I find some other cases similar to this, and I would like to read them for the benefit of the House. At Alexandria, where it is proposed to build a post office, the gross revenue is $2,664; the table does not give the cost of rent. At Alliston, in Simcoe, the gross revenue is $2,434. At Aurora, one of the thriving towns in the riding represented by the hon. Postmaster General himself, the revenue is $2,974, and the cost for rent, fuel and light is $140. So that if you take the interest on $15,000, if this post office only costs that, at 3½ per cent, it amounts to $525 a year, besides which there are repairs, a caretaker at a cost of about $400 a year, and all the other incidental expenses. Why should you saddle the country with a permanent expenditure of from $1,200 to $2,000 a year for what you can get for $140? If the hon. Minister of Public Works desires to carry on a conversation while I am speaking, and the hon. member for Haldimand wishes to interrupt me, I would like him to understand we have rights in the opposition which we intend to exercise, and we expect to be treated with the courtesy to which we are entitled. I listened to him without interrupting him, and I ask him to extend to me the courtesy that is usually extended by one gentleman to another. I have heard the hon. Postmaster General years ago, in the time of the Conservative regime, saying that the principle we had adopted with regard to building post offices was that when we could get the accommodation necessary at a reasonable price by renting, we would not put up a public building. But he went further and declared it to be the policy of the government, when they proposed to put up a public building or to improve a harbour, to first ask the town or city where the improvement was to be made, whether it would be prepared to provide a site, or to contribute something towards the improvement. The hon. member for Haldimand says the town should not be required to do that, because this is the only opportunity we have of spending money in these rural constituencies. It may or may not be; but many of our towns would gladly give a free site if by doing so they could get a public building. They have offered it over and over again, towns of considerable importance, and the offer has not been accepted. In this case, what we complain of is that the Minister of Public Works does not inquire what the town will give, but purchases a very expensive site, probably from some friend of the government. Let me name some more of these towns. Blenheim has a gross revenue of $2,310, and no post office. Brighton has a revenue of $2,053, but no post office; Bowmanville, $2,721; Burford, $2,283; Campbellford, $2,344; but I need not go over them all. They are here in large numbers in the hon. Postmaster General's own report, showing that in most cases the people are accommodated at an outlay of from $65 to $150 a year for rent, fuel and light; and when we can obtain the necessary accommodation for such a small sum, why should we saddle the country with an expenditure of from $15,000 to $20,000, and a permanent outlay of from $1,200 to $2,000 a year? I do not think the country will endorse it or regard it as good business.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand). I have to thank the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) for two things: First for having given me a lesson in manners. I must apologize to the hon. gentleman for having taken part in a short conversation with my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works while he was speaking. I think I listen to the hon. member of East Grey as often as any man in this House does. I find in his speeches very often a great deal of valuable information, which as a young member I am glad to obtain. I do not think in this particular case the hon. member should have called the attention of the Committee so pointedly to my case, because there were several gentlemen on his own side who were engaged in conversation; but they were behind his back, and probably he did not see them. Second: because he has called attention to some ancient history. That has always been a favourite pursuit of mine, and I have gathered from it that in the case of this very Cayuga post office, the hon. gentleman himself supported and voted for it. If so, how can he condemn the government for undertaking to do what he approved of in years gone by?

Mr. SPROULE. So far as my memory enables me to speak, I cannot say that I ever voted for it or supported it; but I am only pointing to the fact that the hon. gentleman is condemning his own friends so unstintedly when he cites that as an example to justify what is being done to-night.

Mr. LANCASTER. In view of what has been said by the hon. member for Haldimand, I think I ought to call his attention to a little modern history in the form of the Auditor General's report, which has been received only a few days ago. Looking into that report, I find under the head of Cayuga public building that the caretaker, G. A. Gibson, a name well known to me, got $50.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand). I may tell the hon. gentleman that he is also the postmaster.

Mr. LANCASTER. I understood the hon. member for Haldimand to tell the House very frankly that there was no caretaker in the Cayuga post office. Of course, I do not live as near Cayuga as my hon. friend, but I live near enough to be able to look up these things. As we are getting more information from the hon. member for Haldimand than we are from the Minister of Public Works, I think we ought to warn him to give us correct information, but, at the same time to encourage him to give us all he can. I will follow that Cayuga business for just a few more items. For instance, I find here expenditures amounting to $721 including repairs, polished brass door handles, oak grill and corners and so on. This post office at Cayuga was not supposed to be costing anything more than the ordinary expenditure, but last year, by the Auditor General's report there was this expenditure of $721 including caretaker. This is an instance in which the Minister of Public Works might perhaps do better than rely entirely upon the hon. member for Haldimand for information to be given to this House. I do not know what this expenditure would have been if the hon. member (Mr. Thompson) had been at home. He was away in England—properly enough, no doubt. But, in his absence, or before he went or after he came back, these expenditures of $721 of which he knew nothing, took place. I would almost be inclined to urge the Minister of Public Works to keep the hon. member at home so that he may look after some of these expenditures. I trust that when we come to the Postmaster General's estimates he will move to strike out some of these amounts as being improper. He had better find out who this G. A. Gibson is and make him refund that $50, as he is not a caretaker in a regular sense and has no right to it according to the statement of the hon. member for Haldimand.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I understood the hon. member for Glengarry—and I would like to ask if I did correctly understand him, for I have no wish to misrepresent him—he told us that before the item was put into the estimates last year to buy the site a census had been taken of the village of Alexandria. That census had been taken by the authorities there and they made the number something over 2,800, if I understood him correctly.

An hon. MEMBER. It was circus day.

Mr. SCHELL. 2,280.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood him to say 2,800. An hon. gentleman suggests that the census was taken while a circus was in town. I think I must have understood the hon. gentleman correctly, because his figures showed an increase of about 1,000, for someone who followed him asked if the place had increased eight or nine hundred in a year. I would like to ask if the census was taken prior to the $7,000 being put in the estimates last year to purchase a site ?

Mr. SCHELL. No, that census was not taken prior to the $7,000 being put in the estimates. The census was taken by the authority of the reeve and council, and taken under oath, as the census of that kind must always be, as the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) probably knows, and the statement was forwarded to Toronto with the request that the place be incorporated as a town.

Mr. BENNETT. At what time of the year was it ?

Mr. SCHELL. It was in 1902, I think in September or October.

An hon. MEMBER. Was there a circus there then ?

Mr. SCHELL. No, there was no circus.

An hon. MEMBER. Was there a fall fair on ?

Mr. SCHELL. No, there was no fall fair.

Mr. PRINGLE. Before the item passes I wish to place myself fairly on record with regard to this matter. Personally if it is the policy of the government to erect a seventeen thousand dollar building in towns of less than 2,000 population, there is no county outside of the county of Stormont in which I would rather see those buildings erected than in the county of Gengarry. I raised this question largely to ascertain from the government what their policy was in regard to the erection of post offices. I understood from the hon. member from Glengarry that it was not erected because the public service required it, but it was erected in consideration of the government having deprived the county of Glengarry of the reformatory for which an estimate was passed during the term of the late government. But, though I desired to ascertain the policy of the government, I have not ascertained very clearly what they intend to do with regard to post offices in towns the size of Alexandria.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the Minister of Public Works to say something about a free site. Is it the policy of the government to get free sites for all the public buildings that are erected ? What free sites have already been given ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry I have not the list of sites that have been given, but I know that such things have been done.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that in the riding I have the honour to represent there is a large, flourishing town by the name of Campbellford. It has a population of between two and three thousand. It is a manufacturing town and I think the ex-Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) will bear me out in saying that it is one of the busiest and most flourishing towns in eastern Ontario. I am not opposing the government in building post offices, but I think we should have some mode under which the population of the places in which these buildings are to be erected should be taken into consideration, and not show partiality. I can remember very well when the Minister of Public Works was in opposition, I used to hear considerable from him on that line. Now, I hope he will not mete out to me what he thought it unfair for the Conservative government to mete out to him. I hope he will not discriminate against my riding because it happens to be represented by a Conservative. That is a line of argument, that I remember, he used to use in regard to his own flourishing village. Speaking seriously, it has always seemed absurd to me for hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are criticised by members on this side, to say, in effect. 'You're another ; you did it.' That is the most absurd argument that could be advanced by an intelligent man. I can understand that I may have made mistakes ; I can understand that the Conservative government may have made mistakes ; but I cannot see any common sense in these hon. gentlemen opposite arraigning the Conservative government before the House and country for making mistakes, and, when they themselves do the very things which they condemned in others, seek to justify themselves by the one answer, 'You did it.' That is the very height of hypocrisy. If they find they are wrong in the past, let them say frankly : We made a mistake, and we are going to take the responsibility of carrying out the principles that we condemned you for when you were in power.

Mr. CLANCY. I want to make a last appeal to my hon. friend. I have the honour of representing a riding containing two towns which are of great importance, Wallaceburg and Dresden. They are among the best business towns of the province. One yields a revenue of $4,000 and the other of $2,247. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has had an application for a public building in either of these towns, such as is being built in Alexandria. Within the last year a building has been erected in each of these places costing over half a million dollars, I mean the two sugar factories. There is a sad story connected with the history of public buildings, or the lack of public buildings in the county of Bothwell. The Liberals said that when Bothwell was represented by a Liberal it was punished for thirty years for sending a Liberal to parliament. There were many salty tears shed by hon. gentlemen opposite on that ground. To-day that riding has changed its political allegiance, and it is again being punished for the same reason. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me what solution he can offer us for this problem ?

An hon. MEMBER. Suicide.

Mr. CLANCY. Well, that is probably what it is coming to, because I see in the newspapers that that riding is to disappear in the new Redistribution Bill.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall take a note of the two towns the hon. gentleman mentions. I would just say to the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) that he misunderstood me altogether. In his county, if I remember right, the county town had a very fine building, and some of these places are not so favourably situated.

Mr. MACLEAN. There is an agitation in the country to-day in favour of a rural postal delivery. That is an idea that is growing rapidly in the United States, and the farmers of Canada are asking to have the same thing. This money that is now being wasted on these public buildings, if applied to rural post office delivery, would give the farmers a substantial benefit for their money. For $500, which is the interest on these post offices, you could have four good rural postal delivery routes established; and for the money expended on thirty of such buildings, which we shall probably be asked to vote for, you could establish eighty rural postal delivery routes. That is something the people want. The government have been asked if they have a policy in regard to rural mail delivery, and they say they have it under consideration. I fear that their answer will be that they cannot afford the money. I appeal to the members of this House who come from rural constituencies to ask the government to cease wasting money in unproductive ways, and devote it to rural postal delivery. Let them at least commence with an experiment of 50 or 100 routes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Since the Minister of Public Works is receiving appeals for public buildings in towns of over 2,000 of a population, I wish to put in an appeal for the town of Durham in my constituency. It must be known to many members of this House that this is one of the most thriving and prosperous towns in Ontario, rapidly increasing in industry and population. It is very much in need of a public building of the character we are now discussing.

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin). I do not hear the hon. gentleman complaining so much of the want of post office facilities. If it is the policy of the government to erect buildings in places of the size of Alexandria, there are several towns of that size in my constituency in need of public buildings. I will mention Rodney, West Lorne and Dutton, large and thriving villages with no public buildings. I am not anxious to have buildings erected where they are not necessary, I do not want to see public money squandered, but if we are going to squander it I want a share for my constituency.

Mr. INGRAM. The Minister of Public Works should remember that he has just now heard from an independent member of the House, and if he wants his support, let him promise him two or three post offices in his constituency.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the policy of the government with regard to building post offices ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have explained as fully as I could that this vote is supplementary to the vote given last session.

Mr. SPROULE. He must have some policy with regard to putting up these public buildings.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The policy of the government is to erect these buildings where they are required, having due regard to the public interest and the revenue received.

Mr. SPROULE. If these are the rules we can only turn up the Postmaster General's report and find that they are violated in a hundred instances. So that, he is either admitting his own act, or, otherwise, is dishonouring his own rule, because, when you take places like Owen Sound, where there is a revenue of $14,000, you find there is no post office built there, but seven years ago I was there when the present Postmaster General was dangling that question before the people of North Grey, and saying that if they wanted, as the late Mr. Hardy said, 'warm justice,' they should send a supporter of the government to parliament. He said: 'Here is a thriving town and your friends have been in power for a number of years and they have not put a public building up.' He went around and looked at two or three sites that he said would be eligible sites for a post office, yet, that town which has a revenue of $14,000 has no post office. The hon. Minister of Public Works said last year: 'Our principle is this: If we require a post office, a custom house and an inland revenue office, we make an effort to put up one building that will accommodate the three, as we think it is better that we should have all these buildings together.' There is at Owen Sound, a post office, a custom house and an inland revenue office, and the three of them are realizing a large revenue, but there is no post office building. What rule is the hon. gentleman going to apply? Now, he has a post office rented there from one of his friends at $600 a year. However, I am not complaining if it appears that this plan has supplied the needs of the place, because, I hold that if the public needs can be supplied in this way for a small outlay, the government are not justified in making the large outlay necessary for the erection of public buildings. I ask the hon. gentleman what principle has he adopted, and if he has adopted the principle that was enunciated last year, why he does not follow it more closely, and why is it that we have such glaring examples of improper expenditures as the case that has been cited here to-night.

Bowmanville, public buildings, $10,000.

Mr. BROCK. I would like to ask the hon. minister if he has bought a property in Bowmanville on which to put this post office, and if so, will he say from whom, and what figure has been paid for it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A site has not been purchased. There are some negotiations going on with the town, and I had an interview with members of the council. There has been a proposition made by the town to take some property they have, but the negotiation has not been completed. I hope that we will be able to come to some agreement that will be satisfactory, because this site will be more satisfactory perhaps than any other site we could obtain.

Mr. BROCK. Bowmanville is a very old town. It has been in existence and the post office has been there for about 100 years. I am not aware that the town has been increasing in population lately, and I have not heard that there has been any great fault found with the present post office arrangements there. Is there a demand from Bowmanville that $15,000 should be spent there? The hon. minister must remember that they have done a large business in the post office there at an expense of about $300 a year, and I do not think there has been such an expansion of trade in the town, or that there have been new factories established to an extent that would justify a very large expenditure at the present time. I say justify—I mean justify upon anything like business principles. I cannot attempt to enter into all the reasons that might induce the government to erect a post office in that town. But, I find that a new principle has been enunciated. We used to get most of our explanations in reference to expenditures from the minister himself, but I find that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Schell) has spoken for his county and has given us some valuable information on some points, and I would suggest that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Beith) might probably give us a little information on this subject, together with the reasons why the important town of Bowmanville should have a $15,000 expenditure for a post office. Now, Mr. Chairman, the government are supplying the House with a rod with which to beat the backs of the people of Canada for a great many years to come. We know how demoralizing the cry is in the United States' 'to the victors belong the spoils,' but I can assure you that this is being taken note of in Canada to-day and that the honest, respectable Reformers are the people who are finding the most fault with it.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. BROCK. There is one of them; he is endeavouring to hide his light. The government have been asked this evening upon what principle they are carrying out the erection of these public buildings. I do not think that is an unreasonable question to ask them. I think the hon. Minister of Public Works is quite capable of saying upon what principle the government are acting. It is a pleasure to go into matters with him because he so good-natured and I think he should allow his good nature to manifest itself to explain to the country, not to the opposition, upon what principle they are acting. Are you going to spend an amount of money proportionate to the size of the town, the village, or the city in which you are putting up these public buildings or are you going to take note of the important demands made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) and which is being made by the farmers throughout the province of Ontario very largely for a rural postal delivery ? Take the expenditure of $17,000 that you are making in Alexandria —the interest upon that sum alone will go a long way towards supplying the farmers of my hon. friend's constituency with a postal delivery to say nothing of the convenience it would be to them at the same time. It is, I know, a new departure, but the government have been making a great many new departures. When they were in opposition they took one course, now that they are in power, now that they are able to dispense patronage and now that they are in receipt of handsome salaries as ministers they are taking another course. We are anxious, we on this side of the House to know on what principle this expenditure is based, because we wish to see that the principle is applied in every case fairly and equitably. If the Minister of Public Works will to-night commit the government or commit himself to a principle, we will be prepared to let estimates of this kind through not only this session but other sessions without very much criticism, because we are not so anxious to criticise the particular items as we are the principle of the thing. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has characterized the action of the minister pretty strongly, and therefore he ought in duty not only to the country, but to his own friends, give an explanation. I am sorry to see so few of the gentlemen on the back benches coming to the assistance of the Minister of Public Works, or any other minister for that matter. They seem to have entrusted the affairs of their constituents to the members of the cabinet, when in the best interest of their people they ought to look after those interests themselves. Last night my hon. friend (Mr. Boyd) had to draw the attention of the government to grievances in Manitoba and the North-west. There was not a Liberal member from the west to speak for that great and growing country, and it had to be done by a Conservative member. I am endeavouring to relieve the members of the government to some extent from a very unpleasant and very difficult duty, for if it is a very difficult duty for the Minister of Public Works it must be doubly so for other members of the government who have not that versified knowledge of general affairs that he has. Some of his supporters behind him are voluble enough at times, and I do not see why they should be silent now and allow money to be expended without a word of explanation and without being able to report to their constituents upon what principle the government is acting.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) asked a pertinent question as to whether the people of Bowmanville, in the county of Durham, requested this expenditure to be made. My hon. friend (Mr. Brock) seems very much opposed to expenditures of this kind, but I may tell him that this matter was as urgently pressed upon the government by the people of Bowmanville as was another expenditure pressed by two deputations from the city of Toronto, and it is my opinion that the Bowmanville expenditure is every bit as defensible as the other. I was pleased to give my support to the expenditure in Toronto although I had some little doubt, still I thought it was for the national benefit.

Mr. CLARKE. What was that expenditure for ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That Fair of yours.

Mr. CLARKE. The Dominion Exhibition, was it not ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. I would like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) to remember that the Conservative government put an item in the estimates for a building in Bowmanville, and I think we are justified in following that example when we see that in this old prosperous and rich county of Durham the comparatively small town of Bowmanville gives us a revenue of $15,000 a year.

Mr. SPROULE. It is $4,500 if the Postmaster General is right.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This building will be for Customs, Inland Revenue and Post Office and the total revenue is over $15,000. I think the expenditure for a small public building in a town like that is perfectly justifiable on public grounds and I believe that the people of Bowmanville had a very strong claim upon this government as it had on the Conservative government who put an item in the estimates for this work.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What is the total cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $10,000 or $12,000.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). But you vote $10,000 this year and $5,000 last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The amount I stated was for the building alone.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I was not in the election in West Durham some years ago, but it was there I first heard of a post office for Bowmanville. A couple of nights before the election, the friends of gentlemen opposite issued circulars to the faithful calling on them to vote for Robert Beith as member for West Durham in order that they would be in a position to appear before this government and get a post office. I would like to know if the minister could inform us who was responsible for the issuing of that circular.

Mr. BENNETT. 'Cap' Sullivan.

Mr. BEITH. I wish to state to the hon. member (Mr. Hughes)——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Beith) will be good enough to speak to the House ; I don't want to talk to him.

Mr. BEITH. I wish to say to the House that no such circulars were issued previous to my election in 1902, nor was there any promise from the government either directly or indirectly that a public building would be put up in Bowmanville. I might say to the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock), who asked me with regard to the necessity for a public building in Bowmanville, that prior to the Liberal party coming into power and when the government which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) had the honour to support was in office, a deputation came down from Bowmanville to interview the Conservative government, asking for the erection of a public building in Bowmanville. They were promised that building by the Conservative government, and that promise was used against me in my election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MACLEAN. I beg to move :—

That the Committee rise and report to the House that in the opinion of the committee the public interest would be better served by the expenditure of public money in the direction of establishing rural postal delivery routes, rather than in erecting post offices in towns of less than 3,000 population.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I agree that the question of rural postal delivery is one that is rapidly coming to the front, and under the able management of the present Postmaster General there is a probability at an early date of steps being taken in that direction ; at least I hope so. At the same time that does not do away with the necessity for erecting post offices, for even if we had a rural delivery we would still want post offices. The Motion is inopportune. So far as the question of erecting public buildings is concerned it is very amusing to those of us who have been in the House to hear that principle opposed by the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Taylor); the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), when we find from their record that they heartily supported the Conservative government in erecting post offices in towns where the revenue was only $400 or $500 or $600 a year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name one.

Mr. SPROULE. I want to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) that I never did so in this House, and I ask him to give me his evidence that I did.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Look over the records and you will find all about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Cayuga has been named as one.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the revenue only $400 or $500 a year ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Look at Laprairie and see what the revenue is. In 1892 a post office was erected there. In the county of Peel there was another post office erected in a town where the revenue was very small. There is a good deal to be said in favour of the position of the Minister of Public Works when he points out that in those counties there has been no expenditure of public money at all. In all the large cities enormous sums of money are spent, and I do not think there is any serious objection to erecting reasonably good buildings in these comparatively small places, which are important as the centres of large sections. This custom has been followed ever since confederation. The old government followed it, and they were supported by the House at that time. There is considerable to be said in favour of it, because this is the only money that can be spent in these places, and it serves a good purpose. But coming back to the motion that has been made by the hon. member for East York, even if we had rural delivery, it would be necessary in my opinion to have a post office. We have in the city of Toronto a free postal delivery, but it is found absolutely necessary at the same time to erect postal stations in different parts of the city.

Mr. MACLEAN. We want one in West Toronto and one in North Toronto.

Mr. CAMPBELL. North Toronto is not in the city, and it has not free postal delivery yet ; but I suppose at an early date, when that system is adopted, it will have it. In Toronto we are spending $20,000 or $30,000 for remodelling the general post office ; we are also erecting a postal station on Queen street west ; and I believe it is intended by the hon. Postmaster General to divide the city into several stations, and three or four more post offices will probably be required in the city. Applications are now in for three more. So that even if rural postal delivery comes, post offices will be required. We cannot have delivery without some place for sorting and distributing the mails. Therefore I think the motion of the hon. member for East York is not one that should receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. SCHELL. This discussion seems to have gone along the line of post offices, whereas in the case of Bowmanville as well as the case of Alexandria the accommodation for the customs office has also to be taken into account. I understand from the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Beith) that the revenue derived at Bowmanville from the post office and the customs office together amounts to about $15,000 a year. So far as the town of Alexandria is concerned, I may mention that when our importations come in from the United States, we never know whetner they come by way of Smth's Falls, Cornwall, or Montreal. Sometimes for weeks and months we are unable to get our customs returns. So that this expenditure is not alone for post office purposes, but is also for the convenience of the public in the matter of a custom office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think my hon. friend for East York is in earnest in making this motion.

Mr. MACLEAN. I beg pardon. I never was more in earnest in my life.

Mr. FRASER. That may prove nothing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. member may be right; but if he wishes to get a fair expression of opinion from this House in regard to the policy of rural delivery, he has taken the very course which any one would take who was opposed to it; because under the present circumstances members will be compelled to vote against the motion no matter what their view may be. The hon. gentleman is experienced enough in the House to know that that must be the result of his action at the present time.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I just rise to correct a statement which was made in regard to the Bowmanville post office. My recollection is most distinct that it was made an issue in the last election. Unless my hon. friend from West Durham was safely caged away or knew nothing of what was going on, I can assure him that he must have known that the Bowmanville post office was used throughout the length and breadth of that town for one night at all events before his election.

Mr. BENNETT. It was Cap. Sullivan the night before.

Mr. MACLEAN. There may be a right way of proceeding with this matter, and there may be a wrong way; but I am taking advantage of the present situation to ask the representatives of the people in this House to-night to put themselves on record as against this expenditure of public money, which is not in the public interest, but, so far as we can gather, is for the payment of political claims. I am quite within my right in proposing to divide the House on this great issue. There is no question before the people to-day that interests them so much as the question of rural postal delivery. The farmers are awake to it, and I am an old enough member of the House to seize this opportunity to bring it before the people, and I intend to put hon. gentlemen on record on the question. I intend to make them say whether they are in favour of these extravagant expenditures for post offices, or whether, like me, they prefer to see the public money put into that experiment of rural postal delivery. Have they seen what it amounts to in the United States to-day? The expenditure is away up in the millions; but in the benefits it confers on the people, it has completely changed life in the rural districts of the United States. These postal routes are being established in that country for $500 apiece on the average. Look how we are expending public money for the delivery of the mails in this country. I know routes which are costing $500 or $600 for a poor service for four or five post offices, when, if the same money were spent on the modern plan, it would give the people ten times the accommodation. There is only one way to bring these questions before the public, and hon. gentlemen are up against a great issue. It may be a bolt from the blue, but it is in the right direction, and I ask them to say whether they are in favour of rural delivery or in favour of spending public money on these country post offices.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) This is a very important question, and it has assumed a very curious shape. But speaking seriously, if you want a successful rural delivery, you must have a proper place from which that delivery can take place. You must have modern post offices from which rural delivery may take place, and when the hon. member is advocating rural delivery he is at the same time going against it when he does not advocate the building of proper post offices from which this delivery may be made.

Mr. BOYD. As seconder of the resolution of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), I wish to say that I am heartily in accord with his proposition to establish rural mail delivery. There is no question to-day which is engaging the attention of our farmers to a greater extent. It is only those who have considerable intercourse with the farmers and who go among them who can understand the great benefits that such a delivery would confer on our agricultural community. It would have the effect of bringing them in daily contact with the outer world, and in that way counteract the desire on the part of the young people to leave the farm and seek their living in the cities, which is certainly one of the great drawbacks to our country's advancement. In this connection it seems to me that hon. gentlemen on this side are levelling their criticisms at the wrong man. The member of the government who should be taken to task is the Minister of Finance. I have had a little experience in these matters, and I know that the man you must go to, when you want a post office built, is the Minister of Finance. Go to the Department of Public Works and you will be sent to the Finance Minister to see if you cannot get his consent to the necessary expenditure. After you have procured that consent, the Minister of Public Works is always delighted to let you have the building. Therefore, I think that the hon. Minister of Public Works has been called upon to stand entirely too much this evening, and I am surprised that the man who is really responsible has not shown up and endeavoured to shield his colleague from what he has undoubtedly brought upon his head. I would ask my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) if he would not in his motion, reduce the population in towns in which post offices should be erected from 3,000 to 2,000 ?

Mr. MACLEAN. I am quite willing to accept that amendment.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am delighted to learn that the Minister of Finance is all-powerful. We all like to have our offices magnified, and I have no desire to deny the soft impeachment. The question of rural mail delivery is a most important one, so important that it is a pity to see it treated in the way it is to-night. It does not seem to occur to my hon. friend from East York, that one might be strongly in favour of rural post office delivery without at all opposing the building of a post office at Bowmanville. The two questions do not hang together at all. The question of rural mail delivery is one involving a large expenditure of public money, which must be dealt with by the Postmaster General, who has administered so successfully the Post Office Department, and if my hon. colleague is able to take a step further and give us rural mail delivery we shall be very much pleased, but we would not be advancing that project by voting for any such motion as this. It is quite possible that some hon. members may be of the opinion that it is a good thing to give Bowmanville a post office, and if so why should they not support this item and still favour a rural mail delivery system. If rural mail delivery can be obtained for the money spent annually on the small class of public buildings provided for post offices, or if it could be accomplished for six times the money these would cost, there would be no difficulty in the matter. But there can be no good purpose served by confounding two things which are entirely separate, and I hope the House will see the unwisdom of the course taken by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), if the hon. gentleman does not see it himself.

Mr. BROCK. Hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have themselves to blame for this debate. If the hon. Minister of Finance had devoted his great ability to answering the fair question put by the hon. leader of the opposition, as to what principle the government were going on in connection with the expenditure of public money in erecting post offices, we would not have had this discussion. What we want to know is what principle they are acting on, or if they are acting on any principle. As regards the spending of $15,000 on a post office at Bowmanville, I am not opposing that particular vote.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE My hon. friend is opposing it in supporting this motion.

Mr. BROCK. I am speaking on the question of principle. I am not opposing the erection of a building, but I am insisting on our having a declaration as to the principle or policy upon which the government base this expenditure. No doubt the support of the hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Finance Minister is strong enough to vote down this proposition of rural mail delivery.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BROCK. But I tell the government that they are making a mistake in not acceding to the very reasonable request made by the hon. leader of the opposition that they should state to the House and the country upon what principle they are spending this money in erecting post offices here and there throughout the country.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would call the attention of the Committee to the nature of the amendment. In my opinion it is not in order, because it asks the Committee to report upon a subject which has not been referred to it at all. Therefore it is quite irrelevant to the matter under discussion and in my opinion is out of order.

Mr. INGRAM. As other hon. gentlemen have been allowed to discuss the question, perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words. The hon. member for East York has made a motion dealing with rural mail delivery. While I am prepared to support that and believe it is a step in the right direction, yet there is another phase of free delivery which should not be overlooked. We have small cities and large towns in Ontario, which pay a good revenue to the Post Office Department. Many large manufacturing concerns are located in these places and are deprived of free delivery. I could name a number of such cities and towns. There is the city which the hon. Minister of Public Works represents, the city of Woodstock. There are also St. Catharines, Sault Ste. Marie, Peterborough, Brockville, Berlin, Guelph, Stratford, St. Thomas, Chatham and Windsor. These are all important cities, and it is well known that workingmen employed in the factories in these cities find it very inconvenient to go to the post office during post office hours. I trust therefore that when the government are considering the question of free rural delivery, they will also consider the question of free delivery in these small cities and large towns. So far as rural mail delivery is concerned, although you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have ruled the motion out of order, I wish to say that I am heartily in support of the proposition as being a step in the right direction. The hon. Minister of Finance has given great credit to the Postmaster General for his administration of the Post Office Department. Well, I think it would be well for the hon. gentleman to urge on his colleague the advisability of not looking at this question of rural mail delivery mainly from the point of revenue or expenditure. The thickly settled districts of this country should be well served with mail matter even if that service should cost a considerable sum. We have an intelligent class of people who would not object to a small deficit incurred for the purpose of providing them with this great advantage.

Mr. NORTHRUP. This debate has proceeded to the length it has on account of the point raised by the hon. leader of the opposition. It is all important that we should have a declaration from the government of the principle on which they propose to incur this class of expenditure. I venture to think that a very clear principle could be laid down which the government might adopt and which would command the approval of the people. It is a principle that would save them from great importunities on the part of their friends, and a principle so sound that any succeeding party coming into power in Canada would not dare to depart from it. The principle I submit is that the government, in handling public moneys should endeavour to act as a trustee handling private moneys would act under similar circumstances. Wherever the business is such that a private individual acting as trustee would be justified in erecting a building to carry on business, let the government erect a building. But if, as a matter of business, no private individual would think of investing trust funds in a building there, the government should equally abstain. The hon. gentlemen opposite should not lose sight of the fact that every time an item appears in the estimates for the construction of a building in a town of two or three thousand inhabitants, the minister calls down upon himself frantic appeals from dozens of his own followers who would not make such appeals but for the encouragement they receive from seeing such items in the estimates. The country looks to us to practice economy. While we on this side do not necessarily object to this, that or the other item for a post office here or there, we are unable, and hon. gentlemen opposite are equally unable, to give an intelligent vote on these matters, unless some principle can be applied. The moment they can lay down a principle, no matter what it may be, which can govern these questions, we can consider them intelligently; but until a principle is laid down, both sides must simply go it blind, for there is nothing to guide or govern us. When we look about this country and consider the amount of money that is being spent in these public buildings, much of it certainly unnecessary, and when we find that the expenditure has grown, and when we find that it is proposed to construct a public building in one place that will entail an annual cost for maintenance of $2,000, whereas the service as it is now performed, as stated to the House, costs only about $150, I venture to say there are very few of the hon. gentlemen opposite who can stand before their constitutents and justify such a vote. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that the people before whom they must justify these expenditures are the people of Alexandria or the people of Bowmanville. But there are five millions of people in this country who are interested in every dollar that is spent, and it is to the great mass of the people that the representatives in this House must stand or fall upon, showing how they have appropriated or misappropriated the public funds. If hon. gentlemen would be good enough to lay down a principle—if a vicious principle so much the worse for them—but to lay down some principle to govern the disposition of public moneys and not merely throw it out haphazard here or there according to the personal influence or popularity of the individual members, it would be a great deal better for the country and better for hon. gentlemen opposite themselves.

Clinton—Post office, $8,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to know what the present expenditure is for the service there, and what would be the increased cost entailed by the construction of this building.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The present rent for the post office is $200 per annum, and for the custom house $36, total $236. It is quite impossible for me to tell the committee what the increased expenditure will be. But, if the postmaster lives in the building, the highest allowance I have found in the department is $100. So, the difference between the present expenditure and the interest on the amount invested would probably be $100 besides what might, from time to time, be spent in repairs on the building.

Mr. HENDERSON. I remember when the debate took place on the construction of this building the then minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) informed us that the post office at Clinton was to be built upon a new plan which he had approved of—the plan of erecting cheaper buildings and more of them. Year after year I had advocated the idea that, instead of spending $30,000 in one town in a county where there were four or five small towns, the sum should be divided up and cheaper buildings—yet quite sufficient for the purpose of post office and postmaster's residence—should be erected in each of these towns. I instanced the county of Halton, with five incorporated towns and villages. If $5,000 were appropriated in each town or village, leaving $1,000 to purchase the site—because I did not believe in the principle of the municipality buying the site for the government—the amount would provide a suitable building for each place. I instanced that county because, under the application of the rule that there must be a large revenue or a large population, it would never be entitled to a public building, as we have no town in that county—and not likely to have for many years to come—with a greater population than 1,700 or 1,800. I pressed this point upon the then Minister of Public Works year after year, and at last I believed I had made a convert of him. Not that he gave me any promise that he would fulfil what I required in the county of Halton, which is the county I have the honor to represent, but that he would adopt that principle generally. And he said across the floor of the House that, in the erection of a post office at Clinton that plan would be adopted, that building would be erected for a much smaller sum and the postmaster's residence would be provided for in the building and the postmaster would thus become caretaker of the building, and so the large expenditures which have been spoken of here for maintenance should be saved. I may say also that several years ago, not in the chamber, but outside of it in discussing the proposition with the present Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Sutherland), that gentleman expressed himself as favourable to the plan I had suggested. I think that hon. gentleman will recollect that he gave me to understand the proposition was a fair and reasonable one, and was the only plan by which certain ridings in the province could obtain a fair share of public money. I am sorry to find that although the Minister of Public Works started out well in the case of Clinton—started out to show us how a public building could be erected for a very moderate sum of money and yet fulfil all the requirements, furnishing not only a post office of sufficient size for a town of 2,000 or 2,500 population, but a residence for the postmaster, thus doing away with the caretaker —I am sorry, I say, to find out that, year after year, we are asked to grant additional sums to this Clinton post office and that we have simply got back to the old plan of a costly building in a small town, a plan which was condemned by the Liberal party when they were in opposition as has been so often shown to-night. I am sorry that the plan approved by the late Minister of Public Works has been departed from, and that we are not to see introduced the new system of supplying small towns and villages throughout the country with sufficient post offices. I am sorry that we have no more hopes now than we had five years ago of securing post offices or public buildings in these small towns. I would like the minister to tell us whether he intends to adhere to the policy that was laid down by the late Minister of Public Works, and why it has been departed from in this instance.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend will be pleased to know that the principle he has advocated so long has been carried out to a very large extent. He and I perhaps may be a little extreme in our views with regard to this question. My hon. friend knows that Clinton is a town of considerably over 2,000 population. The contract price for this post office is only $9,500. He will remember that we advocated buildings costing $5,000 for places of this size. Every business man in this committee knows that there has been a considerable increase in wages and in the cost of material during the last two or three years. The cost of heating, fittings and that sort of thing which will bring the total cost up to something like $18,000. Now the hon. gentleman will hardly say that, beginning at the old figure of $35,000, $50,000, $80,000, this case does not show considerable progress in the right direction. I have had several discussions with the chief architect with the view of adopting a policy of putting up public buildings in smaller places, and that policy is to be carried out. We should adopt a plan that will serve the purpose to the full extent, while costing less money than we have paid hitherto.

Mr. HOLMES. I would add for the information of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) who has been fair in his remarks, and for the information of other members opposite, that the principle advocated so far as the caretaker is concerned is being rigidly carried out in the Clinton post office. I had the pleasure of appointing a new postmaster in my own town within the last few months, and my only regret was that I had to take a lawyer. I appointed a postmaster on the strict condition that there was to be no caretaker for the office, and the party was glad to accept the office under those conditions. In fact a number of men would have been willing to live on the ground floor if they could have got that position. I may say that the revenue from the post office and customs amounts to about $13,000 a year.

Mr. LENNOX. I desire to congratulate the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) upon his elevation to the position of deputy Postmaster General. He tells us that he has recently apopinted some person to the position of postmaster, and that he appointed a lawyer because he could not get any one better. Well, I myself would be at a loss to ascertain where you could get a better man than a lawyer. Doubtless since the hon. gentleman was promoted to the position of deputy Postmaster General he has been doing valiant service in several ridings, and he has left his trail in proof of his devotion to the present government. The Minister of Public Works says there is ground for congratulation in respect to the Clinton post office in the fact that the contract price of the building is only $9,500. The estimates so far show that we voted $7,500 last year, and we are asked to vote $8,000 additional this year, making $15,500. Even if we stopped at this point I do not think there is ground for congratulation. The minister tells us that the total amount will be at least $18,000, and when we get this $18,000, I suppose, having regard to the history of the past, we will be requested to make a still further appropriation. So there is no reasonable hope that even $18,000 will finish the Clinton post office. There is no reason to believe that economy is being practised in this case, any more than in many other cases that have been before the committee. The hon. member for Halton tells us that he has been pressing the Minister of Public Works to do justice to the smaller towns and villages. There is every reason why this matter should be taken into consideration with a view of doing justice to the rural municipalities by giving them public buildings at a moderate cost. The suggestion made by my hon. friend from Halton that the residences of the postmasters should be combined with the post offices so as to dispense with the expense of caretakers, is, I think, a proper one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I think in this connection it would be fair to call the attention of the government to the policy of the Public Works Department in expending large sums of money in small towns just emerging from the condition of villages, on buildings altogether too ornate, too expensive for the purpose for which they are designed, and which, in fact, are more ornamental than useful. In this way a gross injustice is done to the agricultural portion of the community, many of whom have to travel two, three or four miles to get their mail matter when a large amount of expenditure is made in erecting these monumental and expensive buildings in little towns, merely emerging from the state of villagehood. If favours are intended for towns of 2,000 or more, I put in a claim for a town in my own constituency, the town of Durham; yet, I am strongly in favour of some move being made in the direction of the motion made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) looking to the establishment of a rural mail delivery system. This, I believe, would probably be a very expensive undertaking and one that the department could not enter upon completely at the beginning; yet, some experimental steps might be taken in order to find out what the cost would be in extending it over the whole country. I believe that at any rate we should take some measures to show our disapprobation of the practice of erecting these costly structures, far more costly than the requirements warrant.

Mr. INGRAM. As I understand it, there was $5,000 voted for this building in the first place. Now, there is a contract let for $9,500 and the total cost will be about $18,000. Last year I drew the attention of the Department of Public Works to this kind of thing going on in respect to erecting public buildings. I asked then if there were any architects employed outside to prepare estimates, plans and specifications for these buildings. If there are surely the architect could come to some nearer figure than $5,000 or $6,000 for a building which we are subsequently told is going to cost $18,000. No private citizen would think of doing business in that way and no wonder that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House criticise items of this kind when they find these items growing to treble the amount at which they were placed when first introduced. I say it is high time that something should be done in the direction of putting a stop to this growing evil, for it is a growing evil. If the town of Clinton is entitled to a public building, one that will meet the requirements of the town, has not the department an architect who has brains enough to say whether a building proper for such a town shall cost $5,000 or $10,000? Instead of coming down with figures of this kind, the minister ought to be prepared to state exactly, or within a few hundred dollars, what a public building in a town of this kind should cost. I object very strongly to this kind of thing occurring year after year in this House. The time of this House has been taken up in discussing items of this kind more than with the discussion of any other subject in the House. I am not blaming the hon. Minister of Public Works; this is an old, crying evil. He is not the father of this evil by any means, but I hope our good-natured minister will use his best efforts to have this kind of thing stopped and if he does I am sure he will deserve great credit and he will be commended on this side of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this building intended for the joint purposes of the customs and post office, or the post office alone ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is for the customs and the post office.

Mr. INGRAM. I find in the Auditor General's report, page V—100, the following account:

Potter, F. A., Potter, D., and Moore, T., executors estate of late Ann Moore, purchase of site, $2,500.

Is that what this site cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is what the department paid for the site.

Mr. INGRAM. Then we have :

Weatherald, T., surveying, &c., $31.80.

Who is that gentleman ?

Mr. HOLMES. He is the Conservative surveyor of the town of Goderich.

Mr. INGRAM :

King's Printer, $69.08 ; advertising, $152.89, $221.97.

Mr. INGRAM. Does this amount of $69.08 mean paying for the advertising of this contract to the government Bureau, or to whom ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is the account of the King's Printer and it must have been for the plans and specifications.

Mr. INGRAM :

Advertising, $152.89.

Will the hon. gentleman tell us what papers this advertisement appeared in ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not the list of papers in which this contract was advertised.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. minister bring it down ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will be very pleased indeed to bring it down.

Mr. INGRAM. Now, there is this account:

Travel of Ottawa officials : L. F. Taylor, advanced ch. 960, $25.

Who is this gentleman ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He is an architect in the department at Ottawa who went up to attend to this work ?

Mr. INGRAM :

Legal expenses, James Scott, $34.

I suppose this is in connection with the plans, specifications, &c.

Mr. HOLMES. It is in connection with the transfer of the property.

Mr. INGRAM. Was there any local architect employed in Clinton ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, the work was all done in the department here.

Mr. INGRAM. Last year I brought up the question of architects in this House, and I find there are some ten architects engaged by the Public Works Department, or, at least, the Auditor General's report shows that number. I want to say to the hon. minister that this system of engaging architects in this country to look after public buildings is one that is not in the interest of the country. Last year I drew the attention of the department to it, quoting several buildings throughout the country where they paid large sums of money for clerks of works, to men who are architects residing in the localities in which public buildings are being built. The abuses that these men create in connection with the erection of these public buildings are simply these : They are paid so much per day as clerks of works, all the way from $2.50 to $7 a day and by reason of these architects receiving that amount of pay per day from one end of this country to the other the public buildings are being delayed in their construction. By reason of that payment by the day system, the work is extended for twice as long, yes, three times as long as it is necessary to construct these buildings. That abuse should be wiped out. It would pay the department better to have their own architects, or if they are obliged to engage outside architects to pay them on the principle of so much per cent on the contract price. Why, the way in which the armoury in my own city was constructed is a disgrace. They had two or three men employed on that building months at a time, whereas if they were paying an architect by fees he would not have put up with the method of construction; he would make the contractors whoever they were put more men on the work so that it would be completed quicker, and there would be less money to be paid the architect. I am not going to find fault with the present Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) because he is a new man in the department, but I say that the system has been going on for years and it should be stopped.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. So far as possible I have adopted the policy of making an arrangement with the local architect, as to what shall be charged by him for the building. I think the rule is a good one, that it will probably save a considerable amount of money, and that we may get better service. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) remembers as I do, the erection of the public building at St. Thomas which lasted for so many years, and in which they had a permanent caretaker. We have to take warning by the abuse in that case and try to do a great deal better.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I have tried on some occasions to employ local men to prepare plans but nearly in every case it was a failure. After six years of experience in the department I say that it is better that the plans should be prepared here in Ottawa. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) must not lose sight of the fact that there is always a time limit fixed in the contract, so that the employment of a foreman to supervise the work at $2 or $3 a day cannot result in extending the time. I stated last year that it was not desirable to spend too large sums of money on public buildings and I am still of the same mind. At the same time we cannot forget that this country is growing pretty fast, that we are not building for one year or for two years, that we are putting up these buildings for at least fifty years. It would be imprudent and unwise not to look to the future. Might I suggest to the hon. minister (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) that if I was in his place, I would not be too much impressed by what is said in this House about the erection of these buildings—tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis (times are changed and we are changed in them). If the minister will make a search in his department he will find hundreds of applications for public buildings. I was perhaps never able to gauge public opinion as my hon. friends on the other side have done, but I remember very well that for the past ten years complaint has been made in this House that we are not erecting enough public buildings, and the Public Works Department has had hundreds of petitions for public buildings from both sides of the House. If public opinion does not want public buildings, I verily believe that governments have not much interest in building them, because it is my experience that they give more trouble than power. The future of this country will be great; nobody can tell how many millions we will have in ten or twelve years. No one can say what the population of this town or that will be in ten years. I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works, that while remaining within the bounds of economy, he should not be too much impressed by criticisms which are indulged in by both sides of the House every time that a public building is erected.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not wish to unduly criticise the erection of public buildings, but I ask any member in this House if he were erecting a public building to cost $39,000, does he think it would take over a year to erect that building. In my judgment it would not require more than six months, and that being so, what is the necessity of employing a clerk of works by the day at a large salary for so long a period as it now takes to erect these buildings.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. If there was no clerk of works, the building would not be satisfactory.

Mr. INGRAM. There should be a limit to the time.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. It is necessary to have a good clerk of works and he should be there all the time or otherwise you will have botched work.

Mr. LANCASTER. Was there a clerk of works employed on this building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. I understood my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) to say that where an arrangement could be made with the local architect he should get a percentage on the value of the work. I believe in that principle and I have done so in several cases lately. It would be a great mistake to let a contract and not have proper supervision on the work.

Mr. LANCASTER. Who was the clerk of works here and how was he paid?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. His name was Henry Stevens and he was paid the usual fee of $3 a day—it was perhaps lower than the usual fee.

Mr. LANCASTER. What is his usual occupation?

Mr. HOLMES. Contractor and builder.

Mr. BROCK. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has told us that we do not know to what extent this country may grow, and that is the reason why I am so anxious that we should be economical and careful. I have been doing business in the province of Ontario for forty-five years and I can tell you that you would be very much surprised to find how very little most of these towns and villages have grown during the last twenty years. The population of these towns and villages is being depleted all the time on account of those who go not only from Ontario to the North-west, but also to the larger cities and towns. Concentration is the order of business nowadays, not scattering. The policy of the present government seems to be to scatter their favours all over the country. I contend that it is better to concentrate, and that if a building is really required you should put up a good building, but these small amounts you are spending through the villages of Canada are not justified by the requirements. I can tell you that the post office and custom business has been as well attended to in the past, as it will be in the future in these new buildings. Because the Dominion of Canada is going to have an immense population, is no reason why the little villages and towns in Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario should have buildings that will be an expense for all time, and the expense of which buildings will prevent you from developing in the right direction, namely, in the direction of our North-west and the larger towns and cities.

A good deal has been said about a large amount of money being spent in Toronto. In consideration of the importance of Toronto as a commercial centre, I contend that she has not had anything like the expenditure in proportion that many small villages have had. I have the greatest possible respect for the opinion, the energy and the courage of the late Minister of Public Works but I would not like to follow him in all matters of expenditure, not only on buildings, but on canals, railways, harbours and wharfs. We have spent an immense amount of money that is not productive and never will be, and I would urge the Minister of Public Works to be very careful how he allows himself to be pressed by his followers or any one else into large expenditures in the towns and villages throughout the province of Ontario. I am speaking as one who does business with them. I do not care about their politics or their votes. I am here only to speak as I feel and as my experience tells me is the right thing, regardless of the effect on politics or elections or anything of that kind; and I contend that if we spend hundreds and thousands of dollars in these ways in the province of Ontario, some day, when we pass off the crest of the wave, we shall be sorry for those expenditures and regret that we have not made them in some other direction. You will excuse me for extending my remarks to this length, but I do so because I feel anxious as a business man. I know that times are good and the government are getting more money than they expected; but I tell you that now is the time to be careful. It is not when times are hard and business is bad and money is scarce, but it is when money is plentiful, when people are filled up with ozone, that you ought to be careful, and that is why I warn you that you are making a mistake in moving in the direction that you are doing, and you will be making a greater mistake if you allow the late Minister of Public Works to urge you into expenditures that are not justifiable.

Hon. Mr. TARTE. I do not mean that we should spend money without sense or reason, or erect buildings right and left without cause. But it seems to me that in government matters we should follow the same rules that are followed in ordinary business. The sense of the country to-day is that we should build well. My hon. friend in his own business has erected splendid buildings. This country is growing, and it seems to me that the government of the country should follow the course of ordinary business. I do not mean to say that we should spend money right and left, but I say that when we make up our minds to erect a pubilc building, we should build it well. I do not mean to say anything more than that, and I believe that is a sound principle. My hon. friend has a great deal of confidence in this country. I have always found him to be a good patriot; he has always expressed himself in the House as a sound Canadian. I think I am not wrong in saying that in ten or twelve years we may have 10,000,000 people in Canada, and if we are going to grow in population as fast as we all hope, let us in our policy act accordingly.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to say to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that I find a policy stated with a good deal of frankness on certain matters of this kind, in a journal which strongly supports the government, published in the town of Owen Sound. The editorial from which I will read was written with reference to the recent election which was in progress there. I do not think my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works had much to do with that election; some other members of the cabinet were interesting themselves more actively in it. The paper gives some names, and perhaps I had better read them first:

> The members of parliament who have taken part in this campaign so far for the Liberals are Colonel Thompson of Haldimand, C. B. Heyd of South Brant; R. F. Sutherland of North Essex, and R. Holmes of West Huron, the latter being the only one remaining in the riding. Mr. Joseph Haycock, ex-M.P.P., of Frontenac, is also doing effective campaign work. On Tuesday evening, Hon. D. C. Fraser, the Guysborough giant, and Dr. Macdonald, deputy speaker, will adress the electors of Owen Sound; other speakers are expected during the week.

I am glad to know that our honoured and respected Chairman was having so good a time on that occasion, in company with our hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser).

> Hon. Mr. Fielding will address a meeting here on Friday afternoon, which is intended to be for those who reside out of town, and will also address a meeting of the townspeople in the evening. It is expected that Hon. Mr. Mulock will also be in the riding next week.

That, however, is only by the way. The doctrine of the government is stated here with a great deal of fulness and precision, and I am going to read it for the information of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who has hardly expressed himself with considerable frankness but not with the brutal frankness of the writer of this editorial:

> The country has never been more prosperous than it is at this moment under the able administration of the Laurier government——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Now, we shall see how much these hon. gentlemen will cheer something that follows, particularly the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), who was so prominent in leading the cheering, and who took occasion to announce to the people very much the same doctrine as that set forth in this editorial:

> ——and the town of Owen Sound never stood a better chance of securing the expenditure of a large amount of money for the erection of public buildings and for additional improvements in her harbour. These are considerations that invariably weigh well in a by-election, and, with ordinary care, should insure the return of almost any candidate the party might choose to put in the field.

These, I suppose are the sentiments of the hon. member for West Huron.

Mr. HOLMES. Certainly.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am glad that my hon. friend is equally frank with the editorial writer. Here are some further suggestions which I have no doubt equally commend themselves to my hon. friend's judgment :

This town is slated for certain favours within the gift of the government, and, to make a long story short, the electors cannot afford to kill their chances for securing them by electing an oppositionist.

