ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY—RATIFICATION BY U.S. AND U.S.S.R.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, seldom does a Prime Minister of Canada rise in the House of Commons to comment on activities undertaken by foreign governments. Nevertheless, the simultaneous steps taken this morning by the United States and the Soviet Union are of such importance to all of mankind that I regard it as entirely proper to use this opportunity to bring them to the attention of all hon. members, all the more so as in my statement at the beginning of the session this is what the government of Canada asked these two governments to do.

At eleven o'clock this morning the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union announced their intention to deposit forthwith instruments of ratification of the non-proliferation treaty, a step which our government and other governments have been urging for some time. This event will hopefully precede the coming into force of the treaty, which Canada and 20 other countries have already ratified.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that hon. members will join me in welcoming this important decision and in hoping that it will be followed by others of similar importance during the strategic arms limitation talks now being held in Helsinki.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, the news announced by the Prime Minister will receive widespread approval throughout the world. I hope that the next countries that will see fit to ratify the treaty will be France and the Federal Republic of Germany. As a matter of fact, the latter has recently announced that it will take such a step. It becomes increasingly important that continental China, the country with the largest population in the world, be brought within the community of nations so that she can be a party to some of these instruments that may result in the survival of mankind.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am sure that members in all parts of the House join with the Prime Minister in expressing great pleasure that this first step toward reaching a non-proliferation treaty has been taken by the United States and the U.S.S.R. I hope that the Canadian government will press on to urge the establishment of an underground test ban treaty and that we will also continue to press for changes in the proposed treaty with respect to seabed nuclear installations. I think Mr. George Ignatieff has been taking a very excellent position on this matter in Geneva. I hope the Canadian government will support him and get the support of other countries to take this necessary step.

However, Mr. Speaker, the whole question of nuclear arms is so far-reaching in its implications for mankind that I do not think we can ever be satisfied until we have succeeded in getting the nations of the world, in particular the nuclear nations, to agree to a treaty which will not only ban testing and reduce proliferation but will finally ban the manufacturing, storing and use of nuclear weapons in every field. I hope that this is the position which the Canadian government will press in the various international agencies when our representatives sit down with the representatives of other countries.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we from the Ralliement créditiste are pleased to learn that the world is now taking a course that will encourage the various countries to realize that they are in danger of being completely wiped out if they carry on the nuclear arms race.

We are quite pleased to learn from the Prime Minister of Canada himself that the United States and Russia have concluded this morning an agreement to restrict the production and use of nuclear weapons.

As the other members, we hope that the other nations will follow suit and show more understanding and co-operation in order that there may be less suspicion among them. Thus, the entire world will be in a position to consider the future more calmly than in the past few years.

We are pleased to hear such good news and we hope that a similar agreement will be concluded with the other nations that already have nuclear weapons.

OIL

B.C. DRILLING PERMITS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43 which reads as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

My explanation, Mr. Speaker, is quite brief. My motion arises out of the fact that the government of British Columbia has granted seismic testing permits for drilling in the coastal areas of B.C., in particular in Georgia Strait. The people who live in those areas are fearful that they will be subjected to the same kind of oil pollution which has been experienced by people living in the coastal areas of California. If the seismic tests prove to be favourable the oil companies will be applying to the federal government for oil drilling permits.

I therefore contend it is imperative that parliament be given an opportunity to express its opinion on this matter and that the government should indicate whether or not it intends to grant these oil drilling permits before the seismic testing goes too far. I would therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis):

That this House expresses its concern regarding the potential oil pollution arising from the proposed exploratory drilling in the Georgia Strait and in the waters off the coast of British Columbia and urges that all those concerned take immediate steps to assure that this will not be allowed to happen.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, this motion, to be presented for consideration by the House at this time, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. Therefore the motion may not be put to the House.

URBAN AFFAIRS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has indicated the gist of Standing Order 43. I would now ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under that Standing Order. In order to establish the urgent and pressing necessity which justifies my request I make the following brief explanation. The federal government, Mr. Speaker, is currently involved in a number of problems relating to issues which directly affect the municipalities, that is, airport location, pollution, violence, urban transportation, housing and slum clearance, urban poverty, etc. Despite the provincial governments' primary constitutional responsibility, it is urgent and essential that a forum be established by this House to permit those concerned in such immediate urban problems to make their representations.

I therefore ask for unanimous consent to move the following motion:

That in the opinion of this House, a special committee of this House on urban affairs should be appointed to consider and make recommendations, and to report to this House on the advisability of measures to be taken affecting people living in urban areas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has indicated the urgency of this matter and has indicated what his motion is. I hope he does not intend to proceed into the matter much further. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that a special committee of the House spent a few years revising our rules, changing substantially Standing Order 26. I would think that hon. members would agree that we should not now find a way to circumvent the new rules of the House by abusing—by taking advantage of Standing Order 43. If hon. members wish to propose a motion under Standing Order 43 they should be satisfied with making a brief explanation. I would invite the co-operation of all hon. members to respect the spirit of that rule by limiting their submissions to the House to a very brief explanation. I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West that this is what he has done to this point, and I do not think any purpose would be served by pursuing the matter further.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): On the point of order that Your Honour has raised, Your Honour is quite correct, but during the course of proceedings in the House a day or two ago I attempted to make use of the provisions of Standing Order 68 and Your Honour reminded me that because that order had not been made use of it has probably expired. I think it must be our course on this side to ensure that such rules are not lost through atrophy.

Mr. Speaker: That is quite obvious. I would think that the use we have been making of this Standing Order during recent weeks indicates that the Standing Order is still acceptable in the sense that it is the type of Standing Order that can be made use of. I do not want to make things difficult for the hon. member for Hamilton West. If he has further comments to make they can be made, with the usual caution by the Chair. I would certainly allow him to continue.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It was not my intention to circumvent the rules of the House, nor was it my intention to take the time of the House unnecessarily. I think I can say, with a great deal of respect to the Chair, that the problem I have posed is one of great concern to all Canadians. Perhaps it can be put down to my inexperience with the rules, but I have followed the rules and I would hope that the Speaker would realize that my intention was sincere. Of course it is unfortunate—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's hope is well-founded, I can assure him. I thought that, as I always do, it was my duty to remind hon. members that under Standing Order 43 the only explanation that can be made is regarding urgency and it has to be as brief as possible. I am sure all hon. members will agree with me, upon reflection, that we should be careful not to revert to the situation we had previously under Standing Order 26 which was not quite conducive to effective, efficient and orderly debate. I hope we will not get ourselves involved in that situation. I am not suggesting that we have at any time up until now, but I think it may be useful to bring this point to the attention of the House from time to time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would think it would be helpful to hon. members if Your Honour would make clear what your concern is. The wording of Standing Order 43 is perfectly clear. It says "that in case of urgent and pressing necessity explained by the mover" an hon. member can, by unanimous consent, move a motion. I take it Your Honour is concerned about the length of the explanation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is making the point now. What I am worried about is that we could have a lengthy explanation that would in effect be a speech rather than an explanation in support of the motion. That is what I am hoping to prevent, for the benefit of all members of the House.

I have often said it is difficult for the Chair to determine what brevity is. We do not all have the same standards. The Chair always hopes that hon. members will observe brevity in the sense that they will be brief rather than long. At the same time I think that an hon. member who moves this type of motion would feel that he is entitled to have some kind of leniency in proceeding somewhat longer than the Chair may wish. As the hon. member knows, my concern is in connection with the possible extension of such remarks. I am sure that hon. members will keep this in mind as they have in the past and as they no doubt have this afternoon.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know all hon. members want to be guided by your wishes in the matter. We all agree that explanations should be brief, but some explanation is necessary. I contend that both explanations which have been given have not been longer than necessary to explain the motions being introduced.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no point in our pursuing this matter much further. I told the hon. member I was in agreement with him. The explanations which were made were acceptable. It was only when the hon. member for Hamilton West sought to pursue the matter after having moved his motion that I thought this caution should be given. Motions.

Mr. Baldwin: Your Honour has not put the question.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Hamilton West leave to proceed with the motion which has been presented to the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear some yeas and some nays. The hon. member knows there must be unanimous agreement before the motion can be put, and there has not been unanimous agreement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DESIGNATION OF MR. SPEAKER AS MEMBER FOR PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-159, respecting the designation of the Speaker of the House of Commons as the member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I first thank the hon. member for Fundy-Royal for seconding my motion for the introduction of this bill. I also thank those members of other parties who have indicated their interest in it.

The purpose of this bill is to make it possible, when the House has a Speaker in whom we all have full confidence, as is the case at the present time, to take steps to provide for that occupant of the chair to continue therein from Parliament to Parliament. My bill preserves the principle that a Speaker, in the first instance, must have been elected in a constituency. It also preserves the principle that each new Parliament must elect its own Speaker. My bill provides, however, for the continuity we would all like to see. I hope hon. members will study its details and that the house leaders may be able to arrange a time when this matter can be discussed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

WHITE PAPER ON TAX REFORM

Question No. 77—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Were any changes in substance made to the White Paper on Tax Reform after the proposed United States Tax Reform Act was made public?

2. Has the Minister of Finance had a study done to assess the effects of the proposed U.S. tax returns on Canada or on the proposals contained in his White Paper on Taxation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The reasons which led the government to advance the proposals which are in the white paper on tax reform are set out in the white paper. It is not the practice, nor in the public interest, to identify when government decisions were made.

2. The U.S. developments are being kept under review. There is now a tax treaty in effect between Canada and the U.S. which will be reviewed and possibly renegotiated following the decisions on tax reform in both countries.

STUDIES BY ECONOMICS BRANCH, NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Question No. 88—Mr. Thomson:

1. For the fiscal years 1968-69 and 1969-70, what specific research studies have been undertaken by the Economics Branch of the National Energy Board?

2. Who are the individuals involved in these studies and when is it anticipated that these studies will be completed?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board advises: 1. The Economics Branch of the National Energy Board has contributed to a number of research studies undertaken by the staff of the Board. Such studies are in most cases directed to meet the internal needs of the Board and the government. A study, "Energy Supply and Demand Balances: 1955-1967" was published during 1968-69 and a supplement to this publication was published during 1969-70. The Economics Branch has also made a substantial contribution to the preparation of a long-term energy forecast, "Energy Supply and Demand in Canada and Export Demand for Canadian Energy: 1966 to 1990", which has just been published.

2. Research studies involve members of the staff of the National Energy Board other than those of the Economics Branch. It would not be meaningful, therefore, to name those associated with economic research studies at the Board.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. Immediately following the decision to purchase the CF-5, steps were taken to examine all available options that would give this aircraft a rapid world-wide deployment capability. Because of the financial restraints imposed on DND, it was recognized that any aircraft chosen as a suitable tanker would also have to adequately fulfil at least one other role, i.e., long range strategic transport.

2. After numerous studies and proposals the C141 was selected and recommended as the best aircraft available with a multi-role capability. Acquisition approval was given for the purchase of four C141 aircraft to provide an in-flight refueller for the CF-5 and a long range transport to augment airlift resources. However, when negotiating the purchase of the C141, Lockheed advised that due to the advanced stage of their production line shut down, they could not re-open the line for an order of less than eight aircraft. The possibility of purchasing used C141s from the USAF was also explored with negative results.

3. Aircraft Type	Discarded in Favour of the C141 – because
KC 135	No new ones available No used ones available None available for lease
KC 130: or modified Yukon	Flies too slow and too low for a CF5 ferry operation which would necessitate a rendezvous mission rather than the air-to-air technique considered essential
VC10	Vickers advised they could not respond to our requirement due to production shut down.
DC8-62F or Boeing 707-320C	The C141 considered to be a more satisfactory military transport.
C5 Galaxy	Too large and too costly to be a practical tanker, however, an excellent transport aircraft.

4. No—the subject is under study.

5. No.

POWER, BAY OF FUNDY TIDES

Question No. 381—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the present estimated cost of the economic and engineering feasibility study into the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides from a power point of view?

2. What is the breakdown of financial responsibility between the participating governments?

3. What is the present estimated date for the completion of this study?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. $2,300,000.

2. Canada is paying $\frac{2}{3}$ of the cost of this study, and New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are paying $\frac{1}{6}$ each.

3. The Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board expects to complete its report on this study by about the end of the calendar year.

RAIDS ON NEWSPAPER OFFICES BY COMBINES OFFICIALS

Question No. 390—Mr. Flemming:

Was any examination made or raids conducted by officials under the Combines Investigation Act on any others newspaper offices in Canada, except the Daily Gleaner, of Fredericton, New Brunswick during the years 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes.

EXAMINATION OF RECORDS OF FREDERICTON "GLEANER"

Question No. 391—Mr. Flemming:

Was a request made for an examination of the records of the Daily Gleaner of Fredericton, New Brunswick prior to the raid on that newspaper office by officials under the Combines Investigation Act and, if so, by whom?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The usual procedure was followed in this case, namely: the Director of Investigation and Research, having reason to believe that the Act had been or was about to be violated applied to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission for a certificate allowing him to exercise the power of entry and search provided under section 10 of the Combines Investigation Act. To proceed in any other way would give rise to serious problems of proving the documentary evidence.

CLOSING OF CERTAIN POST OFFICES

Question No. 415—Mr. Mazankowski:

Is consideration being given to the closing of the following post offices in Alberta (a) Duvernay (b) Brosseau (c) Foisy (d) Lafond?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. (a) Yes; (b) yes; (c) yes; (d) It has been decided to retain the Lafond, Alberta Post Office which had been considered for closing.

LETTER TO PRIME MINISTER FROM PRESIDENT, RCAF ASSOCIATION

Question No. 436—Mr. MacLean:

Has the Prime Minister received a letter from Mr. Alex M. Jardine, National President of the RCAF Association on the matter of Canada's Defence Forces and, if so, has this letter been replied to and what was the nature of the reply?

[Mr. Greene.]

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Yes: an acknowledgement was sent to Mr. Jardine informing him that his letter was referred to the Minister of National Defence for study and further reply.

TOTAL STRENGTH, REGULAR AND RESERVE FORCES

Question No. 437—Mr. MacLean:

On the most recent date for which figures are available (a) what was the total strength of the Regular Defence Forces of Canada (b) what was the total strength of personnel in the sea, land and air environments respectively (c) what was the total strength of the corresponding three elements of the Reserve Forces on the same date?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): As of 30 September 1969: (a) and (b) sea, 17,844; land, 36,675; air, 42,525—Total 97,044. (c) Sea, 2,330; land, 23,619; air, 789—Total 26,738.

*USE OF VIRUSES AS INSECTICIDES

Question No. 469—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. How soon is it expected that viruses will be available for use as insecticides, as referred to in the publication known as "News" issued by the federal Department of Agriculture, Issue No. 1346, for the week ending November 7, 1969?

2. Are precautions being taken to make absolutely certain that no dangerous effects will result from the proposed dissemination of viruses for insecticide or any other purpose, unlike the precautions advocated by scientists in the past with respect to DDT?

3. What are the details of the precautions in (2) above?

4. What scientists or scientific bodies have been or will be consulted with respect to the use of viruses as insecticides?

5. Has the government received warnings or any other information that would indicate that such use of viruses might be potentially hazardous?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is as follows: 1. Developmental work on the commercial use of viruses as insecticides has been undertaken by two companies in the U.S.A. No Canadian commercial production is currently anticipated. The first virus formulations specifically directed to the cotton bollworm and corn earworm in the United States are not likely to reach commercial status until 1971. This insect specific virus is not likely to have commercial application in Canada. Another virus which may be suitable for cabbage looper control in Canada is not likely to be available before 1973 for a number of reasons, including evaluation of safety, efficacity and commercial suitability.

2. Viruses to be used as insecticides will have to be registered under the Pest Control Products Act and meet the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act insofar as acceptability is concerned. Fish, Wildlife and Forestry authorities will also be consulted in evaluating data to determine whether the insecticides should be accepted for registration under the Pest Control Products Act.

3. Precautions are those required under the Pest Control Products Act which include: (a) A full description of the insecticide including the chemical and/or biological properties of the active principle. (b) Evidence of effectiveness under field-use conditions. (c) Full description of the manufacturing process. (d) Assurance as to the safety of the product. (e) Approval of directions for, and conditions of use. (f) Any other measures which are deemed to be in the public interest to reduce risks.

4. Scientists in the Departments of Agriculture, National Health and Welfare, Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Fisheries and Forestry; United States Department of Agriculture and the World Health Organization. Also the Society of Invertebrate Pathology, the clearing house for information on insect pathogens used for insect control.

5. No. However, officials in departments having a responsibility for the control and use of insecticides are maintaining a watching brief on research papers and commercial developments both in Canada and in other countries.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

RESEARCH BRANCH STUDIES, MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

Question No. 1—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. For the fiscal years 1968-1969 and 1969-1970 what specific research studies have been or are being undertaken by the Research Branch of the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

2. Who are the individuals involved in these studies, and when is it anticipated that these studies will be completed?

Return tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In connection with starred question No. 268, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that this was asked by me on October 23, over a month ago. It concerns the total amount of expenditures by the Company of Young Canadians for 1969 and, further, the names of staff members who receive salaries between $10,000 and $15,000, over $15,000 and over $20,000. It seems inexcusable that a simple question like this should not be answered. As I understand the rules, starred questions are to be answered within three days, if we are to follow the course taken in the United Kingdom, and such delays as this can only indicate the terrible mess the finances of that organization must be in.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, based on his statement that our attention or the attention of the government—sometimes I do not know which is which—would be directed toward so-called genetic engineering beginning in the seventies, that is, next year.

Mr. Trudeau: Is this going to be funny?

Mr. Baldwin: If the government has any serious thoughts on this issue, is it the intention to provide an opportunity for discussion in a parliamentary committee at an early date?

While the right hon. gentleman is pondering the significance of that question, may I ask whether in making that statement he has taken into account the experience of the Hitler years in Germany in selective breeding? Is this an attempt to get the state back into the nation's bedrooms again?

OIL

STRAIT OF GEORGIA—ISSUANCE OF DRILLING PERMITS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Has he received representations from the board of the regional district of Nanaimo and other interested bodies regarding proposed oil drilling in the Georgia Strait and the coastal waters of British Columbia? May I also ask whether any decision has been reached on whether such oil drilling permits will be granted by the government of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe the question was whether I had received any representations. I shall have to inquire whether any such representations were made.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Could the Prime Minister tell us by whom any definite decision would be announced on behalf of the government in respect of this matter, bearing in mind that on November 13 the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry announced in Vancouver that no drilling permits would be granted, and that in the House on November 18, as reported at page 934 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated there had been no change in departmental policy. Can the Prime Minister tell us which minister in the government will be able to give a definitive answer with respect to the granting of oil permits in the Georgia Strait?

Mr. Trudeau: For the time being the question is hypothetical. I shall get the petition and see whether and how we should answer it.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the Prime Minister by way of a supplementary question whether, when looking into this matter, he would determine what consultation with the federal government, if any, was undertaken by the government of British Columbia prior to the issuance of these drilling permits?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

BANK OF CANADA

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF BRANCHES FOR FINANCING UNDERDEVELOPED AREAS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

The Liberal party bigwigs having gone into an important retreat that took place behind closed doors in British Columbia over the week-end, was the establishment of regional development banks, as branches of the Bank of Canada, suggested to help the financing of underdeveloped regions in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must point out that the question is groundless in every regard.

First of all, it was not a retreat behind closed doors. It was not a retreat, but an advance. And then, far from being closed, it was, on the contrary, a very open meeting, and no resolution such as the hon. member has mentioned was introduced.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Assuming that it was a very open meeting, would the Prime Minister be in a position to tell us if, on the other hand, the government intends during this session to introduce a bill to create regional banks?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. What is the minister doing to soothe the acute embarrassment caused by an over-zealous member of the RCMP, posing as a journalist, who attempted to prevent an invited guest from confronting the Liberal establishment at Harrison Hot Springs?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON AID

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister make a statement on motions or in some other way to establish the government's position on external aid, in view of the extraordinary statement he is alleged to have made on the subject, namely, "I think we should give aid to promote revolution which is very much needed"?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I have been misquoted. What I did say was that "I think we should give aid even though revolution may result".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is worse than the original statement.

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the innate sense of fairness of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, would it be fair to assume that he would not take for himself rights that he would not grant others, and that therefore any revolutionary activities carried on in Canada by non-Canadian subversive elements have his approval and blessing?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question is argumentative, though perhaps the minister is entitled to one supplementary reply.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government giving serious consideration to recommending to the House the appointment of a special committee on urban affairs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA—AGREEMENT RESPECTING DAYLIGHT RELIEF FLIGHTS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In reply to a question from the hon. member for Egmont on Wednesday last the minister stated that the only agreement reached by the Red Cross with respect to daylight flights into Biafra was a signed agreement with Nigeria. Since that time has the minister's attention been called to an agreement dated August 27 signed by Professor Freymond and Dr. Cookey, representing the International Red Cross, providing for daylight relief flights into Uli and accepted by the Biafran authorities, and will the minister correct the no doubt unintentional misstatement he made at that time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said, that the only agreement reached was the signed agreement between Nigeria and the International Red Cross, which the Biafran authorities did not agree to.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Is it not correct that the agreement signed between the Nigerian authorities and the Red Cross was prior to the agreement signed by the Biafran authorities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The supplementary is argumentative.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MANPOWER

STUDENTS—CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PROJECT TO PROVIDE SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the honourable and learned Minister of Manpower and Immigration and is prompted by the welcome announcement that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce is undertaking a project to find jobs for half a million unemployed students. Can the minister advise whether his department is co-operating in this project, and has he any new major plans for dealing with this important problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the person in the Chamber of Commerce who is heading up this program, Mr. Scrivener, has been in touch with the department. We have discussed their plan and are very pleased with the initiative that is being taken. We hope it will succeed in mounting an even better community program for student summer employment next year. We have not yet made any decision about a new program for next summer because we have not yet evaluated the results of the program that was in force last summer.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether his department is planning any special programs to help alleviate the heavy unemployment in Atlantic Canada, a problem that is being accentuated by the non-discriminatory, anti-inflationary policies of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that kind of question normally should be replied to by way of a statement on motions. The minister may want to indicate whether he proposes to make such statement.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was just asking the minister whether he was planning any programs, and I expect a very simple answer.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, any plans that will be implemented will be announced in the House in the regular way.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STEPS TO PROTECT CHILDREN FROM POISONOUS PRODUCTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is prompted by a coroner's jury request that products such as lemon oil furniture polish be required to bear lables on the container which will more clearly warn of the poisonous nature of such products. What steps is the minister taking to ensure that our children will be protected from such hazardous products?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that that question is more appropriately one for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who has responsibility for this matter.

IMMIGRATION

ENTRY OF BLACK PANTHERS INTO CANADA

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration related to a question I asked in the House last Friday of the then Acting Prime Minister, the Solicitor General. It has to do with complaints from the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta concerning the activities in this country of the Black Panther's organization. Is the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in a position to answer the question now or, indeed, the Solicitor General, since I understand that three of them have been kicked out of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have examined the question and in reply I would say that three members of the Black Panthers were admitted to Canada last week to attend various functions at universities in the west at the invitation of the students unions at these universities. These people were admitted under the policy that we have been pursuing for a considerable time, namely, that otherwise prohibited persons are permitted to visit the country for a short period at the invitation of a reputable organization if there is no evidence that any disorder will result. This policy was carried forward in this case.

However, it was later discovered that two of the persons had misrepresented their identities at the border. When this was discovered an inquiry was held and an order of deportation was effected. In addition, two of these persons were prosecuted and fined for the misrepresentation which took place at the border. This was an issue aside and apart from implementation of the policy respecting admission of prohibited persons into Canada for short periods.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION OF HARASSMENT AT LIBERAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice has already expressed concern about a student's charge that RCMP officers harassed him at the Liberal conference at Harrison Hot Springs, can the minister indicate to the House whether he is at present undertaking an investigation of this matter?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the minister already has.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate to the House what are the results of this investigation?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the minister can. Two members of the RCMP on duty last Thursday afternoon were called in to remove certain persons who were loitering around the hotel. After this was done the person concerned came into the hotel. He was wearing jeans at the time, long hair and dressed somewhat similar to them.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fairweather: What colour—green jeans, blue jeans?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether there was wisdom in allowing the question in the first instance. I do not see that the question as asked is one that should be allowed at this time. I also wonder whether the minister should be entitled to continue his explanation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that hon. members may be—

An hon. Member: Unanimous.

Mr. Speaker: —enjoying the situation, but I doubt whether it would be in order to pursue the matter. I might say that when the hon. member for Fundy-Royal asked the same question originally I thought it should not be allowed because I do not consider the question asked to be one of national urgency.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, if I leave the answer at the point at which I was it would do an injustice to the man concerned. This would be quite unfair. In the circumstances I believe I should be permitted to complete the answer, the question having been asked. If there is not to be an injustice done to the person involved, I believe the answer should be permitted. The answer is that this person did not go, as did the other guests, directly to the place of registration. They intercepted him—

An hon. Member: That was Russ Jackson.

Mr. McIlraith: —and asked him if he was there in connection with the conference. He promptly said he was and produced his identification. They apologized immediately and profusely. He seemed to be satisfied at the time that the incident was closed.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the minister is now satisfied that the answer has been given.

Some hon. Members: More, More!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must make the statement that this is not a matter of such national urgency that a supplementary question should be allowed at this time. If the hon. member wishes to pursue the matter he might ask a supplementary at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the very greatest respect to you, sir, another question might have received an answer in respect of the behaviour of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers involved at the place and at the time, which does make it a matter of national concern. If I may say so with respect I would urge Your Honour not to dismiss the consideration of this matter, because the reports in the newspapers indicate that these police officers disguised themselves as press representatives and had—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are going to spend some time on this matter and therefore we might as well have the supplementary as a lengthy point of order. I will allow the supplementary.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, could the Solicitor General indicate to the House whether it is common practice to have RCMP undercover agents masquerade as members of the press?

Mr. McIlraith: No. I think, however, I should answer the part of the question referring to the reports in the press about the wearing of a press badge, which is properly a matter of some concern to the public. The members of the RCMP did not disguise themselves in any way, but shortly before this incident they were requested by the hotel manager to accept these badges so that they would not be questioned because they were there without any identification. The badges were provided for them. I think they ought not to have accepted the badges.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, so that other people will not find themselves in the position of being picked up or pushed out if they attend a Liberal meeting, would the minister say whether the action taken was under some anti-pollution provision?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Having heard the original question, the supplementary and the point of order I believe I was right in my opinion at first that there was some doubt whether the question should be allowed at all.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUESTED RECONVENING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the many serious problems facing the Canadian agricultural industry and in view of the fact that a month has now elapsed since the session commenced, will the minister take immediate steps to reconvene the Standing Committee on Agriculture in an endeavour to solve these basic problems?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion there is no doubt that this committee will be reconvened to consider matters that Parliament will refer to it, including some legislation as well as a number of reports which traditionally and properly are referred to that committee. Once the committee is reconvened the matters it takes up are, of course, under its own control.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Could he tell the House whether at the Liberal party think-in over the weekend it was suggested to apply the theories of Social Credit to solve the problem of poverty?

[English]

GRAIN

WHEAT—EXPORT FORECAST—REMOVAL OF LAND FROM PRODUCTION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement made this morning by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada that two recent studies indicate that in the next five years exports of wheat may be 25 per cent below the level of the last few years, may I ask whether the government shares this view and whether it anticipates the removal of millions of acres of western agricultural land from wheat production in that period?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is much too wide in scope. The hon. member is asking whether the minister agrees or disagrees with a statement made outside the House. The question is not in order in those terms.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the government anticipates the removal of millions of acres of western agricultural land from wheat production in the next five years?

Mr. Speaker: The question should be placed on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACTION TO BAN UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the statement made today by the Prime Minister concerning the agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union on non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. Having in mind the fact that the United States is said to be planning further massive nuclear tests at the present time in the northern Pacific, will Canada do what it can at the present session of the United Nations to bring about a ban on underground testing?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are working in that direction. We are applying all the pressure we can for a test ban treaty. It might be of interest to the hon. member to know that according to the information we have from the United States government no further tests will be held on Amchitka, where the original test was made, for a period of one or two years and may not be made at all depending on the results of the first test.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether in that interval Canada will make any representations to the government of the United States that testing not continue on Amchitka in view of the serious consequences it could have because the anticipated tests are to be much larger than the test held this fall?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that the reason we made our representation on the previous occasion was the danger that because of a fault there might be a tidal wave or earthquake generated by the test. We will be following the results of the test and if we find any reason to make further representations we will do so.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has any information on whether the earthquake which resulted in a recent tidal wave alert on the Pacific coast, though fortunately it did not result in a tidal wave, had any relationship to the test on Amchitka? If he does not have that information, can he secure it from the United States?

Mr. Sharp: I will make inquiries about that. There were some earthquakes about the time of the former tests but they were before the tests were made so it would have been very difficult to establish any relationship between the two. However, I will make inquiries whether the scientists see any connection between them.

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION FOR NEWFOUNDLAND FARMERS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture of which I have given him notice. Would he be prepared to consider granting compensation to Newfoundland farmers who suffered serious losses to potato crops owing to early frost damage, and would he advise what can be done to assist the farmers in this emergency?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member is aware, the responsibility for providing assistance in cases of this kind rests with the provincial authorities. In the past there have been occasions when the cost of providing assistance has been such as to cause serious financial problems, and federal funds were provided to assist the provinces in carrying out their responsibilities to producers. However, recently the federal contributions for crop failures have generally been confined to those made under the Crop Insurance Act. Up to the present time, we have received no representations from Newfoundland to the effect that they wish crop insurance to be introduced.

ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government taking or considering any action to provide relief for a large number of farmers in Canada, particularly in the west, who are unable to meet their obligations as they fall due because of the situation there? This is a responsibility which, in the past, has been assigned to the federal government by legislation.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, very positive action has been taken, and part of it was announced by the Minister of Agriculture a week ago last Friday.

SCIENCE SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister has received the report of the OECD on Canada's science policy, does he intend to act on one of its central recommendations and establish a ministry solely responsible for science policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have a minister responsible for science policy, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the Prime Minister misunderstood my question. I asked whether the Prime Minister is considering establishing a ministry responsible solely for science policy?

Mr. Trudeau: We may consider naming some more Ministers without Portfolio, if the opposition does not object.

Mr. Bell: Is there anybody left?

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the question of science policy and ask the Prime Minister if, for once, he would try to give a serious answer to a serious question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: It was a serious answer, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC—CENSORING OF MINISTER'S PRESS CONFERENCE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Do the accounts of the minister's press conference held during his visit to the United Arab Republic give grounds for the belief that the minister's remarks were censored by government officials of that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fairweather: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister formally protested against this act of discourtesy, and what steps has Canada taken to ensure that the homes of embassy officials are free from search and other harassment?

Mr. Sharp: I do not see the relevance of the second part of the question. As to the first, I am not quite sure whether my department has yet made a formal protest, but at least one will be made and I may make one myself to the ambassador of the United Arab Republic.

[Later:]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the press conference referred to by my hon. friend from Fundy-Royal. Does the minister happen to have an uncensored transcript of the press conference so that we might know what remarks were deemed dangerous?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian press reporters who were present reported my comments, I think, fairly well in full. If the hon. member reads their reports, he will find what I did say.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—INQUIRY AS TO REDUCED GRANTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

According to some report heard at noon, the Department of Agriculture intends to reduce by several millions of dollars subsidies to dairy producers. Could the minister confirm or deny such report?

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately, the question as worded is unacceptable.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

EXEMPTION OF OLD ORDER MENNONITES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns the granting of exemptions to the Old Order Mennonites. Has this matter gone before the cabinet and what is the cabinet's decision on the granting of such exemption?

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked is not in order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK—INQUIRY AS TO GROWTH CENTRES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, of which I have given him notice. It is in connection with meetings held in New Brunswick. Has the minister decided that there will be five growth centres in that province and, if so, when will the areas be officially announced? Can he supply any other information on that subject?

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, I cannot supply any information at this stage. Shortly, we will be in a position to announce where the growth centres will be, but this has not yet been agreed upon by the provincial governments and the federal cabinet.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister make a statement to the House once the government has decided on the growth centres in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not know whether I will make a statement in the House, but I will certainly make a public statement. I do not mind telling the House where the growth centres will be when a decision has been reached.

An hon. Member: Thank you very much.

FUTURE OF FAIREY OF CANADA PLANT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a related question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can he say whether or not his departmental officials have made any progress in the last week or so toward providing assistance to ensure the future of Fairey Aviation of Canada?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I am afraid I cannot answer this question.

POLLUTION

INTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINES—PLANS TO MEET PROBLEM

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the increasing apprehension and warnings from scientists everywhere of the danger to our environment through the pollution of the atmosphere by the use of our present internal combustion engines, has his department or any department of the government initiated any investigation, research or discussion on plans to meet this increasingly serious problem?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not aware precisely of how much research has been done by the government or by my department, but I do know that many discussions have taken place between various specialists in this field and specialists in my department.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES AT U.S. BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say if he has received any representations from the Union of National Defence Employees that he hold discussions with his U.S. counterpart regarding Canadians dismissed by the United States at their bases in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked is not in order. It is not sufficient to ask merely whether a minister has received representations.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I rephrase my question and ask whether the minister can indicate to the House what response he has made to the representations made by the Union of National Defence Employees respecting negotiations with his U.S. counterpart regarding Canadians employed at U.S. bases in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It may be that I have received such representations. I will have to check, but I do not recall them.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate to the House the result of his recent negotiations with his U.S. counterpart regarding better arrangements for Canadians employed at U.S. bases in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: I did report on this subject in answer to a question some time ago and I stated that the results were not very favourable. The United States was not prepared to change its policies.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED OIL PRICES—EFFECT ON FARMERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence perhaps the Minister of Agriculture would answer it. On November 17, I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he would instruct the Prices and Incomes Commission to investigate the increase in fuel oil prices. May I now ask the Minister of Agriculture, in view of the fact that virtually all the major oil companies have served notice they will increase their price in the area west of Ottawa by one cent a gallon, whether the government will now instruct the Prices and Incomes Commission to investigate what effect this price increase will have on farm production costs?

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the Prices and Incomes Commission is an independent body. We dare hope that the Commission is studying what relates to the oil companies and will report on the subject.

[English]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question on this subject. I accept the Parliamentary Secretary's answer, but my question was: Will the minister ask the Prices and Incomes Commission to consider this problem?

DRUGS

ALLEGED INEFFECTIVENESS OF PRESCRIPTION PRODUCT—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A week ago, in answer to one of the numerous questions from this corner about his forthcoming statement on the alleged ineffectiveness of certain prescription drugs, he said he would try to make a statement "this week", which is now last week. Obviously he could not do so then and I want to know if he will be able to make the statement this week?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am planning to make a statement on Thursday of this week.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENCE AT BROADCASTING COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and it is related to the musical ride series we had a little earlier in the question period. Are plainclothes members of the RCMP present at the current hearings on the Company of Young Canadians being held before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts and, if so, what is the reason for their presence?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): I believe they are not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rose: I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to look into this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, although I do not like unduly checking on committees of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was not requesting that the Solicitor General check on the committees—God forbid. I asked him if he would mind checking to see if the RCMP are present at these hearings?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to do that.

POST OFFICE

WINNIPEG—HIRING OF CHRISTMAS HELP BELOW MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that the Post Office in Winnipeg is hiring Christmas help at a rate of pay below the Manitoba minimum wage, will the minister look into this matter with a view to correcting it?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

EXEMPTION OF OLD ORDER MENNONITES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has a decision been reached on the granting of an exemption from the Canada Pension Plan to the Old Order Mennonites?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The government is still giving active consideration to this matter. One of the factors involved in this consideration is the practice followed in other countries, which we are now looking into, especially with regard to what this has meant in terms of administrative difficulties. I would hope I would be in a position to give a final decision on the matter within the next month.

INQUIRY AS TO BARBER COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he received a request from the President of the National Farmers Union calling for the immediate release of the Barber Commission report? Would he also advise the House when we may expect the release of this report, whether there will be an interim report and, if so, when it will appear?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, quite obviously I cannot release the final report of the Barber Commission until I have received it, and I have not received it yet. There has been a further interim report, or what is more accurately described as a report dealing with a specific subject matter, that is, tractor and combine pricing patterns around the world. I have already answered that as soon as it is translated and printed it will be released. It cannot be done before that.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION

MEASURE WINDING UP EXPO

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-6, to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East) moved:

That Bill No. C-6, An Act to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith, be amended by deleting therefrom subclause (1) of clause 7.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the party is over and just about everybody has gone home, except those people who have been left with the job of tidying up some of the problems that were created over the past several years in the administration of Expo affairs. These are the people who have to figure out how the bills are to be paid. They are still on hand, and the bills do have to be paid.

A number of years ago an Expo Corporation was established by an Act of this Parliament. It was given the power to borrow money under guarantees from the government of Canada. The Corporation was also provided with a $20 million grant as a contribution from the government of Canada to the 1967 Exhibition. Loans were made and the Expo corporation did borrow money. When these notes came due the guarantee was honoured by the government of Canada and those amounts were entered in the books of the government of Canada as accounts receivable; in other words as assets of the government of Canada.

The Auditor General has taken objection to some of the methods used in handling these accounts. I had occasion to question him when he appeared before the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee, where this bill was being considered clause by clause, and in answer to my questions he made the following comments:

I can only direct you to the comments made in my last report to the House, where I refer to the recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee in which it stated:

"—and that amendments to the existing legislation be placed before Parliament and the Legislature of Quebec so that the additional grants could be made by the parties concerned, namely, Canada, Quebec and Montreal.

The Committee directed the attention of the House to the fact that unless these additional grants are provided, the Corporation's presently estimated total requirement of $143 million (less $40 million already provided by Canada, Quebec and Montreal) will have been financed by loans from Canada and the Corporation will be burdened with the cost of additional interest and at the conclusion of the Exhibition will not have the cash resources necessary for payment of its indebtedness to Canada.

The Auditor General noted that, in fact, an asset was being set up on the books of the government of Canada in the form of an account receivable from a Corporation that had no resources with which to pay that account receivable. He noted this later in further questioning when he said, and I quote from page 36 of the testimony on Monday, November 17:

Mr. Burton, my responsibility in connection with the making of this money in the form of loans was because they were treated as assets, as a balance sheet or a statement that I am required to certify. Do you think it is an asset to show an indebtedness from a corporation that does not have any means with which to discharge that debt, which is called an asset? I think, although it sounds an odd statement to make, that Mr. Bryce and I were kicking this around one day in the Public Accounts Committee when I described it as an operation which was like lending money to your wife, and then calling it an asset.

The Auditor General also noted that in the past several years loans were authorized by this Parliament to Expo Corporation when they may have been more properly made in the form of grants. I understand that these loans were made before my own tenure in this House. It was considered at that time that a significant portion of the money being lent would never be repaid since Expo Corporation would not have the resources with which to repay it. These amounts would have to be written off eventually by the government of Canada as an investment in this project. Mr. Henderson, in his testimony on Monday, November 17 also noted—I am quoting now from page 35 of the testimony:

It was started out with grants of, as you know, $20 million in the federal case. The normal or expected way would have been that there would have been an amount of money appropriated each year as you go along. As a result, there would have been an accounting of some kind given to justify it, and it would have appeared in the estimates. It would have appeared in the computation of the budgetary deficit or surplus in those years. To use the expression rather loosely, you would have been paying your way. Now you get the bill in one chunk at the end.

A number of criticisms have been made of the operations of Expo Corporation and some of these matters came under review during the course of the committee's consideration of this bill. It is not my intention to go into these items at the present time since it is expected that the Public Accounts Committee will probably be giving this matter rather more thorough study than was possible before the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee. At the same time, I think it is proper to note that consideration of the management of Expo finances was a proper matter for consideration of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee since the management of those finances, in fact, does relate to the action which we are now being asked to approve. The fact is as well, Mr. Speaker, that some assets created through the Expo project, and as a result of the work of the Expo Corporation, have been taken over by other government agencies. This quite properly might be noted in appropriate fashion.

The question is now: How do we deal with the remainder of the bill? The fact is that it would appear the total contribution of the government of Canada to the work of Expo Corporation will amount to approximately $142.9 million. Twenty million dollars of this amount has already been provided in the form of grants; the remaining $122.9 million remains as an account receivable by the government of Canada. The money has already been spent and, as already noted, errors may have been made in the earlier handling of these funds when they were approved by Parliament in the form of loans rather than outright grants, as suggested by the Auditor General of Canada. It is also clear that the national debt of Canada will be increased, regardless of how the present problem is handled; I think there is no question of that.

There are two alternatives in dealing with this problem of how to treat the $122.9 million in accounts receivable, which is certainly no longer collectible from the corporation. The first step would be to pass the legislation now before us which would simply write off this amount as an account receivable, remove it as an asset, and thereby increase the national debt by a corresponding amount. The second step would be to approve a parliamentary appropriation so that this amount would, in fact, be shown as an expenditure by the government. There would be a decision taken by this Parliament that the $122.9 million should be considered as a grant for the purpose of financing the 1967 Expo project. Under the present proposal, as I have already noted, the national debt will be increased and there will be no corresponding expenditure to account for this increase.

In his budget speech on June 3 Finance Minister Benson noted it was the intention of the government to ask for parliamentary approval of action to remove this account receivable and thus wind up the affairs of the Expo Corporation. At page 9421 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> A further budgetary provision will also be appropriate under present circumstances. The final acounting for Expo '67 has now been carried out, and arrangements made for the settlement of the operating deficits incurred by the Expo Corporation, which Parliament will be asked to approve by legislation. The federal share of this deficit amounts to about $125 million, and I propose that this amount be written off completely as a budgetary charge during the current fiscal year...
> This will of course reduce the surplus on budgetary acount, but will not affect our cash position. After the adjustment, the net budgetary surplus now foreseen for 1969-70 thus stands at some $250 million.

Then, at page 9423 of Hansard we find this:

> These non-budgetary requirements for the current year will be financed in considerable part by the budgetary surplus which I have forecast at $375 million, before the write-off of the Expo deficit, which will give rise to another non-budgetary offset.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is some conflict between these two quotations which I have presented.

It seems to me there is no question about the legislation now before Parliament. Clause 7, subclause (1) of the bill, as it has been reported back by the committee will, in effect, constitute appropriate and adequate legislative authorization for the removal of this particular item from the accounts of the government of Canada. But the problem is, how will this action be reflected in the accounts of the government and in the accounts and reports of expenditures, as they will be shown to the people of Canada?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter for serious consideration. We should make sure the legislative measures adopted by this Parliament are in such form that the people of Canada will have a proper accounting of how their money was spent. I suggest that the proposal now before Parliament in the form of clause 7, subsection (1), as reported by the committee, will not result in a proper accounting of this expenditure to the people of Canada. First of all we had the loan; then, the loan was simply written off without any further accounting of what was, in fact, a grant to Expo Corporation and what constitutes an expenditure of public funds raised through taxation. Thus, I suggest that the alternative procedure should be to remove subclause (1) of clause 7 from the bill and to press upon the government the necessity of taking appropriate steps to bring in a supplementary estimate, to bring in another appropriation bill to deal with this item. In this way, the $122.9 million outstanding from the Expo Corporation, which is to be absorbed by the government of Canada, would be correctly shown in the public accounts as an expenditure by the government in what was certainly a worth-while national project. This procedure would convey the true story of these expenditures to the people of Canada.

I should also like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the need for consistency in dealing with contributions made by the Government of Canada out of public funds to Expo Corporation. As I noted earlier, $20 million was provided to Expo Corporation in the form of a grant as a result of the original legislation approved by parliament. It is in fact noted in certain accounts, where this is shown, that the total that has to be borne by the Government of Canada is some $142.9 million. To be deducted from that is the grant that was made by the Government of Canada, leaving a net figure of $122.9 million. We have on the one hand $20 million which was granted to Expo Corporation in the form of a grant, which is quite properly shown as an expenditure of the Government of Canada and, on the other hand, we have the other $122.9 million that will be contributed to Expo by the people of Canada. This latter figure will simply show up as an addition to the national debt and no record of that will show up in the expenditures of the government. So, the total amount is really a grant to Expo Corporation and, in my view, it should be shown as such.

When this bill was before the committee I moved an amendment which I should like to place on record. I moved, "that clause 7 subclause 1 be deleted from the bill and that this committee recommend that consideration be given to a parliamentary appropriation as a more appropriate means of effecting the objective of writing off the item 'accounts receivable, Expo, guarantees' as shown on the accounts of the Government of Canada."

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that there was some response from the minister when I presented this amendment. Possibly he was embarrassed at having this matter raised, because he had suggested before that possibly he would place this matter before the Minister of Finance. I certainly appreciate that suggestion by the minister, because it shows that he is somewhat embarrassed at having to deal with this subject in this way. I thought he would like to find some other way of handling what is certainly a rather awkward problem for him in winding up the affairs of Expo. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, when the vote came all government members voted against my amendment. They were quite happy to see the proposal placed by the government before the House presented to the people of Canada, and to have public funds dealt with in this entirely inappropriate way.

The amendment I have now placed before the House, Mr. Speaker, carries forward the first part of the motion I moved in committee. It is not possible at this time for me to place a motion before the House which would give effect to the second part of my motion moved in the committee. I refer to the recommendation to the government and the House of Commons. Certainly, one consequence of the approval of the amendment I have placed before the House at this time would be to require the government to bring an appropriation before Parliament, as recommended in the second part of my motion in committee.

I commend to the House the amendment I have moved and hope that hon. members will approve it, that the government will reconsider its actions and that it will choose, instead, to bring forward a parliamentary appropriation to deal with the problem we are confronted with at this time.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before us deals entirely with the writing off of amounts of money up to $125 million. These consist of loans made to Expo which are uncollectible. Actually, an amount of $122.9 million appears on the books of the government as an asset. It cannot be collected and, of course, must be deleted in some way if we are to get any sort of true picture.

What we are really discussing at the moment is, what is the best or preferable method of dealing with this write-off; is it best done by introducing and passing a clause like clause 7(1) of this bill, or would it be better to deal with it by means of an appropriation bill.

I will not repeat the arguments of the hon. member who introduced the amendment. In my view, and I expressed my view in the committee, the more usual method of writing off uncollectible debts of this sort is for the government to bring in an appropriation bill. That is also a preferable method. I will, therefore, support the amendment.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended speaking on this matter until I read the gratuitous remarks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). I, therefore, feel that the circumstances connected with Expo should be placed on record so that it will be clear and definite.

Often it is asked: What were the circumstances connected with the beginning of this great project? Expo brought Canada to the attention of all the world. It was a tremendous project. Where did it have its beginnings?

My records show that the first person who brought up this matter and suggested that a world exposition would be a means of Canada's being known all over the world was Hon. Pierre Sevigny. He went into considerable detail in connection with this matter. Subsequently, in Paris, the late Senator Marc Drouin, while attending an exposition in 1958, suggested in a speech that the time had come to inaugurate that great undertaking in Canada. Throughout there was the complete, enthusiastic, energetic and imaginative support of His Worship Mayor Drapeau. Immediately, recommendations came from various individuals. On September 5, 1958, a letter was received from Raymond Dupuis, President, Chamber de Commerce du District de Montreal, asking for support on behalf of an exposition to be held in 1967 in the city of Montreal.

On two occasions, the government which I had the honour to lead endeavoured to bring this about. The first occasion was at the meeting of the international Exposition board. The Soviet Union stepped in and asked for the exposition to be held in Moscow in commemoration of their fiftieth anniversary. Canada lost out by one vote. Later, the Soviet Union decided that it did not intend to go ahead, and we sent a representative to Paris in the person of Colonel Sevigny to bring about support for this exposition being given to Canada. The decision of the board was unanimous and the question of financing arose. There can be no doubt as to where the Government of Canada stood, despite the statements made by the minister in the committee and outside of this House. The question was, for how much should the federal government be liable? This question was discussed at length in co-operation not only with the municipal government of Montreal but with the government of Quebec. The then premier of that province, Mr. Lesage, gave the fullest co-operative support to the bringing about of an exposition toward which the three governments, federal, provincial and the municipal government of Montreal, would make their contributions. I emphasize the degree to which there was full co-operation among the three levels of government.

The determination as to the amount for which the federal government should be responsible was clear and definite. Section 11 of the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act reads as follows:

> The Minister of Finance, at the request of the Corporation, may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay to the Corporation by way of grant such amounts as are required for the conduct of the business of the Corporation but the aggregate of all amounts paid to the Corporation under this section shall not exceed twenty million dollars.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Now, by some method of false reasoning the minister has endeavoured to raise the smokescreen that sometime, someplace, I stated that we should not restrict ourselves to that amount if a few million dollars more voted by Parliament would make the exposition a success.

The sum of $40 million was the total amount of the contribution from all three levels of government. The city of Toronto was interested in having this exposition. It had had virtually 100 years of experience in operating the finest annual exposition anywhere in the world. Naturally, Toronto had facilities for a world exposition, although the area covered by the Toronto exposition would not have been sufficient to meet the needs of a world exposition.

The then mayor of Toronto, Nathan Phillips, Q.C., took strong exception, in a communication to me on August 25, 1958, to a statement made by the late Senator Drouin. Senator Drouin made a public statement that the centenary should be celebrated by a fair in Montreal. However, when Toronto found out that the federal contribution determined would be $20 million, the answer was that it was not interested in having the exhibition because it could not be put on for a total contribution of $40 million. We, in the government, then determined that the exhibition should go to the city of Montreal.

It was a tremendous success and everything about it made Canadians proud of their heritage. We are dealing now with a financial situation, and the failure of the government of Canada to exercise any control over the greatest orgy of expenditure that has ever taken place in this country. Apparently anything went and there was no care, no attention and no regard by the Department of Finance or by the Pearson government in respect of controlling expenditures. Much the same thing has happened in the last year in connection with this organization of the young Canadians, where everybody is a friend and nobody is controlled. The government sits and looks on while the Canadian taxpayer's money is poured down the drain. That is what happened at Expo for that period from the time of the organization right through to the end. We cannot do anything about it now, they say, That is true; the Canadian taxpayer has paid $122 million more than there was any undertaking to pay because the government simply did not exercise any control.

One of the most interesting features in visiting Expo was the degree to which nobody seemed to have any control—spend, spend and draw on the government of Canada, or at least with the tacit approval of the government of Canada. I repeat that there was never any suggestion anywhere, any place or at any time that this kind of thing would be tolerated.

The minister has the habit of making statements accompanied with a happy face.

Mr. Pepin: I learned that from you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is a congenial fellow. Nobody I know in the House of Commons can be more congenial when he is in greater difficulty. That is an attribute I give to him. He smiles.

Mr. Prud'homme: He is not going to cry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He exudes congeniality, but I am not going to tell the hon. member that he also imitates the minister or that the minister imitates him. They are both happy individuals, and always when there is difficulty the minister adopts that attitude.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the total amount that was to be spent? Did anybody ever contemplate the expenditure of $270 million? Did anybody ever begin to realize that we were going to be asked to cover up $122 million by the subterfuge of the bill now before the House instead of following the constitutional system? There was nothing of that kind.

What did Mr. Pearson say? On August 13, 1963, within a period of a few months after he resumed office, he announced an immediate summit conference to guarantee safe sailing for the world's fair. Then, he announced that the federal contribution would be something over $50 million toward the exhibition. There had been no ratification or acceptance by Parliament, but even Prime Minister Pearson, in his most effusive declaration regarding the exhibition, never went beyond something over $50 million.

The Prime Minister went on to say that federal government support for the fair had already been decided and an allocation of $20 million had been made toward direct costs. Added to this amount, he said, would be the cost of an exhibit "worthy of this country", and a "substantial extra amount" would be required to protect the site. He said the total expenditure of the federal government would be something over $50 million. That included the cost of Canada's pavilion. Let that be clear. The whole cost would be the original $20 million plus some $30 million to cover Canada's exhibition and certain additional costs. Then he said that improvements to bridges, access roads and other ancillary needs would have to be met by either the Province of Quebec or the City of Montreal. And he added these words: "There must be a clear understanding of who will do what." Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we are saying now. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) who spoke, and who moved an amendment, had this in mind. Well, nobody ever decided that question. The government simply allowed those people in charge to spend whatever they wished to spend, without any control whatsoever.

Let me go on. Mr. Pearson said:

> We must anticipate events. Each government must assess the full meaning of what it must do. Time is all too short for what must be done.

> The three government leaders, with other dignitaries, sat under 16-foot high blue, green and red letters reading EXPO '67 on one side of the main barge—From then on, the folk dancing took place.

Today, the folk who are dancing are the people of Canada who have to pay the taxes from which to meet these unjustified expenditures, outlays which constitutionally ought not to have been permitted. I see the minister says my figures are a myth, and while I had suggested in the House in April, '64 that net costs were to be held to that amount, I had not been so certain of that possibility in December, 1963.

I never altered my view, Mr. Speaker. Parliament approved the amount which was required and requisite on the part of the federal government. What happened was this: the Government of Canada under Prime Minister Pearson and those associated with him simply permitted expenditures to be made beyond reason, completely without any authority and in the absence of any information giving details. Nor are we going to find out, because if this bill is passed in its present form what we shall be doing is something along the lines of the old adage "forgive and forget". But in this case the people of Canada will have to pay.

The government I had the honour to lead brought EXPO about. I was in Vancouver in February, 1963 and I had before me six or seven different areas, one of which, it was suggested, should be the site of EXPO. Having examined them at greater length than ever before, I decided on St. Helen's Island. We brought it about. We launched it. Then, what happened? When the opening proceedings took place, Premier Lesage, no longer premier, and myself, both of whom had done their part to bring it about, were seated so far back in the audience that an ordinary telescope was not sufficient to enable us to see what was going on. The government had decided to turn EXPO into a Liberal holiday, and it turned out to be one in which the liberality of the expenditure has never been exceeded in Canada at any time.

There was waste. There was extravagance. There was an orgy of wasteful expenditure over which no one had any control. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite want us to pass Bill C-6 to wind up the corporation. They tell us, in effect: We won't go into any of the detail, or into any of the facts in connection with expenditure; we just want the House of Commons to say "Blessed are they who spend extravagantly and beyond any right, because they were spending on something which was worthwhile for Canada."

Well, to get the record straight—because we shall not otherwise get the facts on the record—it is well to recall that on March 27 last the Auditor General in his annual report set out certain details which prove beyond question that what happened is an indictment of the Government of Canada for failing to exercise any control over the purse-strings of expenditure. Let me mention some of the references. The construction cost of Habitat's apartments went up to $17,982,000, or $10 million more than the original estimate. Mr. Speaker, if you want to see a habitat of inefficiency and ineffectiveness, view that place. Nobody wants to rent there, because if they did so they would need the resources of EXPO to pay the monthly rental rates. There it stands, a monument to inefficiency and to wild expenditure for which Canadians will have to pay. When the architects' fees and other costs involved are added to the expenditure, the 115 finished apartments and the 43 unfinished apartments cost a grand total of $22,685,000. I should like to hear the minister defend that expenditure. It was waste unjustified, and all there is to show for it is that monument, Habitat, which nobody wants to occupy.

Then, there were the two theme buildings, Man the Producer and Man the Explorer, whose cost went up from—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to apologize to the right hon. gentleman but I must bring to his notice that under the terms of the Standing Order his time has expired, unless he has the unanimous consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you. I mentioned those two theme buildings. Their cost rose from an original estimate of $9,125,000 to $20,560,000. Just imagine what would have happened had there been any control. Then the Auditor General, who does not seem to be very popular with this government, urged that Parliament should commission a fulltime investigation of these operations. He goes on to talk about the jumbled books. The accounting was so jumbled that the joint auditors, Mr. Henderson and the Quebec provincial auditor, were unable to certify the correctness of $101,438,000 out of an approximate total revenue of $141 million. This amount was lost without trace. There was nothing to show how $101 million had been spent.