That also, I take it, was the view my hon. friend from West Huron presented to the electors on that occasion; and possibly the fact that there was a certain disappointment in the result of that election may afford the reason why we do not observe the name of the town of Owen Sound in these estimates.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. These are not all the estimates.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Oh, I see; my hon. friend proposes to put it in the supplementary estimates.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I advocated it some years ago, and I shall probably have to advocate it again if I hope to succeed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That election was held some weeks ago, and my hon. friend has had time to consider the matter between the date of the election and the time when these estimates were brought down. If the reason I have suggested had nothing to do with the absence of the name of the town from the estimates, I cannot understand what the reason is.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. These are not the right estimates.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The editor of this newspaper was evidently very high in the ranks of the Liberal party, he seeems to to have enjoyed the confidence of the leader of that party, because he seems to have known all about these gentlemen who were going to speak in the riding and the promises which they would hold out to the electors. Speaking seriously is it not a sad state of affairs that appropriations from the public revenue should be promised to or withheld from any constituency according as it returns a Liberal or Conservative candidate ? Is not that bribery pure and simple ? Is not that as direct an offer of a bribe to the voter as if you offered him $5 for his vote ? The only difference is that in one case you are bribing the electors individually and in the other you are bribing them collectively. The hon. member from West Huron (Mr. Holmes) is another of these gentlemen who addressed the constituents of North Grey on that occasion. He addressed the electors along those lines, and affirmed the principle in this House, when I read it to him from the newspaper to-night. If these hon. gentlemen can draw any distinction between bribing the electors individually and bribing them wholesale, let them draw it. The hon. member for West Huron speaking from his place has told us that these are proper appeals to be made to the electors and that these are proper considerations on which the electors should vote.

Mr. HOLMES. The hon. gentleman must not misrepresent my position. I was simply laughing and speaking in a bantering and jocular tone, and I do not think that the government should be held responsible for the editorial opinion of any newspaper.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps this may be a lesson to my hon. friend another time not to laugh too soon. I understood him to assert distinctly, though with a somewhat jeering smile, that that was exactly the kind of thing he believed in and that these were proper considerations to submit to the people. I am glad to know however that he did not believe what he said, or that he has concluded that the position he took is one which cannot be well defended. But it is not the first time that the constituency of North Grey has been treated to that sort of thing. When the Minister of Customs ran an election there some years ago, the people were invited to consider whether or not they would prefer that cold justice which they might expect if they elected the Conservative candidate or the warm sympathy to which they could look if they elected the Minister of Customs. It is not the first time in many ridings that that consideration has been put forward. It is very much in line with what seems to be the policy of the government as announced here to-night, and against that policy I raise my voice in protest and submit that there is not the slightest distinction between the offers of wholesale bribery of that kind and offers of individual bribery to the electors.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I see in one of the evening papers another evidence of this policy in North Ontario. The article is headed :—

DELIVERED GOODS, WANT THEIR PAY.

Bracebridge Would Like Government to Fulfil North Ontario Election Promises.

Bracebridge has long been the principal point for a large summer resort territory in the Muskoka district, and is also in a constituency that lately turned down the ex-Minister of Finance and elected George D. Grant, a government supporter, and on both counts Bracebridge has something coming to her. A delegation from Bracebridge, composed of Mayor J. D. Shire, John Thompson, P. Hutchison, G. H. O. Thomas and H. J. Bird is registered at the Grand Union and is here to press the claims of the town. They will see Sir William Mulock and Hon. Messrs. Sutherland and Paterson this afternoon and will ask for a new post office building.

I would like to ask the Hon. Minister of Public Works if it is his intention to grant that application.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know what paper my hon. friend has quoted from, but every city is quite within its rights in sending a delegation to wait on any minister in order to press its claims. This deputation was not entirely composed of Liberals but of both Liberals and Conservatives. In the same way we have deputations from the city of Toronto to which we have given considerable time the last few days, and which are largely composed of very active Conservatives. As far as I am personally concerned I have always given all the time I could to receiving deputations, irrespective of politics. As regards Bracebridge, the question of giving that place a new post office was being negotiated before ever the election in North Ontario was thought of. Our late respected friend, Mr. McLeod, who supported the opposition and represented North Ontario, was pressing the claim of Bracebridge for a public building, and if the late member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) were here, he would also say that that matter was engaging our attention while he was a member of this House and that it had nothing to do with the last election, or the election of the present representative. I also received a deputation headed by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McCormick) which was composed of supporters of both parties, prominent merchants and manufacturers, and I am always pleased, when I think it is in the public interest, to grant public assistance from any of the departments irrespective of the political leanings of the hon. member who urges the claim. I remember that years ago, when the constituency which my hon. friend represents now was represented by Mr. Masson in this House, I, in my humble way, tried to impress the late government with the desirability of recognizing the claim he was making for a building at that time. While I am not prepared to say that all things being equal, the government would not be more influenced by their supporters than by their opponents, I for one will always ask the House to vote such expenditures solely in the public interest. If more of these votes are for constituencies represented by Liberals during many years in this House than for those represented by Conservatives, it is simply because, under the policy which was carried out by the late government, the majority of constituencies represented by Conservatives do not require public buildings. For many years the late government carried out the policy of refusing any consideration, except in extreme cases, to constituencies represented by Liberals. I for my part am not disposed to adopt any such policy. I think that the less partisanship you have in these matters the better and that in every case fair consideration should be given on its merits to the demand of any constituency.

Mr. DAVIS. It is refreshing to hear the hon. leader of the opposition talking about the government trying to bribe constituencies in a wholesale manner. But let me draw his attention to the fact that for eighteen years the party he leads resorted to that policy. I remember that in my constituency they went so far as to promise a mounted police barracks to a certain portion of that constituency if the government candidate were elected, and to show their bona fides they hauled a lot of sand on to the ground and got the surveyor to lay out the location. But after the election the stone and sand were hauled away and nothing more was done. On another occasion not only did their newspapers publish articles, but their candidate himself told the people plainly that if they voted for the government they would get a barracks worth $60,000 to $70,000. The government candidate was elected and the people got the barracks. I remember that on the occasion of another election we had in my constituency, the members of the mounted police were promised scrip and medals if they would vote for the Conservative candidate. They were paraded by their officers in the barracks square and telegrams were read from the Conservative government to the effect that if they voted for the Conservative candidate they would get the scrip and medals. They voted, but they have never received the scrip or medals to this day. That sort of thing was carried on throughout the Northwest. One candidate used to say: What is the use of voting for an opposition candidate ?—you can't get anything for your riding; if you want improvement or public buildings, or more police, vote for me. It is amusing to find a gentleman rising here talking economy, when I understand that it is only two weeks since that hon. gentleman headed a delegation to the Minister of Public Works asking for a grant of $250,000 to spend in the city of Toronto.

Mr. BROCK. What for.

Mr. DAVIS. It makes no difference what it was for. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) headed a delegation asking for that expenditure in the city. Now he says it is not right for the government to spend a certain amount in the small towns in Ontario, because they are at a standstill or going back. But I think the small towns have as good a right to have public moneys spent in them as the larger cities have. They are contributing to the revenues, and I do not see why they have not the right to get the benefit of some of the expenditure. It is just as necessary to have a post office in a small town as in a big one.

I hope that the Minister of Public Works will continue to look after the interests of the smaller communities as well as of the larger ones that can have a delegation wait upon the minister headed by influential members of the House of Commons.

Mr. THOMSON (Grey). I do not think that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) does justice to the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). That gentleman did hold out inducements—a post office, dry dock and other public works—to the electors to support the Liberal candidate. But he made amends for it on the following Sunday, when he lectured in the Young Men's Christian Association and I understand his subject was, 'The Right Road to Heaven.' I am glad to hear the hon. Minister of Public Works say the fact that North Grey had elected a member in opposition to the government would not interfere with the department spending money in public works there. The government derive a large revenue from the town of Owen Sound. We have no public building. I believe it would be in the interests of the country, even as a matter of economy, to erect a public building there. I asked the hon. minister last night if he would let us know the amount expended by the government for rent in Owen Sound. It was a very considerable sum, and I believe that if it were capitalized it would pay for the erection of a splendid building. Therefore, I hope the hon. minister will not refuse to consider the erection of a building because the riding has sent a representative in opposition to the government.

Mr. BROCK. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) attacked me just now, stating that I had headed a deputation that asked the government for the expenditure of $250,000 in Toronto. In the first place—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) wishes to criticise anything I have said—

Mr. BROCK. No, I am criticising what the hon. member for Saskatchewan said. He told us how extravagant the late government were and how wrong the expenditure of public money in his constituency had been and stated that I had called upon the hon. minister at the head of a deputation to ask for the expenditure of $250,000 in Toronto. If the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davis') other statements about drawing stone and leaving sand and so on, in his constituency, were exaggerated to the same extent as his statements about me, he has not added much strength to the government's case. I can assure the hon. gentleman that what he has stated as to my demands on the government on behalf of the city of Toronto is ridiculously exaggerated.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) a question: Does he mean to say that he did not attend with the delegation that waited upon the Minister of Public Works to ask for the expenditure of an amount of public money on Toronto?

Mr. BROCK. Most assuredly I say so. Either the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) was misinformed or else he is wilfully stating what is untrue. I was one of a deputation that called upon the minister to ask him for $50,000 for the Dominion exhibition, which $50,000 was to be expended largely for the country from which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) comes, in paying freight on cattle and other products from there to be exhibited.

Mr. DAVIS. I am credibly informed, and I think I am right, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brock) was with a delegation that asked for $250,000 which, if not to spend in the city of Toronto, was to be spent on Toronto harbour improvements. Was that not the same thing?

Mr. BROCK. I say I was with no such delegation.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope, then, that we may conclude that the hon. gentleman does not approve of that expenditure of $250,000.

Mr. CLARKE. It seems to me that the Minister of Public Works had to go far afield to find an argument to justify some of these items when he brought up the fact that a delegation had waited upon him a few days ago asking for an expenditure on behalf of the city of Toronto.

An hon. MEMBER. That was the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis).

Mr. CLARKE. No, the hon. minister (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) made that statement in the early part of the evening. The hon. member for Saskatchewan was not in his place. But that makes no difference. If the Minister of Public Works had been as frank as we have generally found him in making explanations to this House, he might have explained for what purpose the sums asked for were required. A committee, non-political in its character, and headed by the mayor of Toronto, who is a Liberal, came to ask for a grant in aid of the Dominion exhibition. He was supported by gentlemen, a large number of whom are supporters of the government and on the directorate of that exhibition. And what was it they asked for? I think hon. members will agree that the Toronto Industrial Fair offers the best opportunity that is afforded, from one end of Canada to the other, and year after year, for those who are producers, to exhibit their products to the best advantage. For the last twenty-five years the Toronto exhibition has done a great work, whose benefits have not been confined to Toronto or Ontario, but have been as wide as the Dominion. The splendid progress which has been made by the Dominion since 1878 was mirrored year after year in the exhibits made at that fair. In saying that a political deputation came down and asked the government for $50,000 to aid in holding a Dominion exhibition this year, it should be stated that the purpose for which that money was required was not primarily to advance the interests of the city, but to give those at a great distance from the city an opportunity of getting their products brought free to the city and sent back again. That $50,000 would be spent wholly in paying freight on exhibits from all parts of the country, from the west and from the east, in order that the exhibition might be still more successful as an educator of the Canadian people, as a great fair held from year to year, the most successful on the continent of America, where the exhibits of the farm, where the manufacturing and mining industries of this country, might be presented to the people of Canada to show them what this country is capable of producing. I think the city of Toronto did the government a great favour in pointing out the opportunity that exhibition affords them of having a proper Dominion exhibition held at the least possible cost. How much have the citizens of Toronto contributed from year to year for the maintenance of that exhibition ? The late government gave them the land on which the exhibition is held, at a nominal rental of $100 ; but the citizens of Toronto have spent more than half a million dollars in the erection of buildings. And if the site is favourably located for an exhibition, the citizens of Toronto have taken advantage of the location, and have been liberal in the expenditure of money to provide the necessary buildings and to make possible these magnificent exhibits the advantages of which have been felt from one end of the country to the other.

Now, it has been charged that the city of Toronto is not modest in its demands ; that instead of asking for $50,000 it has asked for $250,000. Supposing it did ask for $250,000, what would it have been required for ? For the development and completion of our great water routes. The finest harbour in Lake Ontario should not be neglected as it has been by the hon. gentleman's predecessors as well as by the present government. The harbour of Toronto has been practically destroyed by the vast quantity of silt brought down in the fall and spring from the River Don and deposited in the harbour. Any hon. gentleman who knows anything about the situation knows that it has been a crying national evil that that harbour should have been permitted to fall into the state it is now in. And if a deputation of leading men representing both political parties came and asked the government to make a reasonable expenditure to undo the damage that was done by government officials, by the harbour commissioners, supported as they were by government engineers, Toronto is surely within its rights in asking that that should be done, that that harbour should be made fit for vessels of full canal size. This will be a substantial advantage to all the producers in the west, by giving them the advantage of water communication which the improvement of Toronto harbour would place within their reach. Toronto asks for nothing unreasonable in its demands upon the government. The citizens have done their full duty in placing the city in the proud position it holds to-day, they have been liberal in their expeditures in making the city what it is, and I say they were quite within their rights and their duty in asking, not as a favour but as a right, for a reasonable expenditure of money in that city, both in the direction of improving the character of the exhibition and in asking that the harbour should be made what it ought to be. If it had received the attention that has been given to numerous less important harbours for political reasons, it would be the finest harbour in Lake Ontario, and the trade of Ontario, as well as the trade of Toronto and other parts of the Dominion, would be substantially benefited by the expenditure of that money. Toronto is not asking for anything mean, or selfish, or local ; and I should think my hon. friend from the west, who is so deeply interested in the transportation question, would back up Toronto in asking that the harbour should be made what it can be made with a reasonable expenditure, so as to give the producers of the west the advantage of competition which would be theirs if the means of communication by water to the head of Lake Ontario was made what it ought to be. I think it was unworthy of the Minister of Public Works to bring into this discussion the question of a deputation of political opponents as well as of political supporters asking for these grants, without stating what the grants were and why they were asked.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend reads me a strong lesson, but he is proceeding on a wrong basis. If he had been in the House and had heard what was said previously, he would not have given me the scolding we have just heard. My hon. friend from Centre Toronto asked me a question as to whether an application had been made by the citizens of Clinton for the grant that was being considered. I thought he was very unfairly criticising the vote and the action of these people in asking for this grant, and it was in that connection that I said that the people from other constituencies had just as much right to wait upon the members of the government and to present their claims as had the deputation from Toronto. I do not think my hon. friend need be quite so thin skinned about it. He knows that I have always lent my assistance to him when I thought his appeals were in the public interest. I do not think Toronto is neglected. I did not mean to be offensive in giving my answer, or in making that remark in replying to his colleague in regard to the particular vote that was then under consideration. As I said, last year a deputation headed by the late member waited upon the government stating that they were entitled to consideration. I had no intention of reflecting on my hon. friend in any respect whatever. I said that every citizen was within his right in making an application and supporting it by the assistance of other citizens of the town in question. If my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Clarke) criticises us very unfairly and unjustly on some votes made for outside constituencies, he must not get so hot if we take our own time. We are within our rights as long as we are not offensive in our language, and as long as we do it in a parliamentary manner, the hon. gentleman must not get cross and scold. I have recognized the importance of the city of Toronto as well as he has done ; I think he has always found me an active supporter of the institutions and of the commercial and business interests of that city, and I have done everything that I could to advance its progress. I propose to do so in a public way in future, notwithstanding the attack made upon me by my hon. friend. I suppose that the reason I am called upon to defend myself is that he was very much in earnest in opposing this vote, and thought that the town of Clinton should not have the same consideration as a large city.

Mr. CLARKE. I would be sorry to get the reputation of being a scold. I appeal to the records to show that I have not taken up the time of the House in criticising harshly or adversly the votes asked by the government. What I objected to was that occasion should be taken by the hon. gentleman of this vote to Clinton to drag in Toronto. I spoke with the greatest possible respect of the ministers of the Crown. I said, and I say still, that I think the Minister of Public Works should have been franker in his treatment of the reasonable request made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) in asking upon what principle these grants were made.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He asked a question as to what particular vote I supported. Other representations were made to me by the deputation. If the hon. gentleman had been attending to the wants of the city of Toronto he would know that they asked for three more public buildings.

Mr. CLARKE. I was quite aware that it was the intention of the hon. Postmaster General to ask that three branch post offices be erected. I heard what the hon. Postmaster General had to say. The hon. Postmaster General was not in his place or we might have criticised the wisdom of establishing these branches rather than providing a central post office near the railway station. I took the opportunity a few years ago of making a statement in the House to the effect that notwithstanding the technical knowledge that the hon. Postmaster General has acquired since he has been at the head of the Post Office Department the public interest and the interests of the people would be better served if there was a central post office near the chief railway station than by establishing branch post offices. I paid a great deal of attention to what the hon. gentleman had to say when making reply to the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock), and I expressed regret that he was not in his seat at the time when these appropriations were asked for. The hon. gentleman has admitted very frankly that the appropriations asked for by the deputation from Toronto are appropriations in the general interest. I may say that the city of Toronto only asks what it believes itself to be entitled to, and that in making the request that is made on this occasion it is merely asking that the public generally shall be enabled to reap a greater advantage than they have reaped in the past from the industrial exhibition.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The people of Clinton think the same in regard to their appropriation.

Mr. CLARKE. I was going to say so far as the appropriation of $50,000 asked for the industrial exhibition is concerned, the object for which it is asked is one that commends itself to the wisdom of this House. And, as far as the $200,000 is concerned, we are merely asking that tardy justice be done for the injury that has been wrought to the city of Toronto in the past, for the injury that has been done the Toronto harbour through the action of the government in days gone by. We are asking that the harbour should be put in first class condition and we believe that if this were done a substantial advantage would be given, not only to the people of Ontario, but to the people east and west of the city of Toronto by reason of the greater facilities for the shipment of different kinds of commodities.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to say a word in reference to the complaint made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke).

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This is all out of order. Hon. gentlemen are discussing questions absolutely and entirely irrelevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. The hon. gentleman put me in a false position. The hon. gentleman tried to make it appear that——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) has a right to answer the hon. member for West Toronto.

Mr. DAVIS. The hon. gentleman made the insinuation when he was on his feet that I was opposing a certain grant of money that was made for the harbour of Toronto and he said that the harbour of Toronto was a harbour that was being improved in the interest of the whole country. I did not intend nor do I intend to oppose any expenditure of money on the harbour of Toronto, but I was merely pointing out that if the people of Toronto wanted money spent in their own town they should not be so small as to object to the amounts of money being spent in the smaller towns and in rural districts.

Mr. INGRAM. I asked the hon. minister about the parties the department bought this lot from and I quoted :

Potter, F. A., Potter, D. and Moore, T., executors estate of late Ann Moore, purchase of site, $2,500.

The hon. gentleman said that they bought this site from these people. Is that correct ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My information is that this property was owned by the executors of an estate. There is no doubt about that, because the hon. gentleman has read the names of the executors.

Mr. INGRAM. Who is the party that the lot was bought from ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is an estate known in Clinton as the Potter estate.

Mr. INGRAM. Is there any name that the hon. gentleman could give us ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. You have the names there.

Mr. INGRAM. That is what I cannot understand. Last year, we were not told that; we were told an entirely different story. We were told last year that the lot had been purchased from Mr. A. W. Wilkie, who happened to be a good Tory.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Wilkie was simply the tenant of the property. The property was bought from the Potter estate.

Mr. INGRAM. All I have to do is to quote the Minister of Public Works :

We have bought the site there from a good opponent of ours, Mr. A. W. Wilkie. We will spend more than $8,000 on the building.

Which statement is correct ? I am bound to believe that of the hon. member for West Huron, in view of the fact that he displayed such a Christian spirit at the Sunday school convention recently held in Owen Sound during the late election there. I am bound to say also that we have a good running mate for the hon. member for West Huron, in Preston, the gentleman who sang at a meeting of Sunday School children in St. Thomas, during the famous corrupt election in West Elgin. 'There is Sunshine in my Soul.' I would like to put these two gentlemen together as they make an excellent team.

Mr. DAVIS.

Cobourg—Towards construction of armoury, $15,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not suppose we will be called upon to sit all night.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Perhaps it is a little unreasonable to sit here wasting time altogether. If my hon. friend has any proposition in regard to these items we may arrange to adjourn.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course I sympathize with my hon. friend in the obstruction he has sustained on his own side of the House, but, we are not responsible for that. The suggestion I was going to make was that as we have made pretty fair progress with these three items, and as we have discussed some of these matters pretty fully, which no doubt will save discussion on similar items in future, we should now rise and report progress.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Allow the present item to be passed and we will agree to adjourn.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We will allow that item to pass on the understanding which I have with the minister that if any hon. gentleman who is not here wishes to discuss it he may do so on some other item.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Perhaps the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) will give us some explanation about that Sunday convention.

Mr. HOLMES. I will if the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) will tell us something about limelight views in North Ontario.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I accept the hon. gentleman's challenge and on a later occasion will throw some limelight views on his actions there.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid we will not have to call the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) to account for doing much Sunday school work. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 37) respecting the Ottawa, Northern and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Brown.

Bill (No. 39) to make further provision for the prevention of cruelty to animals and to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—Mr. Brock.

QUESTIONS.

CANADIAN TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

Have any representations been received by the government of Canada from the imperial government as to the advisability of locating the next Canadian Transcontinental Railway in such a manner that it may be remote from the frontier, and useful for military purposes ; and so placed that railway and telegraph communication between eastern and western Canada may not be liable to be cut off ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. (Hon. Sir Frederick Borden). No such representations have been made by the imperial government to the government of Canada.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.—SPUR LINE FROM RIVIERE OUELLE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. How much of the sum of $43,000, included in the Appropriation Act, 2 Edward VII, Chapter 1, 'for the building of a spur line of railway from the Intercolonial Railway station at Rivière Ouelle to the wharf on the St. Lawrence,' has been expended ?

2. Is the spur line in question finished ?

3. Is it the intention of the government to establish in connection with the said spur line a ferry between the wharf at Rivière Ouelle and the north shore of the St. Lawrence ?

4. If so, have any arrangements been made with any person or company to establish such a ferry, and with whom ?

5. Has the establishment of such ferry been recommended in writing by any member of the House of Commons; and if so, by whom ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The amount expended up to the 31st January, 1903, on Rivière Ouelle branch is $19,578.08.

2. No.

3. Yes. We have it in contemplation to arrange for a connection of that kind.

4. No arrangements have yet been concluded.

5. It has not been customary for the government to make public the names of parties with whom it has advised on questions of this kind.

DOUKHOBORS HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. WILSON asked :

How many Doukhobors have entered for homesteads in the North-west Territories in the years 1900, 1901 and 1902 ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir William Mulock) :

Calendar Year.	No. of Entries.
1900	None.
1901	62
1902	207
Total	269

HOUSES AND FUEL FOR IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

In view of the large immigration into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, what action has the government taken to see that they will be provided with houses and fuel for the next winter ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock). The department has no reason to believe that the immigrants coming into Canada will not be able to provide themselves with houses and fuel.

DOUKHOBOR PILGRIMAGE.

Mr. WILSON asked :

1. How many horses, sheep and cattle did the Doukhobors turn at large in the fall of 1902, in the Yorkton District ?

2. How many of these animals did the government officials take in charge ; what was done with these cattle, and what was the cost to the government ?

3. If these cattle were sold, how much did they bring; who sold them and what was done with the money ?

4. When the Doukhobors of the Yorkton District went on their pilgrimage, in the fall of 1902, what did it cost to take them back to their homes; who paid it, and to whom was it paid ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock) :

1. The exact number is not given, but there were about 120 horses, 95 sheep and 285 cattle.

2. The government officials took charge of 120 horses, 95 sheep and 285 cattle. They were sold at auction at no cost to the government.

3. The stock realized $16,024.25. They were sold by C. J. Macfarlane, an auctioneer authorized by the department, and the money was placed in 'trust' to be expended in the relief of the Doukhobors.

4. The expenses in connection with the Doukhobors' pilgrimage amounted to $7,292. and this was paid from the trust fund. This money was expended by the officials of the department and a receipt was given by three leaders of the Doukhobors duly authorized to do so at a special meeting of the Doukhobors held for the purpose. The details of this expenditure have not been sent to Ottawa.

SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT TRACADIE, N. B.

Mr. WILMOT asked:

1. Has M. E. Bourgeois been dismissed from the position of sub-collector of customs at Tracadie, N.B.? If so, when was he dismissed, and for what reason?

2. Was any complaint entered against him? If so, what was the nature of the complaint, and was he given an opportunity of defending himself?

3. Who made the complaint, and upon whose recommendation was he dismissed?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). M. E. Bourgeois, sub-collector of customs at Tracadie, N.B., was retired from the customs service, from 1st February, 1903, on account of age, it being considered necessary to have a younger and more energetic officer for customs service at that place.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to remind the Finance Minister that yesterday he promised to bring down immediately, a return which I moved for.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I did not promise it 'immediately,' but I promised it promptly. The return may be brought down to-day, or at all events to-morrow.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it a complicated and lengthy return?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There should be some uniformity regarding this matter of answering questions. The Minister of Customs to-day gave a very long answer to a question propounded by one of his supporters, and I have not the slightest doubt that if the question were asked by a member on this side we would be compelled to move for a return. The same principle should apply to both sides of the House regarding questions of that character. I do not see why the slightest discrimination should be made. Discrimination of that kind will not advance the business of the House. I want to be fair about it, but I have observed more than once that it makes a considerable difference whether the question comes from that side of the House or from this side.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There should be no discrimination of that kind, and I do not think there is. There has been no unreasonable delay about this return and it will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I gather that the question asked by my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) will probably involve a shorter answer than the question put by the member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), which was answered by the Minister of Customs, and yet in one case we were compelled to move for a return and in the other case the answer was brought down at once.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sure that there is as great a disposition to answer a question from that side of the House as from this.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We would like to see it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). We have to get this information from the different ports and we try to get it as rapidly as possible, and when we do get it we give it as soon as it comes into our possession. We do not know any other way of dealing with the business of the House.

THE FRENCH TRANSLATION OF THE PAPERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency.)—(Translation.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the way in which the translation of our papers is done.

The PRIME MINISTER (The Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) (Translation.) Is the hon. gentleman referring to the 'Hansard'?

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) No, I am alluding to the papers of the House. Last year I had the opportunity of bringing to the attention of the House that very same matter, and now I wish to give an instance which shows how faulty, to say the least, that translation is.

I have placed on the Order Paper of the day a question in connection with a ferry boat which is to accommodate Rivière Ouelle and the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Now, they have translated the word 'ferry' by the French word 'bac.' I would not have thought it was worth while to correct that error, were it not that I do not wish to be made a laughing stock to the community by leaving the public under the impression that I used the word 'bac' to describe the character of the accommodation which is to be given to the public by a ferry boat plying between Rivière Ouelle and La Malbaie. If you take the trouble of referring to Bescherelle's dictionary, you will find that 'bac' is described as follows: A large, flat boat, chiefly used for ferrying over a river, cattle, carts, &c., by means of a cable fastened on both shores.

The PRIME MINISTER. (Translation.) Where are the words to be found which you are complaining of?

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) At the top of page three of to-day's Order Paper. It would have been absolutely preposterous for me to have used such a word in describing the service which is to be provided by means of a ferry boat plying between Rivière Ouelle and the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

So, I think, the officials whose duty it is to translate the papers referred to, should give a closer attention to their work.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES ACT—PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk) moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend chapter 8 of the statutes of 1900, authorizing the granting of railway subsidies. He said: Chapter 8 of the statutes of 1900 makes a provision which I desire slightly to amend. This provision is contained in section 3, subsection 'C' and is as follows:

> Upon progress estimates and the certificate of the chief engineer of Railways and Canals, that in his opinion, having regard to the whole work undertaken and the aid granted, the progress made justifies the payment of a sum not less than $60,000.

In practice, this provision is found to work to the detriment of roads whose subsidies are within the sum of $60,000. A road with a larger subsidy, may upon a progress estimate apply for an allowance from the subsidy and upon the report of the chief engineer, that allowance can be made. But a road with a subsidy of $60,000 or less, although it may be almost completed, although the progress estimates would show that a very small sum of money would be required to complete the road; yet a road of that character is absolutely debarred from an application for an allowance upon its subsidy under the progress estimate. It must be apparent to the House that this inadvertently works an injustice by putting a road with a small subsidy at a disadvantage as compared with roads having a larger subsidy. In view of this I have introduced this Bill which contains the simple provision that the figure '$30,000' shall be substituted for '$60,000.'

Mr. MONK. Is this amendment going to apply to railways which are only entitled to a subsidy of less than $60,000, or has it a general application?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I might be permitted to explain that in 1898 we introduced a departure from the ordinary rule which governed the payment of subsidies, by providing that in respect to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and I think the Victoria bridge, which were likely to earn very large sums, and which would not be able to complete their line in ten-mile sections; that we should be authorized to make payment on progress estimates providing the amount earned on the said progress estimates would not be less than $60,000. Not that the whole subsidy then earned would not exceed $60,000, but when the amount to be earned with respect to such progress estimates would not exceed $60,000.

Mr. MONK. Was that in 1900?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was before 1900. I think it was as early as 1898, because it was then that the Crow's Nest Pass contract was entered into. At the same time the Grand Trunk Railway was building the Victoria bridge.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister of Railways may remember that yesterday there was a debate on this very subject, in which I stated that the Railway Act was amended so that progress estimates might be allowed as the road was under construction. The Minister of Railways then stated that that had application only to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, my hon. friend is in error as to that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. If you look at the debate of yesterday, you will find that I am strictly correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I understood the hon. gentleman to have reference to the original adoption of this particular change in the law, which was in respect of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. My statement was that the Railway Act was read so as to allow the government to make advances on progress estimates instead of on the completion of 10-mile sections. The hon. minister stated that that applied only to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not intend to convey that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The Act provides that the subsidies hereby granted, and any subsidies heretofore granted under any Act of parliament of Canada, still in force, but not fully paid, may be paid upon progress estimates on the certificate of the chief engineer of Railways and Canals that in his opinion, having regard to the whole work undertaken and the aid granted, the progress made justifies the payment of a sum not less than $60,000. It has no such application as the Minister of Railways now states. He states that this only takes effect when there has not been ten miles of road completed, and where there has been $60,000 spent on a section that does not constitute a complete section of ten miles. There is no such application as that at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say there was.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well, it is unfortunate that when I repeat a statement that has been made by the minister just a few seconds before, I have so misunderstood it that I am subject to a correction by the hon. minister. I leave it to the House if I am not correct in saying that the hon. minister left the impression on the House which I have stated. He may not have intended to say so, but the fact is there that payments can be made on progress estimates, not taking into consideration whether ten miles are completed or not; and the present Bill is for the purpose of amending the Act in order to extend the application, as I think properly, to sums not less than $30,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Act contemplates dealing with a class of railways—there are not many of them—that have a subsidy coming within or very near the limit set in this Bill. For instance, there may be a road fifteen miles in length entitled to a subsidy of $3,200 a mile.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he has already spoken, and he cannot continue except with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. The subsidy on a road of that length would be something like $48,000. The road might be almost completed. There might be work enough to have completed fourteen of the fifteen miles, and yet the ten-mile section not fully completed. Although there might be only $2,000 or $3,000 of expenditure required to complete the work, the subsidy would be hung up by this provision, which was not intended to discriminate in that manner against the smaller roads; and the Bill simply asks for the substitution of 'thirty' for 'sixty,' so that these smaller roads may be treated with the same degree of fairness that would be accorded to the larger and more expensive roads. It is for the purpose of rectifying an unintentional hardship, and not for the purpose of prejudicing in any way any public interest, that this Bill is introduced.

Mr. MONK. It does not seem to me very wise for us to change the statute of 1900. By the terms of section 3 of that statute we provide that subsidies shall be paid in two cases: first, in the case of the completion of a ten-mile section. That seems fair enough. Secondly, upon progress estimates on the certificate of the chief engineer of Railways and Canals, that in his opinion, having regard to the whole work undertaken and the aid granted, the progress made justifies the payment of a sum not less than $60,000; or with respect to part one way and part the other; that is to say, when part of the ten-mile section is built and part of the $60,000 is earned. It seems to me on general principles that this gives the government and the railway company quite latitude enough. We should not, I think, reduce the limit of $60,000 to any smaller figure, particularly in view of the facts which were commented on yesterday in this House, showing that these payments of subsidies are very often abused. Unless there is some very special reason, graver than that given by the hon. gentleman, I think we should adhere to the enactment of 1900.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know whether I shall be taken as having spoken, because of the explanation I made; but if I have, I would ask the indulgence of the House for the purpose of making one remark on the Bill. While I have no objection to offer to the hon. gentleman's motion passing, and would not set up any direct nor indirect opposition to it, at the same time I think that we might very well consider whether or not it is desirable to continue in the future the system of paying on progress estimates. I see no such objection to it as has been referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), because I think the public interest can be safeguarded as well if you are paying from progress estimates as if you were paying according to the original plan. But there are drawbacks which are largely departmental, and which it would not be desirable for us to continue. It will be in the memory of hon. members that some years ago—I think in 1898—we adopted the plan of allowing payments to be made on progress estimates and not limiting the payments of subsidies to the completion of ten-mile sections. Very strong representations were made that it would be impossible in a work such as was contemplated—the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway—that ten-mile sections could be completed. There was a great deal of heavy work on it. The company desired to prosecute the work with all dispatch, to go on with its grading over the entire length simultaneously, if possible, and it would not be possible to grade and do ballasting and station building on every ten miles with the expedition they had in mind. Therefore parliament consented that in respect of these two undertakings, the Crow's Nest Pass Railway and the Victoria bridge, upon the companies showing that they had expended a sufficient amount in the work to earn a payment on subsidy account of not less than $60,000, the government might make payment to them of such an amount. Since then a clause has been inserted in this general Act, and we have paid in a few instances on progress estimates when the parties have been able to bring themselves within the limitations of the present law. I think that the law is attended with some disadvantages. We are often called upon to send engineers for the purpose of making an inspection of a road, and are called upon for payments with a great deal of frequency, which adds to the work of the department. And if this were to go on to a greater extent, it would exceed the capabilities of the department. The lower you reduce the amount, the more frequent have the surveys to be made and all the machinery put into operation in order that these payments may be made. It was chiefly for that reason that we made the limit as high as we did. I do not think that any great hardship is likely to be done in this case—at all events none that the companies ought not be expected to bear. Therefore I should be disposed to drop this portion of the conditions attaching to payments altogether from future subsidy Bills and confine payments to the ten-mile sections as was the law prior to that change. I would not offer any opposition to the present Bill because I think if it becomes law, it would not long continue in operation, as we should have to revert to the original conditions which existed before we made this change.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon.

On section 1.

Mr. MONK. In view of the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals that although offering no opposition to the Bill, he is in opinion that we should revert to the previous system of paying subsidies on the completion of ten-mile sections, it seems to me that it would be prudent for us, before proceeding still further in the direction upon which we entered in 1900, to have this Bill examined by the Railway Committee and have the report of the Committee before taking any action.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sorry to meet with the opposition of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier in this matter. If he understood all the circumstances, he would see that this does not involve any dangerous departure but is merely a provision to treat fairly and equitably projects already under way and nearly completed, and not place them at a disadvantage as compared with larger concerns. The denial of the provision asked for will work hardship in one or two cases, where roads with subsidies of less than $60,000 are nearly completed and in much better condition to ask for progress estimates than many larger roads which have asked for these estimates and received the money. I have introduced this Bill with a full knowledge of the facts. I do not think that the opposition of my hon. friend was called for, and I trust that the application will not be opposed.

Mr. MONK. I do not deny that hardships may be caused in one or two instances but we have the foreshadowing of the granting of very considerable subsidies during the present session, and if the remarks which fell from the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals are to be entertained at all by the committee, it will be wiser for us to revert to the old rule and pay on the completion of each ten-mile section. That is the reason why on a question of this kind we should have the opinion of the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We should have the policy of the government. This is an extension of an important principle in the old Bill and which the hon. Minister of Railways thinks is perhaps a bad principle. The government gives money to railways for what purposes? That they may be of use in the sections where they are built, and they can be of no use until they are completed. On what principle then should the government be asked to advance money on a road which may never be completed and never used. Nearly the whole of the subsidy may be paid and the road never be completed or operated. I do not know the particular case the hon. gentleman mentioned and which he seeks to meet by the Bill. But it seems to me it cannot be of much importance. The expenditure with regard to which progress estimates are required must be less than $60,000, and he seeks to lower the minimum $30,000. Surely, if the undertaking is of any importance whatever, the company are in a position to finish it; and when they finish it, they can get the full amount of subsidy they are entitled to. What I protest against is the advancing of money on progress estimates on a work where there is a possibility—not a probability only but even a possibility—of the road not being completed and used. Surveys, obtaining of the land, clearing it, putting it in shape to build the road—there may be advances on all these under the clause of the Railway Act, yet the road may never actually be built; and in that case the country simply loses the money paid in advance on the progress estimates.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is another consideration to which, perhaps, the Minister of Railways and Canals will attach some importance. It has been stated in the House that subsidies for certain railways which are not now in operation were diverted in some way from the purpose for which they were intended. I have no knowledge of it myself, but if it is the case, as has been stated, does it not make it the duty of the government to announce a policy which will make more stringent the conditions touching the payment of these subsidies, rather than relax them? I do not know how many of the roads would come within the operation of this Bill, nor have I any idea as to the roads referred to by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). But certainly the statements which have been made in this House with regard to this matter within the past few days should make us move in the direction of tightening the purse strings in the payment of these subsidies, rather than in the direction of a more lax system.

Mr. MONK. I would move that the Committee recommend that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would call the attention of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) to the fact that his motion is not in order. This motion is one to be made in the House, not in committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The motion is out of order.

Mr. MONK. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that I should offer any objection to this motion, nor shall I offer any. But I think that before we are through with the matter the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) will, perhaps, be ready to admit that he has been rather captious and unreasonable with regard to it. However, let that go.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It is not for the purpose of killing the Bill, but to make the motion in the House that the Bill be referred to the Railway Committee where it can be more fully considered.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

CATTLE-GUARDS ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. EDWARD A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act. He said: Mr. Speaker. For the third consecutive session I deem it my duty to press this measure upon the attention of the House. I should feel like apologizing to the House for taking up time with this matter did I not know that it is not my fault that it had not already been disposed of. I have discussed the principle of this Bill on the floor of this House and in the Railway Committee over and over again during these three sessions. We have discussed it, I am sorry to say, without getting any further on than we were at the beginning. The government has seen fit, on each occasion, to take some way of disposing of this Bill other than meeting it fairly and squarely and deciding for or against the principle. Two sessions ago, when the Bill was first brought up, I did not demur to its being sent to the Railway Committee, assuming that it would be considered in a reasonable way, brought down to the House in reasonable time and decided upon its merits. It went to the Railway Committee, therefore, I will not say with my actual consent, but without opposition on my part. In feeling that it was fair to give the government a trial with respect to it. But, in the Railway Committee, the government, with their majority, sent it to a small sub-committee, which disposed of it by reporting, practically, that it was not in the interest of the country to adopt it. That was adopted as a matter of course, first by the Railway Committee and then by this House, in consequence of the well known rule that the committees reports are to be adopted. Last session it came up in the same way, and on the second reading I felt it my duty to oppose it going to any Railway Committee, but it went in spite of the division that was taken, and it was there debated upon its merits to a considerable extent and was voted down, not on its merits, but in view of some promises made, some pledges of what would be done by the government in the meantime if it was allowed to stand. It was the opinion of the majority of the committee it should not be proceeded further with that session.

Now, sir, as you know, justice delayed is injustice, and we are here again another year without any expression of opinion against the merits of this Bill and without anything having been done. But I understand, and I want the Minister of Railways and Canals to correct me if I am wrong—I must be more or less uncertain about it until I see his Railway Bill, which has been read the first time but is not yet printed for distribution—I understand that he proposes to refer this great question of the liabilities of railways killing animals belonging to farmers and others, to a railway commission without any positive declaration given by this House as to what principles are to guide that commission. If I am wrong about that, the Minister of Railways will correct me. If I am not wrong—and he does not rise to correct me—then I say at the outset that that is an absolutely wrong principle. There are 214 members in this House elected by our constituents to enact laws, and no railway commission ought to be allowed to decide from time to time, one year one thing and another year another thing, concerning this great question as to who is to be responsible for animals that may be killed on a railway by the railway company running its trains across highways. I say that such a large and important question as that should never be decided by any commission of gentlemen who are at perfect liberty to decide, as I say, one thing one year and another thing another year, and no owner of stock can know from one year to another where he stands, or what the law is, or what the law is likely to be next year. If that statute is amended so that justice is done, if the House, for instance, thinks that this Bill of mine should be carried, and if they think that a railway commission will do that which is reasonable and which we have a right to expect of them in enforcing it, the best way to get them do so is to pass a statute and oblige them to do it, only leaving it to them to carry out the details of the law which we pass. For that reason I am compelled to say at the outset that I feel that the only thing that we can do in the interest of the country is to fasten this responsibility upon the railway companies and by enactment to decide once and for all, right here, that the members of the House believe that it is right, and that the farmers should be protected in their rights, to secure which I am providing in my amendment. But referring it from time to time, first to a railway committee, then to a special committee, then to a commission that is to inquire into the question, then to a permanent railway commission, that may, as I said, do one thing one year and another thing another, is, it seems to me, not to use a stronger word, trifling with the rights of the parties. It would be much better, much more proper for members on both sides of the House to stand up manfully and say: I do not think or I do think the law should be as the member for Lincoln says it should, therefore I will vote against it or for it. That is what I want the House to do, because I want to be governed by the majority, and I want the majority to vote upon an intelligent issue, understanding all the time that they are accomplishing something and not trifling with the question.

Now, not unduly to delay the House, but at the same time to present this case fairly, I must ask the indulgence of the House while I describe the main history of this legislation. In the early days of this country when the railways began to do business, the law was not at all what it is now. I have heard it said by opponents of this legislation which I have been introducing, and trying to get passed during the past three years—I have heard it said more than once that my legislation is radical, that it is going backwards, that we are not going forward as we ought to do, that we are allowing the farmers to go back in civilization, so to speak, allowing them to get careless, to become indifferent as to their rights and as to the rights that other people have against them. That is one view of it, that is a view that comes from the opponents of this Bill, and it is so partial that I think I am right in assuming that it originates with the railway companies, because the railways themselves have been going back and have declined to carry out what in the early days they felt they were obliged to carry out, and which they did carry out as long as they thought it was necessary being compelled to do so, and until they found that the representatives of the people were not as careful in watching the people's interests as they, the railway companies, were in looking after their own interests; and they managed to get the law amended so that they were relieved of responsibility. Now, the original law is to be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, section 13. It declares that cattle-guards at all highway crossings suitable and sufficient to prevent animals getting on the railway shall be maintained and kept up by the railway. That was the whole law upon the subject at that time, that was an absolute liability, that was a responsibility thrown upon them to keep cattle-guards sufficient to prevent animals going on the railways. In 1888 the Railway Act was revised and consolidated, that section was re-written, and instead of their being required to keep cattle-guards on all highway crossings suitable and sufficient to prevent animals getting on the railways, it was amended so that they were required by section 194 of the Consolidated Railway Act of 1888, to maintain and erect on each side of the railway, through any township, fences with openings, gates or bars, sliding or hurdle gates, and so on. Also cattle guards on all highway crossings sufficient to prevent cattle and other animals getting on the railway. And with this declaration of liability added:

> Until such fences and cattle-guards are duly made and completed, and if after they are so made and completed they are not duly maintained, the company shall be liable for all damages done by its trains or engines to cattle, horses and other animals, not wrongfully on the railway, and having got there in consequence of the omission to make, complete and maintain such fences and cattle-guards as aforesaid.

Now that began to take away responsibility. They had then only to pay for the animals that were not wrongfully on the railway, and all this time there has been a section in this Act preventing animals from being lawfully upon the highway within half a mile of the railway crossing; so that when, in 1888, they got that section into the Act, that the animals should only be paid for by the railway if they were not wrongfully on the railway, then they were not responsible, and they are not responsible to-day in any case that can be suggested. They are responsible if the animal is not wrongfully on the railway. If the animal is not in control of a human being, as it has been decided by the courts, it would be wrongfully there, in view of the section of the Act which I last mentioned, the section that makes it unlawful for the animals to be within half a mile of a railway crossing; for then they are not rightfully upon the railway.

Now, what are cattle-guards for? Is there a case that can be suggested by any gentleman in this House where a cattle-guard is required for animals who are in charge of a human being? If an animal is in charge of a human being, one sees at once there can be no responsibility, because the human being would then be guilty of contributory negligence in allowing the animal to get upon the track. So we have since 1888 a statute which is absolutely nonsensical, a statute which ought to be repealed, if it is not amended, because it does not enact anything practicable. That legislation as it stands to-day is absolutely impracticable, it does not legislate for the redress of any grievance that can possibly exist. It does say they shall be responsible if they kill animals that are rightfully upon the railway, but at the same time they cannot get there in a case where responsibility would exist. That Act was further amended in 1890. It was amended so as to read:

> If the company omits to erect and complete as aforesaid any fence or cattle-guard, or if, after it is completed, the company neglects to maintain the same as aforesaid, and if, in consequence of such omission or neglect, any animal gets upon the railway from an adjoining place where, under the circumstances, it might properly be, then the company shall be liable to the owner of every such animal for all damages, &c.

Then it goes on to enact that any animal allowed by law to run at large should be paid for. Now, I am coming to the case of an animal that is not allowed by law to run at large because that is the animal that requires to be protected. An animal escapes without the knowledge of the owner, goes down to the railway crossing, and passes on from the highway to the point of danger on the railway property. If the animal is killed there the owner cannot get paid for it. That is a condition of affairs that should be remedied and one which I have been endeavouring to have remedied for the last two years. I may say that the only argument that has been used against this legislation, so far as I know, is that there is a principle involved and that we should encourage the farmer to prevent his cattle from running at large. People who live in glass houses should not throw stones. The railway companies are deliberately violating an Act of parliament; they are deliberately refraining from carrying out the object of this legislation, they are not doing what it is contended they should do, they are not maintaining cattle-guards at highway crossings. That of course is no reason why the farmer should deliberately violate the minor law but it comes about in this way: The farmer's animal escapes without him knowing it. We must assume that he does not wish to break the minor law and that he is anxious to keep his animals at home. However, an animal gets upon the highway. Has he not a right to expect that it will remain upon the highway? That is where he should be responsible for everything that happens to it. If it gets upon the highway through his carelessness or otherwise, it should be expected to remain upon the highway. But now, if it gets to the point on the highway where the railway crosses and is killed at the point of intersection the farmer should suffer the loss of the animal. It is fair enough that he should stand the expense of an accident happening at the point of intersection. Animals accidentally get upon the highway in different ways without the knowledge of the farmer. For instance, a neighbour visiting a farmer and then going away, may leave the gate unfastened, and though no act of negligence has been committed by the farmer, his animal may get upon the highway and go to the railway crossing. The farmer should lose the animal if it is killed while it remains upon the highway. The responsibility is fairly divided by the Bill which I have introduced, because the farmer sustains the loss himself if the animal is killed while it is on the highway; that is, if it is killed at the point of intersection between the places where the cattle-guards ought to be. If there are cattle-guards provided the animal will pass along; if it is not killed at the point of intersection it will not be killed anywhere else, because, if this amendment is adopted and railway companies are obliged to provide cattle-guards, the animal will be prevented from getting on the railway property. Every owner of property in Canada has to fence his own property. The railway company has to fence its own property at common law, and if the railways and those opposing this legislation contend that we are violating a principle which we ought not to encourage the farmers to violate by allowing their animals to run at large, they forget that they are violating a much older and stronger principle which is that they should fence their own property. But, we must be practical. I admit that a railway company must cross the highway and that it would not be possible to erect fences there. In the older countries they are even compelled to have gates which are moved from time to time as the train goes along, or they are compelled to tunnel underneath the highway or to bridge over it and in most of the states of the Union they are compelled to tunnel under or bridge over it. As the law stands to-day, in Canada, they are allowed to do what they can do in no other country. They do not have to protect the public with gates except where the Railway Committee of the Privy Council orders it in some very populous part of some very large city. They do not protect the farmer with gates when they cross on the level ; they are not obliged to go underneath or to bridge overhead. Then, it is said that in the interests of the country and of its development, we ought to encourage the construction and operation of railways, but the railway company ought to do something in order to prevent these accidents that occur without any deliberate or actual negligence on the part of the farmer. What can they be asked to do that will be less burdensome than that which my Bill will bring about ? They will be required to keep cattle-guards at the highway crossings to keep cattle from getting on the railway property. Is there anything harsh or unreasonable in that principle ? If they do not do this they will be obliged to pay for an animal that gets on their property because of their own negligence, and that is the only time they will have to pay for it. The responsibility is divided. It has been said that my Bill is one-sided. Well, I have asked hon. members on both sides of this House to draw me a Bill that will not be one-sided, and I have said to them that if they would draw such a Bill I will support it—such a Bill as will carry out the principle of making a fair division of the responsibility. Not one of them has said that he could draw up a Bill that would better accomplish this purpose, and as this is a principle that should be carried out, I submit that it is fair that this Bill should be passed in the shape in which I prepared it. Now, as I said a minute ago, and I think it will bear repetition, the Bill that I am introducing here, and for which I have fought for three years, because I thought its adoption was in the best interests of the country, does not put all the responsibility upon the railway company. It puts more responsibility on the farmer than upon the railway company. It only puts upon the railway company the responsibility of carrying out what is plainly their duty of fencing their own property so far as they can and at the same time do the business that they are chartered by the country to do. The railway companies should either be willing to bridge over the highway, or tunnel under it, or provide cattle-guards. They should not have an unprotected and dangerous railway, at common law, running across the highway and they should not encourage animals to get upon their property for want of a cattle-guard to prevent them. The responsibility is chiefly placed upon the farmers, because, if you consider the matter, you will agree with me that the animal is much more likely to be killed at the point of intersection than on the railway. It is more likely to remain on the highway than anywhere else. If the cattle-guard is there there is only one place it can go ; that is, it can continue on the highway, but if the guard is not there there are three places it can go when it gets to the point of intersection. If the cattle-guard is not there the only way in which we can get a practical result is to make the railway answerable in damages if they do not do what you say they should do. If the law does not hold the railways responsible for animals getting on the railway because of the absence of a cattle-guard, you cannot expect the railways to put up a cattle-guard. When an animal gets to the point of intersection it has to turn to the right or to the left, or to go straight ahead, and if it goes straight ahead no danger will happen. It is our duty in this House to so legislate as to prevent loss to anybody. We do not legislate to put any loss on the railway or on the farmer, but we should legislate to prevent loss of any kind. If the animal at the point of intersection does not go straight ahead, then if there are no cattle-guards or insufficient cattle-guards he will turn aside, get on the railway, and the chances are two out of three that it is the fault of the railway that the animal gets on the track. If there are not cattle-guards, the railway is responsible for two out of three causes of death ; that is to say the animal is twice as likely to be killed as not. Therefore, if a railway is required to have cattle-guards it cannot complain at being made responsible when it has no cattle-guards or cattle-guards that are not sufficient for the purpose for which they are intended. We ought to hear no more about this legislation being one sided. It has been said that you cannot get a cattle-guard that will on all occasions turn animals and that there are some animals that no guard will turn. That may be so. But it is also true that there are some fences that will not turn animals. I would like to ask those who oppose this legislation to apply the same rule to the railway company as they do to the farmer. Why cannot the farmer say : I have an animal which will jump over my fence and it is not my fault, and therefore you ought to provide some standard fence which if I put up and my animal gets over I cannot be held to be negligent. That is practically the argument that the railways bring against the farmers in this case. They say : We do not know of any guard that will keep animals from getting on our track, and we think therefore we ought to be allowed to escape all responsibility. Of course the railways entirely disregard the fact that 90 or 95 per cent of the animals would be turned back by the ordinary guard, but they argue that because there is a small percentage that will get over any cattle-guard that therefore they ought be at liberty to kill 100 per cent of the cattle and not be responsible for it. I wonder would the railways pretend for a moment that we ought to determine on a standard fence and then say to the farmer that because there are some breachy animals that will get over that fence, they would pay for that animal if he is killed, and the farmer would not be responsible. It would be no more unreasonable for the farmers to contend that, than it is for the railways to contend that they should not carry out what by common law they are required to do, what by statute they were first required to do, but which they have for years escaped doing by virtue of the legislation of this parliament not having been watched on behalf of the people as energetically as it was watched on behalf of the railways. I have some further authority since last session for submitting to the House that the Bill which I now introduce is the only practical solution of the difficulty. The Toronto 'Daily Star' which ought to be an authority for some members of the government at least, spoke as follows on March 27th of last year:

> Necessity is the mother of invention, and if the railways were responsible for animals killed anywhere but on the crossings, they would not be long in finding a cattle-guard that would largely, if not altogether, prevent animals from turning from the road into the track.
> As it is now, the railways in Canada have no interest in the question at all. They have abolished guards, and trust to the power of their engine to throw aside any animal that gets in the way.
> This is not right, and parliament will not get much rest until it is made right.