Salaries at Expo also went haywire, almost from the beginning. Thirty-three officers received salaries of $10,000 or more, and these amounts were increased during 1967 by from 20 per cent to 60 per cent. This was the time when the government was talking about inflation. All these people had to do was to spend; no one controlled them.

Thirty-three employees left their employment before the end of the year and received severance pay averaging 27 per cent of their boosted salaries. Instead of these people themselves being boosted out, they received severance pay amounting to 27 per cent of their boosted salaries.

Of the work force, about 24,000 received overtime ranging from $1,000 to $19,000, at a total cost of $4.5 million. We hear so much today about people getting overtime. I should think these people at Expo ought to give correspondence courses so that labour can understand how to obtain overtime.

Then, a collective labour agreement that gave most hourly rated employees 4 per cent severance pay was extended to those who were not covered by the agreement, and 12 such employees received a total of $70,000, the largest sum received being $15,425.

The next item dealt with is rental. The Expo Corporation itself lost $345,000 on the rental of an apartment for six months. The CBC, which the government says is usually very careful in its expenditures, was not to be outdone. It contracted for guaranteed accommodation for 1967 in three Montreal hotels. This accommodation remained unoccupied 24 per cent, 48 per cent and 50 per cent respectively of the time, at a cost of $148,000, including a termination fee of $18,900 for premises that were unused.

Did you ever hear, Mr. Speaker, of a gravy train like this? As long as you were aboard it you could spend regardless of whether there was justification. At the same time that these hotel facilities were not being used, the CBC rented accommodation in other hotels costing approximately $40,000. The CBC paid $450,000 to employees for what was called scheduled hours during daily or weekly tours of duty which were in excess of the actual hours of attendance.

It is an amazing record, Mr. Speaker. These are but a few examples of expenditures made. The report also deals with the other losses. Of the assets that were simply written off, Canada was assessed $116,794,000. The Centennial Commission got off lightly with a spectacular—but, of course, I am not going to go into that because it was not part of the fair.

What I have placed before you, Mr. Speaker, is a record that is unequalled anywhere, any place in Canada, for wild, uncontrolled expenditure. The minister says that I thought we ought to spend a little more if all that was going to be spent was $20 million. But the losses were colossal. Control of expenditure was non-existent.

The government now comes along and says, in effect: "Let's forget all about it; it was a wonderful event". And it was. But that is not what we are dealing with at the moment. We are dealing with the right of the people's representatives in Parliament to control a government that exercised no control over the purse strings placed in the hands of the Commission. The government has found a nice, easy way of ending the affair. There will be an Expo Winding-Up Act, and all rights of creditors and all actions pending are unimpaired by the transfer to the minister of the assets.

The purpose of the bill is to provide for the dissolution of the Canadian Corporation. Clause 7 provides:

> There may be deleted from the accounts of Canada, as a portion of the deficit of the corporation that is to be borne by the government of Canada, not more than one hundred and twenty-five million dollars of the amounts shown therein as Accounts Receivable Expo Guarantees.

The government will push this measure through. Parliament no longer has any authority. There is a supine membership that stands behind the government whether it be right or wrong—though the government is always right. This measure should not receive the support of this House. To support it is to place the seal of approval on the most unprecedented and wildest expenditures made in all of Canada's history, with the taxpayer of Canada required to pick up the bill.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has taken part in the debate. "La grande histoire", and "la petite histoire", would not have been complete without his participation. I am sure that whoever writes the history of Expo will quote the words of the right hon. gentleman, that it was the "greatest orgy in expenditures in the history of mankind".

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I said in the history of Canada.

Mr. Pepin: In the history of Canada, then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As usual, the minister is too expansive.

Mr. Pepin: I can think of a number of people who would turn in their graves because they thought they held the record.

I do not intend to reply point by point because many of the matters raised by the right hon. gentleman have already been dealt with in the committee. Although I understand they were not dealt with to the full satisfaction of some members of the committee, explanations were nevertheless provided, and quite graciously accepted in many instances.

I pointed out during the committee hearings that there were a number of safeguards in the original legislation, some of which originated from the right hon. gentleman's. cabinet. These safeguards were the master plan, the annual budget, the decisions of the boards that had to be approved by the two governments in Ottawa and Quebec, the annual report and the observations of the Auditor General. I might also underline the fact that the loans made to the Corporation were approved by Parliament in the Appropriation Act in the year in which they were made, and consequently already appear as such in the public accounts.

• (4:10 p.m.)

On the subject of cost escalation I felt obligated to quote in committee the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) because in my view this figure of $20 million as being the total federal contribution planned appeared rather unrealistic. I looked at Hansard of that time to find out what the facts were. I knew that the right hon. gentleman had said on a number of occasions that his understanding was that the whole thing—I suppose it was irrespective of other federal participation in terms of a pavilion for Canada, for example—would cost the federal government only $20 million. Having the kind of mind I have I had to find out the truth. So, I went to the record and this is where I found the following quotations from a speech of the right hon. gentleman. I am reading from page 3-21 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for November 7, 1969:

> We should also have information as to the total expected expenditure to be made on this fair.

The date of the speech is April 10, 1964:

> I do not want to reiterate what I have already said, but this fair cannot fail. To allow this fair, representative of this nation, even to enter the spectrum of failure would give to Canada a black eye internationally.

So, I gathered from that the right hon. gentleman wanted to make sure Expo would be a success and was willing to pay the price. This, however, is not the most important paragraph I quoted in the committee. The other quotation I gave—and again this is dated April 10, 1964—was the following:

> Canadians as a whole have a great stake in national prestige to assure the success of this project. No one yet knows what the total expenditure will be.

This was rather important to me. The former prime minister who, as everybody agrees was the political creator of this great thing, Expo '67, did admit on April 10, 1964 that no one knew what the price would be. I cannot understand how, on the one hand, the gentleman could say it would cost $20 million and, on the other hand, that no one by April 10, 1964 knew what the price would be. This was rather disturbing to me.

[Mr. Pepin.]

I was even more disturbed when I read the rest of the paragraph:

> There has been an estimate of $585 million as the total cost, an estimate I think made by Mr. Bienvenu some months ago.

On the one hand we are told nobody knew what the price would be. On the other hand, we are told it would be $20 million and, on the third hand—if that is a possibility—we are told it would cost $585 million. All statements made by the same gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would allow a question. Does he realize that the $585 million was the estimated cost for all the buildings erected on these premises by all the countries that participated.

Mr. Pepin: Even at that there would be some $300 million or more left to be payed, even if we deduct the costs of foreign pavilions. But again, the part of the quotation I emphasized most was the statement, "no one knew". Why was it that nobody knew? Because of the limited amount of time. The Russians had got it first, and we only got the fair when they gave it up. The fact is that the Expo Corporation had to tie together the actual planning of Expo and the actual building of Expo. I have read that from the moment the Corporation obtained the land on which Expo was to take place it took only two years, nine months and 26 days to actually build the fair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is wrong.

Mr. Pepin: That is what I am told.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The land was picked out in February, 1963.

Mr. Pepin: I said that from the time they took possession of the land, the Corporation took only two years, nine months and 26 days to build the fair. Anyway, the point I am trying to make is that Expo was not actually created. It grew. The result of this was that the master plan was revised seven times before the opening of the fair and even once after.

I am quite sure members of this House would also like me to emphasize that as the costs of Expo grew the benefits also grew. This is a point I made before the committee. For example, $480 million of extra tourist revenue in 1967 was directly attributed to Expo. An amount of $230 million in the form of taxes payed to all levels of government could be attributed to Expo. I am trying to make the point that as the actual costs of Expo grew, because of the demonstrated enthusiasm of people all over the world, and Canadians, the benefits also increased. In other words, Expo in 1967 was not what the government of the time had in mind in 1963; it was very much bigger.

With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), may I say first that I am rather surprised he moved it because I thought I had charmed him out of it, in the committee. I thought the promise I made that I would bring his views to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would have been sufficient. I thought the hon. member, having said this was only a bookkeeping operation, would have chosen another forum in which to debate the issue which I assume is an interesting one.

His first grudge is that the financing of Expo '67 took place in the form of loans rather than in the form of grants. Had it been done in the form of grants, I suppose someone else would have a good reason for saying it should have been done by loans. Since it has been done by loans, I presume there are good reasons for saying it should have been done by grants. I explained in the Committee the reason it was done by loans; time was of the essence. I do not think this is a major issue. I believe the hon. member for Regina East said so himself, before the committee even if he did not say so in his speech in the House. As I said, the loans were the subject of parliamentary appropriations in the year in which they were made. That gave them parliamentary sanction.

The hon. member's other point, is in respect of how the "bookkeeping transaction" should appear in the financial books of parliament. This is debatable also. Mr. Speaker, we have two sets of books on expenditures, as you know better than I do. One contains the estimates of expenditures and the other contains the accounts of Canada. I want to underline for the benefit of the hon. member for Regina East the fact that these figures will be included in the accounts for Canada; that is, the share of the deficit to be borne by the federal government will appear in the accounts of Canada. This is the document on which the Auditor General can comment. So, if he wishes to comment again he is free to do so and the Public Accounts Committee will be free to look at that again. I was not sure whether or not the hon. member for Regina East was aware of this.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not think it is fair, and I do not think there is any justification, for the minister to attempt to leave the impression that I would not be aware that this matter would come to the attention of members of this House through the report of the Auditor General and the subsequent reference to the Public Accounts Committee. The point I was making was that this matter is not being reported to the people of Canada in the form of an expenditure, which it is.

Mr. Pepin: I had not finished my commentary, but I am glad to know the hon. member was aware of the point I was making. I regret having made it now that I know he was aware of it.

Mr. Burton: I hope the minister is aware of it also.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: I just became aware of it today! I am no authority on procedure, as is my hon. friend, so this is why I looked into this personally to make sure that the right procedure was followed, and being proud of my newly acquired knowledge I may have tended to be too keen to pass it along.

Mr. Baldwin: This is a very dangerous thing.

Mr. Pepin: With respect now to the other side of it, that is estimates; the deficit could not be included in the main estimates for 1969-70, although it was mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) during his budget speech, because the exact figures were not known then.

The other possibility, which was mentioned by me in the committee, was to include it in a supplementary estimate. There are arguments both in favour and against that. One of the arguments against is that supplementary estimates are introduced usually for the purpose of covering unforeseen expenditures. This Expo deficit can hardly be considered to be an unforeseen expenditure. I see the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) smiling at that thought. So, apparently this matter did not fit too well into supplementary estimates, either.

Mr. Burton: May I ask the minister a question? Can he state that all supplementary estimates introduced in the House can be correctly described as unforeseen expenditures?

Mr. Pepin: I would not dare, do that, but as we are speaking theoretically, and as the hon. member spoke of theories before, I thought I could go on in the same rather philosophical vein. I had the impression in the committee that one of the things which the hon. member for Regina East wanted was to ensure that this expenditure, this deficit, was made well known to the Canadian population, for educational purposes, I presume. If that is the objective, what better place is there to make it known than by way of a clause in the winding up legislation itself? So, I think that from the point of view of good democracy and of making the people of Canada aware of the price of Expo to the federal government, the present way is a very democratic way of proceeding.

It seems to me that the way that is being taken by the government now is very proper and there is certainly nothing illegal about it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because it conceals everything.

Mr. Pepin: Consequently, I think the amendment should be defeated. However, I will bring the whole debate to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and I am sure there will be other forums where the hon. member's arguments could be more properly made, in my estimation.

Mr. Burton: May I ask the minister another question? Is the government in fact giving consideration to the recommendations made by the Auditor General in his report to the House on a number of occasions in which he requested the government and Parliament to put an end to the practice of dealing with expenditures of money or writing off certain assets or accounts receivable through the method of non-budgetary transactions? Can we expect any change of policy on this matter?

Mr. Pepin: I am not familiar with this matter but I will inquire from the Minister of Finance and I will gladly have a conversation with my hon. friend later.

Mr. Baldwin: His answer will be no.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I would like to say a few words on the amendment. I was rather interested in the remark of the minister that one of the safeguards for projects of this type was the annual report which is always issued. As I recall the terms of the agreement, the annual report was to be issued within three months of the termination of the financial year. As an example, let me speak of the sixth annual report. The financial year ends on December 31, yet the financial report for the year 1969 was issued on November 4.

Mr. Pepin: May I break in at this point, with the permission of the hon. member? A confession was made in the committee to that effect. I blushed and I said that indeed the report came too late. Explanations were provided. They were judged to be sufficient by some and insufficient by others, but the confession was made.

Mr. Harding: I understand that no explanation was given as to why it was not provided to members.

What really worries me about this whole affair is the fact that for a period of years the Auditor General of Canada, and the auditor general of the province of Quebec, have been submitting reports recommending that certain things be done. It is amazing to realize that after a series of reports which have come to the government pointing out inadequacies in certain financial arrangements with Expo, the government has ignored them year after year. According to the Auditor General, some changes might have been made after a great deal of pressure, but they were inadequate. The question which I think we should ask ourselves is whether this should be the normal procedure, that a goal is set in all government departments, then the Auditor General, who is the watchdog of the Canadian taxpayers' money makes a report and that report is ignored right down the line. This is what really worries Canadians and worries me. Someone is at fault. Somewhere along the line following the receipt of the Auditor General's report by the government someone has not been doing a job. I think we have every right in the world to criticize the lack of effective action by this government on this particular matter.

I should like to put on the record a few comments made by the Auditor General just to show that he has drawn this matter very clearly to the attention of the government on numerous occasions. I will quote from the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, at page 185. This is what he said:

In our 1965 and subsequent Reports (paragraph 226 in 1967) we drew to the attention of the House certain expenditures and practices of the Corporation which, in our opinion, were inconsistent with those usually followed by Crown corporations and agencies. We mentioned that these matters had been drawn to the attention of the Corporation's management and Board of Directors who advised the joint auditors that the expenditures in question were necessary to the Corporation. The practices were continued in 1967. A number of other matters arising from the 1967 examination have been dealt with in the joint auditors' detailed report to the President and Members of the Board of Directors, and three of these are referred to in the following paragraphs of this report:

67. Salaries and termination payments.

69. Loss on operation of rented apartment building.

71. Cost of repairs to sanitary sewer system.

Certain revenues of the Corporation aggregating $101,438,000 of the total of $140,984,000 could not be effectively checked by the joint auditors and their report was qualified accordingly. This matter is dealt with in paragraph 65 of this report.

Then at page 186, the Auditor General's report reads:

Following the close of the Exhibition all of the capital assets, with the exception of minor items which were demolished or sold and the mass transit system which has since been sold to the city of Montreal for $1,880,000, were transferred to the ownership of Canada, Quebec and Montreal, whichever owned the land on which they were situated. Details are given in paragraph 66 of this report.

In paragraph 226 of our 1967 report we pointed out that a number of procedures followed in connection with capital construction projects had the effect of materially weakening financial control. These included amending contracts subsequent to the work having been completed in whole or in part without prior ascertainment of the additional costs involved, making a substantial number of progress payments to contractors without complete verification, and renegotiating bid prices with the lowest tenderer for modified programs without the benefit of competitive bidding. These procedures were continued throughout 1967.

Mr. Pepin: May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just want to observe that these points were raised at the committee stage, after second reading. I wonder what the purpose of third reading is—

Mr. Harkness: This is not third reading.

Mr. Pepin: —if we are to discuss over again what was dealt with in committee. This is more question than an observation.

Mr. Harkness: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that this is not third reading. This is the report stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister's point is well taken. Not all the members of the House were on the committee. I think these points should be explained, so the members who did not have the opportunity to attend the committee meetings will clearly understand that warnings had been continuously given to the government and requests for action had been made. I contend that this is very pertinent to the debate currently taking place. I quote again from page 187 of the Auditor General's report:

A request by the joint auditors for confirmation of the correctness of the amounts due by Canada, Quebec and Montreal as their share of the cost of the Exhibition was not replied to by the City of Montreal (see paragraph 66 of this report).

At page 188, the Auditor General said:

In previous reports (paragraph 67 in 1967) we pointed out that, since the major portion of the cost of the Exhibition was being financed by loans from Canada and because of the existing limitation on grants, changes in legislation would be required before the additional substantial grants could be made to provide the Corporation with the necessary resources to pay its indebtednes. The Public Accounts Committee discussed this matter with officers of the Department of Finance on June 16, 1966 and in its Seventh Report 1966-67 expressed its concurrence with our view and recommended that amendments to the existing legislation be placed before Parliament and the Legislature of Quebec so that additional grants could be made by the parties concerned, namely Canada, Quebec and Montreal.

Then, we see on page 32 of the Auditor General's report the following:

In their annual report to the President and members of the Board of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition over the past five years, the Provincial Auditor of Quebec and the Auditor General of Canada, joint auditors of the Corporation, have stressed the importance of the Corporation establishing and maintaining an adequate system of internal financial control.

Prior to the opening of the Exhibition, the Auditors drew to the Corporation's attention certain aspects of internal financial control that required improvement and certain important decisions that had to be taken before the opening of the Exhibition with respect to the procedures to be followed during the Exhibition for the handling of substantial amounts of cash and the recording of revenues from admission passports, tickets, parking fees and other sources. However, action taken was not adequate and serious breakdowns developed in the control of on-site revenues shortly after the Exhibition opened on April 28, 1967. Furthermore, the remedial action eventually taken did not correct all major weaknesses and the joint auditors were unable to express an opinion as to the correctness of revenues aggregating $101,438,000 of a total of $140,894,000. This situation was communicated by the auditors to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on July 30, 1968 and to the Minister of Industry and Commerce of the province of Quebec on July 31, 1968.

The most recent annual report of the Corporation, including the report of the joint auditors, was delayed because of the inability of the Corporation to finalize the accounts and answer the auditors' queries. This report, which pursuant to the requirements of section 18 of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act, 1962-63, c. 12, should have been submitted by the Corporation to the Minister within three months of the close of the financial year on December 31, 1967 and laid by him before Parliament within 15 days of receipt thereof, was not tabled in the House until October 2, 1968.

It is very clear, therefore, that the constant warnings given by the Auditor General of Canada and the Provincial Auditor of Quebec were disregarded by the ministers and the government. Surely, if there is a breakdown somewhere along the line between the receipt of information to correct situations which should be corrected and the taking of the necessary action we should search and find where the breakdown occurs and have it rectified. It is just a little much when Canadians, who expected to pay $20 million initially found this raised to $40 million, and now discover the amount has reached $142.9 million. I am not objecting to Expo, but I do object to this way of estimating expenditures which puts Canadians, the government, and members of this House in a very awkward position.

Mr. Pepin: It is not the same product.

Mr. Harding: Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, this is the point I am going to make. I trust that in future, if we have other commitments of the same nature, we will have adequate controls established so that we will not get into a mess similar to that which has been indicated by the Auditor General in this case.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might begin with the famous words that I did not intend to take part in this debate. It so happens that such is the case, but I am brought to my feet by the suggestion of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) that the amendment posed by my hon. friend from Regina East (Mr. Burton) is only a bookkeeping technicality which might have been dealt with in some other forum. These bookkeeping technicalities can be obscure; they can be the subject of debate—

Mr. Pepin: I did not say it; he said it. I did not say it was a bookkeeping technicality; he said it.

[Mr. Harding.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend the minister said something to the effect that it was the kind of thing that my friend might have raised in some other forum. If I have "done the minister wrong" I shall withdraw.

Mr. Pepin: Don't.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But certainly, what he said and the way he said it made me feel that I could not let him get away with it—whatever it was he said.

I am concerned about this matter, Mr. Speaker, both for its own sake and for an ancillary reason which I will allude to in a moment. I think the suggestion made by the Auditor General should be considered and if we are appropriating money, giving to Expo $125 million, the way we do it should be made clear. I do not think it is clear at the moment; I think it is being played down as simply the writing off of a debt.

I said I had an ancillary reason for getting to my feet and it would not take many guesses for members opposite to know what that is. We are dealing here with a $125 million deficit with respect to Expo. In my city we are concerned about a very small item, a $1 million deficit from the Pan-American games.

Mr. Pepin: I will gladly inform my hon. friend that I have taken up this case with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who apparently has received representations. He is looking into the matter now and he tells me that a decision should be reached soon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister was going to cut me out of my remarks altogether by telling me that a favourable decision had been made. It is very nice that he interrupts me at this point and tells me that a decision is close. That is the sort of charm that the minister turns on which makes one feel that he does not need to say any more. The trouble is that around this place we have been close to decisions time and time again. I am glad to know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is considering this, as is the Minister of Finance. He is perfectly right in saying that many representations have been made about this and I hope that fair play with respect to Winnipeg will come into effect.

On the subject of the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Regina East, may I indicate the argument that has been used by the Minister of Finance. When some of us asked that Winnipeg be helped with its $1 million deficit, since Montreal is being helped with its $125 million deficit, he said that the matters were not comparable, that in one case we were simply wiping out a debt while in the other case a request was being made for new money.

Let me try to put this in terms that I can understand. Supposing I were to lend $10 to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) and some time later he informed me that he could not repay it. Then I would say, "All right, Allan, forget it." But the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce hears this and says, "You gave my friend Allan $10, how about giving me $10?" But I reply, "Oh, no, I didn't give the Minister of Manpower and Immigration $10, I just wiped out a debt." In fact it is $10 to one and $10 to the other; it is just the same thing. This is the way Winnipeg feels about the situation. To be told that it cannot be assisted with its debt because this is new money whereas in the case of Montreal it is a matter of wiping out the debt, does not make any more sense than my simple illustration.

Mr. Speaker, this is one reason why I do not like clause 7(1) in this bill. It carries forward the idea that Montreal is not being given the money, it is just having a debt cancelled. It is on this basis of a bill being put through Parliament to help Montreal that Winnipeg is told it cannot receive the assistance it feels is due to my city.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the interjection just made by my charming friend the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the effect that a decision is about due means that it will be a favourable decision because I feel that the situation in both cities is on all fours and I think if we are going to help out with the huge deficit in the one case we should help out with the small deficit in the other case, both of them having been incurred with respect to great national events in our centennial year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Division

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Burton) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-6, to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

An hon. Member: Later.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the motion now be put, subject to debate later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pepin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being after five o'clock it is my duty to bring to the attention of the House the matters to be discussed at the time of adjournment. The questions are as follows: the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Information—retraining program—lack of knowledge by farmers; the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch)—Federal buildings—Vancouver—new project and "Project 200"; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Penitentiaries—Dorchester—extension of work of Jaycees with parolees.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard).]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, Notices of Motions and Public Bills.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand that because of the limited time available today for private members' business, and the desire of the hon. member in whose name the motion appears, we might now call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.40 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION

MEASURE WINDING UP EXPO

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-6, to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, during second reading of this bill, during the meetings of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee which considered the bill, and to some extent this afternoon at the report stage several speakers laid a great deal of emphasis upon the great success of the exhibition and the indirect benefits which it brought to Canada. There is no argument in this regard. I think everyone recognizes that the exhibition was a tremendous success and that it brought many indirect benefits to Canada in the way of advertising throughout the world, the possibility of increased tax returns and other benefits along that line. However, the reason for a good many of the questions raised in connection with this measure, both here and in the committee which considered it—and this is really the point which we have to consider—is that all these benefits and all this success could and should have been secured at a great deal less cost than was actually the case. We are now considering whether the exhibition was carried on in an efficient and effective way and at a reasonable cost.

The more one considers the evidence in regard to the matter, the more definitely one comes to the conclusion that the cost was excessive. The 1968 report of the Auditor General which was before the committee, and other evidence before it showed without any doubt that there was a great deal of loose administration. Many inefficient procedures were allowed to continue in operation, and there was carelessness over the letting of contracts for the construction of capital works. All this resulted in a very large waste of public funds. This resulted in a terrific escalation of costs, as was pointed out at second reading by myself and by others. As was pointed out in the committee, and again here this afternoon, by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the cost escalated so far as the federal government was concerned from what was supposed to be, to begin with, about $20 million to a final cost in excess of $144 million.

I submit that a good deal of this increased cost was due to the fact that no real control was exercised by the various ministers responsible at different times for the conduct of the exhibition, by Treasury Board or by the cabinet as a whole. Therefore, the responsibility for the great increase in cost and the amount of waste that took place rests squarely on the shoulders of the government. When we were considering this bill on second reading, the minister, in directing his remarks to me, said the following: as recorded at page 557 of Hansard of November 5.

—I know how fair he is and I do not think he would respect me if I were not to say that these points were raised—

The points he refers to are the numerous criticisms that I had brought out and read from the Auditor General's report of 1968 in connection with the administration of this exhibition. He went on to say:

—and answered before. I will appear before the committee soon and will explain, with the help of my officials, all these matters.

In fact, these questions had never previously been answered and they were not answered satisfactorily at the committee by the minister and his officials. I might give further proof in that regard. The committee's Minutes of Proceedings No. 5, at pages 5-9, contain evidence in that regard. Mr. Henderson, the Auditor General, was before the committee and I asked him the following question:

I will put my next question. It was stated that the various criticisms or observations that you made, some of the main ones you have just outlined, had all been satisfactorily answered to you people as auditors. Would you have any comment in regard to that statement?

Mr. Henderson answered as follows:

My answer to that statement, Mr. Harkness, would be quite a simple one: if they had been satisfactorily answered we would not have placed the qualifications in our certification on the accounts.

When referring to the criticisms he brought out his report to the House of Commons. The following exchange then took place:

Mr. Harkness: I think the statement or the implication at least was that they had subsequently been satisfactorily answered.

Mr. Henderson: That is not so, sir.

Mr. Harkness: You have had no subsequent answers from the corporation to these various observations of a satisfactory nature?

Mr. Henderson: Not to my knowledge, sir.

I do not think anything could be more definite than that. However, in addition to that it was disclosed in evidence that the Auditor General had written a letter to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) containing the observations and criticisms which subsequently appeared in his 1968 report, a report which has been quoted extensively when the House has been considering this bill. I questioned the Auditor General in connection with this matter and he said he had written the minister but had received no answer from him; he had received no request to see the minister, although he indicated that was the purpose of his letter. In other words, the letter was completely disregarded.

When the minister appeared before the committee I questioned him about this matter. I quote from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 7, page 7-13, as follows:

Mr. Harkness: As the Auditor General said, the whole purpose of his meeting with the board and his attempt to meet with you was to get explanations of this, if possible, so that he could change it and not put it in this form.

Mr. Pepin: All right; I agree with that; and I have already apologized for not having acknowledged or answered his letter. But I am trying to explain what actually took place.

The minister went on with many explanations, but I do not think anybody on the committee thought they were really satisfactory. I subsequently observed that I hoped this sort of treatment of the Auditor General would not be repeated. As a matter of fact, as recorded at page 7-14, having listened to the minister's apologies and unsatisfactory explanations for his total disregard of the Auditor General's criticisms, I said:

> As the Auditor General really represents the House of Commons in going over these accounts, and things of this sort, I think he is at least due the courtesy of an answer and, in fact, an interview relative to representations he makes to the responsible minister in any case. It is the sort of situation that I would hope would not be repeated.

I can only reiterate that statement here. I hope that in future this minister and others will not treat the Auditor General in the cavalier fashion that has been revealed in this case, and that I am afraid has occurred in too many other cases involving other departments.

One of the things which amazed me at the hearings before the standing committee was that it was impossible to establish the total cost to the Canadian taxpayer of this exposition. For quite a long time several of us on the committee tried to get the definite figure of the cost, but without success. As far as could be determined, the Canadian government put out in cash $142.9 million, and there is a further $1.1 million in lost interest because of the postponement provision in this bill with respect to Quebec holding back some $5½ million for over two years, all of which would make a total of over $144 million. Further, we could get no figure whatsoever to cover the assets which remained in right of the Crown through the federal government; neither could we get any information as to the costs of other departments in connection with Expo, although these costs were quite considerable.

In summing up, Mr. Speaker, I say that this represents an extremely unsatisfactory situation. It is not the sort of thing which should happen in connection with the expenditure of government money and accounting for it to the taxpayers. However, I recognize that the money has been spent. Now that the careless way in which it was spent has been brought out there is no point in continuing to go over the details of the mistakes that were made and the inefficiencies which were disclosed. I end by hoping that making this situation public will at least have the effect of serving as a warning to other government departments and agencies, and that considerably more care will be shown in the future in the administration of public funds.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one or two observations before this bill is given final passage. Much was said this afternoon, and during second reading, about the great success of Expo. I do not intend to dwell on that. Much has also been said about the cost to the Canadian taxpayer. I do not propose to belabour that point, but I do want to say a few words on the lessons to be learned from the experience gained in connection with Expo.

One of the first lessons to be learned is that the House should take more notice of recommendations laid before it by the Public Accounts Committee. In the normal course of events, the Auditor General makes certain observations in his report to the House; then the Committee on Public Accounts deals with them and makes recommendations to the House. In its seventh report for 1966-67 that committee recommended as follows:

> The committee recommended that amendments to the existing legislation be placed before Parliament and the Legislature of the province of Quebec so that the additional grants required can be made by the parties concerned, namely Canada, Quebec and the city of Montreal.

In effect, the committee recommended that the legislation be changed so that this money would not appear in the form of loans but as grants. If the suggestion had been adopted the money would have been passed by this House in the form of grants; it would then have appeared each year in the Public Accounts of Canada and we would not have had to meet the great amount coming all in one lump as is the case with this bill, asking Parliament to write off $122.9 million.

Another good reason for the committee making that recommendation was that there was no use giving money to the corporation and calling it a loan, knowing full well the corporation would never have the ability to repay it. In such a case the money may as well be given in the form of a grant. It would also have saved the corporation a certain amount of interest. I quote further from the seventh report of the Public Accounts Committee for 1966-67:

> The committee again expressed the opinion that expenditures of this type are not loans or advances which can or should be regarded as revenue-producing assets but are in fact grants and should be charged directly to budgetary expenditure in the Public Accounts of Canada.

No action was taken, so we find ourselves in this position today. If we have a piece of very valuable Dresden china which has fallen down and broken into a million pieces, the question we must ask ourselves is: Are we going to attempt to pick up the pieces, or sweep them under the rug? We cannot sweep them under the rug. We have to bring this to the attention of all concerned, particularly the taxpayer, the individual who has to pay the shot.

As a matter of fact, this show cost Canadians about $142.9 million. When you subtract the $20 million grant that the federal government gave, it leaves $122.9 million as the cost. However, taking the full amount of about $142 million it represents approximately $6.50 for every man, woman and child in Canada. A married man with three children will pay $32.50 as his family's share for Expo, and he will want to know why.

An hon. Member: It is his share of the gravy train.

Mr. Hales: Many explanations have been given in this House as to why he is being charged $32.50, most of it due to great extravagance, waste and carelessness. This is the way in which the money voted by this House and entrusted to the corporation was spent. Had we known at the time what we have since learned from the witnesses in committee, I am pretty sure this money would never have been granted.

The joint auditors made six reports during Expo. The first one had some qualifications, and the last thing an auditor likes to do is make any qualification when auditing a statement. However, they qualified it by informing us of the default on notes to the order of $183,900,000. The second qualification was this: "We were unable to check revenues to the order of $101,438,000." Then the third qualification: "We had to report that the banking arrangements, in our joint view, were not in order."

When questioning witnesses in committee about this latter qualification we were told that a legal opinion had assured them that the bill was poorly drafted and left the way open to them to go ahead and do what they liked in regard to banking. The committee report No. 5 continues:

> Fourthly, as to the over-all plan, the deficit was restricted to $210,665,000 by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and the accounts we were certifying showed a deficit of $273,589,000. Our fifth qualification was that the city of Montreal had not confirmed the correctness of its share of the deficit.

If this had been known to members on all sides of this House I think a great deal more attention would have been paid to the direction in which Expo '67 was drifting, so far as the financial operations were concerned. The joint auditors stated in the committee:

> On May 19, 1967, our attention was drawn to serious breakdowns that had occurred in the handling of cash receipts and revenues. Two months later—

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, two months later!

> —the corporation itself established, or had established for it, the following points:

Can you imagine any man in business knowing that the tills at the check-out desks of his supermarket were not accounting for all the money? Do you think he would wait two months before looking into the matter to see what was going on? The corporation waited two months and then were told the following by consultants:

> 1. that ineffectual control was in fact being exercised over the delivery and returns of floats to and from the clearing houses on site;

A "float" is the apparatus that took the money from where it was collected to where it was accounted for and deposited.

> 2. that there were no integrated accounting records to ensure that cash passing from one operation arrived at the next;

Some of it might have been lost, in transit according to this.

> 3. that revenue distribution reports were inaccurate to the point that they were misleading;
> 4. that independent checks were either nonexistent or ineffective;
> 5. that ticket control records were not tied in with the cash or float preparation records; and
> 6. that procedures differed from shift to shift and procedural changes were not communicated to all concerned.

These points were communicated to the corporation two months after the joint auditors first told them that things were not right. Some of them were corrected but the auditors state: "In fact, we refrained from making any spot checks at that time." If anything, I would accuse the auditors of failing to make spot checks. I think they should have; there was no reason why they should have waited before making them. The report continues:

> We deferred it until later. It took remedial action, but this did not correct all of the major weaknesses. I will list the ones it did not correct and which we found in the course of our work.

Closing Expo 1967 Corporation

1. The records for the first part of the exhibition were never reconstructed;

2. procedures for the handling and destruction of surrendered tickets and passports were unsatisfactory;

3. no detailed audit work on site cash receipts was performed;

Imagine—no detailed audit work on site cash receipts was performed!

4. prompt clearing of differences disclosed in bank reconciliations were not effective; and

5. failure to instal a power line which would have eliminated parking lot power failures that affected control of a number of vehicle entrances by means of total counts.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what lessons are to be learned? This is the subject I commenced with. After reading the report it is obvious that this information should have been before the House long ago. If it was impossible to bring it before the House, the responsibility falls on the minister in charge who with his officials and the corporation was entrusted to see that things were done in a businesslike way.

I know it will be said that the House passed the estimates, but at that stage the House is often pushed for time and cannot get all the details. The estimates for 1968 simply say, "1967 World Exposition" and give six headings, no details, and cover $6,750,800. There are no particulars, and if we had known then what we know now I am sure we would have held up the estimates. This raises another question. Estimates are now referred to a committee of 20 people, which means that only those 20 members have the opportunity to dig into the particulars. There are in this House many people who would like to ask questions. Some wonder whether we are doing the right thing by sending estimates to a committee for study. I know there are points in favour of doing so. but in this instance many members of the House would have been interested in the expenditure of Expo moneys and there would not have been the same opportunity to sweep the matter under the rug.

Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of lessons to be learned here. I have not mentioned them all. More attention must be paid to the recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee. The suggestions and recommendations of the joint auditors of the corporation should have been dealt with more sincerely and with greater respect. This whole expenditure was an exhibition of slipshoddiness and—I will use the word used in the committee—the auditors said it was a sloppy operation.

I am convinced it was a sloppy operation. I know the corporation officials were pressed for time in trying to get everything ready, but they were warned long before the show opened that there might be difficulty in the handling and collecting of gate receipts. I know in some ways they could not be flexible; but anyone who runs a business ought to be ready to meet these conditions when they arise. Surely they did not have to wait for two months to obtain a report from a firm of consultants and find out what to do. I will not repeat what I have already said, so I conclude my remarks. I hope Parliament has learned its lesson from what has happened and that the people involved in the Corporation have also learned their lesson. If any official of the corporation is asked in future by Parliament to spend the taxpayers' money, I hope he will treat it as if it were his own and will not wait two months before finding out where the mistakes were made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF—EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. H. E. Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-140, to amend the Customs Tariff and to make a consequential amendment to the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the House will expect me to give some explanation of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray: This bill is based on the notice of ways and means motion which I tabled in the House on October 24. As I said at that time, the notice was substantially the same as Bill C-212 which was given first reading on June 27 in the previous session of Parliament. The main purposes of Bill C-140, therefore, are to implement the proposals in the June 3 budget statement in so far as they deal with the Customs Tariff and related matters. Of course, it is my intention at this stage to comment only briefly on the various parts of the bill. I will of course be pleased to expand on these remarks if hon. members so wish when the bill is being considered clause by clause.

The first two clauses of the bill deal with the formalities required for the obtaining of authority from Parliament for the continuing in force of Orders in Council which may be made pursuant to sections 4 and 7 of the Customs Tariff, and the proposed amendments are largely for the purpose of clarifying the parliamentary procedures required.

Paragraphs B, D and F of subsection 1 of section 4 of the Customs Tariff provide the Governor in Council with authority to withdraw by Order in Council the benefits of the British preferential tariff, rates more favourable than this tariff, or the Most Favoured Nation tariff from any country. Subsection 1(a) of section 7 authorized the Governor in Council, on the report of the Minister of Finance, to impose a surtax on imported goods that cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers of goods that are like or directly competitive with the imported goods. This section came into force on January 1, 1969, in conjunction with the enactment of the new anti-dumping law.

Under the present wording of section 4, an Order in Council made pursuant to it would cease to have any force or effect on a day which is 180 days after its making unless approved by Parliament prior to such date. Under the present wording of section 7, an Order in Council made pursuant to it would cease to have any force or effect on a day which is 180 days after its making or if Parliament is not then in session on the 15th day after the commencement of the next ensuing session unless before that day such an order is approved by Parliament.

The proposed amendments would make clear that for Orders in Council made under sections 4 and 7, the approval by Parliament required for their continuation would be in the form of a resolution adopted by both Houses. Amendments would also provide that orders made under section 4 as well as those made under section 7 would cease to have any force or effect following the 180th day after their making, or if Parliament is not sitting on that day, by the 15th day next thereafter when Parliament is sitting unless before such day the order is approved by Parliament. Such approval is to be given by resolution, as I have just said. Finally, the amendments are to make clear, as I have indicated, that the 15th day in question is to be one when Parliament is actually sitting rather than simply one when it is only in session. These provisions are the only ones which are substantially different from those proposed in Bill C-212.

Moving on to the third clause of the proposed bill, the third and eleventh clauses should be looked at together. I will simply say about that, that they provide for technical changes arising out of the Anti-Dumping Act which came into effect on January 1 of this year.

Next we come to the provision which brings into effect as of June 4 the final rates which were negotiated in the Kennedy Round. Hon. members will recall that these changes were the subject of a careful study by the House finance committee during a previous session of Parliament and were given further study and approval by Parliament last year.

As the Minister of Finance noted in the budget speech, a number of Kennedy Round reductions had been completely implemented in one step in January, 1968, or January of 1969. Originally the remaining tariff changes were to be staged over four years. This meant that for these items two of the steps, that is to say two-fifths of the reductions, have been made as of January 1, 1969. It is now proposed that the final rates, almost all of which were to come into effect on January 1, 1972, should come into force instead as of June 4, 1969. These remaining reductions amount on the average to around three percentage points. While this acceleration has direct benefits for consumers, the main effects are on producers' costs.

As the Minister of Finance said in his June 3 budget statement, this acceleration of the Kennedy Round reductions is being made as part of the government's anti-inflation program. It is a measure which could be directed in a more selective way to deal with particular problems, as the minister said. I quote his words:

> —one of these is the need to increase the element of price competition and efficiency in the domestic economy.

He went on to say:

> In considering this situation, we have concluded that a particularly useful and effective way of intensifying competition would be to put into effect immediately the remaining tariff reductions of the Kennedy Round.

"A most important consideration before the government", he said, "in making this proposal is that the burden of adjustment and the pressure of increased competition will fall mainly on producers in the industrial centre of Canada. It is here that inflationary pressures are greatest."

There may be some hon. members who are wondering whether some producers have been given sufficient time to adjust to the increased competition created by this acceleration of tariff changes. I have been informed, however, that there have been only a relatively few complaints to the Department of Finance since the announcement of the acceleration of the Kennedy Round cuts in the June 3 budget statement. I have also been informed that since this announcement the General Adjustment Assistance Board has received only a few general inquiries, I think about five in number, as to what help will be available from it to assist in any adjustment that might be required as a result of the acceleration in cases where it was found that there was serious injury or threat of injury.

Next we come to the provisions for implementing three reports which have been made by the Tariff Board. These should be looked at in conjunction with Schedules A, B and C to the bill. These reports were tabled in the House of Commons on the dates shown in the explanatory notes to the bill which all hon. members have. Briefly, clause 5 and schedule A deal with the recommendations of the Tariff Board for a new schedule of tariff items for machinery, apparatus and printing plates for the printing and allied industries. Clause 6 and schedule B cover tariff recommendations with respect to precision instruments and apparatus used in such activities as engineering, surveying, prospecting, drafting and metalwork.

The next part and schedule C flow from a Tariff Board report which dealt with the concept of duty free entry of certain goods for religious, educational, scientific, literary or artistic purposes, institutions or groups, or for the benefit of afflicted or handicapped persons. The next clause of the bill contains the usual mixed group of tariff changes similar in type to those which appear in every budget. They are set out in schedule D to the bill. These changes normally arise out of studies of representations received by the department and involve amendments to existing tariff items or the introduction of new items.

I should now like to say something about the amendments to the provisions in the Customs Tariff for goods brought in by Canadian residents returning from trips abroad. These are dealt with in clauses 9 and 10 and schedules E and F. It is proposed to replace two items in the tariff with four new items. One of the present items now provides for $25 exemption once every four months after an absence from Canada of not less than 48 hours. Under the second of the present items Canadian residents returning from points beyond the continental limits of North America after an absence of not less than 14 days may claim an additional exemption up to $75. If use is made of this latter exemption no further claim can be made under either tariff item for the next twelve months. That is the present situation.

The main purpose of two of the new items is to facilitate the clearance of returning Canadian residents by customs. These two new items came into effect on a provisional basis as of June 4, 1969, and appear in schedule E. The first tariff item in this schedule provides for a new combined rate of 25 per cent for duties and taxes on goods valued up to $100 which they cannot claim under an exemption other than duty free goods, alcohol and tobacco, brought in by Canadians after 48 hours absence. The second item provides for a new exemption after 48 hours absence for goods other than alcohol or tobacco valued up to $5.

Two more substantive changes appear in schedule F. First, there will be a $100 exemption each calendar year for Canadian residents returning from any country, including points in North America, after an absence of 12 days. Also effective January 1, 1970, the $25 exemption after an absence of 48 hours will be available on the quarterly basis and will be completely independent of the annual exemptions I have just mentioned. These two exemptions, however, may not be combined for the same trip abroad. In conclusion let me say that the final portions of the bill are consequential to the amendments I mentioned earlier and also set out the dates on which the tariff changes are to come into effect. I would therefore ask the House to give the bill its support at this second reading stage.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, the minister has outlined in detail the clauses of Bill C-140. He has pointed out certain technical changes. At the end of his comments he made remarks concerning the facilitating of Canadian citizens returning through customs to Canada from points abroad or from continental North America. This bill will be going to a committee of the whole House. I do not intend to deal with it at length because it will receive clause by clause attention at that time.

The principle behind clause 4 is that all the Kennedy Round reductions not in force as of June 4, 1969, are to be brought into force as of then. It seems in this regard that the minister is repeating the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). This provision is being adopted to combat inflation and its effect is to be borne by the producers. I am not against anything which may assist in our fight against inflation, nor do I object to anything that may assist the consumer. However, it is my feeling that the producers who have been singled out in this case accepted the Kennedy Round negotiations, which were studied by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. This is a unilateral effort with no reciprocation by anyone else; we are simply handling these benefits to other countries.

Let me suggest that years ago the government might well have listened to suggestions about inflation. Had it listened to the advice of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Economic Council back in 1965, which warned the Minister of Finance of that day about the state of the country's finances, it would not be in the state in which it now finds itself. The Minister of Finance of that day, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) would not listen to any advice and the government went ahead—and continues in this way today—with a spending spree.

Today this government supports a policy of austerity and suggests that everybody must save money. Why does the government not follow that policy at home? The construction of three new buildings was announced recently, particularly the new R.C.M.P. building in Toronto. I fail to see how the government is protecting our economy. Some jobs here and there are going down the drain, but an austerity program should have been commenced years ago.

We are now facing another step in combatting inflation. This measure is to be taken at the expense of the producers who finally accepted Kennedy Round reductions. They geared themselves to putting their operations into the position wherein they would be able to meet that measure, then suddenly they are faced with a complete loss of tariff protection in this respect. Certain industries still require protection from foreign competition. This government has taken an unfair advantage of corporations. We must remember that about 50 per cent of manufacturing in Canada is carried out in Ontario.

I would suggest that Ontario corporations deserve some consideration; they have, over the past number of years, paid their taxes. Of course, they are getting another setback in the white paper which we shall be discussing on Thursday and Friday—I do not wish to go into that subject at the moment—but they seem to be the whipping-boy. They had geared their whole operation to a gradual reduction which had been initiated and finally agreed upon according to the Kennedy Round, and now they are faced with this reduction in tariffs all at one time. As I said earlier, there are several clauses in this bill involving a surtax on certain goods, and so on, which the government will be allowed to impose. We shall be dealing with these in detail when we get to the committee stage. I would just say once again that the government should stop using small producers in Canada, particularly those in Ontario, as a whipping-boy.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like my first words to be those of congratulation to the new minister. I had the pleasure of working with him on the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee and I want to say that no one is more deserving of the honour which has been paid to him.

On the subject of this bill may I say that while almost everyone is in favour of free trade, just as almost everyone is in favour of motherhood and God, I do not believe we should delude ourselves into imagining that the results of the Kennedy Round are likely to do a lot of good for Canada. The cuts which were made were not very significant and in some cases the protection afforded is somewhat higher than it was before. A recent study by the Economic Council of Canada showed that the so-called tariff cuts did not go very far. The minister's statement that this is a way of fighting inflation has to be viewed in the light of the miniscule success achieved in bringing about significant tariff changes. I do not see that this can play any important role in fighting inflation.

In the second place, while we are moving in the direction of freer trade through agreements of the Kennedy type, non-tariff barriers are emerging all round the world and are seriously affecting industry in this country.

Up to the present there is little evidence that the government is directing firm efforts against these practices. Recently we witnessed the example of a country maintaining its currency at an inflated rate despite an obvious need to change it. We are aware, today, of the action taken by several countries to bonus their exports through low-cost financing, making it impossible for Canadian competitors to compete successfully. A serious situation is developing as a result in areas where low-cost financing is used to block out Canadian industry. I trust the government will look at some of these practices under the terms of the anti-dumping provisions. Unless it does so, all the talk about freeing trade will be meaningless as countries impose these other methods of restricting competition.

At this very moment the United States is talking about imposing new barriers against trade by providing a bonus for certain of their export industries and excluding certain imports altogether. This is not in keeping with the generous mood of President Kennedy when he initiated the talks which came to a conclusion not very long ago. In other countries we find examples of the outright prohibition of Canadian goods. Little songs and dances are invented to maintain the fiction that Canadians can enter these markets, whereas in fact they are effectively kept out. Hon. members may have heard about the experiences of cable manufacturers in Canada who have been making bids to sell in the Japanese market without the least success. My purpose in mentioning this experience is to show that one cannot consider these tariff cuts out of context, that is, without at the same time taking into account the other barriers which have been erected around the world for the restriction of trade.

Too often, it seems to me, we as Canadians are so concerned about being good world citizens that we do not take sufficient effective action when such barriers are raised. If we intend to plan our future on the lines of freer trade we shall have to do a great deal more, otherwise we shall fail to play our role in international world trade. Today much of our trade is not really international; it is continental, with 70 per cent of our exports going to the United States. At the same time, the overwhelming amount of industry in this country is dominated by United States-based international corporations which are not really interested in exporting; their essential interest lies in serving the domestic market.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

As a result, we are developing what is probably the most inefficient production pattern of any western nation. If we are to go all the way with free trade while neglecting to do something about this inefficient pattern of production, freer trade, instead of proving a great salvation may well be the beginning of the end for us.

To succeed in international trade we must take immediate steps to ensure that Canadian industry becomes more competitive. I am getting a little tired of listening to big business tycoons in this country declaring at their annual meetings that we are pricing ourselves out of international markets while laying the blame, as they usually do, at the doorstep of labour. They claim that labour costs are too high. A close examination of the facts would show that nothing could be further from the truth. The real reason industry in this country is not as competitive in international markets as it should be can be simply stated: it is badly organized. I could give any number of examples of over-investment, of unnecessarily duplicated facilities, of failure to provide guidelines which the industry itself would have accepted.

At a recent meeting with a number of industrialists I was told that a particular firm had decided to build a plant. They were completely oblivious of the fact that another firm was making exactly the same plans. There just is not room enough in Canada for two plants of this size. The result will be that neither plant will operate at a level of efficiency. Both will have wasted much of their investment; they will not be profitable, and no advantage will accrue to government by way of taxes.

A very good example of over-capitalization and lack of planning is the potash industry in the province of Alberta. I understand there are something like nine mines in Alberta, all of them unable to operate efficiently since the world market is not big enough. These mines are going through a readjustment period. The Premier of the province rushed down to the United States to head off a dumping inquiry, though he was not very effective. Now there is talk of pro-rating production, having the mines produce only a small amount of potash so that all of them can stay in business.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that such policies are devastating to this country. They waste our resources and talents and are causing us to import fantastic amounts of capital that we do not need. If we do not solve this problem of industrial efficiency, the cry will go up that the only answer is continental integration with the United States. It will be said that the oil industry, the potash industry, the pulp and paper industry and the chemical industry will have to be tied together with those in the United States so that we achieve a similar arrangement to the Canada-United States auto agreement.

There are a number of things wrong with proposals of this kind. First of all, integration of industry in this fashion makes it impossible for Canada to pursue a life of its own in that it represents a serious infringement upon the sovereignty of the nation. You cannot mate an elephant with a rabbit. In addition, the United States no longer wants this kind of marriage. The United States feels we have gained too much benefit from the auto pact, despite the fact that we are still producing fewer automobiles in Canada than we buy. In other words, we are still not getting what should be our real share of the North American automobile market. Nevertheless, there are cries of anguish from the United States that we have been given too much.

The United States does not have to worry about its sovereignty or about its culture being dominated by Canada. They see only the minor economic advantages that accrued to Canada as a result of the auto agreement. On the other hand, we have to look beyond small economic advantages to the future of this country as a nation. I suggest that if we have many more pacts similar to the automobile agreement with the United States, this nation will not have a future. Already there is evidence that the real planning and decision-making process in this industry is no longer taking place in Canada. It never really did take place in Canada, but to the limited extent that there was some autonomy in this country, even that has largely gone. Decisions are being made south of the border. The design engineering and planning is done south of the border. We in Canada are the humble assemblers, the willing workers; we are a sort of annex to the main office.

When things get a little tight, if a choice is to be made in the matter of development on this side of the border or on the other side, the choice will be quite obvious to head office: they will favour locations in the United States. We will continue to be at the mercy of this kind of arrangement until we develop as autonomous an industry as it is possible for us to have free of all integration schemes. Another aspect of this problem is, as I have said, that there will probably be no more of these arrangements. The United States is in fact saving us from ourselves. It is the United States that is now unwilling to enter into further co-operative agreements of this kind. This is rather fortunate, since our government shows little concern about the future sovereignty of this country.

If we are going to take our rightful place and create the kind of wealth necessary in a society like ours, one that wants to do great things for its people and for other nations as well, we must improve production efficiency. It is quite obvious that the Canadian entrepreneur has not been able to stand up to the United States way of doing business; he has not performed his function in our society. We will have to develop a new kind of entrepreneur.

I hope that the Canada Development Corporation—if this government ever creates it—will perform this kind of function. I also hope industry in this country will pay attention to schemes of specialization and rationalization. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is developing some programs along this line, but I also know that nobody is paying much attention to them. Should these matters not succeed in improving the productive capacity of this country, if we wish to remain a sovereign nation little choice will be left to us, but to take under public ownership many of our industries, if only to ensure that they will be efficiently organized and developed.

There will be other opportunities for debating the specifics of this bill. Although some of my comments have not been directly related to specific clauses in the legislation, I submit they are very pertinent when considering proposals regarding the freeing of trade. In conclusion, free trade in itself will not solve our problems. Unless we take steps to enlarge our productive capacities in industry, free trade could very well be our destruction.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say that if I were prepared to carry out the wishes of most people in western Canada I would at this time propose a motion to repeal or rescind the Customs Tariff which this bill seeks to amend. There is a strong feeling in western Canada at the present time that a free trade area should be formed among the three western provinces. We in the west are forced, as a result of the inaction of the government, to sell our products at world market prices, yet under the provisions of this act we must pay tariff charges on practically everything we purchase. We feel that the provisions of the Customs Tariff are discriminatory and harmful to the economy of western Canada.

As the minister said, the purpose of Bill C-140 is to amend the Customs Tariff. The explanatory note indicates that the purpose of the amendments is to clarify the parliamentary procedure relating to continuing in effect any orders that may be made by the Governor in Council pertaining to certain sections and subsections. Under clause 3 we are told the amendment is required for clarification purposes only and does not change the existing law. For a number of years we on this side of the House have asked for clarification or for a change in the Customs Tariff. This has not been forthcoming even in respect of our pleas concerning clauses 5, 6 and 7 dealing with the implementation of the Tariff Board report. As I have said, many of us hoped that because of former representations amendments would be introduced at this time to clarify the meaning of the term "all other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery" under item 40924-1, schedule A, referred to by the minister. At present this is ignored not only by the government but by departmental officials and the Tariff Board. In other words, the term has no meaning whatsoever to the groups I have mentioned.

Briefly, they contend that if any implement or machine can be used for any purpose other than agriculture, it ceases to be an agricultural implement or machine. I contend that such an interpretation was not the intent of Parliament when this item was first put in the schedule, nor is it the intent of Parliament at the present time. I intend to prove that contention in a few moments. Also, it is not the intent of the minister who is piloting the bill through the House.

However, since we have delegated our authority or have shirked our responsibilities, the bureaucrats have taken it upon themselves to interpret these items in the narrowest possible way and the result is that farmers are forced to pay the tariff on implements and machinery which it was intended should be brought into Canada duty free.

There has been over the years in Canada a general impression that farm machinery and farm implements enter this country free of duty. Such a conception is erroneous because public officials refuse to recognize any meaning in the term "agriculture implements or machinery". As I said previously, they contend that if any implement or machine can be used for any purpose other than agriculture, it ceases to be an agricultural implement or machine.

For many years western members have been endeavouring to have the ministers responsible for the Customs Tariff make the amendments necessary to give clarification to the term "all other agricultural implements and machinery". In July, 1963, the then minister of finance stated, as recorded at page 2798 of Hansard, that the Royal Commission on Taxation was sitting and that he would send the commission copies of Hansard so it would have the benefit of the suggestions put forward at that time. To date, to my knowledge, there has been no action to indicate that this was ever carried out.

Then again, as recorded at page 2812 of Hansard, the same minister stated he was prepared to consider the point very carefully. He apparently is still considering it. He is not in the House at the present time. In each subsequent year the same request for clarification has been made whenever the opportunity has arisen to discuss the Customs Tariff. On December 3, 1968, the then spokesman for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), while piloting a similar amendment to the Customs Tariff through the House said as recorded at page 3435 of Hansard:

> It is my understanding of the will of parliament, expressed in schedule A of the Customs Tariff Act, that implements and machinery for farm purposes come in duty free—

The person who made that statement is the minister who is today piloting this amendment through the House. With that statement, and all the pleas he realizes have been made on this particular topic in years gone by, he has not even today undertaken to amend the Customs Tariff in order to clarify something which he knows has been bothering western members for many years. I can say from experience, and I wish to inform those who are of the same opinion as the executive assistant to the minister, that such is not the case: the officials are not carrying out the will of Parliament.

If this is the intent and the will of Parliament, and if the officials are circumventing the intent by claiming lack of ability to interpret our meaning, what are we as representatives of the people to do about it? Nothing? A matter of great concern to many rural people today is the growing indifference among citizens to their government and the increasing disenchantment of the ordinary person with Parliament. I suggest this feeling may in large measure be due to Parliament's inability to supervise and control their servants, the bureaucracy whose members actually administer the legislation passed by Parliament.

We appear to have been unwilling or unable to make them responsive to the needs of the public. We seem to have reached a period of bureaucratic arrogance and stagnation. We as members of Parliament have delegated our authority and, as I said before, are shirking our responsibility. The attitude of entrenched public officials is in my view the principal cause of the loss of respect for Parliament and parliamentarians as well as the passive hostility of so many Canadians toward the machinery of the state.

We speak of the public service and public servants, but these phrases have lost their original meaning. Indeed, to speak of a public servant in all too many instances is only to provoke wry laughter. There has been a complete about-face in this country. The servant has become the master, and an unfeeling and often tyrannical master at that. The departmental octopus has fattened on a rich diet of power and responsibility delegated by us as members of Parliament. As it has grown, its tentacles have reached ever farther and wider to embrace almost every aspect of the ordinary citizen's life. This uninvited embrace is neither friendly nor helpful. In his zeal to protect an abstract thing, usually referred to as the "public interest", the modern Canadian government official has come to regard the taxpayers who employ him as a menace that must be combated and frustrated in every way possible. He has forgotten that it is the legitimate interests of millions of individual Canadians that constitute the public interest he professes to serve.

It is the interests of these millions of his fellow Canadians that the public servant is hired to safeguard and advance. Instead, today our public service appears to regard the people it was set up to serve as at least a nuisance to complicate departmental administration, and often as an opponent who must be bested. Departmental administration has become an end in itself, divorced from the original purpose and intent of its relevant legislation. This is a perversion of the basic tenet of democracy, that government exists for the benefit and convenience of the people. Ottawa's bureaucrats today act as though the reverse were true.

The reason I have broached this subject at this time, Mr. Speaker, is that there are few areas in which bureaucratic arrogance and oppression are more clearly demonstrable than in the area covered by Bill C-140, to amend the Customs Tariff. There are few areas in which it is easier to illustrate the general public service practice of ignoring the legislative intent of Parliament and, incredible as it may seem, of even dismissing the clear interpretative direction given by courts as authoritative as the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Last summer I had the occasion to act for one of my constituents in an appeal to the Tariff Board from an arbitrary ruling by the Deputy Minister of National Revenue. It was not my first experience of dealing with this body or with officials of the Department of National Revenue. I was not unduly surprised, therefore, when despite what I considered to be a very reasonable case, the appeal was disallowed. This unfortunate experience has the dubious merit of illustrating perfectly what I have been saying about Ottawa officialdom. My constituent, a Saskatchewan farmer, purchased two 16-inch irrigation pumps for his farm on the reasonable assumption that such pumps employed to irrigate agricultural land would be classed as agricultural machinery or agricultural implements. As such he expected that they would be allowed into the country duty free. Not so, said the Deputy Minister of National Revenue and other departmental officials down the line. They said that these pumps were just machinery and as such were liable to be taxed 15 per cent ad valorem.

Throughout my dealings with the department and the Tariff Board never once was there the slightest hint that these public servants were trying to give a generous interpretation which might help the taxpayer. On the contrary, it was as though we were guilty of some offence by appearing before them and we were trying somehow to swindle the government. Perhaps, more important, there was never a peep at any time that there was any other course open to this farmer by way of appeal other than to take his case to the Tariff Board. This is a point on which I will elaborate later. To get back to the Tariff Board, our contention was that the irrigation pump should be classified under schedule A. This is the item that takes in all other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery. No ordinary citizen has the money to hire a lawyer, import witnesses and come all the way from Saskatchewan to fight the Department of National Revenue before the Tariff Board on such an item as two farm pumps.

We had to be content with the written assurance from the firm that made the pumps that they were primarily used and designed for irrigation work, my constituent's assurance that he bought these pumps for work on his farm, and with citing the judgment of the Exchequer Court in a similar case stating that the broadest interpretation should be given to items falling under this schedule. On the other hand, the Crown was able to array against my constituent not only officials of the Department of Justice, expert in confounding appelants, but at least four favourable witnesses whose contribution was to say that the pump was not an agricultural implement, although they had no idea what an agricultural implement was. They blandly stated that a pump was not an agricultural implement whether it was a pump for the tractor on a farm or a pump for irrigation. This is ridiculous. I consider this to be an unjustified expenditure of money. This is what the weight of officialdom really means: all the cards are stacked against an appellant in such cases.

Most people just pay the tax and swallow their anger and resentment. The whole system of pitting the government against the citizen is an unequal struggle and is exactly what I am attacking tonight. Government officials and agencies such as the Tariff Board appear to regard every citizen as a rascal. Their method of listening to appeals from an arbitrary ruling by an individual bureaucrat is a reversal of the fundamental principle of British justice that guilt against the individual must be proven, not that he must prove his innocence.

Any Canadian who has faced a government tribunal such as the Tariff Board is immediately aware of the fact that he is regarded as being guilty of something. It becomes evident that the board, chaired by an ex-civil servant, is sympathetic to the bureaucratic cause. Other members of the board are aware of those responsible for their re-appointment. I will have more to say on that subject at a later date. In my opinion the Tariff Board is a waste of public funds. It is inflexible, costly and negative. It operates in the shadow of the officials of the Department of National Revenue. It gets troublesome people off the back of the department and provides handy precedents for the future use of officials in handing down their own unilateral rulings.

In my view it is this sort of thing that makes the state apparatus so burdensome to Canadians. The ordinary individual is helpless to cope with officialdom with all its facilities and know-how. Both the officials and their facilities are paid for by public funds, so that the taxpayer is being bedevilled by his own money. The concept of the public service, that government is a contest between the departmental official and the public, is a gross perversion of democracy. The "in group" of the public service disdains both Parliament and the courts. They seek guidance and find precedent only within themselves. In the appeal to the Tariff Board on the question of irrigation pumps, the board's attention was specifically drawn to the finding of the president of the Exchequer Court at Winnipeg on June 22, 1954, in which he held that the ambit of the terms "agricultural implement" and "agricultural machinery" is a very wide one and a decision on this question requires consideration of the use to which they are put.

Certainly the Tariff Board in this instance ignored both the president of the Exchequer Court and his recommendation for consideration of the use to which the pumps in question were to be put. I believe, too, that the board ignored and continues to ignore the intent of the members of Parliament who formulated the pertinent acts. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that such clauses as that included under schedule A are contained in legislation to make provision for cases which cannot otherwise be legislated for. They are to apply to any machines that may be designed between now and the next time this measure is amended.

In conclusion let me return for a moment to a matter I mentioned earlier, that is, other avenues of appeal and the relief open to taxpayers. I may be naive, but I believe that any good public servant who truly believes in serving the public will take every opportunity to point out to a beset citizen every possible avenue open to him to achieve relief from burdensome legislation. Why, then, is the relief provided under section 22 of the Financial Administration Act kept such a deep, dark secret from ordinary people who have neither the means nor the opportunity to know of its benefits? Is it a device reserved only for large corporations or millionaires with ready access to professional legal or tax experts' advice?

The Treasury Board, under the provisions of section 22, can remit any tax, fee or penalty if it is deemed to be in the public interest. One might well ask, again: What does the term "public interest" mean? All one needs to do in order to see the extent to which this privilege has been extended is to examine the pages at the back of the Public Accounts. Those for 1968 contain the names of hundreds of firms and individuals whose taxes, fees and penalties ran into the millions, all of them remitted on the simple say-so of the Governor in Council. I know of no official in the public service willing to disclose such means of possible relief. Such information is guarded by a misconception which holds that something called "the public interest" is thereby being protected. All I can say to that is that it is a warped concept of the public interest.

I would like to refer now to some of the items that have been remitted by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of Treasury Board. It is impossible in the time allotted to me to cover all of them, but as I stated, they are listed in the Public Accounts because of section 22(8) of the Financial Administration Act which makes it possible for every item over $1,000 to be listed so that the public can see it. Some of these remissions were under various headings. They may have no connection with the bill under consideration, but I suggest that a great many of them have. It is revealing to see the number of automobile companies, railways and so on that have had thousands of dollars of taxes, such as customs and excise tax, remitted.

Mr. Speaker, the pleas made on behalf of western farmers have in most cases been in respect of only a few hundred dollars, but the government will take no action to protect these farmers. It does give large corporations and millionaires protection on all sorts of things. Even remissions are granted on cars. There is one here listed as, "Remission of duty and sales tax on a 1966 Mercedes-Benz automobile not entitled to free entry under... the Customs Tariff because it was not owned abroad for the period specified..." Some $1,300 remission was granted on it. here are several items here for remissions with respect to other cars, because the people concerned knew how to get the remissions.

I would like to direct the attention of the House to another item which comes under the heading, "Remission of Taxes Imposed Under the Excise Tax Act in cases where, on the basis of expert opinion, it is considered that litigation would not be expedient." Some $620,000 are involved here. Some of the individual amounts are outstanding. There is one time, for one company alone, of $290,000.

The next item I would like to direct attention to comes under the heading, "Remission of customs duty and sales tax in respect of certain motor vehicles, and in respect of parts and accessories and parts thereof for such vehicles." Here there is a list of automotive manufacturers, and the largest amount is for Mack Trucks Manufacturing Co. of Canada Ltd., Montreal, $1,426,041. There is another heading, "Remissions of customs duties and excise taxes payable on articles imported in excess of a pro-rated amount assessed for each month such imported articles remain in Canada." The list goes on for page after page. Just to mention a few, there are Chrysler of Canada, General Motors of Canada, International Business Machines, Goodyear Tire, Pacific Western Air Lines, Playcraft Toys, Rolls-Royce of Canada, Scott Paper Limited, and Smith and Stone Limited.

Here is another one that is very interesting, and I would just like to read the heading:

> The following remissions were granted on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, and the Treasury Board under the Automotive Adjustment Assistance Program, the stated purpose of which is to help Canadian manufacturers of automotive parts and accessories improve their competitive position by encouraging modernization and efficiency in their industry—

That is the very reason that the farmer imported these pumps, to modernize his farming methods, to improve his production. But all the effort he has made, the money he has spent and the time which I as his representative spent on his case, have not been successful in achieving a favourable decision for him. Yet big companies are encouraged by the government to modernize their industry. The government recognizes this principle with respect to eastern industry but will not recognize it with respect to western agriculture. I ask the government, why not? The amount that has been remitted under this heading amounts to over $500,000.

Here is another part of a heading, "...customs duty on machinery and parts as described in the various remission orders and schedules thereto..." This does not give the names of the companies involved. It just says P.C. No. so-and-so of such-and-such a date, and the total amount is almost $2 million.

Earlier tonight we heard about the amount of money which the Canadian people had to put up for Expo. I am sure hon. members who spoke in that debate did not know that a great deal of customs taxes were remitted to certain people in regard to the exposition. It is all listed here. In fact, one of them is very funny; it reads, "Remission of sales tax to... two firms on United States aircraft for use to transport members of a Detroit club to attend 'Michigan Day' at the Canadian Universal and International Exhibition, Montreal, 1967." Here is another one, "Remission of customs duties and excise taxes on steam boilers and auxiliary machines and equipment installed in a fertilizer plant." We heard about that a few moments ago.

Here is another item, Mr. Speaker. It reads, "Remission of duty and excise taxes on a 1967 Ford station wagon not entitled to free entry under item 70321-1 of the Customs Tariff because it was not owned abroad for the period specified in the item." Some of these are very interesting. Here is one, "Volkswagen (Canada) Limited, Toronto, remissions of customs duty and excise taxes" etc., amounting to $101,000. There is another item for Volkswagen (Canada) Limited, Toronto, "Remission with respect to 10,918 Volkswagen automobiles imported during the period December 7, 1964, to July 28, 1965, of customs duty and the portion of sales tax attributable to the duty remitted, $2,187,532." Under the previous heading with respect to these items the total comes to $25 million. I can go on and on. Here is Air Canada, Montreal, another remission for Montreal of $1,800,000. Someone suggests that this is a just society with just taxes for some. We in western Canada will agree it is not just for the farmer in western Canada.

The last heading I quote is, "Other remissions were granted as follows." Then there are listed four judges, one of the Superior Court of Montreal, another of the Supreme Court of Quebec, and so on. These judges had the know-how. But over the years farmers have had to pay customs duty that they should not have had to pay, customs duty that the minister has said he is sure they should not have to pay. He inferred this in the statement he made on December 3 last year. He is under the impression, as are all other people in Canada, that agricultural implements and machinery enter Canada customs free. That is not the case, because the minister on a previous occasion, and ministers before him, refused to clarify the term used in the act. We western members have repeatedly asked for clarification of this term. We say, give the civil servants some idea what is meant by this term so that they cannot dispute it. Without that clarification the farmer will have to take the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, a procedure he can ill afford.

Lately there has been a great deal of discussion about the failure of the government and government departments to communicate with the public. Perhaps a good start could be made by informing Canadians of legitimate avenues of relief that exist for all. This one I have dug up may be one such avenue. I am not a lawyer; I am not a tax expert, and so I am not aware how many other avenues exist for the farmers I represent. As I say, I have been fighting this case for a number of years. I have taken it to the Tariff Board; now I am taking it to the minister. I shall advise my constituent to ask for a remission of that tax as other people have done. Why were we not told about this?

I dismiss the idea of an ombudsman mainly on the basis that I believe such an official would be largely powerless to assist in cases of real grievance. He would be like the Auditor General, totally ignored by the government. This matter was referred to by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) earlier this evening. But it may well be that we need something like the ombudsman concept, some body or bodies devoted to protecting ordinary Canadians from the tyranny of the faceless bureaucracy and able to impress on public servants the real meaning of public service. This might help to dispel the hostility toward politics and politicians, toward government departments and Parliament, which is a growing menace to our form of parliamentary, democratic government.

At this time when we are amending the act I would ask the minister to consider clarifying the term I have referred to, "All other agricultural implements and agriculture machinery," so as to give a clear interpretation of the intent of Parliament. On December 3, 1968, at page 3434 of Hansard, I suggested the item should read, "All equipment, apparatus machines and implements N.O.P. for agricultural use", N.O.P. meaning "not otherwise provided". We are not asking for much; in fact, we are not asking for as much as is now enjoyed by eastern industry. I would ask that the minister consider this suggestion in view of his statement of December last that he was under the impression that all agricultural implements and machinery are entering Canada duty free. I can assure him from personal experience that they are not.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I shall not impose myself upon the House for any great length of time, but some of the remarks of my colleague from Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) have prompted me to raise a point or two for clarification of the expression "all agricultural implements and machinery". I trust that I may be permitted to refer specifically to certain machines as an example of the frustration experienced by farmers in southwestern Ontario. I have no intention of pointing the finger at anyone, but I suggest there should be more flexibility and more imagination used by those who administer the regulations. I hope the example I use will clarify my meaning.

A number of years ago ammonium or nitrogen fertilizers were a new thing in the agricultural industry and anhydrous ammonia was one of the wonder fertilizers introduced. It did a tremendous job of improving the growth of corn, for which our part of the country is famous. This chemical is applied under pressure into the ground by an applicator—the uninitiated may call it a cultivator. The cultivator has three or five teeth. Mounted on this machine is a 250 or 500-gallon tank holding the anhydrous ammonia which is released underground by pressure. This was fine in the days of 50 or 60-horsepower tractors, but we have been encouraged to modernize in order to meet competition in the North American market and now have much more powerful tractors of 100 and 125-horsepower. In turn, to work efficiently these tractors need bigger machines with which to apply the anhydrous ammonia to the corn crop.

According to our regulations, Mr. Speaker, a tank on a three or five-tooth applicator supposedly comes into this country duty free. This means that we can compete with our American counterparts. But in order to become more efficient some people are using much larger applicators; instead of the three or five they are using seven, nine or even eleven-teeth applicators which in turn require a larger tank. You can go only so far with a mounted piece of equipment. These 1,000 gallon tanks cannot be mounted on the cultivator, so they are being pulled behind the outfit on a wagon. But in this case they do not come under the same regulation as the cultivator type. If I am wrong, I hope somebody will correct me.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. To my mind it is completely incongruous that machines doing the same job and differing only in size should be treated differently under our Customs Tariff. On their tour through southwestern Ontario the agricultural committee—and I see some of the members here tonight—saw what I am referring to. They know what I mean when I speak about the big outfits, and I hope some of them will back up my presentation in this very serious matter, this unfair competition which is facing the farmers of southwestern Ontario.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope that our administrators will stay abreast of current advances in technology and will treat the new, larger outfits the same as the old-fashioned ones. As my hon. friend from Swift Current-Maple Creek has pointed out, this is done in industry and it should also be done in agriculture in order to encourage the modernization of our farms.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few things about these changes. I really do not think they will do a great deal for the western part of Canada, the part which I represent. The Kennedy Round has not been one of the most fortunate things that ever happened to us and I expect it to run true to form in the matter we are now discussing. In 1969 the government stated that a very useful method of intensifying competition would be to put into effect immediately following the remaining tariff reductions of the Kennedy Round. I suppose the government believed this to be true, but as I watched the oil companies increase the price of fuel to the farmer by a cent a gallon I lost a lot of faith in the hope of competition changing the input costs to the farmer in western Canada. I suppose this would also be true of eastern Canada. I have lost a fair amount of faith as a result of this particular approach.

The previous speaker suggested some of the other members of the committee might bear out what he said about certain equipment being used for applying fertilizer. I think he was referring to the day when an Ontario farmer was describing his difficulties in the field of fertilizer application. I was informed, and I think my informants were reliable, that Ontario farmers were going to the United States and trucking fertilizer back in order to save themselves some money. You can go into western Canada, where I farm, and see the very close relationships that exist between the suppliers of various fertilizers. This leads you to the inescapable conclusion that at some place along the line, either tacitly or openly, some agreement or understanding has been reached on the price at which fertilizers of various classification will be offered to the farmer; there is agreement about the price he will pay for it. For that reason I cannot stand here and shout great hurrays because of some changes that are proposed.

We read of concessions being given to manufacturers in the east and of the adjustments they are supposed to make to the new, lower rates. All this may mean that there may be some adjustments. But when you look at the continuing increase in the cost of living and the continuing cost of inputs or business costs of farmers, wholesalers and retailers in the area where I live, I am afraid I must say —unless I am shown otherwise—that these adjustments are not filtering down to us; they are not getting through.

The other part of the Kennedy Round which has been little less than disastrous to western farmers is that having to do with grain negotiations. I include the negotiations with respect to cereals. This was the first time that cereals had been brought into the negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Some of us thought, rather naïvely, that this would make it easier for us to go to the market, that it would enlarge markets and we would be better off. But that did not happen; instead, our markets are contracting. We negotiated prices under the Kennedy Round, but those prices have not been followed. Canadian officials have gone to meetings in Europe and the United States to discuss prices and the agreement we made. They went there, in so many words, to plead with the people on the other side of the table to abide by an agreement to which nations had affixed their signature.

I recall a minister saying just a day or so ago that he was hopeful that the plateau in prices which has been reached would hold. What kind of agreement is the Kennedy Round? Why is it that we and other nations feel bound to adhere to one area of the negotiations but not to adhere to and maintain that part which concerns wheat prices? Why do other nations not feel bound to maintain the price for wheat that they agreed to under that agreement? I wonder why we, as Canadians, are putting so much faith in the Kennedy Round? I wonder why we think it will help us be more commercially effective than we have been up to now? We have attempted to stabilize the market for our products, but we have been less than successful. I suspect that tariffs and juggling with tariffs is not the answer to our problems. I think it is about time we looked at our situation, at least in so far as it affects the farming sector of Canada, and considered how we might improve it by bargaining face-to-face with some of the nations which are prepared to purchase our products and do business with us in a straightforward fashion. I believe we have pretty well come to that point, because the Kennedy Round simply has not accomplished the type of agreement, the type of good will and the type of understanding and expanded trade among nations which it was supposed to accomplish. I think we may as well face that fact and go on from there.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INFORMATION—RETRAINING PROGRAM—LACK OF KNOWLEDGE BY FARMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on November 6 I addressed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) about the Task Force on Government Information. I asked, as reported at page 591 of Hansard, the following question:

In view of the fact that the report of the task force on government information revealed that approximately 40 per cent of Canadian farmers were not aware of the government's retraining programs or even the location of manpower centres, is it the intention of the government to provide some emergency information to the farmers or must they wait for a white paper on this subject?

In the next few minutes I wish to outline why I was motivated to ask this question of the Minister. I think it is very important. Basically, I had two reasons for asking the question. First, it is obvious from the task force report that the farmers of western Canada are not aware of federal government programs that are available to them. It is said that only about 40 per cent of our farmers are aware of federal government programs. It is also said that a very large proportion of Canadian farmers are not aware of the location of manpower centres in their localities.

The second reason for my asking the question is the farm crisis we are today experiencing in western Canada. Because of this crisis there is today an accelerating shift of rural dwellers into the urban centres of our country. This is the most drastic shift we have seen since the 1930s, and it will get worse and worse.

If you look at the basic figures, Mr. Speaker, you will see that last year the average income per acre to farmers in western Canada was $8.09. Meanwhile, costs per acre have risen to $21.49. I emphasize that income per acre is $8 and outgo $21. Clearly, even the most efficient farmer cannot begin to make ends meet. This situation affects everybody in western Canada—the farmer, the teacher and the small businessman. Small businesses are closing. Farm machinery sales, for instance, have dropped by about 23 per cent. Housing starts are down by 21 per cent. This means disaster to the whole economy. As a matter of fact, about the only business that is making any profit or headway nowadays is the moving business in moving people into the cities and out of rural areas. That is why I pose my question. We find that when people from rural areas move into the cities many of them join the ranks of the urban poor and unemployed. This not only affects the unemployed person, but his family and the future of the family educationally as well as in many other ways.

Just the other day a presidential report in the United States dealt with the reasons for violence and the question of the prevention of violence. It suggested there was in the United States a very high relationship between poverty and violence. Another commission set up when Kennedy was the President suggested that one reason for the decaying of cities relates to poor people coming in from the countryside to join the ranks of the urban poor. We have to try to avoid this situation not only for the sake of the individual but for all society.

Why are the farmers not being informed about government programs? I think the first reason is that the government is not getting information to the farmer about the type of programs now available. First and foremost we should keep the farmers on the farms by making them aware of new techniques, planning, agricultural economies and methods. If a farmer has to leave the farm we should make him aware of the different training programs available to him as well as the different relocation programs. We should make him aware of the types of jobs and skills available to him with his qualifications. According to the task force, this is apparently not being done today. It could, of course, could be done through public relations efforts at each of the manpower centres. It could also be done by sending letters to all the farmers, together with leaflets and pamphlets This should be done in times of crisis such as the one we are now experiencing.

Besides this we could use the media of radio, television and newspapers in order to spell out what is available to these people with their qualifications. We must begin an emergency program and work in this direction, because 40 per cent of our farmers are not aware of the many programs which exist, and there is a farm crisis in the west.

Before resuming my seat let me refer to one or two precautionary measures. First of all, I am in favour of the family farm and reaffirm that we should help as much as possible those farmers who are in economic difficulty which will eventually lead them to seek other employment. Second and last, I should not like to see this report become an excuse for the government to issue propaganda through various agencies. This is being done by a number of provincial governments. The information that must be provided should be legitimate and should inform the farmer, other individuals and specific groups, of the government programs open and available to them. I am looking forward to the minister's reply in respect of the suggestions I have made.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has stressed the negative aspects of the report. On the positive side is the fact that two thirds of the farmers did know about the program although it had at that time been functioning only for two years. It can be inferred that all the information since made available to farmers will in the meantime have contributed to reducing the percentage of those not aware of the existence of these services.

It should also be taken into consideration that farmers are not as interested as other workers in this type of service. They are so to speak their own bosses and not looking for jobs as other people might be.

[English]

For example, a current advertising program in magazines and on radio covers all regions of the country, urban and rural. Canada Manpower centres throughout the country continually advertise in daily and weekly newspapers the availability and starting dates of adult retraining courses. In addition, 350 Canada Manpower centres dispense a wide variety of pamphlets and brochures dealing with adult retraining.

The Canada Agriculture Manpower Committee, composed of federal and provincial officials concerned with problems in the agricultural manpower area, met recently to consider experimental projects which could result in new initiatives in the training of agricultural workers. These pilot projects would focus on the training needs in this field and serve as the basis for the development of courses. This development could lead to intensified information efforts aimed at farm organizations and the general rural population.

PENITENTIARIES—DORCHESTER—EXTENSION OF WORK OF JAYCEES WITH PAROLEES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 17, I directed a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) having to do with the outstanding work which has been done for almost a year and a half by the Moncton Jaycees in response to an opportunity to work with the inmates of Dorchester penitentiary as well as with the inmates of the Westmount county jail.

In a day and age when we can be increasingly cynical about the activities of a number of service clubs and organizations, the work of this outstanding group is to be highly commended. The fact that at a recent banquet on November 15 this group received a congratulatory telegram from the chairman of the National Parole Board, Mr. Street, as well as from the Solicitor General, indicates the degree to which its activities have been recognized.

I raised the question in the House because I was concerned, first, that the work of these people should be encouraged and enlarged and, second, that the example of the group should not be lost sight of, so that we might see an increase in this kind of activity across the country. The local newspaper was moved to publish an editorial after the recent banquet of the Moncton Jaycee unit in which it said:

> Members of the Moncton Junior Chamber of Commerce have drawn high praise from Mr. T. George Street, Chairman of the National Parole Board, for their fine work in helping make possible a day parole release system for several inmates of the Maritime Penitentiary at Dorchester and the Westmorland County jail.

I can speak from personal experience about the work which has gone on in the penitentiary itself. It was my privilege in June of this year to spend an evening in Dorchester penitentiary. I suppose the advantage of spending an evening there is that one can leave at the end of the evening, unlike most of those who make their homes there.

The thing that amazed me was the calibre of the meeting which was conducted that evening. I have rarely attended a public meeting conducted on such a high level as the one which was held that evening behind the bars of Dorchester penitentiary. It is easy for a lot of people to believe that those who run afoul of the law and end up in a penitentiary are limited in outlook and that they are not interested in the wider questions facing our society. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have rarely been asked such searching questions on such varied issues as were placed before me that evening by the members of the Dorchester Jaycee unit. The way in which the meeting was conducted spoke volumes for the members of the Jaycee unit which is behind bars in that penitentiary as well as for the assistance given by the Moncton Jaycee unit.

While there is a very active Jaycee unit in the penitentiary, composed of some 50 members, it is unfortunate that outside in the farm annex no Jaycee unit has yet been put together. Encouragement has been given by the Moncton unit, but unfortunately one has not yet come into existence. Perhaps as a result of my encouragement and that of the minister, such a unit will be established there.

A more remarkable program was begun in May of this year, when members of the Jaycees unit began to provide transportation for day parolees from Dorchester to Moncton. Here we have volunteers, young businessmen from the Moncton community area, leaving their homes every morning at 6 o'clock or 6.30, driving the 20 or 30 miles to Dorchester, picking up an inmate and bringing him back to Moncton. The inmate goes to work for the day at Moncton, and then at the end of the day, around 6.30 or 7 p.m., he is driven back to the penitentiary. One man in particular single-handedly carried on chauffeuring for a month to six weeks. Since then others have joined him. They are driving up to 500 miles a week at their own expense, and the whole thing has been a considerable undertaking. A week ago Saturday I had the opportunity of spending part of the day with one inmate who was participating in this program. I had the pleasure of his company when I attended the banquet that evening, and I can tell the House that this kind of work is beyond the normal kind of rehabilitation that has been carried on in our penitentiaries.

These volunteers from the Moncton Jaycees are making a unique contribution to the rehabilitation of men who found no hope but who, through this kind of assistance, are now finding in many ways immense hope. To give just one example, of 30 members of the Jaycees unit since released, only five have returned. That may seem a large figure to some who are uninformed about penitentiaries; but for those who know that the recidivism rate in Canada is around 75 to 80 per cent, the figure of 25 men who are "making it" out on the street, so to speak, is an astronomical one.

May I congratulate the minister and his officials for the work they have done to assist the Jaycees unit, and I hope that their good work will not stop there. We know that this kind of social education is a must, and that there must be some basic citizen interest if we are to further the work of rehabilitation. For too long have our penitentiaries operated on the basis of punishment and revenge, offering very little in the way of long-term protection to society and in terms of rehabilitation.

The Dorchester Jaycees, a reflection of the Moncton Jaycees unit, have shown the way through the group operating in the penitentiary and the day parole program. They have made plans for the future acquisition of a halfway house, with which I hope this government will assist, as well as for eventually providing transportation for prisoners with the object of integrating them into the community of Moncton and beyond. I look forward to hearing the minister reply to this extended question.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this question. May I also thank him both for the remarks that he made about the work of the Jaycees in Moncton and for the remarks he made about the correctional services and their part of the program. The object and the task of the whole correctional services system in this country must be the effective restoration of the inmate, the person with whom they are concerned, so that he can usefully participate in society as a normal citizen, playing his full part. You can express it in many ways, but that is what it comes to. To do this, it is quite clear that the best results are achieved when you have the full co-operation of the offender and of the correctional services personnel—that is, the penitentiary or the Parole Board, as the case may be—as well as of the local community. Tonight the hon. member has drawn attention to the importance and effectiveness of the part played by the local community.

This kind of program has been extended in various ways to different parts of the country. Fifteen or 20 different types of groups and societies have offered assistance. Bodies like the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society and similar better known societies, as well as many other church groups and local service groups, have got together to this end.

Some groups have got together, without having any other background of organization, and in an effective and co-ordinated way have the full guidance and proven co-operation of the institutions, correctional service or parole board as the case may be. We have gone much further in utilizing this service and are trying to encourage it by every means possible. It becomes important not only in the way spoken of tonight but also in those areas where we have pre-release centres in the cities. The inmates prior to release are placed in these centres; then they are sent out to look for work, or perhaps begin work if jobs have been obtained. This takes place before their sentences have expired or when they are out on parole. Sometimes they attend universities and schools. We have done this with what promises to be considerable success in some cases with very young offenders—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON DELIVERY OF RELIEF SUPPLIES TO BIAFRA

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days several questions have been asked of me in the House of Commons with respect to steps taken by the government of Canada to assist in the shipment of relief supplies to the civilian populations of the secessionist areas of Nigeria. Because it is desirable to set forth in a single statement the several aspects of Canadian efforts in this regard, the following brief chronological record has been prepared:

1. In October 1968, Canadian Forces Hercules aircraft were despatched to the Nigerian area for use in carrying relief cargoes to Biafra. One of those aircraft joined the night airlift, the hazards and inefficiences of which were then and have always been recognized.

2. In late October 1968, my personal representative, Professor Ivan Head, journeyed to Lagos for discussions with the Nigerian head of state, General Gowan, about the possibilities of additional relief shipments. It was as a result of that Canadian initiative that the Nigerians agreed to permit daylight relief flights subject to only a single condition, an undertaking by Colonel Ojukwu that he would not take advantage of the situation and fly in arms during daylight hours.

[English]

3. The proposal for daylight flights on these terms was transmitted through the International Committee of the Red Cross and other channels to Colonel Ojukwu. When in November no reply had been received from Colonel Ojukwu, and the Nigerian government announced that it could no longer guarantee the safety of aircraft flying into Biafra at night, the Canadian government withdrew its aircraft. Canada stated at that time that it would consider replacing the aircraft once appropriate daylight delivery arrangements were concluded.

4. Not until June, 1969, some eight months following the announcement of the daylight relief flight proposal, did the Biafran authorities comment officially upon it. Not even then did Biafra accept the idea of daylight relief. It only said that, subject to five conditions, it would be "willing to consider" daylight flights.

5. Since early 1969, and with the knowledge of the Nigerian government, contacts have been made and discussions about relief and other measures subsequently held by Canada with representatives of the Biafran regime. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has spoken with Biafran authorities in New York; various Canadian officials have met with Biafran representatives in London, Ottawa, Geneva and New York, and are continuing to do so in one or more of these places whenever it appears appropriate to do so. It is in this light Mr. Speaker, that my statement of last week must be viewed when I said there had been contact at the ministerial level. This contact was made at New York; of course there have been other contacts at the official level in the various capitals, as I have just said.

6. In an effort to overcome the delivery difficulties the Canadian government has consulted continuously with a number of other donor governments which make up what is known as the Hague Group. It has consulted as well with the United States government. That government, early this year, took the recognized lead in Nigerian relief activities when President Nixon appointed Ambassador Clyde Ferguson as his official representative to co-ordinate humanitarian assistance to Nigeria.

7. In June of this year I sent my representative back to Nigeria to ensure that General Gowon's single condition for daylight flights remained unchanged. Professor Head then journeyed to Tanzania on my behalf to speak to President Nyerere, the leader of an African country which had recognized the independence of Biafra, about all aspects of the Nigerian situation.

Minister's Statement on Biafran Relief

8. On July 10, in an attempt to meet Biafran contentions that daylight flights would prejudice its military position, the Secretary of State for External Affairs offered to send Canadians to the area to act as inspectors of relief cargos.

9. In the early summer the International Committee of the Red Cross began negotiations in Geneva in an attempt to solve the flight impasse which by then had reached a critical point as the Nigerian Air Force increased its efforts to prevent night flights of arms from reaching Uli. After one of its aircraft was shot down, the ICRC halted its night flights.

10. A Red Cross proposal for daylight flights—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, this whole business of daylight flights was begun as a result of Canadian initiative—the whole idea was brought up as result of Canadian initiative which followed upon our obtaining from General Gowon his consent to such flights.

Mr. Bell: Wonderful fellows!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Apparently the opposition does not believe in daylight flights.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes.

Mr. Bell: We do not believe you.

Mr. Woolliams: You are reading it very well. A little on the quiet side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We do not believe in alibis for inhumanity.

An hon. Member: Smile on.

Mr. Trudeau: Still thinking of those Christians over there, Mr. Diefenbaker?

An hon. Member: You do not even know anything about Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: May I take the liberty of reminding the right hon. Prime Minister that members are to be referred to by constituency and not by name.

An hon. Member: He doesn't know.

Mr. Trudeau: 10. A Red Cross proposal for daylight flights was given to both Nigerian and Biafran representatives in Geneva on August 1. Biafra accepted the proposal in principle on August 14 but made its acceptance subject to the condition that it would continue to use Uli airport for its own operations. The Biafrans offered no evidence that they were prepared to meet the single Nigerian request that arms not be flown in during daylight hours. The paper setting out "technical modalities" of daylight flights, drawn up by Professor Freymond of the ICRC and Dr. Cookey of Biafra, and circulated by the Biafran authorities, must be read in light of this Biafran condition.

11. In late summer the ICRC sent a team of representatives to Nigeria in an attempt to conclude a daylight relief agreement with both sides, no agreement having been reached with either side up to this point. On September 13 the federal Nigerian government and the ICRC reached an agreement for an internationally-inspected and militarily-inviolable daylight relief airlift. The agreement included, at Nigerian insistence and reply to the Biafran condition for what amounted to daylight military use of Uli airport, a clause that the agreement should be without prejudice to military operations by the Nigerian government.

12. The Biafran regime refused to conclude an agreement with the Red Cross. Biafra, instead, demanded in a press statement dated September 15 "a third party guarantee which will ensure that daylight flights are not used to military advantage by Nigeria." The statement continued to say that "the only guarantee acceptable to Biafra is that of a third government or international organization of a political character."

13. The governments of Canada and the United States immediately attempted to provide assurances to meet this understandable Biafran fear of military disadvantage. Discussions toward this end took place in Ottawa and in Washington and involved officials of the Prime Minister's office and the Department of External Affairs and officials of the White House and the Department of State. Included in these discussions as one element of these assurances was a proposal for Canadian observers to travel on board relief aircraft.

14. Canadian officials subsequently met with Biafran representatives in Geneva. Ambassador Ferguson, who had been agreed upon as the person who should convey formally these offers, travelled to Africa. As set forth in the Washington statement, dated November 12, 1969, the Biafran authorities on October 24 formally rejected the offers which were designed to protect Biafra from military disadvantage, which is exactly what they had asked for.

15. Canadian officials in Geneva have been informed by Biafran representatives that Biafra demands more than military assurances; that, in addition, guarantees of a political nature are required in order to break the impasse. The Canadian government is not willing to give the political guarantees demanded as these would be tantamount to recognition of an independent state of Biafra, and an overt interference by Canada into the political affairs of another country, contrary to the resolutions of the Organization of African Unity.

16. During the past several weeks, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has continued his discussions about Nigeria with some 25 other foreign ministers, many of them from African nations, at the United Nations. I talked to Secretary General U Thant about the problem in New York on November 11 as I had a year earlier. Canadian leaders have pursued the Nigerian issue with the leaders of two African countries who have visited Ottawa this fall. They were President Hamani Diori of Niger and President Nyerere of Tanzania. I can say that the unanimous view of these African leaders is that the Organization of African Unity resolutions must be respected.

17. The government is now considering, as stated a few days ago, alternative means of delivering relief to Biafra in daylight. It does so while agreeing entirely with the recent statement of United States Secretary of State Rogers: "Daylight flights under agreed procedures...remain the only practicable scheme for an immediate and substantial expansion of relief operations."

18. The government's concern remains, Mr. Speaker, as it has throughout, and as does that of hon. members opposite and indeed all Canadians, with the innocent civilian victims of this tragic war. Delivering adequate food and relief supplies to these people must be our resolve, notwithstanding the disinclination of the Ojukwu regime to accept it, except in return for political advantage.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in finishing his statement the Prime Minister passed very harsh judgment on Colonel Ojukwu. We are not in a position in this House to assess the faults of those involved in this dreadful disaster. But we are in a position, as it is our duty to do, to pass judgment on the government of this country and the Prime Minister of this country for the way their responsibility in relation to this matter has been discharged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister has really given us nothing more than a catalogue of excuses for inaction.

An hon. Member: Shame!

• (2:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister and his government colleagues are trying to escape the indictment they deserve, because this issue has profoundly affected the Canadian people. A government that proclaims participatory democracy on the one hand cannot be indifferent when the people respond. The people have left no doubt about their anger over government inaction.

Let us be under no illusions, Mr. Speaker, about the purpose of the statement made today by the Prime Minister. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians watched a television show on Sunday night in which an important statement made by the Prime Minister in this House was shown to be misleading.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister was asked in the House whether there had been any recent requests to the government of Canada by Canairelief for relief assistance and aid. On November 17, as recorded at page 874 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak of any recent request. There may have been some; I do not know.

This is a subject of great importance, Mr. Speaker. If it has been recognized to be of great importance, why did the Prime Minister not make it clear to the House at the first opportunity that such a request had been received from Canairelief? Even during the course of his long statement today he did not disclose that such a request had been made by Canairelief.

We can all agree, Mr. Speaker, that the arrangement of daylight flights would be most desirable and satisfactory. The Prime Minister indicated that this idea originated with the government of Canada. I doubt that very much, but I do not rise to quarrel about that.

An hon. Member: You're all heart. Really big!

Mr. Stanfield: I ask the Prime Minister to tell the House some time the conditions of a political nature which the government of Biafra has attached to its recent position with regard to daylight flights. What are these conditions? Certainly for a long time the actions and activities of the government of Canada with regard to Biafra were dilatory and the government refused to talk to anyone associated with Biafra. Professor Head, the personal representative of the Prime Minister, has never done so to my knowledge, certainly not when he was over there. When Professor Ferguson was appointed by President Nixon he had discussions and tried to make the necessary arrangements with the Biafrans. Granted, Mr. Speaker, we want to see arrangements regarding daylight flights. The Prime Minister puts all the blame on Colonel Ojukwu, the head of the Biafran government.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: I doubt that it is quite as simple as that. I ask the Prime Minister why the government of Canada is not prepared to do what it can to help solve the problem. Why has the government refused to assist Canairelief which has been and continues to transport substantial relief to the starving people of Biafra? Why, Mr. Speaker? Two requests made to the government by Canairelief have been refused. I understand that the most recent request is still unanswered. Why?

The Prime Minister has accused Colonel Ojukwu of indifference toward daylight flights and the kind of relief that could be brought by daylight flights. I must charge the Prime Minister with stubborness regarding aid that could be used to bring relief through night flights.

For over 16 months the people of this country, the opposition parties and many private organizations outside this country have been trying to move the government to action. I shall not go over the whole history as the Prime Minister did in his statement; there is no need. We tried to get the government of Canada to protest the shipments of arms from the United Kingdom and other countries but the government refused. According to a recent announcement, shipments of arms from Britain are to increase. We tried to get the government to support the early efforts of the Nixon administration in the United States but the government refused. We went on trying to get them to contribute to the efforts of Canairelief. Again the government refused. Canairelief has received support from the United States government in the amount of some $750,000, without which it could not have carried on its lifesaving operations. Now it appears that the government of the United States is likely to withdraw its support of Canairelief because the Canadian government will not support its own citizens who are sending food and medicine to the war victims.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: The people of Canada are aroused as never before by what I call the callous stubbornness of the Prime Minister—I am not going to accuse him of indifference—in the face of one of the great human tragedies of our time. Shortly after the Nixon administration took office and began to take some initiative in this area we pleaded with the government of Canada to support those measures but the government refused until November 12 when a statement was made by the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Rogers, which appeared to suggest that the United States government was backing away from the problem. Then the government of Canada courageously rushed to Washington's side.

I understand that about 1,500,000 people have starved since early in 1968 and that perhaps 2,000 a day are dying of starvation at this moment. Let us do what we can. Let the Prime Minister and his colleagues act to assist Canairelief in taking supplies to that country by night; let them provide this assistance rather than come to the House with a long statement designed to whitewash the whole picture and excuse the government of Canada from discharging its humane responsibility.

The Prime Minister has passed a harsh judgment on Colonel Ojukwu; the people of Canada will pass a harsh judgment on the Prime Minister for his failure to act in an area in which Canada can be of assistance, night flights, and I plead with the right hon. gentleman to move as rapidly as he can to make this important and helpful assistance available.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have never listened to any statement made in this House by the present Prime Minister or by any other prime minister which caused me greater unhappiness or deeper regret than the statement we have just heard.

There is one thing in the statement which I am prepared to welcome: it is clear the right hon. gentleman is now aware of the great concern felt by the Canadian people about the immense human tragedy which has already cost between one million and two million lives and which threatens to exterminate a whole people. What I find so regrettable about the lengthy and evasive statement we have heard is that there was no mention, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, of the one thing, amid these different alternatives, which is staring the people of Canada in the face. The obvious place where our help should begin is in the operation which, despite danger and difficulties, is in fact being carried on by Joint Churchaid, to which Canairelief has given tremendous and heroic assistance.

Why is it that this channel of help is being neglected? It is suggested that Colonel Ojukwu should accept in their place daylight air relief flights. Is the Prime Minister aware—if he is, he has shown no sign of it—that the International Red Cross operation contemplates only the delivery of some 90 tons of supplies over a three week period under the control of the Nigerian army and air force authorities?

Canairelief is a voluntary organization. I should not say Canairelief because the organization also includes other voluntary bodies that have banded together in Churchaid, but the joint church operation is flying in 200 tons of supplies nightly. Is Colonel Ojukwu or anybody else being asked to accept a three weeks arrangement, tainted as it is, which would involve a much smaller amount of supplies? Is this going to help Colonel Ojukwu's own people? That is what the Prime Minister suggests. It is ridiculous to pretend that this operation cannot be assisted without causing some breach of protocol or improper intervention in the affairs of another nation. As a matter of international law the right of humane intervention has been recognized for centuries, and is still clearly attested to by recognized authorities in the field.

The most important factor of all has already been stated by the Leader of the Opposition, who pointed out that Canairelief operations have indirectly been supported to the tune of $800,000 by the United States government through payments to church agencies. The U.S. government can assist church agencies to do this job, and they are the only ones who are relieving starvation. Why cannot our government do the same thing? Earnest requests have been made by many Canadians to this effect.

There has been a long and elaborate discussion on the subject of daylight flights, and I noted certain significant omissions in the statement of the Prime Minister. He referred to a document that he did not admit was an agreement. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the only agreement was with Nigeria. I have in my hand what purports to be a copy of an agreement entered into by the Red Cross agency and the Biafran authorities on August 27, 1969, providing in detail for daylight flights. The statement, which is so loosely made, that Colonel Ojukwu has refused to allow daylight flights is not in accordance with the fact.

After this agreement was signed the Red Cross went to the federal Nigerian government and secured another agreement. What does this agreement provide? Paragraph 4 reads as follows:

> Routings to and from Uli, call signs, radio communication, emblems, types of aircraft and flight schedules shall be as agreed from time to time by the ICRC with the Nigerian Air Force and the Nigerian Army.

Is it not perfectly clear that this is asking the Biafran authorities perhaps to sign their own death warrants? It is certainly asking them to surrender. What does the agreement go on to provide? The Prime Minister made something of the fact that Colonel Ojukwu was asking for certain military considerations in the proposals that he made. Paragraph 6.2 of this draft agreement between the International Red Cross and the Nigerian federal government provides:

> This agreement shall be without prejudice to military operations by the federal military government.

Perhaps both sides are using propaganda in this battle, Mr. Speaker, and it is not surprising that they are. The Biafrans are fighting a war of survival and it would not be reasonable to expect them to agree to anything which might lead to their military defeat.

But there is more than just the propaganda of one side behind this matter. As long ago as last January General Alexander, a British member of the observer team in Nigeria, according to The Economist of January 11 spoke of a Nigerian plan, in collaboration with the British government, to propose certain relief measures which for military reasons would be unacceptable to the Biafran authorities, and which could then be used for propaganda purposes by blaming Colonel Ojukwu for Biafran starvation. This is precisely what has occurred. Indeed, when talking about propaganda it seems to me that the Prime Minister and his colleagues have been the victims of Nigerian and, I hate to admit it, British propaganda in this regard.

In the name of humanity I implore the government to be big enough to look at this problem again. From time to time the government has stated that if its efforts to assist the International Red Cross are not successful, it will look at other avenues and approaches. Therefore let me end by urging the Prime Minister and the government to listen to what the Canadian people are saying, and to do something about helping the only agency that is relieving starvation in Biafra. The lives of hundreds of thousands depend on action of that sort, and there is no good reason for not taking it. I believe that the people of Canada demand that this action be taken.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we have listened carefully to the 18-point statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) concerning the tragic situation in Nigeria and Biafra.

Mr. Speaker, this delicate, serious and very complex situation will not be solved by miracles, and the Prime Minister did not come up with a practical solution. In my opinion, he cannot make a miracle to set things right, not any more than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who censures the government for its inaction but fails to recommend a concrete solution; or again, the NDP member who has just told us about the great human tragedy taking place in Biafra.

Mr. Speaker, we Créditistes are also members of the opposition and we sincerely believe that one of the 18 points expounded before the House is based nevertheless on actual facts and research. I say this not to flatter the Prime Minister or the government but out of respect for the truth.

Some Canadian officials went there, not to have a party, but to observe and study the situation. They met with representatives of both sides and even travelled to Great Britain to confer with Nigerian authorities. As for those Canadians, whoever they might be, who went to Nigeria, they have discussed the problems facing that country.

When either Nigeria or Biafra lays down conditions concerning relief to be sent by Canada, be it drugs, food, clothing, medical care, etc., it seems to me that we should in this House stop tearing one another to pieces, as the Leader of the Opposition and the spokesman for the New Democratic party are doing at the present time.

We cannot always be at one another's throat and I shall speak straight out: if the Leader of the Opposition were in office instead of the present Prime Minister and told us what he would do in such circumstances, we would listen to him carefully.

Nobody wants more than we do to bring relief to those who are in distress and are being massacred in Nigeria and in Biafra. But all the same, we must be realists and coldly look into the possibilities offered us to help them. We are asking the parties concerned to allow us to help them through the Red Cross, but they do not even want to hear of it. Are we to settle Biafra's future in the House of Commons of Canada? Let us be logical and consistent with ourselves. I hear the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) grumbling. This is all he can do in the House of Commons. Besides, he also does it outside.

No one here, except perhaps the hon. member for York South, can tell me that he is more anxious than we are to settle the dispute between Nigeria and Biafra. We want to help. However, as I said earlier, it is not by quarrelling with one another that we shall solve that problem.

Let us examine the solutions instead of saying simply to the Prime Minister: You are wrong, you have no solution to offer, you are arrogant toward Biafra, you do not want to commit yourself to supply assistance. I would like to know why logical, reasonable and truly human solutions are not suggested to the government to help parliament and the people of Canada to settle the disastrous situation prevailing in Nigeria and Biafra.

In our opinion, it is possible to work objectively if we offer solutions and ask for the assistance to those who are directly responsible. If the colonel of some country refuses to accept our aid and to co-operate, how can we undertake any action?

We are asked to intervene in the affairs of another country and to take position in favour of one side or the other from the political point of view. Mr. Speaker, if those leaders are out merely to save their political skins, it is time for the populations to find other leaders who can get along better with other heads of state.

FINANCE

SALARY OF MINISTER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43, which reads as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

I shall heed your admonition of yesterday as to the brevity of one's explanation. In fact, I think no explanation of my motion is necessary at all. I shall simply send a copy of it to you so that when I have read it you may be in a position to put it to the House. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

That the salary and indemnity of the Minister of Finance be reduced to $30 per week, and that he report to Parliament this day six months hence on whether it is possible for one person to live on this amount.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I heard at least one negative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE—POSITION RESPECTING STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT NIXON

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does the government of Canada share the view attributed to the Prime Minister of the United States, as expressed today, that all chemical and—

An hon. Member: You mean the President.

Mr. Stanfield: The President of the United States, rather.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The same thing.

Mr. Stanfield: There is so much confusion these days, Mr. Speaker, between "Prime Minister" and "President"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want the minister to be too confused so perhaps I should start again. Does the government of Canada share the view expressed by the President of the United States that all chemical and biological warfare weapons should be destroyed immediately and research discontinued?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put the answer the other way around. It is the President of the United States who joins Canada in support of the resolution by Britain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Now who is confused?

Mr. Stanfield: There seems to be a lot of static over there.

An hon. Member: No, just donkeys.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: What does the government propose to do with any stocks of chemical or biological warfare weapons it may have on hand, and what does it propose to do with any research facilities of the Defence Research Board such as those in Alberta and others that may be located in the country?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have repeatedly said in the House that we have no such stocks on hand. We have never stored biological or chemical warfare agents. What we are involved in is research of a defensive nature so that if such a thing should happen to us we will be in a position to defend ourselves.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it then the intention of the minister to continue with the research efforts undertaken by the government of Canada although the President of the United States has today indicated that research ought to be discontinued?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I did not check whether the President of the United States said research was to be discontinued in that country. We have no such intention in Canada so far.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the quadripartite agreement, under which research at Shirley's Bay and Suffield, Alberta, is carried on, is still in force and whether, since one of the parties to the agreement, according to President Nixon, is giving up research—perhaps I should say, not research of the kind that is called defensive—the government is ready to enter into negotiations with the other three parties to the agreement with a view to abandoning it?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I have a copy here of the President's announcement. He said he is asking the United States Senate to ratify a 1925 Geneva protocol prohibiting the use of gas and bacteriological warfare equipment. I do not seem to see any reference to research.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister will undertake to have his staff provide him with the full statement which does contain a reference to the abandonment of research in that field in the United States as well as to the destruction of present stockpiles of weapons. If he finds through later intelligence that this is the case, will he consider entering into negotiations to cancel the quadripartite agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question asked as a supplementary has become highly hypothetical. Perhaps it might be asked again on another occasion or later during the session.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—NICKEL PRICE INCREASE—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and it arises out of the action of the International Nickel Company in increasing its prices by nearly 25 per cent. Coming as it does upon increases in prices of cars, steel and oil, I want to ask the Prime Minister what action, if any, the government intends to take with respect to this latest increase in the price of nickel?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not consulted the minister and I do not know whether he has consulted the members of the Prices and Incomes Commission on this matter but, as I have said in previous weeks, any action of the government beyond that of a merely suasive nature depends on the legal authority which the government may have to initiate such action. On the basis of the research we have conducted thus far we are not prepared to make a government announcement on whether or not we have the power to control prices within provinces.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Mr. Larry Sefton, a director of the United Steelworkers of America, has issued a request for a public inquiry into the increase in the price of nickel, to deal both with the wages paid and the profits made by the industry, is the government prepared to accede to this request and have a public inquiry into the price increase and into the wage and profit level of the industry?

Mr. Trudeau: Previously when price or wage increases were announced, various members of the House and people throughout the country have asked for such an inquiry. We are realizing that we cannot set up an inquiry into every price or wage increase in every area of the economy and that it would be a mistake to answer yes to every request for such an inquiry because we might end up having more inquiries than we can conduct. That is why the government is trying to establish an over-all approach to control inflation with the means we have. We do not mind setting up inquiries or having parliamentary committees inquire into the subject, but I repeat that it will take some policy orientation by the government in order to know what precise areas of inquiry we want to embark upon if we do not want to have more inquiries than we can handle.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have one last supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the government is making an appeal to all sectors of the economy to prevent inflation, does the Prime Minister agree it would be of value to have an inquiry to establish whether or not these price increases are justified?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary question is argumentative.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the substantial increase in price announced by the International Nickel Company and another Company, following upon the increase in steel prices, has the government decided that its attack on inflation based upon fiscal and monetary restraints is not adequate? Has the government decided that other policies are necessary and, if so, when may we expect some announcement as to what these policies will be?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course this approach is not adequate in itself and other policies are needed. That is why the government in the past couple of years has been acting, through monetary and fiscal policies, to combat inflation with the means that we have available to us under federal jurisdiction. That is why we have, for the first time in 13 years, a large budgetary surplus. That is why we have applied these tough restraints and guidelines to cut down expenditures in departments and areas, which do not always have the approval of the opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Raising taxes.

Mr. Trudeau: But we have said before that there is danger in applying certain policies which are under federal jurisdiction and that is why we prefer people to apply voluntary restraints, because obviously the policies we can follow under our jurisdiction may entail other types of evil which it would be desirable to avoid.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government yet prepared to indicate to companies and to others what these voluntary restraints consist of in their particular circumstances?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe the Prices and Incomes Commission has indicated this quite clearly in its negotiations with the industries, with the unions and with the provincial governments. The Commission has also indicated this clearly to the Canadian government and we have applied our guidelines policy with this in mind. These are the guidelines which are being suggested by the commission. If the commission reports failure, we will have to take other means.

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister advise the House on the effect that he anticipates the increase in the price of nickel will have, first of all, on Canadian markets and, second, on our export markets?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The hon. member should bear in mind, as he well knows, that 96 per cent of Inco's nickel production is exported from this country. So obviously the effects on the domestic market will be limited. At the moment my department is looking at the domestic effects on industrial consumers of nickel. At first sight these effects seem to be quite small. But I cannot prevent people from jacking up prices from say 5 per cent to 20 per cent. I suggest that members read the communiqué issued by Inco explaining its decision. It is very educational and apparently good enough for the premier of Ontario who said, according to a radio news item this morning, he had no objection to its content.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prices and Incomes Commission is busy with over-all policies, would he consider having a standing committee of the House examine the price increases in steel and cars, to mention two, pending an over-all report? I think people would like one or two inquiries.