In view of that expression of opinion in the Toronto 'Star,' I hope I shall get the support of the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock), although I have not had his support for this Bill before, so far as I am aware of. I think, Sir, that this matter should be dealt with now once and for all, and I trust this will be the last time I shall have to address the House upon it. I do not wish the railways or the government or any one else to infer from that, that if the Bill does not pass you shall hear no more about it, for so long as I have a seat in the House, I shall try to get a remedy for this grievance, and I shall keep on knocking at the door in the hope that it will be opened some day. In view of the attention which has been given to this Bill during last session and since last session. In view of the fact that there is no other solution suggested, and in view of the fact that it has never been rejected by this House on its merits, I think I have good grounds for again submitting it to the House. Last year the Bill was referred to the Railway Committee and discussed thoroughly, but under that reference to the committee it only required fifty members of this House to prevent the Bill passing. Fifty members of that committee as against forty-three, a majority of seven, reported that in the opinion of the Railway Committee it was not wise to pass the Bill at that session. They did not report that it should not pass sometime, or that it did not provide a remedy for the evil, but that it was not wise to pass it during that session. Therefore, fifty members of the committee were able to accomplish what it should take one hundred and seven members, or more than half the House to accomplish. The right hon. the premier found fault with me for taking exception to the report when it came from the committee, and he suggested that I was practically appealing from the report of the committee and that it should not be allowed because it was against the rule that reports of committees should always be respected by the House. Well, Sir, it is time for the House itself to take this thing into serious consideration and decide whether it is reasonable that a farmer should take all responsibility for any accident that may occur, and that the railway company should have no responsibility cast upon it. The railways are permitted to expropriate property, and to cross highways with their dangerous machinery, and yet they are not to be liable for any damage they may cause by reason of their operation. I grant that it is necessary to have railways in order to carry on the business of the country, but why should they not be compelled to treat their neighbour, the farmer, the same as any other neighbour would be compelled to treat him? Accidents will happen in spite of the most absolute care; you cannot help a fence rail falling down or a gate blowing down and animals escaping. Under my amending Act if the animal does escape and gets to the point of intersection, and is there killed, the farmer will lose the animal; but if it gets on to the railway from the highway the railway will be responsible for not having guards to stop it. The only way to get a good guard is, as the 'Star' newspaper of Toronto says, to put the responsibility on the railway. If a railway company wants to get a new coupler, or a new brake, or a new steam whistle, or a new telegraph instrument, is it to be expected that the country at large or parliament will provide them? No, the railway company finds all such things for itself, and it should be bound to find cattle-guards. They may not get guards that will turn back every animal; but they will get guards that wil turn back 95 per cent of them. If this legislation passes, they will perhaps pay slightly unfairly for about 5 per cent of the animals that will be skilful enough to pass over any guard; but is it not better that the railways should pay for that 5 per cent, even wrongly, than not pay for the 95 per cent rightly ? It is simply a question of the greatest wrong being done the greater number, or the greater right to the greater number. Because there is a trifling percentage of cases in which the result might be hard on the railways, that is no reason why they should escape all responsibility in 95 per cent of the cases.

I do not think I ought to trouble the House any longer on this question. I dare say other members desire to address you upon it. If the Bill passes its second reading, as I think it ought to, we shall all have an opportunity to discuss it in committee, if the House goes into committee upon it, as I trust it will ; and if any member there can propose an amendment which will provide a better remedy for the wrongs that exist or one more applicable to the rights of the railways, he will have my support in amending the Bill to that extent, so long as the principle of the measure remains, namely, that the responsibility ought to be on the railways to protect their own property, and to keep animals from getting on their property from the highway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I may say at once that I have no opposition whatever to offer to the second reading of this Bill. I shall propose, however, that the Bill, after being read a second time, shall be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. I shall do so for this reason, that it is quite impracticable for us to discuss in this House a question of such apparently contentious character with the same effect or advantage as we can before that committee. I have no fault to find with the desire which the hon. gentleman has expressed, that the utmost justice shall be done in connection with this serious trouble. I realize the gravity of it. I know there is a very strong public opinion, in some parts of Canada at all events, in respect to it. I know that many people desire a remedy. I am confident that what they desire is that when the remedy is applied, it shall be a just, fair and equitable remedy, and I am prepared to act to the utmost of my ability with any gentleman who is interested in this question, in order that a remedy shall be devised which shall be an ample remedy, but which shall also be a just and equitable remedy. When the Railway Committee a year ago dealt with this question, it was perfectly clear that there was a very divided opinion among the members of that committee as to the form which the remedy ought to take, and seeing that the committee were far from likely to agree upon this, I suggested that during the recess persons should be chosen who would examine into the question of cattle-guards, have tests made of all the cattle-guards in use, and report at the conclusion of their labours what the result was ; and if they were able to report that one or more cattle-guards could be found which would answer the purpose and afford a sufficient protection, the government would introduce legislation whereby the use of such guard would be enforced. My hon. friend fell in entirely with that suggestion. If I am not mistaken as to what occurred, the hon. gentleman moved or seconded a motion in this House for the purpose of having the matter disposed of for the session in that way. After the session a commission consisting of two gentlemen was constituted. They have made investigations and held tests, and they are preparing a report, which I hope will be available in a very few days. Whether or not that report will be of material assistance to us in determining the character of the legislation which we shall adopt, I am not now in a position to say. But I am in a position to state here now that when this question shall have been dealt with by the Railway Committee, if that committee comes to the conclusion that the principle on which the law is now based should be changed and some other principle adopted as more equitable, then it will be the simplest matter in the world to incorporate such an amendment into the Bill creating the Railway Commission, and making it part of the general railway law of the country. That is the way in which I think this matter can be dealt with in a business like manner, and a manner that will produce the very best results.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). Did I understand the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to say that the commission has not yet reported ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not yet.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). Is it possible that they will report before this session is over ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). This is a very important matter, and we want to deal with it this session.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We will engage that it shall be dealt with this session, when the Railway Bill is going through.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). How long is it since that commission was appointed ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the commission was appointed in August. They have been visiting different parts of the country, and the delay which has occurred has arisen largely from the desire of the experts to have every cattle-guard submitted to a test. There are some people who think that they have very efficient guards and who have asked to have the tests still further applied. The tests will be applied very shortly and the government will then be in possession of the report of the commission.

Mr. T. G. SPROULE (East Grey). I would like to ask how that one-eyed steer has fared lately ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am afraid that my hon. friend will have to wait for the report.

Mr. SPROULE. I have always been in hearty accord with the principle of this Bill. I think it is intended to do justice to a very important class, who have scarcely had justice done them by the railway companies in the past. But I regret that the hon. Minister of Railways has not been more active in putting that commission in operation so that we might have had the report at the opening of the session.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You will have it very soon.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman knows that there are many delays and many dangers and difficulties which beset measures of this kind when not brought down early. They are apt for one reason or another to be put off to the end of the session and then summarily disposed of in a very unsatisfactory manner. That commission might reasonably have anticipated that after the long discussion we had last session, this House would be anxious to deal with the question at the earliest possible moment. Why is the report not down now in this, nearly the third week of the session? I am afraid that unless the commission are hustled by some one, their report will not be down until it will be too late for the House to deal with it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No danger of that.

Mr. SPROULE. From the somewhat lengthy experience I have had in this House and on the Railway Committee, I am inclined to view with suspicion the sending of Bills of this nature to that committee. I have found it to be frequently the graveyard of the hopes of those interested in such measures.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Let us hope that this will be an exception.

Mr. SPROULE. Some how or other such Bills come to very unfortunate termination in that committee, and I am afraid this will meet with a similar fate. After the lengthy discussion we had last year in this House and in the committee on a similar Bill, I should think that hon. members would be quite prepared to deal with this matter in Committee of the Whole and not send it to any other committee. I do not care what committee you send it to so long as it is dealt with fairly and put before the House as it should be, without having to submit to the fiat against it of some force we cannot account for. I think it would be fairly dealt with by the Committee of the Whole without any injustice to any of the interests concerned.

Mr. ROBERT JOHNSTON (Cardwell). I understand, Mr. Speaker, that every railway charter contains a clause providing that the company shall provide sufficient cattle-guards, and certainly whenever our municipalities have granted bonuses, they have done so under the understanding that such protection shall be afforded. But it seems that there is another law in our statutes which prevents our farmers collecting from the railways compensation for animals killed on the track. We have been trying to have this defect in our law remedied, we have been trying to have the railway companies compelled to afford the farming community adequate protection, but after three years agitation in this House and in the country, nothing has yet been done, and our farmers have to suffer the loss of their cattle without being given the means of recovering compensation. What guarantee have we that this condition of things will not continue another year ? A railway company runs a train across a highway, that train kills cattle when on the railway property, and the owners can recover no compensation. We have laws which provide that when an animal strays into another man's field, it can be impounded, and there is nothing to prevent railways impounding cattle which stray on their property. From the start to the finish the railways have the advantage. If a man shoots an animal which wanders on to his property, he will have to pay for it, but a railway engine can kill an animal and the owner has no recourse. That is not treating the people fairly. And after we have had this question delayed for three years by being sent to committees, I think we ought to deal with it in this House in the Committee of the Whole and get through with it. Two years ago it was sent to a committee of five members, of whom two were in favour and three against compelling railway companies to put up better cattle-guards. It is time that something should be done. I do not see why the government should say what sort of cattle-guards a railway company shall build. The companies have accepted their bonuses on condition that they will furnish proper cattle protection, and are compelled to do so by their charters. It makes no difference to us whether the guards are of steel or wood so long as they are effective, and the companies should be allowed to judge what kind of cattle-guards are required. All we ask is that they be efficient. That is what they agreed to put up when they got their charters and when they canvassed the municipalities for bonuses. This matter has been before the government three different years, and yet they are no further than when they started. I hope that parliament this session will do justice to the farmers and compel the railway companies to put up cattle-guards that will turn the cattle. All that the government have accomplished so far is to find out that this one-eyed steer, which has been referred to, can jump any cattle-guard which so far may be put up. I would ask that in all fairness we should deal with the railway companies as we would with any individual who broke the law.

Motion agreed to ; and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I move that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

House divided on motion (Hon. Mr. Blair).

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Order being called for :

Second Reading Bill (No. 18) To amend the Interpretation Act.—Mr. Monk.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). My hon. friend from St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) is not in his place. He has a Bill very much to the same intent and purpose as the one I have before the House, and I would prefer to await his arrival before discussing the merits of this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand.

Order allowed to stand.

TICKET OF LEAVE ACTS—RELEASES.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency) moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council, documents, papers, correspondence, &c., in relation to the release from imprisonment under the Ticket of Leave Acts, since the 1st of January, 1902, to the 12th of March, 1903. And a statement showing :—

1. How many persons have been released from imprisonment under the Ticket of Leave Acts, since the 1st of January, 1902, to the 12th of March, 1903 ?

2. Of what offences had they been convicted, and at what dates were they so convicted ?

3. At what dates were they so released from imprisonment ?

4. Have any of the licenses of ticket of leave so granted been revoked ; and if any, how many ?

He said : Mr. Speaker, the motion as I gave notice of it, contained the following as paragraph 2 : 'What are the names of such persons.' In view of the remarks made the other day, when this subject was up in the House, by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick), I ask leave to amend the motion by striking out that paragraph.

Motion agreed to.

PREROGATIVE OF PARDON.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency) moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council, documents, papers, correspondence, &c., in relation to the exercise of the prerogative of pardon exercised by His Excellency the Governor General in cases of conviction of offences against federal or provincial laws, since the first day of January, 1902, to the 12th of March, 1903 ; and a statement showing :—

1. The number of the persons in whose favour the prerogative of pardon was so exercised during the said period.

2. Of what offences the said persons had been convicted.

3. The penalties to which the said persons had been condemned.

4. The dates when the convictions were pronounced against the said persons.

5. And what date the prerogative of pardon was exercised in each case.

He said : In this case I have to ask the leave of the House to amend my motion in somewhat the same way as the one that has just been carried. The motion as I gave notice of it, called for 'the names of the persons in whose favour the prerogative of pardon was so exercised.' I ask leave to amend that by substituting 'number' instead of 'names.'

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Perhaps my hon. friend would allow that motion to stand for the present. It is my intention to oppose it on the ground that it is contrary to the well-established usage in England, and also to the practice which has been adopted in the Justice Department. I make this suggestion because I have not been able to put my hand upon the particular case in which this rule was adopted in the Justice Department when Sir John Thompson was head of that department. I hope to have it within a day or two. I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the Minister of Justice look up the authorities ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps there would be no objection to furnishing us with a copy of that memorandum in the meantime.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I will have a copy made and send it to the leader of the opposition as soon as I have found the particular case I refer to.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

A DIVORCE COURT.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk) moved :

That this House is of the opinion that the laws of Canada should clearly and within narrow limits define the causes for which divorces may be granted. But that the present system of granting divorces by legislative enactment is unduly expensive, and often capricious, and unreliable. That if cause for divorce may exist, the means for obtaining a decree should be rendered less expensive than at present. And that as the justification of divorce by virtue of law, defining adequate cause, can only be established by investigation and evidence, the proceedings upon which such decree may be obtained are judicial in their character ; and that consequently divorce proceedings should be taken before, and decree of divorce emanate from a properly constituted divorce court.

He said : I stated last session upon an occasion when a divorce Bill was before this House, and when assigning reasons for my reluctance to act in a judicial capacity upon a matter of which I knew nothing, that I should this session introduce a motion asking for a change in divorce proceedings in the Dominion, at the same time laying stress upon the fact that in my opinion the method of granting divorces in Canada was unique in the respect that the decree emanated from a court not one-third, perhaps, the members of which knew anything of the case upon which they were passing judgment; that divorces were often subject to capricious influences, were uncertain in their character, and were in all cases expensive. For that reason I expressed the opinion then which is expressed in the resolution I have the honour to place in your hands now, that the method pursued in this country in divorce proceedings should be changed, and that the proceedings should take place before a judicial tribunal and not before a legislative body. The member of this House, the member of the Senate, on such a case acts in the capacity of a judge, and I have never felt in my thirty years' experience in the Canadian House of Commons that the question of divorce was treated with that degree of solemnity that it is entitled to. There has generally been manifested a spirit of levity, and often indeed influences have been brought to bear in securing a result which had little or nothing to do with the merits of the case. A member of this House in nine cases out of ten, if he has any opinion upon the matter at all, founded upon investigation, takes for granted the evidence that is received in another body, takes for granted the evidence in securing which he had no participation. He knows nothing of the character of the witnesses, he knows nothing of the circumstances under which their evidence was given, he has had no opportunity to cross-question, which a judge necessarily must have in forming an opinion as to a case ; still he takes the report presented to him by the other branch of this national legislature and is called upon to act on that report as a judge in a judicial capacity. In giving my vote upon a divorce case I have never felt that I was acting in a way in which I was entitled to act. I have always felt that so far as my vote was concerned, I was taking action in the dark without a proper knowledge as to whether my action was justified or not. Now, I have always felt a desire to avoid this responsibility. I have always felt that a divorce was a judicial proceeding, that if a divorce was to be granted at all, the question of granting it was a matter of law and evidence, and was a proper subject for investigation and for action by a judicial tribunal.

There is another element in this question so far as this House is concerned which may sometimes, and perhaps has often prevented the consummation of proceedings that had been initiated and passed in the other House, and that is the fact that a large element in this House is opposed to divorce and do not believe in it under any circumstances whatever ; who are opposed to divorce per se, and who, as a matter of principle, will vote against any decree whatever. Now, if the case were referred to a court, and if the judge upon the bench entertained opinions which debarred him from granting a decree that the law provided for under certain circumstances, of course there could be no justice in the proceedings of that court. The very object of the court might be nullified by the prejudices of the judge, who would allow these prejudices to rise superior to the law and evidence, and to govern his conduct in that matter despite the law and the evidence. That is necessarily the case in this House, because there are members here who religiously, and conscientiously, believe that divorce should never be granted. It may perhaps be a question whether it should be granted, and if I believed that there was no warrant for granting a divorce, I should never introduce a resolution of this kind, I should never propose the establishment of a divorce court.

But I believe there is Divine warrant for divorce under certain circumstances. I believe that divorce, as the resolution provides, should be confined within the narrowest limits, and that there is only one cause that will justify the granting of a decree of divorce, and that cause is laid down in Holy Writ, laid down by the Saviour in two passages in Matthew, where it is said that divorce, except for the cause of fornication, is not permitted and cannot be granted. But for that single offence, for the offence of infidelity, I think we may say that we have Divine warrant for granting a divorce. Well, if we assume that is the case, and we do assume it in our proceedings in this House, we do assume it in the laws in force in this Dominion—if, I say, that is the case, then the question arises, in what way that provision of the law should be carried into effect. In what way should this offence be provided for ? What should be the machinery provided ? Should that machinery be of a cumbersome, costly, unworkable character, liable to be set aside by prejudice, or counter influences, or political influence ? Should such be the kind of a court to deal with this question, or should we establish, as has been established in all other civilized countries except Canada, so far as I am aware, a judicial tribunal, a divorce court to deal with this question ?

As I stated a moment ago, a divorce decree under the law is a question of law and evidence. The proceedings are properly and strictly judicial, but the proper conduct of proceedings of this character is not attainable in the parliament of Canada. Strictly judicial proceedings, entirely free from all prejudice, entirely free from all influences that may sway the opinions of the members, or influence the decision of the case, such proceedings, I say, are not attainable in a legislative body such as this, or in any other similar body. You must have judges who will examine the case, hear the evidence, and be governed by the law in arriving at a decision, impartially governed by the law as it exists, which defines what their actions should be on the evidence that is taken, proving to them whether cause for divorce exists.

Now if divorce under the constitution is a legal right on the part of any person who is aggrieved, who is sinned against, when the offence has been committed under the law that makes it proper for him to apply for a decree of divorce, if, I say, that is a legal right, then the great mass of British subjects in Canada should be at liberty to avail themselves of that right under the law. The expense is now onerous, the inconveniences and difficulties that beset the applicant are very great. The times when this case can be tried are very infrequent, they must be tried when this parliament is in session. Witnesses, respondents, applicants all must come, perhaps from very long distances, and they must dance attendance here upon the Senate. These proceedings are surrounded by circumstances that are apt to deter people of fine feelings from attempting to come here at all. Great publicity attends these investigations and all the circumstances attendant upon a trial befor the Senate, of an application for a divorce are of a repellant character, are of a non-judicial character and are of a character so antiquated and so full of objections that it is time a change was established in reference to this matter. It would be better, I believe, Mr. Speaker, to abolish the privilege of divorce entirely, than to continue proceedings as they have been continued and are continued at the present time. It would be better to abolish them altogether or to have a properly constituted divorce court to take cognizance of cases of this kind. I assign briefly, for I shall not detain the House at any great length on this question, the reasons to be urged against the present procedure. The first of all is undue publicity, a degree of publicity that is not beneficial to public morals, a degree of publicity that is not dignified or desirable. I assign, in the second place as a reason for a change in the method of obtaining divorce, the great inconvenience inflicted upon the parties who appeal to this House for the remedy which ought to be placed within their reach in the easiest and most expeditious manner. I assign as another reason the prohibitive cost. As the law now stands the rich man may take his proceedings here and get his redress, but the poor man is absolutely barred out from making an appeal for what he deems to be and what the law says is an act of justice. Another reason I assign for a change in the procedure is the liability to a miscarriage of justice here as has been the case and as is liable to be the case. As we all know the result depends upon the condition of the House. Those who believe that divorces are permissible under certain circumstances may be in the majority at one time while the elements opposed to divorce under any circumstances may have a majority at another time and thus the case miscarries and the Bill is lost. Whatever may be the circumstances, whatever may be the evidence, whatever may be the reasons that exist for putting that Bill through if it so happens that there is a certain element in the House in the ascendancy for the time being the Bill will be lost. That element of uncertainty exists to such an extent that justice may often miscarry. Another reason I assign is that personal interest may and often does affect the result of the trial of these cases in the parliament of Canada. These are some of the reasons for providing for a change in the mode of procedure in reference to the granting of divorces.

The reasons that I would urge in favour of a divorce court are that the proceedings before such a court are strictly judicial; no other elements will enter into the case, no uncertainty, or doubt, or political influence being exerted by the element that is opposed to divorce under any circumstances whatever. The proceedings will be strictly judicial and the case will be decided upon the evidence and under the law. Another reason is that there will be an impartial administration of the law. Another reason is that it will minimize the cost and inconvenience, not that I would admit, Sir, that it is a desirable thing to promote divorce by rendering the thing easier, but the law assumes, when it puts upon the statute-book a cause for divorce, that it is a proper thing to apply for divorce under the provisions of the law. It assumes that where a party is sinned against to the extent that he is entitled to apply for a legal remedy he should have his remedy. If the law contemplates that the aggrieved party should have a remedy, then it is the height of injustice to make the securing of that remedy, so difficult, so inconvenient, and so excessive in cost as to neutralize the effect of the law. And so, we have under this proposed arrangement of a divorce court the minimum of cost, the minimum of inconvenience, and an administration of the law that is speedy, impartial and to a certain degree inexpensive. In addition to this we would avoid indefensible delays. Here we have a parliament meeting once a year. Perhaps an attempt may be made to institute divorce proceedings and the case will go over for another year. The delays are intolerable, the expenses prohibitive, while with a divorce court these cases could be tried promptly, tried according to the usages of law and order, and tried and decided in accordance with the evidence. Now, if divorces are to be given at all, there should be some degree of solemnity, some degree of attention to appearances in the proceedings and in the granting of divorce. Do we have that here? Are there not often scenes of levity, are there not often undignified and uncommendable features in parliament in connection with these proceedings, features that would be disgraceful to a law court if it was called upon to give a decision upon a case of such momentous consequence as that of divorce. We would invest the trial, in case we establish a divorce court and the deliverance of that court, with not only the supposition that there was justice done, but with the unquestionable fact that the decision would be in accordance with justice. We would invest these proceedings with dignity, we would have them conducted impartially in conformity with the law and with the evidence of the case and we would remove a stain from our judicial proceedings that now exists through the operation of our divorce laws the granting of divorce by this House of Commons. It is surprising, Sir, that thirty-five years, after confederation, this crude, objectionable, expensive, cumbersome, ineffectual system should be allowed to continue. It is time that this state of things was brought to an end. It is time that we had conformity in this respect to the usages of other enlightened states. It is time that we had a court established charged with the duty of dealing with these cases in accordance with the provisions of law and in accordance with the testimony placed before that court under which its decisions would be given and which would be of a character that would command public respect, that would do justice and meet the requirements of the case.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). The only divorce court we have in this country is the Senate, and it seems to me that there ought to be some other court. I am not one of those who would like to see divorce granted as in other places for trifling causes such as incompatibility of temper, but I do not think that the Senate of Canada is the proper place to try these cases. It is deplorable that they should publish the proceedings relating to divorces in the Senate and send the evidence to every member of this House. The most frightful trash I ever read in my life has been put in my hands since I have been a member of parliament. The page boys get hold of this, and all classes of people get hold of it in this city, and I am strongly opposed to this evidence being sent from the Senate and distributed all over the country. It is contaminating—I was going to use a stronger word. I think that the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) has done well in bringing this matter before the House, and if no action is taken on the divorce question itself, I hope something will be done to prevent that filthy evidence being printed by the Senate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) brought a similar motion to the attention of the House on a former occasion.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to say that I have never brought in a motion of this kind before. I spoke on the second reading of a divorce Bill, to protest against the existing system, but I have not before brought a motion.

An hon. MEMBER. It was Mr. Britton's Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes; my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) expressed the same opinion on that occasion as he did to-day. The House at that time did not endorse his views, and so far as I know, nothing has occurred since to induce the House to change the attitude it took on that occasion. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) told us that Canada is the only civilized country which has not a divorce court. To a large extent that assertion is perfectly true, but I do not think it is a blot upon the fair name of Canada, that for the thirty-five years since confederation, no pressing want has been found for a divorce court. For my part I think it is always a grave matter to change, even by way of improvement, the institutions of a country. If the people are satisfied with their institutions it is far better to leave them as they are even though in the eyes of some they may be deficient.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no doubt that among many people in this country there is a disposition to believe that Canada, like some other countries, should have a divorce court. This opinion, however, is far from being unanimous, and so far as public opinion has the right to speak and can speak in this matter, none of those evidences by which public opinion does reach parliament have come to us upon the floor of this House. There have been no petitions inviting Canada to establish such a court; there have been no resolutions passed anywhere in the country, except on some occasions by religious bodies of certain denominations who hold strong views upon the subject. But these resolutions are far from being general and far from representing the whole country. Therefore, so long as more is not heard from the public opinion of the country, so long as no general demand is made in favour of such a court, I think Canada ought to be satisfied to leave things as they are at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is no discredit to Canada; on the contrary it is to the credit of Canada that there are so few demands for divorce. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia there are divorce courts which have existed prior to confederation, and so far as I am aware, the applications for divorce are so few and far between, that the judges of these courts have much of a sinecure. In the remaining provinces divorce must be sought by a private Bill originating in the Senate, and even in that case, I am glad to say, there has been no increase in the number of applications from year to year. The records from confederation to the present day show that the number of applications for divorce has not increased, although the country, I am glad to say, has increased in population and in many other ways. It is a testimony to the good morals of Canada that we are so free from the causes which generally lead to divorce. Public opinion as a rule has not expressed itself in favour of such a reform in our system, if reform it can be called, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) ought to be satisfied to let well enough alone. If the time comes—which I would deplore sincerely, and which I believe will never come—when public opinion will move in this matter, and the morals of this country instead of improving would degrade to an extent so as to make the number of applications for divorce more numerous than they are now; then my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), holding the views which he does, might be justified in coming before parliament. I speak with some diffidence on this question, because I belong to a persuasion which does not permit of divorce; but putting aside that feature of the case altogether, and appealing to those whose views are different upon the question ; appealing to those who believe that under certain circumstances divorce ought to be allowed, it seems to me that the argument is overwhelming that there is no necessity for the establishment of such a court, and I hope that will be the view taken by this House.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. WM. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Mr. Speaker, evidently the spirit of reform is dead in this House. The representatives from Ontario used to pride themselves on being great reformers, and yet, on a question of so much importance as this they appear to be indifferent, and to be willing to leave on the records of this Dominion such a crude, I was going to say savage, way of dealing with a subject of this kind as we have at present. Why the savages do better in this manner than we do. They confine their divorces to the same cause as our Saviour did, and when they find any unfaithfulness on the part of one side or the other, particularly if the squaw is unfaithful, the Indian takes her to the camp where her people reside, and there the divorce is completed. I think there is some decency in that, compared with the way in which we deal with the matter. Let us look at it. A man may come here from the farthest part of New Ontario. He has to pay $200 ; he has to pay all the expenses of his witnesses ; he goes before a Committee of the Senate, composed of men who perhaps have no experience or training in legal matters, they take the evidence, and that evidence is submitted to both Houses. I need not say anything about the nature of the evidence itself. It is often so filthy that the pigs would not sleep on it if it were placed before them as a bed. The charwomen who go to clean the Senate in the morning will get piles and piles of printed paper ; they take it home, they scatter it among their families, and it is read there to their moral injury. Why should not the Dominion of Canada copy the reform that has been in existence in New Brunswick, in British Columbia, and in Nova Scotia, on this matter ? In Nova Scotia the case is tried before a judge of the Supreme Court, and not a trace of the evidence is copied or goes into any of the papers. The only statement is that such and such a case has been tried before Judge Graham, and he has granted or refused the divorce, as the case may be. That is all that the world knows of the proceedings in the case. When the maritime provinces came to be united with the Dominion, we forced certain reforms on the people of Canada. At that time dual representation existed in Ontario and Quebec, but by the good example which we brought to this House, that system was abolished. Then you had elections on different dates, and the strongest seats, those most likely to return men favourable to the government of the day, were contested first. We abolished that system, and induced the Dominion of Canada to accept a simultaneous polling day, which was in force in the maritime provinces. Now, I think the Dominion should go a step further and copy our method of dealing with divorces, which is the only rational one, and which does justice to the poor as well as the rich. The law as you have it now is only for rich people, and does the grossest injustice to the poor, who cannot afford to avail themselves of it. In the maritime provinces we have no distinction of that kind, and I am happy to say that I believe the number of divorces which take place in those provinces is as limited as the number in the Dominion. We can speak with pride of the high moral character of our people in that respect, although the law as it exists makes it easy for them to obtain divorces. Now, I think that a sense of justice should lead this House to see that equal justice is done to the poor as to the rich. If that were done, there are people now in the Dominion of Canada who would avail themselves of the law ; but, being poor, they cannot avail themselves of it as it exists. I am not going to say much more on this subject, but I think it is time that people who claim to be reformers should take this subject up and abolish the present system, which is crude and is certainly not found in any other civilized country in the world. The premier said there were no petitions for this change. I do not remember that there were any petitions for these other reforms which I have mentioned. I do not know that there was a single petition for the abolition of dual representation or for simultaneous polling when these measures were adopted. I do not think that is any reason at all. If my hon. friends the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) were free to speak their minds, they would speak boldly and logically and effectively on this question. They do not want to offend their master who presides over them, but they know very well that the law that exists at present in Canada is one we would never think of adopting in the enlightened maritime provinces. I do not expect that anything I say on this subject will have the least influence on this House ; but I think the country will in time see the necessity of making such a change in the method of dealing with this matter as will bring about something like equal justice for the poor as well as the rich in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the motion proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is one involving much more important considerations than have at times been attached to it in this House. In all civilized countries, I believe, the law of divorce is recognized. In respect to this divorce law Canada is unique among the civilized countries of the world. There is no judicial law of divorce in this country. There are divorce courts in several of the provinces, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has so well explained. The proposition, therefore, is a broad one, and in my opinion ought not to be dismissed from serious consideration because of the fact that heretofore the hon. gentlemen who have brought it before the House have not succeeded in interesting the House in it sufficiently to make any progress with it. The hon. gentleman who last brought this subject up in the House is now a distinguished judge. I refer to Mr. Justice Britton, who when he represented Kingston in this House, brought this matter before and excited a more exhaustive discussion than my hon. friend's motion has brought forth. The result, however, was nil, and certainly in view of the position which the right hon. the Prime Minister has taken, the present motion is not likely to be any more successful. But I go with the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House (Hon. Mr. Ross). I think with him that even if the leader of the government takes, on a matter of this kind a contrary view to that entertained by many other members of this House, that is no reason why those who are in favour of the motion should not be at perfect liberty to support it without impairing their political allegiance in any way. I am a strong Conservative, generally classed as a Tory, and I believe that although party government is the best for the well being of the country, still, unless there is a question of government involved, we should, on each side of the House, be free lances and freely express and assert ourselves on all questions beyond the pale of party discipline. This will stamp our legislation as being of a higher standard, and show the people that we are not mere automata to be freely moved at the will of the leaders on either side. The question before the House is a very broad one, to be considered from all points of view, and I must say that from what I have heard of divorce, and in view of the fact that all free civilized countries acknowledge that under certain circumstances divorce is justifiable, I am in favour of the motion before the House. I do not of course expect every one to entertain the same view, but one of the great lessons taught by free institutions, especially in a country governed by British institutions, is that we can differ in our religious faith and recognize that the views of those who differ from us are entitled to every respect, and that while we may differ in opinions, we agree that the majority must prevail and we can be very good natured and sensible over it. I am one of those who believe that divorce is a necessity, but at the same time I have been brought up in the old school which teaches that we ought to have as little of it as possible. One of the strong objections to any change in our divorce laws is the fear entertained by the ordinary domestic people of the country that any change may lead us to fall into the other extreme of the too great freedom of divorce which prevails in the great republic to the south of us. I think myself that that feeling is merely a prejudice, but the strongest argument that could be presented against any change is that which was made by the right hon. the Prime Minister. He claimed that there was no great call for it. I agree, however with the hon. member who has just taken his seat that the fact that there are no petitions calling for this change is not a good reason for not granting it. I am not so much of a believer in petitions as I was in my younger days, because my experience has taught me that many of those petitions are the result of the agitation of some individuals, who want to make us believe that there is a great cry in the country, when in reality there is not. I am of the opinion—and I think most hon. members will agree with me—that according to the capacity which God or nature has given us we are responsible for our actions and judgments, and I am not disposed to give any heed to petitions except when there is something in them which appeals to my judgment or when they spring from something which I believe calls for action on my part. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister well founded in his statement that there is no desire in this country for a change in our divorce law ? I think he is only right to the extent of the dread to which I refer on the part of many people that a change would bring about too much freedom of divorce, but I submit that this parliament of Canada ought to be responsible to the public for a definition of the causes or reasons for which divorce should be granted, and I understand that my hon. friend's resolution is based upon that principle. This House ought to define these causes and be careful not to make them too extensive. I am one of those who believe that the trying of divorce cases should be relegated to a judicial tribunal. A judicial tribunal could better take the evidence and in every way be more desirable and more competent than any committee of this parliament, and that is a strong answer to the plea of the right hon. the First Minister that there is no call for any change. If we can devise a simpler, a better and cheaper tribunal than the one we now have, both Reformers and Conservatives must agree that it would be wise for us to do so. This question has been brought before the House within my memory several times. Long before I had the honour of being in parliament, it was introduced. It has been stated that the principal reason against the establishment of a divorce court is a religious one. Well, there is no one who respects the religious convictions of others more than I do. I have proved this in times past; when it was not in my interest politically to do so, and I am prepared to show the same spirit in the future. The religious views of every one ought to be respected, but when we come to a question of this sort, we come to a question of moral suasion, and until we learn to stand up face to face and consider it in all its phases, we will not be apt to come to any satisfactory conclusion.

And I am sure that every hon. gentleman within the sound of my voice and every Catholic that knows me or has ever heard me speak, will do me the justice to say that I am as ready to concede to them full freedom of opinion as I am to claim it from others, ready to be convinced by them, and to change my views or prejudice or whatever you call them. My claim is that, assuming that we are to have divorce, a judicial tribunal can best deal with the evidence in divorce cases. The proceedings before those tribunals will not involve the danger of injuring public morals that may attach to our present system. As my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) has said, the evidence will be confined to a court and not be spread throughout the country by having printed copies of the evidence sent out, very much of it of a nature that we would not desire to see in the bosoms of our families. Therefore, on moral grounds it would be better to make this change. On legal grounds, there can be no question. The evidence upon questions involving the marriage tie should be taken in a court of law, for there is only one thing more solemn than the marriage tie, and that is the belief in a personal God and a future life. If these divorce cases are to go before any tribunal, they should be sent to the best and soundest tribunal. Beyond all peradventure, my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) is right, and we should thank him for bringing this matter before us. The consideration of these grave matters relating to the very foundations of our social life must have the effect of improving, elevating and strengthening our people. We must decide these questions according to the principles of British freedom, for, under that flag, which now, I believe, is being recognized more than ever as holding the freedom of the world with other enlightened nations, there is no man, be he heathen or Christian but is assured of freedom such as no other but British institutions can secure for him. If it is necessary, as I believe it is, and as the practice of all civilized nations seems to sanction, that society should authorize the severance of the marriage relation, the bond should be unloosed only upon conditions which this parliament lays down. We should restrict as closely as possible the grounds upon which the divorce shall be allowed. But, having provided for this, we should relegate the rest to the courts of our land, which I believe are, and which history, I am glad to say, proclaims to be, in this as in other British countries, the best fitted to pronounce a verdict in such matters.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). I am a little surprised to find that the House, apparently, takes no great interest in this very important question. The reason may possibly be found in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Ross) that a number of hon. gentlemen in the House—amongst them, if I understand him, the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick)—were not free to take the stand that they would like to take in this matter. In our deliberations last session, we learned from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) who moved this resolution a good deal as to the inner workings of the Reform party, or Liberal party, as they are usually called, and from the hon. member from Victoria we are again learning to-night something more as to the tendencies of that party. The hon. gentleman tells us that Ontario, at one time, prided itself upon its reform principles. If the hon. gentleman is referring to the members who form a majority of the representation from Ontario in this House, I do not know that he has any reason to attack them upon this question, because, I am not aware that, as yet, any of them have declared themselves hostile to the resolution. But we can well understand such remarks from an hon. member who has had long experience of Liberal practices, who can look back to the day when the position of the party upon many questions was not what it is to-day, who can look back to the stand taken in this House by the Liberal opposition and to the stand taken in Ontario years ago, and contrast it with the unfortunate position occupied, for instance, by the Liberal party in Ontario to-day.

Now, as to what the hon. gentleman has suggested as to the desirability of secrecy of proceedings in these cases, we need not go into a careful discussion of that matter now, because, if it is determined by the House that it is desirable to change the mode of procedure in obtaining a divorce in the Dominion of Canada, the details of the measure and the procedure to be fixed can be dealt with later on. I am not sure, however, that we should do wisely to revert to the old system of jurisprudence with its secret proceedings, as secrecy was then understood. There may be many things to be said in favour of the position advanced by the hon. member for Victoria as regards not transmitting the records of these proceedings in all their noisome details to the public through the newspapers. But, on the other hand, I do not understand that in Nova Scotia they have an absolutely secret tribunal such as obtained in days gone by. As to the question of lessening of costs, that, too, is a debateable subject. In the course of my practice as a lawyer, I have known many instances of parties who contemplated divorce, and were about to seek redress by applying to this parliament, but were deterred by the consideration of expense. These parties would have separated and made their families homeless, but were prevented by the expense involved from making application for divorce. And in the end it was found that they lived happily together. On the question of expense, a good deal can be said on both sides. It is no doubt a hardship that a poor man or a poor woman who has just cause for seeking a divorce—and the cases are very limited where there is just cause—should be debarred from a remedy by reason of the expense. It will be found unwise, I am sure, and unfortunate if we make the means of obtaining divorce any easier than they are now, except in the matter of expense alone.

I did not hear the right hon. leader of the government speak on this question, but I gathered from the remarks of the member for Victoria that the leader of the government said that this motion should not be adopted at the present time because there had been no petitions in favour of it. Why, is that a sufficient answer to this proposition, or to any other? So far, experience seems to show that in this House, at present, the greater the number of petitions against a grievance, the less chance there is of getting redress. Not only during this session of parliament, but during preceding sessions, we have had petitions pouring in in favour of certain measures and nothing has come of them. Take for instance the cattle-guard question. If we are to judge of the effectiveness of petitions by the history of that question in this House, we would rather come to the conclusion that the fewer the petitions the greater the probability of obtaining redress.

Now I come to the resolution itself. The hon. gentleman who moved it says:

> That this House is of the opinion that the laws of Canada should clearly and within narrow limits define the causes for which divorces may be granted.

Upon that point I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman. I believe it would be greatly in the interest of Canada to define exactly what causes may justify the granting of a divorce. I entirely agree that we should define within narrow limits those causes. Speaking for myself, I must say that I am entirely opposed to the principle of divorce except in the most extreme cases. Every effort should be made, both by legislation and by educating public sentiment to minimize as much as possible the number of cases in which a divorce may be obtainable in this country. It would be very unfortunate if we opened the door for divorces as widely as it is open in the neighbouring republic, where so great facilities exist for obtaining divorces, and where so great a number are granted in consequence. The hon. gentleman then says:

> But that the present system of granting divorces by legislative enactment is unduly expensive, and often capricious and unreliable.

A word later on about the question of expense, but I agree that the present means for obtaining divorces are to a large extent capricious and unreliable. He says further:

> That if cause for divorce may exist, the means for obtaining a decree should be rendered less expensive than at present.

I submit that the means can be rendered less expensive without going to the opposite extreme of facilitating the obtaining of divorces. I hope parliament will take this matter up, not in the sense of encouraging divorces—and I think that is what makes some hon. gentlemen afraid to speak upon this question—but recognizing the fact that in some isolated cases parties must have divorce. Recognizing this fact, I submit the resolution is probably on the right lines when it asks parliament to declare that proceedings for obtaining divorces should be less expensive than at present, in order that the poor man may have the same facilities for obtaining redress as the rich man. Then he says:

> And that as the justification of divorce by virtue of law, defining adequate cause, can only be established by investigation and evidence, the proceedings upon which such decree may be obtained are judicial in their character; and that consequently divorce proceedings should be taken before, and decree of divorce emanate from a properly constituted divorce court.

Now whatever opinion may be held on the abstract question of divorce, there can be no difference of opinion as to where the investigation can most properly be had. It should surely take place in a court of justice, where the machinery and procedure are adapted for eliciting evidence, where the court is in the habit of restraining every expression of levity, and where the utmost decorum is always observed. There can be little doubt I think that the investigation can better take place in a properly constituted divorce court than elsewhere. I am not quite certain that I understand the meaning of the mover of this resolution. If he intends that we should have a separate divorce court, distinct from the existing courts of the Dominion, I would not be prepared to agree with him; but if his meaning is, as I apprehend it is, that some court at present constituted should have these functions added to it, or that some of the judges of the Supreme Court or of a Superior Court should constitute this court, then we would avoid the additional expense which would be incurred by constituting a new court. In this view of the matter I would be in favour of the resolution. I am rather happy at the fact that for the first time in my very short parliamentary experience I have been, to a large extent, with the distinguished gentleman who has moved this resolution. I had no very great desire to speak upon it because I did not feel that I could add anything to what hon. members of the House know and understand more thoroughly than I do. I felt that I could say nothing but what could be very much better said by many hon. members of this House of greater experience and ability, but I venture to say, that when an important question like this comes up it is just as well that we should have an opinion upon it one way or the other.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I suppose we must acknowledge that in this case, as in several others, we owe a considerable debt of gratitude to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who is not afraid to face the indifference, or the quiet and sometimes effective inertia of the public and who has on several occasions, and in connection with a good many different subjects which are of great importance, found himself capable of taking hold of a case long before it has received popular support. It is gratifying to find that while there is not very much evidence of great interest there is a great deal of gravity and decorum about the debate so far as it has proceeded. There is no disposition to treat the subject with levity or to improve the opportunities which it affords for jocosity, but, evidently the House is disposed to regard the matter as of a somewhat serious character and of very great importance. It cannot be forgotten, in dealing with this matter, that the subject of divorce is inevitably associated with our civilized life. From the beginning of time almost, at least, from a very early date, in fact since marriage was established as an ordinance, occasional interruptions to married life have arisen from various causes. In Canada the proposition of the hon. member for North Norfolk would not materially change the position of affairs. In the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, divorce courts are established and have been established since before confederation. These give relief from time to time to those parties who find the conjugal bond one of intolerable weight and one which must impose conditions to which they can no longer comfortably submit. Divorce is a subject that must be dealt with and although the effect of the sentiment in the province of Quebec has so far and probably will perhaps for ever prevent the institution of such a court in that province, still, we find that in the absence of provisions by which married persons can secure the relief which the divorce action affords they do, in the cases of the several provinces, where divorce courts do not exist, overcome that difficulty by appealing to the law of our country which enables them by legislative enactment to procure the relief which the courts of their provinces cannot afford. The presumption is that the number of divorces granted would not be materially increased if the present system were done away with and if we substituted a more easy, economical and what would be of the utmost importance, a procedure which would involve much less publicity. Reference has been made to the character of the proceedings before the Senate and of the circulation of the evidence disclosing the relations between the married persons to the action and other corespondents. Literature of this character would not be tolerated at all if circulated in our country in the ordinary way. The courts and legislatures of the country would forbid the circulation of such material as this through the mails, of such material as under our system is put out in large quantities and which finds its way by one course or another into the hands of persons who should not have access to it. It is most unsatisfactory that such must be the case and I feel some sympathy with the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) who really seemed to look upon it as a grave infraction of his rights that he was compelled to receive, at the hands of the Senate, communications of such a very improper character. Still, I suppose it is an infliction to which we must all be prepared to submit unless we should determine to rid ourselves of that infliction by giving our moral, our personal and our active support to the cause which the hon. member for North Norfolk has espoused. It would be utterly wrong and intolerable that we, here, as a branch of the legislature of Canada, should give our contributory action to the effecting of a divorce without acquainting ourselves with the circumstances, the grounds and the evidence upon which the petitioner relied in each case of divorce. I do not know that all the members read the evidence in every case, but, certainly, in every case it is the duty of every hon. member, representing a constituency and forming part of the legislating body of Canada, to give effect to the legislation which secures a divorce, to satisfy himself that the evidence is sufficient to warrant him in voting so as to give legal effect to the Bill which has its origin in the other Chamber adjacent to this. Now, that the subject is of considerable importance a review of the statistical record of our country in connection with it will show. Taking the figures as they appear in the last volume of the Year-book up to June, 1901, we find that in the provinces of Canada which have no divorce courts, parliament has granted divorces numbering seventy-one. Seventy-one divorces have been granted by the parliament of Canada in the course of thirty-four years, not a very large number, it is true. In the province of Nova Scotia, in these thirty-four years, 102 divorces were granted by the courts. In the province of New Brunswick seventy-three divorces were granted and in British Columbia fifty-four divorces were granted in that time. In the case of Prince Edward Island there is evidently a state of conjugal felicity which can scarcely be paralleled in any other portion of His Majesty's dominions. In that little island, the garden of the gulf, the most highly civilized, prosperous and happy under the flag of His Majesty in North America, not one single divorce has been granted in these thirty-four years. Evidently, in the province of Prince Edward Island there is an understanding of the advantages, the benefits and blessings of union that the other provinces fail to realize to the same extent as they do in that happy country. The result is that in Canada 300 divorces have been granted in thirty-four years, or almost an average of nine divorces per annum. We are told that if there were greater facilities for divorce there might be more divorces granted, and therefore, it might be argued by some that by furnishing divorce courts in the several provinces and by doing away with the present tedious, cumbersome, expensive and odious system of coming before the Senate of Canada and substituting a more convenient, more cheap and less public process of hearing applications before a judge of the Supreme Court of a province, divorces might be multiplied in number. We have no evidence of this to show this would be the case, and I do not know that any strong presumption exists that it would be. One thing that is established as a fact is, that in Canada for the last thirty-four years, three hundred divorces have been granted—six hundred married persons have secured release from the marital tie, and that is sufficient to show that there is a want of civilization and of social life as organized, which cannot be winked out of sight. Marriages are necessary to our civilization, and everything that tends to heighten and elevate and improve the condition of woman amongst us, is something that ought to receive our most anxious support. And concurrent with the institution of marriage; apparently inevitably associated with it, must be some reasonable provision by which in certain cases one party or the other who is bound by the marriage bond may secure a release when its conditions become intolerable or too irksome for them to bear. I find on further reference to the Canadian Year-book, that according to the census of 1901 there were in Canada 661 divorced persons—339 men and 322 women. That is almost exactly the number that would be supplied by our divorce courts since 1867, the year of confederation, were all the parties to these divorces still living. But manifestly a comparatively large percentage of the divorced persons who are presently living in Canada must have procured divorces elsewhere. It is utterly impossible that the 600 persons who have been divorced in Canada since 1867 could now be alive. The great probability is that at least one-third of these persons are dead. As a product of our own divorce courts and of divorce proceedings taken in the parliament of Canada, there are possibly 300 divorcees in this country, and the other 361 who are in Canada at present must have procured divorces somewhere else, or must have been divorced before they came to Canada. It is quite well known that in certain cases, in all the provinces of Canada, persons who are determined to procure divorce do go to the states of the neighbouring union and seek separation from their married partners in the courts of that country. The result is unsatisfactory, because those persons who being Canadians go to the United States and there secure a divorce, are only divorced so far as they continue residents of the United States, and they cannot return to Canada, and they cannot resume the marriage tie with another person, without practically bringing themselves within the operation of the law against bigamy, or making themselves liable to action for adulterous living. If, as I think we must grant; if there be an absolute certainty that to a certain extent—not at all to encourage, but on the other hand to be repressed and to be controlled by making the conditions onerous and the reasons for granting divorces of the most grave and serious character, limiting it so that there would be no flying with flippant ease to this court for relief; to make the conditions so that it would be only under circumstances absolutely in the eyes and known to the neighbours and fellow-citizens of the parties concerned justifying the divorce that such a thing could be obtained—with these conditions it seems to me that it is the duty of the people of Canada not to lose sight of this question, but to consider whether or not there be not a number of fellow-citizens in our country who are entitled to receive at our hands a strictly limited opportunity to secure release from the marriage tie when circumstances render it impossible for them longer to bear it with comfort. It is very evident that this is a question which will not have many advocates in parliament. It is not a matter in respect to which any person who is personally interested could easily make himself or herself heard. It would be only on a personal appeal, and that of a very strong character, that any member of parliament could be induced to advocate such a matter. Therefore, it is all the more important that this being a question which to the most of us is absolutely impersonal, that we should not on that account lose sight of its importance, but should rather devote ourselves to a fair and earnest consideration of it, the more so on account of the fact that it is a thing that can scarcely count on very hearty support on the part of any of the representatives of the people in this parliament. There must be to a very great extent, a large feeling of indifference in the minds of most of us here, and yet a little reflection will show that in this matter we are dealing with one of the institutions of our civilization which is inseparable from it, and one which ought to be most carefully controlled. An avenue ought be opened up through which escape may be had from the conditions of married life when they become intolerable, and at the same time every condition of secrecy, every condition of solemnity, every condition that would prevent anything like shock to the sensitiveness of the public on matters which ought to be concealed from them, ought to be attached to the process by which divorce may be procured in our country. That I believe unquestionably, to any one who gives the matter consideration, will be found to be, by applying to this parliament, not for a Bill of relief, but rather by some quiet and orderly resort to the judges of the land in whose hands we may safely leave the administration of this matter. The statistics of the provinces go to show, that where divorce courts are in operation, they have not been largely availed of. In Nova Scotia the average will be about three cases in a year, and it is quite possible that several of these cases are not of native Nova Scotians, because it is naturally to be expected that in provinces in which no divorce courts are existent, persons who desire to procure divorce may migrate there for the time-being. It seems to me quite probable, that either in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia it may turn out to be the case, that many of the actions for divorce that have been commenced and concluded there, have been set up by those who really were not citizens of the province. That being the case, it is very evident that the number of divorce actions is not encouraged by the fact that courts in which such actions may be taken have been set up in the province, but that this is a remedy which the parliament of Canada may to a certain extent permit without any fear that it is all going to weaken the strength of the marriage bond among the citizens of our country.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). My own views on this question are naturally influenced by the experience of my own province, which has been referred to by my hon. friend from Victoria, N.S. (Mr. Ross), and if it were necessary to come to a decision I would express the hope that the other provinces might adopt the method which is employed in Nova Scotia, with, as I think, success. I think, however, that I am correct in stating from the tendency of the discussion here to-day, that there is no great zeal on the part of members generally to deal with this question. The right hon. Prime Minister suggested, just before six o'clock, that perhaps the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had served his purpose for the time being by a discussion of the question, and might withdraw his motion. If he is disposed to do that, my own judgment is that that would be the course most satisfactory to the House. I merely make the suggestion to the hon. gentleman, but I am quite prepared to vote if the division takes place.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, of course I did not introduce this motion for the mere purpose of taking the time of the House or leading to an inconsequential result. Still, the discussion of the motion has probably accomplished all that can be reasonably expected at the present time. It is very true, as the right hon. Prime Minister says, that the House at large does not appear to take a deep and active interest in this question. It is a matter which, I presume, will require a good deal of discussion in the country before legislative action can be secured upon it, and one which we ought to approach with due deliberation and some degree of caution. While my own wish, of course, would be to have this motion go to a vote, and have an expression of this House favourable to it, yet I am in the judgment of the House, and if it is the opinion of the House that it would be better under the circumstances to accede to the desire expressed by the leader of the government, as a matter of etiquette, I would feel disposed to do so. If I have the concurrence of the seconder of the motion, and if no objection is made by any member of the House, I am quite willing that the motion, having been discussed in so agreeable, proper and instructive a manner, should be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) As the seconder of the motion, I think the end we have in view has been served to a large extent. We have listened with a good deal of pleasure to the very excellent speeches which have been made by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Those speeches will go to the country, and in this observing age the country will by and by begin to see the necessity of adopting a different method of divorce from that which exists at present in the Dominion of Canada. I know what the law is in Nova Scotia, and I know that there is no publicity given to the evidence. The only thing stated is that the case has been tried and the judgment has been given. When the excellent speeches which have been made on the other side are sent to the country, they will perhaps effect the first change in public opinion on this subject. This is perhaps a small beginning to a great reform, but all reforms in the past commenced with small beginnings, and we must not despise the day of small things, because great things will be the result at some future day.