Mr. Trudeau: I think people would like one or two inquiries and they are getting more than that from the Prices and Incomes Commission. But as I said a moment ago to the hon. member for York South, the object is not merely to inquire into a situation but to act on the basis of the findings of the inquiry. We have not yet heard that the opposition feel that the federal government can regulate contractual settlements under provincial jurisdiction in peacetime. If this is their position it would be interesting to hear them say so because we are having some trouble with the constitutional problems inherent in this matter.

DAIRYING—INQUIRY AS TO REDUCED GRANTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

It is indeed common knowledge that the dairy industry receives subsidies. Is it true that the government or the department are about to reduce these subsidies?

Mr. Speaker: I am under the impression that this question was already raised yesterday. If I am mistaken, the minister could reply.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member can look at the statement I made in the House a week ago today, I believe, and he will notice that we are asking the dairy industry to help us design a support program that can be financed with $115 million in the next fiscal year.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Will he be in favor of holding the emergency debate asked for by the Quebec Milk Producers Association?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the question thus asked is in order.

Mr. La Salle: As this question seems to me of the utmost importance, since the Quebec Milk Producers Association has already set up a petition to be presented to hon. members—and that entails a considerable output of money and energy—could not the minister tell us whether he will support the holding of that urgent debate, in order to save this expense to the Milk Producers Association?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister to give his opinion on a petition which could eventually reach the House, and I do not think the question is in order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA—REQUEST TO MAKE DAY FOR DEBATE AVAILABLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the general attitude of frustration among Canadians over the failure of the government of Canada to come to the assistance of the Biafrans, even though in so doing it might cause antagonism on the part of the Organization of African Unity, will the Prime Minister make a day available this week for the discussion of this matter? I believe Canadians as a whole are asking for that. Indeed, in my mail today I received $300 in contributions by different people across Canada. Will the Prime Minister not give the House an opportunity of discussing this matter, instead of producing all kinds of alibis for inaction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gladly accede to this very reasonable demand by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and I suggest it be Thursday of this week.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Good. Fine. That is what we want.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that a commitment, Thursday of this week?

Mr. Benson: It is an opposition day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order—

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, Thursday will be an opposition day this week.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that is just playing with the problem.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want a day set aside, and not an opposition day, so that the matter can be discussed, with none of that playing around in which the Prime Minister has been indulging for the last 18 months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the opposition is telling us this is a very important subject. I am suggesting that they take Thursday of this week to deal with it. The opposition is saying this is no good—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of both the right hon. gentlemen that—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): You still don't know where Biafra is.

Mr. Trudeau: I have been there. That is more than you have.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognize that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will want to rise on a point of order in a moment, but I wish to say that having heard him indicate that he wanted to rise on a point of order I was trying to re-establish order in the House before we have the point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to the fact that it is the right of the opposition to request the days it shall have as allotted days, and there have already been discussions and arrangements made under which a week from Thursday is to be an opposition allotted day. Is the President of the Privy Council now to say it is this Thursday because the Prime Minister has made the mistake of committing this Thursday for this question? If so, I say he is violating the rights of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I would point out that while the opposition of course can pick whatever subject matter it wants, it is the prerogative of the government to name which particular days will be available for opposition days. I am prepared, however, if hon. members think it important, to change the order of business and make this Thursday an allotted day for them. If they think the question of Biafra is important, then they can use it for that purpose. If they do not think it is important, then we will carry on with the business as announced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period will soon come to an end and I would think we should go on to the many other questions which hon. members seem to be intent on asking during the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this House cannot be trifled with in this manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister smiles and laughs about Biafra.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He gave his undertaking that on Thursday we would be given an opportunity to deal with this question. Surely, he is not going to be repudiated by the government house leader.

Mr. Benson: He wasn't.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is still not a point of order. Some minutes ago the Chair recognized the hon. member for Calgary Centre. Perhaps the House would allow me to give him the floor now.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSTING OF DETACHMENTS IN YELLOWKNIFE AND WHITEHORSE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. What is the purpose of posting small military detachments of three or four persons each in Yellowknife and Whitehorse?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked does not indicate any urgency. I really do not know what is behind the hon. gentleman's question, but certainly as asked there is no urgency that is apparent to the Chair. The hon. member for York South.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM ATROCITIES—SUGGESTED INQUIRY BY ICC OR UN MISSION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the recent revelations of unspeakable atrocities committed by the United States forces and the South Vietnamese in Viet Nam, and the allegations of similar atrocities by the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese, may I ask has the government been in touch with our representative on the International Control Commission for the purpose of initiating some sort of relevant inquiry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker. I do not know the answer.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When he is making inquiries, if it has not already been done would the Prime Minister and the government instruct our permanent representative at the United Nations to request that the Secretary General of that body send a special mission to investigate this inhuman behavior in an inhuman war?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the way in which the question was asked really does not convey the respect which the hon. member usually has for legal processes when he talks of inhuman behavior. I believe the matter is being inquired into now and that it is before a military court. I think we might wait until both sides give evidence before deciding what happened exactly.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, like everyone in the House I always appreciate the Prime Minister's lectures, and indeed like everyone else I get many of them. But, Mr. Speaker, whatever description he would prefer, may I repeat my question and ask whether the government would instruct our permanent representative at the United Nations to request that the Secretary General send a special mission to investigate these events? Now, that is a rather neutral description—these events.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will discuss this neutral matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

OIL

STRAIT OF GEORGIA—ISSUANCE OF DRILLING PERMITS

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In order to answer all the petitions and letters which have been flowing in from the west coast, could the minister tell the House whether his department has granted a permit to drill for oil in Georgia Strait near the city of Vancouver, British Columbia?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is a flat no. My officials have been in touch with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Ottawa, which is responsible for off-shore drilling in this country and have been assured, and I personally have been assured by the minister, of their co-operation so that no drilling permits will be granted as long as there is any danger, not only to the sports and commercial fisheries but also to the entire ecology of that area.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to use the power he has under the Fisheries Act to prevent such drillings from taking place, considering the risk that they might pollute the waters and hence damage our marine resources there?

Mr. Davis: We are working closely, as I said earlier, with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which has authority over granting permits. We are concerned about the effects on the living resources in the water, and it is co-operative action which I think is desirable from every point of view.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on November 18 that departmental policy has not been altered, may I ask the minister if we have his assurance now and the concurrence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that no oil drilling permits will be granted in Georgia Strait?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly going to urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources not to grant permits if there is going to be any effect on marine ecology, but I think the question should have been addressed to him.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will permits be granted for oil drilling in Georgia Strait, in view of the pollution which similar drilling has caused along the California coast?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a hypothetical question as no one has applied for oil drilling permits for the Georgia Strait. If they do apply there must be 90 days notice given to the Department of Fisheries, 60 days notice to the Department of Transport and 45 days notice to the Department of National Defence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has only one day to answer his question. As we are running short of time perhaps we might go on to another question.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

MARITIMES UNION—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Was the minister indicating government policy when, in a recent speech in Toronto, he expressed approval of maritime union and suggested the name "New Acadia" for the united maritime provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be asked of the Prime Minister. I am not sure whether it has already been asked in those terms but, as the hon. member knows, he can only ask the Prime Minister whether a statement made outside the House represents government policy.

Mr. Flemming: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should be very glad to ask the Prime Minister and perhaps he would like me to repeat the question. Was the Minister of Veterans Affairs indicating government policy when, in a recent speech in Toronto, he expressed approval of maritime union and suggested the name "New Acadia" for the united maritime provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am told, Mr. Speaker, the minister made it quite clear that it was not government policy but his own personal opinion. In fact, the government has not reached any decision on this and therefore—

An hon. Member: Better not.

Another hon. Member: That minister had better attend to veterans affairs.

Another hon. Member: He cannot even handle that.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Has the Minister of Veterans Affairs recommended to the Premier of New Brunswick that he take steps to bring about the union of the Maritime provinces?

[English]

POLLUTION

DUMPING OF MINE TAILINGS IN QUATSINO SOUND

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the widespread concern being expressed in British Columbia by such bodies as the Society for Pollution and Environmental Control, the Pacific Trollers Association and others over the proposed dumping of mine tailings by the Utah Construction and Mining Company, Limited from their 33,000 ton mill project in the Quatsino Sound area, is the minister prepared to consider or have his departmental scientists reconsider the approval of this application which he says he has granted?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): This department does not grant permits; it certainly does not grant permits to pollute. A mining company has received a permit to carry out mining operations, but the permit was received from the provincial government. We are looking into the possible results of the dumping of effluent into an inlet on the west coast. We are studying the situation, but we have not granted any permit or approval.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister, Mr. Speaker. Does he expect to be able to reach a definitive conclusion on this matter before 30 November, at which time I understand the decision of the Pollution Control Board of British Columbia is to be made on this application?

Mr. Davis: I understand that those who will appear before that board will be using technical information supplied by our department.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

REQUEST FOR MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the House leader. Would the House leader arrange for an early organization meeting of the Parliamentary Restaurant Committee so that charges that the Parliamentary Restaurant is purchasing and serving California grapes can be considered and a decision made if that policy should be continued?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should know that this question should be directed in the usual way to the Chair. If the hon. member will consult with members of this committee, he will be informed that a meeting has been called for some time next week—not necessarily to consider the subject mentioned by the hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

BILINGUALISM—USE OF INSTANT TRANSLATION COMPUTERS IN CLASSES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. and austere President of the Treasury Board on an administrative matter of great importance, namely the achievement of a wider measure of bilingualism in the Public Service. Can the minister advise if consideration is being given to lightening the burden of language classes and immersions of many civil servants through advancing the use of instant translation computers, a technology which a prominent Ottawa communications expert recently said we may soon reach?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that this development will be reached so soon that the question can properly be asked at this time. I should think the question should be put on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MINIMUM LIVING WAGE—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance on his $30 a week statement, and I know the minister is waiting to answer. Does the minister realize that a tin of pipe tobacco costs $2.25 and along with the cost of all the matches he uses, he would not have any money left with which to buy anything to eat or drink each month?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister has an interesting reply to the question but I have to rule it out of order. In those circumstances, I cannot allow the minister to reply.

PESTICIDES

DDT—PLANS FOR COLLECTION AND DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker. In view of the recent federal policy statement on the drastic curtailment of the use of DDT in Canada, and in view of the urgent need for an orderly and systematic collection and disposal of DDT now in the possession of many Canadians, I would ask the minister if his department or any government department is preparing plans for the collection and disposal of this surplus DDT now in the possession of Canadians in every part of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that question has been asked, but I cannot recollect whether it was answered by the minister. I would think that this would be a very good question to consider at the time of adjournment of the House.

HOUSING

SEWAGE TREATMENT FACILITIES—AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I also have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that he seems to have his facts at his fingertips today. Can he indicate to the House when the large and expanding fund for the construction of sewage treatment facilities that he mentioned last Thursday will be made available?

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member added the word "today" to his preface. With respect to the funds available in CMHC for sewage disposal plants, that matter is under consideration in relation to the government's over-all commitment to fight the war on inflation. As soon as it is possible to make more funds available and reopen these funds, I can assure the hon. member that the House will be notified.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question, please. May I ask the minister if the date now set of April, 1970, will be advanced so that there will be more funds available before that date? Is that question being considered?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, that question, along with every avenue whereby funds can be made available consonant with the government's over-all fiscal responsibilities, is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. Baldwin: I bet they are.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MINIMUM LIVING WAGE—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and I believe it is anticipated. Is he stating the taxation policy of the government when he says that a person can live on $30 a week?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege in view of the fact there was a question raised—

An hon. Member: Is this a statement on motions?

Another hon. Member: Out of order.

Mr. Benson: I did not say that $30 was a living wage.

Mr. Baldwin: Down, down!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the minister is rising on a question of privilege, and he should be allowed to state his question.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that $30 weekly is a living wage in Canada. May I read from the transcript. The question was asked:

You think that in any place in Canada that a man can live on $30 a week?

My answer was as follows:

Yes, I think there are places in Canada.... They can't live to the standards that one would want them to live to. I think there are places in Canada where people are living on $30 a week. And there obviously are places where married couples were living on $3,500 a year. Previously, a married man with two children was living on it because he was filing his tax return as his only income and was paying $118 in tax, and we're taking that $118 in tax off.

An hon. Member: Where are those places?

Mr. Harkness: The minister will be known as "$30 a week Benson."

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, but I understand that another hon. member is seeking the floor for the purpose of raising a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer the minister gave, will hon. members be given an opportunity to ask some supplementary questions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, the account that we have is at such variance with the account the minister gave that I am surprised he did not raise a question of privilege at the opening of the House. In press accounts we have a very ample statement, but the minister's version is different.

Mr. Benson: That is not so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It was my impression that the hon. member was seeking the floor for the purpose of asking a question. Could he please ask it now?

Mr. McCleave: My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is: Is this figure the party line that is accepted by the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think people have this whole question mixed up a little bit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benson: The question arose because someone was asking me about the increased exemptions. If hon. members opposite would take the trouble to read the transcript they would see that I said that by raising our exemption $400 for single people and $800 for married people we would take 750,000 Canadians, who should not now be paying taxes, off the tax rolls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Minister of Finance is concerned about raising exemptions will he, in light of the fact that a person earning $30 a week will still have to pay income tax, consider raising the exemption even further above the $1,400 level?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, it would be very nice to raise the exemptions still higher but, in order to do that, we should have to impose greater increases in taxes on other Canadians. Under our proposal, we are raising the exemption by $400 for single people and $800 for married people, and the cost of this will be $1 billion, which we shall have to collect in taxes from other Canadians.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

LACK OF ENGLISH DESIGNATION ON TRUCKS TO VISIT WEST AFRICA

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister which pertains to the splendid new truck and trailer equipment being displayed in front of this building. I take it that the equipment is destined soon to tour many West African countries and to reflect the true bilingual and bicultural character of Canada. My question is, why are the words in quotation marks on both sides of the trucks and trailers in French only. I refer to the words, "Visages du Canada"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what these trucks are. I do not know where they are going; I do not know where they came from.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Why do the words "Faces of Canada" which I understand is an appropriate translation, not appear on one side of these trucks and trailers in fairness to bilingualism at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a suggestion which we must assume has been noted. The question period expired some moments ago.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the business of the House for next week. During the course of the question period, a question was asked about a day being granted to debate the situation in Biafra. The suggestion was made that this might be done on Thursday. This suggestion came as a surprise to us, because Thursday was to have been a government day. During the confusion, the President of the Privy Council offered to make this Thursday an opposition day. In the meantime I have consulted with the members of my party with respect to this matter. It so happens that the next opposition day was to have been ours and was to have been a week from Thursday. We recognize the seriousness of this question, so we are prepared to take this Thursday instead of next Thursday. If that is agreed to, a motion will be filed tomorrow in the name of the hon. member for Greenwood on the question of Biafra.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in that case the reference of the tax white paper would not be called, as agreed, on Thursday, on Friday and again on Monday, and Thursday, instead of being the first day of the two-day white paper debate, would be an allotted day.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I was going to rise on a point of order and ask for unanimous consent for the question period to be continued because of the large number of members who wish to ask questions. However, inasmuch as so many ministers have sneaked out I will refrain from raising that point of order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CUSTOMS TARIFF—EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-140, to amend the Customs Tariff and to make a consequential amendment to the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I conclude the remarks I was addressing to the House last night. What I really wanted to say in the short time I have left is that, to put it in blunt words, in so far as the farmer and the people in Saskatchewan are concerned, the Kennedy Round has failed. The juggling of various tariff schedules as proposed in Bill C-140 will not, in the final analysis, mean anything to the people in Saskatchewan.

Previous speakers have outlined the facts of life as to how the tariff structure has affected the actual farmer on the land in Ontario and in Saskatchewan; but, if one wants to really look at some concrete examples, one can look at the development of the potash industry in Saskatchewan and the situation it is in now. Essentially, there is an impasse vis-à-vis Canadian and United States production. What the United States is saying, as a result of the congressional hearings held in Washington, is that first and foremost the jobs of the workers in New Mexico are going to be protected. Since this is their first consideration, it means that the ordinary process of negotiation, such as the Kennedy Round, will not protect the position of Canadian workers and it is probable that, despite the horrendous efforts of the Premier of Saskatchewan, negotiation will not protect the investment of Canadian companies in the potash industry in Canada. The moral of the lesson is that we have to look to the world markets if we are going to sell Canadian potash.

We are in a desperate position in the wheat economy, according to the papers that were presented to the Agricultural Outlook Conference in Ottawa yesterday and today. Mr. H. B. Huff, Assistant Professor of Agricultural Economics at the University of Guelph, speaking to the Conference, stated that policies are needed to stabilize prices and production, and to match production with demand. Dr. Huff described the dilemma of the wheat producers as "probably the most serious problem confronting Canadian agriculture".

I would go further than that and say that the wheat problem and the potash problem are two of the most serious confronting the total Canadian economy today. The juggling of the tariff schedules under the Kennedy Round will not offer a solution to either one of these problems. It is time the government of this country ceased proposing policies that were relevant to Canada in 1910 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier first looked at the agricultural economy in the west on behalf of a Liberal government. It is time this government realized it is 1969, not 1910. It is time they started to look at this economy in terms of how Canadians can live in the cut-throat economic jungle which exists in the world today.

What the people in Saskatchewan want to know is, how we are going to use the capital investment in the wheat industry and in the potash industry in Saskatchewan? How are we going to have sufficient jobs to maintain the population in that province? The answers will not be found in the tariff juggling that is proposed in Bill C-140.

If the government and this House doubt the seriousness of the situation, then they should certainly give consideration to a news report emanating from the convention of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. This press report in the Globe and Mail of November 25, 1969, reads as follows:

> Western Canada should study the implications of secession if Ottawa does not give proper attention to western problems, the Saskatchewan wheat pool said yesterday. The comment was made in a statement released from the wheat pool's annual meeting and it did not elaborate.

The situation is serious when an organization as responsible as the Saskatchewan wheat pool issues such a statement from its annual meeting. The statement also indicated that, since farmers did not contribute to inflation they should not be affected by the budgetary restraints of the government. The meeting asked the federal government to subsidize interest rate charges over 7 per cent on farm improvement loans and to curtail high costs of farm production by the establishment of a prices and trade board.

Questions were repeatedly raised in this House today during the question period as to what was going to be done to stop escalating prices in this country. The people in the cities and on the farms in Saskatchewan are being crucified by the fiscal and trade policies that are being followed. I cannot over-emphasize the serious situation that exists. The government should give very careful consideration to the suggestions emanating from the Saskatchewan wheat pool convention with regard to interest rates and prices affecting farm production. Some steps should be taken to bring these important factors under control. Undoubtedly, this House will pass Bill C-140. What is implicit in that type of approach is that if we juggle the customs tariffs in Canada we will reach a state of competition which will result in a fair distribution of opportunity and earning power for the people who live, work and produce the wealth of this nation. It just has not happened, Mr. Speaker. The people who are in competition with one another are the farmers and the small businessmen, and these are the people who are going broke in Canada today. It is not International Nickel, Imperial Oil, Gulf Oil or Shell Oil. The people who are going broke are those in competition with one another. I just cannot take seriously the exercise of juggling tariffs, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is only an exercise. It is not relevant to a good many people who live and work in this nation today.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on Bill C-140, my mind goes back over a number of years during which we on this side of the House have continually harangued and harped at the government to seriously consider the problems existing with regard to custom tariffs and excise duties, particularly as they apply to rural western Canada.

Bill C-140 brings up to date and ratifies the tariff schedules which have been in effect since June 3, 1968, as a result of the Kennedy Round tariff negotiations. What concerns me, Mr. Speaker, is that many of the items in tariff schedules approved by this House, such as the one we are now dealing with, are then left up to the officials to interpret, and more often than not the officials interpret them in the narrowest possible sense. They do not take into consideration the general theme or the intent of the legislation passed by Parliament. The government does not really give the intent of the legislation to the officials who have to police or interpret the act.

All across this country today we see groups of people rebelling against bureaucracy and the system; farmers in western Canada, university students and people in the cities trying to build homes. Why are they rebelling against the system? It is because the system is not paying any attention to the people of this country. The system does not give one particle of consideration to, their problem of staying alive and earning a fair standard of living. All across Canada, we see a certain amount of rebellion against the system because the bureaucracy built up by this and previous governments is finally reaching an unbearable stage for the people of this nation. I can quote many instances of this.

We see a great deal of apparatus and paraphernalia on which duties are being removed under Bill C-140. We also see some on which they are not being removed. I go back to the old complaint which I and other members raised in this House a number of years ago with regard to agricultural implements under tariff items 40924-1 or 40948-1. We come back to a long and detailed list of tariff exemptions, and then a narrow interpretation placed on those tariff exemptions.

I will give some examples. In the tariff exemptions, sprinkler irrigation systems are duty-free. In another place, we find aluminum sluice-gate devices for the control of water in irrigation ditches. In another item we find that agricultural instruments and agricultural machinery might be duty-free, if not otherwise listed. It was pointed out very forcefully by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) that duty has to be paid on an irrigation pump which may or may not be used for a sprinkler system. Here, we see the very intent of the legislation and the whole tariff structure. The intent is to allow all agricultural machinery into Canada duty-free, yet because one specific item is not spelled out, some narrow-minded official says, "Oh, oh, this wasn't the intent of the legislation". I argue it was the intent of the legislation because sprinkler irrigation systems are duty-free. Then, we have the example of sluice-gate pumps. Sprinkler irrigation systems and pumps are duty-free. In another item, we have aluminum pipe sluice-gate devices for the control of water in irrigation ditches.

How much further must we go before we spell it out in complete detail? Then, at the bottom of the list, we find the words: "Agricultural implements or agricultural machinery and parts not otherwise listed." These are duty-free. Yet because officials are overconcerned with maintaining their own positions, we find them placing the narrowest possible interpretations on these items.

Last fall we experienced a difficult time in finding storage for damp grain. It became evident that silos could be used for this purpose. I asked whether the minister would take the trouble to see whether silos could not come in duty-free. But there is no mention of this in Bill C-140. Action should have been taken. We find that the duty on ladders for silos is up 25 per cent; that steel wall sections, with or without doors, for the construction of steel silos attract rates of duty which have risen from 10 per cent to 25 per cent, and so on. Last year, when they faced this difficult storage position, many farmers resorted to the construction of steel or glass-lined silos and I maintain these items should be allowed to enter duty-free. After all, they are not made anywhere in Canada. Yet farmers have to pay duty at rates between 10 and 25 per cent because the government failed to act.

I submit that the total revenue flowing to the government from this source would amount to relatively little. Yet to the individual farmers concerned, this duty represents a considerable extra expense. To my regret, many farmers in parts of Saskatchewan, northern Manitoba and some parts of western Alberta along the foothills still face a situation in which many bushels of grain will have to be harvested damp. Silos could help meet this difficulty. In any case we could help farmers to diversify into a cattle feeding operation which would be of help to them in staying afloat during a risky period.

The government suggests that the federal sales tax on grain bins should be refunded to the purchasers. Yet I am informed by the department that the same consideration does not apply to Quonset buildings, since such buildings are not regarded as grain bins. A letter I have received says that a Quonset building may or may not be used to store grain; in other words, it may be used for some other purpose. Well, this enables the farmer to produce more efficiently. What I am complaining about is that we find no efficiency in government, no broadminded approach to the whole question of the application of the Customs Tariff and Excise Tax Act.

The whole principle of the bill we are considering involves a broader and more fair-minded approach to the application of the Acts to which I have just referred. Every member of this House should realize that this was the underlying purpose of the Kennedy Round negotiations. The intention was that the burden of customs and excise taxes should be reduced as far as possible. It is not difficult to pass legislation to confirm actions which have in fact been taken since June 3 of last year, but we ought not to do so without registering concern that the intent of the Kennedy Round is not being fully carried out by the officials working for the government. The minister responsible for piloting this measure through the House is a Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray), with very little else to do. Surely, he could pursue this subject with the officials of his department to ensure that the full spirit and intent of the Kennedy Round negotiations is carried out by them. The time has come to take a close look at this whole field to determine whether we are treating all sections and minorities in this country fairly. It is not good enough for the government to have parliament pass pieces of legislation and then to pay no attention to the way in which sections of that legislation are applied.

This is one of the reasons which prompted me to speak on the particular bill before us. I want the government and the minister responsible for piloting this bill through the House to carry out the full intent of this legislation; that is to say, the most liberal interpretation of the Customs Tariff and of the Excise Tax Act. What I want to see is not a group of bureaucrats trying to enforce their will upon citizens who are trying to make a living but, rather, a group of officials who are trying to translate the intent of Parliament for the benefit of the people of Canada. When a situation of this kind is reached we shall find less and less evidence of anxiety among minorities, less and less evidence of anxiety in particular regions of this country. This is important to me, especially when one recalls the extract which the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) read from the Globe and Mail to the effect that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, a conscientious, law-abiding, purely Canadian firm is suggesting that western Canada might secede if no attention is paid to prairie problems.

Canada, we cannot remind ourselves too often, consists of many regions spread across some 4,000 miles of territory. It is the home of many minorities. Surely, the government must be prepared to listen and respond to some of the wishes of these various regions and minorities if we are to stay together as a single, unified force.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

• (3:50 p.m.)

On clause 1—Approval by Parliament.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would advise the House if he intends to clarify the section to which western members were referring with regard to farm implements and farm agricultural machinery.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, the section to which the hon. member referred with his usual eloquence is not, as far as I am aware, dealt with in any way by the bill which is before the committee at this time. I recall that when he raised this matter a year ago I suggested to him that I would be most happy, if he wished me to do so, to arrange a meeting with the representative senior officials of the department concerned, which I would attend, so as to assist in some way in a discussion aimed at seeking a clarification of this matter.

Following that particular sitting of the House, I understand my hon. friend had a brief conversation with one of the officials, but as yet, perhaps as a result of an omission on my part or on somebody else's part—though I do not think that is directly relevant—it has not proved possible to arrange such meeting.

Let me repeat my invitation to the hon. member. I would be happy to convene such meeting, at which time we could review at greater depth than is possible in a forum of this kind the questions he has raised.

I might conclude my comment on this particular point by saying that Parliament has provided, in the passage of the legislation in question, procedures for those who are not satisfied with administrative rulings of officials. These rulings can be reviewed by the tariff board, and an appeal lies from the tariff board in certain cases to the Exchequer Court. This is the method provided by Parliament.

I recall my hon. friend referring yesterday to section 22 of the Financial Administration Act. I note that it is his intention to advise the people in his riding who may not be satisfied with administrative rulings to take advantage of this provision, by making application under it, and this is something they are fully entitled to do if they wish.

However, I might say that as far as I am aware there is nothing secret about this particular provision. It is part of a statute that has been passed by parliament. The statute appears in the Revised Statutes. If it is amended from time to time the amendments are printed in the annual statutes. These volumes are made available to all members of the House. If I am not mistaken, the Queen's Printer distributes them free to just about every public library and university library in Canada. So as I have said, there is nothing that is more secret about section 22 of the Financial Administration Act than any section in any other piece of legislation on the federal statute books. Certainly, my hon. friend is at liberty, as is any citizen of Canada, to see whether matters of concern to him qualify for consideration under the provisions of this particular statute.

While I understand the concern that he and other members have expressed about the manner in which they feel the officials seem to apply or to interpret various sections of the Customs Act, it seems to me that it is not the most helpful way to advance the consideration of these matters to attempt to suggest that the attitude the officials are taking is founded on some type of ill-will or animus toward a particular group or section of the country.

Although officials are as capable as any other human beings of making mistakes from time to time, generally they try to carry out their duties in a way that they hope will be considered as being in the best interests of the public at large. As I have said, if my friend and I sit down together to review the administrative procedures, I do not say it will be immediately impossible to clear away the difficulties he so eloquently brought to the attention of the House, but at least it will help clarify matters and perhaps point the way to some solutions. Now that I have a somewhat greater responsibility for such matters I would be happy to try to assist hon. members and their constituents in obtaining fair and equitable treatment from the administration for their problems.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I am not as learned in the law as my colleague the minister, and neither are the people I represent. I made no reference to anything that was secret. As I stated last night, my objection was that no effort was made by the bureaucrats to inform persons like myself, representing the farmers as I do, that there were other avenues we could pursue.

As far as the minister's comments today are concerned, let me remind him that although I outlined the problem to him last December he still has not fully understood it The department the minister represents, the Department of Finance, inserts these items in the schedules of the Customs Tariff. It is the duty of the officials of the Department of National Revenue, a different department entirely, to interpret these items. So although they are passed by Parliament, in effect they mean nothing.

The situation is this. One item in the schedule referred to "all other agricultural implements and all other agricultural machinery". That must mean something to those who inserted the item. Certainly, it meant something to the people of Canada, and particularly to the western farmers.

It now appears that the western farmers were under a misconception. They thought that all agricultural implements and agricultural machinery would be allowed into Canada duty free, something they were very happy about. Indeed, I think that was the intent of Parliament when this particular item was agreed to. However, over the years, time and again the farmers have found that their interpretation was incorrect.

I remember spending three days with a constituent of mine trying to obtain an interpretation of this term which I have used so often. We both went to the officials of the Department of Finance, and they confirmed that this item was in the schedule. They said that nothing could be plainer, and we agreed. We then went to the Department of National Revenue and told them what the Department of Finance officials had said, to which the officials of the Department of National Revenue replied that it was they who were charged with the proper interpretation, which was different from ours.

This is the point that I have been endeavouring to clarify. Why is the item in the schedule if none of the officials know what it means? Why do not the Department of National Revenue officials tell the Department of Finance to spell out the meaning of the item? We who represent the farmers are not legal minded, but the language used is plain enough to us: an agricultural implement is an agricultural implement, one that can be used for the production of agricultural products.

The contention of some of these very narrow-minded officials is that any agricultural implement that can be used for some purpose other than agriculture is no longer an agricultural implement. I say this is foolish, because every implement used on the farm can be used for some other purpose. If that interpretation were correct, there would be no such thing as an agricultural implement or an agricultural machine; so let us strike out these words and we will know where we are.

I have discussed this matter with both the minister and his officials. Last December 3 the minister was under the impression that all agricultural implements and machinery were allowed into Canada duty free; as far as he was concerned there were no ifs, ands or buts. He interpreted the item to mean what it says, as I suggest the officials should unless there is good reason not to.

I referred last night to section 22 (8) of the Financial Administration Act, and indicated that people in the know are able to hire tax experts, legal advisers, and so on, to take advantage of any existing loopholes in the legislation. The farmers are not aware of these loopholes. The minister stated that the farmers could appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but he should be the first to know the cost of taking an action to the Supreme Court.

I also said last night that most of the things about which we were complaining would not involve $1,000, therefore they are not recorded in our public accounts. There are many occasions when our farmers have to pay less than $1,000. Perhaps the minister would sit down for one minute and calculate how much it would cost a farmer from Saskatchewan to appear before the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of any one item. The minister would then know that this cost would be prohibitive. That is the point I am making.

There is no use in having any more meetings between me and the officials of the department. I have already taken this matter to the Tariff Board. I make my plea now to the minister. The Question is not a complicated one. Just tell us what you mean by an "agricultural implement" which you said you thought was allowed into Canada free. No one seems to know what an agricultural implement is.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I have the Hansard containing the quotation my hon. friend has referred to at the desk I regularly occupy. My recollection of what I said at the time was that it was my understanding the agricultural implements usually if they were "for farm use"—I believe I used that term—were eligible to come into the country duty free. I was trying to summarize a rather complex situation.

As my hon. friend implied in his remarks today and last night on this point, the agricultural field is one that is becoming increasingly more technical involving many new and different types of machinery. I think even with the best goodwill in the world, whatever statements for clarification might be made by anyone there would still be problems of interpretation and application involved. In something as complicated as the Customs Tariff, it is difficult to see how we would ever be able to get away completely from problems of interpretation and application of the statutes. I wish we could come up with some magic formula that would eliminate these problems. Perhaps we can come up with one. However, we may be just a little over optimistic if we think with the changes in technology of agricultural machinery, with its many different attachments, a way can be found so as to eliminate these difficulties completely.

My hon. friend is probably better informed than I about these improvements. I should think we would be optimistic if we thought it ever possible to eliminate completely all problems of application and interpretation, particularly when there are industries right here in Canada which make some of these same products. Other hon. members of my friend's party have referred to the effects of lowering tariffs in Canada. This shows how it is often difficult to develop Policies and legislation for a country like Canada which are equally acceptable to everyone. This is not always the easiest thing to do in a way which satisfies everybody involved at one and the same time.

In any event, I say to my hon. friend that I am prepared to examine the matter further. I am in perhaps a better position to do so now than when we last discussed this matter. I invite my hon. friend to make available to me some of the knowledge and expertise he has shown in raising the matter in this House at this time and on previous occasions.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge or expertise to offer the minister. I am no better acquainted with actual farming than the minister himself, but that is not the point. The point I am raising is that some clarification should be made of this term. I do not know how many years this term has been in the schedule, but it has been there for a long time and as yet no one knows what it means. At least, we could make an effort to change that situation. We may have the same problem later after the schedule is changed, but if the term does not mean anything let us take it out. If we are not going to allow agricultural implements and machinery into Canada free of duty, we should not try to fool the farmers. This purported exemption is erroneous and it does not apply. I am asking the minister to clarify the meaning of that item and give the officials of the Department of National Revenue the benefit of that interpretation of the intent of Parliament. That is all I am asking.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I just indicated to my hon. friend that I would certainly be prepared to look into the matter further. I do not know what more can be done at this point, since this item is not actually before this committee for consideration. I am prepared to go into the matter further. Perhaps my hon. friend is being too modest when he says he is not an expert, but he has produced some very well documented and informative speeches on the subject, and I would be glad to take advantage of some of the research he has done in this field.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I have just repeated what I have said since 1962. Every minister since then has replied in almost the same words this minister has used today. They have said they would be glad to look into this interpretation, but that does not do the farmers a bit of good. I ask the minister to change this interpretation or clarify it. This is a bill to amend the Customs Act and this is the time to meet this problem. Perhaps we may have to wait another year, but why can we not make this change now? The Department and its officials have known about this for at least eight years, to my knowledge.

Mr. Gray: Perhaps we are getting into an area of procedure. We are dealing now in the committee of the whole with a bill that has been given second reading. There is nothing whatsoever in this bill which touches upon the item in the Customs Tariff to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. McIntosh: That is my complaint.

Mr. Gray: My hon. friend says that is his complaint, and he has stated it very eloquently. That is why I say to him a decision to make further changes in the Customs Tariff is a matter of government policy which is usually announced only in the course of a budgetary presentation. In saying this, I hope I am indicating a great degree of good will and sympathy towards the approach he has put forward, and I am prepared to look into it further.

Mr. McIntosh: I have not got the bill before me but I thought in the explanatory notes there was a clause which referred to a clarification only.

Mr. Gray: What my hon. friend is referring to applies to two particular sections.

Mr. McIntosh: I know what it applies to, but why can we not put another item under that same heading, for clarification only? This is all we are asking. Just because the bill has been printed does not make any difference. If there has been an omission, we can add something. There would be no expenditure involved. It is just for clarification.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I would only intervene at this stage if the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and the minister have completed their exchange of views. In this connection, I thoroughly support my colleague, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

I want now to raise a point that has been before the minister and his officials. It relates to Section 4(1) of the Customs Tariff Act. It has to do with the authority of the Governor in Council to pass Orders in Council, as was done in 1968, which suddenly change the nature of the tariff that is imposed on goods, and then perhaps two and a half or three months later reverse that again. I think the minister and some of his officials who are present are familiar with the case I want to bring before the committee.

My purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee is not to question at all the raison d'être behind the Order in Council. This case had to do with the control of importation into Canada of textiles from low cost countries. What I continue to object to is that the method of procedure in this particular case involved an Order in Council passed in May, 1968 when Parliament was not in session. This action was taken during an election campaign. The Order in Council was published in the Canada Gazette of June 12. We know how long it takes for a copy of the Gazette to go out to western Canada, and particularly to Vancouver.

If there are going to be other conversations, Mr. Chairman, I will just shut shop. I am talking to the minister and the officials regarding a particular case, and I apologize to the minister if he is talking to the officials about the case at hand.

Mr. Gray: May I say for the record, Mr. Chairman, that I was trying to identify for the officials the case to which the hon. member was referring. I believe that is the case involving a higher duty on the import of shirts from Malaysia.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is Order in Council 1968-1965, passed on May 15, 1968 and subsequently rescinded by an Order in Council in August of 1968. The number of the latter is immaterial, although I have it here. What concerns me is the attitude of the officials of both the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue that an Order in Council having been made is deemed to be public knowledge across the country ipso facto, because they care not one whit whether or not anyone has had an opportunity to see the Order in Council or be aware of it. As I indicated, Order in Council 965 was passed on May 15, 1968. It was published in the Canada Gazette on June 12, and if anyone can tell me in this day of pony express postal service how a copy of that particular part of the Canada Gazette can get out to Vancouver in less than four or five days, then that man is a wizard and I invite him to specifically carry out what he says can be done.

What I complain about is that goods which have been ordered from a Canadian importer by Canadian firms, the order transmitted to a manufacturer based in Hong Kong or Singapore, executed during the course of the winter and shipped in three lots all of which reach Canada before June 12, which is the date of the publication of the order, were made subject, without further notice to the importer, of almost double the customs tariff. These goods originating from Singapore were suddenly removed from the British preferential rates and put under the general tariff.

I am not in any way criticizing the action of the government in relation to the authorities in Singapore. I realize there is a problem with regard to finished textiles from low cost countries. But what I do protest is the action taken against an innocent Canadian importer, and there is no official in the government service, unless he has the proof, who can impute knowledge or lack of bona fide to the importer. I have read more presumptions based upon presumptions in the replies I have received from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) with regard to this particular case, than I thought were possible.

Not one tittle of evidence has been advanced by the department to show that there can be any question regarding the bona fide of the importer. There are assertions or allegations, but there is not one tittle of evidence. I put it to the minister that the burden is not upon this or any other Canadian businessman to prove his innocence when there is a situation of this kind. The goods in question were landed, the demands were made for the increase in customs duty, they were paid, and all the goods were cleared. Then, some two months later the government, having resolved its quarrel with the authorities in Singapore, restores the customs tariff to its previous level. When I make representations to the minister with regard to this, I am told the importer could have left the goods lying in the customs warehouse. That attitude is absolutely incomprehensible. We have an importer who is regularly doing business with retail firms across the country and who has a reputation to maintain. He accepts a signed order for goods. There is a contract on the delivery of the goods which he cannot escape. He cannot go to the retailer and say: I cannot deliver the goods to you because I am being charged extra duty.

In the case to which I refer, the timing of the delivery of the goods was essential to the contract. It was the beginning of the summer retailing season. If these goods had been left in the warehouse until after August 15, the market would have been gone and the retailer would have been entitled to call for rescission of the contract and to claim damages. This case deals with an extra customs duty of over $10,000.

What adds to the difficulty is that knowledge is imputed to the importer of discussions between Canada and Singapore and the other countries. There were questions about quotas, but no one can say that this importer knew that he was exceeding the quota or approaching the limit that Canada was going to impose. However, there is a general assertion that this man knew it or ought to have known it. That is patent nonsense.

The next point is that the importer was in some way acting in bad faith in ordering from Singapore rather than Hong Kong because Hong Kong was living up to the quota restrictions. But the Canadian importer did not know this. He was not privy to the dealings between governments. He was not aware of what precisely the government was doing in this regard.

The third point is that the Department of National Revenue issued some sort of internal bulletin, and it was asserted to me that the importer must have been on the mailing list. But it turns out he was not on the mailing list and there is no obligation on him to be on the list for these internal bulletins. In any event, he became aware of the changes when he went to claim the goods. There was the demand of the customs officer when the goods were going to be taken out of the warehouse, the customs officer who in such cases says the duty is not 17½ per cent. It may be 25 per cent. As a matter of fact I think it went to 35 per cent in this case, although I may be corrected on that.

What I am getting at is that it is totally unjust and unfair in matters of this sort not to provide in the Order in Council that this additional duty should not apply to goods bona fide in transit. When the government was considering this matter, the goods were at sea. As a matter of fact, they were landed on May 23, May 30 and June 12. The duty was paid on May 29, June 5 and June 14, and it must be remembered that the Order in Council was published in Ottawa on June 12.

I go back to 1962 when there was a much greater emergency. I do not deny that within the industry there may have been some problems with regard to this type of import, but at the time of the national emergency in 1962 when surcharges were imposed, the government provided that all goods which were bona fide in transit at the time of the passing of the surcharge order should not be subject to the surcharge.

We are not talking about goods on order. I am talking about goods in transit where the importer cannot do anything about it. The goods are on their way. What are you going to do with the goods that are at sea? Are you going to refuse them and face a diminution of your business reputation and a likely claim in damages from your customers? I will admit that this point I am raising does not have to do directly with section 4(4). It has to do with section 4(1) which is referred to in this particular amendment to the Customs Tariff.

I want to know why in matters of this kind there is the refusal to consider this question of publication. I have mentioned it time and time again. There is the attitude that if you are in the Golden Triangle of Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa you sit in a comfortable pew. You have the advantage of immediate notice. We have this situation under the Immigration Act, and in fact under any number of acts. But people living in British Columbia and in Alberta or on the east coast, particularly now that we have this nonsensical postal system with restrictions on postal deliveries, are at an even greater disadvantage. Why should we be at a disadvantage? Is it simply because we do not live in Ottawa?

I am not complaining about living in Ottawa as such, but I think that businessmen in Vancouver, or Halifax, or Edmonton, or in St. John, Newfoundland should be in the same position vis-à-vis the government as businessmen in Montreal. Toronto and Ottawa. It is for this reason that I am so insistent upon this point. There is, (a) the publication of government orders, and (b), what I think is an entirely unconscionable and unjust action on the part of the government in insisting that extra duty shall be levied on goods imported by a bona fide importer unaware of the quarrel going on between the governments of Singapore and Canada. He is caught, so to speak, as meat in the sandwich.

What makes it doubly bad is that three months later the action taken in May is rescinded because the club has beaten Singapore into some form of submission. But the man who has been hit is the Canadian businessman, and according to the government he should take his lumps. I cannot see what justification can prompt such a decision, and the insistence that what the government has done is right.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would like to hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has repeated in committee some arguments which he put forward in correspondence which he had been exchanging with my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and it is really difficult to go into the matter in detail in these surroundings when it involves reference to correspondence and documentation which I may inform my hon. friend is not before me at this time.

As I said to him when he was beginning his remarks and he was wondering why I was consulting with officials, I did have some recollection of the matter because I happened to see some of the correspondence which my hon. friend had been exchanging recently with my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and I was attempting to identify to them the particular matter which involves, as my hon. friend said, the import of shirts from Singapore. I may say that my initial recollection was Malaysia, probably because at one time Singapore was associated with the country of Malaysia.

As my hon. friend pointed out, the order in question was made pursuant to authority given to the Governor in Council by parliament when it passed the Customs Act. Also, as my hon. friend pointed out, this authority was exercised in a much broader way, but perhaps not in an identical way, by the government of which he was a party in 1962. If I am not mistaken on this earlier occasion Parliament was not in session, just as it was not in session when this order to which he refers was made. On these occasions, the respective Governors in Council were relying on the authority which they felt had been given to them by Parliament when the Customs Act was passed.

I wish to say to my hon. friend that it may be that he has me somewhat at a disadvantage because I do not have the file in front of me and I am trying to speak from memory about a matter with which I was not directly charged from the outset. But perhaps it is fortunate that I did see some of the correspondence, and so I can attempt to comment on the argument he has made here.

I would gather that in publishing the Order in Council in the Canada Gazette the requirements of the law as it existed at that time were met. My colleague, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, and the committee which he chaired has presented the House with a very useful document, the report of the committee on statutory instruments, which may well point the way to changes in the manner in which publication is made of these orders, but this is something to be discussed and perhaps implemented in another forum. In any event, there is something else my hon. friend alluded to which may indicate that something more was done by way of conveying information than he might have thought, and I refer to the issuance of what is commonly known as a "D" memo.

My hon. friend indicated that this may not have come to the attention of the particular firm in question. One would have to look also to see if it came to the attention of the customs broker who acted for that firm. I do not recall whether the firm put the goods through customs in person or used a customs broker. Let us say they used a customs broker. It is likely that every or almost every licensed customs broker in Canada would be a subscriber to the "D" memo service of the department of internal revenue. This is not simply an internal document of the department. It is something which, aside from being used to inform departmental officials, is used to advise those who deal with customs of various changes. The purpose of the "D" memo service is to provide all who subscribe to it with information faster than is possible by means of the press or the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I agree that the customs broker did have the "D" memo, but it had not arrived when the goods were in transit. The first "D" memo may have conceivably arrived only when the first goods were being landed.

Mr. Gray: My hon. friend may have a point in this regard. I have just been informed that the "D" memo in question went out on May 15. What I am trying to do is explain the "D" memo procedure, and inform those on the committee who are interested that it is not simply a matter of waiting until the Canada Gazette comes through to inform those concerned. There is also this other method of informing them more quickly of changes of this type.

Now there is really not too much more that can be added in this particular forum. It may well be that the decision of the government of the time was that the situation was sufficiently serious that very sharp and firm action had to be taken. I gather that after the order was made an agreement was reached with Singapore involving restraints by Singapore on the volume of export of shirts to Canada. I gather that if this arrangement had not been made arising out of the order, serious damage would have been done to Canadian firms and Canadian workers as a result of unfair competition by low cost imports from the country in question.

In any event, my hon. friend has raised, with all the eloquence customary to him, some other matters relative to this particular case. If I am not mistaken he has just recently written to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, about this matter again. These further representations are under consideration and perhaps I might take it upon myself to consult with my colleague about them both as expressed in the letter and as put forward to this committee, to see what further consideration can be given to them.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, while the question of definitions and the difficulties that arise in trying to determine in which category an item falls is being discussed, I should like to bring to the minister's attention a difficulty that has arisen as outlined in a letter which I have received. This concerns, of all things, equipment for eviscerating chickens. It appears that the Department of Agriculture has supplied a definition of what evisceration is. That definition includes the removal of the head and legs. However, those responsible for tariffs do not accept this definition and therefore duty is charged on this equipment as it comes into Canada.

I have sent a letter to the minister outlining the problem and asking him to look into it, but I should like to ask the hon. Minister at this time whether his department has any plans for trying to eliminate these discrepancies in opinion arising between his department and other departments of government.

Mr. Gray: I must confess to my hon. friends on the committee that this is not a field of activity in which I claim any expertise. In saying this, I do not wish to imply that it is not very important to those concerned with the import of this equipment or the millions and millions who enjoy chicken in its various forms. At the same time, I should like to inform him that I will be very happy to look into the matter and consult with members of the Tariff Section of the Department of Finance, and those concerned in the Department of National Revenue, to see if some way cannot be found to resolve such conflicts in interpretation.

One sometimes looks upon tariff matters as being dry and dull, Mr. Chairman, but the point raised by my friend illustrates that almost every facet of Canadian life is touched by tariffs so the subject is rather more colourful and interesting than one might think.

While I am on my feet, perhaps I could take a minute or two to deal with a matter which my friend raised in his remarks on second reading. He raised the question of subsidized import financing in support of goods imported into Canada and its relation to our antidumping law. I should like to inform him that generally speaking goods are considered to be dumped where the normal value is lower than the export price. I am informed by officers of the Department of National Revenue that in the event that normal value or export price was affected by subsidized import financing, the latter would be taken into consideration by the officials of the department who would be carrying on investigations into complaints about the dumping of the goods in question. This may help answer my hon. friend's question and also act as a form of warning to those who feel that they might like to get around our antidumping law by such methods.

My hon. friend made some interesting comments about non-tariff barriers to trade. I should like to remind the committee in dealing with the point raised by the hon. member for Waterloo, that the members of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade decided after the conclusion of the Kennedy Round of tariff negotiations to undertake a study of non-tariff barriers to trade with a view to reduction or elimination of as many of these barriers as possible. Canada is one of the countries taking an active part in this study. A detailed inventory of such barriers has now been compiled and the next stage is to work out solutions to the wide range of problems in this field. This is something of great importance to Canadian trade generally and is one reason why Canada has been taking a leading role in the work of GATT. on non-tariff barriers. We hope to see concrete progress made in this direction through GATT or if necessary through direct contact with the various countries involved.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address a question to the minister. The Globe and Mail of October 10, 1969, carried a story to the effect that the United States had reached an agreement whereby Japan was to free the import of soya bean meal and peanuts for oil production by the end of 1971 and to expand import quotas for sausage, both meat and pork, by 20 per cent. In view of these recent revisions has the government of Canada, within the last year or two, been conducting negotiations with Japan directed to achieving comparative advantages for Canada and, if so, what have been the results?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I do not recall the exact detail of the article which the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has drawn to the attention of the committee. I recall that the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in the House, in answering a question earlier this year, that, certainly, with respect to the treatment by the Japanese government of the import of rapeseed as compared with the import of soybeans, discussions were carried out and I presume continued with the Japanese government. I gather the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated when he answered the question raised in the House, I believe by my hon. friend, that the Japanese had promised to take the Canadian representations in this regard into consideration.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, have no direct negotiations been carried out at, shall we say, the operational level between the two governments with a view to seeking a better deal for the Canadian producers of rapeseed or other agricultural items? In the intervening period, are negotiations being conducted?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, these matters have been raised with the Japanese and I think it is a matter of continuing concern and interest for the officials of the Department of External Affairs and other departments concerned. These are rather delicate matters, and rather than take the risk of prejudicing the contacts that have been under way and are under way, perhaps I could refrain from attempting to give a more detailed answer at this point.

Clauses 2 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A, B, C, D, E, and F agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to give leave now. We have had second reading, so that leave is required. Our consent is conditional on the minister's making a strong effort, which will go beyond the almost superhuman efforts made by my colleague the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh), to produce answers to the respective questions which have been asked. We are not going to hold up this bill now, but I urge the minister, in view of our magnanimity in this connection, to try to provide those answers.

Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-155, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks to explain and describe the nature of the measure before us. This bill is intended to implement the proposal in the budget speech of June 3, 1969, that a tax be imposed on the price of tickets or other charges for carrying passengers by air. As explained by the Minister of Finance at that time, the cost of construction and maintenance of air transportation facilities is very high and, in addition to obtaining revenue from user charges at airports, the government has decided that it is advisable to ask parliament to require individuals who travel by air to pay an amount through what, in effect, will be a special tax to help defray the costs of providing air transportation facilities.

When the proposed tax on tickets or other charges for transporting passengers by air was announced during the June 3 budget statement, the Minister of Finance said:

> We shall wish to consult with the air carriers about detailed problems of defining and administering a measure of this kind.

Therefore, during the preparation of this bill a number of meetings took place between air carriers, their associations and government officials. These meetings were extremely helpful and the bill now before the House reflects a great many of the proposals and suggestions of the carriers concerning the application and administration of the proposed tax.

In devising a tax on tickets and other charges with respect to transporting passengers by air, it was necessary to recognize that the air transportation business, perhaps more than any other, operates across international boundaries on a world wide basis. In many cases, passengers have a free choice between travel on Canadian carriers or those of other countries. It was also necessary to keep in mind that the United States imposes an ad valorem tax on air transportation at the rate of 5 per cent but that it does not at present impose a tax on international air transportation except for flights into Canada and Mexico.

The proposed tax would be what is known as a consumption tax. In other words, it would be imposed on purchases by people in Canada of air transportation. The proposed tax will be in two forms. It will be an ad valorem tax at the rate of 5 per cent on the amount paid for transportation, in certain cases, and a flat dollar amount in certain other cases. The tax, whether ad valorem or flat amount, will be paid at the time when the purchaser of transportation buys a ticket. It would not, therefore, be a departure tax or airport tax to be collected at airports. The 5 per cent ad valorem tax will apply to tickets purchased in Canada for transportation within Canada, to the United States, and to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

The flat tax will be a tax of $5 but it may be reduced by Order in Council to an amount of not less than $2. It would apply to overseas flights where tickets are purchased in Canada for transportation that begins at a point in the taxation area and ends at a point ouside the taxation area. The term "taxation area" is more fully defined, as hon. members will note, in the bill before us. Where an amount is paid for the charter of an aircraft the 5 per cent tax, if applicable, will be on the amount paid by the person or group for the charter of the aircraft and not on the amount paid by each passenger. The flat tax, if applicable, will be calculated on the number of seats in the aircraft. The tax, whether ad valorem or a flat amount, will apply on charter flights that depart from Canada, even if the contract for the charter or the amount for transportation is paid outside Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say I will be pleased to attempt to answer more detailed questions that hon. members may have when the bill is in committee. I, therefore, ask the House to support the measure at the second reading stage.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say we of the official opposition support the principle that those who use the services should be expected to pay for them. However, I do not say that without some qualifications. I wish to point out the principle used by the government in drawing up this bill leaves a great deal to be desired. What is being done is an attempt to recover a basic amount for the provision of certain services by the government of Canada with regard to airports.

The first point I wish to make is that this service varies from one city to another. Regardless of where persons fly from or what their destination is in Canada, they will have to pay on the same basis. Secondly, having an ad valorem tax on tickets again raises a point about which I was complaining during the discussion of the previous bill. The one who is going to have to pay the most is the person who flies the farthest; in other words, the people living at the extremities of the country.

A person living in Edmonton or Calgary will have to pay $10, give or take a few cents, on a ticket to Toronto or Ottawa. During that flight the passenger will use two airports, the point of departure and the point of arrival. A person flying from Toronto to Windsor or London, Ontario, will pay a much lesser amount. In fact, a passenger flying from Toronto to Ottawa on a round trip ticket will pay approximately $1.90 ad valorem. If my memory serves me right, the round trip costs $38, giving a $1.90 ad valorem.

An hon. Member: The rate is $42.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I stand corrected. It would then be $2.10 ad valorem. That passenger would also use two airports, Toronto and Ottawa. The passenger coming from Edmonton or Calgary to Toronto has paid approximately five times as much, but has not used any more facilities. I do not think he has to pay $8 for the communications network, therefore I do not see the reason for this ad valorem tax.

In addition, there are vast areas in this country, such as in the north, where the only means of communication is by air travel. One need only study the schedules of the airlines flying out of Edmonton, Prince Albert or Winnipeg to see the cost of the fares. People living in the District of Mackenzie, in places such as Fort Norman, Fort Simpson and Inuvik, will really have to pay.

The frontier we are now developing is all along the rim of the Arctic. We are sending great numbers of people to the Arctic to look for oil. I am speaking of the west and the Northwest Territories, the whole eastern slope of the Rockies. We are competing, but what is being done? We are being loaded down with another additional cost.

Let me assure hon. members that the Department of Transport provides very rudimentary or almost non-existent facilities, outside of communications, into those areas. Yet a passenger going from Edmonton to a small landing strip with a shack for a passenger terminal, or something a little better although very humble compared to Malton, Dorval or Vancouver airports, has to pay the same as a passenger going from Toronto to Montreal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is the just society.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is a government acting from its comfortable pew. In other words, they are saying, "I am all right, Jack I am in the lifeboat". I could use much rougher terms than that. We intend to make a point of this. I give the government fair notice that we intend to move changes with regard to this type of tax. We are not seeking to change revenues. The minister is entitled to estimate what type of revenue he should get, and what should be the cost to the taxpayers. Here again, I ask for justice on behalf of the taxpayers.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TABLING REPORT OF TASK FORCES ON HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of allowing me to table certain reports?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Haidasz: Under the provision of Standing Order 41(2) I am tabling in English and in French the reports in draft form of the task forces on the costs of health services in Canada.