Motion withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT OFFICE BUILDINGS.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey) moved for :

Return showing the number of buildings, or portions of buildings, rented or occupied by the government for offices or other purposes, in Ottawa, outside the departmental buildings; from whom rented, terms of lease or leases, and rent being paid for each.

He said: My object in making this motion is to ascertain the number of buildings or other apartments rented by the government and used for government purposes, from whom they are rented, the rent that is paid, and the terms of the leases. I do so because of the rumours that have been current for some time, that the government have rented many buildings or portions of buildings which are not suitable for the public requirements, that they are rented from political friends, and that exorbitant rents are being paid. I am told that there is no provision in most of these buildings for protecting valuable papers and other goods belonging to the government, from the danger of fire. I do not know how far these rumours are correct, and I make this motion so that we may get the correct information. If it is true, that we are paying very heavy rents for these buildings, and that it has cost considerable to fit them up for the needs of the government, it seems to me that it would be much better and wiser for the government to buy land and erect buildings suitable for the needs of the country. They could be made fireproof, and we would save a very heavy outlay in rents. After I get this information, if I am correctly informed, I may follow it with another motion later on. Now, I have heard it said by supporters of the government that we cannot get land in Ottawa on which to erect public buildings. Well, the longer it is put off the more difficult it will be to acquire land. It is true, the government might be obliged to pay a pretty good figure for suitable land; but I imagine that they would pay a smaller figure now than they would be likely to do fifteen or twenty years hence. I have often thought that the time will come when it will be almost compulsory on the government, in order to provide office room, to purchase the piece of land from the Langevin block to O'Connor street, and fill it with one large block. It would certainly greatly enhance the appearance of the government grounds, and the buildings surrounding them. There are other places where buildings might be erected, such as Nepean Point and a portion of Major Hill Park. It is for the purpose of drawing attention to this matter and of putting ourselves in the position to be able to determine whether it would be the part of wisdom or otherwise for the government to purchase grounds on which to erect new buildings or whether it would be better that they should continue the present system of renting buildings from outside parties, that I make this motion.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Hon. James Sutherland). I should be very pleased indeed to bring down the return called for by this motion. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) that it is in the public interest that this House should be possessed of all the information obtainable on the subject. My hon. friend has referred to the splendid site obtainable on Wellington street, and I agree with him that it would be a great improvement and add greatly to the appearance of the parliamentary grounds and buildings, that we should procure that site. But there are one or two rather serious objections raised. One is the heavy expenditure we would have to incur, owing to the valuable buildings that have been erected there within the past few years, and another and a more serious one is that unless we have the whole block from Wellington to Sparks street we would always be liable to injury from fire communicated from the other blocks and the safety of our valuable records and books would be endangered. There is also a serious objection to our taking Major's Hill Park. I doubt very much if the hon. members of this House would like to see that beautiful park covered with buildings. It is certainly a fine breathing spot for the citizens of Ottawa and visitors and members of the House. Parks are a great necessity in a growing city, besides being a great luxury to the people. However, the suggestion is well worthy of consideration. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right when he says that the time has arrived when this House must seriously consider the erection of departmental buildings so that public business may be carried on more conveniently than it is now. I have not the figures and therefore cannot make a fair estimate at present, but if it be the case, as the hon. gentleman says, that we are paying now in rents and other expenses more than the interest on capital and maintenance would cost us, if we purchased a site and erected new departmental buildings, we certainly should not hesitate doing so. I am not aware that either the previous or the present government has been guilty of paying excessive rents because buildings rented by the government happen to be owned by political friends. I think that the buildings required by some of the departments since this administration has taken office, have been rented from political opponents, and I have no doubt that the best bargain possible was made by the officials of the government. However, it is a very important and serious question, this question of the desirability of procuring property on which to put up better buildings than we now have, and I am satisfied that it is in the interests of the country that these buildings should be erected as soon as possible. This matter has in the short time that I have been in the department, received some attention from myself and my officials. During the past few weeks we have gone into it to a considerable extent in order to ascertain what properties were available and what the buildings would cost. I hope that even during this session we may be able to report some progress so that hon. members may be in a position to give us the benefit of their advice as to what, in their opinion, would be the best course to take. I shall have much pleasure in bringing down the papers at the very earliest possible moment.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 9.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

OTTAWA, Friday, March 27, 1903.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SUBSIDIES FOR PUBLIC HIGHWAYS.

Mr. SPEAKER. In regard to the petition of W. H. Rosevear, mayor of St. Lambert, and others of the counties of Verchères and Chambly, praying that special subsidies be granted for the improvement of public highways, I beg to state that this petition is against Rules 85 and 86. In the first place it is not properly signed, and in the second place, as the petition asks for subsidies, it cannot be received. The same decision will apply to the petitions of the Rev. L. J. S. Sirois, and of the Rev. A. Audette, because they are asking for subsidies. A petition asking for subsidies is out of order.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. LEIGHTON G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 48) to amend the General Inspection Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. McCARTHY. Last session I had the honour of introducing a similar Bill to this, and I explained it pretty fully at that time. It being late in the session, I explained that I would not press it to a finality that session, but that hon. members would have an opportunity of circulating it through their ridings and ascertaining whether public opinion was in favour of it. Since that time I have heard no complaints against the Bill. The explanation I gave last session is in Hansard. The Bill is for the purpose of obtaining a uniform inspection of hides, skins and leather in the cities mentioned in the Bill, to which only it is intended to apply. By that means the hides, it is expected, will be taken more carefully off the animals, and will thereby be increased in value.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMORAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved third reading of Bill (No. 12) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

Mr. J. E. E. LEONARD (Laval). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before this Bill is read a third time, I wish to move :

That, the said Bill be not now read a third time but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole with instructions to make the following amendments thereto :—

1. That the words 'or immoral' be added to the words 'or obscene amusements' in the fifth line of the first paragraph of Section 179a, as well as to the words 'obscene amusements' in the fourth line of the second paragraph ;

2. That the following paragraph be added :—

'5. Will be considered immoral, for the purposes of the present Act, all representations, plays or scenes, and all theatricals that may ridicule the marriage tie or laws or the misfortune of a deceived spouse, or that may present in a favourable light concubinage, adultery, adulterous love, or the life of the debauchee, or of the girl of public character, who is kept up, or that may picture, without censure, the life or the conduct of concubines, or of those who habitually live in a state of forbidden love, concubinage, or prostitution.'

If I understand aright the debate that took place in committee the other day, the reason why the hon. member for Pictou (Sir C. H. Tupper) objected to the Bill, was mainly on the ground that the meaning of the word 'immoral' was not clearly defined. With the amendment I am now moving and the definition which it embodies I think the hon. Minister of Justice (Hon. C. Fitzpatrick), who has so willingly complied with the demand of the Quebec authorities, will not object to accepting this amendment as it contains the definition of the word 'immoral.'

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. After having heard this definition read to the House, I need not say how very difficult it is to define such terms as immoral or impure. I think any attempt of that sort must fail, as this attempt fails. I would have preferred myself that the Bill had remained as it was introduced, with the words indecent or immoral continued. But I can quite appreciate the idea of those who suggested that the word obscene should take the place of those words, because in the Criminal Code, which the Bill seeks to amend, the word obscene occurs ; and it is good legislation to use the same term as much as possible in the same paragraph or section of a code.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

House went into Committee on the following resolutions :

1. That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and to provide that if the period of service includes a fraction of a year less than one-half, the service shall be taken to be the number of years served, not including the fraction. And if the period of service includes a fraction equal to or greater than one-half, the fraction shall be deemed to be an entire year.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to confirm all superannuation allowances heretofore granted, calculated in the foregoing manner.—(The Minister of Finance).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The resolutions before the Committee, on which a Bill is to be founded, are designed to remove a small difficulty which has been created by a recent ruling of the Auditor General, a ruling which is strictly in accordance with the law, but which nevertheless is at variance with the practice of the government and parliament for the long period of 32 years. The Superannuation Act passed in 1870 made provision for the retirement of officials upon pensions, which should be in proportion to the amount of their salaries and the length of their services. Immediately after the passing of that Act, an Order in Council was passed as a regulation, making provision respecting fractions of a year. By that Order in Council it was determined that where an official on his retirement had a few months service beyond the year to his credit, if it was less than six months, it should not count in his superannuation, but if it was more than six months, it should count as a full year. That continued to be the practice of the government from 1870 down to a very recent date. Two or three months ago the Auditor General objected to a superannuation which was based upon that rule, and although we have been following that practice for 32 years, he raised a question as to the validity of these proceedings. Upon an appeal to the Department of Justice, it was decided that as a strict matter of law the Order in Council passed 32 years ago was void, inasmuch as it was beyond the authority of the Act. Still, I think the House will agree with me that the practice established in 1870, of dealing with a fraction of a year in the way I have described, was fair and equitable, though perhaps a little liberal towards the official. The object of this Bill will be to confirm the superannuations of the past as respects those fractions of a year, and to provide that henceforth the same rule shall apply and be a legal proceeding—practically confirming the Order in Council of 1870.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, who is of course very familiar with the terms of the Act, whether or not there is any provision in it with regard to the repayment of amounts paid in on superannuation account by officers who have been dismissed from the service ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was no provision of that nature until the year 1897 or 1898, when I myself introduced a measure to amend the Superannuation Act by providing that where an officer was dismissed for political partisanship, he should not suffer the loss of the money he paid into the superannuation fund. As in such case, though he may have acted unwisely, there was no malfeasance or anything discreditable in a moral sense, I consider that he was punished enough by being deprived of his office and ought not to be further deprived of the money he had paid into the fund. Application has been made from time to time for a return of the superannuation money to parties dismissed for other causes, but although the Act is not restricted in its terms and we might be justified by the Act alone in returning the money, still as it was designed to apply only to cases of dismissal for political partisanship, we have not thought fit to interpret it as applying to other cases.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.). I have a case in point in which the inspector happened to see a collector of customs who did not appear to be attending to his duty at the time, and the inspector reported unfavourably, and the man was consequently dismissed. This dismissed official has since reformed and is now as steady and temperate a man as there is in the Dominion, which is saying a good deal. I have been trying to have justice done to this man by having the money returned to him which he paid into the superannuation fund but have not succeeded. I think that something should be added to this Bill which would enable the government to deal justly with a case of this kind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course it sometimes happens that a man is dismissed for what is alleged to be cause but really is not cause. Take a case in my own city, that of Capt. Stewart, who was dismissed ostensibly for cause but really for something else. No investigation was ever granted although Capt. Stewart was anxious to have one. In a case of that kind, an officer who has been long in the service receives back no portion of the money which he has paid to the superannuation fund. I am not so familiar perhaps with the practice of commercial institutions in this regard as some of the other hon. members, but I know that some institutions of this country which have created pension funds, repay to their employees, even when dismissed for cause, the amount contributed by them to the fund, and they do this because they think it is only fair and equitable. They do not think it fair to keep the money of these men even if they are dismissed for cause. I would like to know whether the hon. Minister of Finance has considered the question in this aspect?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Superannuation Act as respects these matters is precisely in the same condition as it has been for many years. There is no provision which would enable repayment to be made in a case such as my hon. friend has mentioned. The difficulty is if we once open the door, it will be impossible to draw any line. I have had cases brought to my attention, in which the wives represented that their husbands had been dismissed because of intemperance and other offences, and the dismissal of whom brought great hardship on their families. Such cases appeal forcibly to our sympathy, but once you begin to entertain claims of that kind it will be impossible to draw any line. We have been simply following the practice continued ever since the Act was passed some thirty years ago.

Mr. OSLER. As regards banks, no clerk is dismissed, no matter from what cause, without having the money returned to him which he paid into the pension fund, and I think that is only fair.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Under what is called the Civil Service Retirement Act, which has been passed in recent years, we return the money paid in. Under that Act the money contributed constituted a savings fund, and when an officer retires from the service he gets back his money with interest. This Act now takes the place of the old Superannuation Act as respects new officials.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why should there be any difficulty in dealing with cases such as those brought to the attention of the hon. minister. Of course there may be cases of malfeasance in which it would not be desirable to return the money, but I think that the practice followed in commercial institutions should be followed by the government. I think that the practice should be followed even in cases of malfeasance, but where there is no actual taking of money. It seems to me that there would be no difficulty in making a general rule.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is a broad distinction between the Superannuation Act and the Civil Service Retirement Act. In the latter there is no charge on the public treasury at all. We simply return the money paid in with interest. But in the case of the Superannuation Act, there is a large drain on the public treasury. For every dollar paid into the superannuation fund, we pay out three or four dollars. If we were to accede to my hon. friend's request, we would have to pay out considerably more. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister reminds me that under the Superannuation Act, no matter how long and meritorious a man's services may have been, if his death occurs before superannuation, his family receive nothing. In the case of life insurance, a man must die to benefit by it, but in the case of the Superannuation Act, a man must live to get any benefit from it. I may say that while the contributions to the superannuation fund under the Superannuation Act amount to $60,000 a year, we pay out annually $330,000, and if we were to take the course suggested by my hon. friend, we would add considerably to the burden.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The same argument would apply in the case of corporations because the pension fund of a private corporation is not only built up by the contributions of the employees but is also supplemented to a large extent by the institution itself. Then so far as the cases of death are concerned, I think there is always a gratuity—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Only two months salary.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That might not be very much. But the fact that that seems, perhaps, a not altogether desirable state of affairs is no particular reason why the government should depart from what is the ordinary usage among commercial institutions throughout the country. However, I brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and have no desire to say more at present. I am not going to move an amendment, because I have not considered the matter sufficiently myself. But I think it a matter that the government might well take into consideration.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. How would this affect the case of clerks who entered the service as temporary clerks but were afterwards appointed to the permanent service ? On their retirement, would they be entitled to have the retiring allowance based upon their whole time, including the time of temporary service ? The Act of 1871, I think, provided for temporary service, but it did not provide that a temporary clerk should contribute to the superannuation fund. In 1884, I think, an Order in Council—not an Act—was passed providing that a temporary clerk would have to contribute the same amount that he would have had to contribute had he been from the first a permanent clerk to entitle him to superannuation on his whole time. I would simply like to know how such cases would be affected by this measure.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would say to my hon. friend from Victoria, N.B. (Hon. Mr. Costigan) that this measure does not touch that point at all.

Resolutions reported and agreed to.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 49) to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

House went into Committee on the following resolution :

That it is expedient to amend the 32nd chapter 63-64 Vic., 'An Act respecting and restricting Chinese immigration,' by providing :

1st. That a tax of $500 shall be imposed on every person of Chinese origin entering Canada.

2nd. That the person in command of, or in charge of, any vessel or vehicle, bringing Chinese immigrants into Canada shall be personally liable to His Majesty, for the payment of the said tax, with respect to any such immigrant carried by such vessel or vehicle.—The Prime Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Chairman, the House is aware that in the province of British Columbia there exists a very strong feeling against Asiatic immigration. This feeling is confined exclusively, in Canada to the province of British Columbia, and, as we are told, does not extend to other provinces of the Dominion, for the reason that there is no Asiatic immigration which is settled outside the province of British Columbia. As far back as twenty-five or thirty years ago this feeling which exists in British Columbia commenced to manifest itself. In this regard, the province of British Columbia is not at all isolated from other portions of the world in which Asiatic or Mongolian immigration has settled. In California, in Australia, in fact wherever the two races, Caucasian and Mongolian have come into contact, the same feeling has manifested itself. After giving it full consideration, every one who has looked into the matter must come to the conclusion that this antagonism is based upon ethnical considerations, the difference between the two races. It seems impossible to reconcile them, and the conclusion of all who have considered the matter seems to be that the amalgamation of the two is neither possible nor desirable. There are so many differences of character that it is supposed to be impossible to overcome them. At all events, in the province of British Columbia this feeling is very strong. In 1885, the government of Sir John Macdonald introduced a measure to impose a capitation tax of $50 on Chinese immigration coming into the Dominion. It was supposed that this tax would be sufficient to prevent, for the time being, the increase of this immigration; and for some years, it had that effect. But, of late years, the immigration has increased very rapidly, and a new agitation arose in the province, and representations were made to the government that there should be an increase in the capitation tax. In 1900, we doubled the capitation tax, making it $100. It was represented to us at that time by the members of British Columbia, whether they sat on this side of the House or the other, that the resolution then introduced would be inadequate to effect the purpose in view which was to check the immigration of Asiatic labourers into the country. We were aware that there was a good deal to be said in favour of the contention which was urged upon us. At all events we proceeded with our legislation and we then organized a commission to investigate the subject and report. The commission made its report. That report has been in the hands of hon. members of this House for eighteen months, and I presume that by this time it has become familar to all of us. The commissioners who seem to have done their work very thoroughly, came to the conclusion that this kind of immigration ought to be prohibited, and that, if it was not absolutely prohibited the tax should be increased to such a figure as to restrict the immigration to very narrow limits. I would call the attention of the House to the conclusion of the commissioners which is found at page 279 of the report, as follows :

4. In reference to the representations made by the people and legislature of British Columbia, wherein it is alleged :

That the province is flooded with an undesirable class of people, non-assimilative and most detrimental to the wage-earning classes of the people of the province, and that this extensive immigration of orientals is also a menace to the health of the community ;

That there is probability of a great disturbance to the economic conditions in the province and of grave injury being caused to the working classes by the large influx of labourers from China, as the standard of living of the masses of the people in that country differs so widely from the standard prevailing in the province, thus enabling them to work for a much less wage ;

That it is in the interests of the empire that the Pacific province of the Dominion should be occupied by a large and thoroughly British population rather than by one in which the number of aliens would form a large proportion :

We find that these representations are substantially true and urgently call for a remedy.

We also find that the increase of the capitation tax from $50 to $100 is ineffective and inadequate.

Your commissioners are of opinion that the further immigration of Chinese labourers into Canada ought to be prohibited ;

That the most desirable and effective means of attaining this end is by treaty supported by suitable legislation ;

That in the meantime and until this can be obtained the capitation tax should be raised to $500.

The only point upon which your commissioners could not agree is the date when the capitation tax of $500 ought to come into effect. The chairman and commissioner Foley are of opinion that the capitation tax should be raised to $500 at once, while commissioner Munn is of opinion that $300 should be imposed for two years, and if a prohibitive treaty be not obtained within that period, that it be then raised to $500.

I may say that I entertain no hope in the present condition of China of having such a treaty as is here indicated ; therefore, we have taken the course of asking parliament to increase at once the capitation tax from $100 to $500 as here recommended. Now, with regard to Japanese immigration, the same prejudice, I am sorry to say, exists in British Columbia concerning the Japanese as the Chinese. I say I am sorry for it, because for my part I make a distinction between Japan and China. Japan is one of the rising nations of the present day. It has shown itself to be very progressive, it does not seem to me at all doubtful that within a short period Japan will have placed itself in the fore front among the civilized nations of the earth. But whatever may be my feelings in this matter, it is a matter of record for there can be no dispute that in British Columbia the feeling towards the Japanese is exactly the same as towards the Chinese. The Japanese is not looked upon as a desirable immigrant. But as I said a moment ago, though I am prejudiced in favour of the Japanese, I must confess that there is little probability that it will be possible to assimilate the Japanese immigrant to the standard of Canadian civilization. The ethnical differences are also of such a character as to make it very doubtful whether assimilation of the two races could ever take place. But the problem has been solved so far as British Columbia is concerned by the Japanese government themselves, who have undertaken not only to restrict but absolutely to prohibit Japanese immigration from that country to Canada. The report of the commissioners upon this point is also very pertinent. Some two or three years ago the Japanese government issued an order, I cannot say whether it was legislative or executive, but at all events a legal order, absolutely to prohibit within certain limits, immigration from Japan into Canada. The report of the commissioners upon this point is to be found at page 399 :

Your commissioners fully appreciate the action taken by the government of Japan on August 2, 1900, whereby the governors of the prefectures of Japan were instructed to prohibit entirely for the time being the emigration of Japanese labourers for the Dominion of Canada. It is stated in a pamphlet purporting to be published by the Japanese consul at Vancouver : 'the principal reason for the measure thus taken was to avoid any friction that might occur by allowing them to come into British Columbia where their immigration was not desired by a certain element of that province,' and that 'the government of Japan wholly stopped the issuance of passports to any intending emigrants for Canada since the 1st of August last (1900), and still continues to do so, under a provision of the Immigration Protection Law. (Law No. 70, 1896).

The course adopted by the Japanese government, if we may without presumption be permitted to say so, is most opportune, eliminating all cause of friction and irritation between Canada and Japan, and so favouring a freer trade and intercourse between the countries than could otherwise obtain.

Nothing further is needed to settle this most difficult question upon a firm basis than some assurance that the action already taken by the government of Japan will not be revoked.

Your commissioners desire to express their earnest hope that in the continuance of this friendly policy, legislation on this subject by the Canadian government may be rendered unnecessary. Should, however, a change of policy be adopted in this regard by the Japanese government whereby Japanese labourers may again be permitted to emigrate to Canada, the welfare of the province of British Columbia imperatively demands that effective measures be adopted to take the place of the inhibition now imposed by the Japanese government.

Your commissioners recommend that, in that event, an Act be pased by the Dominion government on the lines of what is known as the Natal Act, made sufficiently stringent and effective to accomplish the desired result.

There is no necessity to go back to that, because the action of the imperial Japanese government is sufficient of itself to cover the ground. Under the action just taken by the Japanese government, three classes of persons only are allowed to leave the shores of Japan for Canada. First, those who hold both a passport and a certificate of the Japanese consul at Vancouver certifying that they are resident in Canada, and are only returning to this country ; second, those families of Japanese resident in Canada coming out to join them upon approval of the Japanese consul at Vancouver; third, merchants and students duly qualified. Within these bounds, even according to the most extreme views which may be entertained in British Columbia, no harm can come from Japanese immigration, because no Japanese immigration except what is here specified is possible; therefore, it is not necessary at this time to pass any legislation to prohibit that class of immigrants. For these reasons we maintain that restriction only to Chinese and not to Japanese immigrants.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman on what the action of the government was based in disallowing the recent acts of the British Columbia legislature? Perhaps he will be good enough to give us information as to what the acts were which were disallowed.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot at this moment, speaking from memory, state the nature of the Acts. Speaking in very general terms, the Acts which were disallowed were of a nature which prevented Japanese and Chinese working in the mines. We had had communication several times with the government of British Columbia to the effect that if they would restrict the operation of their Act to Chinese labourers only and exempt the Japanese labourers, we would not object and would not disallow the Act; but if they were to continue to apply these restrictions to Japanese labourers as well as to Chinese, we thought such legislation would come into conflict with our views upon the obligations which rested on Canada as part of the British empire. Japan being an ally of Great Britain, we thought it extremely unadvisable to pass any Act which might cause friction between the empire of Japan and the British empire. Of course if the Japanese government had refused to take any action and had allowed the subjects of that empire to flood the British Columbia labour market, we would have been probably induced to reconsider our own views. Representations were made by our officials, at all events, I may say that verbal representations were made by myself to the Japanese consul. In view of the fact that the Japanese government had prohibited their own people from coming to Canada, we thought that there was no necessity for enacting such legislation, and therefore we took the action that we did. I have had further communication with my friend, Mr. Prior, the present premier of British Columbia on this subject, and I hope that in future any legislation that may be passed in British Columbia will be confined to Chinese labourers, and in that view we have notified the government of British Columbia that we see no cause to interfere.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did the disallowance take place upon the initiative of this government or was it upon representations of the imperial government?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have not looked at the correspondence for some time, I am not aware that we have any correspondence upon the subject, but I think it was done upon our own initiative.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the right hon. gentleman consider that the statutes passed by the British Columbia legislature went beyond the provisions of the statutes which are now in force in other colonies, for example in the colony of Natal, and I think in some of the Australasian colonies?

The PRIME MINISTER. Beyond its legislative powers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Chairman, is there any really good reason why the province of British Columbia should not have the same rights in regard to legislation of that kind—I am speaking from the standpoint of the empire, not from the Canadian standpoint alone—is there any good reason why British Columbia should not exercise the same rights in regard to legislation of that kind as are at present exercised by the colony of Natal? My right hon. friend is aware of course, that the Act which is enforced is printed in this report and I understand that it goes very far indeed towards the exclusion of immigration, even to the prohibition of Asiatic labour. I would like to understand, if this disallowance took place from the imperial standpoint, and I would gather that from the right hon. gentleman's remarks, why it is, that these imperial concerns more directly touch the province of British Columbia than they do the colony of Natal or the Australasian colonies, to which I have referred. I am as ready as my right hon. friend would be to give all due weight to imperial interests in regard to legislation of that kind, but I have been unable to understand why these interests would more directly concern the province of British Columbia than the colony of Natal or the Australasian colonies.

The PRIME MINISTER. The reason seems to be a very obvious one. The action taken by the Canadian government in this matter was not dictated solely from the point of view of imperial interests, but solely from the point of view of Canadian interests. The geographical relation of Canada to Japan is very different from the geographical relation of Japan to Natal. We intend to have a trade between Japan and Canada. We intend to bring about a development of the relations which exist between that progressive people and our own people. We have steamers plying to-day between this country and the orient, steamers which are subsidized by this government. We have at present in Japan exhibition commissioners who are trying to promote trade between Canada and Japan. Under such circumstances I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) whether it is not good policy to try and promote friendly relations between Canada and Japan. The conditions would have been very much different if the Japanese government had not undertaken to act in a friendly manner towards the government of Canada. The Japanese government went out of their way to prohibit their own people coming to Canada. They did this as a friendly act towards Canada. They wanted to preserve the good relations that existed between us. Under these circumstances was it not good Canadian policy, not from considerations of imperial interest, but from considerations of Canadian interest, to take such action as was calculated to promote the best interests of Canada and not to irritate people who wanted to have friendly relations with us. What was the cause of irritation between us and Japan ? It was that there were Japanese subjects coming to Canada who were settling in British Columbia and working in competition with our own workingmen, where their presence is not welcome. They have undertaken to remove that cause of irritation by preventing their own people from coming into competition with our workingmen, and under such circumstances, it seems to me that the action of the British Columbia legislature was, to say the least, ill-advised, that it was not calculated to promote the best interests of Canada, or those friendly relations that ought to obtain between two neighbouring nations, such as Canada and Japan are, because, after all, we are neighbouring nations. For this reason we represented to the legislature of British Columbia that if they were to restrict their action to Chinese immigration, that if they were to except Japanese immigrants from their legislation, we would not interfere, leaving them to exercise their own will in regard to Chinese immigration. It did seem to us that it was an ill-advised action to still persist in giving a slap in the face to the imperial government of Japan by including Japanese labourers in their legislation. The action which we took was dictated not only from considerations of imperial interest but from considerations of Canadian interest.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It almost seems to me that the right hon. gentleman, in the attitude which he has taken, was constituting this government as a court of appeal from the British Columbia legislature. Assuming as we have right to assume, that this legislation was within the competence of the legislature of the province of British Columbia, my right hon. friend, nevertheless, suggests that because they did not really understand their own affairs, this government has the right to reverse their legislation. Upon what ground ? Because Japan is a neigbouring nation, and because we may expect to have some trade with that country in the future. Well, I thought that my hon. friend was a more pronounced champion of provincial rights than to adopt an attitude of that kind. Here is the province of British Columbia acting admittedly within its legislative rights.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not admitted.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am dealing with the question in the light in which the Prime Minister has placed the matter before the committee. The ground that has been placed before the committee is that this legislation was properly disallowed, because it is ill-advised and not in the interests of Canada. I respectfully submit that the legislature of British Columbia is the judge of that, when it is acting within its jurisdiction. If we are to have another ground put forward, we will deal with that when it comes, but I am now dealing with the ground that has been taken up to the present time. If it is a good reason for disallowing such legislation that we are to have a trade with Japan that circumstance might also be a reason for asking the Japanese to revoke the restriction which they have made, and if the probability of trade is made a good ground for disallowing this legislation, why is it not a good ground for rejecting the legislation which the right hon. gentleman is introducing now, because, I suppose we have as good reason for supposing that we will have a trade with China as with Japan ? I do not profess to be very familiar with trade questions in reference to these two countries, but I should imagine that perhaps we have as much trade with China as with Japan and possibly more. It does not seem, when looking at the question of the disallowance of the British Columbia legislation, that very valid reasons have been put forward by my right hon. friend. I would think that the considerations, if they are purely Canadian considerations, which he has put forward, are not a sufficient justification for the action which he has taken, and if there are more than Canadian considerations, in questions, if there are imperial considerations in question, then, I repeat again, as I said before, that I know of no imperial interest which touches this legislation emanating from the province of British Columbia which does not equally touch the legislation which has been enacted in the colony of Natal and in certain of the Australasian colonies.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) to the fact that the first disallowance of British Columbia legislation of this character, as far as I recollect, took place in 1884, and I would like to read an extract from the report made at that time by Sir Alexander Campbell, then Minister of Justice.

Having reference to the condition of Canada at the time of the union with the province the undersigned is of opinion : That the authority given by the 95th section of the British North America Act is an authority to regulate and promote immigration into the provinces and not an authority to prohibit immigration.

A law which prevents the people of any country from coming into the province cannot be said to be of a local or private nature. On the contrary it is one involving Dominion, and possibly imperial interests.

The measure was then referred to the imperial authorities and the result was that the Act was disallowed. That principle laid down by Sir Alexander Campbell at that time has been followed ever since with respect to British Columbia legislation on the subject of Chinese emigration.

As regards the Natal Act, I have not it before me and I do not like to speak from memory regarding it because this is a matter of very considerable importance, and I do not like to discuss the question without having the documents so as to be able to speak with accuracy. But my recollection of the Natal Act is this : That the question at one time was considered as to whether or not, in British Columbia, it would be possible to adopt the Natal Act. The people of British Columbia said that the Natal Act did not go far enough. My hon. friend will bear in mind that the Natal Act has no reference to Chinese or Japanese immigration, but has reference to immigration generally. A person who cannot comply with certain conditions laid down in that Act with respect to the speaking of the English tongue and being able to read and write cannot settle in the colony of Natal. The Natal Act would be impossible of application here ; it would be impossible for us to allow the province of British Columbia to have such an Act governing immigration. It is necessary for us to have an Act which would be applicable to the whole of the Dominion of Canada and the Natal Act is impossible of application to the whole Dominion. I do not want to go any further at the present time. This question is one of considerable importance and it requires to be discussed with a present knowledge of all that has taken place. I say to my hon. friend, that the principle adopted, in so far as the disallowance of this Act is concerned by the Department of Justice on a recent date, is the principal laid down by Sir Alexander Campbell in 1884.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to have some information before the resolution is adopted, as to whether or not, as has been alleged in the press of British Columbia, it was suggested by the imperial government that the very Act which was disallowed might be passed by that legislature and would be regarded as satisfactory. No papers have been brought down to this House on this subject. Substantially this has been asserted in the press of British Columbia. I do not know as to the truth of that, but I would like to have some information on the subject.

The PRIME MINISTER. That despatch is in the report.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Could my right hon. friend refer me to the page.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot at the moment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand that the position which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice takes is : That this Act was beyond the powers of the legislature of British Columbia and therefore was disallowed. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, whether it is the practice of the Department of Justice to sit as a court of interpretation upon provincial statutes and deal with them all in that way ; disallowing all those that are possibly ultra vires—or is it the practice to leave that question to be determined by the courts in the usual way.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. When a question comes before the Department of Justice for the purpose of settling as to whether or not a law is ultra vires of the provincial parliament ; representations in the first place are invariably made to the provincial government asking that as a doubt has arisen it may be set at rest by subsequent legislation. If subsequent legislation is not passed and if in the opinion of the Department of Justice the legislation is clearly ultra vires, then disallowance takes place. If there is a doubt as to whether legislation is ultra vires or not, it is left then to its operation and to be settled by the courts. The course to be pursued with respect to Acts passed by the provincial legislatures was settled by an Order in Council passed 8th June, 1868.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What does my hon. friend mean by that ? Does he mean that in case the provincial authorities contend that their Act is within the competence of the povincial legislature, and the Department of Justice arrives at an opposite conclusion ; that in such case the department constitutes itself a judge instead of leaving the provincial authorities to have that question determined by the courts.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There is a door open under the statutes. If the question is one on which the provincial authorities want to have the matter referred to the courts and will say that they will have a case stated for the courts ; then the Department of Justice is always ready to meet them half way. That question has now arisen in the province of Ontario with respect to the rights on the rivers, and will be disposed of in that way.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would consider that a fair way of dealing with the subject. The provincial authorities adhere to their view that the Act is within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature, and desire to have the question referred to the courts, and the Department of Justice expresses itself ready and willing to do so.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Was that option given to British Columbia in this case?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No. As I have said, Sir Alexander Campbell stated in his report that the law was ultra vires, and he said it was contrary to imperial interests and he said in addition to that, that it was contrary to the general interests of Canada. My hon. friend is well aware that an Act may be perfectly ultra vires of the powers of a province, but if that Act is contrary to the general interests of the Dominion of Canada that is sufficient cause for disallowance.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I know; but let us not revert to the other ground. I was dealing with that a moment ago and my hon. friend raised the question of ultra vires; let us not mix up the two things. I want to know from my hon. friend this—I want to know whether or not the option to which he refers was extended to the executive of British Columbia; whether or not they had an opportunity of having this question referred to the courts and determined by the courts instead of having it referred to and determined by the Department of Justice.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I do not like to discuss the language of documents without having these documents before me. I read what Sir Alexander said and I shall read it again, and it is all that he said on that point.

> Having reference to the condition of Canada at the time of the union with the province the undersigned is of opinion: That the authority given by the 95th section of the British North America Act is an authority to regulate and promote immigration into the provinces and not an authority to prohibit immigration.

That is what the British Columbia authorities attempted to do at the time.

> A law which prevents the people of any country from coming into the province cannot be said to be of a local or private nature. On the contrary, it is one involving Dominion, and possibly imperial interests.

By that rule we have been bound ever since.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Evidently I do not make myself clear to my hon. friend. Does he take the position, that the province of British Columbia, with respect to the Act passed last year or the year before—

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There have been four or five Acts passed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).—is bound by what Sir Alexander Campbell said seventeen or twenty years ago.

The PRIME MINISTER. The principle is the same.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The principle is not the same.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) pardon me a moment. The hon. gentleman speaks of an Act passed two or three or four years ago. There have been several Acts passed in that period of time, one was left to its operation and it came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a year ago. I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to be more precise and to specify which particular Act he refers to.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am referring to the Acts which were disallowed; I am trying to find out why they were disallowed. I am told by the right hon. gentleman that they were disallowed because they were considered not in accordance with Canadian interests and not in accordance with imperial interests. I discussed that matter very briefly. Then I was told by the Minister of Justice that they were considered ultra vires of the province of British Columbia.

Mr. RUSSELL. And not in accordance with Canadian or imperial interests.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will have my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) to the rescue in a moment, but I hope he will pardon me until I finish and then I will give him an opportunity. Assuming now that they were disallowed on the ground that they were ultra vires, I want to know whether or not the province of British Columbia had an opportunity of having that question determined by the courts, and if not why it did not have that opportunity. I am told that it depends upon an opinion given by Sir Alexander Campbell in 1884. Well, Sir Alexander Campbell was not sitting as a court; Sir Alexander Campbell was Minister of Justice; and the province of British Columbia if it is bound as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice seems to think it is bound by the decision of Sir Alexander Campbell in 1884, has had no opportunity of having the question settled by the courts. Therefore, I think that that advances the matter not very much further; it still leaves it as it was before. If it be a fact, what is the reason that the province of British Columbia had not an opportunity of having this question determined by a proper court?

The PRIME MINISTER. I thought I had made myself clear, but I will try once more to give the reason to my hon. friend. We considered first of all, that it was very doubtful whether or not it was within the power of the British Columbia legislature to enact such legislation. But, apart from that consideration, we had no doubt whatever that it was not in the interest of Canada, either from an imperial or Canadian standpoint. We did not give the opportunity to the province to have the matter brought before the courts, because our conviction was too strong in that respect. From the days of Sir Alexander Campbell such legislation was thought to be contrary to imperial interests; we also thought it extremely contrary to the interests of Canada; and for these two reasons we disallowed it. We intimated to the government of British Columbia that if their legislation had been confined to Chinese immigration and had exempted the Japanese, we would have left it. In the case of Japan, the Japanese government, acting from motives of friendship, has undertaken to prevent the emigration of Japanese to Canada, so that there was no reason for restriction on our part. But the Chinese government has never attempted to restrict or prevent Chinese emigration to Canada. That emigration is increasing; and, though in restricting it, we run the risk of injuring our trade with China, yet we felt that of two evils we should choose the less, and restrict the immigration even if it injured that trade. This is the reason we make the distinction between Chinese and Japanese immigration.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think we have practically got back to the first ground again.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is the only ground.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend the Minister of Justice gave another ground.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, my hon. friend assumed that there was power.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Minister of Railways is now going to elucidate the situation. I regret that I require so much assistance ; I have no doubt it is my own fault. I will just make one or two further remarks in regard to what the right hon. gentleman has stated. It is from the standpoint of Canadian interests that this legislation was disallowed, I understand now.

The PRIME MINISTER. Partially.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And for that reason the government were not willing to refer it to the courts.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is one of the reasons.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Had it not been for that, I presume it would have been referred to the courts.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not say that at all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My right hon. friend does not say yes or no to that. He has still some confidence in that opinion of Sir Alexander Campbell of 1884. I think, as the Minister of Justice stated frankly today, it ought to be the rule, if a provincial government desires to have the question of the validity of its statutes referred to the courts, it should be referred, unless some overpowering reason, apart from the question of ultra vires, makes it necessary that the Act should be disallowed. I think that would be in accord with the views expressed by my right hon. friend in the past with regard to provincial autonomy. Therefore I take for granted that the real reason which operated in the minds of the government in this case was the reason last assigned by my right hon. friend. Now, I would like to ask my right hon. friend in what respect he thought those statutes of the province of British Columbia conflicted with Canadian interests, and on what principle is it that a provincial legislature, being the only judge appointed by the constitution of matters which are within its competence should have its legislation overridden by the act of the executive at Ottawa.

The PRIME MINISTER. I thought I had given that answer already at least four times ; but I am sorry to see that I have not made any impression on the mind of my hon. friend. I am afraid that whatever answer I give I shall not be any more successful. I would suggest, as the best way to get at a solution of the question, that he should move for the correspondence and the Act of disallowance, and he will find all the reasons for our action.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The absolute power of disallowance is given to us by the British North America Act when we choose to exercise it. It was held that this power should be exercised on some principle, and that principle is laid down in an Order in Council, in which the subjects, the reasons, and the distance we ought to go, are stated. Therefore I think the complete answer of the premier ought to be that we exercise that power in accordance with the British North America Act, and that the rules under which we exercise it are laid down in an Order in Council.

Mr. PUTTEE. As regards the Japanese, I wish to ask the right hon. first minister if any assurance has been sought or obtained that the action of the Japanese government, which was so timely so far as Canada is concerned, shall not be revoked.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, we have no assurance to that effect.

Mr. PUTTEE. Does the right hon. gentleman not think it would be wise to get that assurance at this time, when there is no friction ?

The PRIME MINISTER. So long as matters remain as they are, there is no necessity of invoking any trouble. Should the action of Japan be revoked, it would then be time for this government to take action.

Mr. PUTTEE. It seems to me it would be to late then. The commissioners recommend that assurance be sought from the Japanese government at this time. If they give an assurance that their action will not be revoked, it will be unnecessary to pass any legislation here; but should they revoke their action, it would mean more agitation in this country, and perhaps more friction between this government and the imperial government, and Japan. All this could be avoided by getting an assurance from the Japanese government at this time, and I think it could be got if it were sought.

Mr. INGRAM. If I remember rightly, a Bill was introduced last session to divide the capitation tax among the different provinces, I am not sure whether that is the law or not.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is the law.

Mr. INGRAM. Now that it has been increased, is it still the intention of the government to divide it among the different provinces.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRISON. I would like to ask the right hon. first minister, in the event of Japan receding from the position it has taken, say after the session of parliament, what machinery could be invoked to stop an influx of 8,000 or 9,000 Japs within a few weeks or months? If that number were to go into British Columbia, it would have a most disastrous effect. It strikes me that before legislation could be passed, a great deal of harm would be done.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have to say to my hon. friend that he is contemplating a contingency which has not the slightest probability of taking place.

Mr. MORRISON. It is not remote.

The PRIME MINISTER. I consider it is not only remote but improbable, because all the negotiations we have had with the Japanese government—and our negotiations can only be through the Japanese Consul at Montreal—are of such a character as to assure us that there is not the slightest intention on the part of the Japanese government of revoking its present orders with respect to emigration.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I presume this is the despatch to which the right hon. gentleman referred a moment ago. It is a despatch from the colonial office to the Governor General, dated 9th April, 1899. The first portion of the despatch up to and included in the 7th paragraph, is taken up with the reasons alleged against the passage of such legislation as was adopted by the British Columbia legislature. The 8th and 9th clauses are as follows:

8. Her Majesty's government earnestly trust that on consideration of these explanations the government of British Columbia will at once procure the repeal of the provisions complained of and the substitution of legislation on the lines indicated above.

9. If this is impossible, Her Majesty's government feel compelled, however reluctant they may be to cause inconvenience to the province, to press on your ministers the importance in the general interests of the empire of using the powers vested in them by the British North America Act, for cancelling these measures to which Her Majesty's government object on grounds both of principle and policy.

Is that the despatch to which the right hon. gentleman refers?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That brings me to quote to my right hon. friend the language of one of the sections of the Natal Act:

The immigration into Natal, by land or sea, of any person of any of the classes defined in the following subsections, hereinafter called 'prohibited immigrants' is prohibited namely:

Any person who, when asked to do so by an officer appointed under this Act, shall fail to write out and sign, in the characters of any language of Europe, an application to the colonial secretary in the form set out in schedule B to this Act.

This provision, it is needless to say, would absolutely prohibit any immigration from China or Japan into the colony of Natal. I think that provisions of a similar character have been passed by some of the Australian colonies. What I desire my right hon. friend to say is whether or not this legislation of British Columbia was disallowed in consequence of this despatch I have just read from the colonial office, and if so, in what respect was the legislation passed by the province of British Columbia more injurious to imperial interests than that passed and now in force in the colony of Natal?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have nothing to add to what has been said. If my hon. friend will move for the correspondence, he will there find the reasons given. I cannot say whether disallowance took place in consequence of this legislation, I do not think it did, but my hon. friend will find all the reasons set forth in the correspondence.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I thought everything was here that is of any importance.

The PRIME MINISTER. With regard to the disallowance there is further correspondence, and I shall be very glad to take the opportunity of discussing the question from the standpoint of the disallowance of provincial legislation on some future occasion.

Progress reported.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 8) to amend the Expropriation Act.—The Minister of Justice.

On section 2.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). When this Bill was last under consideration, it was suggested by the hon. member for Pictou (Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that there was not sufficient provision made for the compensation of the owner of property who might have lost the opportunity of selling it to advantage through the fact that the government had given him notice of expropriation. In view of that objection, I decided to offer an amendment to section 3 of the Bill, which will make that section read as follows :

> The fact of such abandonment or revestment shall be taken into account in connection with all the other circumstances of the case, in estimating or assessing the amount to be paid to any person claiming compensation for the land taken.

I put the objection raised to the deputy minister, who drafted the Act. He said that he thought the Act was broad enough to cover the case put by my hon. friend from Pictou, but in order to make the matter absolutely clear, I would move that after the word 'account' in the second line of paragraph 3, the following words be inserted : 'in connection with all other circumstances of the case.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I would like to ask my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) whether he can quote any precedent for such legislation as this. I confess I cannot find any. The Crown assumes to take a man's property only temporarily, leaving him with a qualified interest at their sweet will, and they keep it or abandon it as they see fit. If you are going to adopt such a principle for the Crown, how are you going to prevent corporations and other institutions to which we are in the habit of giving powers of expropriations claiming a similar power ? Surely my hon. friend must have some precedent, and is not going to take the responsibility of initiating a principle of this sort. It surely cannot be that the Crown, for ordinary public works—government railways or other such works though clothed with all the powers they now have, will demand something more than they are willing to grant to private interests similarly situated. I say it is a vicious and a wrong principle. If specific cases are to be dealt with, they can be shown and can always be dealt with by the Crown——

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. How ?

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. By a special Act or resolution. Why should parliament grant to the Crown powers that it will not grant to other institutions ? If my hon. friend has a precedent to quote, I will not say more at this time, for I do not wish to prolong the discussion. From the fact that he does not answer, I infer that he has no precedent for this measure. All the greater reason, then, why the dangerous character of this proposition should be pointed out. It is wrong in principle, especially wrong in view of the fact that the Crown has so many rights against the owners of property beyond what private individuals have against each other. And it is especially dangerous, because if you enact such a Bill, you establish a precedent in the case of the Crown for which corporations will clamour, and which you will find it difficult to deny them. Suppose that I am the owner of property, and the Crown wants that property. They have the same right to take it for the public service that a corporation would have. But the Crown say : We are not satisfied with that, we want to introduce a new principle ; we want to take your property for a time. But is it not plain that this involves the impossible proposition of making a fair comprehension of damages for the future ? It is impossible to foresee what the effect will be upon my rights in the property. It is contrary to all business principles. The law of damages is well understood. One must show direct damages, or he cannot claim compensation. This Bill involves a dangerous innovation upon an immemorial right, a right which is embodied in the old saying that a man who is in his house is in his castle. It is contrary to those rights of property which were particularly impressed upon me in my legal education, when it was made clear that the rights of property were the rights of individuals, and were the most sacred things that the law deals with, next only to personal liberty. Many wars have been waged to compel the recognition of these rights in the subject as against the Crown. Yet, here in this advanced age of the world and of legislation, we are to have a principle embodied in our laws for which there is no precedent—or if there were I would say it was a dangerous precedent, and it would be well to be careful how we acted upon it. Why cannot the Crown buy a man's property if they want it, and, if they cease to want it, sell it ? I can get a jury of my countrymen or a board of arbitrators to fairly say what my property is worth. I would not sit on an arbitration—and I am no prude and no poser—between the Crown and an individual to say what was fair in the cases to be brought up under this Bill. I could not assess the damages fairly without knowing the future. It is so simple to me, the case is so unanswerable, the wrong is so patent, that I am bound to protest as strongly as I feel. Here is my farm, or my house, and you want to take it for public purposes. You can find plenty of men to say what is the value of the property. If you want it you can pay me for it as the governing authority in any free country does when it takes the property of an individual. But to say that the Crown may take a man's property and not pay for it is to attribute to the Crown a power against which the barons of England stood out firmly in Magna Charta days. Under the existing law, which nobody finds fault with, you may take my farm and pay me for it; and when you are done with it you can sell it to some one else. But I deny that you have the right to take it from me for the time and hand it back to me when you please. It is impossible to say what compensation I should have in that case, for it is a question of the future and there is only one Being, and he is not in this world, who knows the future. This is a clear invasion of the individual rights of property. Then there is the other consideration, and second in importance only to the first—that, if parliament confers this right upon the Crown, this right of qualified expropriation, the corporations will demand the same, and trouble will commence the end of which no man can foresee. Do allow my protest to have some effect and go no further with legislation involving so vicious a principle and likely to arouse so undesirable a feeling.

Mr. HUGHES (North Victoria). I would ask the hon. minister what necessity there is for passing this Bill? Have any cases arisen which seem to make such a law as this necessary?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend from South Norfolk (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) has spoken with a great deal of feeling. I apprehend that he has convinced himself that a grievous wrong would be perpetrated and some very obnoxious infraction of principle or some great iniquity result if this Bill should become law. My hon. friend must have been dwelling upon this until it has assumed a much greater magnitude and importance in his mind than the facts would justify. There is nothing alarming about the proposition which my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) has embodied in this Bill. There is nothing strange, there is nothing unusual about it. It is simply a moderate and reasonable extension of a principle already recognized, and which is practiced every day of our life. That principle is that whatever individual interests may be, they should be subordinate to the public requirements, awarding every possible compensation to the individual who may have suffered pecuniary injury. Now this Bill surely makes ample provisions for compensation to the man who is injured; and if it appears that in the public interest either the whole or the part of any man's property must be taken for public purposes, we provide that he shall be compensated therefor. Now my hon. friend seems to think that there is something outrageously wrong in the idea of expropriation itself?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. No, I qualified it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are not proposing to give power to any railway company by this legislation; we are only proposing to give to the Crown power to make a qualified expropriation, just as you do when you give to a railway company power to take a portion of a man's farm, or to run through the middle of his farm. This legislation is qualified in the same way. My hon. friend thinks that we must not touch a man's property, that we must not even touch the hem of his property, unless we take the whole of it.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. No, I made no such argument.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not professing to give his exact words, but in effect he argued as I have stated. It is no more a qualified expropriation to take part of a man's property, or to take it for a limited time, than it is to take it for all time. I fail to see wherein the principle is different. As I tried to argue the other day, unless hon. members are of opinion that it is wholly impossible for any tribunal to make a just estimate of the amount of compensation a man ought to receive when you take a limited interest in his property, unless you are driven to that conclusion, there is nothing wrong in this Bill, because if you give him full and ample compensation what more can he expect? It is not a desirable thing, I admit, to take a man's property away from him against his will. I do not like to do that any more than anybody else, but that principle is so imbedded in our law and jurisprudence, in our whole system of government, that it is altogether too late in the day to complain about it. You do it everywhere. You give that power to every kind of a public organization; you give it to cities and towns, to expropriate lands for the purpose of parks, groves and gardens. My hon. friend goes back to Magna Charta. Well, we are doing lots of things to-day that were not done in the days of Magna Charta.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the question of limited expropriation a settled principle in Canada?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not exactly know what my hon. friend means, but if he means to ask if there is any established law to authorize it in Canada, I say there is not, certainly not as respects Dominion public works, because we have advanced beyond the conditions out of which grew the existing legislation, and we have advanced to a period when the extent and magnitude of our public works make it necessary that the Crown should be invested with some additional power in order that these public works may be carried on at the least cost to the country.

Mr. CLANCY. The reason I asked the question was that the hon. gentleman based his whole argument upon the other principle, something that is now in existence in Canada, and well understood, namely, that private interests must yield to public interests, under a general expropriation system as practised in Canada. The hon. gentleman was basing his argument upon that, although in his Bill he provides for a different state of things, namely, limited expropriation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I take exception to the hon. gentleman's statement that this is the adoption of a new principle. It is not. The principle is the principle of expropriation, of giving power to the government to take a man's property for its use. Now, it is a mere extension, a mere enlargement, to say that when you require a man's property, if you do not require it all, or only require it for a limited time, you may make a limited use of that property. That is not the adoption of a new principle at all. He is mistaking the enlargement and extension in a moderate way of a principle for the principle itself. The principle is already laid down and established. Everybody admits that it would be impossible to carry on the government if you did not have that power. Therefore no one ought to oppose the provisions of this Bill unless he strikes out the basic principle itself. Now my hon. friend says that in the prosecution of public works it is often found in Canada wholly unnecessary to take the whole of a man's property or to take it permanently; all that is necessary in any instance is to take only a part of it, and for a limited period. Now upon what ground is it contended that while you can take the whole of a man's property for all time, you cannot take a portion of that property for a part of the time, even though you make him ample compensation.

Mr. CLANCY. The difference between the hon. gentleman and myself is not whether he should take the property, but the difficulty is to provide means by which a proper compensation would be given in each case.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friends have to admit that they are here. Is it impossible, or is it improbable that the courts of the country cannot have such evidence and assistance given to them by the parties who are concerned in showing the value of an interest which has been taken as will enable them to name the sum which will safely and surely be sufficient compensation for the interest in the property taken ? Take the case of any property that the Crown may want to occupy for four or five years. Take a farm ; if my hon. friend has a farm, or a dwelling house, if my hon. friend has a dwelling house, which the Crown would require to use for five or ten years—does he argue against the Bill upon the assumption that it would be impossible for any tribunal to say what the use and occupation of that farm for ten years would be, or to arrive at the amount of compensation that he should receive for taking the property away from him during that time ?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman seems to be reasoning backwards. He is putting up a case and he is asking : Would any person suppose it is possible to arrive at a fair compensation ? What we say is, that it should be reasonably possible to arrive at a fair consideration.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Why can you not be reasonably positive ? If you cannot be reasonably positive there is a difficulty as to the value, the price, or the accurate amount which a man ought to get, but there is not a tribunal which would deal with such a case, or which would be called upon to adjudicate upon it, which would not allow ample latitude so as to cover any possible contingency. We know that in our experience—the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) doubtless knows as the result of his experience in the department which he presided over for a number of years—that the Crown invariably gets the worst of it in all these cases. This has been referred to by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). He knows that the disposition of every tribunal is to give to the individual claimant the benefit of every doubt, and to give against the government every advantage which it can give to the other side.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We are not debating the question as to how the Crown is used, or whether it has been obliged to pay greater damages to individuals than it should have paid. It is the clause which is immediately before us that we are discussing. The question is : What is the meaning of the clause which is immediately before us ? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals asks if the court cannot fix the amount of the remuneration for a limited estate in any property. They can. They can describe a limited interest just as well as they can the value of a complete expropriation, but how are they to arrive at the compensation when the hon. Minister of Justice says that the Crown may use a property for one, two, or three years before payment of the compensation may take place ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You have to name the time during which you require to use the property.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. You have to put that in the notice of expropriation.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I am dealing with the clause immediately before us, and you have not to do anything of the kind. I will ask the hon. Minister of Justice if notice has been served at the present moment in regard to any land intended to be expropriated, and on which the amount of compensation for the expropriation is not paid, would not that clause apply in such a case ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You have to state just what term you want the property for; and you have to estimate the damage.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I am asking the questions of the hon. Minister of Justice. If notice is given of the expropriation of any property that the Crown is in possession of at the present moment and has not paid the amount of the expropriation, if this clause passes, cannot you abandon the land, get the compensation fixed, and compel the owner to take the land back again ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Why should he not ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The difference between the two ministers is this : The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals says the amount is to be fixed at first——

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. He never said anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART——before the partial interest in the limited estate is taken. There is a difference as I understand it between these two hon. gentlemen.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not if we are understood. We both say the same thing.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I will admit for argument that if you fix the limited estate at first, or the interest in the land to be expropriated, if you fix it in your notice and serve it upon the party whom you take the land from, you can fix its value, but this clause goes a great deal farther than that. It goes so far that you can serve notice on the man whose land is to be expropriated, you need not pay him the amount of the expropriation, or any money, for the user of it till the time expires, and when the time expires you can fix the amount of the expropriation, or get the arbitration to fix the amount which is to be paid to the man for the user, and the clause gives you power to do so and to hand back the land. Another reason why we object to a Bill such as this is, that it will have an ex post facto effect. It applies to lands which are at present under process of expropriation. Does it not do so ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It has no retroactive effect at all.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Does it not apply to lands on which the government are at present working, and in regard to which they have not paid the amount of the expropriation ? Are there not hundreds of cases at present in the department that the Bill applies to where the Crown is in possession of the land ? Certainly there are, and this Bill applies to them. It is intended to apply to them. It is intended to apply to some difficult cases of expropriation perhaps running, not for months, but for years, and to lands of which the Crown is at present exercising the user, or using the lands at the present moment, because the parties have not been able to settle with the Crown or to get their claims settled. By this plan the government will be able to say : We have used your property as long as we like, we will leave it to the court to fix the value of the expropriation for the user, and we will hand you back your property. This can be done under this Bill if it becomes law. I agree with my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) that there is no justification for any such action as that. There is no justification for the Crown, or any individual, taking from a person who owns a property a partial interest in the property for a small number of years. The law of eminent domain should apply solely to the absolute taking of the property, and as my hon. friend says, when you have taken a property for public purposes and when there is no more use for it for public purposes, you ought to put it up to auction and give it to the highest bidder. That is the only honest, fair way of doing. This is new legislation as the hon. Minister of Justice himself admits. He cannot show a precedent in any other country in the world for it. He knows it is the exercise of a right which is an extreme right. The taking of property from an individual is a right which most countries do not allow the government to exercise except under the strictest conditions, such as are provided, for instance, in the constitution of the United States. It is not for the state to determine, nor for the federal government to determine the reasons for which they may exercise the right of eminent domain ; it is fixed in the constitution. But here is an extreme right of absolutely taking property where it is necessary in the public interest, and when you have no further use you can sell it or give it back. I am afraid that under the law this right may be exercised in connection with suits which are pending.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. If such be the case I object to the principle of the thing.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. As to the retroactivity of the law, I will take the opinion of the leader of the opposition, as to whether it is retroactive or not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If there are cases in the department where land has been expropriated and the compensation money not paid ; the statute would seem to have the effect which the ex-Minister of Railways states.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) say that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is at least open to question whether the language is not sufficiently comprehensive for that.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. If there is any doubt on the subject I will insert language that will remove that doubt.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is perfectly fair. In this country, as in all other countries we have the power to take a man's land against his will because sometimes it is in the public interest to do so. It is an invasion of private rights and it is desirable it should be made as little oppressive as possible. The argument from this side is that you are making this more oppressive when you introduce complications of this kind. The Minister of Justice knows, that when the Minister of Railways talks about a tribunal absolutely determining the amount of compensation for land; he does not mean that any tribunal can absolutely determine that with anything like certainty. What is the usual practice? A number of expert witnesses, perhaps fifteen or twenty, are called on each side—in one province, I believe, the number has been reduced to five—and they give varying estimates as to value. In one case in which I was concerned the estimated value of a piece of land expropriated by the Crown varied from $15,000 to $90,000. The tribunal in the end must simply make a guess, and the objection to this legislation is that you are making the guess much more difficult, and you are imposing upon the owner of the land the duty of proving what his damages are.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I think the burden of proof is on the expropriated party.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In an ordinary case in the Exchequer Court the proceeding is this: The Crown proves that it has taken the land and the party proves in the first place the amount of damages and the Crown gives evidence in rebuttal. That is the practice in the Exchequer Court in all cases in which I have been concerned.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The origin of the proceeding is notice, and the deposit of a certain amount.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Quite so.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Then the party to whom the money is offered determines whether or not he accepts, and if he declines the proceeding is taken in the Exchequer Court, and a deposit is made and the question is whether the amount is sufficient or not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is part of the issue; but the real issue is: What is the value of the land. The expropriated party must prove the value of his land, and it comes to what I said at first. If he agrees to what the Crown offers of course there is no litigation, but if he does not agree the burden of proof as to value is upon him. Thus you are imposing a burden upon the claimant and you are making it much more difficult to determine the compensation. Is it desirable in the public interest that that should be done. At present the court makes a mere guess formed upon the opinions of people who come to court and say: This land is worth so much or the detriment to this land by reason of taking part of it is so much. You might get a very extreme case under the provisions of this statute, and I would invite the attention of the Minister of Justice to a case of this kind. Suppose you take ninety feet from the middle of a farm to build a railway, and the owner sells the balance of his farm. After you have had that land for some time you come to the conclusion that you do not require it, and you file a document under section 2 of this Bill stating that you desire only a limited interest, namely, that you desire that land from the period of time which has elapsed from the time it was first taken up to the filing of the notice.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That must be done at the inception. You must bear in mind that the preceding section is the origin of the proceeding.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the Minister of Justice mean that this section only applies to land taken for a limited interest in the first place. This section is general, is it not?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is general in the first part; in the second part it is limited.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The second part seems to make provision that the Crown may retrace its steps and say that land taken absolutely in the first instance should only be taken for a limited interest. Am I correct in that?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes, before the compensation money is actually paid.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I guarded myself in that. Then it is general in its terms. The Crown may file such a document as I mentioned, the result being that a piece of land ninety feet wide through that farm is handed back to the original owner who sold the rest of the farm, and the burden is cast upon him of determining what compensation shall be paid by the Crown to him for that: Is not that a rather complicated position, and is it desirable in the public interest that an obligation of that kind—and I have mentioned only one case out of hundreds that may arise—should be imposed on the property owners of this country. As has been said, the Crown has the remedy in its own hands. It takes a piece of property; let it take it absolutely; if it finds out afterwards that it does not need the whole of that property; if it finds it only needs it for a limited interest; let it retain that interest and sell the balance of the property and every one's right is preserved by that. Is the Minister of Justice familiar with the Land Clauses Act in England—I have no doubt he is. And is it not a fact that courts in England under that Act have the power of determining whether or not the whole of a man's land shall be taken where part is taken in the first instance. I have not refreshed my memory by recent examination, but I think there is some provision of that kind in the Land Clauses Act—does the Minister of Justice think there is not ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No. I would not care to say anything about the Act, unless I had it before my eyes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Minister of Justice is quite right in regard to that, but I thought that perhaps in connection with these matters he would have frequent occasions to refer to that Act. That English law would seem more in consonance with what we should do. I think you are going far enough when you take part of a man's land, leaving on him to prove not only the value of the land, but the damage which is done by severance as it is called in England—when you go beyond that, and take a man's land absolutely in the first place, or take it for a limited interest at first and hand back to him a portion of that limited interest, and in every case impose upon him the duty of proving his damages, it seems to me you are going very far and passing legislation for which there is no precedent.

Mr. OSLER. Notwithstanding what the hon. Minister of Railways says, I think there is a very marked distinction between the powers given here and the powers given under an expropriation Act. The powers given here are the powers of expropriating an option, not buying the property. The government under this clause may virtually get an option on a quarry, hold it, and by increasing the amount they require from time to time, practically continue to hold that option on it for all time. Look at the power this would give, say the Minister of Railways. Suppose you have a contract to let in connection with railway bridges or canals, requiring a large amount of stone. The minister advertises for tenders. Say there are two tenderers. One man looks about for a stone quarry. The other man, who is a friend of the government, has the promise of the minister that they will expropriate a quarry. That is open to happen under this Act. It puts a power into the hands of the government which might lead to corruption at any future time. It practically allows you to take a man's property and tie it up for an indefinite period; and in the end the government will only pay for the comparatively small amount that they use, or perhaps they will not use any at all. This is a power that should not be possessed by any government or corporation. It might lead to serious abuse, and probably would, if any contractors knew that the government had such power when they were tendering for a contract.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am at a loss to understand how it is that my hon. friend, when he enters into the discussion of any Bill or proposal emanating from the government, absolutely takes leave of his ordinary good, sound judgment and sense. It is the wildest distortion of language for my hon. friend to say that this Bill authorizes the Crown to take an option for an indefinite period on a man's property. What is the use of trying to conduct an argument in such a fashion ? Is he going to ask parliament to condemn this Bill because he asserts that the government are asking power to take an option on a man's property for an indefinite period ? I am amazed to hear my hon. friend address an argument of that kind to this committee. There is not the word option in the Bill from beginning to end. The very moment the notice is given, the property is vested in the Crown, and the moment the Crown takes charge of the property it has to pay for it. It has to pay for just what interest it declares it is taking ; and there cannot be any indefiniteness in it, because the notice must say what interest it is taking, and for what period its interest must go.

Mr. OSLER. Let me ask the minister a question. Assuming that the Crown has served notice on the owner of a quarry adjoining a public work, and the government contractors are working on that quarry ; while they are working there, the quarry man cannot work. As I read this Bill, if the government expropriated a small amount of that quarry and used it for six months, they would have the power to expropriate a further amount for the next six months; and in that way they would be getting an option on the quarry as fully as if it were in writing under seal of the government, and signed. No one else could work that quarry so long as the government were working it. Therefore, as a matter of fact, this Bill gives the government power to expropriate an option on a man's lot. Whether I am legally right or not, I am right technically, as to the effect of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has arrived at that conclusion without the slightest data, foundation or authority.

Mr. OSLER. May I ask the minister to answer my question, whether the government under this Bill has the right to expropriate more than once on the same property ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think probably the government would have the right to expropriate for a further period, but it would have no more right to make the second expropriation than it had the first; and if any man is working in the quarry at the time the expropriation takes place, he will get his compensation. Every time an expropriation was repeated, it would be dealt with as a distinct and separate expropriation, and compensation would have to be awarded in respect of it. I say it is not a fair way to discuss the Bill at all. The Bill is plain, easily understood, and capable of being easily worked. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition saw a difficulty in determining as to the mode of doing justice to a man whose property had been cut in two by a right of way being taken or the construction of a railway. After that was done, the land might be turned back to the owner; but in the meantime he might have sold the rest of his land, and that part would be of no value to him. If my hon. friend had read the section, he would have seen that that is a question that would have to be dealt with by a court.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, it would undoubtedly, and I will point out the reason why. After the expropriation notice is given, some little time must elapse before it would get to the tribunal. At all events before payment is made—and I presume that would have reference necessarily to the payment the Crown would offer in respect of their valuation—they would have to declare whether or not they were going to retain the whole or surrender any portion of the property. If they were going to surrender any portion, then the Act provides that such abandonment shall be taken into account by the court, in assessing the amount to be paid as compensation for the land taken.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What would the claimant have to go into in the case I have suggested, in order to prove his claim ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He would simply have to show that after these proceedings had been taken for expropriation, under which his property had been cut in two, he had parted with his interest in the property. Would it not be perfectly apparent to any court that to throw back on his hands ninety feet or whatever might be the extent of the right of way, would be the throwing back of property on his hands which would be of no value, and the court would have to take that fact into account ? He cannot suppose that any court could view the matter in any other light.

Mr. COCHRANE. Suppose he did not sell his land until after the court had assessed the damage ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not the case my hon. friend presents. If he had not sold his land, he would be getting it back just as it was originally, and there would be no strip or right of way cut through his entire property.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend thinks he has settled the matter most satisfactorily. He says that in the case cited there would not be the slightest difficulty because the land handed back would have no value whatever. That would absolutely depend on the circumstances. I will tell him one case in which it might have a great deal of value. Suppose the land had been laid out in lots and a populous settlement created and a street laid out immediately along the line of the ninety feet taken ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It would depend upon circumstances.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would depend upon the facts and it is for the courts to determine the meaning and effect of those facts.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, and I am pointing out that the provision of this statute imposes an oppressive burden on the claimant in proving his case.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is there any more difficulty in determining what the value of a two or three year's user of a man's property is than in determining the value of the whole property ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Take the case I have referred to. What you would have to do would be to prove in the first place what damage was occasioned to the man who continued to own the farm. Then you would be met with the difficulty that the land was handed back to him after it had ceased to be of as much value as it would be if he had retained it. I would like to point out that sections 92, 93 and 94 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act of the United Kingdom provide that in certain cases the whole of the land must be taken and a part cannot be taken.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Where a man is injuriously affected.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is a different thing altogether.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. You would not take the land that was not affected by the appropriation at all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think that my hon. friend is possibly confusing two things. In England if you do not take any portion of a man's land at all, although his land may have been injuriously affected by your expropriation of adjoining property, the general rule is that he cannot recover damage.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That is the law in Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But if you do take a portion of his land, you must consider the injurious effect which that has on the remaining portion. If you take a portion of his land and leave only a certain portion on either side, the owner can call on you to take the whole property and give you a counter notice. I merely bring this to the notice of the Minister of Justice.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is practically the same with us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The power of expropriation should not be oppressively exercised.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Are these clauses to which the hon. gentleman is referring in the Consolidation Act of the United Kingdom, not limited to the cases of expropriation cases by railway companies ? The Crown is not included within the provisions of this Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is a good principle in a case of expropriation by the Crown should be a good principle in the case of expropriation by an ordinary railway company ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know about that because the great public interests of the country are concerned in the one case in our not paying any unnecessary money for the user we want. But in the other case, it is only the particular interest of a private company which is involved.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is not the interests of a private company at all, but the public interest in every case, which is considered.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister of Justice referred me to my leader as to the interpretation of the clause we are considering—as to whether it had a retroactive effect and affected lis pendens. Let me give an illustration which I have received in a letter complaining particularly about this Act, and in which the opinion of a leading lawyer is given with reference to this particular clause.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That is the Peterborough case.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes. In 1865 the government expropriated land at Lakefield. for the Trent canal. The land belonged to one John Hull, and was attached to a flour mill worth some $30,000. The land was taken on which were the store houses, sheds and other appurtenances of the mill. In this letter, after describing the litigation, the writer proceeds to say that the goverument has brought in this measure apparently with the view of defeating Hull, not on the merits, but by an Act of parliament of their own passing, while the case is pending in appeal. The solicitor of Mr. Hull thinks that this Bill is intended to apply to Mr. Hull's case, litigation in which has been going on since 1865 to the present day. While this Bill would not apply to actions settled, it certainly applies to action pending.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I have read the letter to which my hon. friend refers and my opinion is not in any way affected by what the learned gentleman says. If the case of Hull is not proceeded with, the writer of that letter may probably inform my hon. friend the reason why. It is not due to any fault of the Crown. And, in any event, I give it as my opinion that there can be no doubt about it that this law will not have a retroactive effect. Legislation of this sort has never had such an effect. But, if there is any question about it, I am prepared to make it absolutely clear. There is no intention to make this Bill applicable to pending cases. When the Bill was introduced before.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is what I said—

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. When the Bill was introduced before, the hon. gentleman will see it was made applicable to pending cases, and it was largely because of that it was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I hope the hon. gentleman does not mean that I said that this was retroactive in the ordinary sense. But if the Crown should file a document creating a limited interest in a man's property——

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I see—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is wavering between his reputation as a lawyer and his desire to come to the assistance of his friend (Hon. Mr. Haggart).

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). By no means.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am willing to set the question at rest by accepting an amendment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will ask the hon. gentleman's (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick's) opinion—as he seems to want opinions—on one point. Does he mean to say that it is plain that if the Crown file, under the provisions of the section, a document stating that it will take only a limited interest—

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is what I am talking about, and that is the case the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) was putting. I confined my remarks to that. I am prepared to stand by that and to say that it is open to serious question. It is not a desire to support my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Haggart) in an indefensible position that leads me to say this, but because I believe there is a grave question about it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The observations of the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) seem to confirm the view I touched upon when this Bill was before the committee on the last occasion. That hon. gentleman hesitates to say that this would be a safe power to give to private corporations and draws a distinction between the exercise of this power by such corporations and by the government. That hesitancy seems to confirm my idea for there being no similar provision in the legislation of other portions of the empire. I understand that it is conceded that this is a unique piece of legislation ; and I suggest for the consideration of the committee that the reason it does not obtain elsewhere is not merely that it is a dangerous and unfair power to put into the hands of a private corporation, but that it is an equally unfair and dangerous power to put into the hands of the government. To illustrate, let us apply the principle as in the case that the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) stated the other day when he was explaining the measure. Suppose the government want the temporary use of land for the erection of derricks in connection with the public works, and they want to get that right from the owner at a reasonable price. They do not want to pay the amount that would be involved in taking the title in fee. Therefore, some such legislation as this is deemed desirable. It is desirable from the point of view of the government, there can be no doubt about that, for it will enable them to get what they want at a cheap rate. But there is something to be said also from the point of view of the owner of the property, and it is because of that, I believe, that other legislatures hesitate before passing such a law as this. The result of the Bill will be that the government can drive a hard and small bargain every time it wishes to use the land of a private owner for temporary purposes. They can get the use of the land at, perhaps, $150 or $300 less than the real value. And for this reason—the owner, let us say is a farmer ; he has a strong belief that the temporary use of his property is worth a certain sum, but he is face to face with the fact that he may be drawn into a contest with the government, and must retain counsel and be put to expense. He may be well advised by cautious counsel that, though there is good reason to believe he is entitled to so many hundred dollars, it is impossible to say what the tribunal will fix, for the evidence has to be threshed out, and if he appeals, he will be mulct in costs as a result of the contest with the government. The result may be that he will sacrifice so many hundred dollars, as represented by the Minister of Justice, and will accept the proposition of the government. I do not think that is putting it as an extreme view, as in the ordinary run of cases, that would be the result.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Assume that the case is one of the permanent expropriation of property.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is always the difference in value—in that case you get into bigger figures. As I understand, the hon. minister based his plea on the fact that he is dealing with insignificant figures and does not want to pay a big sum. The smaller the amount involved the less likely the individual will be to engage in a contest with the government. It may be an evil that the government cannot drive a cheap bargain when it wants to, but the very fact that the government hesitates to give this power to private corporations is good reason why we should hesitate to give it to the government, as it may be a detriment to the farmer.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not see the force of that argument—that because some hesitation is felt in giving this power to railway corporations, therefore, parliament cannot safely confer it upon the government. It seems to me the arguments would be all the other way. Parliament can safely confer this power upon the government, but we may well pause and consider very carefully whether we should give the same power to railway companies. The argument of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is against all expropriations where only small values are involved. It would apply to every case of expropriation in which the value did not represent such an amount as would make it worth while to the owner to employ counsel. We are expropriating small properties every day in the week.

PRIVATE BILLS.

WINDING LEDGES POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. MacKINNON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Winding Ledges Power and Boom Company.—Mr. Costigan.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that this Bill be read the second time, and that it be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills ?

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Bill should go in the usual way to the Committee on Railways and Canals, where all similar Bills have, up to the present, gone. I merely make the suggestion as I know that Bills of that character have heretofore gone to this committee.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Has it been the practice to refer Bills of this nature to the Railway and Canals Committee? There can be no objection, but I do not think it is the custom.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. I am only speaking from what I understand has been the practice. I know that the Bill of the Grand Falls Power Company, asking the right to build a dam and to construct booms at Grand Falls was sent to the Committee on Railways and Canals and that when an extension of power was asked by the company the Bill went to that same committee which discussed it very fully. These Bills asking for certain powers under the Railway Act have always gone to that committee, I know.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask if this is the Bill a very large deputation is coming from New Brunswick to oppose?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. Then I object to the Bill going through until it is printed in English and French.

Mr. SPEAKER. We established the rule last year in regard to Private Bills that if they are not printed in French and if there is an objection to their being proceeded with, we must observe the rule requiring them to stand. In regard to this Bill the point of order is well taken. The Bill stands.

Order allowed to stand.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 8) to amend the Expropriation Act.—The Minister of Justice.

On section 2,

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with very close attention this afternoon to the debate which was very largely confined to the legal gentlemen in this House. It had more the character of a legal argument than that of an ordinary parliamentary debate, and I may feel some little fear of being classed with those individuals who sometimes step in where angels fear to tread in venturing upon a legal argument. However, I paid as close attention as I could and listened very closely for one argument which I thought was very essential to be advanced by the promoters of this Bill, and which I listened for in vain and that was the reason why legislation of this character was called for, to what extent, where and when the public interests had been so seriously prejudiced for lack of the extension of the expropriation powers which are asked for in this Bill. It is true that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) presented a very strong, voluble and vigorous argument in defence of the powers of expropriation exercised by the government, a principle that is conceded and which is well understood in this country, one that we all understand to be the law of the country and which we believe is a very great concession by the people who are willing to subserve their own private interests for the public welfare, and I think the sense of the House will concede that this ought to be enough, that it is sufficient and ought to be sufficient and as much as should be asked for by this government or any government. But, when they are asked to make such a large extension of it as is asked for in this Bill, we must call a halt and we must call upon ourselves and the government to step cautiously and carefully before arousing a strong public sentiment, a public prejudice in a matter of this kind. I said just now that we conceded the right of the government to expropriate property if the public interest demands it, but so far the promoters of this Bill have failed to show to any extent that the public interests are prejudiced for lack of this extension of the expropriation powers. During this afternoon the Minister of Railways repudiated the expression used by my hon. friend from Toronto with respect to the term 'option,' saying that the government were asking for power to expropriate options on private property. One of the strong arguments that he used was that the word 'option' did not occur in the Bill. Now, I am not a lawyer, and may not understand an argument of this kind, but it seems to me there was no necessity for using the word 'option' in order to express the principle. If I offer to my neighbour a piece of property and say: 'You may have this property for a certain sum of money any time within the next thirty days.' I do not think it is necessary for me to put into that offer the word 'option' in order to convey the idea that it is essentially an option that has been given to him. There is nothing in the position taken by the Minister of Railways that the power of expropriating options in private property is not contained in the Bill, because the Bill certainly does contain that principle.

Now, as I have already said, the hon. gentleman and his friends have failed to show to what extent, if any, the public interests are prejudiced by the lack of these extended powers. I think this proposition is a very serious invasion of private rights, and one that is likely, if put into practice, to lead to interminable litigation, vexatious in character and unsatisfactory to the public at large. More than that, it is one that is capable of very extensive abuse by the agents of any government that may be in power. I think it has been clearly established during this debate that the public interests are very well served and protected by the law as it now stands, and that the invasion of private rights to any further extent in this direction would arouse a good deal of feeling in this country. If it became known that any man's farm, any man's homestead, whether in town or country, was liable to be invaded in consequence of this Bill, certainly it would arouse a grave feeling of disquiet, and create uncertainty in the tenure of real estate of any kind. All the requirements of the public interest are sufficiently served by the law we now have. It does appear to some persons that this Bill is not being promoted in the public interest, but it is brought in to benefit some private individuals, and the promoters of the Bill have not had sufficient candour to state their object plainly to the House. But if such is not the object, I see no sufficient reason in the public interest to grant these extended powers to the government that are asked for in this Bill.

3. The fact of such abandonment or revesting should be taken into account in estimating or assessing the amount to be paid to any person claiming compensation for the land taken.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved to insert after the word 'account' the words 'in connection with the other circumstances of the case.'

Amendment agreed to.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE moved that another clause be added as clause 6, to read as follows:

That nothing herein contained should affect any pending interest or claim.

He said: This is to make it absolutely clear that the Bill will not be retroactive, as I promised to do before recess.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported.

JUDGES' RETIRING ALLOWANCES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved:

That Bill (No. 7) to amend chapter 138 of the revised statutes with respect to retiring allowances of judges be dropped from the order paper.

He said: It is intended to bring this Bill up in another form.

Motion agreed to.

THE PUBLICATION OF THE STATUTES.

Bill (No. 11) to amend the Act respecting the publication of the statutes (the Minister of Justice), read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

On Section 1.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Under the law as it exists, when you apply for a copy of a Bill to the clerk of parliament, you are obliged to pay 10 cents per folio of 100 words. In the case of a long Bill like the Bill to amend the Railway Act, or the Criminal Code, this charge becomes excessive. The amendment provides that after you pay $2 to the clerk for his certificate, then you have to pay the actual cost of printing and no more.

Mr. SPROULE. Will there be any saving in the case of short Bills when you have to pay the $2 anyway.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This Bill is introduced at the suggestion of the clerk himself, who finds that the charge has been excessive, and that many persons who apply for Bills have complained.

Mr. HENDERSON. I always thought that when the Bill was signed by the King's printer there could be no stronger certificate as to its accuracy.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The law is that you have to apply to the clerk for a certificate that that is the Bill introduced which was in parliament.

Mr. LANCASTER. It could be left optional with the applicant whether he wanted the certificate or not.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There are dozens of Bills that can be had for nothing, but it is only in case he requires the certificate of the clerk that he pays for it. The law is so very old that I do not wish to change it.

Bill reported; read the third time and passed.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT—AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 13) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act. He said: This is intended merely to arrange for the place of trial. At the present time the trial of an election petition may take place either in the electoral district in which it arises or in the chef-lieu of the district or vice versa, and there are times when that may become convenient. The second amendment proposes that the judges shall have the right to issue a bench warrant for a witness to appear. At the present time the only proceeding is by way of contempt and it is very unsatisfactory. What is wanted is that the witness should be compelled to attend.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE moved that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to study this Bill a little before it goes through the committee stage. Has there been any suggestion from the judges with regard to this.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes; from the chief justice of Manitoba. It is for the convenience of the judges and the witnesses. It enables the judges to move to where the witnesses are instead of bringing the witnesses to the place provided for the trial at present.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I realize the force of that, but I wish an opportunity to consider whether it may not operate as a hardship some times. Of course I know we must leave a good deal to the judges in that regard.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It was represented that it was intended for convenience and for the purpose of reducing expenses.

The House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill and then rose and reported.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Hon. Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Dominion public buildings, Ontario—renewals, improvements, repairs, &c., $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. James Sutherland). This vote is to carry out works of repairs and renewals not covered by the general appropriation made by parliament and undertaken in the fiscal year 1903-4. I do not suppose my hon. friends will want me to read the whole list.

Mr. SPROULE. You might read it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Most of the items are very small. The largest are: Belleville, $2,170; Berlin, $178; Brampton, $14; Brockville, $604; Chatham, $704—something in connection with the water pipes.

Mr. CLANCY. Who is the person in charge at Chatham?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think the work was let by contract. I forget the name.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works whether his attention has been called to the state of the new Railway Committee room? The ceiling has been discoloured, I suppose because the roof leaks. It is a pity that a fine room like that should be spoiled because of a leaky roof.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My attention has not been called to it. I shall be glad to make inquiries.

Fort William public building, $22,300.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to complete the public building being erected at Fort William. The contract was let on the 22nd of July last. The amount of the contract was $20,400. $5,000 has been voted before. The total expenditure estimated by the architect is $27,551.61.

Mr. CLANCY. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the contract was considerably less than the sum voted. What is the balance for?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The balance is for the fittings and furnishings, including the letter boxes, $3,500; the heating, $1,400; the wiring and electric light fixtures, $500; incidental and travelling expenses, $200.

Mr. SPROULE. Did you get the site for nothing?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, a site free of cost to the Crown was given by the city corporation.

Mr. BROCK. Is the fitting up of the letter boxes not usually done by the postmaster, who receives the revenue from them?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It depends on the size of the office. Probably in an office of this size the receipts would be divided.

Mr. SPROULE. What rule do you follow in regard to fitting up these offices or leaving the postmasters to fit them up ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have never known a case of a post office being built and the postmaster fitting it up. In an office of this kind, I think the postmaster will receive 50 per cent of the revenue.

Of course it is as broad as it is long. The postmaster's salary is fixed on the percentage of the revenue and in some cases a percentage is allowed him on receipts from the boxes.

Mr. SPROULE. In all cases where the postmaster furnishes the boxes himself, he gets all the revenue from them ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Where there is a public building, does the postmaster not get salary instead of percentage ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I find that where the post office is declared to be a city office the postmaster gets a salary. In other cases he gets a percentage.

Mr. SPROULE. Who is the contractor, and was the contract given to the lowest tenderer ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contractor is Robert Campbell, of Almonte, and his was the lowest tender.

Mr. SPROULE. Was any application made to the department by the town to furnish a site ? Or did they voluntarily offer the site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That happened some considerable time before I was in the department. The building is on ground belonging to the corporation.

Mr. SPROULE. In some cases the town furnishes the site and in other cases the government pays for the site. It seems to me that all places should be treated alike. Where an application is made for a post office, the town should be called on to furnish the site. It is not fair that in one case the government should pay for a site and in another the town should furnish it.

Guelph—public building, addition to, $21,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For many years the accommodation for the public has been altogether too small. I asked the chief architect to visit Guelph himself and look carefully into the present requirements and a little to the future, so that we might not be called upon to again make any additions. He found that the lowest estimate he could make would come to something over $21,000. I found that to make a temporary addition would not give the public satisfaction and that we should soon be called upon to make further improvements, so that the report of the chief architect was adopted. It will cost us this amount to complete the work. This expenditure is very well warranted from the revenues received from the government at that city. The postal revenue is $25,000, and the customs over $113,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the inland revenue office in the same building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not prepared to answer that question as my officer has not put into this memorandum the revenue from inland revenue.

Mr. HENDERSON. Have tenders been called for or has the contract been let ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think the contract has been let, but tenders have been called for.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is understood there Mr. Kennedy has the contract.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Now that my hon. friend mentions the name, I believe that Mr. Kennedy was the lowest tenderer.

Mr. SPROULE. What will the building cost in full ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not the cost of the original building. That was begun in 1874 and completed in 1877.

Mr. SPROULE. What will the present addition cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will cost $30,000. Nine thousand dollars were spent last year, and $21,000 are required this year, which makes $30,000. The contract is not yet let. We advertised for tenders, and I remember that the tenders came before the deputy minister and myself, and the amount was something over $27,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did the government own the site on which the addition is being erected ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Public works—chargeable to income, public buildings, Ontario—Kingston military buildings, stable accommodation for field battery, $5,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vote has been taken several times, I believe. A demand was made a number of years ago for suitable accommodation for the field battery, Royal Canadian Artillery. They want a stable for forty horses. There has been great difficulty about the site, but that has now been purchased at $5,000, which is represented to us as a very reasonable price. Later on I intend to ask the House for a vote for the erection of the stable. The plans have been drawn for a wooden building one story high and about 150 feet long by 25 feet wide.

Mr. SPROULE. This has no connection with the military college ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, this is for the field battery, Royal Canadian Artillery.

Mr. CLARKE. Part of the permanent force ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. The conclusion of the inquiry made was that if we were to maintain this force, we must have stables for the horses. The present conditions are very unsatisfactory.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the whole expected to cost ? There was a vote of $5,000 last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That was voted several years, I believe, but it was not used. The difficulty was to procure a suitable site. One has been secured at $5,000 which is satisfactory to the military college, the citizens and the permanent corps. It was originally held at $8,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the size if it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot give the exact size, but it is a good big piece of land.

Mr. SPROULE. From whom was it purchased ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think from a widow, a Mrs. Garvin.

Mr. SPROULE. This does not look to be exactly a business like way of doing it. It is usual, when the House is to be committed to an expenditure to give us the means of judging what the whole is likely to be, and not call upon us year after year for several small sums.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) but the circumstances in this case are peculiar, the work having been delayed owing to the difficulty of procuring a site. But I have given the nature of the building and I should think it could be built for about $6,000. That is an estimate of my own. But I think the chief architect would agree with me.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose in the absence of better information we must take what we get.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before we go on with the next item I wish to ask one or two questions with regard to the Cobourg armoury, for which $8,000 was voted last night just as we were about to adjourn, but with the understanding that further questions might be asked with regard to it. I wish to know whether the government is buying that site or whether the town is giving it; and, if the government is buying it, what is the price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand we have a drill hall there which is not satisfactory as to site. It is the intention of the government to dispose of that property and build in a more suitable place. The site has been bought for $4,000.

Mr. LANCASTER. The town is not doing anything towards a site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. What will the Cobourg armoury cost when completed ? With this vote, you will have $20,000 at your disposal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The original estimate was $15,000 but since that time the headquarters of the Durham Field Battery have moved to Cobourg. This makes it necessary to provide more accommodation in the armoury. But the amount voted we expect will complete the work.

Mr. SPROULE. And give accommodation to the battery as well as—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As well as to the 40th battalion.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the old armoury been sold ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. OSLER. What is the reason of the changing of the site ? Surely, in a town like Cobourg, the question of a site is not so important as to make it advisable to put up a new building. What is the reason for buying a new site when the government has the old one ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because the old one was not suitable for the purpose either in location or in size.

Mr. OSLER. But in a town like Cobourg, surely there is not such great difference between one site and another.

Mr. SPROULE. Was there not something behind that ? I think there was some discussion about this last year, and I thought then there was a nigger in the fence somewhere. I think we ought to get some further information about this, and I suggest that it be allowed to stand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The request was made to the Department of Public Works by the Department of Militia. I am aware that the local officers were a long time asking for the accommodation. I have no knowledge of any local differences of any kind, or that there is any objection to a settlement. I understand from the Militia Department that everything is satisfactorily settled.

London drill hall and armoury, $60,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site has been purchased and is 252 feet on Dundas street, and 120 feet on Grenville street. It is to be constructed of brick, with stone dressing on a stone basis.

Mr. OSLER. Is there a drill hall there now ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The deputy minister informs me that he doesn't think there is.

Mr. OSLER. You do not know; but supposing there is one.

Mr. HYMAN. There was a drill hall constructed in 1872, which got out of repair and became practically useless. Besides, the site of the old hall was not conveniently situated, and was altogether too small.

Mr. LANCASTER. From whom was the site bought ?

Mr. HYMAN. I fancy the site was bought from eight or ten different people who owned different portions of this land.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have a memorandum that the site was purchased from seven different parties, and I will give the hon. gentleman the names : The Dominion Savings and Loan Company, Mr. Caravella, Mr. McKellar, Mr. Fraser, Mr. Crouch and Miss Durkin. The total cost was $5,507. The total cost estimated to complete is $175,000 to $180,000, including the site.

Mr. OSLER. I think a city like London ought to have a good drill shed, and if the old site was not large enough the new one should be larger. In the case of Toronto, we paid a large amount towards buying the site before we could get the government to entertain the idea of building a drill shed. I think the same rule ought to apply to all cities. The Toronto building is in proportion to the size of the city, still I do not think it cost as much as it is proposed to spend in London. I am inclined to be very liberal with all these expenditures for drill halls, but I think the same principle ought to apply to all the cities. I do not begrudge the expenditure at all, but I want to see all treated alike.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think it would be good policy on the part of the country to build these drill sheds on a somewhat less costly plan, and have good headquarters in all the counties for the militia. It is true that in the large cities they require a great deal of accommodation, and the buildings are expensive. I think the building in Toronto cost between $300,000 and $400,000. Even yet I know from applications I have received lately from the Militia Department that the local corps complain that they have not all the accommodation that they require. I believe the Militia Department are considering a policy of providing accommodation on plans that will call for very much less money than we are expending now.

Mr. OSLER. Toronto paid $150,000 for the site.

Mr. HENDERSON. I fail to see any reason why municipalities should be called upon to furnish the site for public buildings of this character. To my mind it is the duty of the government not only to furnish the building but the site. As a rule, I have no sympathy with the idea that municipalities should tax themselves to furnish the site of any public building. In the present case I have a pretty fair recollection that when this building was first proposed to be erected we had strong assurances from the Minister of Public Works that the cost would not exceed $100,000, and quite a lengthy debate took place at the time the first vote was given. I see that some $14,000 were expended prior to the 1st of July last, some $10,000 were voted last year, which I presume will be expended before the 30th of June coming. Now we are asked for an additional $60,000. Those sums alone would be somewhere within the estimate given us by the Minister of Public Works when he first asked for an appropriation for this building. I confess I am astonished now to find that the architect was so far wide of the mark in his first estimate that he now tells us he will want from $160,000 to $175,000, about $75,000 more than the original estimate. But this is not the only occasion that similar mistakes have been made. From year to year this House is led to vote money for public buildings on the assurance that the cost will be limited to a certain amount. But, before these buildings are completed, we find that in many instances the construction of the buildings costs from 50 to 100 per cent more than was originally contemplated. Now, the objection I take to it is this : I am not so particular whether that building costs $150,000 or $175,000—the country can afford it—but I do protest against this principle of engineers and deputy ministers spending the money of this country contrary to the wishes of this House. We are the men who should say how much money should be expended. We are, as a matter of fact, not the men. It is the officials of the government, not the ministers—they do not control it—but they allow their officials to control the whole of this expenditure and I say the sooner we stop that system the better. I do not believe in coming here and taking the responsibility for the expenditure of money in this country year after year when practically the entire expenditure on these public buildings is brought about, not by the minister who is supposed to be responsible to parliament, but by his deputy or by his other officials. I think the ministers should draw the line, and when they come and say to this House that a building is not going to cost more than a certain sum their officers should be instructed to make an estimate within that amount. That was the tenor of the discussion which took place two years ago when this building was first spoken of and it was the distinct understanding at that time that the engineer should get his instructions that the building should be erected and completed for a sum not to exceed $100,000. Who is responsible for this over-expenditure ? Is it the minister, or is it the department, or is it the chief engineer, or some other official of the government ? I say that the time has come when we should protest and I intend to protest against it in every instance when the officials of any department undertake to spend the money of this country and compel parliament to vote it. If we are to be responsible for the expenditure of money then I say let us have the fixing of the amount and not the officials of the government as has been the practice year after year. I enter this protest and I intend to repeat it in every case where the same thing occurs. So long as the minister has assumed the responsibility himself and has the responsibility I have not much to say, but when I know, as in this case, it is the officials of the department and not the minister, then I say, we ought to enter a strong protest against it and see that a stop is put to it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Chairman, I may say that I am in full sympathy with the position taken by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I hope he will not have on many occasions to protest as far as I am concerned. In this particular case I am satisfied that the minister was perfectly frank and candid in his figures as to the cost. So that no member of the committee would have reason to complain when asking for this vote for $60,000. I requested the chief architect to make a complete estimate so far as possible so that I might announce to the committee what the entire cost of this building will be. My hon. friend knows that it has been the practice to ask for a vote for a portion of the money required and then to come back to parliament and get more to complete the work. It is not my intention to do that in this case so far as I can avoid it. It is my intention to do what the hon. member suggests ; that is to ask the engineer, or the architect of the department to give me a carefully prepared estimate and to announce this to the House. I can quite understand that in many of these cases it is unnecessary to vote the full amount of the money required in one session for the simple reason that we all know and well know that it sometimes takes two or three years, even when reasonable progress is made by the contractor, to complete the work. But, I agree with the hon. gentleman that if there is one thing that parliament is entitled to, it is that when work is undertaken a fair, and straightforward estimate of the total cost should be given. So far as I am concerned I intend to carry out that policy.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am obliged, indeed to the hon. minister for his very frank statement and I presume that he will endeavour to carry out that principle, but he has missed my main point. I have a very distinct recollection, and I think it is the recollection of the other members of the committee, that we were assured that this building would not exceed in cost $100,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I admit that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to know how in the world it is going to cost $175,000. Who is responsible for that ? I do not think that the cost of material, or the cost of labour has increased in any such ratio as 75 per cent in all. I fear very much that the officers of the department have full liberty to draw such plans as they think fit and that they are the men, and not the ministers, who actually fix the price to be paid for the completion of a building. We have no control over it because we have no control over these officers. If the minister allows his officers to go on and draw plans of a building that will cost 75 per cent more than parliament is given to understand it would cost, how are we going to put a stop to it ? We cannot say now : Let us stop the construction of this building. It has been started on that principle, and will have to be completed on that principle, but I do trust that a closer watch will be kept and that when a pledge is given to parliament in regard to the cost of the building the minister will see that his engineer, his architect, and those who seem to me to have control of the expenditure will not overstep reasonable bounds and will keep somewhere near the limit fixed by parliament.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Would the hon. gentleman allow me one word of explanation ? It was out of my desire to give the full cost that the amount stated appears to be more than it should. The building itself will cost $133,000. It was in carrying out the very policy that the hon. gentleman advocated, and of which I am in favour, that I insisted that the architect should give full details as to the amount that would be required to complete everything in connection with the building and I am giving the committee now the full and complete cost including fittings, furniture, boilers, ventilation, fencing, electric wiring, and everything connected therewith. I am giving the committee, as far as the architect has prepared under my instruction, the full amount required. Of course I am not asking for the full amount for all these purposes now because hon. gentlemen know that the balance will have to be asked for later, but to arrive at what may be considered a complete estimate I have brought this further information.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to say that this is another illustration of what we have over and over again here. When it was contemplated to put up this building had the House been told that it was going to cost $181,000, I have no doubt the House would have hesitated before consenting to authorize this expenditure, but on the ground that it would only cost $100,000 the House somewhat reluctantly and after a lengthy debate consented to it. That was the commencement of an expenditure which at the outset was said to be $100,000. We had scarcely got into the work when the expenditure began to creep up and within two years it had almost doubled. Are there not reasonable grounds for complaint that there is something wrong with the architect, with the government, or with somebody. Would this House have consented to going on with this building if it knew in the first place that it would ultimately cost $181,000—I am not talking here for pastime or for the purpose of obstructing; I am protesting against a growing evil and I think the Minister of Public Works should give me his attention instead of speaking to his friends around him.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I beg your pardon, I was speaking to the deputy minister.

Mr. SPROULE. It is only when the House knows what the total cost to complete will be that it can intelligently pledge the resources of the country for a vote of this kind. This building will cost twice as much as was intended originally and we find the same thing over and over again with regard to these public works and public buildings. It is an improper system and should be put an end to. I am obliged to disagree to some extent with my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) as to the propriety of towns and cities paying a share of the cost in the way of furnishing a site or paying portion of the cost of a site for these buildings. Public buildings embellish a town or city and confer a benefit on it, and I do not think there is any injustice done if the town or city is asked to pay a fair share of the cost. But whether that principle is right or not, the fact that Toronto contributes $150,000 for a building which costs $300,000, and that London does not pay a cent towards the building which is to cost $181,000, seems to be very unfair towards Toronto. There should be some fixed principle. Let it be either that nothing should be contributed or that each place should contribute a certain proportion. All should be served alike. As my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler) has pointed out, Toronto has just grounds for complaint at this discrimination. I am not complaining of the present Minister of Public Works, because I think he shows a commendable desire to give all the information he can, but I do say that when he asks an initial vote for a public work he should be able to tell the House what the entire cost of it will be so that the House may form a correct judgment on it.

Mr. CLARKE. I agree with my colleague from Toronto that when an armoury is to be erected in a town a good building should be put up. I find no fault with the expenditure of a reasonable sum for this purpose in the city of London. The objection taken on this side is, that so to speak, the House has been hypnotized into approving of this building by the inaccurate statement made at first as to what the ultimate cost would be. We are not holding the present Minister of Public Works responsible for that. The principle laid down by the hon. members for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is one that cannot be controverted. Those who pay the piper should be able to choose the music. It is not fair to the House that it should be told a building will cost $75,000 or $100,000 when the fact is that it will take double that amount to complete. Now, I want to draw the attention of the minister to the oft told tale that while the city of Toronto contributed $150,000 to purchase the site for the Toronto drill shed, that drill shed is not yet completed. Representations have been made again and again to the department. I have myself raised my voice in my own humble way in this House to urge upon the minister in all fairness that the additional drill hall accommodation required in Toronto should be provided. I commend the matter to the serious consideration of the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sutherland). It is not unreasonable to ask that the armoury should be completed. I would remind the minister that in addition to what else we have done, the city of Toronto has provided accommodation for the military stores. The city will be ready to give accommodation for any of the military stores in any of the municipal buildings, but surely a drill shed is the proper place for these stores. A last word to the minister. I hope that he will bring down in the supplementary estimates a vote to complete the original plan of the drill shed in order to give the needed accommodation to the garrison at Toronto.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The matter has not been brought to my attention before, and I am not familiar with the details of it. but I have made a memorandum and will look into it.

Mr. CLARKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. Was the contract for the London building let by tender.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was let to the lowest tenderer for $133,-

897. I am afraid I will have to retort to my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) and complain that he is talking to the hon. gentleman behind him while I am giving this information.

Mr. SPROULE. When is the building going to be finished ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. December, 1904, is in the contract.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any danger that the price will be increased between now and then.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I explained to the House that this is a carefully prepared estimate, including everything that would be required for the building.

Rideau Hall—drainage, $3,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the Minister of Public Works ever thought of building a new hall, or will he keep on for ever repairing the old building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I must say that officially I have not given the matter any attention. I do wish something could be done to stop these large expenditures from year to year. But this I am given to understand is a very necessary work. The drain at present empties into the Ottawa river. It was choked up, and the odour from it was very offensive.

Mr. SPROULE. Where does it empty now ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Into the city sewage system.

Mr. SPROULE. Will this complete the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, the total cost is $10,647.

Mr. SPROULE. Was the work let by tender ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. A portion of the work was done by the city, for which the city was paid. The balance was done by day's work under officers of the department.

Mr. SPROULE. When was this work commenced ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last summer. It will be completed in a short time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the length of the sewer ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. 2,065 feet. My hon. friend must remember that the work had to be done by blasting through the rock.

Toronto Custom House—underpinning walls, $10,000.

Mr. KEMP. Will the minister please explain the nature of that work ?

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I suppose the great majority of the members of the Committee are familiar with the splendid building we have in Toronto. It was reported to the department that the piles on which the building was originally constructed were decayed, and that there was danger of the building falling down. The chief architect of the department made a careful examination, and came to the conclusion that this was correct; and the work seemed to be so necessary and so urgent for the preservation of the building, that I took the responsibility of ordering it to be commenced. This is one of the cases in which it is somewhat difficult for any one to estimate at the beginning just what the total cost will be. The chief architect estimates, however, that it will be between $15,000 and $20,000. The work is done in sections, six feet of the wall being taken down at a time and reconstructed. The timbers are cut away down below the water line where they are decayed, and a new foundation built up of hard brick set in cement. It is a somewhat dangerous work. I may say, as I may be criticised afterwards, that I ascertained who the original contractors on the building were, and as they were responsible and reliable men who could be depended on, I authorized the chief architect to make an arrangement with them to do this work. If I had let it by tender to other contractors, and a mistake were made, there would be great danger of a valuable building being lost.

Mr. CLARKE. What are the names of the contractors ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Brown & Love.

Mr. KEMP. Is it the main building or the examining warehouse ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The custom house itself.

Mr. CLARKE. I understand that no tender was asked for, but that you gave the work to Brown & Love without tender ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They gave a price, and it was agreed on between them and the chief architect under my authority. I did not ask for any other tender.

Mr. CLARKE. Who supervises the work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The architect's name is Mr. Curry.

Mr. KEMP. Has the minister had any application from the officers at Toronto looking to the enlargement of the buildings there, or are they considered large enough for the work at the present time ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have had applications from all over the Dominion for increased accommodation, including Toronto. I have not been able to inform myself of the necessity that may exist in Toronto, but will look into it at the earliest moment.

Mr. CLARKE. Did the architect, Mr. Curry, recommend that this work should be given to Brown & Love without tender?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. When the matter was discussed between the chief architect and myself, he looked up the papers and ascertained that Brown & Love were the original contractors. The architect was appointed afterwards, when it was decided that that was the best mode of proceeding with the work.

Mr. SPROULE. On what principle is the work done? Is it at a schedule price?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. The price was agreed on between the chief architect, the contractors and the department at so much per foot.