[Later:]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask the parliamentary secretary if the reports he just tabled have been made available to the conference of provincial doctors and federal people that are meeting here in Ottawa this week?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has made these documents available to the provincial Ministers of Health attending the federal-provincial conference of health ministers.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question. I take it from the parliamentary secretary's reply that this information has been made public before the members of parliament received it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch)—federal buildings—Vancouver—new project and "Project 200"; the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales)—national revenue—delay in federal sales tax audits of companies; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—violent disturbances—Montreal—bombing at Loyola College.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely: public bills.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): There have been certain discussions, Mr. Speaker, and I believe there is general agreement to proceed with Item 8 on the list of public bills and stand the other bills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: They stand at the request of the government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FINE PRINT CLAUSES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved that Bill C-21, to amend the Criminal Code (Fine print clauses), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak in support of my bill I wish to say at once that it was talked out two years ago by very appreciative but also very loquacious members on the government side of the House. In the second place, I realize that there is some provincial legislation in the field in which the bill is intended to operate. Third, I note the fact that we now have a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

My feeling is that the subject matter of this bill could provide that department or some appropriate committee with a subject for study or possible legislation. The purpose of the bill is—and I quote from the explanatory statement I made in the House—to eliminate the trouble which is so often caused by fine print or small type in contracts. The measure would amend the Criminal Code to make illegal the publication of clauses in contracts or deeds printed in small typographical characters with intent to delude the purchaser with respect, for example, to the limitation of benefits. Fine print in this context means type smaller than the main body of the print in the contract. The entire aim is to protect the consumer.

The bill contains two clauses, one setting out the penalties for those found guilty of an offence in line with what is proposed. Anyone found guilty of an indictable offence would be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or to a term of imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment. Second, the expression "small typographical characters" means characters substantially smaller than the size used in the body of the printed matter of the document.

When this bill was discussed, and, unfortunately, talked out earlier, I felt that some hon. members, particularly on the government side, made useful contributions toward refining what is proposed in the bill. For example, the hon. member who is now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), speaking on the measure at that time in 1967 said he thought a good plan would be to identify the small characters in the type of policy contracts and so on by colour rather than by just a reduction in the size of the type. This appears on reflection to be a very practical thought. I would be happy if the general idea put forward in the bill were to be referred to the department for consideration of the minister's suggestion.

I could say a good deal more, but my intention this afternoon is to be as brief as possible. After all, most hon. members have heard this proposal before; whatever they think of it I am sure they are all well aware of what is proposed. I thought the hon. member for Beauce at that time made a good contribution to the discussion when the bill was talked out in 1967. He said he fully agreed with the intent of the bill and hoped that the then proposed department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would study the measure suggested. I would go a little farther than that. I would ask hon. members this afternoon, though I have no hope of the bill being passed, to consider whether it could not reasonably be directed to the attention of the appropriate committee or to the department which he mentioned. I believe that in the area covered by the bill, even if the exact terms of my proposal are not followed, millions of dollars could be saved for many millions of Canadians if there were better regulation of the fine print used in contracts, as I have sought to indicate.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is not very often I get up in this House to be less than complimentary to another hon. member in connection with the introduction of a bill, especially a private member's bill. I was hoping that the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) was rising to say he would like to withdraw the bill. That would have been very kind action and it would have saved me this cruel task—I believe it will be a rational one.

The hon. member was correct when he said this subject had been discussed before. This is, in fact, the third occasion on which almost identical bills have been before us. Today, the hon. member wants this measure to go to a committee where it can be hashed over again even though, as he admits, time has passed by. Small print is no longer of any consequence. We have a Department of Consumer Affairs and, moreover, this happens to be a provincial matter. It seems that someone has dragged the barrel of old bills into a new session. Incidentally, I was checking the numbers of private bills introduced on the Order Paper, and I found that the New Democratic party is responsible for 40 per cent of all the bills presented. I, personally, wonder whether this is the purpose of the assistance they were given—to drag this barrel of all the old bills along and flood the Order Paper with them. Some of the fault lies with Your Honour. It is, I believe, ultimately the responsibility of the Speaker to decide whether or not old bills rehashed several times should even be placed on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Otto: I shall not deal with the aspect of the proposal which has already been pointed out by hon. members on this side to the effect that this is a provincial matter. The hon. member admits that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been saddled with the responsibility of fighting such abuses as he describes. This is not merely a matter of the size of the print. Anyone who suggests that the civil law does not cover this point has simply not studied the law. The hon. member may be surprised to learn that the civil courts have been well ahead of him for 20 years. Anyone who has practised law or who has talked with lawyers would find that the size of the print does not matter at all. If a judge or a civil jury finds that the purpose of anything in a contract, or, possibly, even a parking ticket, is to keep the plaintiff, or the person directly concerned, uninformed, or to defeat the purpose of the contract, or to defraud the person concerned, the fact that it is included in the contract would have no bearing at all on the case. The common law has given credence to exactly what the hon. member now tries to achieve by using the criminal law. I dare the hon. member to give me one case during the last five years where the argument that the inclusion of a fine print clause was meant to hide something, and was given credence by the court, was not thrown out as a defence to the action. I suggest to the hon. member that his bill is a repetition of the existing law.

The nature of man being what it is, it does not seem to matter whether the print is large or small. A few years ago I recall the government of Ontario passing a law that provided that all automobiles sold in Ontario as used cars must bear a certificate stating in half inch block letters whether or not the car was roadworthy. In effect, every car that was from then on sold in Ontario was represented in large block letters as being unroadworthy, yet people bought the cars just the same. I have not seen one certificate in the last four years declaring that a car was roadworthy. This law was ignored until the passage recently of provincial legislation respecting dealerships, which are now compelled to make their cars roadworthy before sale. So, surely the size of the fine print is not the criterion for judging whether we should include the matter within the criminal law, as suggested by the hon. member.

Is it not strange that he and his party have declared that the criminal law must not be applied to those who smash windows, set buildings on fire and use violence, because these people are reformers? Yet today, we see not only the hon. gentleman opposite but also many Canadians declaring that the protection of property does not necessarily involve criminal jurisdiction; that a person who damages property, or even threatens the life and limb of others in the cause of rebellion, should not be judged according to our criminal law. They also declare that use of drugs should not be a criminal matter.

The hon. member is saying, in effect, that those who throw Molotov cocktails while parading in Montreal, Vancouver, or on university campuses should not be charged with criminal offences because they are acting in the cause of rebellion. Yet someone who prints a contract containing a clause in fine print may, if the hon. member's bill passes, be sent to jail for three months. The hon. member cannot have it both ways. I am not suggesting for one moment that in protecting private property one is justified in committing assault; whether the theft of private property is punishable by imprisonment is something for the court to decide.

I suggest this bill would further restrict the provisions of the Criminal Code. Today, we can be sent to prison for refusing to take a breathalyzer test. There are also provisions relating to impaired driving, but I do not drive. Although the Criminal Code is embracing new concepts, at the same time I feel we are restricting it. If the hon. member's bill were adopted, then what about such matters as riding a bicycle on the wrong side of the road?

With regard to false and misleading advertising, the question of what is false and misleading has not yet been decided. If someone were to sell me a product which he claimed was the best available on the market, and a month later I found one that was better, would this person go to jail? Of course not.

Not only would the incorporation of this provision into our criminal legislation be reversing the trend today; this matter is already being taken care of by other government departments. We are all aware that some people continue to promote ideas even though the world has passed them by. I am reminded of those young "Turks" who 35 years ago were disciples of John Maynard Keynes. Today these disciples are in power and are plugging the concepts of Keynes for all they are worth. The fact that they have no relevance to today's society does not faze them. Neither is the hon. member fazed by the fact that he is proposing a measure that he admits does not come within federal jurisdiction. As I say, the point is already covered by the common law.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat, may I ask him a question? From what he has said, am I right in determining that he does not agree with the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who has said that this bill has merit but that the print should be coloured print rather than fine print?

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, the minister was kind. I am not.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member who introduced the bill before us and to the member who spoke after him.

As the representative in the House of a part of the population, I think the matter to be debated has two sides, as do most of the problems submitted to us.

On the one hand, I cannot help but congratulate very warmly the sponsor of the bill which aims primarily at protecting the Canadian consumer, since particularly in the last few years, we have paid attention to the problem.

That aspect of commercial, insurance and loan companies contracts is the one that should be examined by the government and more especially by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). Indeed, I also feel that the form of those contracts raises every day some problems for the purchaser or the policy-holder.

It is often stated that those who buy insurance do not take the time to get acquainted with the terms of their contract. The reason is that those contracts are quite elaborate and that certain clauses appear in fine print. If such contracts were drafted in a plainer and clearer style, they would contribute to protect the citizens.

On the other hand, I notice that the hon. member has introduced this bill several times in recent years and I have the impression that he always does it in the same way.

A moment ago I was reading the speeches made last February in connection with this bill and I realize that the member is again introducing his bill in the same way, supporting it with nearly identical arguments except that he acknowledges the provincial jurisdiction and the part played in this field by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) could have given more details on the nature of discrepancies or other weaknesses inherent in these contracts. He should have given examples and been more explicit as this would have made it easier for us to offer sound criticism.

The government has a part to play as regards the protection of the public in most cases where goods and services are bought. I feel that if we study existing legislation, whether provincial or federal, we realize that certain laws contain provisions to protect the public in this matter.

Perhaps the member goes too far in always presenting his bill the same way. The creation of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs seems to be a striking example of the fact that mostly in the last few years the government has developed an increasing awareness of its responsibilities which it is ready to assume fully.

Does the problem come solely under federal jurisdiction? Although I am certainly not competent to express an opinion in this regard, it is my modest personal view that the provinces, even if they do not have a strong say in the matter, should at least assume responsibility for providing legislation to solve problems which might arise in this area.

I believe all the provinces of Canada have adopted such laws.

However, I also know that several professional groups in Canada have formed associations, not for the protection of their members, but primarily to protect the public against potential abuse on the part of members of associations or corporations.

Moreover, I know that insurance agents throughout Canada have joined professional associations and that insurance companies, as well as insurance agents both individually and in small groups are increasingly making continued and serious efforts in order to improve the general skill of their members so as to serve the public better.

It is a fact that, in Canada, the federal government, the provincial governments and several associations are on the lookout for those problems and keep a continuous watch so as to protect the public.

It also seems that if Canadians wish, for instance, to buy insurance policies or to benefit from advantages offered by finance companies or others, they can get information on what they buy and on what they are getting into through the news media, namely TV, newspapers and advertising handouts, which are becoming more efficient every day. I have in mind here a certain kind of advertising finance companies usually go for.

Further more, every year, in each region, the agent who has sold more than a million dollars' worth of insurance receives some kind of honour. In my opinion, besides stimulating the agent who earns his living by doing advertising insurance companies, that indirectly makes the public aware that such an agent is trustworthy because many citizens relied on him during the year by passing on to him their insurance problems.

I am no lawyer, but nevertheless, when I see the ways of our society, I find that the citizen is protected by provincial laws in this respect and that he can also resort to civil courts. Lawyers claim it is easier to resort to civil courts than to criminal ones in that connection.

I was saying at the beginning of my remarks that both sides of the medal had to be considered. Indeed, we all are in favour of protecting the consumer and we all wish for serious steps to be taken for that purpose. For some time, in various places and in government circles, people have been talking about protecting the consumer and putting a ceiling on prices and wages. More and more we wish to consider the difficult problems with which the consumers are grappling; however, if the question comes up under the aspect referred to in this bill, the hon. member should have been more explicit and shown more originality.

I hope that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs also will consider that problem, as well as the officials of his department and the other hon. members. Indeed, it would be advisable to have this bill amended in committee, so as to make it more workable.

One detail in the speech of the hon. member has struck me. He stresses that some members would have tried in the past to kill his bill and that the same thing is happening again. In my opinion he gives too much importance to this matter because he knows the procedure concerning those bills. In my humble opinion the way we discuss this bill and other similar bills is positive and efficient because it has at least the result of drawing the attention of the members to these problems. This can be a good thing for the welfare and the happiness of the Canadian people. It is also possible to focus the attention of the government which will study these proposals again later to adopt effective measures.

If the hon. member accuses us of trying, sometimes, to kill such bills, I could briefly allude to the role played by some of his colleagues when they try, to the disadvantage of the consumers they sincerely want to protect, to delay the passing of certain private bills whose basic aim is precisely to protect the consumers.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few words on bill C-21 with which we are now dealing.

First I congratulate the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) who wants by this bill to protect those who buy insurance through a printed contract under conditions laid down by the Civil Code.

I believe this bill to be important but incomplete. As the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. LeBlanc) said, this bill has been discussed several times and always in the same or nearly the same way.

The text of the bill says, and I quote:

—Everyone who, with intent to mislead—

It is very difficult to know whether or not the company intended to mislead in printing clauses in small typographical character.

If the hon. member for Surrey really wants to help the public, he should eliminate, as far as he can, the possibilities of legal proceedings.

It would seem that this bill is nothing but a trap enabling anyone to make a charge of fraud against any finance company, insurance company or any other company. As for insurance companies, the clauses of their contracts should be more explicit. To show that such contracts are very difficult to understand, I shall take the liberty to read the statutory conditions related to fire insurance in the province of Quebec, and I quote section 16:

Should any disagreement arise as to the value of the insured property, of the property saved or as to the amount of the loss, such value or amount and the proportion (if any) that the company will have to disburse shall be submitted (whether the right to recover under the policy is discussed or not, and independently from all other questions) to the arbitration of a person chosen by both parties, or, if they cannot come to an agreement, then to the arbitration of three persons, one to be chosen by the insured, another by the company and the third by the first two persons chosen or, if they cannot come to an agreement, by a judge of the Superior Court sitting in the district where the loss happened; and such arbitration is subject to the provisions of article 1431 and following article of the Code of Civil Procedure. If the company is otherwise bound, the decision of the arbitrators will be final regarding the amount of the loss and the proportion the company shall pay. In the case where the full amount of the claim is granted, the costs will be paid accordingly, and, in all other cases, all matters of costs will be left to the arbitrators.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand any of this. I am a licenced insurance agent and even if I tried to explain it to a client, I would not succeed. Even if it were written in large print, such as is used on the first page of a policy, I think it would not be any easier to explain.

The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) should, through his bill, ensure that such contracts are more precise.

I believe that contract clauses should not come under the Criminal Code, because, generally, they are signed by two willing parties who are aware of the commitments they are making.

I do not support the bill, because I believe that such contracts are already complicated enough without having to ask oneself whether the contracting parties had the intention to mislead.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I am to congratulate the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) for introducing this bill, I do so mainly because of his patience and perseverance, for this bill was not passed by hon. members when it came before the House in 1967 and 1969. Hon. members were right in so doing, as it seems evident that this bill to amend the Criminal Code deals mainly with a provincial and civil law matter.

However, the hon. member's objectives certainly are very praiseworthy, for if this bill succeeds in calling public attention to the danger of signing contracts whose meaning one understands only when they have been signed, the bill will have achieved, together with the relevant discussion, a useful purpose.

The hon. member likely wants to draw attention of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the need to warn the public against this danger.

The explanatory notes say that insurance companies should be prohibited from embodying in their contracts fine print clauses. I think the problem is real, even if the hon. member never mentioned specific cases. As a matter of fact, I have often noted that people almost never read contracts, and even less insurance policies. Even the clauses printed in large characters are difficult to understand, except for lawyers specializing in this field. Other people rely on the salesmen to explain to them the terms of the contract.

The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) is nodding his agreement. He sells insurance and he knows what I mean.

Whenever a disaster or an accident occurs, people wake up; they try to understand what is happening and get in touch with their insurance broker or their lawyer.

I believe that the goal being sought by my hon. friend is indeed commendable, but that the bill itself is rather inadequate, especially as concerns amending the Criminal Code. Let us refer to the terms used in section 328A to be inserted.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Sub-clause (2) reads as follows:

—the expression "small typographical character" means a typographical character that is substantially smaller than the one used in the body of the printed matter of the document.

I find this somewhat vague. What would happen, for instance, if the whole contract were printed in such typographical characters? The said section would then have very little meaning.

I would prefer the suggestion of the hon. member. The essential clauses in insurance policies, intended to exclude the liability, should be printed in different characters and in red in order to call the attention of the contracting parties, because as a rule they are not included in the statutory terms of insurance policies. Certain clauses are particularly important for the insured or for a party to a contract of another nature, whether it be an instalment or financing contract. In fact, the citizens do not realize, for instance, that they have one year only to file a claim and that they have barely a few weeks to produce a proof under oath in support of a claim. Failure to meet these conditions might cause the insured to lose some of his rights. Therefore, it would be important if for instance one could easily take note of these conditions.

They should be underlined or printed in another colour in order to call the attention of the contracting parties because, although they might consult a lawyer or an insurance broker, the time for their appeal might have lapsed. This suggestion could be usefully considered if we wish to protect the consumers and the insured public.

The bill deals with an indictable offence. That might be going a little too far. If we had really wanted to amend the Criminal Code, it might have been better to make it an offence punishable on summary conviction, since the penalty provided in this case does not seem as severe as that provided for an offence punishable on summary conviction. Furthermore, the bill says and I quote:

Everyone who, with intent to mislead, prints or causes to print in small typographical character.

Therefore, the offence would lie in the fact that someone prints or causes to print something. I cannot understand how this is an offence. The offence would rather consist in distributing or selling any article under a contract written in fine print.

Where deceit is the obvious purpose, we must not forget that the Criminal Code provides for the real cases of fraud, and legal action can be taken against the person who, in a deliberate attempt to deceive would have made people buy, for instance, an article under false representations. This happens often but does not apply so much to insurance contracts which, in general, are pretty standard and in which there is no false representations. This applies especially to the contracts used by canvassers who sell articles under false representations and who make people buy lots in Florida, sewing machines or family trees. They often tell people that they are not really buying anything, that they are not committing themselves to anything, while the latter end up by signing a contract, probably with full knowledge of the facts.

The Criminal Code and even the Civil Code provide for the annulment of a contract in case of fraud.

But the main objection to the bill is that its purpose falls within provincial jurisdiction. It therefore behoves the provincial authorities to pass legislation to protect those who sign such contracts and to set the rules governing all contracts, but more particularly insurance contracts. Insurance companies are members of responsible associations such as the Federation of insurance agents and insurance companies. There are also insurance superintendents. Most of the provinces have adopted laws and regulations on insurance. To my mind, and generally speaking, the public is well enough protected in that field.

The legislative assemblies are authorized to legislate on this matter. I maintain that the hon. member did well to draw those cases to the attention of the public. Indeed, he has done useful work and we trust that the people will be grateful to him for it But, though he is entitled to our congratulations, I do not feel that we can adopt this bill or refer it to a committee.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the arguments put forward by my colleagues and I would merely like to endorse a few of them.

People who intend to mislead may do so whether the print used is large or small.

However, I can understand that the consumer's first reaction may be to resort to such an excuse when he has been fooled, as we say. The first excuse that comes to his mind is that he had not read the contract. Even if the contract had been read and re-read to him, he will always resort to the same excuse. The one who was fooled by some contract always claims that the clauses were in very fine print and that he signed it without question because the print was too small to be read.

I do not believe we could do away with fraud by passing this bill. That is why I found sensible the argument put forward by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), namely that the size of the print does not matter, what matters is that one should understand the clauses of a contract. That is the point to be considered, for whenever a person feels wronged by the terms of a duly signed contract, it is not because of the fine print of the clauses but because the wording was incomprehensible or ambiguous, since anyone could give it any meaning he wished.

It is through the purposely unintelligible wording of contracts that people are misled and not because of the size of the print. This, however, is quite likely to happen, and some take advantage of the small print to insert clauses which are not to the advantages of the customer.

When we deal with such matters, we must protect the customer by looking more fully into the problems and by finding ways of detecting real fraud. People claim they are fooled because of the fine print as a pretext for refusing to sign a contract. In some cases, the fact that fine print is used does indeed protect the people who then use it as a pretext.

I am far from denying the merits of the bill introduced by the hon. member. Of course, we all want to protect the consumer. But that is not the real problem, and whether there is a problem or not, it is up to the provincial governments to solve them.

• (5:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, while I fully support the principles which prompted the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) to introduce this bill, I do not think the bill properly deals with the problem. As a matter of fact, I think it is a bad bill because the fine is not large enough. Under this bill a man could be in the class of which the hon. member complains, pay the fine or undergo the penalty and still make a great deal of money. This is a very important problem and one with which I have dealt many times in my practice as a lawyer in cases where people were duped by big business because of clauses in contracts; and not only big business, but firms like jewellers, dry cleaners, etc. I acted in a case concerning a ski-tow that involved many thousands of dollars. It was written on the tow ticket that all fault and responsibility was excluded. A young boy went on the ski-tow and was injured, fracturing his skull, his back and many other parts of his body. The company tried to get out of its responsibility because it was written on the ticket, which is a contract, in big print that they would not be responsible.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this type of bill will not meet the problem. We need to bar any exclusion of responsibility in written contracts, whether they are big or small. I do not think that anybody in business should be able to make a profit out of exclusion from fault or responsibility. I do not think this bill covers the problem. It is true that in the courts of some provinces this type of clause excluding responsibility or fault has been outlawed, but they have not gone far enough.

I think that if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) proceeds with the policy he has enunciated, it will fill the gap. There are those who argue against this proposition and cite the principle of caveat emptor, "Let the buyer beware", stating that when a man enters into any kind of agreement or contract he should realize what he is doing and bear full responsibility for it. We know that the services and goods sold on the market today are so technical and so complex—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-155, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, at the five o'clock adjournment I had discussed in part those aspects of the principle of the bill that I wish to cover at this stage of the debate. I emphasize once more that the opposition has no basic objection to having the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) recover some of the costs of operating Department of Transport airports and related services from persons using those services and airports. However, I had indicated my objection to the principle of an ad valorem tax on tickets which is based on the quantum of the ticket. This principle will throw a disproportionate burden on those persons who are flying long distances and it will adversely affect the sparsely settled areas of the country, particularly the north and the mountain areas where a good deal of flying is done but at high cost. Minimal facilities are provided there by the Department of Transport.

Therefore, I would feel it preferable to collect a flat rate from every passenger, as is done at many airports in foreign countries. As a matter of fact, that is what is proposed to be done with regard to passengers leaving on flights overseas. I think it would be much simpler if there were an agreed charge: While some people might object that those on relatively short flights are paying a higher incidence of tax than those on longer flights, it seems to me that the same revenue would accrue to the government from an average and fairly minimal charge. I do not know what the experience will be as to what should be the average charge, but I am sure it will not be disproportionate to the 5 per cent charge to the great bulk of passengers who fly on shorter, commuter routes in Canada.

Having examined the bill, I feel that the government is imposing on business and industry the entire cost of collecting this tax. To my mind the airline companies, particularly the smaller ones, will have the burden imposed on them of collecting and remitting the tax. If you look at the bill itself, Mr. Speaker, you will find that quite a burden is imposed upon every airline that will be subject to the tax. I say airline, but some of them will be merely air services.

On examining the bill, you will see that a licensed air carrier has the duty of collecting the tax which is a debt to Her Majesty. There must be a monthly return in respect of taxes. In fact, there must be a nil return in those cases where services which are operating in the much more thinly populated regions of the country cannot, between seasons, carry any passengers; they have to file a nil return. There are severe penalties for default. I am sure that if I were to examine all the fine print in the bill and read all the regulations it is proposed to pass, I would discover that a trust will be imposed on the moneys in the hands of the licensed carrier. These moneys are collected on behalf of Her Majesty. Therefore, they fall into the same category as all other forms of taxes that are collected and receive a certain priority.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the government could quite easily make some adjustment based upon the quantum of taxes being remitted, in order to pay for these services. This tax money will amount to quite a large amount. But here we go again: the government wants money and it is telling the businessmen involved, "You are going to pay for the cost of collecting this tax." I think it is about time the government paid to have these taxes collected. We find that in the bill this is the businessman's responsibility. I submit that it is the responsibility of the government and is not the responsibility of the businessmen concerned. I hope there will be some changes in this regard.

I think other members of the opposition wish to make remarks on this bill, and I am sure some government backbenchers will wish to speak to it. I invite comments from hon. members such as the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) and those representing the developing regions of Quebec and Ontario. I think we all wish to see how they react to this 5 per cent surcharge on almost the only, and very essential, form of transportation in their constituencies, transportation which covers not only business but pleasure and the development of their areas. If they think this is a fair impost, I should like to hear them say so, in order that their constituents may consider the position of those hon. members.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it has been my experience that one can criticize the Liberal Party in almost any way as long as you give its members credit for being businesslike. If there is anything this government is proud about, it is that it runs a businesslike operation. The Liberals think they know how to run the country. Mr. Speaker, I suggest in very mild terms that they are disastrous as businessmen. All the time they feed us with phony propositions, as if we cannot see through them. This bill is another of those propositions.

Who is going to be paying this tax? Let us face up to the situation. The government starts by saying that some of the deficits in operating airports have to be recovered. I believe the deficit is in the neighbourhood of $57 million. This proposal, if passed, will bring in another $20 million and will still leave a deficit of $37 million on the operation. It has been in the past, and will continue to be, a subsidy to business. It has always been of this nature and no one is really taking any exception to this.

When this government hands out some old age pensions it thinks it is doing a great job, but it does it in a very meagre way. The government says, "We are subsidizing the poor, and we should not do so much subsidizing". But when the government subsidizes the rich, it does not count for much. This situation has been continuing for a long time and will go on even after this legislation is passed, if it is the disposition of the House to pass it.

The only people who will pay this 5 per cent tax are those in groups which charter flights, because that form of air travel is all they can really afford. I have experience of many of these groups. They consist of people who have saved for years in order to get back to the old country and visit their relatives and friends. They travel on these flights because of their relatively low cost. These are the people who will pay more. There is no way they can pass off this 5 per cent tax, just as there is no way they can pass off the airline ticket. That is part of the double standard of taxation in Canada.

What difference does it make to the businessman if we add another 5 per cent to his airline ticket? The whole amount was deductible before, and it will still be deductible. The government will be paying part of those costs. If it is not the government which pays, the additional tax will be reflected in higher prices being charged by the company concerned. The same pretence is being made here, namely, that we are trying to put airport operations on a paying basis. In fact, the subsidy is simply being transferred from one point where it is very visible to another point where it is not so visible, because of our tax system.

This is not the only thing the tax system conceals, but it is an example of how these things get swallowed up in a tax system. The government will either lose revenue or prices will rise to take care of this situation. This is a sort of peanuts operation the government is running. What is particularly infuriating is that there was an opportunity in the past —and the opportunity still exists—for the government to recover large sums of money which could have been applied against the operating losses of airports. I am referring to the fact that we started off in Canada with a solitary airline, Air Canada. The minute it started to do well, the government introduced a competitor. Every time they appear to be doing fairly well, the government makes certain there is a competitor to interfere with its operation. We in this party believe it is far more effective and businesslike to run airlines on an efficient, profitable basis rather than embarking upon the kind of taxation gerrymandering that is being suggested in this piece of legislation.

We in this party believe that the government has an obligation to state clearly its policy with respect to Air Canada and to end the uncertainty and speculation that has placed a cloud on the future of Air Canada. The impression persists that the Liberal government, with its usual concern for the interest of big business, is preparing to hand over all or part of Air Canada to private ownership. The chairman of Air Canada, appointed by this government, began his term of office in January by openly advocating the merger of Air Canada with Canadian Pacific Airlines. Had he suggested we take over Canadian Pacific Airlines, as we should, that would have been something else. They never should have been allowed in the field. The idea of a merger will not appeal to the taxpayers of this country. The week after that statement was made, Canadian Pacific was authorized to increase its transcontinental service from two daily flights in each direction to five, perhaps the most ill-timed administrative decision in Canadian history.

One would assume that if a merger was really under consideration, the government would do nothing in the interval to strengthen the hand of Canadian Pacific. Instead, the government and the Canadian Transport Commission, headed by a former Liberal minister of transport, have placed Canadian Pacific in a position in which to demand a larger share of the ownership and control of the merged airline in the event that a merger takes place. We cannot help viewing these events in light of the fact that the Minister without Portfolio from Manitoba (Mr. Richardson), who has been placed in charge of air transport policy by this government, until recently was a director of Canadian Pacific and a major holder of its common stock.

We do not dispute Mr. Pratte's claim that money would be saved by having a single transcontinental and international airline. Unlike the Liberals, we have consistently adhered to that position. We have also insisted that that airline remain under public ownership. Since the public pays for the construction of airports and in effect subsidizes the whole industry, private entrepreneurs must not be allowed to reap a major share of the profits. We know that in a thinly populated country it makes no sense to have two airlines trying to duplicate one another's schedules, particularly when Air Canada will within two years be operating aircraft which have twice the seating capacity of those now in service. Duplication of service reduces load factors and increases costs, and we note with concern that the major airlines are rumoured to be considering another increase in domestic fares. On top of that there will be this additional 5 per cent tax.

On the other hand, we must point out that the uneconomic situation which exists did not arise mysteriously from natural causes; it is the result of deliberate government policy over a period of more than 20 years. Under both Liberal and Conservative governments the only consistent principle behind our air transport policy seems to have been concern for the interests of Canadian Pacific. The unstated assumption has been that Canadian Pacific has a natural right to as large a share of the air transportation market as can be given to it, at Air Canada's expense, without placing Air Canada in an over-all deficit position.

Canadian Pacific became an international airline because of the decision of a Liberal government in 1948. That decision, which reversed Mackenzie King's policy of keeping international air routes in public hands, was announced a few days after Parliament had adjourned—and nothing seems to have changed since then—so that the government could avoid parliamentary criticism of its actions. In his comparative study of the relations between governments and airlines David Corbett, an Australian political scientist, notes that this decision "marked the declining influence of Mackenzie King in the Liberal cabinet as his retirement approached in 1948, and the rising power of the friends of the businessman in the Liberal Party". That power continued to rise in the following years and Canadian Pacific was permitted to extend its routes from the Pacific to Europe and Latin America. Canadian Pacific became a transcontinental airline as a result of a decision made and announced by the Conservative government during the 1958 election campaign.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank goodness it was.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, now you will be paying an extra 5 per cent. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is arguing against the necessity of imposing a 5 per cent increase to defray the cost of airports. We could have had this as profit from Air Canada had we not introduced unnecessary competition.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Max, you sit in a comfortable pew.

Mr. Saltsman: Although the decision was arrived at in principle before any study of its economic implications could be made, the government commissioned Mr. Wheatcroft to prepare the first of his famous reports on airline competition in Canada. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), who was then minister of transport, told Mr. Wheatcroft that in his view "The time has come for the introduction of some measure of competition on our transcontinental routes".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must say I am having some difficulty relating his remarks to the bill before the House. As I understand it, the bill is designed to amend the Excise Tax Act. As the hon. member knows, I am prepared in all these matters to give him the benefit of the doubt, but it does seem the remarks he has been delivering go well beyond the scope of this bill and deal with a matter which is quite extraneous to the bill.

Mr. Saltsman: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that we are opposing the present tax measure. We are suggesting an alternative to the present proposal and we are trying to support our position which is, simply, that if there was one public carrier in Canada, that carrier would be more profitable and this country would be able to save the 5 per cent tax now proposed. I hope, Mr. Speaker, you appreciate my position; I have to outline the way in which I believe this could come about. The Wheatcroft report discovered, however, that exposing the publicly-owned airline to transcontinental competition would wipe out the profits on that service needed to cover the losses on its other domestic services. This situation was not expected to change for several years.

In January, 1959, the minister announced his acceptance of a recommendation by the Air Transport Board that CPA be allowed to operate one daily transcontinental flight. In this curious recommendation the board found that additional transcontinental air services would have a major detrimental effect on existing operations, but overruled its own conclusions on the peculiar grounds that Canadian Pacific's position as an international air carrier needed strengthening. The transcontinental flight was supposed to serve this purpose by connecting its existing international operations.

The inauguration of the CPA service diverted traffic from the publicly-owned airline without increasing the total volume of traffic, and contributed to massive deficits suffered by both airlines over the next few years. In 1960 even the Liberal members of this House voted to condemn the government for unnecessary duplication of domestic transcontinental airline services which denied TCA the opportunity to implement a further reduction in fares. But once they returned to office in 1963 the Liberals reverted to old habits.

Rumours of an impending merger between the two airlines began to circulate as early as 1961. In February, 1964, a Liberal member proposed on the floor of this House that they be merged, with Canadian Pacific holding 50 per cent of the stock in the successor corporation. Considering the relative size of the two airlines at the time, this would have been quite a bargain for CPR shareholders. It is interesting to recall that when the proposal to establish a national airline was first advanced, CPA was offered an opportunity to take part as an equal partner. But it felt the deal was not good enough, and declined to do so. However, once the Canadian people had gone through the agony of building up the airline, the airports and the entire infrastructure required for the operation, CPA became terribly interested. In other words, its attitude was: let the people of Canada take all the risks and we shall come in for the gravy.

I suggest this type of operation has led to deficits in the operations of our airports—this tendency to let private enterprise take the gravy when it was there to take, while continuing to pick up necessary expenses by using the public purse. In 1965 the Liberal government established spheres of influence for the international services of the two airlines which in effect confined Air Canada to its existing routes in northern Europe and the Caribbean while throwing the rest of the world open to Canadian Pacific. The allocation of the United States market was postponed until after the negotiation of a bilateral agreement with that country, but in 1966 Canadian Pacific was given the route from Vancouver to San Francisco. Whether this was in return for services to the Liberal Party or to the country is not clear from the records.

Also in 1965, Mr. Pickersgill announced that the government would employ a consultant, to advise, and I quote, "whether the growth of domestic main line service would now permit some further degree of competition on that basis and, if so, to recommend a suitable procedure for working out, from time to time, such extensions of service." Mr. Wheatcroft was again hired as the government's consultant, and presented his second report to the minister some time before April 4, 1966. The second Wheatcroft report, unlike the first, has for some reason never been released to the public. According to the Financial Times of April 3, 1967, it found that the establishment of competition on the transcontinental route had neither improved the efficiency of the service nor generated additional traffic. The implication is clear that it recommended against further increases in competition and that it has been kept secret for this reason.

Nevertheless, on March 27, 1967, nearly a year after he admitted receiving the report and five days after Parliament adjourned for the Easter recess, Mr. Pickersgill made a statement of policy concerning the transcontinental airline service: Canadian Pacific would be permitted to increase its service immediately to two daily flights and, beginning in 1969, it would be permitted to occupy 25 per cent of the market. On February 5, 1969, it was announced that Canadian Pacific would be permitted to increase its service to five daily flights in each direction. Since Air Canada has only ten flights, this will constitute 33 per cent of the market, rather than 25 per cent. So a series of political decisions has transformed the CPA from a small regional carrier into a major transcontinental and international airline.

Successive governments have deliberately created this situation and justified it with reference to the presumed benefits of competition. If the Liberal government now reverses its stand and eliminates competition by merging the two lines, it will have been party to a scandal unprecedented in our history. In effect, half of the airline owned by the Canadian people will have been turned over to the CPR free of charge, first by gradually allocating routes to Canadian Pacific at Air Canada's expense and then by merging the two on a basis of equality. This can only encourage elements in the business community to make even more outrageous demands. Already an editorial in the Financial Post of January 11, 1969, has demanded that the whole air transport industry be handed over to private interests, with the government completely liquidating its ownership of Air Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Again I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I must say my doubts are stronger now than they were when I first interrupted him. He really is in the area of air transport policy; it does appear to me that he is well beyond the scope of the bill before us. I have been as generous as I can; indeed, I have probably been too generous. I now invite the hon. member to bring his present line of argument to a close, bearing in mind that the rule of relevancy, though often difficult to apply, requires that debate relate directly to what is before the House. At the moment, it is an amendment to the Excise Tax Act which is before use. As I review the explanatory notes, I must say I have difficulty in reconciling the hon. member's argument with the contents of the bill.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a few more words which will conclude this portion of my argument. However, I wish to assure Your Honour that when a tax is brought in which will affect every passenger who uses the airline service, it must be considered part of air transportation policy. Although it may in this case fall under the direct responsibility of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), it will have an effect on transportation policy and this is why I have discussed it in a somewhat wider context than usual.

I conclude with these remarks: We in this party will do our utmost to ensure that the Canadian people are not deprived of their national airline through a series of cynical bargains with private interests. We will demand that Air Canada shall not be deprived of the opportunity to prosper and expand while making low-cost transportation available to its real owners, the people of this country. We will resist any fallacious argument which claims that the transfer of this great public resource to private interests is either necessary or desirable. Most of the world's great airlines, outside of the United States, are in public hands. With the support to which they are entitled from their respective governments they can meet the challenge of the supersonic era.

We in this country have suffered too much at the hands of innefficient private enterprise. We have an airline of which we can be enormously proud. Despite all the roadblocks which have been put in the way of Air Canada, it is still one of the great airlines of the world. We in this party cannot see our way clear to vote for this obvious camouflage, this 5 per cent surtax, to cover up the consequences of the inefficient stupidity of the policy followed by the government in connection with air transportation in this country.

• (8:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, because as all other members, I should like us to proceed as quickly as possible to the consideration of other government bills, because we have a very full legislative program.

Bill C-155 is no more no less than the levying of a new tax on air travel.

The minister will have, I believe, the opportunity to tell us how much that new tax will bring in and how the government will use the millions thus collected.

I would like to draw the attention of the Minister to the following text: Air travel is the mode of transportation used more and more by businessmen. It is a fast and therefore should be used not only by the inhabitants of big cities, but also by those of the areas that the governments are trying to develop.

Yet, in the region I have the honour to represent, there are problems concerning landing strips and if I were sure that the amounts the government intends to get through this new tax would be used to enlarge landing strips at municipal airports, it would not be so bad. It would still be a tax, but at least one would know that it would be used to improve difficult situations.

In my opinion the government should answer these questions because as it has examined all aspects of this problem, it should certainly be able to do so.

Nevertheless, the most practical solution is that suggested by the Ralliement créditiste members who always use the same hammer to drive in the same nail. The harder and longer it is, the harder they must strike. If the government thinks that a new tax would be the ideal solution, I repeat that consumers will have less money in their pockets. There will be charges which will very often be added to production costs. So the consumers of goods and services will again have to pay the total cost.

I know that the government needs money for its projects, a few of which though under way are temporarily stopped due to lack of funds. In my opinion it would be to the advantage of the government to study once more the possibility of using the Bank of Canada for this purpose.

This tax revenue the government obtains from consumers originated somewhere, so could not the government discover that new money can also exist in the form of services, instead of debts.

That is why I urge the sponsor of the bill to seriously consider our suggestion. Unless very specific replies as to the use of these funds are forthcoming, I must necessarily oppose this new tax because it is the taxpayers who will be paying the piper, and they are all already complaining about not having enough money.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, we have before us an amendment to the Excise Tax Act to authorize an air transportation tax of two kinds, one consisting of a 5 per cent ad valorem tax for transportation to areas spelled out in the bill—including Canada, the United States, except Hawaii, and St. Pierre and Miquelon—and another tax applied on a straight per capita basis on travel to all offshore areas.

I think the introduction of an amendment of this kind demands that the minister supply the House with justification for imposing such a tax. In this regard I think we in the House are becoming very slipshod. The government states that money must be collected for this, that or the other purpose without justifying the need. I think the members of this House should be told why the imposition of this tax is necessary.

The minister has not revealed the amount of money that is required to be raised, or to what use the money is to be put. I should like to know whether the money will be deposited in the consolidated revenue fund, or into a special trust fund created for the specific purpose of providing funds to meet the cost of construction and maintenance of airports. I would be remiss if I did not remind the House that when the Conservatives were in office several airports were built. For example, we had to meet the bill for four airports, Dorval, Malton, Winnipeg and Edmonton, all beautiful, large airports which were constructed without the necessity of imposing a tax of this kind on the taxpayers of Canada. We on this side of the House support the principle that he who uses should pay. In other words, those who use the airports should pay for their construction and maintenance. I do not think those Canadians who live in isolated parts of Canada and who seldom use airport facilities should be expected to pay for these facilities.

If the principle of taxing those who use the airports is a correct one, how will it be applied? According to this amendment, 5 per cent will be added to the cost of an air ticket. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out that a person who travelled return from, say, Toronto to Ottawa would pay a tax of $2.10, which is 5 per cent of the air fare, whereas a person travelling from Toronto to Vancouver, taxed on the same basis, would pay five or six times as much.

Let us just analyse this situation. A person travelling between two airports, regardless of the length of his journey, occupies the same number of square feet at the airport terminal, uses the same parking space area and requires the same checking facilities and rest rooms, use of restaurant, and so on, as a person who travels the short distance from Ottawa to Toronto. So I think it would be a much fairer assessment if it were on a per head basis across the board. Everybody would then pay the same. The arguments I have put forth for this proposition are, I think, sound and reasonable. The United States have imposed a 5 per cent transportation charge, and they are not satisfied with it; there is great political pressure to have it changed. One of the greatest arguments against it is put in the form of a question. They ask: Why should the long-haul passenger be subsidizing the short-haul passenger?

When the time comes to revise air transportation rates, people will sit down around the table and discuss the situation. They will realize that a passenger on a short trip will be paying only $2.10 in tax. One can visualize their coming to the conclusion that the rate can be increased, but not to the long-distance passenger. I am trying to visualize what might happen when the time comes to make adjustments in the rates.

Nothing was said about whether this tax would apply to air freight or express. Perhaps the minister did say something about that, but I did not hear him. It is apparently left to the Governor in Council, or the cabinet, in respect of overseas charges; they will decide whether the tax is to be $2 or $5. Surely it would be better for us to know now what the rates will be. Let us establish them now so that we are not buying a pig in a bag, as it were. Those are some of the points that come to my mind. I hope there will be a free-wheeling discussion during the debate on this subject and that all hon. members will have a chance to take part in it.

Let me quote from the Financial Times of Canada, the November 24 issue, which says in part:

> Transport department officials suggest the tax would bring in $20 million in new revenue to the government.

That is a lot of money. At this moment I think we might ask whether, with the invention of the short take-off aircraft which has proven capable of taking off in a fraction of the distance now required, this extra revenue will be needed to cover the cost, or will it more than cover it? We should keep this in mind. The article continues:

> This tax would increase income at all airports by almost 50 per cent (currently it is $42 million annually). Conversely, it would make a reasonable dent in the operating losses of the airports. The national accounts figure for 1968-69 placed these at about $58 million.
> But apart from doing nothing to cut into the "substantial" expense of maintaining air services—air traffic control and telecommunications networks are two examples—the point about how the money would be used still lingers.

That bears out what I was saying when I commenced my remarks. The House should be supplied with more detail as to why this tax is necessary. It is all right for us to say we need more money, but how will we get it? We are going to again tax the poor taxpayer. Let us put a priority on the taxes we intend to thrust on the taxpayer Is this a priority tax? To conclude my remarks I should like to repeat what I said at the beginning. We need more information about amendments to the Excice Tax Act before we can intelligently vote one way or the other.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly on this bill. I do so because it is an inequitable and discriminatory measure which should not pass in its present form. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out, and most of us agree, that if the money required to operate our airports, derived from fees charged and other revenue obtained from the operation, is not sufficient to meet the cost, it would be more equitable to meet the cost by charging the people who use the airports—in other words, the passengers—than by assessing that cost to the general population and taking it out of the consolidated revenue fund.

As far as a tax is concerned, I think most people would agree that this is the equitable way of paying whatever costs are incurred. However, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Wellington, we do not know how much money is required to meet these costs. We do not know whether the tax proposed will just cover the extra cost, or whether it will bring a greater amount of revenue into the consolidated revenue fund. Before the measure is passed we should have before us the estimates of the Department of Transport and the Department of Finance in respect of what this tax will be used for, and where it is going if it is in excess of the amount really required to meet those airport expenses now borne by the federal government.

The person who travels from Ottawa to Montreal and makes use of those two airports is in exactly the same position, as far as the use of the airport is concerned, as the person who travels from Vancouver to Montreal. I see no reason why the person who travels from Vancouver to Montreal should pay several times as much in the form of taxes for the use he makes of those airports than the person who travels from Ottawa to Montreal.

The tax is discriminatory of people in outlying areas of this country who fly considerable distances to get to the seat of government or the two major cities in this part of the country. A number of people from the east and from the west have to come to Toronto and Montreal for business reasons. This tax is particularly discriminatory so far as people in the city of Calgary are concerned. That city generates a very large amount of air traffic, much larger than the per capita figure for any other city in Canada. Calgarians travel a great distance to Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto and various places in the United States in connection with the oil business. Therefore, this tax will be particularly burdensome to the citizens of that city. If it is necessary to impose a tax in order to meet airport costs, it should be imposed on a per capita basis; it should not be imposed as is proposed, that is, as a percentage of the total fare. This proposal will result in people living in outlying sections of the country paying more taxes. Let me remind hon. members of the regional development schemes the government proposes for those areas now being discriminated against because of economic and geographical conditions. The proposal before us will impose a further burden on these people. It is a burden they should not be asked to bear. Therefore, I hope this legislation will be modified so that whatever taxes are imposed will be imposed on a straight per capita airport basis, rather than as a percentage of total fare.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there is no need for my saying anything because most of the points that have been raised—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: —have been covered adequately by my eminent colleagues. Looking back at those remarks one sees that several opinions have been expressed in respect of the principle of this type of taxation. Several hon. members have expressed agreement with the proposal, but I have not been convinced.

I want to emphasize one point mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness). It appears to me that this tax will certainly have an adverse effect on people coming from places which are far from the centre of Canada which most people consider to be the Toronto-Montreal complex. People coming from the Atlantic region, for example—if I may be a little parochial—will certainly be overtaxed as a result of the proposed legislation. I cannot stand here with a clear conscience and support a tax which will discriminate against people from my part of Canada. If I were living in Hull, I would agree with this new tax because I would not have to do any flying. But I have to do a fair amount of flying between Gander and St. John's, Newfoundland, and there are in this position hundreds of small businessmen who are trying to make ends meet and who will perhaps go under when the white paper on taxation is enacted into legislation. When this piece of legislation becomes effective they will certainly go under.

Before I can agree to the proposed tax I would like to know what the money will be used for. This is not a complicated question and it is one to which all Canadians want an answer. I have heard that the government plans to spend $6 million in Ste. Scholastique. It plans to renovate the Vancouver Airport facilities to the tune of some $30 million, and I understand a controversy is shaping up, enhanced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), over airport facilities in the Toronto area. If that is what the money will be collected for, and the government has made these commitments, I as a Canadian taxpayer, my 70,000 constituents and 22 million Canadians would like to know if in fact they are the plans of the government.

Last year I was pressuring a friend of the Premier of Newfoundland, The Minister of Transport, for action on the facilities at the International Airport at Gander. We are entering an era wherein 8,900-foot runways are no longer adequate and we need at that airport, as I imagine is needed at most airports in Canada, an extension of the runway facilities to accommodate larger and faster aircraft which need 11,000-foot runways. If these are the sort of things for which this money will be used, then I might change my attitude.

Another question which I would like to raise is the following: We are talking about efficiency. I have been in the House of Commons only a few months and every day I have been hearing about government efficiency. Today I learned that a $400,000 investment of Canadian taxpayers is going into refurnishing the new Department of Communications.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take the liberty to remind the hon. member that the rule of relevancy has to be taken into account. The hon. member is straying very far from the principle of the bill and I ask him to return to the subject matter of the bill before the house. Most certainly if the hon. member is allowed to adopt the line of thinking and argument which he is putting forth to the House at present, other hon. members will want the same privilege, to which they would be entitled. We would then be discussing everything under the sun except what is before the House. I invite the hon. member to keep that in mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why members of the NDP are applauding your decision. This is hardly understandable after listening to their speeches. I wanted to establish a point, and not being one of the learned group of lawyers perhaps I am not stating my premises very clearly. I have been trying to establish a connection between efficiency and the government, and the government's need for more taxes. I am trying to put forward the point of view that if I am to support this tax increase, I would like to see more efficiency in government spending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: A point of concern to many Canadians is that the Canadian people are perhaps among the highest taxed of the free nations of the world, and this additional taxation will have increasing repercussions. Where will the line be drawn? We are now being taxed directly and indirectly, as economists can confirm, in order to finance airports and so the government can provide a service to the Canadian people. Then we turn around and suggest imposing a tax on the Canadian people for the use of a service for which they have already paid. What tax will we impose for the use of post offices? Shall we increase postage from six cents to eight cents? On looking at the bill before us I come to the conclusion that some of the points raised by hon. members have not been taken into consideration. It seems to me that this bill does not reflect a great deal of thought; as a matter of fact, it appears that it was hastily concocted in order to raise a quick buck. This is my impression.

Questions such as the one raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) have not been taken into consideration, nor have questions about the effect on a person who uses airport facilities three or four times a week or six or seven times a month, such as the small businessman who makes $8,000 or $10,000 a year and is forced to frequently use these facilities in order to carry on his business. What happens to the man who has to spend a significant proportion of his expense account money on which he will not be able to claim a tax rebate after 1971?

What will happen to air freight? This is a significant question. In Newfoundland we depend to a large extent on freight coming in by air in order to take care of the needs of our people. We bring in products from Ontario and Quebec by air. Are we to be further taxed? What about people who live in places such as Vancouver, the far north and some places in Newfoundland: they will pay a proportionately higher rate relative to their earnings, in comparison with people in other parts of Canada.

What about the per capita increase? If we are going to increase taxes, let us apply the increase equally to all Canadians. What about the users of private aircraft: are they going to have to pay taxes for the use of airport facilities? I am referring to the numerous small companies which operate private businesses with small aircraft. I do not see any reference to these people in the bill before us. What about the administrative costs of administering the $20 million which will be collected? I hope I am not again guilty of skirting the issue, but it seems to me that the administrative cost of such a tax, or of a capital gains tax, is such that the ultimate revenue derived will be negligible.

I will not continue my remarks because I know other hon. members would like to speak. I should like to hear Liberal members, NDP members and other Conservative members who come from other parts of Canada raise questions about the implications of this tax in respect of the people they represent. If the government is in a financial mess, let us face facts and collect taxes directly; let us not impose a tax on a tax, the administrative costs of which would render the ultimate results negligible.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments about this tax as it affects the northern sections of our country. In the years since I came to Ottawa I have come to realize that so far as this government is concerned the development of the north is something to forget about.

Ever since the Liberal government took office back in 1963 it has tended to discourage the development of the north. I say this tax is in keeping with that theme. We had a roads to resources program instituted by a Conservative government. It held out a good deal of hope to the people of the north that they might finally have some of the ordinary amenities that Canadians in other parts of the country enjoy. When the Liberals assumed office, they discontinued that program. Many of the people in the north live in isolated villages scattered many miles apart. Often their only means of communication with the southern regions of the country is by air, and in most cases by chartered air service. As you know, Mr. Speaker, chartered air service costs two or three times, and maybe four times as much as the use of commercial aircraft, but people in northern Alberta, as well as those in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon frequently must use chartered air services because there is nothing else available to them.

A man travelling from Fort Chipewyan to Fort McMurray has the choice of going by dog-team in wintertime, by boat in summertime or by using chartered air service. The first two methods of travel are highly unacceptable. We are here being asked to place a tax burden on people already greatly burdened through having to use chartered aircraft. The minister should pay special attention to this problem. It is a great problem for people who live in the north. I believe he should make an exception in their case, or possibly should forget about this proposed tax so far as people who use chartered aircraft are concerned.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to say very much, but I am compelled to do so by the eloquence of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) who said that other people should get up and voice their views. I waited for members on the other side of the House to speak, but the only remark I heard was an outburst from the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Deakon), who, rather rudely in my opinion, wanted to know how many people travelled into the north country.

Travel into the north is primarily by air. I have been flying into the north, into the Northwest Territories and places like Yellowknife, for 35 or 40 years. The north now has something in the way of airports, but in many areas they are not the facilities they are elsewhere. The cost of flying from Yellowknife to Edmonton is rather substantial. Some people who spend most of the year in the north, to use the vernacular come out one or twice a year. They use in a very limited way the very rudimentary type of airport available, yet now they will be asked to pay a substantial tax, some 5 per cent, on the fare from Yellowknife to Edmonton, This is a very substantial amount of money. It well illustrates the attitude of the Liberal party toward northern development.

We must also bear in mind that the normal means of transportation are changing through evolution and through the means which the railway companies are using. This point is quite relevant. It is notorious—and we can take parliamentary notice of this fact—that applications are being made to the appropriate board to discontinue a great many rail passenger services. It is my guess that within the next five to ten years a very large percentage of the passengers now carried by rail over great distances in this country will be travelling by air. Therefore this question involves, not the situation as it is today but the situation as it may be some years from now and the tax, the incidence of which is being initiated by this legislation, may be very considerable. I do not know what amount is involved now. I think I saw a press release that it was something in the order of $20 million. It is my guess that in the next few years it will be $40 million or $50 million, and it will fall with unreasonable severity on people who should not be paying it.

The Liberal Party has always been the party of taxation—tax and tax, and spend and spend. Now they are a little conscious of it. They have been spending so much in recent years and now, ostensibly, there appears to be some drawing back. I think it is absolutely unconscionable to impose a tax of this kind. The basis of any taxation system should be equitable distribution of the tax burden. A tax should fall mainly upon the people using the services which are being provided. Take the example of another means of transportation, the automobile. We all know there is a once-a-year tax imposed in the licensing of the automobile and thereafter the taxation comes from the imposition of gasoline taxes, on the fuel which powers the automobile. It is quite obvious from that, that to the extent to which you use your automobile you pay tax. If you use an automobile to drive 20,000 miles in a year, the taxation you pay through the purchase of gasoline will be based upon that use. I think exactly the same principle should apply with regard to this tax; its incidence should fall on those who make most use of the facilities at our airports. But that will not be the case.

Literally tens of thousands of people in this country are in the process of substituting, or have already substituted, air travel for travel by train. They will be travelling across the country maybe once or twice a year, and their rate of taxation on a flight, say, from Vancouver to Toronto and return, twice a year, would be infinitely greater than that of a person who is in and out of Toronto maybe once a week or once every two weeks. I think that is not equitable. I would suggest the Great White Father of the taxation field, who was here a little while ago, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson)—

An hon. Member: The thirty-bucks boy.

Mr. Baldwin: I hate to use rude terms like thirty-bucks boy, and in the sense that I would want to use such a term it would be unparliamentary; therefore, I will content myself with just thinking of it. In the result, I think the government should take a good, hard look at this proposed tax. When the committee stage is reached we propose to take steps with regard to the clauses to which we object. I hope that by that time the government will have reviewed its policy on this matter, because it is not a fair tax. I think it is completely wrong and I hope the government will review it.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Certainly we all know taxation is like death. There is a certain inevitability about it, an inevitability which under this government is being compounded.

An hon. Member: It creeps up on you.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not like to use the word "creeps" which my hon. friend has used; it may be taken out of context. Finally, Mr. Speaker, as I intend to point out when we get into a clause by clause study, there are some rather peculiar clauses in this bill. I am not going to debate them now; I just want to refer to them so that my friends can express themselves when we get into committee. Clause 14 (1) gives to somebody—I do not know who, but presumably the government—an inordinate amount of power, stating:

14(1) Where an amount is paid or payable outside Canada for the transportation of a person by air

(c) by any other arrangement with a person outside Canada for the benefit or convenience of a person in Canada

Mr. Speaker, that is a very wide, very woolly, very loose clause and the minister might have a look at it when we get to the committee stage. He might well attempt to interpret and explain it, and that is why I am raising it now. As I see it, if I were to travel from Ottawa to New York and then ask someone there to reserve for me a ticket from New York to San Francisco, even though I had paid the tax on my Ottawa-New York ticket it would seem, within the meaning of clause 14, that at the whim of the government I might also be called upon to pay 5 per cent tax on the ticket for the New York-San Francisco and return trip. I think this is a too far-reaching power to trust to any government, and certainly this government.