Mr. SPROULE. What are you paying per foot?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not here the figures which were agreed upon.

Mr. CLARKE. I suppose there will be no difficulty about bringing down the correspondence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No objection at all. I was very sorry to know that there was a danger of the building falling down. It was an extreme case, and I thought this was the best way to proceed.

Mr. CLARKE. The firm of Brown & Love are certainly good contractors, there is no doubt of that. They have a very high and enviable reputation. There are other firms, of course. We would like to know what price has been agreed on with them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have to take the responsibility of ordering the work to be proceeded with on the recommendation of the chief architect; and I thought it was much safer and cheaper to have it done by the men who had originally erected the building than to take new men. We will not put more on it than necessary to make the building safe. The architect has examined as closely as he could. When they come to cutting these piles they must continue the work until the building is safe.

Mr. SPROULE. The architect ought to be able to come to some conclusion now as to the repairs which have to be made.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have given the detailed description of the work to be done. We are asking for $15,000 and hope that that will do the work.

Mr. SPROULE. They must have done most of the expensive work or as much foundation work as would enable them to tell how they have to finish it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect states that this will complete the work. If it does not, he will be able to give very satisfactory explanation why.

Toronto—Dominion public buildings—renewals, repairs, &c., $8,000.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. minister allow this item to stand and also the one that follows, Toronto post office. I have been requested to ask that these two items stand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am quite agreeable.

Items allowed to stand.

Toronto Junction—public building, $15,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to provide a building for post office and customs purposes. The total estimated cost is $38,135. That includes the site and the building, as well as the fitting, heating, lighting, &c.

Mr. CLANCY. What did the site cost and how much will the building cost, and the heating, fitting and lighting?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site cost $4,500. Including all expenses, $4,625. I need not give the estimated cost of the building, heating and fitting as I have already read the particulars.

Mr. CLANCY. From whom was the site bought?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site was purchased from the Real Estate Loan Company of Canada, limited.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the contract been let?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Then this is just an estimate. There is one pleasant feature about this. When the hon. member for that riding was running his election, he and his friends gave the word that if he were elected, there would be a good post office put up, and now the government are redeeming their promise. It is so unusual to see this government redeem any of their promises that I cannot but help giving them credit in this instance. Whether the transaction might be considered bribery or not, I am not going to discuss. Toronto Junction requires a post office and should get it. No doubt the site was bought from some very good friend of the government. I do not know whether the government paid double its value or not, but they probably paid a good round figure. They will no doubt follow that up by giving the contract to one of their friends, but I would advise them not to give it at too high a figure and then ask us next year for an additional sum to complete or they may expect much more severe criticism.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The site was bought at a very reasonable price, $75 a foot for 60 feet on Dundas street and 130 feet on King street. It is one of the best sites in the whole town of Toronto Junction. Toronto Junction, as everybody knows is growing rapidly. It has a population of nearly 7,000. The post office receipts are nearly $5,000 a year, and the customs about $60,000 a year. This all appears under the head of Toronto, as Toronto Junction is an outport of that city. The present post office is very small and the amount they are paying for rent for the present post office and also for the customs will pay a reasonable sum on the cost of the building.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the government paying for rent ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it is $150 a year for the post office.

Mr. SPROULE. How much for the customs ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. For two rooms they are paying $20 a month. Four or five years ago rents were very low and they made an exceptionally good bargain renting the two rooms for $12 a month. But when the lease was to be renewed, rents had gone up and they had to pay $20 a month. I am sure that when the time expires again the rent will be still further advanced.

Mr. OSLER. These rents are a little more than three quarters of one per cent on the amount to be expended.

Mr. INGRAM. Last night I asked for a list of the papers in which tenders for the Clinton post office were advertised for.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Orders have been given to have a list prepared, and I shall be glad to send it to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram).

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I was not in my place when the minister gave details with regard to the Cobourg drill shed. Though a little out of order I ask leave to go back to that point. I wish to know if the Minister of Public Works has outlined any policy in relation to these drill sheds erected throughout the country. I think he should prepare some plan by which drill sheds could be erected at much reduced cost. In that way all the regiments could be provided for, but, at the present rate of going, and each drill shed costing a great deal of money, it will be years before the country will be anything like fully served with these sheds.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) had been present he would have heard me express my views on that subject. Of course, the policy with regard to these matters rests largely with the Militia Department. I expressed my personal view that every battalion should be provided with a good building for headquarters, and, that to that purpose we should try to reduce the cost of the buildings to some extent. I am not complaining about the cost that has already been incurred in some of the large cities. But I think we should provide in the counties good substantial buildings at the least possible cost as headquarters for these battalions.

Mr. THOMSON (North Grey). The hon. member for West York (Mr Campbell) gives as a reason for the construction of a public building at a cost of $35,000 for postal purposes in Toronto Junction, that the post office receipts last year were $5,000. I may say that, in Owen Sound the receipts of the post office are about $15,000, while the customs collects $40,000. Yet we have no public building. The rents paid by the government for buildings used in connection with the customs, post office and inland revenue, amount to $965 a year, which, capitalized at 3 per cent would give about $30,000. Reference was made the other evening to the promise made to the electors in the recent by-election that there would be a public building put up in Owen Sound. I merely submit these figures to the Minister of Public Works, and hope that it will enable him to see his way clear to put a sum in the supplementary estimates, so that we may have a building there adequate to the business of the town and of a character creditable to the government.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have to be consistent. As I have spoken of the necessity of a public building in Owen Sound, I can express my sympathy with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thomson) in agitating for this expenditure. But, of course he would not expect me to make a promise, because that would be unconstitutional. Though I am not very anxious to be in the government, I would rather leave of my own accord than be kicked out. If I were to announce anything not in accordance with the constitution the hon. gentleman knows what would happen. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the case will have every consideration when it comes up.

Mr. SPROULE. All over the country there seems to be drill sheds which are going out of repair. The government are doing nothing to preserve them. The hon. Minister of Public Works speaks of intending to provide headquarters for the different regiments, but how about retaining the buildings already in existence ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not say we were going to provide headquarters ; but I stated my personal opinion in favour of that policy. In many cases, the rural battalions have quarters. The policy has been recommended to the militia department, and, I believe, is being carried out to some extent, of providing comparatively cheap buildings, but many of them, so that our accoutrements, rifles, etc., may be better taken care of than at present and greater encouragement given to the young men to join. The buildings referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) are under the management of the Militia Department. We are getting more expensive arms and accoutrements, and it will be a saving to the country to provide buildings where they can be kept free from injury.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The drawback to the old system was that the municipalities paid half the cost of these buildings and had the use of them. It was very convenient for the town, but it was inconvenient to the militia companies to have their armouries almost open to the public.

Mr. SPROULE. Several buildings in my own county are going to rack. Nothing seems to be done to repair them. I have always thought there ought to be some headquarters for these militia companies, and if these buildings are too expensive, smaller and less expensive ones should be provided. Take the case of Flesherton, I do not think the municipality has any interest in the building there, and it is all going to rack. If it is government property the government ought to take care of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It may be there is some neglect. I will call the attention of the department to it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is a little matter I want to bring before the attention of the government, possibly the Department of Justice. I chanced this year to be coming down on the train from Edmonton to Winnipeg. There were four criminals on the train, being brought to Regina; one was a murderer, and the others were about as tough looking subjects as one could see anywhere. They were in charge of the police. These fellows rode first class; and on the same train there were about twenty young ladies who were coming to the normal school at Regina, and all the way they had to sit in seats adjoining those occupied by these criminals. I want to draw the attention of the government to the fact that I do not think the people of Canada are inclined to pay for criminals riding first-class. In Ontario our volunteers have to ride third-class, frequently in freight cars, when going to serve their country. I do not know whose business it is to look into this matter, but I trust that the coming Prime Minister will take note of it, and give it his serious consideration.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. When he comes in.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 30, 1903.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PETITIONS REJECTED.

Mr. SPEAKER. Two of the petitions presented to the House this day asked aid in subsidies from the government. They are consequently contrary to Rule 86, and can not be received.

The petitions were rejected.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. L. N. CHAMPAGNE (Wright) presented the first report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House during the present session, as follows :—

Your committee recommend that their quorum be reduced from eight to five members.

L. N. CHAMPAGNE,
Chairman.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 50) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway.—Mr. Morrison.

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the North-west Bank of Canada.—Mr. Scott.

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company.—Mr. Demers (St. Jean-Iberville).

INSOLVENCY.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 53) respecting Insolvency. He said: I may say at once to the House that this is the same Bill that was introduced in 1898 by Mr. Fortin, the former member for Laval, now judge of the Superior Court. At that time I took some interest in the measure, and was a member of the committee that was struck for the purpose of studying it and making a report upon it. I think it would be a pity that the measure should fall, for the reason principally that it was submitted to all the boards of trade of this country, and was approved by them all with the exception of the board of trade of Winnipeg, which for some reason or other refrained from giving the Bill its express approbation. Under these circumstances, the Bill, as framed at that time, met the requirements of all the different provinces of the Dominion. At the present moment there is a great demand for uniform legislation throughout the Dominion on this important subject, and it is with that view that I am re-introducing the Bill. I will give further explanations when it comes up for its second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF ONTARIO.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to direct the attention of the House to the present situation in Ontario ; and, in order that I may put myself within the rules of the House, I intend to conclude with a motion. In the Canada 'Gazette' of Saturday, the following announcement occurs :

Department of the Secretary of State of Canada.

His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to make the following appointments, viz.:

March 26, 1903.

The Honourable Charles Moss, Chief Justice of Ontario, to be the administrator of the province of Ontario for the purpose of assenting to such bills as may be required during the present session of the legislature of Ontario, of assenting to the Bills passed by such legislature at the close of the session ; and of proroguing the present session of the legislative assembly of Ontario.

I take this opportunity of asking the right hon. gentleman who leads the House to state to whom has been assigned the other high duties that are attached to the office of Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. The Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, like all other lieutenant governors, exercises other prerogatives of the Crown than those mentioned in the 'Gazette,' and so far as we know, they are left to some one else. Now, I believe that the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario is very ill, and somebody must be discharging those other duties. Let me point out from one of the authorities what is included in the other duties of the lieutenant governor. At page 30 of 'Confederation Law of Canada,' by Wheeler, it is stated :

The Executive Council of Ontario and of Quebec shall be composed of such persons as the Lieutenant Governor from time to time thinks fit.

and so on. A serious political crisis exists in the province of Ontario ; grave charges have been made against ministers of the Crown and are now under discussion in the Ontario legislature ; and in view of the fact that the government have confessed that the lieutenant governor is unable to discharge three of his duties, and have appointed somebody else to discharge them, I want to know who is discharging these other duties, and passing upon the fitness of the ministers of the Crown. Let me quote another authority, Mr. Goldwin Smith, who the other day made the following statement :

Mr. Ross, it has always been maintained in these columns, had much better after the general election have met without delay the legislature which he had called, taken a decisive vote, and thereupon made up his mind whether he was in a position to carry on the government. He preferred, as a matter of party tactics, to fight the battle out in the election courts, and in such by-elections as might ensue. He thereby manifestly exposed the province to a reign of intrigue and corruption, as well as to an extraordinary outburst of party rancour. He now sees the result. It is much worse for him than even a defeat upon an appeal to the legislature would have been. In that case he would at all events have retained the confidence and support of a united party. As it is, he is threatened with total wreck.

I am not raising a political question, but I want to show what Mr. Goldwin Smith's position is. He goes on to say :

The proper arbiter of the course to be taken by the ministers in such circumstances as these is the lieutenant governor. By him the ministers are appointed, and he is responsible to the province for their integrity. It is very unfortunate if, as is stated, he is incapacitated by sickness for the performance of his functions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have made out that the lieutenant governor has been considered by the Governor in Council here to be incompetent to discharge certain of his functions, and that there are other high functions which require to be discharged at this moment ; and I take this opportunity of asking the right hon. First Minister whether these other functions have been assigned to any one. I have not the slightest intention to reflect on his honour the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. I have the highest respect for him. I am rising here solely from a conception of my public duty. I think I speak for the people of Ontario, for constitutional practice, and for a majority of the members from Ontario of this House, without claiming to speak for them from a party point of view ; and I ask the Prime Minister to tell the House and the country what he is doing in connection with the present serious situation in the province of Ontario. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Some few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend sent me word that he intended to bring before the House the condition of the health of his honour the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. I would have much preferred that my hon. friend had agreed to the suggestion I made in reply, that he would defer doing so until tomorrow, on the motion to go into Committee of Supply. However, for reasons I shall not discuss, he did not see fit to accede to my request. One of the reasons which induced me to ask my hon. friend not to bring the question before the House at this moment was that if he had granted me the privilege I asked, I would have written at once to Sir Oliver Mowat for permission to read to the House a letter which I received from him, and which was the cause of the recommendation I made a few days ago to His Excellency to appoint an administrator for certain purposes. In the absence of such permission, there are in this letter some personal matters which I would not like to bring before the House, but if I may speak of the general tenor of the letter, it was a request for the appointment by His Excellency the Governor General of an administrator, who would give the necessary sanction to certain Bills this session and who would also prorogue parliament. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) asked me who is administering the other duties of the Lieutenant Governor. It seems to me there was no need for him to put such a question. Sir Oliver Mowat is the Lieutenant Governor of the province, and is administering all the duties of the office except those which he himself has asked to be assigned to another person. The reason why Sir Oliver Mowat asks that an administrator be appointed to give the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor to the Bills passed during the session and prorogue the session, which is not expected to last very long, is that he has been incapacitated by an accident, which he met with some days ago, which confines him to his room. Otherwise he is in good health and quite able to discharge, and is now discharging, the duties of his office. My hon. friend says that Sir Oliver Mowat is not able to discharge the duties of his office, that his health has incapacitated him from doing so. That is the language which my hon. friend used a moment ago, and I suppose he still stands by it. Well, I have the word of Sir Oliver Mowat himself, for whom my hon. friend says he has very great respect, that he is quite able to discharge all the duties of his office except those I have stated, and the inability to perform which is due solely to physical incapacity. Sir Oliver says that he is otherwise in good health. My hon. friend has told us that—and in this he voiced the opinion not only of the people of Ontario but of every Canadian that he has the greatest respect for Sir Oliver Mowat. We all have the same respect and when a man of the authority of Sir Oliver Mowat, when a man who commends to such a high degree the respect, confidence and admiration of the whole community, says he is quite able to administer all the duties of the office, it seems to me my hon. friend has in that statement an answer to the doubt he has expressed, and ought not to go any further, if indeed he has the respect for Sir Oliver Mowat which he professes to have. It seems to me that my hon. friend ought not to insist that Sir Oliver Mowat is not able to discharge the duties of his office, when he has the assurance of Sir Oliver himself that he considers himself quite able in every respect to discharge all the duties of his office except those which call for such physical exercise as to require him to move from one place to another.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Might I ask the date of that letter ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I really do not recollect, but it is within the last ten days. I am sorry that I have not the privilege of bringing it to the attention of the House, but if I remember aright, it was written within the past ten days. Under the circumstances what more can be said ? Sir Oliver Mowat had a fall on the stairs which injured his leg so that he cannot walk, and is therefore not in a condition to go to the House and sanction Bills or prorogue the House. That is why we appointed an administrator. Let me go further. This is the third time this matter has been brought to the attention of the House. Sir Oliver Mowat is Lieutenant Governor by virtue of the commission issued to him on the proper authority, that of the Dominion government. He can be removed to-day at will, but until last November he could not be removed except for cause. Had we renewed his commission, he would be in the same position. My hon. friend need not go far back for a precedent to which no objection was taken. Some few years ago, we objected to lieutenant governors being kept in office year after year without any renewal of their commissions, but no fault was ever found when a lieutenant governor was kept in office for some months longer than his actual term. Some few years ago, the late Sir George Kirkpatrick was appointed Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. He was sworn in on the 13th of May, 1892, and his five years term expired on the 13th of May, 1897. But he remained in office during the term of his natural life, or some six or seven months after his commission had expired. He was in very poor health, had undergone an operation, and it was well known he could not live much longer, but we did not chose to disturb him and left him in the enjoyment of the office which he held with the concurrence and respect of everybody in the province of Ontario. I would like to know why a different rule should be applied to Sir Oliver Mowat. Does he not enjoy to as high an extent the confidence of the people of Ontario as did his predecessor ? For all these reasons it seems to me that my hon. friend is not playing the best part he could. If I judge rightly the trend of public opinion, I am warranted in saying that if there is a man in whom the people of Ontario at this moment have confidence to guide them through the political crisis there existing, it is the man who has for so many years enjoyed to the fullest extent the confidence of that province.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). This side of the House, Mr. Speaker, as well as the other side, are extremely gratified to learn that the only reason for the appointment of an administrator for the province of Ontario are those assigned in the Canada 'Gazette.' If an administrator be required on account of the physical condition of his honour the Lieutenant Governor, the government were perfectly justified in acceding to Sir Oliver Mowat's request. We are all glad to learn from the right hon. gentleman that the alarming reports as to the mental and physical condition of his honour are incorrect and that he is only suffering at present from the physical disabilities which require the appointment of an administrator.

Mr. MONK. I have just heard my right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) say that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) is playing a part in the representations he has thought fit to make to the House and the government. Well, I have listened to my hon. friend from East York each time he has referred to this matter, and I am not aware of any remark he has made that would justify the right hon leader of the House in claiming that in the language used by my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) there was the slightest tinge of disrespect to the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. He took occasion to call attention to the inability of the Lieutenant Governor to fulfil the functions of his office at the present moment. On the last occasion, the Prime Minister contended that there was no such inability. But, as a matter of fact, all the remarks of my hon. friend from East York have been fully justified by the Order in Council which appeared in the Canada 'Gazette' last Saturday. What the hon. gentleman stated was absolutely true; it is impossible for the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, at this moment to fulfil some of the functions assigned to him, as shown by the fact that it has been found necessary to assign those functions to somebody else. Thus the stand taken by my hon. friend from East York is amply justified. What I wished particularly to point out, is this—that there seems to be, in my humble estimation, a mistake in this Order in Council. The government, if it had any authority for it's action, must find that authority in section 67 of the Confederation Act, which says:

> The Governor General in Council may from time to time appoint an administrator to execute the office and functions as lieutenant governor during his absence, illness, or other inability.

Now, what I submit to you, Sir, is this—that under that section, which must be construed strictly, the only thing which the Governor General of the Dominion can do is to appoint some one to fulfil the office of lieutenant governor. This gives pertinence to the remarks of my hon. friend from East York. It is within the power of this government to appoint somebody to fulfil the office of lieutenant governor entirely, and I question very much if, having complied with that section, the lieutenant governor himself can proceed in the execution of any of the duties assigned to him. Once the government of the Dominion has judged that there is in the case of a lieutenant governor, illness, absence, or other inability, this government may appoint some body to fulfil the office; but nobody, I think, will contend that it was possible for this government to appoint somebody under this section 67, which is the only one that applies, somebody, for instance, with power to dissolve the local legislature, of or somebody with power merely to give assent to Bills or to prorogue the legislature. Now, in this Order in Council, as I read it, there is an appointment made, not of somebody to fulfil the office of lieutenant governor in conformity of the terms of section 67, on account of the illness of the lieutenant governor, but there is only the appointment of somebody for the purpose of giving assent to Bills during the present session, of giving assent to Bills at the close of the session, and of proroguing of the present session. So that, really, the act of this government amounts to this—that the office of lieutenant governor is divided. There is a fragmentary authority left in the hands of the lieutenant governor and power is given to the chief justice to fulfil some of the functions of the lieutenant governor. I have not given the matter very careful consideration, but I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House that this action is ultra vires of the government of the Dominion. The only power they have is, in three specified cases mentioned in section 67, to vest, so to speak the office of lieutenant governor in some other person. But they cannot give to another person a portion of the authority of the lieutenant governor and leave him with his other attributes. I think ample authority can be found for that; and I think it is clear, at first sight, that this government has exercised a power which it has not.

The PRIME MINISTER. If I may be permitted, the point taken by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is one in which, I am bound to say there is some reason. But we were guided by the precedent created by Sir John Abbott in the case of Sir Alexander Campbell, who was incapacitated from performing certain duties. After communications between Sir John Abbott and Sir Oliver Mowat, then Prime Minister of Ontario, certain powers were given to administrators for certain limited purposes. We followed that precedent.

Mr. MONK. With the indulgence of the House, I would say that I think my right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is mistaken with regard to the case of Sir Alexander Campbell. In that case a very singular thing occurred; a deputy was appointed by the provincial government. If the House will allow me, I will quote from Clement's Canadian Constitution, which says:

> During the last illness of the late Lieutenant Governor Campbell, an Order in Council was passed appointing a deputy Lieutenant Governor, and this action on the part of the provincial government gave rise to considerable discussion. It is understood that the Attorney General of Ontario prepared a 'state paper' in support of this action of his government, but this we have not seen. A lieutenant governor standing, as he does in the same relation to the government of a province as the Governor General does in relation to the government of the Dominion—has vested in him the appointment of all subordinate executive officers throughout the province, but we do not see how this could extend to authorize the appointment of a deputy.

The action of the Ontario government in the case of Sir Alexander Campbell has been criticised by all writers on our constitution. They question—and I think with a great deal of right—the power of the provincial government to appoint a deputy to the lieutenant governor, who is an officer of this government.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). I think my hon. friend's information is somewhat imperfect. Clement does not go far enough. He had not the facts before him when he made that note on section 67. This debate illustrates the inconvenience of springing questions of this kind on the House without notice. Speaking from memory, I think the deputy to Sir Alexander Campbell was appointed by the local authorities. Sir Oliver Mowat expressed approval of this course. Then the authorities here proceeded as we proceeded. That is, application was made to the federal government, and they did with respect to Sir Alexander Campbell what we did with respect to Sir Oliver Mowat—they confirmed the appointment. And that confirmation was given under the advice of, and after correspondence had been exchanged with, Sir Oliver Mowat, then premier of Ontario. And that is the precedent we have followed.

Mr. MONK. May I ask if there was an official act of the federal government in that case ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes, an Order in Council passed.

Mr. MONK. There was a commission issued to this person who took the place of Sir Alexander Campbell—a commission issued in the name of the local government.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I have sent for the papers and will have them here in a few minutes.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe). Section 67 of the British North America Act taken by itself, seems to be reasonably clear :

> The Governor General in Council may from time to time appoint an administrator to execute the office and functions of lieutenant governor during his absence, illness or other inability.

Taking this section alone, I admit that it is certainly enough to raise a great doubt, at all events, as to whether the government has taken the right position in making this appointment, the meaning of the section apparently being that if the Governor General in Council appoint the lieutenant governor at all, they cannot divide his functions, but must delegate them in their entirety. But I do not think that we are driven to find the meaning of the British North America Act on this point from this section alone. If we turn to a corresponding section with reference to the Governor General, I think we will see at once the great importance and great probability of the contention of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in the arguments that he put forward being correct. This section shows just what can be done, and shows that the functions in this case can be divided ; and when you find in the 14th section governing the action of the Governor General that the functions can be divided, there is much ground for the argument that the functions in the case of a lieutenant governor cannot be so divided. Section 14 says :

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, if Her Majesty thinks fit, to authorize the Governor General from time to time to appoint any person or any persons jointly or severally, to be his deputy or deputies within any part or parts of Canada, and in that capacity to exercise during the pleasure of the Governor General such of the powers, authorities and functions of the Governor General as the Governor General deems it necessary or expedient to assign to him or them, subject to any limitations or directions expressed or given by the Queen ; but the appointment of such a deputy or deputies shall not affect the exercises by the Governor General himself of any power, authority or function.

Here we have expressly provided that the Governor General can appoint a person or persons in any part of Canada to exercise for the time being some or any of the functions of the Governor General, and in that way he reserves to himself the exercise of all the other functions, and in order that there should not be any doubt upon this important matter, it is made still clearer by the concluding part of the section, which provides :

> But the appointment of such a deputy or deputies shall not affect the exercises by the Governor General himself of any power, authority or function.

So we see in this marked distinction between the two analogous positions, the cogency of the argument put forward on this side, and I hope the government will recognize, if they have not already done so, the important step they have taken in this matter, and the significance of the position in which they are placed. It has been well said that this is not the only case in which Sir Oliver Mowat has been unable to exercise the functions of lieutenant governor. The government are aware that, speaking in the ordinary way, his term has expired. I am not one of those who are anxious to see that hon. gentleman removed from the position he occupies, and removed for the purpose of replacing him with another hon. gentleman who has long been looking forward to the position as the fruits of his labour. I think the House understands very well that I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) But there has been an argument put forward by the leader of the government which I think tells the other way. He says that because of a crisis in the history of the province of Ontario, the present is an inopportune time to remove from the office of lieutenant governor a gentleman who has shown such conspicuous ability as Sir Oliver Mowat. I submit that this argument is not well taken; because if it is a fact that the government has had in view another gentleman for that position for a long time, and if it be a fact that Sir Oliver Mowat still retains to a large extent the brilliant faculties which he has possessed in the past, surely it is not a great compliment, coming from the First Minister, to the hon. gentleman who aspires to succeed him, to suggest that it would be dangerous now, when there is a crisis in Ontario, to commit to him the administration of the affairs of the province. I hope I am not carried away by any undue admiration for this hon. gentleman, but I do feel that having regard to his faithful public services in the past, having regard to certain promises made to him, it is a little unkind for the First Minister to suggest that it would be dangerous to put the administration of the affairs of Ontario into his hands.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The First Minister has given us the pleasing assurance that he had a letter from Sir Oliver Mowat to the effect that he was physically and mentally in a fit condition to discharge the high functions of his office. I am not going to dispute that, but I am going to say that if the information be at all correct which has come to us from time to time, it is at variance with the statement of the right hon. gentleman. I desire to remind the House that we have a high medical opinion given with regard to the question of superannuation, that an individual is not always the best judge of his own mental and physical condition. I merely draw attention to that circumstance, without desiring to argue that there is anything incorrect in the statement of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). I understood the right hon. gentleman to say in reply to a statement made by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), referring to the case of the late Sir George Kirkpatrick, that after the Liberal party came into power they allowed Sir George Kirkpatrick to remain in office until the time of his death. I think I am correct in saying that the right hon. gentleman overlooked the fact that Sir George Kirkpatrick was not in office at the time of his death.

The PRIME MINISTER. The commission of Sir George Kirkpatrick expired in the month of May, 1897, and his successor was appointed in November, 1897.

Mr. CLARKE. Several months after Sir George died. Besides, there was no crisis in Ontario at that time, such as exists at the present time.

Motion negatived.

PRIVATE BILLS.

WINDING LEDGES POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Winding Ledges Power and Boom Company, and that it be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Should it go to the Private Bills Committee or to the Railway Committee ?

Mr. SPEAKER. In regard to the reference of this Bill I may say that a similar Bill was presented some years ago concerning the Grand Falls company, and it was referred to the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee. I think this is in accordance with rule 59 which provides that Bills relating to railways, canals, telegraphs, canal and railway bridges, shall be referred to the Committee on Railways and that Bills not coming under these classes to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. The Grand Falls Bill, which came up in 1895, and again in 1901, was quite similar to this and it was referred in both instances to the Private Bills Committee.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I may be mistaken, but my recollection is that these Bills were sent to the Railway Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, I have looked into the question and I find that they were referred to the Private Bills Committee.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

ATLANTIC AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MONK moved the second reading of Bill (No. 36) respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved in amendment :

That Bill No. 36 respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company be not now read the second time but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that not a very unusual course in this House ? I do not remember that we have ever refused to allow an ordinary railway bill to be read the second time and referred to the Railway Committee. We can, of course, deal with it very much better there than it is possible to do here with the limited information we have. We have no information at all in our possession in regard to this Bill.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure). I will admit that this is rather an usual course, but we have to deal with a very unusual subject. I believe the House will justify me in the course I have taken after hearing the observations I have to make.

Mr. MONK. I did not know there was any objection to this Bill passing this stage. I would suggest waiting until the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ball) who is promoting the Bill is here. I am not in a position to discuss the merits of the Bill. I merely offer that as a suggestion. Allow it to stand.

Mr. SPROULE. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MONK. Would it not be better that I should withdraw my motion ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Well, the order has been called now.

Mr. INGRAM. I think we could get over the difficulty by objecting to the Bill being read at all. It has not been printed in French.

Mr. SPEAKER. I see that the objection is well taken and the motion will be declared out of order.

Order allowed to stand.

QUESTIONS.

CAPTAINS OF FLOATING LIGHTHOUSES.

Mr. LEMIEUX—for Mr. Gauvreau—asked :

1. Has the honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries received an application from the captains of the floating lighthouses of Ile-Rouge, Ile-Blanche, and of the Traverse, asking for an increase in the amount of their contract for the supplying of the said floating lighthouses ?

2. If so, is it the intention of the department to grant that which they ask, and the same during the present season of navigation ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. James Sutherland). Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Prefontaine). I may say that applications have been received and that the matter is receiving the attention of the department.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Is the government aware that the Montreal post office building is quite insufficient to properly meet the requirements of the service ?

2. Is it the intention of the government to remedy this defect ?

3. Will the building be enlarged during the present year ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock). Mr. Speaker, I may say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) that the department is satisfied that the post office building in Montreal is inadequate. The whole subject of meeting the requirements is now undergoing consideration.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—BONAVENTURE DEPOT.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Has the government paid any sum of money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company since the 30th June last, on account of the Intercolonial Railway, for improved terminal facilities, at Bonaventure Depot ?

2. What is the total amount of such payment ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The government has paid a sum of money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company since 30th June last, for improved facilities at Bonaventure station, subject to a final decision as to liability of the department under the agreement to make such payment.

2. Total amount of such payment is $274.67.

CITY POST OFFICES.

Mr. PUTTEE—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

Is the following statement of the revenue and expenditure of the city post offices correct :—

City.	Revenue. 1900-01.	1901-02.
Toronto	$481,479	$700,806
Montreal	374,941	491,351
Winnipeg	116,726	156,734
Hamilton	83,763	97,941
Ottawa	76,986	95,301
London	69,898	85,416
Halifax	58,433	89,443
St. John	54,893	65,382
Vancouver	52,589	57,300
Victoria	47,247	50,172
Quebec	41,903	50,904

City.	Expenditure.	Letter Carriers.	Clerks and Mess'g'rs.
Toronto	$160,300	..	..
Montreal	150,672	..	..
Ottawa	65,375	49	52
Hamilton	57,229	47	35
London	36,133	36	17
Quebec	35,864	34	23
St. John	35,841	25	26
Halifax	34,729	23	24
Winnipeg	33,243	21	22

Are there any unusual conditions that cause the Winnipeg office to stand third in revenue, and ninth in expenditure? If so, what are they?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir Wm. Mulock). The statement of revenue is correct except that Montreal collected $100 less than the amount mentioned for 1901.

The statement as to expenditure is found to be for the year 1901, and is correct.

The expenditure for 1902 with the number of employees is as follows:

City.	Expenditure.	Letter Carriers.	Clerks, Messengers, and Porters.
Toronto	$166,327	..	..
Montreal	153,826	..	..
Ottawa	63,789	49	60
Hamilton	58,340	44	35
London	37,022	34	21
Quebec	35,864	33	24
St. John	35,960	23	27
Halifax	34,901	24	23
Winnipeg	36,752	30	45

It will be observed that leaving out Toronto and Montreal, the Winnipeg post office has risen to third in rank as regards the number employed.

It might be explained that the Ottawa office handles all the government matter free, and that the revenue does not by any means represent the volume of business transacted.

Hamilton is the chief distributing point in western Ontario for matter from the United States, and there is a good deal of work performed which is not indicated by the revenue.

The staff at Winnipeg is much newer in point of service than in the older offices, where many have reached the maximum of the respective classes, so that the salaries paid in Winnipeg do not, on this account, aggregate as high as in the other offices.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS—MANITOBA.

Mr. PUTTEE—by Mr. Sproule—asked:

Port Colborne was completed, 6,000 cubic feet of water per minute was available for leasing without detriment to the navigation of the canal.

2. Because there are a number of cattle-guards yet to be tested. The testing is still going on.

3. Is answered by my reply to No. 1.

4. Is answered by my reply to No. 1.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). The quantities and kinds of coal imported into the province of Ontario were as follows :

	June 30, 1901 to March 1, 1902. Tons.	June 30, 1902 to March 1, 1903. Tons.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. Sir F. W. Borden) :

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—TRANSCONTINENTAL LINE.

Mr. MONK asked :

2. Is it a fact that some members of the government are urging the said Grand Trunk Company to purchase the Mann & McKenzie system ; and that the said Grand Trunk Company is asking for a large land grant, as a condition of said proposed purchase ?

3. Has the government come to an agreement in regard to the building of said transcontinental line ?

4. What is the cause of the delay in putting the measure for such new line, mentioned in the speech from the Throne, before the House ?

5. Is it a fact that divisions in the cabinet are the sole cause of such delay ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair).

1. I do not know that such a report as stated in the first question is current. If it is current it is not true.

2. It is not a fact that members of the government are urging the Grand Trunk Company to purchase the McKenzie and Mann system, nor is the Grand Trunk Company asking for a large land grant as a condition for such a purpose.

3. No.

4. There is no mention in the speech from the Throne of the Grand Trunk Transcontinental line, and there is no delay in the matter.

5. This is not a proper question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria).

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And if it were a proper question; the answer would be : There is not the slightest foundation in fact for such a statement.

TURNPIKE ROADS ON THE ISLAND OF MONTREAL.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moves for (Translation.) :

An order of the House for a statement showing the indebtedness of the Montreal Turnpike Trust to the government of Canada.

(a) On capital account.

(b) For interest accrued since 1896.

This is in connection with the business of the Montreal Turnpike Trust, and my object is to obtain a statement showing the total amount of the bonds or debentures held at this time by the Dominion government, and also the amount due by that board or corporate body for interest accrued since 1896. Already on several previous occasions, I called the attention of the House to the manner in which the affairs of the Montreal Turnpike Trust were being managed. It is a question of the greatest interest not only to those who live in that populous city of Montreal, but also to the farmers, gardeners and others settled in the counties adjoining the city. Every time I brought the question before the House, the government endeavoured to shirk the responsibility, which to my mind, belongs to them, by arguing that the Montreal Turnpike Trust is a board instituted and governed by a provincial Act; that the government of the province of Quebec, in virtue of the constitution, has to do with all municipal boards and bodies placed under provincial control, and that, as a consequence, the Dominion government or the Finance Minister were not in a position to interfere as requested by me. Indeed, in bringing once more this question before the House, my object is to have the Dominion government interfere so as to correct a state of things which has become altogether unbearable. I quite agree that the Dominion government has no direct control over that body which is governed by a provincial Act, and as a consequence, is under the authority of the provincial government. But the circumstances are such, as I already had occasion to explain to the House, that the Dominion government is in a better position than any other to bring about the change that is called for in the management of the affairs of this board. The Act which governs the Montreal Turnpike Trust provides that holders of debentures will be entitled to appoint three representatives to sit on the board with two representatives appointed by the provincial government. These holders of debentures have thereby actually full control of the commission, since they have on the board a majority of one. Now, in this special case, the debentures of the commission are held by the Dominion government, who, through an officer of the Finance Department, appoints three representatives to act on the board as agents of the holders of debentures. Of course, the Dominion government who appoints three representatives to act for the holders of debentures, which debentures are held by the government, has an effective control over these three representatives. Well then, what is the outcome? I have already pointed out to the House serious defects in the Act which governs that turnpike trust. If we are to have in the vicinity of Montreal suitable roads, it is urgent that this law, enacted half a century ago, and which is altogether out of harmony with administrative notions of the day, should be changed. To obtain that, the Dominion government, holding almost all the debentures of the commission, would only have to instruct its agents on the board to see that a suitable Act be passed by the Quebec legislature amending the law which now governs the commission. If that be not done, you may rest assured that the provincial government will not pass such a law of its own accord. And even admitting that the provincial government should undertake to pass such an Act, the three men who for the time being represent the Dominion government on the board, may, I will not say absolutely, but effectively, prevent these amendments from being voted, although they are badly needed. We are anxious in the first place that the sittings of the commision be open to the public. It is a general complaint on the island of Montreal, on the part of farmers who come to market, on tne part of those who are called out of town and travel over the main arteries which lead into the city, that the meetings of the commission are not open to the public, as are those of municipal councils, of school boards, and of all bodies having to do with the administration of public affairs. Such an amendment cannot be dispensed with.

We are anxious, besides, that the Turnpike Trust be compelled to publish every year a full statement of the business carried on, in order that we may know what are the earnings of each toll-gate, and the total earnings of this corporation. We wish to know how the revenue is utilized for the improvement of the public highways under its control. We want the law amended in such a way that the contracts for these roads be let to the highest bidder after calling for tenders. That too high a price is being paid for the work, and that the contracts for the supply of stone are granted at extravagant rates is a well known fact. At all events, we want to know yearly how that amount, which exceeds $75,000, is spent. We have the right to be informed on that point, the more so as that the roads are not maintained in good order and that there is ground to believe that the revenue is not properly expended.

We are desirous, also, that the mayors of the municipalities adjoining Montreal, and that the mayor of Montreal as well, have a seat on the Turnpike Commission. We ask that there be some elective members on that board which has the control of our public highways. Aldermen are elective, and so are municipal councillors and school commissioners. How is it that on that most important body, which has in its hands the management of the roads leading into Montreal, there is no one elected by the ratepayers, to represent those who supply the large amount of money collected every year by the Turnpike Trust? Such are the changes which are required in the Act, as a preliminary step, and without which the Turnpike Commission will continue to be blamed for the bad condition of our roads. If the Dominion government is at all anxious to foster the interests of the farmers of that section, it should take action and impress on its representatives upon the board of directors the need for obtaining from the proper authority the changes in the law which the public call for.

Now, there are in the county of Jacques Cartier a great number of dairymen, farmers and gardeners who come almost every day, and some of them twice a day, to Montreal. Exception is taken, and rightly so, to the condition of the road between Côte des Neiges and Cartierville. The earnings of the toll-gates are large. Why should this road which is travelled over by a large number of farmers and others, riding or driving on Sundays and week days, who reach Côte des Neiges by way of St. Laurent, why, I say, should this be the most neglected part of the highways under the control of the commission? Why should other roads which are not so much travelled over, be kept, I do say in perfect order—for our roads are not as a rule properly maintained—but at any rate in better order than that road which leads from Montreal to St. Laurent? If we had some effective legislation, if, for instance, the commissioners were compelled by law to lay before the public yearly a full account of the work carried on, we would find out what are the earnings of that body, and how they expend their revenue. The condition of the road is a source of great annoyance to the ratepayers who have to travel over it to reach Montreal and are obliged to pay the tolls. I call the attention of the Finance Minister more particularly to the condition of the road leading to St. Laurent, not only because farmers who live in that neighbourhood have reason to complain, but also because the people of Montreal who have to travel in that direction suffer from the impassable state of the road. I would like to give an instance of the strange way in which the affairs of this board are managed. There is in the county of Jacques Cartier, in the parish of Notre Dame de Grâces, situated close to the Lachine canal, a small village called Turcot, inhabited by working people, who, to make a living, have to go to St. Henry, Ste. Cunégonde and Montreal. As a rule, these people cannot get their living in that village. Now, Turcot village, which no doubt the hon. the Prime Minister knows, is hemmed in by turnpikes put up by the commissioners, which are in the way of the people going to their work. The inhabitants of Turcot village, to get to Montreal from the village, or to get to the village from Montreal, travel over but a very small portion of the road maintained by the commissioners. Nevertheless, they are made to pay for using that insignificant bit of road. It is impossible for them to leave their village to go to Montreal, St. Henry or Ste. Cunégonde, without paying the toll. That is a grievance which calls for redress and to which I would draw the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister. He has the right and the power to give instructions to his representatives on the board, to those who are his agents as holder of the bonds, so as to put an end to this crying evil which the people of Turcot village are subjected to. I appeal to the government, if they have any sympathy for those who have to use that road, to remedy the present state of things, and also to bring their influence to bear to have the grievance redressed, under which the people of Turcot village now labour.

The PRIME MINISTER (The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the documents for which my hon. friend has moved, being brought down; they will be laid forthwith on the Table of the House. But let me assure the hon. gentleman that I do not think the Dominion government have all the responsibility which he would fain saddle on them. Even should they have that responsibility, I may tell the hon. member that I would not be ready to take up and discuss the grievances referred to by him. He is much more familiar than I am with the localities and well informed as to whatever objections may exist against the management of the Turnpike Trust.

The government will call the attention of the trustees or commissioners, who represent the holders of bonds, to the grievances set forth to-day. We shall endeavour to get at the facts in order to be in a position to discuss the question in its proper time and place, when the papers have been brought down and the hon. member takes the matter up again before the House.

Motion agreed to.

HAY AND OATS BOUGHT FOR THE IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved for:

1. The total amount paid by the government of Canada for hay and oats, purchased for the imperial government, for shipment to South Africa, during the years 1900, 1901 and 1902.

2. The names of the parties from whom hay and oats were so purchased.

3. The prices at which the said hay and oats were so furnished during the said periods, from each of the said parties.

4. The total amount paid to each of the said parties, both for hay and oats.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I think I am correct in stating that my hon. friend brought this matter before the House a year ago in the form of a question. And my hon. colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, said that it concerned only the imperial government, inasmuch as it did not affect the public moneys of Canada in any way, and therefore he was unable to supply the information asked for. I think that we ought to take the same position to-day. For all expenditure of the public money of Canada, the ministers are accountable to this House and the House is entitled to every information, but this is an expenditure of imperial money for which this government is not accountable to this House.

Mr. SAM HUGHES (North Victoria). It is an export of the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But we do not show the exports made by particular individuals. We bring down returns of exports generally, but if my hon. friend wants a return of the exports in this particular case, let him ask it of the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson). This motion, however, does not deal with the question of exports, but of the expenditure of public money. If this were the public money of the Dominion, my hon. friend's motion would be a proper one, and we would be bound to bring down a return showing how it was expended. As however, it was imperial money, the expenditure of which was made through the friendly offices of a Minister of the Crown, at the request of the imperial government—which request was of course very cheerfully granted—the government of Canada have nothing whatever to do with it. The matter would be a proper one to be brought forward in the parliament of Great Britain but not in this House. I hope my hon. friend will see the reasonableness of this view and not press his motion.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). By whose orders was the money dispersed?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The money was provided by the imperial government and the transactions were managed largely, if not wholly, through the Minister of Agriculture. The imperial government asked for his advice and assistance and provided the money.

Mr. CLARKE. Under those circumstances, there is no valid reason why the hon. Minister of Agriculture should not bring down all the information asked for.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). This is a new doctrine of responsible government. It seems to me that a minister must be held strictly accountable for everything he does as head of a department, and I will not sit here quietly and allow a new doctrine of responsibility, or rather lack of responsibility, to be submitted without repudiating it. A reason may be given for not bringing down the information asked for, but not the reason given just now.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Either the Minister of Agriculture was doing this as a Minister of the Crown or he was not. Was he doing it, as Mr. Sidney Fisher, providing his own clerks, and as a matter of private business between himself and the imperial government. If that be the case, we would not press the motion. But if he was doing this as a Minister of the Crown, and not as Mr. Sidney Fisher, but because he held the position of Minister of Agriculture we do not see any reason why all the information should not be laid on the Table. I do not think the hon. Minister of Finance has suggested any. If I understand the position of the Minister of Agriculture, he was acting as a Minister of the Crown of Canada on behalf of the imperial government, using the officers under his control, who are paid out of the revenues of this country and therefore I cannot understand what objection there can be, from any reasonable standpoint, to bringing down the papers. It is not information that can prejudice the interests of the imperial government in any way. It is information which is in the possession of this government and ought to be in the possession of the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot admit for a moment that because the government has furnished the good offices of any of its officials to the British government, it is obliged to bring down all records of the transactions which may have occurred and in which only the money of the imperial government was used. As the money expended was not that of the people of Canada, there is no ground on which this government can be called to an account here for that expenditure.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On what principle can the money of the Canadian people be used in paying men who are employed in that way and the people's representatives refused information. What would prevent the government acting for the government of the United States or France or Germany or any other country, and then refusing to give the slightest information as to their proceedings in that respect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. To the best of my knowledge and belief there was no expense incurred by the people of Canada. No additional officials were employed, and whatever officials were required for the purpose, their expenses were charged to the British government. If we loan the good offices of any of the officials of Canada, as we should in any matter in which the imperial government desires to make use of their services, I cannot admit that we thereby are liable to account to this House for any expenditure of imperial money which may happen to be made in that connection.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The fair name of Canada is at stake. There are very serious scandals in connection, not only with these oats and hay purchases, but also the purchase of horses. I would like the hon. gentleman to understand that when our government gives instructions to its officers paid by the Canadian people, the people of Canada are going to inquire into the actions of these men. I hope that the right hon. the Prime Minister will come off his high horse—not one of those horses which were bought for $40 and sold for $150—and give the information asked for.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Hughes) ought to be more careful than to use such language.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I take the responsibility of my language and am prepared, if the government will give me a committee, to prove what I have said.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman has charges to make, he knows that there are ways and means of making them. This is not the way to make a charge.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Would the right hon. gentleman give a committee of the House or a commission ?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman knows how to proceed if he has any charges to make, and if he has, it is his duty to make them. Although the money expended was not that of Canada, but of the imperial government, still if he has charges to make, if he thinks he can prove any scandals, it is his duty to make these charges and he should not have delayed so long. But he cannot expect the government to take notice of vain words thrown on the floor of parliament. There has been no charge, so far as I know, made, and the hon. gentleman has no warrant to speak as he has done. I believe that everything in this matter was done fairly and well. We have had no complaint from the British government, and I therefore see no reason why this House should inquire into the expenditure of money which does not concern it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to know whether the right hon. gentleman is willing or not to have these purchases ventilated in the Committee of Public Accounts, as they might be, if they were the expenditure of this country.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly not. My hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) has no reason to speak in that way. The Committee on Public Accounts are bound to investigate the expenditure of the money of the Canadian people, not the expenditure of money by the imperial government. But, if my hon. friend or any one else has any charges to make that the government has behaved in the manner suggested, he can have all the investigation he desires—not before.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). It is because of the constant rumours——

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, oh.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria).

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Rumours !

Mr. SPROULE. I shall avail myself of my right, notwithstanding the Postmaster General or the Prime Minister, to express myself here as I see fit so long as I keep within the rules of parliamentary debate. I say that these constant rumours in circulation cause us to desire to get this information, in order to know whether they are or are not correct. But I rose particularly to ask the Minister of Finance one question. If this is the ground to be taken now, why was it that we had information given in this House with regard to the cost of horses sent out to supply the contingents ? That information was asked for and given.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid——

Mr. SPROULE. I am correct, for I asked the question myself, and got the information. Therefore, I know. If it were proper to give information with regard to the purchase of horses, why is it not proper to give it with regard to the purchase of oats ? And if this information is not given, how is the imperial parliament to reach a conclusion as to whether that money was properly spent or not ? It does seem to me that this is a proper thing to endeavour to ascertain, for our government was acting on behalf of somebody, and our civil servants were acting as the employees of somebody. We paid for their time; and it does seem to me very proper that we should have some information along these lines.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not recall the question to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) refers. But, if such information as he refers to was given, I am bound to believe that the horses were purchased with the money of the Canadian people. There were expenditures of that nature made with the money of the people of Canada, and a refund made by the imperial government. Where the matter passed through the hands of the government of Canada and moneys were paid out of the public treasury, it would be eminently proper that information with regard to such expenditures should be given. With regard to horses purchased, a full inquiry was made by the imperial parliament, or by a commission authorized by parliament, and I am sure that if there was cause to suspect anything wrong in the case of the purchase of Canadian horses, that would be inquired into as carefully as anything else. But we draw a distinction between the expenditure of the money of the Canadian people, for which we are responsible, and the expenditure of money by the people of Great Britain, for which the imperial government are responsible. I am sure that the members of the imperial parliament would be pleased to get information that would enable them to make proper inquiry in that direction.

Mr. SPROULE. Were not the oats paid for with the cheques of the Dominion government and the money refunded ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have only such knowledge as comes from the department. I believe the money was paid to the credit of the people engaged in this work, particularly of the Hon. Mr. Fisher. Money of the imperial government was placed to his credit. The purchases were not paid for by cheque of the department, so far as I know. The position was that the friendly offices of the minister and his assistants were given to the imperial government in that way.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Did the Department of Agriculture furnish the imperial authorities with the information in this department ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot answer my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) from personal knowledge. But I have no doubt that all this information and much more was freely given. They have their auditors for the examination of these expenditures, and I have no doubt that every detail was furnished to the imperial government.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to know if certain information was furnished by the imperial officers in South Africa to the Canadian government with respect to the way the horses from Canada were starved at the port of landing at South Africa. I think the Canadian government ought to insist on the imperial authorities making a thorough investigation into the manner in which these horses were treated. If the statements circulated are true, the facts are a disgrace to the imperial authorities—to allow horses to be half starved before being set to the work they were called upon to do in South Africa. Not only that, but they endangered the lives of Canadians who were mounted on these horses. For that, if for no other reason, an investigation should be made.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe). As I understand this matter, the imperial government requested this government through the Minister of Agriculture to act for them. They did not select Hon. Mr. Fisher as an individual; they selected him as the Minister of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada. It was well understood at the time—it was announced and not denied—that the government of Canada, through the Minister of Agriculture, were acting as the agent of the imperial government at that time. It is now said that the money spent was the money of the imperial government. But was not the honour of the parliament of Canada and the honour of the people of Canada pledged to the faithful administration of this trust ? What position should we have been in if any wrong had been done in connection with the matter, if there had been any dishonesty or anything reflecting on the credit of the people of Canada ? Now, it is suggested—pretty freely suggested—that, if that has not occurred, at all events, there is ground for believing that some more light should be had upon the subject. I am afraid that the administration are about to make another mistake. They may say that we have no evidence that they have made any mistake. But I venture to say that, in treating the opposition in this House—and thus treating the people of Canada—in such a light and jaunty manner as they have done this afternoon, they are making a mistake. If there is any body of men to whom the people as a whole look to for the investigation of matters of this kind, it is necessarily the opposition of the House of Commons, which ever party that opposition may for the time being represent. It is not to be expected that the supporters of the government will be alert to ascertain the position of these matters as they arise. To whom do the people look ? They look to an alert opposition to investigate these subjects. And I submit, that the Minister of Finance—yes, and the right hon. leader of the government—have not treated the opposition here, and so have not treated the people of the country, with the courtesy that should have been shown on this occasion. I am prepared to hear—I would be very glad to hear—that there is some good reason why they should take the attitude they have taken and why this information should not be given. But, as yet, I submit, no good reason has been given why we should not have the information that has been asked for. If there is any better reason, if there is any valid reason at all, it is for the administration to give it. But, at present, I stand here on behalf of the people I represent and I say distinctly that I believe—and I intend to stand by that position—I am entitled to the information that has been asked for.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). It seems to me there is something on the very face of the government's position that shows that there is a desire on their part to conceal the facts in this case that, in ordinary course would be published, if there was no extraordinary reason against it. Now, the Prime Minister, it seems to me, has given the whole case away when he says that the government have no responsibility in connection with this expenditure, still, if charges are formulated with regard to it, then all the papers will be brought down. Now if the government's position is reasonable, how would the formulation of charges alter their position ? Their answer might as well be : We are not responsible to the Canadian parliament in regard to the expenditure of this money, we are only responsible to the British government. Now, it has been bruited about—I admit that is not a sufficient reason to call for an investigation—that Grit heelers have enjoyed a great deal more of the money under this expenditure than they were entitled to, and that the British government, in paying that amount of money through this government, have been cheated to a large extent; and that, instead of the money going for hay and oats at a fair price, a large amount of it has gone for fodder for government support. Admitting, as I frankly do, that these rumours would not give us a right to a parliamentary inquiry in the nature of a commission, I still say that it is the right of this parliament to have these rumours set aside, and to be made acquainted with the actual facts, in broad daylight, as to how much money the government received, for what it was paid, how many bushels of oats and how many tons of hay, and so forth, were obtained for that money, so that the people can see whether the government have a clean record or a dirty record in this matter. Surely that concerns this parliament. Money distributed through the Department of Agriculture, through the officers of the Canadian government, is a matter we have to do with, whether it is our money or not. Supposing, for instance, we gave a grant of public money, as was given by some of the old parliaments before confederation, for a certain purpose, and that money was to be disbursed through the English House of Commons, such as a grant to the families of those who fell in the Crimea, and that thousands of pounds sterling were sent to the British government to be handed to these families, would it be pretended that the government of England would hesitate to give an account on the floor of the House of the way that money had been disbursed, in order that we might see whether the money going through their hands had reached the proper quarters. This is a matter affecting the fair fame of this country as well as of this government, and the very fact that the government dare not make a simple statement—that could injure no one—if everything was honest and above board—the mere fact that they seek to hide themselves behind the subterfuge that they were disbursing the money of the people of England and not our money, suggests at once that these serious rumours are not merely rumours, and that the belief that many people hold that that money was not disbursed honestly, is well founded. I say the government owe it to themselves, as well as to this parliament and to the Canadian people, to make a clear, business-like statement, one that they can easily make if there was no dishonesty, showing that they received so much money, that they bought so much hay and so much oats, then we can draw our own conclusions. If they gave double the prices that it was necessary to give, there would be a reflection on the government, but if they have given fair prices, their skirts would be clean. But it seems to me they are taking an extraordinary attitude, for which no one will thank them, for the British government have no desire to be shielded in this matter; it is extraordinary that they should say: We are not accountable to the people of this parliament because the money was not paid by this parliament. The money was expended by the servants of this country, that money was received by them because they were our servants, and we have every right to hold them to account as the servants of this House and of the Canadian people, and to know whether, called upon as they were on that occasion, they have discharged their duties, and discharged them not merely with honesty, but with business ability. It does seem to me that their position gives a great deal of force to the rumours that have been referred to, and to the suspicion that is now created, that they have an ulterior object not consistent with business-like administration, when they refuse to bring down the papers showing how much money they got, and to whom they paid it. Especially are we dissatisfied when the Prime Minister follows that up by saying: Although we are not accountable, still if you make a charge that we did not spend that money properly, then we will give you all the information. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to be put in that position. If they are accountable to us when we charge fraud in regard to an expenditure of the money of the people of England, surely, as in ordinary cases, they are accountable for all the money that has gone through their hands. Surely this money—I merely mention this by way of debate, acknowledging that I have no right to enter into that question—surely this money passed through the public accounts at some time or other. It will not be pretended that when hundreds of thousands of pounds, or hundreds of thousands of dollars are remitted here to any department of the government and goes to the credit of one of the spending departments of this country, surely it will not be pretended that that money does not appear in the public accounts. That amount must appear in the public accounts of this country. I submit that the money covered by this resolution has gone through the public accounts, otherwise it would be a most extraordinary thing that the Department of Agriculture would have anything to do with it. The resolution in your hands contemplates a statement as to the moneys paid out by this government.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The answer is that there are none.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then let this motion pass, let the government take the position that no moneys have been disbursed by the government. There could be no objection to that. Let this pass, and the return will show that there was none. But if my position is right that these moneys have passed through a regular department of the government, the hon. gentleman cannot be correct in saying that there are no moneys to account for. All we argue is that the money has been paid by the government of Canada. In debate it is one thing to argue the contrary, but in a return to this House it is another thing to state that the government have paid nothing. The Minister of Finance argues that because the Minister of Agriculture was asked to do this thing for the English government, it is not a matter concerning this parliament. But if the Minister of Finance has no statement, if the Prime Minister has no statement, that these moneys did not actually go through the hands of the Department of Agriculture——

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have stated so.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then if he states that in debate, let that resolution go, and we will see what the facts are when it comes to comply with the order of the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I just wish to observe that the hon. member for Pictou (Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) appears to argue this case on a wrong conception of the point in issue. After having received a statement from the Minister of Finance that a motion of this kind would be quite futile, inasmuch as the transaction never was officially recognized by the government, that it was simply an action of the Minister of Agriculture, who gave his friendly office, and after the Minister of Finance has stated that no money passed through the hands of the government, what is the use of the present motion? The hon. gentleman can take nothing out of such a motion as that. He says that perhaps the minister has done this, or has done that, which he ought not to have done, suggesting that he may have done something affecting his honour as a minister of the Crown. That is a very different matter. How far parliament should intervene to sit in judgment on one of its members, as to what he should do outside of his representative capacity, is a fair subject for discussion. If the hon. gentleman has any suggestion to make that the Minister of Agriculture, in his dealings with the imperial government, although in a semi-private capacity, has done something derogatory to his position as the adviser of His Majesty in Canada, I am sure he will have the most ample opportunity to make good his suggestion. But instead of that, he goes back and argues that these moneys passed through the Canadian treasury.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Through the public accounts?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. How could anything be referred to the Public Accounts Committee if no money passed through the Canadian treasury? The accounts and vouchers would not be in our possession; there were no disbursements by the Canadian government, there was no liability by the Canadian government, no accountability to the imperial government, no legal obligation of any kind on the part of the Canadian government, or on the part of Canada.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the government let us have the request of the imperial government? We could see then whether this is a government matter or not. This correspondence should be laid on the Table.

The PRIME MINISTER. That should be the subject of another motion.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, but on this motion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would ask to be permitted to add something to what I have already said. I am informed by Professor Robertson that he practically managed all this business and that these moneys were placed to the credit of the imperial government in what was called the imperial government hay account. The method by which the transaction was handled was that the imperial government cabled a request to give the prices at which they could purchase certain goods. Prices were cabled as an estimate as to what these goods could be probably purchased for in this country. Then the money was forwarded and placed to the credit of the imperial hay account. And the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Sydney Fisher) and Professor Robertson were authorized to draw cheques against that account. I have the authority of Professor Robertson to use his name in saying that he managed the matter largely himself, and he authorizes me to say that the goods supplied were of the best quality and were furnished at reasonable prices.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Why do you not bring down the papers?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Because this is not a transaction which concerns the parliament of Canada. I have never heard of any such rumours affecting this transaction until I heard them here to-day. I may say that every person with the exception of the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Professor Robertson, who was assigned to duty in connection with the transaction had his services paid for by the imperial government, and therefore it did not cost this country one dollar. In regard to the suggestion that there is something wrong in this transaction, I am satisfied that the statement I now make on the authority of Professor Robertson that the goods were of first quality and fair and reasonable in price, is one that the people of this country will accept.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. Minister of Finance permit me one question ? I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there has been no amount paid by the government of Canada.

If these words were added to the main motion :

And all correspondence between the imperial government and the Canadian government.

We would ascertain the position of the matter—correspondence which the hon. gentleman refers to and which he is bound under the rules of the House to lay on the Table.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not consider that I am.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the rule; at any rate, we will not stop to argue that now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If it were a state document concerning the people of Canada the rule might apply.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is a communication passing between the two governments.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not pretended that the communication was with Professor Robertson direct. The return might be made bringing down papers giving some colour to the statements made by the hon. Minister of Finance, that while the matter originally began by correspondence with the government, it ultimately assumed the personal character to which he refers.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think that amendment to the motion will meet the case. If the hon. gentleman brings forward another motion we will then consider it on its merits.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. minister if the hon. Minister of Agriculture acted with the knowledge and concurrence of the government on this matter ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I may answer frankly by saying that the fact that the hon. Minister of Agriculture was rendering that friendly service to the imperial government was known, but the matter never came before the government, and it was never treated as government business.

Hon. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did you buy hay or oats from a Conservative in Canada ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We may have made some mistake in that regard, but if the hay and oats were good, and the price fair, I do not think anybody would insist that we should inquire into the political colour of the persons from whom we bought them.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. MONK. I am very sorry that the government has not seen fit to give us the very simple and plain information asked for by this motion. There is not a country where irregularities of some kind do not occur in the furnishing of war supplies, and this is the only country I know of where an investigation into the manner of the furnishing of these supplies has been refused after the war. We have had investigations in England since the war, in France after the war of 1870, and in the United States. The reasons given by the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Postmaster General, and particularly by the hon. Postmaster General, seem to be very poor ones indeed. As a matter of fact, the public at large will not take the trouble to consider whether it was Mr. Sydney Fisher, or the hon. Minister of Agriculture, or Professor Robertson, or the government, who had to do with this transaction. Everybody knows throughout the country that it was the government that purchased these supplies for South Africa, and, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentlemen who sit on treasury benches knew what is being said in public since the war closed, about the manner in which supplies were furnished, they would be the first to call for the motion to lay this information on the Table of the House. What is it that is being said all over the country, at any rate, down in Montreal ? They say that hay was sold to the government of Canada for shipment to South Africa at an exorbitant price, that $14 a ton was paid for it when better hay than that could have been purchased at $11 a ton, and the fact that the British government had sought the assistance of this government for the purchase of hay had been used by this government in order to allow speculators to get hold of that money, filling their own pockets with it and cheating the British government out of what was due to them. That is what was being said. I do not mean to say it is true, but it is being said very generally .

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Who is saying it ?

Mr. MONK. If the hon. Postmaster General will go down to the city of Montreal I will introduce him to a number of people who say that, and from all I hear it is being said elsewhere. At any rate it has been alleged, it has been printed, and what reasonable reason can this government have for not laying before us here, the representatives of the people, copies of the accounts which undoubtedly they have rendered to the British government and which are lying in the Department of Agriculture at the present moment. It is an outrage on the rights of this House to refuse us that information. We are here to judge of the accounts of the government. It concerns the treasury of Canada when the money of Canada has been spent and that is the reason why we should have that information. I venture to say that the government has travelled outside true constitutional principle because we have the right to judge its work upon all of its acts. Whether the government is the agent of the British government or the agent of any other government, it is responsible to this House for all of its acts. In addition to what is said about the price paid for oats it is alleged that the horses in South Africa were supplied with bad oats, and bundles of hay in the midst of which there was nothing but rottenness, and which were paid for at an exorbitant price. The government cannot fail to have heard some of these rumours but now they refuse to give us that information under the specious plea that it is not the money of the people of Canada that has been expended. We are interested in knowing, if the Canadian government, acting for the imperial government in this important matter, has charged the British government, in a critical moment, a price for hay which was not the price at which hay was selling for, and giving them bad hay at that. We are entitled to know if they have charged the British government an unjust and unfair price for oats at a time when oats was at a lower price here, a thing which is easy to prove. I would ask the members of the government to consider whether, apart from any little petty-fogging objections, it would not be in the interest of the government itself to give us a clear statement of what was paid, so that the public may know that there is no truth in the current rumours. I venture to say that if the government refuses us this reasonable information, which we are entitled to get on constitutional ground, that rumour will receive confirmation and the public at large will believe that there have been dark and shameful dealings in regard to these matters.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). I would be ready to sympathize with my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) and to support his motion if he would enlarge it somewhat. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the rumours that were current in Montreal as to the cheating that the British government was subjected to, but perhaps he has heard the rumours which were quite common as to the cheating that the Canadian shippers were subjected to by officers of the British government. We were told that goods which were sent to England were refused by the British representatives of the War office, and that messages were sent to the Canadian shippers that it would be well to sell these goods at auction in England rather than bring them back; that they were sold at auction in England, purchased by officers of the War office and then resold to the British government for a very fair price. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) takes so much to heart the wrongs of the British taxpayers, he might have thought also of the wrongs inflicted on Canadian exporters by the British War office officials.

Mr. COCHRANE. What has that to do with it.

Mr. BOURASSA. It has this to do with it, that I will support the motion, if the hon. gentleman would make it apply to the interests of Canadian taxpayers as well as to those of the British taxpayers.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Bring another motion yourself.

House divided on the motion (Mr. Monk).

DOMINION SUBSIDIES TO PROVINCES—INCREASE.

Mr. R. LEMIEUX (Gaspé)—(Translation) moved for :

Copy of the correspondence exchanged between the government and the various provincial legislatures on the subject of an increase in the subsidies paid to the provinces under the British North America Act.

Mr. Speaker, the object of this motion is to call the attention of this House to the proceedings of the interprovincial conference, which was held in the city of Quebec, in December last. This question of readjusting the federal subsidies paid to the provinces under the British North America Act, is apparently coming to a crisis. The present state of affairs call for a solution ; or failing that, the provinces henceforth will have to be satisfied with a less efficient administration of certain departments, to the great detriment of public affairs. Sir, these are growing times and an era of unprecedented prosperity has been ushered in ; now, would it be fair for the provinces, I ask, to keep aloof from that general movement, when the whole world is progressing by leaps and bounds ?

The question of readjusting the Dominion subsidies to provinces is of no recent growth; and it is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that, on several occasions, this very same question was threshed out in this House, but, I make bold to say here and now, without the least fear of contradiction, that in the province of Quebec, it is a matter which is irrespective of party affiliations.

As early as 1882, the treasurer of the Quebec government urged upon the Dominion authorities the desirability of a more liberal grant being secured by the provinces. In the year 1883, a similar demand for better terms was made by the provincial authorities. In 1884, the late Sir Adolphe Chapleau brought to bear a pretty strong pressure upon his colleagues in order to engage the then government to take action in the matter and to increase by $250,000 the Dominion grant to the province. As all the hon. gentlemen know, the increase in subsidies applied for was to indemnify the province of Quebec for the considerable outlay it had incurred in building the North Shore Railway, which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had just bought. But it was only in 1887 that the question as to the readjustment of the federal subsidies assumed a more definite shape, through the increasing efforts and the indomitable energy of the late Honoré Mercier. All the provinces of confederation, with the exception of British Columbia, then passed resolutions which will go down to history as the most remarkable statement and the most forcible plea ever made in favour of the cause of the provinces. I shall not weary the House with the extracts from the conclusions reached by the delegates to the convention of 1887 ; let it suffice to say that these resolutions constitute one of the historical documents which will ever be read with interest by those who are concerned with the question of provincial antonomy. From the many public actions with which Mr. Mercier's name remains identified, this conference will be handed down to posterity as the most important act of his political record.

For reasons which it would be idle to review at this remote period, the conference of 1887 was barren of immediate results ; but, as I said, the remoter the date of that event, the greater the importance of the resolutions then adopted.

The conference which was held in December, 1902, was but a partial revival of the proceedings of 1887 ; but, as I shall soon explain, the resolutions which were passed at that meeting of premiers are of the utmost importance.

I am happy to say that those two conventions held in 1887 and in 1902 met together, owing to the action taken by the Quebec government. It was according to the fitness of things that my native province which was the 'constituante' of confederation, should take the lead of that movement in favour of provincial autonomy and should promote through temperate and well conducted debates, the establishment of relations, both more fair and more just, between the central power and the various provinces. The position taken by the government of the province of Quebec in December last is all the more justifiable as the two administrations which have succeeded each other in power since 1897, under the leadership of the regretted Mr. Marchand and under the present leadership of Mr. Parent, have administered public affairs with an eye to the most rigid economy. As a matter of fact, it is no idle boasting to say that, since 1897, owing to the generous cooperation of all concerned, in our province, we have succeeded in putting a stop to the era of deficits and effected an equilibrium between income and expenditure. Ever since that year, we have had surpluses to our credit, as shown by the following figures :—

1898-1899..	$22,556 22
1899-1900..	23,198 57
1900-1901..	71,339 73
1901-1902..	44,837 72
Total of surpluses	$161,933 25

But, undeniable as the economy practised in the several branches of the provincial administration is, as shown by those surpluses, it has necessarily brought about a halt which may ultimately result in checking the development of our resources. Now, is it good policy, I ask, to continue that state of things and should the provinces keep aloof from that era of progress which Canada is now enjoying ? I think it would be idle to look for a remedy to that state of things elsewhere than in a change in the federal constitution in connection with the financial question. In other words, it is absolutely necessary that the resources of the provinces should be increased, unless we want them to pine away and perish.

Under section 118 of the British North America Act, we receive grants of two different kinds : first, we get a specific grant of $70,000 ; secondly, we receive a grant of 80 cents per head of the population as fixed by the census of 1861.

I profess the greatest respect for the fathers of confederation, as we affect to call them. I say that any man who takes the trouble of perusing the debates of 1867, must come to the conclusion that the lawmakers of the time had but a very imperfect notion as to what the needs and requirements of the country would be after a growth of thirty-five years. I shall not weary the patience of the House by reading extracts from speeches, the more so as I have already, upon a former occasion, read to the House expressions of opinion given in 1867, from Sir A. T. Galt, Sir John A. Macdonald, the Hon. George Brown and Sir George Etienne Cartier. These speeches show that these statesmen had neither foreseen the rapid growth which was to take place throughout all the provinces, nor the increase in the necessary outlay for their sound administration.

To give but one instance, that of the province of Quebec, let me tell the House that its expenditure which was $1,183,238.44 in 1867-68, was $4,707,932.24 in 1900-1901, or an increase of $3,524,693.30.

The following table will show still more clearly the character of the expenditure, which, by the very force of circumstances and under the pressure of circumstances, and owing to fresh demands, have increased twofold, and in some cases threefold :

	1867-68	1900-01.

	$1,183,238.44	$4,707,932.24

Let us take the administration of justice : now, on this head the expenditure has doubled. How is this fact to be accounted for if not from the increase in population in large cities like Montreal and Quebec ? Owing to their growth as seaports, these cities receive every year a large floating population, and this surplus of population necessarily involves additional expenditure in the administration of justice, and more particularly of the courts of criminal jurisdiction. It is still within the vivid recollection of old practitioners that, not so very long ago, there were only two sessions of the criminal court held in the cities of Quebec and Montreal every year. Now, men of my generation are aware that, as concerns Montreal, four sessions are actually required, and that the courts of inferior jurisdiction hold sittings from the first of January to the end of December, for the despatch of criminal cases. In both cases the courts have to enforce federal laws, and to this fact the considerable increase in the administration of justice is due.

As to asylums and hospitals, what is the reason the relative expenditure involved by their maintenance has increased threefold, but that their population has considerably increased and that the treatment of the insane and the poor should keep pace with the progress of science ?

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. LEMIEUX (Gaspé). Before you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was explaining the cause of the increase in some expenditures incurred for some branches of provincial administration. I wish now to call the attention of the House to the glaring disproportion between the revenue derived from the federal treasury and the revenue which the province itself has levied for the administration of public affairs. The following figures show that in that respect, the provinces have done their large share. Of course, I am referring here to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In 1870, Quebec was drawing from the Dominion treasury a grant of $859,626. In 1901-02, that subsidy amounted to $1,279,105, or an increase of $419,479.

Let us now take the revenue which has been created by the province itself, as the revenue derived from the Crown lands. In 1870 the revenue derived from the land sales was $501,478, while in 1902, it was $1,291,111, or an increase of $788,633. The licenses which in 1870 yielded $98,050, gave $681,229 in 1902. As will be seen, the revenue from this source has increased fivefold since that time, other sources of revenue have been created in order to meet the requirements of the provincial administration. The taxation levied on commercial corporations which did not exist prior to 1870 has yielded $231,695 in 1902, and the duties on successions $222,763. In other words, whereas the Dominion grant has increased from 1870 to 1902 by $419,479, on the other hand, the revenue which the province has derived from its own resources has increased by $4,827,261.

Let us now take the case of the province of Ontario. The figures which I am giving here are borrowed from a most exhaustive memorandum recently prepared by the Hon. Mr. Ross, Prime Minister of the great sister province. The total revenue of the province of Ontario is $4,466,043. The Dominion grant is $1,339,287. The revenue derived from provincial sources reach $3,126,756.

Now, in the face of such figures, can it be denied that the provinces have done their large share outside of any aid received from the Dominion government ? Can it be denied that the provinces, by means of contributions levied upon the taxpayers, have drawn from local sources, enormous sums of money to meet the expenditure of their administration ? Have they not unmercifully taxed themselves to meet their engagements ? Of course the expenditure has considerably increased. In 1870 the grants to public education in the province of Quebec, amounted to $279,972, while in 1902, they reached $469,184. Whereas the expenditure of the Department of Agriculture amounted to $49,863 in 1870, it rose to $119,683 in 1902. For the same departments in the province of Ontario, the outlay for public education was $247,192 in 1861, and $782,193 in 1901, whereas for agriculture, the expenditure was $56,211 in 1861, and $209,258 in 1901. Now, I appeal to the hon. gentlemen who sit on both sides of the House, whether there is a single man who would dare to hold, at this stage of our history, that we should apply the brakes to such cases as public education and agriculture, instead of giving them a new impetus, and such remarkable development as is seen nowadays in other parts of the world ? Why, Sir, does it not stand to reason that these are outlays which are bound to increase in proportion to the very growth of population ? In these modern days, public education, as we all know, is becoming more and more expensive. Our institutions insist upon higher salaries being paid, and rightly so ; and competition makes it necessary for arts and manufactures to be up to the standard of modern science. Again, the new conditions of agriculture require more skill and greater technical knowledge. To recoil from an increased expenditure would be tantamount to saying that provinces must remain at a standstill.

But, Sir, whereas on the one hand, the grant which we receive from the Dominion exchequer is fixed and unalterable, on the other hand, the sources of revenue which the provinces have handed over to the Dominion have trebled in value. Let us take the customs and the excise. In 1867-68, the income from those sources was $11,580,968.25, whereas in 1901, it reached $38,245,223, or an increase of $26,664,254.75. Now, in 1867, the total subsidies received from the Dominion government by the provinces amounted to $2,753,966, or 24 per cent of the revenue of which they had divested themselves, whereas in 1901, the subsidies paid over to the provinces were $4,250,607, or 11 per cent only of the same revenue. Moreover, there is this remarkable anomaly, that the increase of population in the various provinces involves the creation of fresh sources of expenditure, which are beyond the control of the men of power, whereas from that same cause the Dominion government derives a fresh source of revenue which cannot fail to develop more and more. The question is, how is this anomalous position to be remedied, which impresses every thoughtful man who is anxious about the lawful claims of the provinces ? For my part I am of opinion that in the demands set forth by the interprovincial conference in December last, is to be found the true and practical remedy to the existing difficulties. The wording of those resolutions is very clear and very explicit :

Instead of the amounts now paid, the sums hereafter payable yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures, to be according to population, as follows :—

(a) Where the population is under 150,000	$100,000
(b) Where the population is 150,000 but does not exceed 200,000....	150,000
(c) Where the population is 200,00, but does not exceed 400,000..	180,000
(d) Where the population is 400,000, but does not exceed 800,000..	190,000
(e) Where the population is 800,000, but does not exceed 1,500,000..	220,000
(f) Where the population exceeds 1, 500,000	240,000

Instead of an annual grant per head of population now allowed, the annual payment hereafter to be at the same rate of eighty cents per head, but on the population of the province as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census, until such population exceeds 2,500,000 ; and at the rate of sixty cents per head for so much of said population as may exceed 2,500,000.

As I said a little while ago, such a demand seems fair and reasonable. The provinces, of their own accord, did delegate certain powers to the central government and did hand over to them the best of their revenue. Is it reasonable to believe that the idea of the fathers of confederation should have been that such a renunciation of powers and such a transfer of revenue should work to the detriment of the provinces, by placing them for ever in straitened circumstances, bordering upon poverty?

The federalists think that the remedy to that state of affairs is to be found in the power of self-taxation and in the borrowing power, which the provinces have preserved. But such an argument no longer holds, in view of the enormous burdens shouldered by the provinces since 1867. The people in the province of Quebec at least, are opposed to dircet taxation and to any further loans. Moreover, as to the parcelling out of the public domain, that is a policy which all right-minded people, all patriotic men antagonize. It is our children's patrimony and their future is intimately linked to it. It would be unfair to deprive our fellow countrymen of the public lands and the natural resources they contain, for the benefit of aliens and speculators who have no permanent interests in this country.

We do not want the provinces to be a mere geographical expression in this Dominion of ours. Any attempt to build up the central power at the expense of the provinces ought to be discountenanced. To call this demand for better terms a raid on the federal treasury is no argument at all. When the federal government grants every year to powerful corporations subsidies amounting to millions of dollars, do not they feel that the position of the provinces is growing more and more humiliating ? Why should the provinces have to play the part of paupers, when they represent in this country interests far more important than the interests of the great corporations referred to ? Do you not think it would be a better policy to settle once for all, by means of a mutual understanding, the financial status of the provincial legislatures, so as to put a stop, for the future, to repeated demands for better terms ? A sad spectacle this House has been a witness to, within the last twenty-five years. Of course, to quote a sensible saying, it is the people who pay ; but it is also the same people who contribute millions to an overflowing public exchequer. It is no use quibbling here. The taxpayers in the various provinces are also the taxpayers of the central government. The additional sums which will be paid to the provinces by the Dominion government will be expended on agriculture, colonization and public education ; and after all, it is Canada that will benefit by them. An increase in the Dominion subsidies to the provinces is necessary, I may even say, it is imperative. From the very inception of confederation, a progressive increase in the revenue of the provinces should have been provided for, on the basis of a subsidy adjustable to the increase of population. Suppose that the population of the province of Quebec should receive an increase of one million within the next twenty years ; will any man, in his sober senses, pretend that the federal subsidy should continue for all time to come, to be determined on the original basis of the population of 1861 ? The question admits of no doubt. Therefore, it is necessary that there should be a fairer redistribution of income and expenditure. Let us bear in mind that the conditions in Canada have greatly changed since 1867. From the necessity of keeping pace with modern progress, from the development of our resources and the new needs of the country as well as the requirements of competition, fresh duties have devolved upon provincial governments which it would be idle to postpone any longer. As to the charges of extravagance brought against the provinces, I may say that they are worthless ; because, it stands to reason that when the provinces have aided in the building of great railway lines, and have opened up to settlement tracts of uncultivated lands, they have thereby notably contributed to the increase of population ; they have also increased tenfold the volume of general trade, and promoted, to a large extent, the development of the whole country. It would be, indeed, a very poor policy, quite at variance with sound political economy, to add to the embarrassed circumstances of the provinces, in proportion to the general development of the country. Take away from the provinces the assistance they are entitled to, and you thereby deprive them of the best incentive to self-development. As I said last year, the provinces exist, true enough, but they barely live under the present condition of affairs. They are entitled to something more than a bare existence; they have a right to live.

Motion agreed to.

SCUTTLING OF SCHOONER 'EUXINE.'

Mr. A. McLENNAN (Inverness) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council, and other papers, in connection with the prosecution, by the Customs Department, for the scuttling of the schooner 'Euxine,' of Margaree Island, while reported on a smuggling expedition, from St. Pierre, Miquelon.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). With regard to the motion, I do not know exactly what action the department took in the matter and how the case actually stands. It seems that all the papers are not available, but whatever papers can be had will be brought down. This is a case which occurred under the late government.

Mr. McLENNAN. It did occur some years ago, under the regime of the late administration, and seems to have hung fire somewhere between the departments and the courts. For some years nothing was done and the case stood in abeyance until a repetition of this species of illicit traffic in recent years caused public opinion to become alive to the importance of stamping it down. The proximity of the island of St. Pierre, Miquelon to Cape Breton has facilitated smuggling operations between the two places, and it is therefore of great urgency that offenders should be taught to respect the law. In order to do this, it is considered advisable to start in with the original offender and have this case pushed to the end. Hence it is that I call for the papers at present. The prosecution was entered into by the Customs Department under the late government, but it would seem that a very important witness on that occasion conveniently disappeared, which for the time set the case at rest, but it appears that in recent years evidence has become available which is calculated to throw some light upon this mysterious matter, and public opinion calls for a further probing of the case. I believe that important evidence which was not available on the first occasion is available now, and I hope that the department will take the case up where it seems to have dropped. When last heard of, I believe it was in the hands of the agent of the Department of Justice at that time in Halifax. Who that gentleman is I cannot recall, but the papers are in that office now and should be available. While I agree with the hon. minister that all the papers may not be available in his department, I shall be glad, if all those which are, should be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that Order No. 13, House again in Committee on Bill (No. 2) to amend chapter 8 of the Statutes of 1900 authorizing the grant of railway subsidies, be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraph and Telephone Lines.

Motion agreed to.

TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York) moved second reading of Bill (No. 4) respecting telephone companies. He said: This Bill is substantially the Bill introduced last session and it is of great public interest. I have discussed it very fully on previous occasions both in the House and in the Committee. And it is a Bill that demands passage now more than ever. It is altogether in the public interest, and will go a long way to promote commerce and communication. I do not intend, at the present time, to discuss it very fully, but I expect from the government to-night a statement of their intention with regard to the matter. Last session, when I introduced the Bill, the Minister of Justice, on behalf of the government, said it was the intention of the government to introduce a Bill dealing with the question. And he did introduce a Bill which came before the committee; and then the statement was made in the committee that the questions involved were of such a character that it would take a year to consider them fully. That year has elapsed. I have asked the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if it was the intention of the government to redeem its pledge and bring in a Bill this session. So far, I have not had an answer to that question. I am quite willing to give the leader of the House (Hon. Sir William Mulock) an opportunity to say now whether it is the intention of the government to bring in that Bill.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock). I was going to make a suggestion. Whether or not the government brings in a Bill, that circumstance would not be a good reason for not inviting the attention to this question. It is a very large question. The Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines is a large committee, comprising about three-fifths or, perhaps, three-quarters of the members of the House, and perhaps a better plan would be to let this go to the committee and have a thorough discussion there. The government and the House will then be better able to give an opinion on the subject.

Mr. MACLEAN. But a government must redeem its pledges.

Mr. MONK. Oh, no.

Mr. MACLEAN. Well, some of us take that view. A solemn pledge has been given to the people that we shall have a Telephone Bill this session. Deputations have been here and interviewed the government. The Minister of Justice said that he was giving all the attention he could to the constitutional question that had arisen. And I expect that Bill, and the country expects it. But the leader of the House tells us that he has no policy to announce and does not know what the intention of the government is——

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MACLEAN. Well, the hon. gentleman was not in a position to give any information on the matter. In all fairness, in view of the large issues that come up in connection with the question, a public statement ought to be made by the government with regard to it . But I am in the hands of the government, and I must go to the Committee with the Bill, fight it out there and then come back to the House, if necessary. There is only one change in my Bill from last session. While a number have raised the issue in this House that the Bill I introduced interfered with municipal rights, I never admitted that it did so, as at first drafted; but, to provide for that point, I have inserted a clause that any rights granted to the telephone companies under the charter of this Act are subject to the rights of municipalities. But I am not dealing with the constitutional question. I am dealing with a practical public grievance. A telephone monopoly exists in this country, and all I ask is that the telephone business be put on a competitive basis, that anybody and everbody may go into telephone business and that the well known principles of the law be applied to telephone business as to any other. So I have made the necessary provision regarding municipal rights. I intend to go on with the Bill. I am ready to go to the Committee; and, with that understanding, I move the second reading and that the Bill be sent to the Committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—TELEPHONES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 5) to amend the Railway Act. He said : This is a very short Bill. It deals with one phase of the telephone grievance in this country. That grievance has developed since last session. When a year's grace was given to the Bell Telephone Company they went out and made contracts with all the railway companies in Canada, and so they secured a telephone monopoly in all the railroad stations in the country. I contend that this is against public policy. The railroads of this country should be given facilities with regard to telephones, as they are compelled by the Railway Act to give equal facilities in their transportation of freight. This Bill is a very short amendment to secure that end. I should like to see the hon. member (Mr. Dyment) who represents Fort William and Port Arthur in his place to-night that he might tell us what is going on in those two progressive towns. The people in these towns have organized a municipal telephone service for the two towns. They are giving the people a better telephone service than the Bell Telephone Company gave, and charging only half its price. But they find, under this invidious agreement between the telephone companies and the railways, that the public telephone systems of these towns are debarred from entering the Canadian Pacific Railway station. And representatives of the people of Port Arthur and Fort William are here to-day in Ottawa to ask that the amendment that I now propose or some similar amendment may pass. In my riding of East York, the farmers—and I hope the farming members of the House will listen to me, and I hope the Postmaster General (Hon. Sir William Mulock) who comes from that county is listening to me, and I hope the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Ross) is in his place and listening to me—the farmers of East York, and of Pickering in South Ontario, could not get telephone connection. They implored the Bell Telephone Company to give it to them. An immense price was demanded. I have to pay $180 a year for my telephone service in the township of York. I find the service useful, and I have to pay the price. A veterinary half a mile away was asked $160 for a telephone service. But he cannot pay it, and is not able to answer his calls. This, of course, is a great inconvenience. All the doctors there were held up in the same way. But the farmers had enough spirit to organize an independent telephone system. They organized it on the basis of each man paying $40 as an initial payment; and an annual contribution of $5. On this basis they made first-class telephone service which they own and control themselves. Eighteen went into the first line. But they wished to have connection with the Locust Hill station of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But when they went there, they were told: Gentlemen, we cannot let the farmers' line into the station because of the exclusive agreement we gave to the Bell Telephone Company last year. I wired to Sir Thomas Shaughnessy about it, and he was willing to give the farmers the service if he could get out of his agreement with the Bell Telephone Company. Who were these farmers who applied to get access by telephone to the station? Every one of them was a customer of the Canadian Pacific Railway and all they wished was the privilege of being able to ask the Canadian Pacific Railway agent whether the trains were on time, whether their freight had arrived, and questions of that character which the railway people are only too pleased to answer, if you knock at their door—but if you wish to get in through a hole in the wall by a telephone wire, you have to ask the consent of the Bell Telephone Company. This is an iniquitous state of affairs, contrary to public policy. It is contrary to the political principles of both parties, and is a thing that ought to be stopped. All that my Bill does is to insist on every railway company giving equal telephone facilities to every one who asks for them. I would like to know where the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) is to-night and whether he is prepared to make a statement on this subject. Here are two Bills relating to the branch of affairs which he is supposed to administer, and he is not here to give us an answer to our questions. The hon. member for Victoria, N.S., spoke about the sessional gaieties the other evening. Apparently the sessional gaieties are taking up the time of the ministers, for they are not here to state the policy of the government on public questions. The farmers of Canada, from one end to the other are watching this little Bill, and they expect some kind of declaration with regard to it. I suppose that all the information I shall get is that I must go to the Committee. But what is the intention of the government?

Now, I would not have spoken so warmly on this point if I had not had a large experience of being jollied, as the term is, in committees in regard to these public Bills that I have introduced. I intend now to insist on some kind of fair treatment of these measures and some kind of statement from the government as to what they intend to do. They need not answer me if they don't wish to, but I will try the best way I know how to take care of these Bills and get a full discussion of them. I trust the House to-night will send this Bill on to the committee, and I trust further, in view of all the agitation in the country, and in view of the interest the farmers are taking on this question, that I will have the assistance of the government in passing both these Bills, especially this very short one. I am not exceeding my right in expecting that the ministers having charge of these important questions should be in their places and prepared to state the policy of the government in regard to them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. MACLEAN.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 15) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1900. He said: This is the same Bill I introduced on two former occasions. The object of the Bill is to amend the Dominion Elections Act so as to prevent what is now a most insidious and dangerous form of intimidation. I regret that I have to say it, and I say it with a feeling of shame, that in the province of Ontario we have not a secret ballot, and that is well known from one end of the province to the other. Though we have a secret ballot in the Dominion Act, it is well understood by those who know anything about these matters that when an election comes on men are intimidated and are told that the Dominion ballot is not secret, and they had better be very careful how they vote because it will be discovered. The object of this Bill is to make such a threat an offence against the Election Act, and to make it punishable and liable to the penalties that attend the usual acts of corruption. I do not think that I need spend any more time in urging the necessity of a Bill of this kind.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I think there is some misunderstanding. The Minister of Justice, who has these matters in charge, is not here to-night, and I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would allow his Bill to stand over. The minister had an impression that these Bills would not be reached to-night, otherwise he would have made some arrangement about them. So if the hon. gentleman has no objection to let it stand over, it will come up on the first order the next day.

Mr. CLANCY. I may inform the Minister of Finance that the Minister of Justice has already had that stand over on two occasions in order that he might take it to the block and use his hatchet. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that it is just as well that he should know my position. I do not intend that the Minister of Justice shall dispose of that Bill at this session without a vote of this House. I will accept the proposition made by the Minister of Finance on the understanding that the Bill shall not lose its place, and shall become the first order of the day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. When I say the first order—there are very few orders ahead of it. I do not make the suggestion with any intention of preventing a vote. There are only two or three motions ahead of it, and as we are at the beginning of the session, there is not the least danger that the matter will not come up again at an early date.

Motion withdrawn.

INTERPRETATION ACT.

On the order for :

Second reading of Bill (No. 18) to amend the Interpretation Act.—Mr. Monk.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). Does my hon. friend intend to ask that his Bill be referred to a committee ?

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). No, it is not necessary. It is a short Bill, and I do not think there can be much objection to it. Is the hon. gentleman ready to go on with it to-night ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the absence of the Minister of Justice, I would prefer that the hon. gentleman should let it stand, unless it goes to one of the main committees.

Mr. MONK. I would like to get it advanced one stage to-night. The hon. gentleman will recollect that I brought that Bill in last year, and put it off several times. It failed to become law last year. I do not think there can be any objection whatever to its taking a second reading to-night. I would like it to be advanced one stage, and when it comes to be discussed in Committee of the Whole, if there are any objections to it, they can be urged then. Otherwise I would like to go on with it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Sir William Mulock). The second reading would be admitting the principle.

Mr. MONK. It does, as a general rule.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The practice is to refer such Bills to a committee where they can be threshed out. Otherwise I would prefer if the hon. gentleman would let it stand until the Minister of Justice is in his seat.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Unless he wants it to go to a committee.

Mr. MONK. There is no necessity for its going to any committee. There is no committee to send it to.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows :—

MINTO.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1903, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the message of His Excellency and the estimates he referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 66) to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. He said : I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of presenting to the House a measure for the redistribution of the representation in the House of Commons, rendered necessary by the last census. Perhaps before proceeding any further it might not be amiss if I would remind the House that in introducing this Bill, the government is not acting in any discretionary sense, but is performing an imperative constitutional duty, the constitution having provided that after each decennial census there should take place a redistribution of the representation of the different provinces in this House. Three years ago I introduced a redistribution measure, but that was very different from the one I am now submitting. That was simply a partial measure of redistribution, a discretionary measure, one which we had the option of presenting or not, and our object then was not to frame a general scheme of redistribution, but simply to correct certain errors—or to use perhaps a more severe but more appropriate term—certain injustices which had been perpetrated on the province of Ontario by the Redistribution Act of 1882, and on the province of Quebec, by the Redistribution Act of 1892. The motive therefore and the provisions of that measure were very different from those of the present one. Perhaps also it would not be amiss for me to inform the House that the distribution of population, as revealed by the census of 1901, will cause some disturbance in the proportion of the representation now held by the different provinces of the Dominion on the floor of this House.

Let me read a statement showing the increase in population in the Dominion as a whole, and in the various provinces, comparing 1891 with 1901, when the last census was taken.

	1891.	1901.
Dominion of Canada....	4,833,239	5,371,315
Prince Edward Island ..	109,078	103,289
Nova Scotia....	450,396	459,574
New Brunswick.....	321,263	331,120

	1891.	1901.
Province of Ontario.....	2,114,321	2,182,947
Manitoba....	152,206	255,211
British Columbia..	98,173	178,657
North-west Territories..	66,799	158,940
Province of Quebec	1,488,535	1,648,898

The province of Quebec, I need hardly remind the House, is the pivot of representation, on which depends the proportion of the representation to be allowed each province. The population of the province of Quebec being 1,488,535, and its representation being limited, under all circumstances to 65 members, it follows that the representation of the province of Quebec in this House is in the proportion of 25,367 for one member. This number therefore, 25,367, being the unit of representation of the province of Quebec, becomes the unit of representation for the rest of the Dominion, and according to this unit the province of Prince Edward Island will only be entitled to four members in this House, and thus lose one. The population of Nova Scotia being 459,574, the unit of representation would give it a total representation in this House of 18 instead of the 20 members it now has. New Brunswick, having a population of 321,220, the unit of representation would give it 13 instead of 14 members as at present. And the province of Ontario having a population of 2,182,947, would have a total representation of 86 instead of 92 members. All these provinces east of Lake Superior, therefore, except the province of Quebec, whose representation must remain stationary, will lose a part of their representation.

On the other hand, the population of British Columbia, which at present has six members, will be represented by an additional one, and have seven instead of six. The province of Manitoba will have its representation increased by three, and have ten instead of seven. In the case of the North-west Territories, we have made special provisions, the territories not being bound by the letter of the constitutional law, to which I will allude later on.

Upon the exact proportion of the representation allotted to the several provinces there can be no possible controversy. Everybody is aware that in those provinces which, according to the new redistribution must lose part of their representation, there has been some flurry of excitement, and well intentioned and well disposed persons have been making endeavours to convince themselves that by torturing the letter of the law, the law itself might be made to express the reverse of what it actually expresses. Unfortunately, the letter of the law is such as not to allow of any doubt. Three redistributions have already taken place in this Dominion—in 1872, 1882 and 1892. In almost every one of these redistributions, the same thing has occurred. Certain provinces have been forced to lose some part of their representation, and naturally protests were made, but the matter has been debated and discussed and determined by such able jurists and eminent men as Sir John Macdonald, the Hon. Edward Blake and Sir John Thompson, and it is not possible—for my part I am indeed sorry, and I express my sorrow very sincerely that certain provinces will have to lose part of their representation in this House—but it is not possible to avoid this. We have to abide by the law and to apply the law, and in applying the law the question is more of mathematics than of anything else. We have only to take the provisions of the constitution, section 51, and the figures of the census, and find the result. In this matter parliament is not a free agent. It has no discretion to exercise, but is simply the instrument and creature of the law, and in this particular Bill we have only to take the result of the census and make the redistribution accordingly, giving to each province the number of members to which it is entitled, some having less, others having more, but all being bound by the same rule. So far, as I say, the powers of parliament are limited; but in the creation of the constituencies which are to elect members to this House, the powers of parliament are unlimited; and those powers can be used either for good or for evil, either for very much good or for very much evil. We, on this side of the House, have always complained, that, in previous redistributions which have taken place—and which have taken place always under the same party, the Conservative party, now in opposition—the opposition of the day were unfairly treated. I grant that this is a matter in which the temptation is great to the party in office to abuse its power, to take an unfair advantage of its opponents, and to so arrange the constituencies as to secure the return to parliament of more members of its own political faith than the actual political opinion of the country at large would warrant. I would avoid, if possible, upon this occasion, which, in some respects, is a solemn one—I would avoid, as far as I can, any recrimination concerning the past. But, without any recrimination, and referring to the past only for illustration, let me call attention to a list of forty-two constituencies in Ontario created by the redistributions of 1882 and 1892, in which the total of the popular vote recorded gave a clear Liberal majority, but in which, notwithstanding, there was a clear Conservative majority of members elected. The names of these constituencies are as follows :

Brant South, Bruce West, Bruce South, Durham East, Durham West, Elgin East, Elgin West, Essex North, Essex South, Hastings North, Hastings East, Hastings West, Kent, Lambton East, Lambton West, Leeds and Grenville, Leeds South, Grenville South, Lanark North, Lanark South, Northumberland East, Northumberland West, Oxford South, Oxford North, Ontario North, Ontario South, Ontario West, Perth North, Perth South, Peterborough East, Peterborough West, Renfrew North, Renfrew South, Victoria North, Victoria South, Waterloo North, Waterloo South, Wellington

Centre, Wellington North, Wellington South, Wentworth North and Brant.

Here we have forty-two ridings. The popular vote for the Liberal candidates in the last election was 88,363; and the popular vote in favour of the Conservative candidates was 86,392, a clear Liberal majority of 1,973. The result in these counties which thus gave a clear Liberal popular majority was that twenty-five Conservatives were elected and seventeen Liberals, a clear Conservative majority for these constituencies of eight in this House. Now, I presume there is not a fair-minded man in this House who will not agree with me that such a condition of things is not fair or just. It is a condition of things not conducive to good government, and should not exist under our free parliamentary constitution. That we should desire to correct that evil goes as a matter of course. We certainly intend to undo this evil, but while that is the case, let me say at once that, though we intend to undo the injustice perpetrated at the expense of the Liberal party, it is not with the view or intention of perpetrating a similar injustice at the expense of our opponents. What we have in view and what we desire is to introduce a fair measure that will give all parties an equal measure of justice, freedom and responsibility. The Liberal party has always contended that the redistribution that must follow each decennial census should take place under certain rules, well understood, well defined, and which everybody could appreciate. These should be the unwritten law of the country, and apply wherever and whenever a redistribution takes place, and should be applied, whichever party is in power. We have always maintained that the guiding principle in this redistribution should be that county boundaries should be preserved. And we lay to-day as the basis of redistribution, which we hold ought to be accepted and adopted on this occasion, that the municipal representation of the country ought to be the basis of the parliamentary representation. The position we take is that we should take the map of the municipal organizations of the Dominion and make it the basis of the parliamentary representation. There are countries for which one man is sufficient. The unit of population—which, of course, cannot be followed with absolute exactness would not warrant any more. There are other counties in which there may be two or three members to be elected. There are certain cities in which there must be more than three or four members, whereas there are other municipalities whose population is so small relative to the unit of population that they should not be allowed to send even one member here. This, therefore, involves the work of selecting, of dividing, of uniting. And the question arises now—and, perhaps, it is the most delicate of all the questions with which we have to deal—by whom is this work to be effected? Who is to make this division of counties—if counties are to be divided; who is to direct this union of counties if counties are to be united? This is a question of great moment; and, after having given it the best consideration we are able to give it, we think that, in this, as in mostly all matters, the best policy to follow, the best and safest rule, is to follow the policy and the rule, which, under similar circumstances prevails in that country which has been the mother of all free institutions—Great Britain. We propose, therefore, on this occasion, as we did on a former occasion when the last Redistribution Bill was before us, to propose to the House to follow the British precedent. The last redistribution which took place in England took place in 1884, under the government of Mr. Gladstone. On that occasion, Mr. Gladstone, before making his Bill, adopted the policy which we intend to follow on this occasion. The Bill was prepared, at the invitation of Mr. Gladstone, by a conference of the two parties in the House of Commons, by a conference of the government and the opposition. Mr. Gladstone invited Lord Salisbury, who was then the leader of the opposition to meet with him and discuss with him the details of the Redistribution Bill which he had to introduce, following consequent upon the new Franchise Act. This conference took place, and, as a result a measure was introduced which proved satisfactory to both parties. Let me quote to the House what took place on that occasion—and I quote from a well known book, 'The Annual Register' of 1884. After having stated that Lord Salisbury had been invited by Mr. Gladstone to meet him and discuss the details of the measure with him the author goes on to say:

> During the next fortnight the process of arrangement was steadily pursued. Lord Salisbury and Sir S. Northcote attended the meetings of the cabinet, and conducted the negotiations with the specially selected delegates of that body.

So, there was a conferencee between members of the government and the leaders of the opposition in order to frame a measure which would be satisfactory to both parties. When the last Bill was introduced in this House in 1892, we were sitting in opposition, and we proposed to our opponents to adopt the same methods. When the Bill came up for its second reading I, sitting where my friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) now sits, moved the following:—

> That Bill No. 76, an Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons be referred to a conference or committee to be composed of both political parties to agree upon the lines or principles upon which the Redistribution Bill should be drawn.

Unfortunately, this proposition was not accepted. But, though our proposition was not accepted, still, we do not intend to depart from the principle we then laid down. What we claimed for ourselves when we were in the minority, we are now ready to grant to our opponents when they are in the minority. We intend, therefore, to have the details of this measure submitted to our opponents, if they will agree to our proposal. From some remarks which I understand fell from the lips of the hon. gentleman opposite, even that measure of justice is not acceptable to him. It is very difficult to satisfy the hon. gentleman; but whether he is satisfied or not, I doubt if anything can be more fair than what we now offer to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. If the right hon. gentleman refers to me, I beg to say that my opinion is the very reverse. I am well satisfied, and was commending the government for proposing to carry out the platform which they laid down when in opposition.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am satisfied with the spirit in which my hon. friend receives my remarks; I apologize to him, and hope to have his support for this Bill. The Bill which I have the honour to introduce will be in these words:

Act to readjust the representation of the House of Commons.

Whereas the results of the census of 1901 necessitate a readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, and the other statutes in that behalf, and it is expedient at the same time to provide for an increased representation in the said House of the North-west Territories: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. The House of Commons shall consist of 214 members, of whom 86 shall be elected for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 18 for Nova Scotia, 13 for New Brunswick, 10 for Manitoba, 7 for British Columbia, 4 for Prince Edward Island, 10 for the North-west Territories and 1 for the Yukon Territory.

2. The said provinces and territories respectively shall, for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the said House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts and be represented as provided in the schedule to this Act.

3. Every town, village, township, parish or place lying within the territorial limits of any electoral district, and not specifically included in any other electoral district by the said schedule, shall be and be taken to be part of the electoral district in which it is so locally situate.

4. Wherever in the said schedule any word or expression is used to denote the name of any territorial division, such word or expression shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be construed as indicating such territorial division as it exists and is bounded at the date of the passing of this Act.

5. This Act shall take effect only upon the dissolution of the present parliament.

Now, this is the Bill which I intend to move. There is no schedule attached to it. If this Bill is accepted by our friends on the other side, we intend, after it has been debated and read the second time, to refer it to a special committee composed of seven members, on which the opposition will be represented by three, to be selected by themselves. The object of the committee will be to create the constituencies which will be allowed to elect the members of this House. In other words, we do not present to the House to-day a scheme cut and dried which has to be swallowed holus bolus by our friends and by the opposition, whether they like it or not; no, we propose to invite our friends now sitting on the opposition benches to meet us in the committee room and there discuss with us the division of the constituencies, and in fact the creation of all constituencies which shall be empowered to elect the members of this House. We propose to do what has been done in England by the government of Mr. Gladstone. We believe that if our friends opposite will meet us in this way, we can prepare a measure which will be at all events fair to all parties. We believe that we shall be able to bring into this House a measure which will be free from those blemishes which are to be found in the Redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892. We believe that if they will agree to meet us in committee, to discuss this Bill fairly, without trying to take an undue advantage over each other, we shall be able to present to the House a measure of which every Canadian will have reason to feel proud, a measure which will be free from those contentious elements which characterized former Redistribution Acts which have been passed in the history of the Dominion of Canada. We intend to do this as a basis to be followed not only upon this occasion, but upon all occasions.

Now, I have to say one word with regard to the North-west Territories. The population of the North-west Territories was 158,940 according to the last census. According to the unit of representation, they are entitled to only six members. But we are not bound by the letter of the constitution so far as representation of the North-west Territories is concerned. Therefore, we propose to give to those Territories a representation in this House of ten members. The population of that region to-day is at least 250,000, which, at present, is no doubt sufficient to entitle them to ten members. It is increasing by leaps and bounds, and in a few years that population—

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Provided they are British subjects.