Mr. Speaker, I would also ask the minister to look at clause 18. We are quite anxious to facilitate the passage of this legislation, tailored to what we think it should be when the changes are made. Clause 18 (d) provides:

The Governor in Council may by regulation ...

(d) determine for the purposes of this Part when transportation begins or ends

(i) at a point in Canada

And so on. This seems to be a rather wide power to give to any government, much less this rather extraordinary government. I hope that the minister will have looked at this question by the time we come to that clause.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, as usual I do not stand and merely criticize for the sake of criticizing. I have a positive suggestion to make in this regard. I am afraid this is a rather hasty piece of legislation because of the number of suggestions already made, and because the terms of reference have not been laid down to the satisfaction of members. I should like to make some suggestions on ways to raise revenue as an alternative to this measure.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, when we are building airports I think we should cut down the excessive waste of the taxpayers' money on such frills as modern sculpture. Yesterday in Vancouver Airport I saw three yellow slabs of metal and I did not know what they were. I thought they were snow-scrapers until somebody told me that it was a piece of modern architecture or sculpture. It cost the people of Canada $150,000—$150,000 for three flat slabs of metal!

Mr. Crouse: Explain.

Mr. Bigg: In Edmonton Airport there are two paintings on the wall. I am not sure of the figures, maybe they are exaggerated, but the story I heard was that these two so-called paintings cost the taxpayers of Canada $26,000. One is a semi-circular piece of wallboard on which somebody has stuck some old burlap. They pasted it on, because there are lumps of paste, ordinary flour and water, as big as your thumb; and three colours, yellow, red and black. I do not know whether that is called art or not. It is not a painting; it is not even decorative. There is another one, blue, white and black, somewhat the size of the end of this building. It is supposed to be another painting. Although I am an art lover and have dabbled a little with paint, I do not think this is an area in which the taxpayers' money should be spent, nor do I think that we should come to them afterwards saying that we want to add 5 per cent to the air fare in order to decorate—and I put that word in italics—the airports of Canada with such poor items of art.

The next question is how to raise the money, as an alternative to this new tax. I would suggest that every airport in Canada might have reasonable entertainment for people held up anywhere from one to twelve hours waiting for airplanes. Why not theatres, slot TV, proper restaurants? It is true that some Canadian airports have good restaurants, but in most of them the eating facilities are precambrian; I think that is the best description. One would fare better by taking along a lunch-box. Generally speaking, the eating facilities in our airports are a disgrace. Why not put in decent theatres, slot machine TV and restaurants? If we had proper facilities at the airports I am quite sure they would make money.

The ground transportation situation at Canadian airports is a standing joke. In bad weather it takes longer to get to Ottawa Airport from downtown than it does to get from the airport to Toronto. Surely with a little co-operation at the three levels of government the capital of Canada could produce one decent road. I know I would not mind paying a considerable sum of money in order to have rapid and comfortable transportation between here and Ottawa Airport. It is something we need, something we are willing to pay for, and the taxpayers' money and my money would be spent in a good cause.

In many cases the ground transportation at airports is a disgrace. I wonder how many people here have complained about having to walk more than a mile at Dorval Airport in Montreal. There are no proper facilities for porters or even hand-carriers to take the luggage. I have seen elderly women lugging great suitcases for a mile, on foot. In little countries like Holland and Belgium the luggage is taken from one plane or train to another for the passenger, without charge. I think my suggestions might earn millions of dollars over the years, so why not provide decent facilities at the airports and in and out of the airports?

A lot of money could be raised by improving the international air facilities to and from Canada. During the past six weeks I have received approximately 100 letters from business firms and private individuals all over Alberta requesting that the major airlines serving the United States, Alaska and abroad be allowed to enter the international airport at Edmonton. I was astounded to learn that our great airports refuse this sort of service. In the twentieth century why should we be denied the right to travel to any airport in the world if we are willing to pay the price? The argument as to whether one should pay a per capita charge, as provided in this piece of legislation, or whether it should be as a percentage of the ticket is one I have not resolved myself. I should like to have more information in this regard.

At present the situation appears to me to be most unfair. A traveller flying long distances will have his overhead increased by a considerable percentage as a result of this unfair tax. I think this question might well be looked into. Perhaps a compromise could be worked out. The government may wish to introduce a combination of a percentage of the ticket price plus a toll. Instead of the flat 5 per cent, there might be a toll plus, say, a tax of $2 for the use of the airport. A small percentage could be charged, so that the man travelling long distances would not be paying less, proportionately, than others using the airport. Instead of merely saying, "Let us put a 5 per cent tax on, through which we will raise 'X' dollars," the government ought to be looking for ways to apply a measure like this more equitably. As I say, there might be a toll plus a percentage, in terms of money, of the distance the ticket will take a traveller.

It would be wise if we did not tax too heavily those people from other countries who use Canadian airports. The tourist industry, which is the second largest industry in Canada in terms of net revenue, brings in vital foreign exchange. We want tourists from all over the world to come here, enjoy our mountains and outdoor facilities when on holiday and leave with us their very much needed dollar and sterling currencies with which to balance our payments.

Being interested in the development of the north, I have taken a realistic look at this matter. It would be shortsighted on our part to bring in a tax which would slow down the pace of mineral and oil resource discoveries in newly explored areas of the Northwest Territories and the Arctic islands. It would be particularly shortsighted if the government were to hamper that part of our industry which is racing United States industry in an effort to explore and develop our Arctic coastline in the shortest period of time and with the least possible overhead.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, without doubt Bill C-155 is one of the most inequitable pieces of legislation this government has brought in. I cannot too strongly criticize the government's attitude in bringing forward this bill. Many people in our country want to travel, and this tax will make it more expensive for them to do so. This, therefore, is a wrong tax to bring in at this period in our history. The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications went to Labrador and Newfoundland in September. We found, during the course of our trip, that people in the Schefferville, Wabush and Labrador areas will have to pay exhorbitant air fares if they wish to travel. That being so, for heaven's sake let us stand up and be counted in our opposition to this measure.

Is the government really concerned about this nation? By imposing this sort of tax the government is being most unfair. The bill shows clearly that those who are travelling farthest will have to pay most. Has the government no consideration for those in this country who must live on fixed incomes? By introducing this measure the government has shown, again, that it has no compassion for those who must live on fixed incomes and who may wish to travel overseas or elsewhere. Even those wishing to go by charter flights must pay. I hope the minister will clarify this point when he sums up. Those who have managed to scrape up enough money to go by charter flight will have to pay this extra cost. Possibly they will not find it in their power to go on those tours we have all been hearing about.

Many of our people wish to travel, but this tax may make it impossible. Clearly, those who travelled to Harrison Hot Springs last week-end were not worried about the 5 per cent tax. They could afford to go. They do not fall into the category of those who are least able to pay higher transportation costs. As I said, many thousands of our people would like to travel, but this new type of tax will add to their expenses in the future and will limit their travelling.

The transportation systems of this country need overhauling and we need a comprehensive transportation policy. Even though we have a Transport Commission and the National Transportation Act on the statute books, the government has adopted a piecemeal approach to transportation, as is evidenced in Bill C-155. If the government were really concerned about providing transportation for the people of this country, it would not have adopted this piecemeal approach. Let us have a complete and comprehensive transportation policy that will allow everyone in this country to travel, and not just those who have affluent positions in our affluent society.

Many applications have been held before the Canadian Transport Commission on the subject of abandonment of railway passenger services. In my opinion the board should not automatically grant such requests. The board should consider over-all transport policy. It seems evident, nevertheless, that the government is not really concerned about introducing such a policy for Canada which will be applicable from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Now that the "Bullet" is no longer in service in Newfoundland, the people of that area have to rely more on air transport. The government is now asking them to pay an additional 5 per cent for their air tickets if they want to travel by air in Canada or to other parts. It is disgraceful that the government should tell the people of this country that if they want to travel by air they must pay an extra 5 per cent for their air tickets because extra airport facilities are needed. I hope the government will carefully reconsider the 5 per cent tax to be imposed after Bill C-155 has received passage.

Everyone in this country who is not now directly affected by this measure may ultimately be affected by it. Surely the advent of the new jumbo jet will remove the need for this tax. Jumbo jets will be able to carry many people. If members of the government are looking ahead—and it seems that at Harrison Hot Springs they were able only to look ahead and not to examine the present—to 1971, 1972 and 1973, they will see that jumbo jets may provide an answer to this problem. In the meantime, let us all realize that 5 per cent extra on an air ticket is a major item for many people of this country who are still earning less than $30 a week.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as is usual in these circumstances, I think hon. members expect me to attempt to respond to at least some of the points that they have made.

The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) suggested that not enough details had been presented by me with respect to this tax and its purposes. In my opening statement I did attempt to say something about the purpose of the tax. I said and I quote, "As explained by the Minister of Finance at that time",—I was referring to the June 3 budget speech—"the cost of construction and maintenance of air transportation facilities is very high and, in addition to obtaining revenue from user charges at airports, the government has decided that it is advisable to ask Parliament to require individuals who travel by air to pay an amount through what in effect will be a special tax to help defray the costs of providing air transportation facilities".

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might have used the opportunity given to me in the opening of the second reading debate to have said even more. I felt, however, that hon. members would not have wanted me to take the time of the House for this purpose in view of the rather complete explanation of the purpose of the tax given by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), when he presented his budget statement on June 3, 1969. Perhaps I might at this point summarize some of the things the Minister of Finance said during the budget statement because I think it will help answer the quite legitimate request of the hon. member for Wellington for details about the purpose of the tax, the revenues expected and so on.

In the budget statement the Minister of Finance said that a further measure of budgetary significance arises out of a general policy to ask those who benefit directly from a service or facility provided by the government to pay charges more in line with the direct costs involved. Several speakers from the official opposition seemed to accept this principle and support it, although in fairness to them I think I should note that they felt that the tax on flights within North America should be added on a flat rate basis rather than ad valorem. I will attempt to deal with this argument later in my remarks.

The Minister of Finance went on to say there would be a review of user charges and in addition the introduction of some new charges. He said, as reported at page 9420 of Hansard:

> In almost all cases this action can be taken under existing legislation. There is one important field, however, where legislation will be required to impose what will in effect be a tax. This relates to air transport.
> It is well known that our expenditures on the construction, equipment, operation and maintenance of airports and other air transport facilities are now very large. In the last fiscal year they are estimated at $73 million. The revenue we obtain from user charges, rents, etc. of one kind and another related to airports and air transport facilities is far less—only about $41 million—

The minister went on to say:

> We have decided, however, on one measure which we believe should be enacted by parliament as soon as possible to assist in providing more revenue in this field.

> We propose that a charge, tax, be levied on the price of tickets or other charges (such as charter hire) made by air carriers for carrying passengers in or from Canada on trips commencing with a date to be specified in the legislation. We have worked out a tentative plan for such charges which we believe would yield revenues of about $20 million a year.

I assumed most hon. members were familiar with the information provided by the Minister of Finance in his budget statement. I felt they would not have wanted me to repeat them in my opening statement, although I am very happy to do so to help make the record on this debate more complete. The hon. member for Wellington asked where the proceeds of the tax will go. I understand the proceeds will go into the consolidated revenue fund. Generally speaking, the amount raised will be taken into account in determining the amount that the Department of Transport will be spending on air transport facilities.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), accepting as he did the general principle that users of facilities should bear an appropriate proportion of their cost, argued that the tax should be a flat tax rather than an ad valorem tax. It is true that the bill does not attempt to make the amount of tax depend directly or precisely upon the use of an airport or the use of navigational aids. This is something that would be very difficult to do. It should be stressed that this is not a tax simply for the use of an airport or airports. As I understand the proposed tax, it is to help provide revenues to pay for the use, maintenance and expansion of the air transport facilities generally which are provided by the federal Department of Transport.

I gather this would include the facilities of air navigation, air traffic control, meteorological and so on, not simply the use of the airport structure itself. If I am correct in this, it seems that some of the arguments put forward by hon. members who have spoken to the effect that the tax is not fair because there are some people who will use an airport once and others will use it three times, are not as valid as they would be if the tax were to be used solely for bearing the cost of maintaining the airport structure itself, something which I am informed is not the case. The tax in effect is imposed on the amount paid for transportation. This is basically analogous to the manner in which sales taxes and excise taxes are imposed. As I said in my opening remarks, this is a tax upon consumption. In other words, as I understand the sales tax it is basically a percentage of the price of the goods purchased.

An hon. Member: Don't you know?

Mr. Gray: I believe the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) suggested that what is done by somebody travelling by car is quite different from the proposed tax. He suggested there is a flat amount paid, I suppose for the licence or registration of the car, and there is another tax paid which is linked with the amount of gasoline that the person uses to travel about in his car. He suggested the proposed excise tax is something different. Perhaps I am wrong in this, but it seems basically that it is quite similar.

If a person travels from Vancouver to Ottawa he uses more gas; it costs him more money since he pays a greater amount of tax on that gas. This seems to be analogous to what is involved in somebody travelling from Vancouver to Ottawa by airplane rather than by car. It costs more than travelling by airplane from Toronto to Ottawa and therefore the tax to that equivalent extent would be greater, just as it costs more by way of tax on gasoline to travel by car between Vancouver and Ottawa than to travel by car between Toronto and Ottawa.

Although I thought the hon. member was putting forward an interesting argument, I felt, and perhaps I am incorrect, that it tended to support the argument for an ad valorem tax rather than the argument against it. If a flat tax were imposed upon every trip by air within Canada and to points in North America, the amount of such tax would probably have to be $5. This would result in a tax equal to about half the fare for persons flying on short trips such as from Fredericton to Saint John, New Brunswick or from Vancouver to Victoria. Some people would end up paying a 50 per cent tax if the proposal put forward by some hon. members of the official opposition were accepted rather than the 5 per cent ad valorem tax proposed by the government.

Hon. members should note it is likely that a flat tax per trip within the taxation area as defined in the bill before us would create many complications. For example, if the tax were imposed on each trip, it would apply on both legs of a return trip ticket. It would be very difficult and probably impossible to fairly define a return trip ticket. For example, would a trip from Ottawa to Winnipeg and back from Winnipeg to Ottawa via Toronto be a round trip ticket? Would it be a round trip ticket if the passenger came back from Winnipeg to Montreal instead of to Ottawa?

If the tax applied to each purchase of a ticket, passengers would include in one purchase all the transportation they might require for a couple of months and then transfer the unused portions. This would add seriously to the cost for the airlines and to the cost of auditing.

If there were to be a flat rate tax imposed on each trip, I presume hon. members would be arguing for a tax which would be in the form of a departure tax collected each time a passenger boarded an aircraft. I suggest such a tax would greatly add to the paperwork at airports and would seriously slow down the flow of passengers through terminals. As the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) remarked, delays at airports due to congestion, and so on, are already serious enough and the imposition of a departure tax would certainly add to the congestion—it would become even worse as the jumbo jets embarked even larger numbers of passengers all at the same time.

A flat departure tax would contain a number of elements of unfairness. For example, if there were such a tax, a passenger flying from Toronto to Vancouver who is unable to get a through flight but who has to stop at Winnipeg and Edmonton uses four airports and logically, I suppose, could pay four departure taxes. But why should he pay more tax than the person who flies directly from Toronto to Vancouver? Then again, a tax payable every time an airport was used would cause passengers to seek a through service and thus might help one airline at the expense of another.

There are other points which should be noted. One argument against the advisability of a flat rate tax of the type proposed by the hon. member is that to produce the same total revenue there would certainly have to be a substantial increase in the tax on short distance travel, and this might have the effect of distorting the demand for short distance air travel in a way which would create competitive problems vis-à-vis other modes of transport.

I have already suggested that this tax is intended to yield revenue to provide services for air travellers, services which are not confined to landing and take-off. Indeed, aircraft have access to a much more comprehensive range of services which are used throughout the flight, from the point of take-off to the point of landing.

I might point out, also, that the United States already imposes a 5 per cent ad valorem tax. As I said in my opening remarks, taxes in connection with air travel have international ramifications. Our major airlines in Canada, Air Canada, Canadian Pacific and so on, are international carriers and are already geared administratively to collecting the United States ad valorem tax.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) suggested that this tax would place an unfair burden on the airlines when it came to collect them. The system proposed is generally that which is used at the present time for the collection of sales tax, a similar form of tax, and our major carriers are already collecting such a tax at the present time on flights in the United States which attract the United States ad valorem tax.

The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) began by saying that the proposed tax is not businesslike and that it represents, in effect, a subsidy to business. However, the hon. member for Edmonton West said the tax would impose an unfair burden on business. Well, both these hon. gentlemen cannot be right. It would appear that as usual the proposal of the government strikes a fair balance between these two extremes in a way which is not adverse to the interest of any segment of Canadian society.

One or two hon. members referred to the impact of this tax on charter flights and suggested it would make things difficult for people who had saved up for many years to take such flights. I would point out that most of the charter flights of which I am aware go to overseas points and, as I indicated earlier, flights to overseas points would attract not an ad valorem tax but a flat tax which, if applicable, would be calculated on the basis of the number of seats in the aircraft. I believe I mentioned that the flat tax would initially be at the rate of $5 for each ticket sold, with authority being given to the Governor in Council, if Parliament agrees, to reduce this to a lower amount. The reason Parliament is being asked to give the Governor in Council authority to reduce the tax is that at the present time the United States does not impose a tax on overseas flights although there is a bill pending before Congress which would not only increase the ad valorem tax from 5 per cent to 8 per cent but would create a flat tax on overseas flights in an amount of approximately $3.

Obviously, if the United States Congress passes a bill along the lines I have outlined it will be necessary for Canada to make appropriate adjustments in the tax on overseas flights from Canada, otherwise passengers will be encouraged to purchase tickets in the United States rather than in Canada.

I return to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Waterloo in case there is some misunderstanding on this point. Contrary to what he has suggested, the proposed tax would not go to pay for the running of Air Canada; the proceeds would be used, rather, for maintaining airports and air transportation facilities and to assist in defraying the cost of there expansion which is presently being carried out by the Department of Transport.

[Mr. Gray.]

While the hon. member made some interesting comments about national airline policy, the question of whether it is desirable to have one, two, or more airlines which are national in scope is not really before us at this time. I might add, however, without passing judgment on what the policy should be, that it is my understanding that since Canadian Pacific is a private firm it does pay taxes to the federal government, probably at the top corporate rate of 50 per cent. So to the extent it makes profits the federal government and the federal taxpayer generally share in them to the extent of 50 per cent. It would seem to me that the growth of air traffic will require the expansion of air transportation facilities no matter how many airlines national in scope we possess. Whether there is one, two or three, the traffic generated will have to be handled.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has asked for information on the revenue this new tax would bring in. As I have mentioned earlier, I believe this will be around $20 million.

The same member has also asked to explain the purpose of this new tax. If we look once again at the budget speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on Tuesday, June 3, 1969, we find that the minister said, and I quote:

> A further measure of budgetary significance arises out of a general policy to ask those who benefit directly from services or facilities provided by the government to pay charges more in line with the direct costs involved.

Speaking about costs, he said, and I quote:

> —our expenditures on the construction, equipment, operation and maintenance of airports and other air transport facilities are now very large.

It is with these aims in mind that I am asking the support of the House to levy this new tax.

The hon. member spoke in a very interesting manner of using the Bank of Canada to grant the necessary credits.

It is indeed on interesting possibility but I suggest that it is not the time, when we are discussing the budgetary resolutions adopted on June 3 to amend the present financial policy. I am sure that we shall have other opportunities to discuss the rather interesting financial policy of the Ralliement créditiste.

[English]

Might I also try to clear up a couple of other points raised by hon. members. I thought it was clear from my explanatory remarks—I regret if it was not—that my understanding was that this tax will not be imposed on air freight. Neither will the tax be imposed on charter flights on aircraft with a load less than 18,000 pounds. Other categories of flights are also not subject to the tax, but I will give further details during the committee of the whole stage.

These exceptions will, I think, effectively answer many of the points made by hon. members who expressed concern about the possible impact of the tax on those living in isolated areas. Such exemptions from the impact of the tax will remove many of the fears hon. members seem to have. I would be happy to attempt to answer in greater detail some of the more specific points raised by hon. members, in due course. However, at this time the House might be willing to give its support to the bill on second reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-155, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. Shall clause 1 carry?

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister without Portfolio just made a valiant effort to get this clause carried. However, I would point out that clause 1 of the bill extends to some eight pages and covers something like 12 new sections. In fact, it is really Part II, the operative part in the bill. My suggestion, in the interest of a more orderly discussion of this matter, would be that we discuss the numbered sections of the act, starting with proposed section 8, then section 9, and all the way through to section 19, before ultimately making a decision on clause 1. This will assist, shall I say, the continuity and regularity of our discussion in committee.

I should like to deal with the arguments raised by the minister in his reply on second reading and discuss them with my colleagues when we reach the appropriate place. I hope that this procedure will be followed, and I wonder whether the minister could indicate whether this course is satisfactory to him. I suggest instead of ranging from one end of the clause to the other we take the proposed amendments seriatim. Then when we have dealt with them we will decide on clause 1.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I have misunderstood my hon. friend. Is he referring to clause 2? I think his remarks are actually directed to clause 2.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Chairman, to clause 1, which introduces a new Part II to the act. I suggest we deal with each proposed new section, starting at 8 and continuing to section 19, and then we will come to a decision on clause 1. I am not suggesting we decide on each proposed section. On that basis may I call it 10 o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being 10 o'clock shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FEDERAL BUILDINGS—VANCOUVER—NEW PROJECT AND "PROJECT 200"

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on November 17 I endeavoured to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) which related to federal buildings, and co-operation in the construction of other buildings, in the city of Vancouver. Being unable to ask the question at that time, I had hoped to get some information this evening. Although this question has now been postponed on two occasions at the request of the minister, I fail to see him in his place this evening even though he promised he would definitely be in attendance.

About four years ago the government made extensive plans to co-operate and participate in what is known as Project 200 in the city of Vancouver. It also had plans of its own to pull down an existing federal building, the old post office, as well as the old Winch building. It is disgraceful, I know, to tear down a "winch" building, but I suppose it had to go.

Nothing has been heard of those plans during the last two years. My understanding was that as far as the new federal building was concerned, it was to be a three-tower project with the preliminary construction starting in 1970, the second stage in 1972 and the final stage in 1974. As I have said, nothing as been heard of the project, of the federal building, or of the government's policy of co-operation in Project 200.

I assume the reason we have not heard anything about it is the austerity program of the government. However, I am asking the question now about the plans for Vancouver because the austerity construction program for Hull and Ottawa seems to have been lifted; it seems to have completely gone by the board. We hear of millions of dollars in new construction to proceed in Hull and Ottawa. That being the case, we should like some information on whether the austerity program has been lifted in Vancouver, whether there are any definite plans to proceed on schedule with the construction of a new federal building for Vancouver, and whether there is any idea of continuing the policy adopted four years ago, that of almost rebuilding downtown Vancouver.

When I first asked this question the other day it was said it could not be answered because I could not ask a specific question about my own constituency. The location of this property is not my own constituency. This area is in the constituency of Vancouver Centre, represented by the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). The situation now is that from Vancouver we have the present Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who should be vitally concerned and interested in this matter because it is in his constituency, and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) who represents a riding directly across the bay from this downtown development. I sincerely hope that their influence and interest in Vancouver, together with my own, will achieve some result and that the Minister of Public Works can this evening give us definite and specific information in this regard, proving to us that the austerity program has been lifted in Vancouver as well as in Ottawa and Hull and that there is no discrimination.

[Mr. Winch.]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am most happy that my fellow citizen from Vancouver has brought this matter before the House. We find there are in greater Vancouver today some 6,000 federal civil servants. We have been assessing the requirement for them to be in the centre of the city. We have decided that because of the interests of the public in certain departments, about 2,400 would be required to be in the very busy centre core of the city.

We have decided that the balance, including a number in laboratories and the like, could be located in less dense areas where transportation might be better and where the land values are not so high. As my hon. friend knows, that particular area bounded by Granville Street, Hastings Street, Howe Street and Cordova Street contains probably the highest priced land in the city of Vancouver. We are at the present time working on a preliminary study of the requirements for a federal building in Vancouver. I know my friend will be glad to hear that.

At the present time these people are housed in eight old federal buildings in Vancouver, and 21 leased buildings. My hon. friend might agree with me, as most Vancouver members will, that some of the accommodation there is of a type that means the morale and efficiency of civil servants cannot be of the best. We are therefore proceeding as rapidly as possible and I intend to make an announcement fairly soon.

My hon. friend referred to Project 200. Because of the critical area in which we are located, making it necessary to obtain clear access from Granville Street and Howe street, it is our intention to keep everyone apprised of what we are doing co-operatively in respect of proper access levels. We want to be a good landlord within the centre of the city, and therefore have over a period of years had discussions with the mayor, city councillors and planners. The mayor and his councillor have indicated to us that they would prefer us to go on the east side of Granville Street for a variety of reasons which my hon. friend can appreciate. It is our intention to continue these discussions and to co-operate with Vancouver in every respect.

I think this is about all I have to say on the subject at present. We will proceed as rapidly as we can. I want to make the point that not only in Vancouver but in other parts of Canada it is imperative that the national government have a national presence, and I intend to see what we can do in Vancouver. We intend to construct a building there of such a standard that the national government will have a reasonable and indeed a reasonable-plus presence.

NATIONAL REVENUE—DELAY IN FEDERAL SALES TAX AUDITS OF COMPANIES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, on November 19, I asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) the following question:

In view of the fact that federal sales auditors have not made annual inspections or audits of many Canadian companies, for up to as long as four or five years, and that in many cases when they do these audits they reassess the companies for thousands of dollars in taxes, what steps is the minister taking to overcome this problem and to make sure that there will be more frequent and regular inspections?

This question was not acceptable at the time, so in the few minutes that are available to me tonight I should like to put forth the following problems. The reason for the question was that I have received several letters from small and large companies which have not had government sales tax auditors on their premises for as long as four or five years. I have had two specific cases brought to my attention, one of a small company which had not seen a federal auditor for four years and seven months, following which they were presented with a bill for $3,419.95 which was due for sales which had been exempted from tax in error. You might say this relates only to small companies, but that is not so. Another very large company, which had not seen a government sales tax auditor for four years, was presented with a bill for $80,000. This amount is not peanuts; it is a very large bill to present to any company, large or small, particularly when they cannot go back and bill their customers. I know the minister will probably say that owing to the austerity program there is not sufficient manpower to make these audits more frequently; but one of these cases occurred three or four years ago, before the austerity program was put into force.

The problem is accentuated by the fact that the department does not send out notices or information to companies in a clear and legible way. They send them out, but do not use plain, ordinary English or plain, ordinary French, whatever the case may be, so that the operators of the companies can understand the regulations and keep their books according to the wishes of the department. I do not think there is any doubt that the inspections should be made more frequently. I realize that the companies are responsible for collecting these taxes, but in many cases there are very difficult decisions to be made, namely is it taxable or is it not.

I know the Department of National Revenue re-organized their whole set up a few years ago. They decentralized. This was in order to give better service. But from talking to my constituents I have found the experience has been that the service is not as good as it used to be.

I do not like to criticize the department without offering some constructive criticism. I think it is high time the government started to collect all tax moneys through one department and had one auditor make the complete audit of a business firm or taxpayer. Why should a man in business have to get out all his books for the sales tax collector, and then a few months or a year afterwards have another inspector arrive from the Income Tax Department and he has to bring out all his books again? The unemployment insurance auditor is the third fellow who comes around, and then we have the Canada Pension Plan auditor coming on the scene as well.

Why could we not have one auditor from the Department of National Revenue to audit all the books on one trip and thus cut down on the cost of the operation? It is very difficult for a man in business to produce invoices that go back four or five years, yet he has to dig up all these invoices. It is a tremendous job and a costly one, and it is only necessary because the government does not conduct audits with the frequency to which a man in business, be he large or small, is entitled.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I desire, on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté), to give this answer. In reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) concerning the possibility of conducting audits for sales tax purposes more frequently than is now the practice, the following are some of the factors which inhibit any change in our present policy in this area.

At the present time we have some 58,000 persons or firms licensed under the Excise Tax Act and experience has shown that the average time expended in conducting an audit of a licensee's records is 2.15 days. Our staff of operational auditors across Canada numbers approximately 265. Apart from the difficulties of acquiring and training staff there is the necessity to see that those employed are applying themselves to those accounts which are most complex because of the variety and volume of their output.

The risk to the revenue by reason of faulty application of the law is of course greater than in other more simple operations. On this basis we therefore use the manpower resources available to us to the greatest advantage, for we have programmed our audits on the basis of a two, three and four year cycle depending on the complexity of the operation involved and the past assessment history of the licensee concerned, which we have found to have worked quite well.

Every step, of course, is taken to help the taxpayer. Our auditors meet with new licensees at the earliest moment after they have started in business. This is usually around the sixth month of their operations. They are then assisted in solving any tax problems they have or may foresee. A check is made to see that they are receiving all the published information issued by the department for their guidance, and they are invited to communicate with our officials at any time they might have any questions to ask. With our regional set-up, more expertise is available to them within shorter distances. On the average we conduct the greater part of our audits within 24 to 30 months.

The only way in which we could meet the suggestion of the hon. member as to annual audits be conducted, would be by more than doubling the number of auditors in our work force. This would be contrary to government policy and we are convinced that it would not be justified on a cost-benefit basis as our experience has shown that approximately 54 per cent of the audits conducted result in no assessment whatever. If we were to attempt to conduct audits every year with our present audit staff, I feel certain that the examination would be a hit-and-miss affair and accordingly not very meaningful in the light of established priorities.

I would like to assure the hon. member that we are working continually to improve our audit program in order to provide the best service possible consistent with the limits of our financial and manpower resources. I might further explain that there is no statutory provision requiring us to audit a licensee's record at any stated interval, and by the same token there is no authority in the Excise Tax Act whereby retroactive assessments may be waived. None the less, our continual objective is to keep retroactive assessments at a minimum.

[Mr. Laing.]

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES—MONTREAL—BOMBING AT LOYOLA COLLEGE—INCREASED CO-OPERATION BY R.C.M.P.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, November 21, I asked the Acting Prime Minister if he would contact the Mayor of Montreal and the Premier of Quebec to inquire if anything more could be done by the federal government, including the R.C.M.P., to prevent further terrorist bombings in Montreal. My question followed the bombing at Loyola College on Thursday, November 20, when a powerful bomb exploded in a classroom building while 400 evening students were in class.

The same week in Montreal a bomb was placed in the home of the Deputy Mayor of St. Michel. These were only the most recent of a long series of bombings in Montreal. Since I did not get any real commitment for action at that time, I decided to raise the question for debate at the time of adjournment.

While the citizens of Montreal have been seriously concerned for some time, the incident last Thursday gave them new cause for alarm. A few weeks previous to the bombing, Michel Chartrand, a union leader in Montreal, told a public meeting that if Quebec Bill 63 should become law there would be a new wave of violence in Quebec. Bill 63 passed on Thursday evening and the bomb at Loyola exploded the same night. While there may be no connection between the statement by Mr. Chartrand and the bombing at Loyola, the innocent public of Montreal wonder whether there will be more bombs and whether their lives and the lives of their children are in danger. If the students at Loyola last Thursday had been in the corridor when the bomb went off, scores of them would have been killed. Luckily, they were all in their classrooms at the time.

Mr. Speaker, I am not an alarmist, but with many others in Montreal I am beginning to wonder whether we have to wait until innocent people are killed before the efforts of the police forces at all levels are intensified. Even though Mr. Chartrand is not directly connected with the bombing at Loyola, are we to tolerate a society where leaders in the community can make threats of violence with apparent impunity and thereby encourage terrorism? I hope that people who are not satisfied with Bill 63, among other things, in Quebec realize that violence is counter-production and in the long run will destroy everything.

In tonight's Star there is an article which says that Lucien Saulnier, the chairman of the executive committee, will be in Ottawa later this week and that one of the subjects he may take up with the federal government is a request for assistance for Montreal police in their battle against terrorism. The article says in part:

A request for assistance for Montreal police in their fight against terrorism in the city could be made in Ottawa later this week by Executive Committee Chairman Lucien Saulnier.

The executive committee is curently reviewing the role of the municipal police in combating terrorist activity. Members are understood to feel that the city police should not have to bear the brunt of the battle and that the city should not have to pick up the entire tab.

Then it states:

The co-operation of the R.C.M.P. and the Quebec Provincial Police with the municipal police in fighting the different groups of terrorists active in the city...is of doubtful benefit in the minds of many senior officers.

Off the record, officers of all three forces will admit that the "co-operation" is far from "total and complete".

Mr. Speaker, without criticizing any one officer, because probably a lot of the men in the police forces are working very hard on this matter, I say without criticism of what has been done that we must intensify our efforts to prevent and deter further bombings and also to discover those persons responsible for the bombings that have already taken place. I hope the government at the federal level will do everything possible to assist the provincial and municipal governments in this task, and I hope I will get a commitment to that effect from the minister and the government.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I share, as I am sure all hon. members do, the concern of the hon. member about the bombings and related acts of violence taking place in a wholly abnormal way in the city of Montreal. However, the facts are that the federal police force authority and those responsible for it are co-operating fully with the municipal and provincial police forces. This co-operation is not an academic exercise; it is worked out in a carefully organized way among the police forces having the responsibility for dealing with this matter. Mr. Speaker, I thought I gave that assurance last Friday when the question was asked and I went on to say:

—I want to emphasize very strongly that there is very close working co-operation between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Quebec Provincial Police and the city of Montreal police in these matters, and in this particular instance there is, of course, that kind of co-operation.

I was referring to the Loyola incident. It is quite true that the initial or prime responsibility lies with the local authorities; but in addition to offering co-operation we have offered every assistance possible. I know of no request for any assistance that has not been granted, and I know of no way of bringing additional assistance, at the moment. We will continue to co-operate fully with the respective authorities in trying to deal with this problem and, in addition, give them all the assistance we can. That is the way the matter stands.

As to the report in the newspaper tonight—I assume the hon. member was referring to the Montreal Star and not to the Toronto Star—I can only say that I have not seen that report and do not wish to comment on it. It was written by a reporter and may or may not be correct in any detail. I shall look at the article and see if anything in it warrants attention, but I would prefer not to comment specifically on it in an offhand way.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

Question No. 10—Mr. Gilbert:

1. Have there been any recent design changes for Canada's domestic telecommunications satellite?

2. If so, what are the main changes contemplated and for what reasons?

3. What is the expected new additional costs of the satellite as a result of these changes?

4. What is the total expected cost for the construction of the satellite?

5. If a new design is now required for the domestic satellite, is Telesat considering new contract tenders for the project?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): The Government is unaware of any substantial changes effected or contemplated in the design objectives and criteria laid out by the project office that had the responsibility for Canada's Domestic Telecommunications Satellite until Telesat Canada took over on September 1st, 1969.

AIR CANADA ORDERS FOR AIRPLANES

Question No. 13—Mr. Skoberg:

What airplanes does Air Canada presently have on order and/or on a reserved basis?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: Aircraft on order as of November 1, 1969: 8 Douglas DC-8's; 3 Douglas DC-9's; 3 Boeing 747's; 10 Lockheed L-1011's. Aircraft on reserve basis as of November 1, 1969: 9 Lockheed L-1011's; 4 Concorde SST's; and 6 Boeing SST's.

CANADIAN CONSUMER COUNCIL

Question No. 50—Mrs. MacInnis:

1. Who are the executive directors of the Canadian Consumer Council and what are their respective annual salaries?

2. Who are the other staff members of the Canadian Consumer Council and what are their respective annual salaries?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Mr. G. R. Anderson is the present executive director of the Canadian Consumer Council and his salary is $23,000.

2. There are three other staff members of the Canadian Consumer Council: Miss F. Sinclair, Administrative Assistant, $500 per month; Mr. K. D. Rubin, Research Assistant, $550 per month; Miss G. Ulmer, St-4, $436 per month.

COMMUNIST CHINA—STATEMENT BY RCMP COMMISSIONER

Question No. 129—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. Does the Government of Canada agree with the statement of RCMP Commissioner William Higgitt that "the presence of a Communist Chinese Embassy in Ottawa will increase espionage activity in Canada"?

Questions

2. What is the policy of the Government of Canada regarding civil servants who express publicly their opposition to or reservations about government policy?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. The statement "the presence of a Communist Chinese Embassy in Ottawa will increase espionage activity in Canada" is not a fair or accurate summary of what Commissioner Higgitt stated.

2. Having regard to the reply to Part 1, this question is hypothetical.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Question No. 135—Mr. Skoberg:

1 What specific mechanism has been established within the Department of Transport to ensure that the effects of Bill C-207, the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, are realized and in particular, that the up to thirty percent subsidy on freight emanating in the Atlantic Provinces and destined for other parts of Canada is passed on in the Atlantic Provinces to shippers in the form of reduced freight rates?

2. When is it expected that the joint federal-provincial committee on transport in the Maritimes will complete their report on recommendations for improving existing federal scheme of assistance to Atlantic transportation?

3. Will this report be made public?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): 1. The Government is relying on competition to be the ultimate mechanism which will enable the benefits of this transportation assistance to be realized by shippers. Increased competition in the area is evident from recent rate reductions announced by Atlantic region trucking operators.

2. It is premature to attempt to set any date for completion of the work of this committee.

3. The decision as to which reports are to be made public will depend on the nature of the material covered and the extent to which confidential sources must be protected.

AIR CANADA PASSENGER FARES

Question No. 139—Mr. Skoberg:

1. What action is contemplated by Air Canada in response to the pasenger fare reduction of Alitalia on North Atlantic routes?

2. Is Air Canada contemplating similar action in reducing passenger fares on North Atlantic routes?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. The Alitalia fare reduction for winter only is one of a number of new individual fares filed with governments for approval. Air Canada proposes to meet any fares of this sort filed and approved by the various governments concerned.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

2. Air Canada has submitted for approval to government heads its proposals for drastic reductions for bulk and group fares on the North Atlantic.

RHODESIA—NAVY CONTRIBUTION TO ENFORCE SANCTIONS

Question No. 147—Mr. Nystrom:

Is Canada prepared to contribute naval forces to the United Nations if it undertakes to enforce sanctions against Rhodesia on the high seas?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A decision by the Security Council of the United Nations would be required to empower a multi-lateral force of member states to enforce sanctions against Rhodesia by naval action. As no such decision has been made the question is hypothetical and the possibility of Canadian naval forces involvement has not arisen.

RHODESIA—VIOLATIONS OF TRADE SANCTIONS

Question No. 148—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Is the Government of Canada aware of violations of the trade sanctions against Rhodesia by Portugal and South Africa?

2. If so, has any protest been registered with these governments and in what form?

3. Is consideration being given to (a) implementing unilaterally, or (b) discussing the implementation of trade sanctions against Portugal and South Africa if violations continue?

4. Will Canada (a) initiate or (b) support U.N. action against Portugal and South Africa if violations continue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Government of Canada is aware that both Portugal and the Republic of South Africa do not abide by the United Nations Security Council resolutions calling for mandatory economic sanctions against Rhodesia.

2. The Canadian attitude toward the refusal of both governments to adhere to the Security Council resolutions has been stated at the United Nations. On October 16, 1969, the Canadian representative on the Fourth Committee said in the course of a statement of Canadian policy on southern Africa: "We call on the Governments of Portugal and South Africa to cease their defiance of the mandatory decisions of the Security Council, and to desist from providing the Smith regime with support."

3. No.

4. While the question of United Nations action against Portugal and the Republic of South Africa for their failure to implement sanctions against Rhodesia has been raised in the United Nations General Assembly, it is for the Security Council to initiate action and take the necessary decisions. In the absence of agreement in the Security Council to do so, it is the Canadian view that United Nations action is not a practical proposition at this time.

ANNUAL SALARY, DAVID GOLDEN

Question No. 180—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What is the annual salary of Mr. David Golden, President of Telesat Canada Corporation?

2. What was Mr. Golden's annual salary when he was Deputy Minister of Defence Production?

3. What was Mr. Golden's annual salary when he was President of the Crown company, Northern Ontario Pipeline Corporation?

4. What was Mr. Golden's annual salary when he was Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. This is a matter which falls within the powers of the Board of Directors of Telesat Canada.

2. Mr. Golden's annual salary was $20,000.00 in 1962 when he left the position of Deputy Minister of Defence Production.

3. Mr. Golden served as President of Northern Ontario Pipeline Corporation without remuneration.

4. Mr. Golden's annual salary was $25,000.00 in 1964 when he left the position of Deputy Minister of Industry.

PRESIDENT OF TELESAT CANADA

Question No. 182—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Is Mr. David Golden the new President of Telesat Canada?

2. Has Mr. Golden divested himself of all financial interests related to the Telesat Corporation?

3. Does Mr. Golden own any shares or have any financial interests in Bell Canada or RCA Victor Co. Ltd.?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. Yes.

2. He did not have any at the time of his appointment to the position of President of Telesat Canada.

3. No.

MOTOR VEHICLE PASSIVE RESTRAINT DEVICES

Question No. 208—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to requiring motor vehicle manufacturers to equip new vehicles with "air bags" or similar passive restraint devices for protecting occupants in crashes?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The possible use of inflatable occupant restraints devices is receiving close consideration. While an "air-bag" restraint system has been developed by at least one manufacturer, the tests on this device installed in vehicles have revealed a number of practical problems that will have to be overcome before "air-bags" could be made mandatory equipment on motor vehicles.

*COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—EXPENDITURES FOR 1968/1969

Question No. 268—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total amount of expenditure by the Company of Young Canadians for 1968/1969?

2. Of this amount how much was expenditure for consulting and professional fees?

3. What are the names of the staff members and their respective addresses who receive salaries of (a) $10,000-$15,000 per year (b) over $15,000 per year (c) $20,000 per year?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows:

Question No. 421—Mr. Fortin:

1. Has the government received submissions from the Government of the Province of Quebec on better co-ordination of the activities of the federal and Quebec farm credit agencies and, if so, when were they received and what were their recommendations?

2. The reply was that the government believes that federal funds provided for lending to individual farmers should be lent directly by the Farm Credit Corporation so that they may be uniformly available to farmers across Canada. In addition, the reply suggested implementation of the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Agriculture in Quebec that a committee be formed between representatives of the Farm Credit Corporation, the Quebec Farm Credit Bureau, and the Quebec Department of Agriculture and Colonization, to promote co-ordination of their respective activities.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL INTERIM WELFARE REPORTS

Motion No. 78—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of the interim reports of the Federal-Provincial Working Group on Costs of Welfare Programs, the Federal-Provincial Task Force on a Developmental Approach to Public Assistance, and the Federal-Provincial Study Group on Alienation, presented to the Federal-Provincial meeting of federal and provincial welfare ministers held in Victoria, British Columbia, on October 2 and 3, 1969.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the interim reports referred to in the hon. member's motion were prepared by working groups of federal and provincial officials at the direction of the federal and provincial ministers of welfare.

The reports were presented to a federal-provincial conference held in Victoria, B.C. on October 2 and 3, 1969. The decision taken at that conference was that the reports are of an interim nature only and should not be released. Under the circumstances my minister is unable to table the papers requested and asks that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be withdrawn?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Such an investigation would not be warranted at this time because the plan is still in its initial phase and no report has been prepared. Under the circumstances, my minister requests that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw it and reword it to meet the point the Parliamentary Secretary has made.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the cost-benefit study referred to by the President of the Treasury Board is the report by Dr. Rose for which there is agreement to table in response to motion No. 92, also in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be withdrawn?

Mr. Orlikow: I agree.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CONSULTANT STUDIES, DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Motion No. 104—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all outside consultant studies undertaken for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as mentioned in answer to Question No. 1,323, tabled on June 25, 1969, as reported in Hansard on page 10597.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that last week I suggested to the hon. member that since he had put a further series of motions pursuant to my suggestion, specifying more clearly which of the over one thousand consultative reports involved in motions 104 to 123 he desired, the hon. member might like to withdraw these motions 104 to 123. I wonder if he has now made a decision in that regard?

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, with regard to No. 104 I would presume to say that the consumers of this nation are paying for the cost of these consultant studies—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There should be no debate. If the hon. member will not withdraw the motion it will stand for debate.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member's view is the same with regard to the remaining 18 and if it might be appropriate to treat them all in one package and transfer them all for debate?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The notices of motions referred to by the President of the Privy Council are transferred for debate.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, with regard to No. 105 the same applies. With regard to the rest of them—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. These notices of motions have been transferred for debate at the request of the government.

Mr. Skoberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was only discussing No. 104 in the first instance. That is the only one on which I call for a vote at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can call for a vote but if the government asks that it be transferred for debate that is where it goes.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member did not make clear what he wants.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The hon. member was suggesting that 104 and 105 be transferred for debate or voted on and that the rest be dropped. I think that is what he was seeking to do.

Mr. Speaker: If this is the hon. member's wish, there is no difficulty. It is agreed that 104 and 105 are transferred for debate and the subsequent notices of motions are withdrawn. Is this what the hon. member wishes?

Mr. Skoberg: That is correct, Mr. Speaker, and it would have been clear if I had been given time to explain.

Motions Nos. 104 and 105 transferred for debate.

Motions Nos. 106 to 123 inclusive withdrawn.

As no report has been issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare my minister requests that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the government would be agreeable to accepting this motion but there is no such correspondence to lay before the House. This applies to similar motions Nos. 139, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145 and 147. I have spoken to the hon. member and in view of the circumstances he may wish to withdraw these motions.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, the legislation calls for consultation with provinces; the Order in Council says that such consultations have taken place. Thus I am amazed at the answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can be amazed but he cannot tell us so; he can only indicate whether he wishes the motion transferred, put to a vote or withdrawn.

Mr. Burton: In consequence of the statement by the Parliamentary Secretary I should like to have motion 141 transferred for debate and I would give my consent to withdraw the other motions.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand the hon. member he suggests that motion No. 141 be transferred for debate and that motions 137, 139, 141, 142—perhaps the hon. member would indicate again for the guidance of the Chair the motion he wants transferred for debate.

Mr. Burton: I wish to have motion No. 141 transferred for debate. I would ask that motions 137, 139, 142, 143, 144, 145 and 147 be withdrawn. The Parliamentary Secretary did not refer to No. 146, but if the same circumstance applies I would consent to have that motion withdrawn also.

Mr. O'Connell: It does apply.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 141 transferred for debate.

Motions Nos. 137, 139, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146 and 147 withdrawn.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE STUDY BY PROFESSOR G. PAQUETTE

Motion No. 157—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant study by Professor G. Paquette of Carleton University on Canada's Unemployment Insurance Program.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, Professor G. Paquet of Carleton University participated as a member of a team reviewing long-term plans for the unemployment insurance program. The Unemployment Insurance Commission produced working papers as a basis for recommendations which are the subject of consideration by the government as indicated in the Speech from the Throne. These working documents were not designed for publication but as a basis for developing proposals with the Minister of Labour. The substance of these proposals will be presented in the form of a white paper. On this assurance, perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would prefer that the motion stand until we have seen the white paper.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN APPEAL PROCEDURES

Motion No. 159—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the list of actual appeal procedures prepared by the Department of National Health and Welfare for use by the provincial governments in connection with the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, no list of actual appeal procedures has been prepared by the Department of National Health and Welfare for use by the provincial governments in connection with the Canada Assistance Plan. The development of such procedures is the responsibility of the provinces. Under agreements made pursuant to the Canada Assistance Plan, the provinces are obligated to provide by law procedures for appeals from decisions with respect to applications for and the provision of assistance, by persons affected by such decisions. A copy of existing procedures, as set out in provincial assistance statutes and regulations, was tabled in the House on October 22, 1969. Under the circumstances the hon. member is requested to withdraw his motion.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this procedure. So long as hon. members on my left possess a certain degree of curiosity which the government is unable to satisfy, these motions will appear on the Order Paper. I submit that under our Standing Orders there can be no debate. What we have been hearing today is a series of miniature debates. With deference, I contend that the courses open to the government are clear: there is a right to accept a motion, to have it transferred for debate or to reject it. One of these courses should be taken without all these explanations.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have been following a far more sensible way of carrying on our business, that it is far better for an explanation to be given publicly in order that hon. members may be satisfied as to the reasons for having a motion dropped. I suggest, too, that this practice comes well within the rules and that it should be continued.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: It is not within the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the point made by both hon. members is well taken. I have had occasion previously to suggest to Parliamentary Secretaries that their explanations be as brief as possible so as not to lead to unnecessary debate. It is a question of judgment in each instance whether the House is engaging in debate or is being given a brief explanation. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretaries or ministers who think it necessary to give explanations will keep such explanations as brief as possible. Motion 159 is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

MINIMUM WAGE REVIEW

Motion No. 180—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Department of Labour's review of the minimum wage and its effect on the Canadian economy referred to by the Minister of Labour on November 3, 1969, as recorded in Hansard at page 402.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the study was prepared as a confidential internal working paper for the use of members of the Department of Labour. The motion cannot, therefore, be accepted.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would you put the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE DEFERMENTS

Motion No. 181—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a return showing a list of all employers who have applied for deferment in respect to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code showing (a) those which have been approved (b) those which have been rejected (c) those to which consideration is still being given (d) the number of workers employed by each of these employers.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the list referred to in the motion would take an inordinate amount of time to prepare since it would involve individual listings of more than 5,000 employers. The motion therefore cannot be accepted.

We would have no difficulty, however, in making available to the hon. member statistical information on the numbers and disposition of applications for deferment under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, which would not include names of specific employers but could be broken down by industrial categories. This could be done either informally or, if preferred, in response to a question on the order paper or a motion for the production of papers.

Mr. Orlikow: That would be agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROJECT AND ESTIMATE REDUCTIONS

Motion No. 195—Mr. Burton:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a list of (a) all projects postponed, suspended, delayed or cancelled as a result of the program reductions announced by the Prime Minister on August 13, 1969 (b) all estimates which were reduced as a result of the Prime Minister's announcement, together with the total amount of reduction.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, motion for production of papers No. 195 is acceptable to the government, but as far as part (b) of the motion is concerned I would like to inform the hon. member that there are no reduced estimates for the 1969-70 fiscal year as a result of the Prime Minister's announcement.

Mr. Burton: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that motion 195 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

STATEMENT BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL CHAIRMAN RESPECTING WHEAT AND FLOUR EXPORTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada that total exports of wheat and flour are not likely to exceed 360 million bushels by 1975, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government is changing the policy that the right hon. gentleman promised on June 2, 1968, at Winnipeg of raising the export figure to 430 million bushels of wheat per year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has not changed our expectations but it may change the possibility of fulfilling them.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that our exports at current levels, in the context of existing government policy, mean bankruptcies for farmers across the west, is the government of Canada considering positively the appeals by several western agricultural associations for immediate cash assistance either in the form of acreage payments or in some other form, or is it the view of the government of Canada today that these bankruptcies will solve the agricultural problems in the west?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ACQUISITION OF COMPUTEL SYSTEMS LIMITED BY U.S. FIRM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance regarding the fact that Computel Systems Limited of Ottawa has been taken over by University Computer Company of Dallas, which means that three fledgling Canadian companies in the computing industry have now been taken over by United States companies, bringing to 80 per cent United States control of this industry in Canada. What action does the government propose to take in view of the fact the computer industry is of increasing importance in a technological society?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should be pleased to look into the particular situation raised by the hon. member. I do not think we have any constitutional jurisdiction to do anything about this particular industry. I would be glad to look into the matter but I do not believe we really have any jurisdiction.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that one of the minister's predecessors, Mr. Walter Gordon, has just made a speech advocating a 30 per cent takeover tax, may I ask the minister whether the government is considering the possibility of imposing such a tax as a means of deterring these takeovers by foreign investors?

Mr. Benson: I will consider this to about the same degree as my hon. friend is considering the suggestions of Mr. Watkins.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question regarding the study which is being made in his department of the takeover of financial institutions. Will the report on this matter be available fairly soon?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I hope to have the report in the fairly near future. I am also waiting for a report being prepared by the stock exchanges in this regard. In the interim I understand they have stopped the transfer of seats to foreigners.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to indicate whether or not the frequently promised Canada Development Corporation will be established in time to act in this situation?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, it would not be the intention for the Canada Development Corporation to act in such a situation, but it is our intention to proceed with the Canada Development Corporation in the very near future.

[Later:]

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which is prompted by a previous answer. I think I heard him say that a 30 per cent take-over tax was about as probable as the adoption of the Watkins manifesto by the NDP. In view of that answer, would the minister say whether we might expect legislation for the introduction of a 30 per cent take-over tax by Christmas?

Mr. Benson: I believe the hon. member misunderstood my previous answer.

MINIMUM WAGE—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the Minister of Labour and the government to introduce legislation to increase the minimum wage to $1.65 an hour? If so, when may we expect the introduction of such legislation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I said about two weeks ago in answer to a similar question that at the present moment we in the Department of Labour are studying this whole question of minimum wages. We have come to no firm conclusion. I read the same newspaper report, and I might say that when such legislation is to be introduced it will be introduced in the proper manner in the House of Commons.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the committee reviewing minimum wages recommended to the minister and the government that the minimum wage should be increased to $1.65 an hour?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, in order to be as fully informed as possible I have no less than three departmental committees reporting to me on the subject, and each has made different recommendations.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN COACHWAYS BY GREYHOUND LINES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he is aware that Greyhound Lines of Canada, Limited, a subsidiary of Chicago based Greyhound Incorporated, has announced its intention to buy Canadian Coachways, Limited? If so, what steps is the government taking to ascertain whether this proposed takeover by a United States firm of an established and profitable Canadian company is in the best interests of the Canadian public?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the announcement so I will have to look into the matter.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a supplementary question which might be directed either to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the Canadian Transport Commission to call for public hearings on this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me right the CTC can investigate such transactions provided they are formally called to its attention in the form of a complaint by someone of the general public. If that happens I am sure the Commission will look into this matter.

INFLATION—NICKEL PRICE INCREASE—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the increase in the price of nickel. In view of the fact that the third company has now increased its price of nickel and the president of Chrysler has indicated that this will result in higher automobile prices, will the minister say what specific action he is taking to investigate these industries in order that these price rises can be contained?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are not investigating these industries. I said in the House the other day something about plans for discussing with the House Leader the possibility of establishing a committee to study the reports of the Prices and Incomes Commission which is an independent body entitled to look into whatever sectors it sees fit.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's refusal to take any action in this regard, would he be prepared to make arrangements for a debate so we can look into the usefulness of his department since it seems to be doing nothing at all?

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Since we are on the question of mining I should like to refer to a problem in the mining town of Grande Cache.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We seem to be going from one supplementary question to another, none of which seems to be related to the previous question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WEST GERMANY—REVALUATION OF DEUTSCHMARK—ALLOWANCES TO SERVICE PERSONNEL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question arising out of the position in which our forces in Germany, other than the air division, find themselves as a consequence of the upgrading of the value of the Deutschmark. This means to each member of the armed forces a loss of 8½ per cent. What is the government going to do to assure that those members affected will not lose any of their income as a result of conditions actually beyond their control?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there has been an extensive study of this matter by senior officers overseas and officers at CFHQ at Ottawa. As a result of a survey of accommodation on the economy some amendments may be recommended. Otherwise there will be no changes in allowances generally since they are related to the cost of living in Ottawa. I can give an undertaking that I will make sure no inequities occur.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the minister says the government has amendments in mind, does he mean amendments that will remove this unjust anomaly in so far as the allowances of those in the armed forces are concerned?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I said some amendments relating to the allowances of those living on the economy who are the ones really feeling the impact of the revaluation of the Mark.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF FUNDS TO MÉTIS ORGANIZATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development wears two hats, so to speak, I wonder whether I might pose two questions. In light of the recent decision of the Métis Association of Alberta to found a national association to deal with Métis problems, is the minister considering granting funds to aid the new organization as he has done for other Indian groups?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Indian Act applies to those who are listed in it and have the Indian status under that act. The department under my direction can assist only those Indians.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's reply, will he consult with his colleagues in order to find some other means of assisting this new organization?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I shall be glad to study that question, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN POTASH FREIGHT RATE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the announced plans of the railways to increase the rate on shipments of potash by about 6 per cent, would the minister say whether he has directed or will direct that an investigation be made by the Canadian Transport Commission?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware the Premier of Saskatchewan has indicated he is going to talk directly to the two railways. It might be better to await the result of those discussions first.