The PRIME MINISTER. They cannot vote unless they are British subjects. That is the reason why we want to give to the North-west Territories very extensive representation in this House, because we want to make it an object for all these newcomers to take the oath of allegiance, and to become British subjects, to take upon themselves the advantages and responsibilities of Canadians. These, Mr. Speaker, are the chief features of the measure which I have the honour to propose to the House. I hope that they will commend themselves to the unbiased judgment of all the members of the House, whether on this side or the other side.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I may say in the first place that I do not think my right hon. friend has pursued his researches into the constituencies of Ontario very far. If he had done so he would easily have found twenty-five Liberal constituencies and seventeen Conservative constituencies in that province which would have presented, not only an equal, but a greater anomaly of an exactly opposite character to that to which he drew the attention of the House. I hardly think that an argument of that kind was worthy of my right hon. friend unless he is prepared to look at the question from all possible aspects. Before he charges injustice against the Conservatives in respect to the Bill of 1892, it would have been proper for him to examine more closely all the constituencies, in that province, the results in all the constituencies, to ascertain whether as great an anomaly might not be found in the opposite direction as that which he presented to the House to-day. We all know that under any possible system it is necessary for these things to be. We cannot devise any system under which anomalies of that kind cannot be discovered; and the mere fact that you can find twenty-five constituencies and seventeen constituencies presenting the condition of affairs which the hon gentleman speaks of, is no legitimate argument whatever in favour of the contention that he has made unless he goes further and examines the results in the constituencies from every possible standpoint.

Now, I do not know that I have fully apprehended all the details of the Bill which my right hon. friend has presented, but, when it is printed, and before it comes up for the second reading we shall have an opportunity of considering what its provisions really are. Speaking offhand, I may say that the proposal for a conference for the purpose of determining the boundaries of the different constituencies would impress one as having the merit of fairness although we recognize that by means of the committee holding a majority from the other side of the House, that fairness might not in the end be so real as suggested by my hon. friend. However, I am bound to assume that my right hon. friend means what he says when he declares that the proposal is to make a fair Redistribution Bill. It will be, of course, open to us to bring the results of the committee's work before the House and have such a discussion as we may think necessary in case we do not conclude that the action of the committee partakes of the fairness which my right hon. friend promises.

There is one point, however, upon which I would like to say a word or two and upon which I would like to have some information from my right hon. friend before this Bill goes to its second reading, and that is whether or not there have been any representations made by the governments of any of the provinces in regard to the proposed reduction in the representation of the provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and whether or not the opinion of the law officers of the Crown has been given in respect to the contention made by these provinces. My right hon. friend has suggested to-day that there is no possible question upon this subject. I understand that the law officers of the province of New Brunswick have given an exactly opposite opinion to that which my right hon. friend expresses to-day. I have not seen their opinion, I do not know of it except by mere report, but this is what I understand. I do not propose to-day, to make any argument upon the question but merely to bring to the attention of the House and of my right hon. friend what I understand the question is which has been presented from certain quarters in regard to the reduction in the representation of the provinces I have named. Section three of the British North America Act of 1867 provides:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this Act, the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall form and be one Dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three provinces shall form and be one Dominion under that name accordingly.

Section four of the Act is as follows:

> The subsequent provisions of this Act shall, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, commence and have effect on and after the union, that is to say, on and after the day appointed for the union taking effect in the Queen's proclamation; and in the same provisions, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, the name Canada shall be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this Act.

Now, take the case of the section that immediately follows by way of illustration and what do you have? Section five provides:

> Canada shall be divided into four provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

It is perfectly obvious that the word 'Canada, as used in teat section, implies and includes only the four provinces that have already been named. The next section to which I would invite the attention of my right hon. friend and of the House, is section thirty-seven, which declares as follows:

> The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of one hundred and eighty-one members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia and fifteen for New Brunswick.

Then, the next section to which I would invite the attention of the House is section fifty-one, which reads as follows :

On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such a manner, and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules :—

(1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members ;

(2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained);

(3) In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded ; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number.

Fourth, and this is the important subsection :

(4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province as ascertained at the then latest census be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards ;

(5) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

There is another section which is important to be considered in this connection. It is section 146, which provides as follows :

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, on addresses from the Houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the Houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union, and on address from the Houses of the parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the North-western territory, or either of them, into the union, on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act ; and the provisions of any Order in Council in that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Now, it is important to observe in construing this Act, in the first place that it contemplates the incorporation of other colonies and provinces into the Dominion which are referred to in section 146 of the Act and it is important to pay particular attention to the language of section fifty-one, because section fifty-one says that :

Representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority——

And it uses the word 'Canada,' in subsection 4. What the word 'Canada' means has been defined by section four of the Act. Canada in all the subsequent provisions of the Act means 'Canada as constituted under this Act.'

What is the meaning of the expression 'as constituted under this Act'? Certainly it means, in section five, simply the four provinces of Canada, because that section provides that :

Canada shall be divided into four provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

The suggestion is that section fifty-one constituted a compact between the four provinces which was not to be disturbed by the admission of any other colonies, that it constituted a compact under which the province of Quebec should never at any time have less than sixty-five members and under which the other provinces should never have a smaller number of members than the proportion they were entitled to according to the population of Quebec, and there was the further provision that their representation should at no time be reduced unless the population had been diminished by one-twentieth part as compared with the total population of Canada.

I know that there are important provisions affecting this question in the shape of the addresses which were subsequently passed by the legislatures of the different provinces afterwards admitted, and which were passed by the parliament of Canada. And also I do not put out of my mind the legislation passed by this parliament and ratified—if that is the proper expression—by the imperial parliament, with regard to the admission of Manitoba and Rupert's Land. But the argument which I think may be fairly made is this : That if you once regard section 51 as a contract between these provinces, fixing as between themselves the terms upon which their representation shall be had in future, then you must find very clear language indeed within the addresses or within subsequent legislation such as I have spoken of, if you are to depart from that contract so established between the four provinces which constituted Canada in the first instance. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is a fair subject for inquiry at the present time, as to whether or not any representations have been made with regard to this by any of the provinces; and whether the opinion of the law officers of the Crown has been had with regard to it. I think it is also right, that the opinion of the law officers here, if any has been obtained, should be laid on the Table of the House and should be printed for the information of all hon. members who may desire to address themselves to that subject.

I may only say further in dealing with the matter at the present time, that my right hon. friend in introducing the measure which was brought before this House in 1899 laid down the principle that any division of counties should take place by means of a judicial commission. I will quote to my right hon. friend the language which he then used and I may say that I did not gather from his remarks to-day any special reason why the principle which was laid down then should be departed from now. The right hon. gentleman said :

Whenever a county is to be divided into ridings ; whenever a county which up to that time is entitled to one member becomes entitled to two or three members; the division should take place by judicial decision and authority. This is the second principle upon which we base the Bill that we introduce to the House now.

I suppose it is in view of the departure from that principle, that my right hon. friend speaks of the measure now introduced as a measure of a different character from that which he then laid down before the House. I do not know in what respect it differs. This measure is of course wider reaching in so far as, being based upon the results of the last census it gives a very much increased representation to Manitoba and the North-west Territories; but apart from that, the principle which is proper for one Act would seem proper for the other, although I do not wish in saying this to qualify in any respect what I have already said with regard to the proposal which the right hon. gentleman has made. I therefore will not take up the time of the House further at present, but I will ask my right hon. friend or the Minister of Justice to inform the House upon the matters which I thus briefly bring to their notice in order that we may be able to more intelligently discuss this Bill when it comes for its second reading.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any lengthy discussion of the measure now before the House, but merely for the purpose of asking my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, if he commits himself definitely to the opinion which has been expressed, to the effect that the word 'Canada' in subsection 4 of section 51, means not the Canada of to-day but the four original provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, and that the proportion referred to under this section is to be estimated with regard to the aggregate population of these provinces, and not with regard to the population of the Dominion as it now exists ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I expressly said when I rose to speak that I did not propose to argue the question at the present time; that I proposed to state for the information of the House the point as I understood it which had been made by the law officers of the province of New Brunswick, and to inquire whether the executive of Canada had obtained the opinion of its law officers, and to ask that we might be favoured with a perusal of that opinion in case it had been obtained.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I may say for the information of my hon. friend and of the House, that an opinion was expressed by the law officers of the crown in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, somewhat on the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman. I think it would be proper to have the representations made by these governments to the federal government, and also the answer which I made thereto. Possibly after my hon. friend has seen—because after all to discuss these representations one has to see the words in which they were made—after my hon. friend has seen the representations and the answer, he may possibly think that there is considerable opinion in favour of the position heretofore taken at the time each Representation Act was introduced.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, what boundaries it is intended to adopt ? Under the Bill they appear to refer to the electoral districts. It says : The boundaries may be the electoral districts, as described by this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is to be determined by the committee or the conference.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understood from the Prime Minister that there were going to be some fixed boundaries.

The PRIME MINISTER. No boundaries are fixed.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. County boundaries.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is what we propose the conference for. We intend that municipal boundaries should be observed.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman used the words 'municipal boundaries.' That does not mean county boundaries.

The PRIME MINISTER. Municipal county boundaries.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Then that is not in the Act. The hon. gentleman spoke of a schedule. Has he laid the schedule on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. No; I stated that the schedule was in blank.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That is to be made at the conference.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. All right.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House go again into Committee of Supply.

Hon. JOHN COSTIGAN (Victoria, N.B.) I rise, Sir, for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the motion that you leave the Chair to go into Committee of Supply. I believe it is unnecessary for me to say that in proposing this amendment I am not proposing it as an amendment of want of confidence, or as an unfriendly motion against the government. But, I avail of this opportunity to bring before the parliament of Canada a subject, in which I may be pardoned for saying, that I have always taken a very deep interest, and I think I am justified in stating that I intend to discuss a subject which is of great importance not only to this House and to this parliament; and not only to the people of Canada, but a subject which is to-day engaging the serious attention of the best minds of the empire. I beg to place in your hands, Mr. Speaker, the following amendment which I move, seconded by my hon. friend Mr. Hackett, of Prince County, P.E.I. :

That an humble address be presented to His Majesty as follows :—

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, desire most earnestly in our own name and on behalf of the people whom we represent to renew the expressions of our unswerving loyalty and devotion to Your Majesty's person and government.

We would respectfully represent to Your Majesty that in 1882 the parliament of Canada adopted an humble address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen expressing the hope that a just measure of home rule would be granted to the people of Ireland, and that in the year 1886 by resolution of the House of Commons the sentiments of the said address to Her Most Gracious Majesty were earnestly reiterated and the hope again expressed that such a measure of home rule would be passed by the imperial parliament.

That the years that have elapsed since the adoption of the aforesaid address and resolution to Your Most Gracious Majesty's illustrious and ever-to-be-lamented predecessor have but served to emphasize the blessings which accrue to this Dominion from the federal system under which the people live, the benefits of which the Commons of Canada rejoice to see are about to be shared in by their fellow-subjects of the Australian Commonwealth, and therefore this extended experience which Your Most Gracious Majesty's subjects have had of the inestimable benefits resulting from the said government bestowed on the whole of British North America but intensifies their desire to affirm through their representatives in parliament the sentiments expressed in the said address and resolution with regard to the bestowal of self-government on Your Majesty's subjects in Ireland.

We have observed, may it please your Majesty, with feelings of profound satisfaction, the evidence afforded in the debate in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom on the Speech from the Throne, of a sincere desire on all sides to usher in a new era of lasting peace and good will in Ireland; and this House congratulates the people of the mother country on the legislation just and equitable, which it is believed will follow the recent conference on the land question and hopes for an early and lasting settlement fair to all of that long vexed and troublesome problem, the solution of which has for so long taxed the powers of British statesmen.

Mr. Speaker, twenty years is a considerable period in the life of a man. It is a considerable period in the life of a parliament ; and if we look back over the last twenty years since, on an occasion similar to this, I had the honour of moving a resolution, the first of its kind, inviting the parliament of Canada to express its sympathy with the people who ask for the blessings which are so highly appreciated by ourselves here, we can see the changes which have taken place and the progress which has been made in that time. We can see that the Canada which we were all so proud of then has made giant strides in the path of progress and prosperity ; we can see the advantages of that wise policy which has extended to this country, that measure of liberty which makes every Canadian proud to boast of his Canadianship ; and we can see that, to my mind, greater change of feeling which has taken place in Great Britain itself. We are all, I am sure, proud of that feeling, and I hope that to-day no word will escape my lips that might arouse recrimination or anything but the kindest spirit of harmony in this parliament as it is now maintained in the parliament of Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh. Rats.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. Oh, I know where that comes from.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. I merely notice those cries and slurs. If they please the hon. gentlemen who utter them, they do not hurt me ; I rise above them, I stand above them, and the Canadian people stand above them. The people of the empire stand above them. These old slurs, which did service in the years gone by, have no more power to-day. The intelligence of the people is what sways the people to-day, not these bugbears that are raised. What is there, Sir, to bring forth the cries of some hon. gentlemen who interrupt me when I make an honest appeal ?—and I have never made any but an honest appeal. What is there to justify the insinuation implied by these sneers, that I am not speaking the honest sentiments of my mind, from my own light and judgment ? I have never given any indication of anything else. Is it because twenty years ago I entertained the same warm feelings on this subject that I do to-day ? I am proud to say that those feelings, which were not then shared in so largely by the people, are to-day shared in by nearly the whole people. In all that time have I or have the men behind me, those descendants from the land of my forefathers shown any lack in the proper discharge of their duties as citizens of this country ? I say no. We have expressed our sympathy with the mother land ; but in expressing that sympathy from 1882 up to the present day, the men who sneer cannot point to an act on our part indicating any want of loyalty to the land in which we live or to the empire to which we belong. Then, let them sneer.

For one, I hope we shall have no more of that. I hope I may appeal to this House for a fair, calm hearing on a subject which I think well deserves the serious attention of the people of Canada to-day.

I may say, in advance, Mr. Speaker, that if I should drop one word that might fairly be construed to be offensive to any member of this House, or unworthy of the dignity of this parliament, I would feel that I was doing my cause an injury and committing an offence against the rules of propriety and the rules of this parliament. Sir, what is the object of the resolution which I have just placed in your hands ? Its object is that this parliament should give expression to the feelings of satisfaction which I know pervades every mind and heart at the bright prospects of the pacification of the empire, and the pacification of Ireland, which has had cause of complaint, as is admitted frankly and honestly by the British government to-day. But I understand, though it has not yet been said, that I am to be attacked because I couple the subject of home rule with that expression. It is said, Oh, these Irish will never be satisfied ; the government of Great Britain proposes to pledge $500,000,000 of its credit and to make a direct grant of $60,000,000 more, and still the people of Ireland are not content ; this member for Victoria is not willing to accept the settlement, but must rise and obtrude this question of home rule.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I suppose you do not mean me when you say the member for Victoria ?

Mr. HUGHES (North Victoria, Ont.) Nor do I suppose the hon. member means the member for North Victoria, Ont. ?

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. I mean the member for Victoria, N.B., I stand corrected. My reference to the former action of this parliament seems to me to be quite legitimate and easily understood. In 1882 a resolution not only suggesting that home rule might properly be extended to Ireland, but covering the release of the prisoners at that time, was introduced into this parliament. Evidently none of the gentlemen who appear to be unfriendly to my position to-day were in parliament at that time, or if they were, they did not vote against that proposition. The proposition was carried by the unanimous vote of the House of Commons and in the Senate it was carried with only six dissenting votes. In 1886 and 1887 similar resolutions were again introduced and received the generous support of this House. Let me say that I think it is unfair to jump at a conclusion and take such a different tone here from what is taken in England on this question. Why should it be any great offence to make in this parliament a reference to its action in past years, in 1882, 1886 and 1887, in favour of home rule ? At)these different periods parliament was asked to express its sympathy with home rule, and asked on what ground ? On the ground that we were a portion of the British Empire and had been given the privilege of self-government, and having had the experience of its happy operation and good effects in this country, we thought that we might very reasonably ask this House to express its opinion that what worked so well in this country might well be tried as an experiment in Ireland, and this House generously responded to the appeal. Parliament took that view—a very fair and moderate view—and so expressed itself on several occasions. I am simply asking the House to reiterate the expression of parliament on those occasions. With reference to the land question and the bright prospects of the settlement of that question, had I the eloquence of a Gratton or a McGee, I would use it to praise the generous spirit in which the British government have come forward to-day to grapple with this problem and settle it. I have no desire to cavil or to minimize the liberality of the British government as shown in this broad measure which, as far as can be seen at present, involves $500,000,000 of its credit and $60,000,000 of a bonus to bring about a peaceful settlement of the land question in Ireland. I am moved by as deep gratitude to the government which has introduced that measure of reconciliation as any man in or out of this parliament.

Why should the mention of home rule be a bugbear ? Has it grown so obnoxious in this country or the motherland as to justify any hostility or opposition to the mention of or any reference to it here to-day ? Certainly not. Why, the question of home rule is to-day an imperial question. It has assumed broader proportions than ever before. The best English minds to-day are engaged on it. They say that they are not going to confine their attention to Ireland alone but will give home rule to Scotland, England and Wales as well, and I am proud to know that the experience of Canada is the great object lesson cited to show the desirability of granting local self government to the different portions of the United Kingdom. I shall quote in a few minutes the words of a prominent English statesman who is in favour of home rule all around. Our parliament, the British parliament, he says, is overburdened with legislation that should not belong to it. Its time is so much taken up with local affairs, that it is unable to properly deal with matters of imperial concern. What is the remedy ? There is but one and that will be found on Canadian lines. Just think of it, Mr. Speaker, the men in the empire to-day who are conducting the business of the United Kingdom, who are considering the changes that require to be made in the British government system—these men say you must provide for Scotch affairs being settled in Scotland by a local parliament, for Irish affairs being settled in Ireland by a local parliament, and English affairs by an English local parliament, and

Welsh business, if necessary, by a Welsh parliament, thus relieving the great imperial parliament of those burdensome subjects which could be much better passed upon and disposed of by local bodies, thus enabling the great central body to deal with the problems that affect the empire at large. Just imagine in what a position this Dominion of Canada—a young giant, surprising the world by its rapid progress—would be if all our local legislatures were swept away and if all the local questions now dealt with by these bodies had to be settled by this parliament? Why, we would then find it impossible to deal with Dominion matters at all. If such a condition of things would be the result here, what must be the condition of that parliament which has to regulate the affairs of the greatest empire in the world? Let me just read a note which I received a few days ago and which justifies me in saying that the question of home rule is not a bugbear any longer either here or in England, Ireland, Scotland or Wales. I have a letter dated March 15, 1903, and written by the Hon. T. S. Brassey:

> Dear Sir,—I observe in to-day's paper, the Daily 'Chronicle,' that you intend to raise the question of home rule in the Canadian parliament. You may, therefore, be interested to hear that there is a movement on this side going forward, the object of which is to educate public opinion to the view that the settlement of the great question of home rule is to be found on Canadian lines. I inclose a leaflet giving an article and speeches on the subject and an account of the work done.
> Yours truly,
> T. S. BRASSEY.

What is the work done over there? Let me quote from a sheet published by a regularly organized committee in England:

> At present the English, Irish and Welsh members have all to be consulted on Scottish affairs, about which they know and care nothing.
>
> If Scotland wishes a reform of the land laws or the liquor laws, or any other laws, it must be submitted to the English voter, who knows little and cares less about the people and condition of affairs about which he is voting.
>
> If Edinburgh wants to get a new water supply; if Glasgow wants to license its newspaper boys; if a little railway is going to be constructed in the Highlands, the matter cannot be settled in Scotland. It has to be decided on by the parliament in London, at tremendous cost of money and trouble to the Scottish people, and the frightful waste of time of parliament.
> There is so much to be done that very little is done. Many laws which every one agrees should be passed are not passed because there is no time to consider them. How can we get out of this mess? There is only one way, and that is the way proposed by the Liberals: Scottish affairs should be managed in Scotland; English affairs should be managed in England; Irish affairs should be managed in Ireland; Welsh affairs should be managed in Wales.

I could give other quotations if I were not afraid of taking up too much of the time of the House, from the speeches of Mr. Brassey made at several meetings under the auspices of this committee, which was organized for the purpose of educating public opinion in the mother country in favour of the policy of giving home rule all around. And they pay us the compliment of saying that the system of government for the old country must be upon Canadian lines. I say that that is a great compliment to the Canadian people; it is an acknowledgment of the freedom of Canada, than which no country in the world enjoys more. It is a justification of our pride in our system that the leading men of the imperial parliament from which we take example, declare: We have reached the stage when imperial legislation is blocked, when the hands of the British parliament are tied, when it is impossible to do justice to great questions of imperial policy, when a solution must be found and we believe that that solution lies in following the precedent set by Canada.

I dare say it will be said by some: We all hold up our hands in favour of the settlement of the land question, but you should not couple home rule with that question. I believe that a time will come when the parliament of Great Britain will give its sanction to home rule. But even after home rule has become the law of the land, when it has been enacted by parliament and assented to by His Majesty, when it is put forward as the law of the empire, there will still be found croakers to question its expediency and justice. That is but natural. I have no fault to find with any gentleman who expresses an opinion simply because his opinion does not agree with mine. But, while I take that position, I believe that the arguments of those who hold views against home rule should not prevail against the reception of this resolution which I hold to be a very moderate one. It cannot be condemned on the ground that it calls upon the British parliament to suspend its action upon the Land Bill and press forward at once a home rule Bill. There is no such demand here. There is no command in this to the British parliament. There is simply a reiteration of the declaration made by this House in favour of home rule as approved by Canadian experience. I hope to see the land question settled and settled this session. But Ireland, through its leading men, through its press, through its sons all over the world, is showing to-day its appreciation of the olive branch that is held out. The people of Ireland show their appreciation of the change of policy from coercion to conciliation. And we also delight in the changed attitude of the British government upon that subject. We believe—all free men believe—that legitimate conciliation is more powerful than coercion can be. Therefore, when I say that I rise in sympathy with the movement in favour of a measure of relief for Ireland and the settlement of the land question, I am moved by the belief not only that that movement is best in the interest of Ireland, but that it is best in the interest of the empire. While we view with admiration the generosity, the wise generosity, of England towards the conquered people of South Africa in voting money and doing everything else to establish peace and harmony there, to reconcile those people to English rule and make them loyal citizens of the empire, do you think we can feel less sympathy for that generous policy when it is extended to the people of Ireland? No people in the world can be more grateful than the Irish people can be, and will be for this new policy in Ireland; but not even Ireland will reap more benefit from that conciliation than will the empire itself broadly considered. I do not minimize the importance of gaining the good will of the people of South Africa now that they have been conquered, but I do say—and I hope I am not saying too much or going too far—that to reconcile the Irish people and satisfy their reasonable aspirations is as greatly in the interest of the empire as is the conciliation of the people of South Africa. I do not criticise that liberal policy or haggle over its details as applied to any other country, when I say that I am delighted to see the extension of a liberal policy to the people of Ireland.

I think I ought to mention here that, as it has been known generally that I would move a resolution on this subject during this session, I have received communications from different parts of Canada all in favour of the attitude I have taken. Not one single letter, not one word of advice have I received to the contrary. I may be permitted to read the list of the most prominent bodies that have sent forward resolutions:

There are many others, and I have also received letters innumerable upon this subject.

I hope that, in view of the fact that I seldom claim much of the time of the House, allowance will be made, even by those hon. gentlemen who do not feel as I do upon this subject, and that I shall be excused for taking up the time of the House upon this occasion. For, as one of the oldest members here, I think hon. members will bear me out in saying that I have not imposed myself unduly upon the attention of the House. I may add this too, as an old man, that if I have any feeling of pride or consolation at this time of life, it is that I can look around upon both sides of the House and say to hon. gentlemen: Whatever our differences have been, can you point out a single instance when I intentionally showed discourtesy to any member of this House? It is a great satisfaction to me that I can claim that position. I do not seek honour or promotion; I am not so selfish as many people sometimes think I am. I have been accused a good deal in that way, but I think that I can satisfy any hon. gentleman who will sit down to a quiet conversation with me, that I am about as disinterested a person as can be found in this parliament. But I have pretty strong convictions, I am firm in my convictions; still, I can appeal to the House whether I have ever been offensive in the proper discharge of my duties and the proper support of the principles in which I believe. I think I have always shown a readiness to meet my fellow members on equal terms, and accord them the same rights which I claim for myself.

We all know what the position of the poor Irish has been for years, indeed I may say for centuries, but to-day that term no longer applies. To-day, to repeat a saying which may sometimes be heard in convivial gatherings, 'there is nothing too good for the Irish.' I think that sentiment is becoming true. But that was not always the case, and I am sure that no one in this Chamber will regret that the contrary condition is passing away. It is a great gratification to every man of Irish origin that this great change has come about. We know that for a long time the prejudices of the whole world were against our race. The policy was to educate the world in prejudice against us. History slandered the Irish, the theatres slandered the Irish character. We know that it has always been admitted that the Irish excel in natural wit; but how often has that feature of the Irish character been misrepresented in vulgar and unworthy caricatures, instead of reproducing the genuine brilliant wit that every man admits is natural to the Irishman.

Ireland was never a land of ignorance. Ireland can claim a history in progress and civilization second to no other nation. Let me quote a few words on this point from the Honourable Colin Lindsay, a leading English historian, who, in well measured words, bears testimony to the high degree of civilization in Ireland. Speaking of the period when the Normans came there he said:

Before England was born into the family of nations, Ireland was an autonomy, recognized as such by contemporary races. When Albion was inhabited by a barbarous and savage people, Ireland was in the height of prosperity. When Anglo-Saxons were tearing each other to pieces, Ireland was possessed of a settled government, and administered by wise laws, so ancient that no one knew precisely the period of their first promulgation. When this country (England) was remarkable for its ignorance, Ireland was celebrated for her culture and civilization. When St. Augustine was preaching to the heathen, when Ethelbert was receiving baptism, when Alfred was a wanderer, Ireland was sending forth her missionaries all over the world, spreading everywhere the gospel and civilization. When the foundations of the universities of Cambridge and Oxford were laid, the colleges of Ireland had long been flourishing seats of learning, imparting to all who came to her schools knowledge and truth. Ireland can assert what no other existing kingdom or state can say: That the history is lost in the mazes of antiquity and that her era of barbarism belongs to pre-historic times.

Therefore I say that we feel a great relief in viewing present conditions ; we have reason to feel a great deal of consolation in finding that public opinion, not only in Canada, but throughout the empire, has changed. We see to-day in that great parliament of Great Britain, men who, a few days ago, were sneered at, as some hon. gentlemen would sneer at me because of my sympathy with this question—we see the Irish parliamentary party, once represented as a set of demagogues living upon the charity and subscriptions of poor people, to-day taking their rightful place in the esteem and consideration of that great parliament. There is one thing that the Canadian people ought not to forget. They ought to all feel proud of the system of government established in this free country, they ought to feel proud that the doors of this parliament are open to any man who possesses the confidence of his fellow citizens, even though he has not a dollar in his pocket. The condition of things in the old country was different. On account of the great wealth of that country, the representation fell naturally into the hands of wealthy men who could afford to give their entire time without any remuneration to meet even their current expenses. It was felt that the men who were going there to fight the battles of their country ought to receive some aid to enable them to meet their expenses. The money they received for that purpose was a free donation. Well, I say these men were slandered. By whom? They were slandered the world over by those who did not agree with their views. What do we find to-day ? We find the government of Great Britain holding out the hand of conciliation, of peace and welcome to those very men who were formerly regarded with aversion. To-day we find the Irish parliamentary representatives treated as they ought to be treated, as men standing on an equal footing with every other member of that great parliament. This change shows the present tendency of public opinion in the empire towards that great reform which recognizes the people at their true worth, that reform which proposes to extend to the people the fullest measure of control of their own public affairs and their own destiny.

Mr. Speaker, I could quote other authorities besides the one I have given, besides that letter of Mr. Brassey and the extract from the historian Lindsay. Let me refer to a Canadian paper, the Toronto 'News,' and in its issue of the 28th of March what does it say ? It does not seem to be scared about the bugbear of mentioning home rule. One would imagine that there had been a secret compact made some where that there has been some hole and corner understanding. If you Irish only keep quiet we are going to do a big thing with the land question, but you must keep quiet and not say a word about home rule at all. We will blind the other fellows and they will not know what is going on. If you do not say anything about home rule at all the other fellows will be willing to support the deal. I do not believe there is any such hole and corner business about the question at all. I thing this is a broad policy and that it should be treated in that light. This article, published in the Toronto 'News,' says :

HOME RULE IS COMING.

The second and salient fact—

In speaking about the Land Bill—

—is that even Mr. Wyndham, though expressly declaring that he spoke only for himself, foreshadows Irish self-government, and sees the desirability of the creation of an Irish representative authority with real responsibility for and the permanent interest in a successful working of the measure.

Mr. CLARKE. That is an Irish Committee for the administration of the land law.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not differ with that at all. I do not think it is necessary to make any argument in favour of home rule. This is not the time. My argument has not been one in which I thought it necessary to establish the claim of the people of Ireland to home rule. I have been trying to give reasons why I was justified in bringing this resolution forward and congratulating the English people upon the evidence of progress towards the settlement of the land question, and still keeping consistent with our expressions of opinion heretofore in favour of a measure of home rule. We do not dictate that measure; we do not say what the extent of it shall be. That is a thing to be worked out practically by the people of England with the approval of the people of Ireland. The question of home rule is not dropped at all. As to the extent of the measure we do not attempt to decide that any more than we attempt to deal with the financial aspect of the land bill itself. They are dealing with that and we hope satisfactorily. The prospect looks bright and I am sure that every Canadian, whatever his feelings may be in regard to Ireland itself and home rule, will rejoice at a settlement which will be in the interests of the empire. Now, I will not trespass upon the time of the House any longer. There are other hon. gentlemen who will follow me on both sides. I would have expressed the hope that there might have been a unanimous vote upon this question but I may not be justified in anticipating that favourable result. However, I will conclude by asking the House to give this matter, fair, honest consideration, not to allow any side issues, not to allow any unreasonable arguments to sway hon. gentlemen in expressing their opinions upon this, what I call, reasonable proposition that they are asked to give their opinion on. Mr. Speaker, I leave the question in the hands of the House feeling confident that the Canadian parliament will not go back upon the record it made in 1882, in 1886 and in 1887.

Mr. E. HACKETT (Prince West). Mr. Speaker, about one hour ago I was told that I would be called upon to second the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Victoria, N. B. (Hon. Mr. Costigan). I regret that I did not know this at an earlier date, in order that I might have been prepared to speak upon such an important question. However, I will do the best I possibly can under the circumstances. I am in favour of home rule for Ireland. I believe that constitutionally the parliament of Canada has the right to pass a resolution of this kind advising the imperial government as to the wishes of the people of Canada and thereby strengthening the hands of the statesmen in the mother country. Last year, in my opinion, a resolution of this kind should have been introduced into this House. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution this evening informed me at an early period of last session that he intended to introduce a resolution similar to those he introduced in former years, but the session passed and nothing was done in that connection. I believe that last year, when the conference of the premiers of the empire met in London to discuss matters affecting the different colonies, was the time when the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) should have had in his hands a resolution passed by this House in favour of home rule for Ireland, but the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Costigan) for some reason known to himself, did not think proper to bring forward this resolution. On this occasion he says that he brings it forward in no unfriendly spirit to the government. I say that is not the proper manner in which to approach an important question like this which affects the people of the whole empire. The question of home rule for Ireland is above all considerations of whether the government be friendly or unfriendly. If the government to-day desire to vote this resolution down let them vote it down; but Sir, I challenge the government to-day to vote against this resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT. Has it come to this point at last: That this great question; this cause of home rule so dear to the hearts of Irishmen all over the world, is to be made a football to be kicked at by designing politicians for their own personal advantages and for party purposes. Sir, I have been a member of this House of Commons for a number of years. In 1882 when the home rule resolution was introduced by the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Costigan) it received the support of the Liberal-Conservative party in the House, and the resolution was forwarded through the proper channels to the authorities in Great Britain. Again in 1884 I had the honour of voting for a similar resolution, and Sir John Macdonald, who was the highest constitutional authority, said that the parliament of Canada had a right to pass such a resolution and he again forwarded the resolution to England. In 1886 and 1887 the same thing was done. I am a Conservative now; I was a Conservative in 1882; I have not changed like some other people; I am a Conservative still and I stand here thankful to the old Conservative party that forwarded this resolution in favour of home rule for Ireland to England in 1882, 1884, 1886 and 1887, and had it placed at the foot of the Throne.

Sir, this question is too dear to the hearts of the Irish people to be bandied about in any way. What does it mean? It means autonomy for Ireland, and when in 1886 Mr. Gladstone received this resolution from the Canadian parliament, that great statesman declared in the imperial House of Commons:

> The most important declaration, the most important message that ever crossed the Atlantic is the voice of the Canadian parliament in favour of home rule for Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone therefore constitutionally favoured the passage of this resolution. Home rule means self-government for Ireland. We in Canada who enjoy every freedom; we who have perfect autonomy in our government; we above all others should wish to see the same measure of liberty accorded to our fellow-citizens in that other portion of the British empire, which is the native land of the forefathers of many of us. Home rule means self-government; it means autonomy; it means a parliament selected by the Irish people sitting in Dublin to legislate on and administer Irish affairs. I claim, Sir, that we in this parliament have a right to pass this resolution in order to strengthen the hands of the men who are fighting the battle of home rule for Ireland. Now, Sir, there were three essential points in the Home Rule Bill introduced by Mr. Gladstone—there were five that he claimed to be essential, but there were three which I believe to be absolutely essential. The first was the unity of the empire. I believe, Sir, that the granting of home rule to Ireland would mean a closer union of the empire and greater unity and greater strength in the empire. We know that when any part of the empire suffers under a grievance and is in distress and trouble, and is discontented with its political condition, there cannot be the same sympathy or the same support from that part of the empire as there would be if the people were happy and contented. As my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Costigan) has said, the Irishman is denied that liberty at home which he enjoys in other parts of the empire. That seems illogical, but it is nevertheless the fact. We know, Sir, that the Irishman is always ready at the sound of the bugle to take up arms and fight valiantly under the old flag for the advancement of imperial interests. All over the world wherever the British flag waves may be found the bleached bones of Irishmen who died in defence of the British empire. To have a really united empire, and in order to have the sympathy and support of the people of Ireland, this measure of home rule is absolutely necessary. When home rule is conceded there will be added to the strength of Britain the noblest force that can be rallied to the support of any empire.

Another point that Mr. Gladstone spoke about was political equality, and he contended that if home rule were granted political equality would follow. That is a very important point. What is the meaning of political equality ? There is no man who can speak more feelingly on that question than an Irish Roman Catholic. It means that the Protestant of the North and the Catholic of the South shall have the same political rights under the constitution. For centuries the Catholics of Ireland were denied the right of the franchise. Through the efforts of Daniel O'Connell, ably supported by Canning, Wilberforce, Macaulay and other great statesmen of that date, the manacles were stricken from the wrists of the Catholics and to-day Catholics have the same franchise as their Protestant fellow-countrymen. That was the political equality for which O'Connell fought and won. Although it takes people of different classes and different religions to make up a great nation, we must remember that although we are Catholics and Protestants and do not kneel at the same altar, yet we adore the same God and we should have the same feelings of charity and respect for each other. Another point which Mr. Gladstone emphasized was that home rule would be a measure of protection for minorities. There is no doubt that some of our friends in this House, coming from the north of Ireland, do feel that the province of Ulster might not be properly protected under home rule. But let me point out to them that the Catholics of Ireland have never abused their privilege of equality of franchise and have never deprived their Protestant fellow-citizens of one iota of the rights which they enjoyed before Catholic Emancipation. In our discussion of Irish home rule to-day we should not forget the important land measure recently introduced in the imperial House of Commons by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. For many centuries the Irish people have suffered from the oppression of absentee landlords and extortionate agents. To-day there is a measure before the imperial parliament with the object of doing justice to the tenantry of Ireland. Coming as I do from a province of Canada where for a hundred years or more the people suffered as the Irish people did, from absentee landlords, I can speak feelingly on this question. At the time of confederation a measure was introduced in the Prince Edward Island legislature which afterwards received the assent of the Dominion government, allowing the tenantry of my province to buy from the landlords their right in the land. That measure proved to be a most successful one, and the men who fifty years ago were tenants in Prince Edward Island, are to-day enjoying the blessings of free men and are contented owners of their own holdings. When Mr. Gladstone was Prime Minister he sent to the government of Prince Edward Island for a copy of the Act passed at that time, and from what I can gather from recent despatches, it would seem that the land measure introduced by Mr. Wyndham is based on the lines of the Prince Edward Island Act. Well, Sir, if the Irish Land Bill is properly carried into effect, I believe that it will be as great a relief to the people of Ireland as our Land Act was to the people of Prince Edward Island.

As I said at the outset, Sir, I was not prepared to make a speech on this occasion. These few ideas occurred to me as I went along. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Costigan) has gone so fully into the question, that it is unnecessary for me to take up further the time of the House. The descendant of an Irishman, as I am, who learned the traditions of the old land in my very youth, although I have never viewed her green fields or rippling streams, I still have a reverence and respect for that old land; that land of heroes and martyrs; that land that has struggled so long for liberty. Her sons and daughters, the sturdy race of Erin, are scattered the world over like autumn leaves before the winter's blast ; strangers in the land of their nativity but princes and lords in every other land where merit is the measure of the man. I hope, Sir, that this resolution will pass unanimously, or if not unanimously, as near to unanimity as is possible in a parliament constituted such as this is.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of combatting the views presented by the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Hon. Mr. Costigan) in moving this motion or the views presented by the hon. member for West Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Hackett) in seconding it. I can concur most heartily with many of the statements made by both of these hon. gentlemen. I believe, and I have no doubt that belief is shared in by every member of this House, that the Irish people are a noble and a generous race. I believe there have been in Ireland in the past abuses which required to be remedied, that there have been grievances of which the Irish people had just cause to complain. I have the warmest feelings and the best good wishes towards the Irish people; I wish them prosperity and the removal of all the grievances and burdens which rest upon them. But, Sir, I am impressed with the belief also that the removal of those grievances, so far as political action is concerned, must come from the government that exercises sway and control over Ireland. My hon. friend from Victoria, in the course of his speech, informed us that this is an imperial question. I quite concur with him in that statement; and as it is an imperial question, it is not one in my opinion for colonial interference; and for that reason, admitting all that may be claimed for home rule, admitting, as I do, that some system of home rule and local self-government for the four Kingdoms might be advantageous, I still take the position that this is a question with which we have nothing to do, and which this Canadian House of Commons ought not to pass upon. The resolution passed in 1882, to which my hon. friend from Victoria refers, was in due course transmitted to the imperial authorities. In due course also we received a reply to that address. It is unnecessary to recount the terms of that address, or to take up the time of the House by reading it. It was simply an expression of the opinion of the Canadian House of Commons that Ireland was entitled to a just measure of home rule. It passed the House on the 20th April, 1882, and was transmitted early in May to the imperial authorities. On the 12th of June of the same year the following reply was transmitted by the Earl of Kimberley to the Marquis of Lorne, Governor General of Canada:

> My Lord,—I have received and laid before the Queen the address to Her Majesty from the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, which was transmitted in your Lordship's dispatch of the 16th May. I am commanded by Her Majesty to request that you will convey to the Senate and House of Commons her appreciation of the renewed expression of their unswerving loyalty and devotion to Her Majesty's person and government. Her Majesty will always gladly receive the advice of the parliament of Canada on all matters relating to the Dominion and the administration of its affairs; but with respect to the question referred to in the address, Her Majesty will, in accordance with the constitution of this country, have regard to the advice of the imperial parliament and ministers, to whom all matters relating to the affairs of the United Kingdom exclusively appertain.

Now, this was an answer which we would be entitled to receive again if the resolution which my hon. friend has tabled should pass this House. It was an answer amounting to an intimation to the parliament of Canada that we had been guilty of an impertinence and had meddled with matters that were not within our province, and did not belong to us to express an opinion upon in an official manner, that opinion being for transmission to the imperial government. A similar motion passed again in 1886, and again in 1887. The motion passed in 1886 was transmitted in a somewhat different form from that passed in 1882. It was sent to the Canadian High Commissioner for the information of the members of the British House of Commons. Whether the members of the British House of Commons profited materially from that source of information I have not been informed. In 1887 the Curran motion was passed. In 1889, Mr. Cook, then a member of this House, who had given notice of a motion upon going into Supply, on the 11th of April moved that motion, and it was lost. In 1892 we had a motion introduced by Mr. Devlin substantially on the lines of the present motion of my hon. friend. We had an amendment to that motion, moved by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Hon. D. Tisdale), the purport of which was that the motion was not called for. We had an amendment to the amendment, introduced by Mr. McCarthy, which asserted that the motion was undesirable, that the wisdom of our course in 1882 and in 1886 was doubtful, and that the motion should not pass. A debate arose on these amendments; the debate was adjourned; it was never resumed; and that closed the action of the House of Commons on the question of home rule up to the present date, from 1882 to 1903. Now, the renewal of the question after the lapse of eleven years I think it would be difficult to show cause for. In the meantime the condition of Ireland has improved; great exertions have been made by the imperial government, not only to remove causes of complaint, but to go beyond that, and to deal with the utmost generosity with the Irish people. In the meantime, the sensitiveness of the British government about colonial interference has remained; and while there is infinitely less cause for this expression of opinion on the part of this House of Commons to-day than there was in 1886, there is the same objection to impertinent interference with something that does not belong to us. Since then we had the Gladstone Bill, a Bill framed for the benefit of the tenant, a Bill which gave Ireland exceptional treatment, which gave its peasant class favours which were not enjoyed by that class in any other of the four Kingdoms. We have now pending the Wyndham Bill, a measure so comprehensive, so far-reaching, and involving such an extent of self-sacrifice on the part of the British taxpayer, that one stands astounded at the courage and the generosity of the government that has introduced it.

That Bill proposes to give a bonus of from $60,000,000, to $75,000,000 for the settlement of the land question, and admits to participation in the benefits which it will confer on the tenant class, even evicted tenants, comprising all who have been tenants in the past twenty-five years. It puts upon the British government the assumption of liabilities amounting to more than $500,000,000. All this is done to pacify Ireland by removing causes of complaint. All this is done in a spirit of the utmost generosity and good will. Under these circumstances, what reason exists for the introduction of this motion? What reason exists for demanding in addition home rule for Ireland? Are we convinced that home rule would be a blessing? Is there any reason for giving to Ireland exceptional treatment as regards the institutions of the country? Is Ireland entitled to home rule and Scotland, Wales and England not entitled to it? Is there any reason for presenting in this House a motion asking exceptional treatment for the one country and leaving out the three others from participation in any of the benefits to accrue from the adoption of the federal principle? The time may come when home rule may be adopted in Great Britain. If that time ever does comes, it will be home rule, impartial in its application and applicable to the three other divisions, and not to Ireland alone.

Now, the home rule agitation has been looked upon, I apprehend, by the British authorities with some degree of suspicion. The agitators for home rule could with difficulty, I believe, give conclusive proof of their entire loyalty and devotion to British institutions. The British authorities were justified in entertaining some doubt as to whether a portion of the kingdom, with an autonomy of its own, with power of its own, the leaders and population of which express disloyalty to the nation which granted these privileges, would not be a source of danger, and so naturally there was some hesitation, and Ireland has been herself to blame, to a large extent, perhaps for the withholding of some concessions which were demanded. But whether that were the case or not, and whether it was wise, whether it would be wise for England to give to Ireland the home rule demanded or not, is a question on which we can exercise our individual opinions, but on which we are not entitled to thrust our opinions, as a government or as a parliament, on the British government, because that is beyond our province. I have the same sympathy for Ireland that I have always had, and that is a warm active degree of sympathy. This degree of sympathy led me to vote for the Curran resolution in 1887. Perhaps I had no reflection—I know I had not reflected at that time upon the constitutional significance of the Act—and I was governed by my feelings with regard to a generous people who had my thorough and entire sympathy then as they have to-day. Anything that can be done for Ireland I am willing to do. Anything that lies within the control of this House to do, I hold up my hand for. But I cannot on this occasion repeat the mistake of 1887 and vote for a resolution which is beyond the province and powers of this parliament, which can do no good and which would be received by the imperial government as an impertinence. It is not proper to refer to a past debate, but I have the right to refer to past actions of the government, and I refer to its action yesterday which bears out my contention in this regard, when papers were refused upon a motion by an hon. member of this House bearing upon imperial actions and interests, upon the ground that they concerned matters which were beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament. I think that the position taken was a correct one, and that the same position should debar us from accepting the motion of the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Hon. Mr. Costigan).

There are a good many phases to this Irish question. There is a large Irish population in this country and in the United States. In the United States, almost as long ago as I can remember, the prejudices of Irishmen against Great Britain were the stalking horse of unscrupulous politicians, and the Yankee demagogue twisted the tail of the British lion in order to secure the sympathy and support of Irish voters. In ninety-nine out of one hundred cases, the most effective of all appeals were these appeals concerning the wrongs which Ireland had suffered at the hands of the British government. I do not know whether the same spirit exists in Canada. I do not know whether the same methods and motives would have the same force here. I do not know whether appeals to the Irish vote may happen to be concealed beneath the assumed reasons which induced the hon. gentleman to take the course he has taken in introducing this resolution. Perhaps it may be possible that on rare occasions the idea may flash through his mind incidentally that there are a number of Irish voters in his riding and that he will stand better with them by taking this course. I do not know but that might be the case with myself. I have a good many Irish voters in my constituency—several hundred of them—but I think as a rule they are men with sufficient degree of intelligence to accept the situation and to realize that the passing of this motion for home rule is an act which exceeds our power as a parliament, and is a course of conduct which is not advisable, and I am confident that it will not receive their sanction and support.

We have a good deal of business here to attend to and we do not need to attend to the business of our neighbours, especially when they inform us that they do not want us to attend to it and will resent our interference. We have half a continent to lick into shape. We have almost unmeasured resources which, when developed to their full capacity, will provide ample scope for a population of one hundred million souls. We have transportation to provide for the great region of the North-west—one of the most gigantic problems that ever confronted any government. We have a great immigration pouring into the country from the United States and from Europe. We have heard the low wash of the waves for years past, which will soon be followed by the rushing in of a vast human sea. All these problems have to be met, emergencies have to be provided against, the foundations of an empire have to be laid and the superstructure erected. This enormous task is on our hands, and we can afford to let Great Britain do her own business without our interference. If England chooses to give home rule to Ireland or to refuse to grant Ireland home rule, we are not in a position to discuss her policy. It is not our business to do so. Besides if we take the course which my hon. friend proposes, we shall establish a precedent that may re-act upon us. If we are entitled to formulate and solemnly pass a resolution advising and informing Great Britain what in certain cases and under certain circumstances she should do, what is there to prevent the parliament of Great Britain acting upon that precedent and passing resolutions informing us what we had better do? What is to prevent the parliament of Great Britain acting upon the precedent that we have created passing resolutions informing us what we had better do?—telling us that we had better get ready to come into an imperial federation, for instance, and have an organic union and a parliament at Westminster to control the affairs of the British colonies? Such a resolution could be passed by the parliament of Great Britain with just as much propriety, with just as much reason, with just as good a foundation of sound constitutional principle as the motion proposed by my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Costigan). Suppose that the British parliament should pass a resolution with regard to an imperial Zollverein, and inform us that, in their opinion the time had come for us to fall into line and have universal free trade and a Zollverein for the British empire? Suppose they should undertake to inform us of our duty in regard to an imperial preference, its limits and the scope of its operation? Suppose they should inform us that they have taken care of us long enough, that we have profited by their generosity and fostering care, that they have given us naval protection and military protection, and that now we must become partners and participants in a scheme of imperial defence, paying our quota of taxation? Suppose they should take it into their heads, as we are in danger of taking it into ours, that they could give advice outside their sphere with regard to the political, social, and ethnic conditions in this country? Suppose they should tell us: You have had the dual language in your deliberations and in the publication of your laws about long enough; it is time that you had a more thorough system of assimilation, time that the French race was absorbed? They have as much right to make that suggestion as we have to make suggestions about home rule for Ireland. And we would resent it in the same way that they will resent the suggestion that my hon. friend proposes to make. Suppose they should make a suggestion about any question of our domestic policy? In these things we have, and expect to maintain, autonomy, as all the self-governing independent colonies do. We do not expect to permit any interference with that autonomy, and we will resent any such interference. That being so, we had better refrain from a precedent that may give colour to the assumption on the part of British statesmen that they have right to interfere with us.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we must carefully preserve our autonomy. We are building up a nation, we have the material to build it with, and we must have a free hand in the job. And, as I said before, it is business enough for us, without attending to England's business in Ireland. We must scrupulously respect the rights of Great Britain to manage her imperial affairs in any of her colonies and in all the realms of Ireland, Scotland, England and Wales. This resolution enters upon a field of action where we have no place, where we are interlopers, where we are not welcome and had better not intrude. As I have said, it would furnish a precedent for interference with us; and the prudent and proper course, I would say in conclusion, is to refuse our concurrence with this resolution.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). Before recess I rose to say a few words on the motion now before the Chair. I understand that the question introduced by the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Hon. Mr. Costigan) is not new to this House, although it is new to me. I think it is to be regretted that every session of this parliament resolutions are introduced into this House that do not concern the people of Canada. It is my opinion that the people of Canada have enough trouble and difficulties of their own to settle, without dragging the affairs of Great Britain and Ireland into this House. The people of Ireland have less grievances than the people in many other places. The English church has been disestablished, courts of arbitration have been formed for the settlement of all disputes between landlords and tenants. Now a land purchase Bill is before the British parliament which, if it is carried, it is estimated will cost the British people over $400,000,000. Still, we have hon. gentlemen getting up in this House and saying that the British government is doing nothing for the Irish people, and asking this government to pass resolutions in their favour. Perhaps hon. gentlemen are not aware, when pressing these buncombe resolutions, how much they cost this country, or how much they cost the Dominion treasury. I do not think they realize, nor do their constituents realize, that every minute of time wasted in this House costs the country the sum of $28. The hon. member for Victoria is not the only sinner in this respect. If I remember right, last session the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) introduced a resolution that the House took all day to discuss, and it was just about as relevant as the one we heard this afternoon ; consequently you see the sinners are not all on this side of the House. Now if it costs $28 a minute, some of you can reckon how much that resolution was worth. Now I have not one word to say against the Irish people, nor against what the English people are doing for the Irish. I know they are a warm-hearted, industrious people. Many of them are my neighbours, and there are no better people under heaven than some of the Irish people. At the same time, when they want to get justice they must go the right way about it ; and every Irishman in Canada will get justice, no doubt about that. I told a story once in this House, I do not know whether it would be advisable to tell one now or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin). Well, some months ago I happened to be in the neighbouring state of Maine. I went into a post office to buy some stamps and envelopes, as I wanted to send some letters and papers to Canada, and the young lady from whom I was purchasing was as handsome as any of the Canadian girls. I suppose she was an American. She was surprised when she learned that my letters and papers were going to Canada. She said 'Surely you are not a Canadian ?' I said, 'Oui, mademoiselle.' and she rather doubted it then, she could not believe that I was a Canadian. She said, 'You don't speak like a Canadian.' 'Well,' I said, 'you must not say too much about the Canadian people, perhaps some of you young ladies will want to form alliances with the Canadian people.' 'Oh, for pity's sake don't say that, we don't want to marry any of those Canadians, we don't like them.' 'Why,' she says, 'I would rather a thousand times marry an Irishman.' 'Well,' I said, 'I am not surprised at that.' 'You are not surprised at it ?' 'No, indeed,' I said. 'You remember Samuel Lover said that an Irishman is always in one of three things. He is always either in love, in liquor or in a row. But in this state of Maine it is not possible, under the law, for an Irishman to get liquor, and if he cannot get liquor he is not likely to get into a row ; consequently he must always be in love. So you young American ladies can never resist the advances made by a warm-hearted and enthusiastic Irishman.' So I come to the conclusion that is the reason why there are so many O'Donohue's and O'Flaherty's and so on in that country. You know statistics say that one half of the people of the state of Maine were born in Canada. Now, Sir, I just want to say that the Irish people can take care of themselves, I think, both in Ireland and in this country ; and I am sure that the English people are doing everything possible for them at the present time.