Mr. Skoberg: Would the minister say whether he would advise the CTC to be represented at these discussions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PENSIONS

RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I had a question for the President of the Treasury Board and you suggested that I withhold it until his return to the House today. Therefore I now ask the President of the Treasury Board what progress is being made with respect to a possible increase in the pensions of superannuated civil servants and does the minister expect a decision on this issue before Christmas or the end of this year?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat the answer I gave to a similar question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I said that this is a subject of considerable concern to the government and it is being looked at in the light of the over-all review of social policy.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he is still full of hope, as he was the last time he answered this question, that something will be done before Christmas?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should have attached my hopefulness to the Christmas season. It was a generally expressed hope.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the study the minister speaks of also includes a study of the pension situation of superannuated members of the RCMP and also ex-members of the armed forces?

Mr. Drury: It does.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—VOLUNTARY RESTRAINT—INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL POLICIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs this question. In view of the widespread price increases which are taking place and the obvious violations of the principle of restraint he has enunciated in the House, has he received any recommendation from the Prices and Incomes Commission concerning policies which ought to be adopted in addition to the policy of voluntary restraint?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The commission, apart from the studies it is conducting, is still endeavouring to negotiate a package of restraint with the union, business and farm groups.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister's intention to refer a number of the reports of the Prices and Incomes Commission to a committee of the House of Commons an indication that the government does not know how to combat inflation and is passing on this question to a committee of the House?

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that there have been price increases in respect of steel, cars, oil and now nickel, and in view of the fact that the minister seems to be uncertain whether or not these increases are being studied by the Prices and Incomes Commission, is the minister prepared to make a statement on motions telling the House which of these price increases are being studied by the Prices and Incomes Commission and what the outcome of these investigations has been?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, it is public knowledge that the Prices and Incomes Commission announced some weeks ago that it is studying the recent increases in steel prices. Apart from that it is endeavouring to negotiate a general package of restraint. So far as the oil situation which the hon. member mentioned is concerned, I met on Wednesday and Thursday of last week with the chief executive officers of Gulf Oil and Imperial Oil and asked them to defer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but my understanding of the question is that the minister was being asked whether he would make a statement on motions. I suggest to him the statement should not be made at this time.

An hon. Member: He has nothing to say anyway.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In making that statement would the minister indicate whether the government has come up with some weapon other than unemployment and bankruptcy to deal with inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

REPERCUSSIONS FROM ST. PIERRE—MIQUELON DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Is the government presently doing studies in order to find out what would be the repercussions in Canada of the development project in St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that such studies are under way.

[English]

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR ORGANIZATION MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the Government House Leader. Bearing in mind the minister's great interest in the standing committees of the House and especially their reports, would the minister at the earliest possible date arrange for an organizational meeting of the Standing Committee on Regional Development so that the committee can elect a chairman and get on with the very important work facing it?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's suggestion will reach the ears of those responsible for the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain.

[Later:]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Government House Leader. Would the minister take the House into his confidence and let the House know just who is responsible for arranging organizational meetings of the committees?

TRANSPORT

DEFENCE OF CTC RAILWAY COSTING FORMULA

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Will the Canadian Transport Commission's formula on railway costing, which is now being appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada by the Canadian Pacific Railway, be fully defended by the government and has top legal counsel been employed or will top legal counsel be employed by the government to that end?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would have to take that question as notice concerning the detail, but as I have said in many answers in respect of the Canadian Transport Commission I think the various procedures are laid out and are well known. However, I shall investigate just how this matter is to be defended before the Supreme Court.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

NEWFOUNDLAND RESETTLEMENT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the criticism that has been levelled against the government's resettlement program in Newfoundland, would the minister agree to have the matter referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I hope the committee will be able to meet as soon as the House returns in January.

[English]

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the Economic Council of Canada estimates that somewhat more than one-fifth of all Canadians live in poverty and the fact that the minister knows where it is possible for a Canadian to live on $30 a week, will the minister inform the House where these places are so that people may move?

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's very dismal showing in kicking off the football at last year's Grey Cup game, can he say whether he is taking any lessons for this year's kick-off ceremony? If he should need any lessons I would be very glad to help him out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

WHITEFISH KILL IN KOOTENAY LAKE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the Department of Fisheries completed its investigation of the heavy kill of whitefish which took place in the west arm of Kootenay Lake over two months ago? If so, what was the cause of the heavy fish kill and what steps have been taken or recommended to prevent the recurrence of a similar disaster?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this question might be placed on the Order Paper.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ACCEPTANCE OF WHEAT IN PAYMENT OF SUCCESSION DUTY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to whom this question should be directed, to the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance. There is a serious situation on the prairies among farmers whose estates owe succession duty. They have lots of wheat on hand but no money and are unable to get credit. In view of its control over the wheat problem through the Wheat Board, will the government give consideration to the acceptance of wheat in payment of succession duties?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that question was asked, perhaps in another form, just recently.

HIGHWAYS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—COST-SHARING FORMULA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and I gave him notice of it a few days ago. Can the hon. gentleman advise what the proposed formula is for cost-sharing on highway programs with the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me this question is of a very general nature. I think it could very well be placed on the Order Paper or debated at the time of adjournment.

Mr. McCleave: Ten o'clock.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE UPSETTING OF ECOLOGICAL BALANCE BY PIPELINE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the recent announcement by Mackenzie Valley Research Limited that it is carrying on work to determine whether a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Edmonton is economically feasible, is the minister taking steps to ensure that the over-all ecological balance of the north is not sacrificed in this type of commercial development?

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether on a question of privilege I could compliment the Prime Minister and most of the senior ministers who are present on their good taste in the colour of their ties today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED OIL PRICES—EFFECT ON FARMERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On November 17 I asked him if he would have the price increases for fuel oil in western Canada investigated, and in his reply he said that all the companies had not yet implemented price increases. In view of the fact that as of this date virtually all of the oil companies have increased prices, would he have the effects of this action on farm production costs investigated?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday and Thursday of last week I asked the chief executives of Gulf and Imperial Oil to defer price increases. The announcements made since then indicate that they are not prepared to go along with such requests. As the hon. member knows, there is no power within the federal government to control these prices.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would reconsider the question I asked him. I asked him whether he would have the results of these increases on farm costs and on the farming community investigated?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister indicated in the House the other day, we are anxious to establish general policies. We have been following general policies to contain inflation. The Minister of Finance will pursue those policies and persist in those policies. As the Prime Minister indicated the other day, it might not serve such a useful purpose to examine every price increase made.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that these increases, which have taken place almost simultaneously, cannot have been the result of coincidence and have all the appearance of a general agreement to mulct the Canadian public, what is the government going to do about prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act to put an end to this continual raising of prices and its unfairness to the Canadian People?

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the right hon. gentleman's comment that these seem to be unfair price increases, particularly in view of the fact that they were asked not to make them—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: That is a non sequitur.

Mr. Basford: The right hon. gentleman, having been Prime Minister of this country, knows that the Director of Research and Investigation under the Combines Investigation Act watches all significant price movements, and if there is evidence of breaching of the act he can be expected to act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the position—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a point of order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to point out to you and to the minister that the question I asked has not been answered. It was, would an investigation be made—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order, but if the hon. member has a supplementary question I will return to him in a moment. For the moment I believe the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert has a supplementary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the fact that the minister's edict or suggestion was not accepted and as he is convinced that any increase is wrong, will he bring to the attention of the organization established to meet such situations the need of action being taken, because everybody seems to be running wild in the matter of prices in Canada today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of his statement that the government has no power to deal with this matter, may I ask him whether he has at any time carried on any correspondence with the premiers of the various provinces on whether or not the provincial governments would be prepared to pass enabling legislation giving to the Prices and Incomes Commission the necessary power to deal with unjustified price increases?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that is a question that falls within the general financial policy of the government and should be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct it to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would like to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, again I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that these price increases are falling on an industry which is already in a depressed condition, will the minister investigate the effect of these increases on the farming industry in western Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Of course the hon. member is merely repeating the question he originally asked. He may feel the question has not been answered, or has not been answered in a satisfactory manner, but he cannot simply repeat the question he asked previously.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SEEKING OF POWER TO INSTITUTE PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Prime Minister to consider that every attempt to deal with the question of price increases has evoked an apology from the cabinet ministers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? The hon. member has been granted the floor and will be granted the floor again for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Saltsman: May I come to the specific question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saltsman: Will the Prime Minister in his discussions with the provincial premiers at the forthcoming conference seek the constitutional power for price controls in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to the premiers of the various provinces suggesting that after the constitutional conference in December we have a further conference early in the new year, presumably in February, to discuss other matters of importance to Canada apart from the constitutional ones. I have received favourable replies from most of them, and I am in the process of sending out letters today suggesting that we look for dates for that meeting and items for the agenda. If the provinces are agreeable I think we would be very anxious to suggest the problem of inflation if it appears that the Prices and Incomes Commission has to report negatively on its efforts. This of course we hope will not happen. But should that happen and should the provinces be agreeable, we would be prepared at the federal level to discuss this very important matter.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Has the increase in prices by the oil companies violated any specific restraint suggested by the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as has been explained in the House almost every day, the Prices and Incomes Commission has been endeavouring to work out an acceptable formula of restraint. Until this has been negotiated and accepted they are not in a position to spell out specific terms of restraint.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary arising out of the assurance of the Prime Minister the other day that the Prices and Incomes Commission was suggesting specific restraints with regard to prices of 5 per cent and 2½ per cent. Have these increases to which the minister referred violated the specific restraints suggested in this way?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, what the commission has been suggesting to business, trade unions and government, is various possible alternatives which would be acceptable at all levels. In the course of endeavouring to negotiate an acceptable package they have made several suggestions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are three or four or five members rising for the purpose of asking supplementary questions on a subject on which hon. members have been asking questions for some 15 minutes. There are a number of other hon. members who have been waiting anxiously for an opportunity to get the floor. I think perhaps at this point we might give this opportunity to the hon. member for Moncton.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEW BRUNSWICK—EFFECT OF LAY-OFFS AND CURTAILMENTS

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of recent announcements of curtailed services and substantial lay-offs by the C.N.R. in New Brunswick, will the minister assure the House that any decisions taken in transportation policy will not undermine the efforts of his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to maintain full employment in that area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will do my very best, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

URBAN RENEWAL GUIDELINES—DEPENDENCE ON URBAN AFFAIRS POLICY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing is so slow in coming out with guidelines for urban renewal, can the Prime Minister state whether one of the reasons for this slowness is that the government wants to announce at the same time its general policy with respect to urban affairs?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

STATUS OF LAC LA BICHE NEW START PROGRAM

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that in recent days approximately 20 staff members have been laid off from the Alberta New Start Incorporated School in my home town of Lac la Biche, does this indicate that the minister now feels the project has served its purpose?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Certainly not, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

STATUS OF NOVA SCOTIA NEW START PROGRAM

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the Nova Scotia new start program is about to end its mandate soon, could the minister make a statement in the House on whether this program will be extended or abandoned?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is a known fact that those are experimental programs, and as soon as the experience is completed, we will have to decide whether they are to be extended, increased, broadened or abolished.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS OF FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct another question to the President of the Treasury Board. I should like to test his hopefulness again. Can the minister say whether a decision will soon be made and announced regarding the federal government's participation in the medicare premiums of its employees and superannuates in view of the great cost of these premiums in some provinces, particularly here in Ontario?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): In the chronological sense, I am much more hopeful.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SASKATCHEWAN—EXTENSION OF DESIGNATED REGIONS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. Since the population of Saskatchewan fell by 6,000 during the past year, the only province to experience such a decline, and since it has also experienced a serious decline in the income level, is it the intention of the government to extend or add to the designated regions in that province established under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this type of question ought to be placed on the Order Paper or asked at the time of adjournment. The minister might like to make a statement on motions about the matter.

TRANSPORT

PLACING OF FERRY, "PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND", IN MUSEUM

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. By his tie he could be a red Tory, but I am sure he is not. The question concerns the placing of that historic vessel, the Prince Edward Island, as an exhibit in two museums, in Ottawa and Prince Edward Island. Would he give consideration to having this fine old ship rest in one museum in one place? I could suggest such a place.

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for debate at the time of adjournment.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

AIR TRANSPORT

WABUSH—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FACILITIES FOR LANDING

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the evidence given by executives of Quebecair yesterday to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications indicating that Department of Transport facilities at Wabush, Labrador, are far from adequate for the safe landing of large aircraft, and in view of the tragedy near the airport recently, will the minister be making a statement soon in regard to this extremely urgent matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the evidence that was given to the committee, but I should like to inform the House that Mr. Arnold Slangen of Quebecair has indicated that the news stories have misquoted him. These stories are all I have seen, but I have asked for a transcript. I understand that I am to appear before the transport committee tomorrow morning, at which time I will be glad to make a statement.

BROADCASTING

SALE OF TELEVISION STATION CKLW—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy participating in the question period finale, though I seldom have enough breath left to put my question. My question is addressed to the Secretary of State. Given the urgent situation created by the sale of Windsor television station CKLW and the further Americanization of Canadian airwaves, plus the concentration of the communications media in Canada, would the minister make a statement on motions indicating what action either he or the CBC intends to take in this regard?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am quite ready to consider that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

LAW REFORM

ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT COMMISSION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice, just in case he feels lonely or ignored. Has the minister set up the permanent law reform commission and, if not, when does he expect to set it up?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I hope to introduce legislation after Christmas.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. May I ask him whether the new chairman of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has been appointed and, if not, when we may expect such appointment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, he has not yet been chosen. As soon as we find someone whose qualifications are at least comparable to those of Mr. Fullerton, we shall appoint him. However, I cannot give any indications in this regard at the present time.

[English]

HIRING OF EMPLOYEES FROM OVERSEAS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question with respect to Devco. Last week I asked the minister whether he would examine the question of hiring employees from overseas. Has he looked into the matter and can he suggest any remedy?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there has been a freeze on hirings at Devco as well as in most government departments and Crown Corporations for over a year. In fact, only one person has been hired, this was an immigrant who had been in Canada for over six months and who was a supervisor. I do not have any further information about the hiring of foreigners at Devco.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister something to say?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period is just about to expire.

Mr. MacInnis: I would ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to get in touch with the Prime Minister who has a letter of complaint concerning these hirings. The person mentioned by the minister has not been in Cape Breton for the last six months.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question period has expired.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 25, consideration in committee of Bill C-155, to amend the Excise Tax Act—Mr. Gray (for the Minister of Finance)—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-155, to amend the Excise Tax Act. When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 25, 1969, clause 1 of the bill was being considered.

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, yesterday evening when we were in committee the hon. member for Edmonton West made what I think is a very constructive suggestion as to our method of study of the bill before us. He drew to the attention of the committee the fact that clause 1 actually contains the major parts of the tax proposal in question. Clause 1 calls for the addition of a new Part II to the Excise Tax Act, and the new Part II is divided into a number of clauses. As I understand my hon. friend's proposal, it is that we deal with each of the clauses or paragraphs of the proposed new Part II in order and that we do not begin our discussion on any later clause or paragraph in Part II until we have concluded the discussion on the earlier paragraphs or clauses in question. I believe that is the procedure the committee used in the past when similar bills were being considered.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we proceed in this way?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The discussion will begin on paragraph 8 (a)(1) of clause 1.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, in considering paragraph 8 it seems to me that we need some clarification as to just what type of air carrier will be caught by the provisions of the bill as it is drafted. We know that the standard commercial carrier is by definition and classification covered in paragraph 8(a)(1). We also find there foreign air carriers which are authorized to operate in Canada, and that part gives no great difficulty. I am wondering about the third category listed in the paragraph. Will that category take into consideration the type of operation furnished by an air service which forms part of a corporate structure; in other words, which is a subsidiary of a large corporation of business and which provides executive aircraft or employee transportation to any job?

Actually, as provided under the Aeronautics Act there is a book entry exchange that is related to the quantum of the depreciation of the aircraft in question. There is a payment off the cost of the aircraft which is sold by the parent company to the subsidiary and in return therefor the aircraft-owning subsidiary performs air carrier services for employees of the parent company. Is this kind of operation to be caught by the definition "certified air carrier", or are we going to have something else?

I am not suggesting that there is in any way a gap in the legislation, but in order that we may be certain, are such operations to be included? Also, will there be included what we may call arranged air transportation cases, as opposed to what we understand by commercially scheduled air services or major, recognized charter air services? That is, will charter services in the development areas, as well as those for tourism, hunting, and so on, be included? Is the minister in a position to give us an answer on that point?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the type of air service my hon. friend is referring to, an air service that is part of a corporate structure which is carrying on some type of general business operation, is not intended to be included. I understand this matter will fall under clause 5 of the regulations. I am referring to the commercial air service regulations under the Aeronautics Act. These types of aircraft would not, therefore, be among those which, if passengers were carried, would be subject to the tax.

Clause 8(a) of the bill deals with certain specific classes as set forth under the commercial or service regulations made under the Aeronautics Act. Perhaps I should read part of the subsection:

'certified air carrier' means (i) an air carrier that, pursuant to the Commercial Air Service Regulations made under the Aeronautics Act, is authorized by the Canadian Transport Commission to operate as an air carrier or as a commercial air service under any one or more of the following classifications as described in those Regulations, that is to say: Class 1, Class 2, Class 3, Class 4 (Groups AA and A), Class 8, Class 9-2, Class 9-3 and Class 9-4 (Groups AA and A);

If I am correct in assuming that this type of operation would fall under clause 5, as I am advised, the operation, as the hon. member describes it, would not be subject to the tax. If the committee desires, I would be happy to place on record a description of the types of operations covered by each of the classes that are among those included in clause 8(a) of the bill. If the committee wishes me to do so, I will read it, although it may be a rather lengthy procedure. I gather, Mr. Chairman, that there is such a disposition. These are the classes of carriers referred to in clause 8(a):

Class 1 air carriers, being air carriers authorized by the committee to operate a class 1 scheduled commercial air service between points within Canada.

Class 1 scheduled commercial air service, being the public transportation of persons, mails or goods by an air carrier serving specific points in accordance with a service schedule and at a toll per unit.

Class 2 air carriers, being air carriers authorized by the committee to operate a class 2 regular specific point commercial air service between points within Canada.

Class 2 regular specific point commercial air service, being the public transportation of persons, mails or goods by an air carrier serving specific points on a route pattern, with some degree of regularity and at a toll per unit.

Class 3 air carriers, being air carriers authorized by the committee to operate a class 3 irregular specific point commercial air service between points within Canada.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Class 3 irregular specific point commercial air service, being the public transportation of persons, mails or goods by an air carrier, from a base, serving a specific point or points at a toll per unit.

Class 4 air carriers, being air carriers authorized by the committee to operate a class 4 charter commercial air service within Canada.

Class 4 charter commercial air service, being the public transportation of persons or goods by an air carrier, from the base or the protected base named in the licence of the air-carrier, at a toll per mile or per hour for the charter of the entire aircraft, or at such other tolls as may be permitted by the committee.

Class 4, group AA, being commercial air services operated with fixed or rotating wing aircraft having a maximum authorized take-off weight on wheels in excess of 35,000 pounds.

Class 4, group A, being commercial air services operated with fixed or rotating wing aircraft having a maximum authorized take-off weight on wheels in excess of 18,000 pounds but not greater than 35,000 pounds.

Before passing on to class 8 may I digress and say I am advised that the effect of the proposal would be to exclude small aircraft providing charter service, those having a take-off weight of less than 18,000 pounds. I now move on to class 8.

Class 8 international air carriers, being domestic or foreign air carriers designated by the government of any state and authorized by the committee to operate an international scheduled air service between Canada and any other state, pursuant to an international agreement to which Canada is a party.

I would be happy to go on and read the other categories. In most cases they deal with international services. Perhaps with the consent of the committee I could undertake to have this printed in Hansard. If the committee prefers, I will read them. Since I gather it is the disposition of the committee for me to continue reading, I will do so.

Class 9-2 international non-scheduled air carriers, being domestic or foreign air carriers authorized by the committee to operate, between Canada and any other state, a commercial air service of a class performed by a class 2 air carrier.

Class 9-3 international non-scheduled air carriers, being domestic or foreign air carriers authorized by the committee to operate, between Canada and any other state, a commercial air service of a class performed by a class 3 air carrier.

Class 9-4 international non-scheduled air carriers, being domestic or foreign air carriers authorized by the committee to operate, between Canada and any other state, a commercial air service of a class performed by a class 4 air carrier.

Class 9-4, group AA, being commercial air services operated with fixed or rotating wing aircraft having a maximum authorized take-off weight on wheels in excess of 35,000 pounds.

Class 9-4, group A, being commercial air services operated with fixed or rotating wing aircraft having a maximum authorized take-off weight on wheels in excess of 18,000 pounds but not greater than 35,000 pounds.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have covered all the classes listed in proposed paragraph (a) of the proposed new Part II.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, this would tend to confirm the point that I was trying to make yesterday and, frankly, it is contrary to what the minister was trying to put to the House as justification for the ad valorem tax. I clearly indicated that a number of people will use air transport facilities as passengers but not necessarily cash passengers. They will use the airports, air transportation facilities and communications networks as much as anyone else, but they will not be paying any tax. That is why I make this additional argument that there should be a flat rate air departure tax. This would make more sense and would spread the burden equally.

If a business transports its personnel by its own aircraft, that is its own decision, but they are using air transport facilities. This should be a cost of their business in the same way as those personnel who are using regular scheduled aircraft. I can see there will be marginal operations wherein it will be of advantage to purchase a private aircraft in which to transport employees for business purposes. There is to be a 5 per cent tax, and if these passengers travel a great deal they will be removed from the clientele of the scheduled airlines and, in other areas, the charter services and the government will not receive the revenue contemplated by this bill.

I am not particularly anxious to see another tax imposed on the Canadian people, but if we are looking at an equitable base for a tax on the basis that it is required to pay for air transport facilities whether they be airports, terminals, runways or guidance systems—that is the take-off and landing facilities as well as the personnel that go with them, the radio beams that are maintained and all the safety features that go into Canada's air transport facilities—this should be a user tax. I agree that these costs should in part be borne by the traffic, but why not spread them evenly on the basis of a flat rate departure tax? This is done in many other major countries of the world. Air terminals such as the one serving London, which is very much larger than any we have in Canada, impose a departure tax. I have been through airports such as that and I have not experienced any great delay. The flat rate tax is either added on to the cost of your ticket as a separate item, or it is necessary to purchase a ticket as you go through the wicket; the collection is right there. In the majority of instances the airlines would not have to worry about the collection of this tax; it would be collected through the airport facilities. There are ways and means of doing this. I will come back to this matter when we are discussing paragraph 10.

The minister told us who will be covered under the certified air carriers provision. This indicates that there is a restricted base for the collection of the tax, and I believe it should be widened.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should attempt to deal with the hon. member's argument to some extent. We must not overlook the fact that owners of company and private aircraft in the category the hon. member mentioned make payments through landing fees and other charges at airports. The Minister of Finance in his budget statement said all these charges and fees are under review, and it could well be there will be appropriate increases where required in these fees. If it appears that people using this type of aircraft are not paying their fair share in comparison with passengers on the other classes of aircraft which are covered, the way to deal with that would be to make appropriate adjustments in the scale of landing fees and other charges for such aircraft.

I do not think the hon. member has had a chance to give the attention he might otherwise wish to give to the administrative difficulties involved in applying a departure tax. A departure tax would not necessarily catch company executives who are not entering through the main terminal building to take one of these plans; they might be using private terminals. Think of the multiplicity of staff and records which would be required to deal with this situation. It seems to me that a more positive approach in dealing with the category the hon. member has outlined would be by way of a review of the scale of user fees and charges.

I might refer to some of the things I said last night about the difficulties created when use is made of a departure tax, the inequities which could be caused for people who travel, say, between Vancouver and Halifax and who for one reason or another are obliged to stop at more than one airport on the way. According to the hon. member's proposal, they would pay four taxes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gray: The hon. member spoke of a departure tax from the airport. Each time a passenger lands he would have to get on another plane and depart.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is nonsense, and you know it.

Mr. Gray: It is a difficulty which has to be considered. Perhaps the hon. member can indicate a way of eliminating it. I do not think he has given the consideration he might otherwise wish to give to the problem of congestion which could be caused by collecting departure taxes, a problem which is increasingly evident at foreign airports and which is likely to increase seriously with the use of jumbo jets. I might say that the airlines which will be carrying the largest number of passengers have expressed the view that if there is to be a tax in this area, it should be in the form proposed rather than in the form of a departure tax, having regard to all the administrative difficulties.

As I said last night, the major airlines are already geared to collect a tax of a similar nature covering flights in the United States. If I am correctly advised of the views of the airlines in question, I submit we ought to give some weight, based on their practical experience, to views made available to the government when it was preparing the legislation which is before us today.

Mr. Simpson: Did I understand the minister to say that passengers aboard aircraft with a capacity of less than 18,000 pounds would be exempt from this tax?

Mr. Gray: If the aircraft is in the charter category.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I want to clear this question up, because that is one of the major categories. I think we are getting ahead of ourselves. Am I correct in assuming that aircraft in charter service and which have a capacity of less than 18,000 pounds will be exempt from the requirement to be certified as an air carrier? I refer particularly to charter services for oil prospecting in the Northwest Territories, or for hunting.

There are a great number of these operations and, frankly, the facilities provided by the Department of Transport are less than rudimentary. There may be a dock; there will certainly be a radio connection, but that is about all. There will be a dock at the point of departure but from there on the aircraft land on floats. The Department of Transport provides few or no services. If these people have to pay an additional 5 per cent of whatever may be the transportation fee in outlying areas, where the fee is already very high, I would invite the minister and the officials of the department to become absorbed in a program of that type and find out how long they would refrain from protesting against such an obvious injustice. I am referring to equating a service of this type with that of a scheduled transport service provided by one of the major air carriers.

Mr. Gray: It is my understanding that the effect of the exclusion from the definition of certified air carrier would mean that at the very least a substantial proportion of air travel in isolated areas would not be subject to this tax. Perhaps it would be appropriate if I were to read into the record a list of the types of carriers excluded from the definition of certified air carrier; it might help to clear the air in this area of concern. This is the list of types of carrier excluded from the definition of certified air carrier: Class 4 not in groups AA and A.

These are carriers authorized to operate a charter service in Canada by means of aircraft with a maximum authorized take-off weight of less than 18,000 pounds. This would exclude from the definition of certified air carrier a wide range of aircraft used for charter services in the north, including Otter, Twin Otter, Beaver, Norseman, Skyvan and Gruman Goose aircraft as well as virtually all helicopters now in use.

The next is class 5. These are carriers authorized to operate a contract commercial air service, being the transportation of persons or goods by air solely in accordance with one or more specific contracts. An example would be Hollinger Ungava Air Transport which was set up by the Iron Ore Company of Canada to transport freight and individuals by air during the construction of the railway to its iron ore project in Quebec and Labrador. Another example would be Hudson's Bay Air Transport Limited. These carriers must serve one or a group of related companies. I understand there are not many of these carriers.

Next is class 6. These are carriers authorized to operate a flying club commercial air service, being an air service providing flying training and recreational flying to the members of clubs incorporated as non-profit organizations.

Then class 7. These are carriers authorized to operate a specialty service such as crop-dusting, aerial surveys, fire-fighting.

The next is class 9-5. These are international, non-scheduled air carriers authorized to operate between Canada and any other state a commercial service in accordance with one or more specific contracts. An example is Hudson's Bay Air Transport Limited.

Then there is class 9-7. There are international, non-scheduled air carriers authorized to operate between Canada and any other state a specialty air service. I understand there are very few of these.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, although I am pleased to hear the minister outline some of the types of air carriers which would be exempt from this tax, I still assert that in many respects this is discriminatory legislation as far as people living in isolated areas of northern Canada are concerned. The minister has endeavoured to show that in a large number of these communities the air transportation of passengers is carried out by means of planes of the smaller type, and generally this is so. However, he should remember that we do enjoy regular scheduled flights; this is the case in my own province of Manitoba, at least. Passengers have the choice between air transportation or an exceedingly long train journey when they wish to reach the more populated areas of the province. Fares are high enough as it is, yet here we find a tax being imposed on people who are pretty well obliged to use the type of transportation we are now considering. The minister pointed out that in many of these outlying places only the smaller type of plane is used.

In many isolated areas of northern Manitoba the province has constructed, at its own expense, landing-strips that are capable of handling fairly large aircraft, aircraft which, I can assure the minister, are capable or carrying more than 18,000 pounds. This 5 per cent tax will go into the federal treasury, and I presume the Department of Transport will reap some benefit from it through the estimates.

During the course of the last seven years we have been requesting the Department of Transport to assist in the construction of airstrips in these isolated and outlying areas of northern Manitoba, but without success.

Despite this, some 15 airstrips have been constructed by the northern affairs department of the province of Manitoba. I assume that no consideration has been given to passing on part of this 5 per cent tax to the province, which has to bear much of the cost of maintaining these airstrips.

We also require air transportation services between such places as Churchill and Winnipeg. The minister may point out that other modes of transportation are available, but Canadian National Railways have already made application to withdraw their passenger service between these two points. Although they may not do so for some time, when they do it will be absolutely essential to maintain air services between these two points.

I agree that some form of taxation or some assessment can justifiably be imposed upon those who use the facilities of the Department of Transport, such as air terminals, airfields and runways in various parts of Canada. Although, as I have mentioned, in the northern parts of the province of Manitoba some of the runways have been constructed by the province, the Department of Transport is going to impose a 5 per cent tax on all aircraft exceeding 18,000 pounds capacity which use them.

I think the minister should take another look at this situation. I would also point out that the only mode of transportation between Churchill and Yellowknife, Edmonton and Yellowknife and on to the Northwest Territories is aircraft. This bill will discriminate against people travelling in northern areas who are obliged to travel by air.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I see another hon. member rising but perhaps I could first reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Churchill. As I understand it, the airstrips built by the province of Manitoba to which he referred, are of a rather basic type. All the air traffic control and navigational facilities, as well a meteorological facilities, are provided by the federal Department of Transport. To this extent, therefore, the people using the airstrips benefit from these services.

People flying from these airstrips to cities like Winnipeg would benefit by using the facilities at the airports which this tax will be used to help maintain. Let us not forget, as I said yesterday evening, that the sole purpose of the tax is not the maintenance or expansion of airport buildings or runways; I understand it will be used to help pay for the whole range of services that are provided by the federal Department of Transport in the field of air transportation. Therefore, when assessing what benefit people in the areas to which my hon. friend referred will derive from this tax, one should bear in mind that they will use the facilities provided by the Department of Transport and any expansion or improvement thereto that may be brought about. I remind the hon. member that charter aircraft of less than 18,000 pounds take-off weight are not subject to this tax.

[Mr. Simpson.]

Mr. Simpson: I do not want to belabour the point, Mr. Chairman, or to get into an argument with the minister. I agree that the Department of Transport is providing navigational aids at airstrips built in northern Manitoba, but I wish he would talk this matter over with his colleague the Minister of Communications. I have been urging the minister during the last few days to do something to improve the mail service in these areas. Although there is daily use of these airstrips in northern Manitoba, the mail carriers sometimes claim they cannot land because of bad weather. They have not complained of lack of navigational aids, but they have indicated that bad weather has prevented their landing.

I should like to know whether the Department of Transport feels that these navigational aids are adequate, and that lack of adequate facilities is not the reason mail carriers are unable to land on these strips.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief on this bill which seeks to impose a transportation tax. I want to lend my support to those colleagues of mine who have voiced protest at the nature of the tax. I, like other hon. members, agree with the principle that services provided at airports should be paid for on a self-liquidating basis, but at the same time I feel that the bill has a discriminatory feature. I do not agree with the ad valorem tax; I lean more toward supporting a per capita tax. Other hon. members have remarked on the fact that the per capita tax is applied in other countries across the world, and I do not understand why simply because our great neighbour to the south happens to apply an ad valorem tax we should also adopt this principle.

I recently had the honour to be delegated by the House to attend the 15th annual conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in the British West Indies. While there I had occasion to do a little travelling by aeroplane, and I noticed that a per capita tax was applied at the airports.

Mention was also made of the fact that the operators of small aircraft in the north, those plying between isolated points and areas of greater population, would suffer a penalty as a result of this ad valorem tax.

In the majority of cases the small aircraft used to convey people and goods out of the North and other peripheral areas of Canada fly only part of a longer journey; they fly to places such as Edmonton, Churchill or Calgary where the passengers then board other aircraft operated by Air Canada or CPA to complete their journeys. These people will be penalized by having to pay this ad valorem tax. We must remember that the cost to these people is a great deal more on long flights whether or not it is broken down into two or three strips on different air carriers. This is particularly true if they are travelling to Toronto or Montreal; the expense involved is much greater than it is to the people who live in the more populated areas of Canada.

Let me remind hon. members of the application before the Transport Commission in respect of passenger services in western Canada. These people who as a result of their isolation from the major cities of Canada have to travel to eastern Canada on business, will have to pay more. The nature of their business demands that they travel by air. This ad valorem tax will discriminate against them. There are many other arguments that could be made, but at this time I should just like to support my colleagues in objecting to what I feel is a discriminatory measure. I support a per capita tax but not an ad valorem tax.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I heard the hon. member for Churchill say that he did not want to argue with the minister. After listening to the replies of the minister I feel more and more inclined to argue with him. This bill was obviously drafted in a vacuum at the Department of Finance, without any real understanding of air travel in Canada.

Let us go back to the beginnings of this bill. I remember when the then Minister of Transport, now the president of the Canadian Transport Commission, discussed the principles of the Transportation Act in this House. He spoke about the idea of user charges; in other words, that the people using transportation facilities provided out of public funds should within reason be required to pay for that use. There may not be a great deal of quarrel among members of the House on that principle, but there may be argument as to how and when it should be applied.

When one looks at this bill with the idea that it embodies a flat percentage charge on the amount paid for air transportation in Canada, you begin to realize how completely inequitable it is. I could see some ground in equity for this principle if it were applied to class 1 airlines operating on major airline routes in Canada. We have heard a lot from the Minister of Transport about the increasing costs of operating and developing major air terminals in Canada. Any one of us who has had occasion to use the existing services can visualize what will be required because of the advent of jumbo jets. If the spokesmen of the Department of Transport are talking about these things, they make some sense. When you refer to the users of class 3 airline services, as this bill does, and put them in the same class as users of class 1 services it should be apparent, even to the minister from a metropolitan region of Ontario who is piloting this bill through the House, just how absurd and ridiculous it is.

I could bring into this chamber a whole stack of correspondence from my constituents. They invariably argue about airlines rates. I received one letter recently which was generated by the air transport committee. My constituent documented evidence in support of the fact that in some parts of Canada you can travel 2,000 miles by air for what it costs my constituents to travel 200 miles by air. This means that the people who are travelling 200 miles between small communities in my constituency have to pay the same tax as those who travel by air from Vancouver to Winnipeg.

The operators using small planes have a greater understanding of this situation, and they point out that the economics of their operation is such that it is essential the rate per mile be greater. This is particularly so of a plane carrying passengers on a route with stops at 20 mile intervals, when compared with one operating on a 2,000 mile route with no interval stops and carrying ten, 15 or 20 times the number of passengers.

The more one examines this principle of a percentage tax levied across the board on the amount paid, the more apparent it becomes that this bill is a completely inequitable approach when dealing with a problem for which most members of this House have sympathy. This problem was outlined previously by the Minister of Transport. Apparently the Minister of Transport has suggested to the cabinet that there is a case to be made for a user charge in respect of the rising cost of providing and maintaining terminal facilities for those travelling by air. One could repeat the suggestion that by and large it is the well-to-do element of our population which travels by air, and this is generally true if one ignores those areas of Canada wherein people have no alternate method of travel no matter how wealthy they are.

Let us consider the man who must take his children 200 miles to the dentist, as compared with the man who can get on a streetcar, travel by highway or by train: keeping this in mind, it should become apparent to hon. members that this Bill is not the answer to the problem of meeting the rising costs of air terminal facilities in Canada.

I was a member of the northern affairs committee which made the first trip across the Arctic. I understand the committee has made two or three visits since then. Anyone who has travelled across the Arctic is aware of the feeling of the people of the north regarding transportation costs.

I have listened to many statements made in this House by the minister which indicated it will be a long time before there is another avenue of transportation available to people who live and work in our northern areas. I see the hon. member for Fort William is in his seat. He was the chairman of the committee which first travelled across the north. I hope before this discussion ends he will confirm the truth of what I am saying. We heard one recurring theme regarding the opening of the north: it was in relation to the need for considering the high cost of transportation of goods and passengers in that area. In spite of that, what is this minister asking the House to do in this bill? He is asking us to add a flat rate increase of 5 per cent to the cost of travel for practically all those people who live in the 35 per cent to 40 per cent part of Canada which is north of the provinces.

We listened the other day to a discussion about constitutional development. There was a debate on it in the House. There are pros and cons in respect of that subject. This point has no direct connection with the subject matter of the bill, but I would point out that if the government intends to pursue this kind of direction in its taxing policies, the question of the constitutional development of the north is apt to become rather academic because no one will be able to afford to live north of the 60th parallel. These are the types of issue which appear in this bill which the minister thinks is a rather simple method of raising revenue in order to meet the rising cost of the provision of airport facilities, terminal and otherwise, by the Department of Transport.

I could spend some time explaining that many people, certainly those in my constituency, receive from the Department of Transport very little in the way of services. I realize that the carriers are licensed by officials of the Department of Transport who presumably enforce the regulations to ensure that planes are safe, and so on. I am not denying that the operators and users of planes flying on class 3 routes around the coast do not receive some benefit from the operations of the Department of Transport. Those, however, are not the costs which have been referred to by supporters of the government; they mentioned the increased cost of major airport terminals.

Mr. Gray: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I said, not once but several times, that the yield of this tax is to be applied not simply to the cost of major terminals but to the whole range of services provided by the Department of Transport in the field of air transportation.

Mr. Barnett: I heard the minister say that. He said that terminals and other air travel facilities provided by the Department of Transport were to be covered. But the genesis of the idea of a user charge providing additional revenue was in a debate in this House about the rising cost of air terminal facilities. I am sure the minister was in the House when that discussion was taking place. It was not too long ago. If he does not believe me, let him consult Hansard or the president of the Canadian Transport Commission. I am sure the gist of what I am attempting to put before the House willl be verified by Mr. Pickersgill.

Mr. Chairman, I was about to say I recognize that some of the services provided by the Department of Transport are for people who use class 3 licensed carrier routes, to take an example of one of the classes which is included. But by and large in my area, and over a large part of Canada, this type of plane flies under visual-flight rules. In most cases there are no terminal facilities. In some cases, so far as float-type planes are concerned, there are little docks which can be used by the public.

I see in the House the Solicitor General, who is a former minister of transport. He might recall my showing him one of these floats in my constituency when he opened a terminal at which jet aircraft have landed although it is not a jet aircraft terminal. There are some facilities provided, but I am sure the Solicitor General would agree that these are rather primitive and inexpensive facilities. These are the facilities provided to the people who under the terms of this bill will pay the most per capita for their air travel.

As this bill is drafted, the people who receive the least will pay the most. I submit that the minister ought to concede this is not a fair principle of taxation to apply to Canadians or, for that matter, to any other people. I hope the minister will take some of these matters into consideration. I recognize this is a rather unusual bill because it will not go before a standing committee of the House. It is the kind of proposition which should be studied by a standing or special committee of the House so that those most concerned in its details or application could make their voices heard. I have simply attempted to bring out some of the facets of the bill as it now stands. This measure will affect a very large percentage of the people whom I represent in this House, people who have no means of travel other than air, which is a very expensive mode of travel.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question of the minister in respect of this clause. The minister indicated certain carriers which will be exempt from the tax. Having listened to the hon. member for Churchill and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni I am more convinced than ever that a large number of people in areas in which air transportation is the only means of transportation will bear the brunt of the tax burden. I am sure the officials of the department have made surveys. Would the minister indicate what surveys have been made in respect of the towns and communities in Canada which have only air services? I am thinking of places like Lac-la-Biche in Alberta, Wabush in Labrador, and Newfoundland which depend heavily on air transportation.

In Toronto, for example, a person very well might not find it necessary in his lifetime to spend five cents on air transportation, but any one who lives in Wabush has no alternative. If people in that area wish to move, they pretty well have to fly. I visited Lac-la-Biche, Alberta, a few months ago. If I am not mistaken, air travel is the only means of transportation to that growing community. We will assume that the bill did not grow out of a vacuum, and that the government has investigated the impact of this legislation and has ascertained who will pay the tax and in what amount. What surveys have been made of areas which have only air transportation, and how much in the form of generated revenue will these people pay per capita?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the studies which led to the proposal in the budget speech, and the studies which followed it when the bill was being prepared, were carried out in exactly the form suggested by my hon. friend. I can assure him and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the bill was not drafted in a vacuum. I understand that prior to the bill being put in its final form for presentation to the House there was consultation with the Air Transport Association of Canada, which represents a very substantial number of carriers of various types in Canada.

There were consultations with major Canadian airlines such as Air Canada and CPA. There were consultations with the International Air Transport Association and also with officials of the Department of Transport who, I presume, would be reasonably well informed about matters connected with air transport in all parts of the country. So far as determining the impact of the tax is concerned, since it is a percentage tax, and ad valorem tax, it is easy in one way to determine it by applying the percentage to the cost of a ticket. Therefore, anyone can determine the impact on a person travelling from any particular point by applying the percentage. I do not think the studies with respect to the bill were developed on a per capita basis, at least those that I am aware of, but rather were along the lines I have outlined.

While my hon. friend and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni were speaking it occurred to me that in considering this situation there is some relevance in the situation now faced by those who travel by car. People who travel by car have to pay a tax on the gasoline they purchase. I could not compute it exactly while sitting here, but it would certainly be in excess of 5 per cent of the price they pay per gallon, and the farther they travel, the more gallons they buy and the more tax they pay.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, but that is a road tax.

Mr. Gray: Yes, but just a minute. Therefore, if Parliament accepts the proposal for this tax, people will be paying a tax on the amount they have to pay for the ticket they buy to travel by air, including those who cannot travel in any other way; but here they will be paying a lesser percentage than people who travel by car and who have to pay a certain percentage on each gallon of gas they use. I do not know if this example could be taken as a complete answer to the points raised by my hon. friend, but it appears that it might have some relevance in our study of the matter.

While I am on my feet I want to assure my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that while discussions at other points in time before this committee or other committees of the House itself may have dealt with airports in particular, I am informed that the intent in dealing with the proceeds of this tax to take into consideration not just airports but also the other operations of the Department of Transport as well in the air services field. And as I believe my hon. friend himself said, while people in his area might not get exactly the same benefit as people in other areas from expenditures by the federal government on the construction of airports, certainly benefit from the services of the department in the field of air services administration, control of civil aviation air traffic control, radio aids to air and marine navigation and meteorological services. So even though they may have to fly in float-planes which weigh over 18,000 pounds and they have to pay this tax, they will benefit from the services I have outlined and will benefit increasingly to the extent these services are expanded.

I am not unmindful of the suggestion the hon. member has made in an informative and constructive way, and I will bear it in mind in any consultation with the departmental officials. One should not look at this matter simply in isolation, in terms of airports and runways alone, but in terms of services to air transportation provided by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I raised the question of the automobile as a comparison to decide whether there is an equitable basis for the imposition of this tax. I think we are all agreed that there can never be complete equity in taxation, but it is our objective to try and arrive at a position as close to equity as possible.

As recorded at page 1242 of yesterday's Hansard, the minister said:

> In the budget statement the Minister of Finance said that a further measure of budgetary significance arises out of a general policy to ask those who benefit directly from a service or facility provided by the government to pay charges more in line with the direct costs involved.

[Mr. Gray.]

He went on to quote the words of the Minister of Finance as recorded at page 9420 of Hansard for last session, as follows:

> It is well known that our expenditures on the construction, equipment, operation and maintenance of airports and other air transport facilities are now very large. In the last fiscal year they are estimated at $73 million. The revenue we obtain from user charges, rents, etc. of one kind and another related to airports and air transport facilities is far less—only about $41 million—

Obviously we can think of this proposed $21 million being used to try and close the gap. I suggested yesterday that there is a comparison here with people who use cars, but cars travel on highways. The highway is a facility which is provided by government, and the extent to which the driver of a car uses that facility is reflected in the amount of tax he pays. If he travels 1,000 miles, the amount he pays to one or more provincial governments will be in relation to his travel. But that is not the case with the tax now proposed by the government.

Consider the case of a man travelling between Peace River and Ottawa. His fare could well be in the order of $300, so he would be paying $15 tax and using three airports. A man who lives in Ottawa and makes 12 round trips over a short distance will use airports 24 times but will pay only the same tax, approximately. There is absolutely no equity in this situation.

Apparently the government is saying, "The ability of a person to pay a tax must be measured by the extent to which he can afford to buy an air ticket. If he can afford to pay $300 for a ticket, that is the measure by which we will calculate his tax-paying capacity and we will charge him $15." I may say that the figures which I am using are taken from memory. Short trip travellers will use airports a lot more than long trip travellers. In one case the airport is the facility provided, and in the other the road is the facility provided. But under these circumstances I do not think the same principle applies to both cases.

Yesterday the minister made what I think was his most valid point, at least from the point of view of a government, when he said there would be difficulty in collecting this tax. Maybe so, Mr. Chairman, but I have never found this government to have too much difficulty with its tax imposing capacity and its ability to collect taxes. If it has any trouble with poverty, it imposes a social development tax. If there is a problem with pollution, it will allow pollution or will impose a tax under the guise of a fee and still allow pollution to continue.

The government produced a white paper to meet inflation dealing with all kinds of taxation. I wonder why the Minister of Finance, who is a real expert on this subject, could not get together with the Minister of Justice and instead of prescribing punitive measures, devise a tax for those who commit crimes or sins. I suggest that we are justified in calling these problems to the attention of the government. It is quite wrong to suggest there is any equity in the imposition of this tax. If the government wants to be quite frank it will say, "The cost of the ticket is a rough yardstick which we will use to measure the imposition of the tax."

I repeat, as I did yesterday, that we are entering an era wherein the people of this country will increase tremendously their use of air transportation. This type of tax will then be unfair and inequitable and will not provide a reasonable yardstick. If the government really wishes to collect additional money for the provision of airport services, it should find other means of doing so.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I asked a question of the minister but perhaps he did not understand it. He has been around for a while, he has been the minister of this department for a while and is already becoming an expert in evasive tactics. I am sure he did not want to do this intentionally, but he can skate around things better than Barbara Ann Scott did.

In case he did not get my question the first time, I should like to ask him whether the government has carried out any surveys on who, in fact, will pay this tax. I am not slow enough to think that the answer is that the people who purchase airline tickets will pay. That is not what I am talking about. If there are 20 million people in Canada and $20 million is generated by the tax, we can assume, if the tax is evenly distributed, that the charge is $1 per capita. Who is going to pay this tax? I am afraid the burden will fall upon those who live in isolated areas such as the northern communities referred to by a number of my colleagues, and communities such as Wabush, Labrador, where there is no transportation except by rail, and that is likely to disappear any day now.

Who is going to pay the tax? Is it the school kid in the summertime? Is it the resident in the isolated community who sometimes has to travel hundreds of miles for medical services? Is it the small businessman? I know all these people will be affected. Has the government made any surveys to determine just who will pay the tax? This is a broad question and I intentionally leave it so in order to give the minister a chance to prove to us and the Canadian people that this legislation was not concocted by a few people in the Department of Finance who did not have sufficient knowledge. Unless he proves this I am afraid he will leave the wrong impression with a great many people.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I did not appear to provide an answer to my hon. friend's question in the form in which it was put, but the way he has rephrased it does not make it any easier to answer. He has asked a rather broad question, a general question which touches upon one of the most thorny issues in the whole matter of taxation, the question of incidence—upon whom does any tax ultimately fall?

There could be all sorts of arguments put forward about the burden of direct and indirect taxes, the distinctions between them and what the distinctions should be. We could devote a lot of time to discussing various philosophies of various economic experts, but I doubt very much whether it would be possible to develop studies which would provide, in any really meaningful way, information of the type my hon. friend is seeking.

Although it may not appear so at first glance, it would seem to me that the people who travel by air most frequently are not necessarily those living in the most isolated areas. Some people who live in the most urbanized, built-up areas travel a great deal in the way of business. Those of us who travel by air from Ottawa every week so often see the same businessmen, or at least the same faces, on the plane all the time. All sorts of people travel in connection with their employment. It is not safe to assume that people from isolated areas are always the most frequent travellers. I regret that I may not be in a position to respond to my hon. friend's question in terms he would like, but I believe this is because we are getting into the area of taxation philosophy more than anything else.

My hon. friend from Peace River mentioned that residents of that area may be in a worse position than someone who travels between Toronto and Ottawa 20 times. He states that the person from Peace River would pay $300 for his ticket but it seems to me that the person who travels between Ottawa and Toronto 20 times would surely pay more; the person making such great numbers of short trips of this kind could pay at least $400. The percentage of tax in the total cost of his ticket would amount to more than that for the person from Peace River.

As my hon. friend says, equity is a very difficult problem when constructing any type of tax. After considering all the problems and difficulties, it will be found that the method we are proposing to the committee is the best and most appropriate one for dealing with them.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I am still not satisfied with the information the minister is giving me. He is telling me, and I am sure—

The Chairman: Order, please. I was extremely lenient, but the hon. member rose on a point of order and the procedure I had in mind was to recognize the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and then revert to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. However, I allowed him to put his question on what I thought was a point of order; at least, that is how it was put to me. Now I should like to return to the original pattern, recognize the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—who apparently is not satisfied with the answer he received, either—and then revert to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have often been dissatisfied with answers given me by ministers. However, I should like to pursue the question a little further with the minister before making any comment. I want to understand the picture clearly. The minister made several references to the fact that this tax would not apply in respect of the operation of certain classes of planes, provided their weight did not exceed 18,000 pounds. With regard to the proposed section 8 of Part II, in which the definition of a certified air carrier is set out, am I correct in assuming this means a certified air carrier will be required to collect a tax on all air fares, including all operations under class 3.

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Barnett: Am I also correct in assuming that where it makes reference to class 4 and groups AA and A under that class, it refers to charter flights using planes of a weight greater than 18,000 pounds?

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his answers, because they underscore the argument I advanced earlier about the way this tax would be applied. Clearly, those who receive the least service from the department will pay the most. If all class 3 aircraft services are to be taxable on the basis of the fare the user pays, it surely is obvious that many people who use no terminal facilities will be paying the tax. Granted, those people are getting some of the other services to which the minister referred. On the other hand, class 1 services, which I assume will carry the largest number of passengers in Canada because they are usually operated over longer distances and with larger aircraft, will have at their disposal the full range of the department's facilities. In other words, anyone using these services will be paying very much less per mile of air travel.

I will not comment on the argument advanced by the hon. member for Peace River about the number of times such people will use an air terminal in the course of a journey. I merely emphasize that those using class 3 services will make very little, if any, use of airport or terminal facilities. In some cases such people initiate a journey from a terminal and sometimes they end a journey at a terminal, but very seldom does their journey begin and end at a terminal.

The minister was trying to draw a parallel between the user tax in question and our gasoline tax which helps to pay for our roads and highways. I will not pursue that argument to an illogical conclusion. I am merely saying that in this particular situation—we are talking of air travel—it costs more to drive a Volkswagen or Datsun than it does to drive a Cadillac. I hope the minister appreciates my point. It is made to show the fallacy underlying his argument, because he argued that there is very little difference in principle between the gasoline tax and the tax being imposed by this bill.

His point was that, roughly speaking, within limits it costs so much a mile to drive a Ford and so much a mile to drive a Chev. But I am afraid that principle does not apply to people who travel by air. That is the point I am trying to make. In other words, the tax of 5 per cent on the fare will not provide equality of cost per mile of air travel By trying to draw a parallel between the gasoline tax and the tax we are now considering, he underscored the argument I was making.

The minister told us that various bodies, organizations and firms were consulted in the drafting of this legislation. May I suggest, and this is not meant to be a criticism, that though airlines and airline organizations are probably concerned about the administrative difficulties of collecting and remitting this tax to the government, their attitude will be, "This is no skin off our nose. We shall simply add 5 per cent to the fare and send that amount to the government." The tax will not cost the airlines anything except that they may lose by being less competitive with other forms of transportation.

I emphasize again that this makes all the more evident the correctness of the arguments some of us have been advancing. This tax will rest most unfairly on those who have no alternate form of transportation, in other words, on those who are captives of the airline carriers and must fly or stay put. I therefore submit that the minister's arguments fall to the ground. If the minister insists on proceeding with this basic approach to taxation, I request him to reconsider the definition of the classes of air service which are to be included under the definition of certified air carrier, in order to eliminate some of the gross inequities of the proposed tax.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to pursue the matter a little further because I am sure the minister is not reading me properly or is affected by an instrument malfunction, so to speak. Perhaps I am not hearing him properly, or perhaps a combination of both factors is causing difficulty.

In so many words, the minister has been telling us that the government does not know who will pay the tax. I am generalizing, of course. We heard several statements about the incidence of taxation, where the greater burden of taxation would fall, and had a small lecture on the theories of taxation. Nevertheless, it still seems that the government does not know which Canadians will pay the tax we are discussing. I cannot accept this because I am sure the minister has available to him statistics showing whether people in airport towns, for instance, use airport facilities and fly more often than people who do not live in airport towns. He must have available to him statistics about the amount of flying done in this country, the percentage of that flying which is to be attributed to people living in small, isolated communities where air transport is the only mode of travel, the types of people who use aircraft and air travel facilities most frequently—whether they are small businessmen, students or others—and the percentage of the Canadian people utilizing our air services. I am sure these statistics are available. I am pursuing this matter because I would like the minister to answer my question.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I have not yet asked my question. I want the minister to tell me—and I assume that this tax will increase regional disparities in Canada—what impact it will have on those who live in small, isolated communities that must rely on air travel. For example, at Churchill Falls, which will be one of the wonders of the world when it is completed, approximately 6,000 people working there can come to the site and leave it only by air. That is the only mode of travel. They go there from all parts of Quebec as well as from Newfoundland and other parts of the Maritimes. Being normal men who like to see their families, they fly back and forth several times a year. By the end of the year they have flown into and out of the Churchill Falls project at least five or six times and have spent $200 or $300 each time, depending upon whether they are travelling to Quebec, Newfoundland or the Maritimes. I emphasize that these 6,000 people live and work in an isolated community and they can get in and out of the work site only by air.

Surely the minister realizes that some communities rely upon air transport, and that this tax will add to their burden. I am afraid the people who live in isolated communities and must use air services will be paying a great bulk of the $20 million this tax is expected to generate. The government does not know who will pay the tax. How does it expect the 264 representatives of the people of Canada to vote for it? How can the government expect our support of this bill? My question is simple: Who is going to pay the tax?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I think the minister has missed one point. As was pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, for people in communities such as Churchill Falls, Yellowknife, Inuvik and all the areas of the north the rate structure is much higher than it is for those in the southern part of Canada. The air mile rate for tickets is much higher. I know this because I have flown into the Northwest Territories. When flying an equal distance on the prairies, the rate is much lower.

The people in the north have no other means of transportation, so the government says, "Sock it to them". I know that phrase is loved by some people on the government side. I am speaking of the people in the frontier areas, which we are trying to develop and where there is no other means of transportation. I invite hon. members from central Canada, who may have just a nodding acquaintance with this subject, to place themselves in the same position in order to see what their reaction would be.

I suggest a far more equitable tax would be a flat rate departure tax, the mechanics of which could readily be worked out. We would then have a much wider base. The citizens of Inuvik, Fort Norman, Fort Simpson and Yellowknife pay a proportionately higher tax because the government insists it wants to use this administratively easy 5 per cent tax figure. It is on behalf of those people that we want to fight.

We are glad to see the minister has been able to explain that much of the flying activity in the north and our frontier lands will not be subject to this tax by reason of the type of aircraft in use, but the scheduled passenger services into these areas are definitely caught by the tax. The Pacific Western service which operates in the Mackenzie River valley to Rankin Inlet, north of Yellowknife, is an example of this. This argument also applies to airlines flying into Labrador and Churchill Falls. I cannot understand why the government is insisting upon loading onto these people an additional proportion of the tax burden. They have a tough enough time as it is. I invite hon. members from the government side to visit these areas to see just what they are like.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a few questions. Like the hon. member for Edmonton West, I am concerned about the situation regarding the Northwest Territories and what this tax will do to those people whose only contact with the outside world is the airlines. For instance, if we look at the fare from Edmonton to Inuvik we see that it is somewhat more than the fare from Edmonton to Ottawa, and yet there are other means of commuting between those last two cities. If you go into the north country, the only way you can travel is by air.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

I know the minister has attempted on a number of occasions to answer this question, but I ask why he needs this additional revenue. Some years ago $32 million was spent in the city of Edmonton on an airport facility, yet on almost every occasion a foreign carrier applied for permission to use that facility, the Air Transport Commission placed obstacles in the way of their use of it. I do not know whether this was designed to protect Air Canada, but I do not think it is fair.

I think the proposed 5 per cent tax is both punitive and discriminatory. It is punitive in the sense it penalizes those people who have to rely completely on air services. I refer primarily to the people of the north. It is discriminatory of certain sections of the country, for instance western Canada where the entire business community must of necessity communicate with Toronto and Montreal where the manufacturing establishments and financial institutions are located. Travel to these points is a necessity; the air fare is high, and this tax will not help the businessman who was slapped recently with a 3 per cent surtax. The white paper indicates he is going to be whacked again. I ask the government when it is going to get off the tax spree we have been on since the last election.

I want to point out once again that most of the burden of this tax will penalize those people who in a year or two will be penalized under the taxation measures proposed in the white paper. I think the most equitable way of raising the revenue that the government seems to need is, as the hon. member for Edmonton West pointed out, by way of a departure tax of $1 or $2 a head on those travelling from the airport terminal.

A year or two ago the international airport in Edmonton imposed $1 a head charge for every passenger using that facility. Nobody complained about it. A great number of passengers use the air facilities across Canada, and they could provide sufficient revenue to meet the minister's requirements. Such a tax would be more equitable than the 5 per cent tax proposed by the government.

I wish to ask the minister one more question: Why is it that on top of the recent increase in Air Canada fares the government is going to impose an additional 5 per cent? The economy air fare from Edmonton to Ottawa used to be $96 and it is now $106. I feel the small businessman who must of necessity travel to eastern Canada is being penalized rather unfairly. Does the minister not agree?

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two questions I wish to address to the minister and a few comments I would like to make. The minister indicated earlier there would be no charge in respect of certain types of aircraft weighing under 18,000 pounds. I did not quite catch his comments with regard to helicopters. I wonder if the minister could tell us when charges will be levied against those chartering helicopters, and whether the weight classification also covers this type of aircraft. Would the minister give us that information at this time?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I pointed out a little earlier in the discussion that excluded from the definition in proposed section 8 would be the type of air carrier that is in class 4 of the air regulations, but not in groups AA and A. These are carriers authorized to operate charter services in Canada by means of aircraft with a maximum authorized take-off weight of less than 18,000 pounds. I am informed that this would exclude from the definition of air carrier virtually all helicopters now in use. There are certain other classes of air carrier which I read into the record earlier, and I presume that in so far as helicopters may come within those classes, they would also be excluded.

Mr. Harding: I should like to thank the minister for that explanation. There are a few points I should like to raise in connection with the bill generally. Again, it would seem to me that the proposed tax has no truly equitable basis. It does not relate to distance travelled but directly to the rates which are charged. Other speakers have drawn attention to this point. I should like to do so, also, and to object to this unfair method which is particularly disadvantageous to people living in the northern areas, in the rural areas and to those travelling on the short runs.

Within the last month we have had an unhappy experience in my riding—a 30 per cent increase in the rates charged by local carriers. This increase was authorized by the air transport committee which felt, I presume, that the company had to be granted an increase in order to carry on. However, it has resulted in our rates being much higher than those charged by the national carriers. This is the point. Here we find a sharp increase affecting northern areas, and we find similar increases affecting the north generally, for a variety of reasons: there is a smaller population on which to draw, and it is much more difficult to take passengers into these out-of-the-way places. The people affected by these higher rates are the ones we are hitting right between the eyes with this tax, and hon. members who represent them have every right in the world to protest it.

As the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has just asked: Who gets hurt most? It is the people in the outlying areas. Those who live in the cities where all the facilities exist, all the good facilities as far as airports are concerned, would pay the least tax under this proposal. Not only do those who live in urban areas have better facilities, but they have better means of communications generally as well as better landing fields, better means of guiding the aircraft to the landing fields, and so on. I suggest to the minister that he go back to the department and look for a better method of applying taxation to those who use air transportation, if he is in favour of a system of just taxation. After all, this is supposed to be a just government heading for a just society.

There are one or two other points I should like to make. First, will the minister tell us whether the department has computed the cost which would fall on the government's own resources if this tax were approved? Will cabinet ministers, government staff and public servants generally be excluded from payment, or will the tax be levied on their fares and charged to the treasury? If an inquiry on these lines has been made, would the minister tell us the estimated cost of the tax to the government itself? Is there to be any charge levied, for example, in connection with fares paid by personnel of the Armed Forces who use air facilities? These are questions which the minister should answer this afternoon.

Earlier today an hon. member made what I thought was a good pitch in favour of a monopoly as far as Air Canada is concerned. I thought he put forward a strong argument. We as taxpayers pay the entire cost of building airports and constructing facilities all over Canada.

I now turn to another question which has been raised this afternoon; I understand the minister intends to inquire into it. A whole host of private operators from one end of Canada to the other use the facilities at our airports. Where do they come into this tax picture? I submit that if we levy a charge on the poor Joe who has to ride on a plane, then, by golly, the others who use the transport facilities should also be charged. When does the government expect to look into this aspect of airport charges?

Again, in closing, I assert that this tax amounts to rank discrimination of those who live in the outlying areas and those who have to take small hops within a locality, one reason being that air fares in these regions are much higher in proportion than they are on the longer runs. I do not know how this tax can possibly be called a fair one. I would appreciate the minister's comments on the question I raised with regard to the cost which this tax would impose directly on the government.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, it seems this is another example of the government making up its mind first and then bringing legislation forward and expressing resentment, almost, at the fact that we should have any opinions on the matter at all. The minister should welcome suggestions from this side of the House. From the information we have been given so far, the picture is still far from clear. It is obvious that almost every speaker who has risen on this side of the House feels that the tax proposed is discriminatory. Surely there are alternative methods of raising the $20 million or so which this tax is expected to produce.

The last speaker suggested—and I must agree it is a valid suggestion—that we might tax the airlines themselves on the basis of a percentage of the business done. If the airlines want to pass the tax on to the customer in a certain way, perhaps by way of a general increase in fares, perhaps on a per capita basis, I would say they know the air transport business better than any of us here can hope to do. Those who really use the airports are the people who run the airplanes, the people who own them. I think it would be a better plan to tax these direct users on the basis of a percentage of business done. It is obvious that if this course were followed the deep pocket would pay. On the other hand, the companies which would pay most would be those which were doing the most business. It might seem that under this proposal Air Canada would have to pay a lot of money. But Air Canada, as we know, is a Crown corporation and it would only be taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another.

There is a good case for competition, too, between airlines. As I said last night, the aviation industry in Canada is behind the times. Canada should be served by any airline that wishes to do so. Aviation has no place for monopolies; what is required is healthy competition, which itself would benefit the airlines and enable us to raise the extra revenue required.

The middle income people of Canada are already carrying a crushing burden of taxation, and we are asking them to tighten their belts and buy Canada back. How in the world can we buy Canada back when practically every month the government brings in a new measure of taxation which is aimed at the hard-working, middle-class people of Canada? I do not like using the word "class" but it is thrown at us all the time. My hon. friends to the left are always talking of class warfare; and although those opposite do not talk about class warfare they practise it. At the present time this warfare is directed at the $6,000 to $12,000 wage earners of Canada who are being asked to shoulder an increasing taxation burden. I suggest we are killing the goose that lays the golden egg.

In one of the few explanations the minister has deigned to give us, he said that some of the aircraft used in the north will be below the weight limit that has been set. I think a fairer way to levy the tax would be to tax the fare-paying passengers, rather than set a weight limit for aircraft. Take the case of the aircraft that carries both freight and passengers. The weight of the freight might put the aircraft above the limit, and in addition the fare-paying passengers would be subject to the tax. As a result miners, prospectors or our native people would be discriminated against.

If a tax of this sort must be imposed, then the simplest way to levy it is to tax the airlines. As I have said, many airlines want to use Canadian airports, and I can refer the minister to hundreds of letters I have received in this regard. These airlines would use facilities at the airports which our taxpayers have already paid for, and taxing these airlines would distribute the tax burden a little more fairly. A tax that is based on mileage would impose a heavy impost on a family man moving from Halifax to Yellowknife. He would be required to pay five or six times as much tax as the businessman who goes north to make $1 million from oil exploration or something of that kind, and I do not think this is fair.

Neither do I think the minister's explanation that such a tax would be hard to compute is valid. The head of a family could buy all the tickets in his own name, pay the tax on his own ticket and take his wife and children tax free. The same method could be used with students. It is ridiculous to allow a student to travel at the student rate from Halifax to take a law degree in Vancouver and then expect him to pay what I suggest is an exorbitant tax. Let us be consistent. People like students, old age pensioners and members of families could easily sign a form to exempt them from the tax when they pick up their tickets. At the end of the month the airline would merely have to calculate how many full fares and half fares they had collected, and pass on the tax to the government.

The minister should find these suggestions welcome. In any event I would ask him to let his colleagues know that we in this House are getting a little tired of the government bringing forward items of legislation for the consideration of the House, having already decided to accept no amendments. I am sure hon. members have noticed how few suggestions are made by government members.

If our proposals are not satisfactory, then we should be told why. If the government thinks students do not require special consideration, that old age pensioners do not require special consideration or that those in the north who are pioneering this country do not require special consideration, the government should explain its position. We on this side feel very strongly that these groups do require special consideration.

The mere excuse that something would be hard to police, or that the bureaucrats should not be expected to count noses, is no excuse at all. There are some 500,000 or 600,000 bureaucrats chasing each other around in circles in Canada; I suggest a few of them busy themselves trying to make sure the tax burden falls on the right shoulders. If that were the case, I would feel a great deal happier about the imposition of this tax.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, the minister is obviously batting on a very sticky wicket this afternoon. He has been asked a lot of questions and his answers have been somewhat vague. I cannot let this measure pass without raising objection to the imposition of this 5 per cent tax, since it will work its greatest hardship on people in areas that are already suffering from regional disparity.

As was quite well pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, the burden imposed by this tax on workers at Churchill Falls or those in the remote areas of Canada will be exceptionally great. What the minister has not yet told us is how much money he hopes to raise by this measure, or how much money the government really needs. For example, I read in the November 24 issue of the Financial Times a statement to the effect that heavy expenses face our airport planners today; that initial cost estimates for the new St. Scholastique airport outside Montreal run to about $400 million; that Toronto's new airport can be expected to cost about the same and that there are varying estimates for creating new ground facilities in other major centres.

If this tax is to be applied against the cost of the Montreal and Toronto airports, then I fail to see the logic of imposing additional taxation on those who live in the remote areas of Canada to pay for the construction of new and expanded facilities in what is really the golden horseshoe of Canada. In my own native province of Nova Scotia the people have been literally trying to pull themselves up by their own bootstraps. Since 1956, through the efforts of Industrial Estates, we have been able to encourage 60 or more new industries to locate in Nova Scotia.

These new industries must of necessity travel to the central areas of Canada in order to obtain the business needed to keep them growing and expanding. What the minister and the government are doing by imposing this tax on these industries is increasing their cost of doing business. I must raise objection to this measure because I think it is unfair and, to use a term that is much overworked, very unjust.

This measure will obviously place a heavier tax burden on industry than we have yet seen this session. I wonder what plans the minister has in respect of the air industry of Canada. Does he intend to expand airports in some of our remote areas, or is the money to be raised by this new imposition to be utilized only in Montreal and Toronto?

Will similar charges be made in respect of light, private club aircraft? We on this side can only look with trepidation at the attitude of this Government which, having taxed us to the limit to provide airport facilities, is now going to increase our taxes in order that Canadians may utilize the facilities. I believe that the government should withdraw this 5 per cent measure and consider making a flat charge on everyone across Canada who is using air services. This would seem to be a fairer means of distributing the cost of airport expansion. In the minister's reply I hope he will give favourable consideration to this suggestion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I should like very briefly to pose a question to the minister. Earlier in the day he suggested that this tax covers a whole range of services. We can appreciate that if it is the intent of the bill. I should like to ask him to inform the committee whether his department has had any consultation with other departments in so far as the correlation of rates for air services is concerned.

Yesterday we had the opportunity of hearing representatives of certain airlines who appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. They admitted that the rates on short runs were some 40 per cent more than the rates for the same services on other legs of scheduled runs. I suggest that the people who must use these scheduled runs have from this government no protection as users or consumers of the service.

It was my impression that when rate schedules were published and filed with the Canadian Transport Commission and the air transport committee their members looked at the rates and considered whether they were justifiable and in line with general marketing practices in Canada. Instead I find that there is absolutely no consideration by the Air Transport Committee in so far as rate schedules are concerned. All an airline has to do is publish its rates and they are then filed with the Air Transport Committee; no consideration is then given as to whether the airline is charging an exorbitant amount on a particular leg of a flight.

The minister should let this House know whether his department in presenting this user tax has considered it in consultation with other bodies, particularly the Department of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission. This government should become the protector of the consumer by limiting the rate schedules that can be charged by respective airlines.

We have heard a great deal about supply and demand. This point was brought out yesterday at the hearing of the committee; it was suggested that there is no such thing as control on price unless an individual complains, when possibly an investigation would be held. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador made it very clear that the rates being charged in their area of the country are not in line with those charged in other areas. If this government is concerned about consumer cost it should inform the House whether it is prepared to protect the users of airlines.

The government should be directly concerned with the 5 per cent charge embodied in this bill, and it should indicate whether during the drafting of it other government departments were consulted. It appears to me that one department of the government has no knowledge of or much concern for the operations of another department. Before introducing this bill the minister should have considered the cost to the consumer of the original air schedule in various parts of the country. This increase of 5 per cent imposed on people already paying higher rates will have a considerably greater effect than it will have on those now paying lower rates.

The minister stated previously that private planes were not included within the scope of the bill. It is amazing to me that when dealing with the bill the minister did not indicate whether private planes landing and using services at public airports would have to pay the additional charge. Surely if the consumers or users of this service will now have to pay an extra 5 per cent, those with private planes using the whole range of services to which the minister referred should expect an increase in the cost of these services. The minister passed this off by saying that someone else will look after it. Does he not have an obligation to include in the bill people who have private planes and use these public services? It seems to me you cannot talk about one and not the other. Perhaps the minister will indicate whether he has been in contact with other departments about this bill or whether he alone initiated its drafting and introduction.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to ask one question. The minister is undoubtedly aware of the fact that most of the major airlines in the United States have commenced a feasibility study in respect of terminals for giant freighters. He must also be aware that much of the damage to runways across Canada is caused by these types of aircraft. I assume he requires this additional revenue to look after this extra cost to some extent.

Is it fair to penalize the passenger because of an additional requirement for revenue to be used for this type of maintenance? I do not want to create the impression that I feel air freight rates should again be increased, but I am wondering whether he is prepared to consider the damage that giant freighters will cause in the next few years.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Moose Jaw asked whether there had been consultation with other departments. I am informed that there was certainly close consultation with the Department of Transport involving the measure before us at the present time. Several hon. members have asked what private planes are paying and will pay for use of facilities for which we are asking people who buy tickets on certified air carriers to pay. At the present time private planes which use these facilities pay special fees; they pay landing fees and other user charges. In opening the debate on second reading I believe I pointed out that this measure arises out of the proposals in the budget statement of June 3 and is linked with a statement of principle enunciated by the Minister of Finance as recorded at page 9420 of Hansard for Tuesday, June 3, and I quote:

> A further measure of budgetary significance arises out of a general policy to ask those who benefit directly from services or facilities provided by the government to pay charges more in line with the direct costs involved. We already obtain about $200 million per annum from such user charges of various kinds—
> In some cases these charges have not been recently revised to reflect current levels of costs or values of services, and we are carrying out a systematic review and revision of these charges. We shall probably introduce some new charges as well. In almost all cases this action can be taken under existing legislation.

So it is my understanding that the user charges and fees presently paid by various types of private aircraft which use the various facilities provided by the Department of Transport for air transportation are under review. The purpose of the review is to help ensure that each category of aircraft pays its fair share by way of contribution to the cost of maintaining and expanding these various facilities.

A number of hon. members have made comments which really amount to complaints about the rates being charged by various schedule and non-schedule carriers for transporting people around this country. It seems to me that in passing the National Transportation Act, Parliament decided to delegate to the Canadian Transport Commission authority in respect of regulatory activity in the field of rates for air travel. It is my understanding, although I do not claim to be an expert by any means in these matters, that while airlines must file their rates with the Air Transport Committee of the Air Transport Commission it is also open to those who are not satisfied with these rates to file a complaint.

The result of this would be that the committee would carry out an investigation and if it finds that the provisions of the law in respect of rates are not being followed, then it has authority to suspend the application of these rates. So it would seem to me that those who feel there are grounds for complaint about rates in one area of the country or another should see that any complaint about rate schedules is filed with the Air Transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Various hon. members have asked about the yield on the tax. The budget statement indicated that the yield was expected to be approximately $20 million. I believe the hon. member for South Shore asked where the money would be spent. It is my understanding it will be taken into account in determining the expenditures of the Department of Transport for the full range of services it provides in the air transport field and not simply in respect of the construction of airports in one or two metropolitan areas of the country.

While, as the hon. member for South Shore said, people travelling from the maritime provinces will pay the proposed tax, once they get to the central part of Canada, they will not only be using the present services of the Department of Transport with regard to air transportation but they will be using the particular airports there. People travelling from the central part of the country to the maritime provinces and other areas to do business of various types will also have to pay the tax. So this proposed tax would not be limited to one particular area of the country or to certain areas of the country alone.

One hon. member proposed that a better way would be to have the tax paid by the airlines themselves. As other hon. members have mentioned, it is likely that this would be passed on to the purchaser of the ticket in one way or another. Some members have already complained that the rates charged for air travel are too high. I think a number of points have been made which have been dealt with in one way or another in my earlier comments. Perhaps I might conclude at this stage by saying to those who argue in favour of a flat rate that this might perhaps inadvertently be in conflict with the argument of hon. members such as the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate who speaks of people who have to use airports frequently. The more frequently people use airports, the more often they would pay the flat rate.

One hon. member suggested that a departure tax of $1 on each occasion would be sufficient. When one looks at the total number of passengers carried, which is something, if I can recall correctly, in the area of 10 million per year, it becomes evident that the tax would have to be much higher in order to yield the approximately $20 million a year.

Let me assume hon. members that in this type of discussion it is my intent to listen as carefully as I can to the points they raise and attempt to respond in a constructive way. Certainly, however, as the hon. member for Peace River has said, in formulating any type of tax there are problems of equity and no matter what type is considered there are problems associated with it. It is a question of having, to decide on a form which would appear on balance to have the smallest number of problems associated with it and which would be the least inequitable, and in fact most equitable in comparison with other possible measures.

If one is to accept the principle supported by the hon. member for Edmonton West that users of facilities have a special obligation to contribute toward the cost, maintenance and expansion of these facilities, then I submit that on balance the proposals in this bill are those which deserve the support of this committee and the House.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister a question which he has not answered. I asked whether his department had computed the tax the government would have to pay in respect of this air tax. I have not heard an answer. I imagine that this tax must have been computed, because there are budgetary restrictions in respect of all departments and surely any government which wishes to do a good job with its budget would take this into consideration. I would ask the minister to reply to my question.

Mr. Gray: I regret that in attempting to summarize and put together a response to a vast range of very interesting comments I did not deal with my hon. friend's point. I understand it is not generally customary when developing proposals of this sort to make the computation or analysis my hon. friend suggested. After all, the same kind of point could be raised when one looks at the impact of the changes in the sales tax in relation to purchases by the government.

[Mr. Gray.]

This is a form of consumption tax which is analagous to the sales tax. It would seem to me the point the hon. member has in mind does not have the weight it would otherwise have if I am correct in saying that the total number of civil servants who travel is very small, or relatively small in relation to the total number of people carried by air in any particular year.

Mr. Nystrom: I believe the minister said that the user fees, charges, or whatever you want to call them with respect to private aircraft and people who travel in them are now under review by the government. When does he expect that this review will be completed, and does he expect legislation to be introduced on the matter? Further, when was the last review made of this particular matter? I ask these questions because the users of private airplanes also benefit from the services and facilities of public airports.

Mr. Gray: I understand this review is being carried out in a very intensive and active manner at the present time. While I cannot give the hon. member the exact date, I would expect it would not be too long before the results of the review are announced. It is my understanding that in order to raise the user fees it would not be necessary in most cases, if not in all cases, to have a change in legislation. It is something that can be done by changes in regulations on the basis of authority already given by Parliament.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, my colleague from South Shore has raised this matter, and the minister has reflected on it but has not given us any conclusive evidence. I know he has talked to his advisers. Can he now indicate the flow of traffic in Canada in terms of air travellers? Is the main flow from the rural areas, which I might classify as the Atlantic region and the northern areas of Canada?

Mr. Gray: Perhaps our discussion illustrates the need for a different way of computing statistics with respect to travel by air and the use of air facilities. Perhaps we should bring this to the attention of DBS. I understand statistics are presently collected on the basis of arrivals at and departures from airports. I do not have these exact statistics with me. It may not be particularly useful to look at these figures for the purpose we are pursuing at this point, because they do not show whether a person leaving a particular airport lives in an area near it or if he lives in a community near the airport at which he is going to arrive. While the statistics available are useful for certain purposes, I do not think they have been put together in such a way that I can easily answer the type of question asked by the hon. member. I say this not to disparage the question but merely to point out that there may be room for developing statistics in this particular field.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps I am being a bit unfair to the minister to expect him to have at his fingertips the kind of information I have been seeking all afternoon. I would like to say that he has done a commendable job. However, I would ask him to consider my question again with respect to the people who will actually be paying the proposed tax, especially those travelling from rural areas, and communities of a type such as Churchill Falls and Wabush, and can he say what type of passengers they are? This question also covers people from isolated areas in the other northern regions of the country. Would he have some of the experts in his department review these questions and report to members through a circular, detailing the type of persons who will be paying the main burden of the tax? Can he give us this undertaking?

Mr. Gray: I would be very happy to consult with the officials to see to what extent the statistics presently available, or which can be readily gathered, could be used to give the type of analysis which the hon. member is seeking. It would be a most interesting type of analysis and possibly could be useful in many ways. Once I have completed this consultation I will communicate with the hon. member and tell him what I have been able to ascertain. I thank him for his comments. I find it a bit flattering to have him think I might be able to deal with such a profound matter at such short notice, but I will certainly do the best I can under the circumstances.

Mr. Harding: Is the minimum amount that can be charged for an adult $2 on any flight?

Mr. Gray: The proposals actually involve two different types of tax under the same general heading. Most of our discussion this afternoon has been related to the ad valorem or percentage tax on travel to points in the taxation area defined in the bill. This is roughly within continental North America. There will be another tax which will be on a flat rate basis, on tickets for travel outside the taxation area, that is to say, travel to points outside continental North America.

Initially it is proposed the tax would be in the amount of $5 per ticket, but the Governor in Council would be given the authority to reduce the tax below that amount if the United States Congress passes a bill of the kind which is presently before it, which would give the United States government the authority to impose a similar tax on international flights. By giving the Governor in Council this authority we would make sure we would not be imposing a tax that would be much different from that of the United States, because if the tax in the United States were very much lower it might have the effect of encouraging Canadians to go to that country and begin their travels abroad from there rather than using Canadian carriers.

Mr. Harding: In my area we have several very short hops. One is from Castlegar to Cranbrook. The fare used to be $10. Then the Air Transport Committee increased the fare by 30 per cent. A 5 per cent tax on this fare would be 65 cents. Does the minister mean to say we have to pay a $2 tax for that short jump?

Mr. Gray: Absolutely not, Mr. Chairman. The tax on tickets for transportation within Canada, or from Canada to the United States and back again, would be a percentage of the price of the ticket, and if 5 per cent would come to 65 cents that is what the tax would be. The minimum amount would apply only with respect to flights from Canada to points outside continental North America.

The Deputy Chairman: Does that conclude the study of paragraph 8?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Paragraphs 8 and 9 of clause 1 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall paragraph 10 carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. Bell: What do you think we have been waiting for?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand the paragraphs are not carried.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, they are. That is the understanding.

The Deputy Chairman: The understanding was that we would carry clause 1 at the end of the study of its various parts.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. The understanding was that we would carry each part, and that we would carry them as we go. This was the clear understanding.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we should have taken a moment to raise this matter again when Your Honour were called upon to occupy the chair. My hon. friend is quite correct; this is something we had agreed on at the opening of our discussion.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Paragraph 10 of Clause 1 agreed to: Yeas, 54; nays, 52.

Paragraphs 11 to 17, inclusive, of Clause 1 agreed to.

On paragraph 18—Regulations

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have one question on paragraph 18, Mr. Chairman. It gives power to the Governor in Council to pass regulations. Would the minister kindly inform us, in respect of subparagraph (c), what is the intention or the purpose of the power of exemption of any group or type of transportation?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, this provision is necessary because of the complications inherent in describing who shall be liable for collecting the proposed tax, and to avoid problems of possible double taxation, and so on, because of the existence of similar taxes in the United States on flights going between the two countries. It is generally considered advisable to have this power to deal with enforcement complications, which may arise in the application of a new and previously unknown tax. I think that is about the best way of summarizing some of the purposes of the proposed new section.

Paragraph 18 of clause 1 agreed to.

Paragraph 19 of clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for speaking for some time at this stage of the bill. This is a tax bill carried forward from the last June budget. The participation of hon. members on all sides has demonstrated the opposition of this tax. There have been many arguments advanced for it, but with the greatest respect to the Minister without Portolio (Mr. Gray), we still do not accept his argument that an ad valorem tax is a just type of tax for this particular purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is the crux of the matter. In the discussion on paragraph 8 of clause I the minister tried to alleviate some of the concern expressed for those in remote areas and some of the smaller services, but he has not in any way contributed to the justice of the government's position with regard to people in isolated areas. As far as the government is concerned, one would think that air travel applied only to central Canada and the cities on the southern plains. But air service is important to people in the developing communities of this country, the Northwest Territories, Yukon, Labrador, northern Quebec and northern Ontario, where the sole source of effective transportation is by air. We all know that the rate per air mile is higher for these people than those in the southern parts of the country and central Canada. The application of an ad valorem tax merely increases the burden on these people.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the citizens of Yellowknife and communities down the Mackenzie River and on the Arctic coast are not serviced by small aircraft which are exempt under clause I, paragraph 8(a) of the bill. These people use regular services. For instance, Quebecair goes all the way to Churchill Falls and Pacific Western Airlines goes down the Mackenzie River and out to the Arctic coast. Jet aircraft are used. All these services are being caught by this provision.

I am not saying they should be totally exempted, although some of them might argue they should be because of the increased cost of living in remote areas. Let me assure hon. members that the cost of living in those areas is fantastically higher than it is here because of the enormous cost of moving goods into remote settlements. Yet here, from our comfortable pew of southern Canada, we are telling these people, "We are going to add another cost; you will have to pay a 5 per cent tax on your air passenger tickets."

The minister tried to use all sorts of arguments against a flat rate departure tax. I tell him, Mr. Speaker, that a flat rate departure tax exists in this country and is levied in connection with the only air bus system operating in this country, that is between Edmonton and Calgary. At the municipally-owned airport in Edmonton the Department of Transport charges the city airport authority for all the services it provides to the airport in so far as take-off and landing guidance systems, and what have you, are concerned. There a flat rate of $1 is charged and people are quite happy to pay it.

Those using that airport do not have to pay for parking because the municipal airport authority allows free parking. On the other hand, if you go to the international airport in order to fly to Calgary, you must pay $1.10 to park your car. If you go to municipal airports, you park your car free but you pay a departure tax. Now the minister says he will tax us again for those services for which the Department of Transport has already billed the municipal authority.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That shows where this type of tax is wrong, and that is why I insist that a departure tax is better. A flat rate tax is better. It might lead to some slight inconvenience with the big, jumbo jets, but does anyone think that jumbo jets will land at every interior airport of Canada? Of course they will not. They will land at Montreal, Toronto and perhaps Vancouver. They will not land at the internal airports of this country, be they designated "international" or not. At least, no great number of such landings will take place. This is just putting up an Aunt Sally in an attempt to knock it down. I suggest it will be quite simple to levy a flat, departure tax. It should be levied per flight and not merely when an aircraft lands at any stage during a flight. It would be better than the present proposal because we would get round the inequities of this type of tax.

I indicated in my remarks on the first clause that people who fly in executive jet aircraft or in company personnel aircraft and use the services will not be paying for air transportation facilities. Is the minister to increase the charges for the landing of these aircraft? Will there not be difficulty in distinguishing between different types of these aircraft, because an aircraft which may have a carrying capacity of 20 passengers may be carrying only three? An aircraft's load-bearing capacity should be based on the travelling public, but the government insists on this ad valorem tax. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) that—

All the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefore:

Bill C-155 be not now read a third time but be referred back to the Committee of the whole with instructions that clause (i), paragraph numbered 10 be reconsidered to provide an air transportation tax on a flat fee basis to be determined by the committee as providing an equivalent return to and in lieu of the tax therein provided.

May I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

DRUGS

STATEMENT ON FIXED COMBINATIONS OF ANTIBIOTICS

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as a result of several inquiries, mainly from the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I wish to make a statement concerning antibiotics and their labelling.

Several announcements have been made recently by the United States Food and Drug Administration that certain combination drug products will be removed from the market. This action was based on reports from the drug efficacy study group established by the U.S. National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council that products containing fixed combinations of antibiotics are ineffective for claims made in their labelling.

We are well aware that fixed-ratio drug formulations have been the subject of controversy in medical circles for some years. However, in spite of the opinions expressed in the U.S.A., there are some physicians who believe that these combinations are of value and would wish them to be retained on the market. The debate as to whether fixed-ratio combinations should be prescribed is a matter which properly rests with the medical profession.

Nevertheless, some months ago the Food and Drug Directorate, Department of National Health and Welfare, initiated discussions with Canadian manufacturers of certain antibiotic combinations. If these investigations show the need, manufacturers will be required to include additional explanatory or cautionary information on the label of the drug or in the professional literature accompanying the drug or being supplied to the professions. If evidence is obtained that these combinations are less effective than their individual components or if they are found to represent a hazard to health, the directorate will take further appropriate action.

The directorate has authority under Section 9(1) of the Food and Drugs Act to prevent the sale of a drug product that is labelled in a manner that is false, misleading or deceptive in regard to its merit or safety.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for giving me advance notice of this statement. I am glad he has realized there has been a mild controversy in medical circles for a good many years about fixed combinations of antibiotics. Those who work in universities and hospitals tend to believe that there should not be combinations while those who are involved with the general care of the public have often thought that in certain cases these fixed combinations are of value.

Minister's Statement on Antibiotics

I agree with the minister that he has gone carefully and slowly, and I believe that in certain conditions physicians would agree that fixed combinations of antibiotics are useful, particularly in a widely scattered country. However, we have to recognize that medical technology is advancing with regard to the desirable role of specific drugs for specific conditions. This is being brought closer and the use of fixed combinations of antibiotics will decrease in the future. I believe that the Food and Drug Directorate has done well not to ban these combinations immediately as has been done in the United States. I look with interest to further evidence as to what the department will do.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note how long it took the minister to make the statement he made today, a statement in which he really said nothing. In other instances, such as auto safety and the use of cyclamates, we in Canada have waited for United States agencies to take action and have then followed their action and took their advice on the basis of the tests they have conducted.

In this case the minister decided to listen to the drug industry and to ignore the findings of the United States agency which made a very careful study of the problem taking more than three years and costing over $1 million. This study was conducted by the United States National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council.

They found that two-thirds of the prescription drugs used in the United States are badly labelled and a large percentage are partly or totally ineffective. They found, in a study of 4,000 drug preparations, 85 per cent of them prescription drugs supplied by over 200 firms, that 7 per cent were totally ineffective. Others were found effective for some diseases and partly or not at all for others for which effectiveness was claimed. The study showed that two-thirds of the drugs were poorly organized, repetitive, out of date, evasive and promotionally oriented. They ordered a large number of prescription drugs to be relabelled and called for the banning of sales of 54 specific drugs.

In light of their findings it is disappointing, to say the least, to find the minister making a statement in which he in effect says that the government is not prepared to do anything. This does not surprise me, Mr. Speaker. We have watched this government over a period of four or five years make extensive studies of drug safety and drug prices and come up with proposals which have had little, if any, effect in improving drug safety and no effect on drug prices. All the steps taken led to no changes in the very high prices of drugs.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if this statement is not related to a recent decision taken by the Americans in connection with the ban on germ warfare.

In any event, it is a statement which tells us what the Department of National Health and Welfare intends to do with regard to drugs. In this statement, we find that if evidence is obtained that combinations are less effective than their individual components, the Director General of the Food and Drug Directorate will take the steps needed to remedy the situation.

Mr. Speaker, as the previous speakers, I rejoice in the position taken because the drug industry is different from others, first because experience has taught me that drugs have more frequently been used to make money than to cure, and also, at the manufacturing level, this industry sets selling prices which are in no way prorated to costs. We have a right to have doubts about the value of what is contained in drugs.

Therefore, I congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who, by his attitude, will contribute, in my opinion, to restrain the shameful exploitation of the sick and the old.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE RESPECTING OFF-TRACK BETTING

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-160 entitled "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (Off-track betting).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the final report of the Prévost Commission in Quebec recommends that gambling be legalized and socialized so that not only illicit interests may exploit this need felt by most Canadians.

This bill introduced for the first time in the House on June 13, 1967, purports to amend the Criminal Code so as to enable provincial governments wishing to do so to establish off-track betting in order to get funds for various social, hospital and educational programs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

MONTREAL—ALLEGATIONS BY MR. SAULNIER OF DISTURBING ACTIVITIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the allegations made publicly by Mr. Saulnier in Montreal this morning involving actions now being taken by the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, can the Prime Minister tell the House when he was first informed of the alleged disturbing activities of the Company of Young Canadians in Montreal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not heard the allegations of Mr. Saulnier, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know what he said before attempting to reply in any way. If any aspects of this question could be directed to the ministers who are informed or concerned, perhaps my hon. friends might wish to attempt a reply.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister tell the House when he was first informed of allegations of disturbing activities by members of the Company of Young Canadians in Montreal?

Mr. Trudeau: I think I can attempt to inform the House, Mr. Speaker, to the best of my memory. I do not think, however, it is a relevant piece of recollection. When I visited a housing development in Montreal there were some disturbances—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the right hon. Prime Minister but I had some serious doubts about the question when it was first asked by the Leader of the Opposition. Hon. members know there is a long established rule of procedure that questions may not be asked concerning the proceedings of a committee until such time as there is a committee report.

Mr. Horner: They do not have to write it; it is in the press.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their advice. May I refer hon. members to citation 324(1) of Beauchesne:

> Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the Table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

I think hon. members should bear this in mind and limit their questions so as not to become involved in matters dealing with the evidence which was submitted to the committee.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, may I assure Your Honour that I will scrupulously follow the rule to which you have alluded, but my question to the Prime Minister was based on a statement made publicly outside the committee by Mr. Saulnier. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, upon hearing these allegations in regard to members of the CYC, he took any action and, specifically, whether he requested the Solicitor General to obtain a report from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I did talk both to the Solicitor General and to the minister responsible for the CYC and asked them to see whether there was anything in these allegations.

Mr. Horner: When?

Mr. Trudeau: I am answering the question. I said yes, I talked to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House when he requested that report from the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice and if, since then, he has asked the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to report to him personally on the activities of the Company of Young Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: When? Mr. Speaker, I was going to give this information in a reply to the first question. I was visiting Montreal—last spring, if I remember well—when Mr. Saulnier first indicated to me that, in his opinion, the Company of Young Canadians was engaged in unacceptable activities and, following that conversation, I spoke to the two ministers concerned.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Has he on hand now records concerning the alleged disturbing activities of the Company of Young Canadians or of some volunteer workers?

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to accept the preamble to that question. May I say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—and here I speak on behalf of the Solicitor General—have received copies of a number of documents from the Montreal city police relating to the activities of the Company of Young Canadians in Quebec.

I think it might interest the House to know that these documents were received on several dates. Beginning on October 29, documents were received from time to time through to November 20. On November 21 the Montreal police turned over some more documents. On November 24 two additional series of documents were received, and another series on November 20, 21 and 25. I understand that other documents were submitted, in the ordinary course of the exercise of co-operative police measures by the federal, provincial and municipal police forces, as late as last night.

The Government will give careful consideration to this material in determining what course of action it should pursue in respect of the Company of Young Canadians. I want to say as well that while the federal government is responsible for deciding what action to take in respect of the management and the future of the Company of Young Canadians—and it will undoubtedly want to wait for the report of the parliamentary committee—any question of instituting legal proceedings regarding alleged violations of the Criminal Code is, under the heading of the administration of justice, a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice.

Since he has just stated that his department had from time to time received documents from the R.C.M.P., I would like to know whether they had been requested by his department and also whether they were studied while the parliamentary committee was carrying on its inquiry.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the law officers of the Crown have received these documents from the RCMP and we are studying them.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister and it is supplementary to the question asked by my leader. After this matter came to your attention, perhaps last spring, as you stated, did you ask the Solicitor General—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly direct his question through the Chair.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, after this matter came to his attention, perhaps last spring, as he said, he requested the Solicitor General to ask the RCMP to make a report? If he cannot answer that today, since this is not a day for the Solicitor General to be in the House will he undertake to have the minister make a statement or perhaps make a statement himself tomorrow regarding what action, if any, was taken after this matter came to his notice?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer this question from memory. Essentially what I did ask then of Mr. Saulnier was that he help us by showing us some proof of his suspicions or allegations, and that has been our position all along. Since then we have had documents turned over to us by him and we have looked at them with all the dispatch mentioned by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Horner: Since the 29th of October.

Mr. Trudeau: What is your problem?

An hon. Member: It's your problem.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and is really seeking clarification. Did I understand the minister to say that he has received reports from the Montreal police on CYC activity, and do I also understand he has indicated that the government initiated independent investigations by the RCMP as a result of receiving reports on this matter?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, sir. What I said was that the RCMP, in the ordinary course of co-operative police work, received some of the documents that were seized. We are not at all sure we have received the complete set of documents. We did receive documents that were purported to have been seized by the Montreal city police. The documents were analysed by the RCMP and were submitted to the law officers of the Crown in the Department of Justice for the same purpose.

Mr. Rose: Again for the purpose of clarification, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the RCMP were instructed by the government to initiate an independent investigation of the problems of the CYC in Montreal?

Mr. Horner: As early as last spring.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would have to check on that particular point with my colleague the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Has he informed the Secretary of State, who is directly responsible to the House for the Company of Young Canadians, of his contacts with the RCMP?

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): After we have completed a review of the documents, which as I say we are receiving from time to time, I will of course be reporting to the Prime Minister and to the Secretary of State. Then it will be up to the government to decide what action should be taken.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice.

When he received those documents from the RCMP, did he get in touch with the provincial authorities?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question.

Mr. Ricard: When the minister received those documents from the RCMP, did he discuss the matter with the Quebec authorities?

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No; I have not had any discussions myself with the Quebec authorities. That is not to say the Solicitor General may not have had such discussions. I wish to reiterate again that since any legal proceedings under the Criminal Code would, if there were evidence, have to be taken at the instance of the Montreal police, the authorities in Montreal or by the Attorney General of Quebec, it would appear that the communication would properly lie between the city of Montreal and the Attorney General of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Justice tell us whether officials of his department have been appointed to study the documents supplied by the RCMP and to advise the ministers concerned about the steps to be taken?

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Well, I have said that the documents have been studied by the police and by the law officers of the Crown, and they are keeping both ministers informed.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Was the minister aware last spring of these disturbing activities on the part of some members of the CYC in Montreal?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, nobody brought to my attention the doubts which might have existed at that time.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister on a different subject—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am led to believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert has a supplementary.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice mentioned that the responsibility for instituting prosecution rests either with the authorities in the city of Montreal or the government of Quebec. Is it not a fact that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police lay charges on the basis of the information they have and from there on the province takes over the prosecution? I would also ask him as part of the same question whether or not the documents that were delivered to the government as far back as October 24 or 25—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The 29th.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right—about four weeks ago, disclosed prima facie evidence of revolutionary conduct and whether he discussed this with the Secretary of State who remains so benignly silent?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Let me answer that question if I may. To begin with, the RCMP have received documents from time to time beginning on October 29. The documents have come in as I have described over a period of weeks and as late as yesterday. I am sure the right hon. gentleman does not want me to comment on the evidence. An Attorney General has never commented on evidence. He decides whether to prosecute or not to prosecute. In this particular instance the decision on whether a prosecution should be taken properly lies with the Montreal authorities or with the Attorney General of Quebec. The right hon. gentleman is talking about subversion, sedition and this sort of thing, and quite properly so. I have searched the records and at no time since Confederation has a prosecution for sedition been taken by the federal Attorney General. Sedition is a crime under the Criminal Code of Canada and in this, as in all other matters, prosecutions taken under the Criminal Code are taken by the provincial Attorneys General.

The only two cases I could find in the last 30 years relating to sedition were both taken against the Jehovah's Witnesses by the Attorney General of Quebec. The only cases of sedition currently before the courts, the one against Michel Chartrand, the one against Pierre Valiere and the one that was dismissed against Charles Gagnon, were also taken by the Attorney General of Quebec. That is where the responsibility lies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to suggest to hon. members that we should not get into the realm of debate. However, I understand the right hon. gentleman has a supplementary, after which we will return to the hon member for York South.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am naturally interested in the dissertation, but I now ask the minister this question. On the basis of what he saw did he give any instructions to the RCMP or did he discuss with the Secretary of State the presence of anything in the nature of revolutionary wrong-doing or conduct unbecoming an organization financed by the people of Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Well, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that any advice I would give to the Prime Minister or to my colleague the Secretary of State would be as privileged as any other advice a lawyer would give to a client, and I would not reveal it on the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What a smokescreen!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have clearly entered into the area of debate. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for York South.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM ATROCITIES—SUGGESTED INQUIRY BY ICC OR UN MISSION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a pretty strong voice but I did not feel like using it to overcome the noise that was surrounding me. I hesitate to ask a question which does not have to do with Montreal or Quebec but I will none the less. Has the Prime Minister had an opportunity to discuss with the Secretary of State for External Affairs the question I asked last Tuesday. I understand that the minister is, regrettably, in hospital with an illness. Has the Prime Minister had a chance to discuss with him the question I asked the Prime Minister concerning the atrocities in Viet Nam?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did ask the department to inquire into the aspect of the question asked by the hon. member concerning the ICC. I have not yet had an answer. As the hon. member just said, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is ill at this time and that may be the reason he has not yet reported to me. When I have the answer I will be glad to give it.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister keep in mind the second question I asked which may be even more important, that is, would the Prime Minister instruct our permanent representative at the United Nations to discuss with the Secretary General of that body the dispatch of a mission to Viet Nam to investigate these atrocities, some of which are being revealed even today?

Mr. Trudeau: If that appears necessary as a result of the answer to my first inquiry I will certainly discuss that with the minister.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Could he indicate whether he shares with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the view that unilingual people are handicapped and, if so, whether he intends to grant a pension to every unilingual Canadian?

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING REASONS FOR TERMS OF SENTENCES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and I do not think there will be any question about his jurisdiction over this matter. May I preface it by saying that the report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections recommended that, when sentences are imposed by a court, the magistrate, judge or justice should specify the reasons for the term of the sentence. In view of the fact that the Alberta appellate division has reduced from five to two years the sentences of the young people involved in marijuana and hashish offences, will the minister now advise whether he is prepared to bring in reform legislation setting out that recommendation in the Criminal Code?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): We are actively considering the recommendations of the Ouimet Commission, and I am certainly considering this one.

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the appellate division's review and reduction of the sentences of these young men and women, will the Minister of Justice ensure that all the special federal Crown prosecutors—and I emphasize the word "federal"—involved in the administration of the Narcotics Act and the Food and Drugs Act are made aware of this decision?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think that all our federal Crown prosecutors keep themselves up to date on the law, but I will certainly draw this to their attention.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMITMENT TO UN TO EXPAND INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and since I read that the topic may become taboo I would like to refer it to the Parliamentary Secretary. Can he advise us whether the government has abandoned the commitment given by the minister's predecessor to the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1967 that Canada will expand its contribution to international development programs so as to reach the target of one per cent of our gross national product by 1970-71?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government intends to determine the extent of its participation in the assistance program to underdeveloped countries, in the light of the Pearson report.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACCIDENT CAUSED BY SPILLING OF SULPHURIC ACID FROM TOY CAR

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that a Montreal child has barely escaped serious or fatal burns from sulphuric acid spilling from a toy car, and in view of the fact that this toy was apparently approved by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will the minister investigate this matter without delay?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had a report on the tragic incident which the hon. member mentions but I will look into it immediately. However, there is one point I would like to clear up. If the question refers to the car that I have in mind, at no time has it received any sort of approval from my department. We have no machinery for giving such approval.

Mrs. MacInnis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware then of a press report containing a statement from the Canadian Toy Testing Council that they examined the car in the company of an official of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who saw no hazard in it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless the minister is rising on a point of order, may I say that I think the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Basford: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, to point out, so as to put the record straight, that while an official of my department had a look at the car, there is no machinery within my department for granting approval to any products.

[Later:]

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, now that the front benches have had their precedence, may I again address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If the facts prove to be as stated, will the minister see that this dangerous toy is taken off the market immediately and certainly before Christmas toy buying?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a representation, so in fairness to both the middle and front benches I have to rule the question out of order.

Mrs. MacInnis: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

NICKEL PRICE INCREASE—PREFERENCE FOR CANADIAN CUSTOMERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the increase in nickel prices. Did he request the nickel companies to defer any increase in the prices of their product to Canadian customers, a request that would appear to be particularly reasonable in view of the fact that only 4 per cent of the output of these producers is marketed in Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. This is a question which I think should be more properly directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but such a request would result in a somewhat complicated two-price system which I think would have disadvantages.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why does the minister feel it is appropriate for him to ask the oil companies not to increase their prices and at the same time feel he has no right to make a similar request in the case of the 25 per cent increase in the cost of a product to Canadian customers, a request that would appear to be relatively easy to meet, particularly in view of the fact that a 25 per cent increase in the price of this product would seem to finish off any effort to establish a program of restraint?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is more in the nature of an argument.

[Mr. Basford.]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL LOAN TO QUEBEC

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Since Premier Bertrand of Quebec was refused yesterday, in New York, a $60 million loan at a 9.65 per cent rate of interest and because of the urgency of the situation, would the Prime Minister grant a loan to the Quebec government under the same conditions enjoyed by foreign countries?

COMBINES

ACQUISITION OF AIR CANADA FACILITIES BY CAE INDUSTRIES AND NORTHWEST INDUSTRIES

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission looking into the recent acquisition by CAE Industries and Northwest Industries of Edmonton of Air Canada facilities in Winnipeg to determine whether or not competition is unduly affected in light of the sixth report of the Economic Council of Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): It has been the policy in the House for the minister responsible for the Combines Investigation Act, a policy established by the former minister of justice from Kamloops, that the minister does not reveal what inquiries are under way, because of section 28 of the Combines Investigation Act, until such cases are either taken to court or reported in the annual report.

Mr. Skoreyko: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of this merger, is his department making any effort to seek opportunities for employment for the 325 men who have been laid off in this industry, particularly in regard to help or assistance for those who wish to move?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Does the minister regard the imminent pay increases of members of the Ontario legislature as being inflationary and, if so, can he assure the House that the Prices and Incomes Commission will consider them?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a representation which will be taken into account.

SOURCE OF REPORTS RECEIVED BY RCMP

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Justice tell us whether the reports he received from the RCMP in connection with the Company of Young Canadians came only from Quebec or from some other provinces?

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I am afraid that the enthusiasm which greeted the last question prevented me from hearing the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether the RCMP reports he has in hand come from the province of Quebec only or also from other provinces.

Mr. Speaker: While the minister is trying to grasp the meaning of that question, I might recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and come back to the hon. member in a moment.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Now that he has had a few minutes to think it over, the Minister of Justice might reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Joliette.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I apologize to the hon. member but at the time I did not hear his question. The documents I was talking about were relayed to the RCMP from the Montreal police and they related to activities of the Company of Young Canadians in Quebec. I would have to check with my colleague the Solicitor General to answer the question whether information on the activities of that organization in other provinces is also in the possession of the police.

COMBINES

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF NICKEL PRICE INCREASES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the increases of almost 25 per cent in the price of nickel by two major producers in Canada on the same day, will he ask the anti-combines section of his department to investigate whether there has been illegal collusion on the part of these two companies?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to that question is the one I gave a moment ago. The director of research under the Combines Investigation Act watches specific price movements and if there is a possibility of a breach of the act he has a statutory duty to take proceedings.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask whether he made any request to the nickel producers to review their Canadian prices. In view of the fact that sales to Canadian customers represent only 4 per cent of their production, and inasmuch as the matter apparently has not been discussed with the companies by the government, will the minister request the companies to review their Canadian prices?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Leader of the Opposition seemed to object to me making such requests of the oil companies, so I am rather hesitant to proceed along that line.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of increased nickel prices and salaries in the Sudbury area, which have led many companies and merchants to also increase their prices, could the Minister tell us whether his department could not bring some pressure to bear in order to prevent this increase in consumer prices?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know from the proceedings in the house on Wednesday and Thursday that neither my department nor the government has any such power. We are calling upon people to exercise restraint. I know some people are using the nickel price increases as an excuse to raise prices. The amount of nickel in a car is five pounds which should lead to an increase, if any, of .07 per cent or on a $10—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the minister wants to revert to motions and make a statement, I think the matter should not be proceeded with.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

AUTOMOBILE PRICE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs state whether he has begun the investigation of auto prices which he stated last August was to be undertaken?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is heavily involved in negotiations with regard to the automobile agreement and the price of cars both in Canada and between Canada and the United States is very much a subject of those investigations.

MONTREAL—ALLEGATIONS BY MR. SAULNIER OF DISTURBING ACTIVITIES

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The Secretary of State on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pelletier: Since we are back to that subject, I would not like the House to be misled by an answer I gave earlier. I said that nobody had informed me. I thought then that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) was asking me whether I had been informed of the matter before it was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister. But I have already stated publicly, and I repeat it here, that every time the Prime Minister has been informed of such matters, he relayed the information to me and conversely I acted the same way with him.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): In connection with the answer just given by the Secretary of State, I would like to ask him if he means that he was told last spring about the activities of the Company of Young Canadians—as the Prime Minister himself said a moment ago in the House—or if he found out later than last spring?

Mr. Pelletier: No, it was not later than last spring.

SPORTS

BID FOR SUMMER AND WINTER OLYMPICS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is Canada putting in a bid for the next summer and winter olympics to be held in this country?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know now, Montreal's bid is going in. As of today I do not know whether any formal decision has been made so far as the west coast is concerned.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the minister recommend the one city?

Mr. Munro: I am sorry, I did not hear that question.

Mr. Paproski: Did the minister only recommend the one city of Montreal?

Mr. Munro: No, Mr. Speaker. The only reason I pointed out Montreal was that their application has gone forward. The other application, from the west coast, has not been submitted to the government for backing or otherwise.

Mr. Paproski: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare saying that he has recommended Montreal?

Mr. Munro: No, I am not, Mr. Speaker.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF URBAN PROBLEMS AT CONFERENCE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the problems of the cities as related to the constitutional responsibility will be placed high on the priority list at the coming federal-provincial conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intend to table the agenda as soon as I have the concurrence of all the provincial premiers, and I think that that will be early next week.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer given by the Prime Minister, I wonder if the Prime Minister would, if it pleases him, make a statement as soon as possible after the federal-provincial conference as to the government's intention or policy with respect to our urban problems?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House that, following the December conference, if the opposition parties agree we would seek an occasion to discuss the whole constitutional matter in the House, as has been done after the previous federal-provincial conferences on the constitution.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. In light of the minister's view as expressed at Sir George Williams University that all Members of Parliament should act and think independently of party ties, has the minister, first of all, asked that he be relieved of his party's whip and whether this explains the absence of government members in the House yesterday?

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO ALLOWANCES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of the statement by the President of CMHC to the Senate Committee on Poverty that housing allowances should be part of a system to provide decent housing for all Canadians, what steps does the minister intend to take?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think a statement of this nature should normally be made on motions.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION WITH PREMIER

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he indicate whether he will be holding discussions tomorrow with the Premier of the Province of Newfoundland and whether we can anticipate, as a result of these discussions, that there will be formal agreement by the federal-provincial authorities on the regional development program for that province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the question is speculative—if I am having meetings and whether there will be formal agreement. I cannot answer what will result from any meetings with the Premier, assuming I am going to have any.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister left an impression that might be a bit misleading. I did not hear him indicate that he will be holding discussions with Premier Smallwood and perhaps he has left an impression that should be cleared up.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I merely rise now to ask the Government House Leader if he would outline the business for the week, as is customary.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Friday and on Monday of next week under the heading of Order No. 32 there will be debate on the reference of the Tax White Paper, anticipated to be a two-day debate. We will ask for a special order by the House to allow the maximum number of participants in the debate. On Tuesday of next week we will call Order No. 10, the annual bill for financing the CNR, the second reading stage of which has already been under debate. Following that we will take the items with respect to the four financial institutions, Orders Nos. 42, 43, 44 and 45. These four bills were on the Order Paper in the last session and we are asking to have them dealt with by special order on second reading as a group.

On Wednesday we will call first Order No. 6, the Canada Corporations Act, which has already been under debate, to be followed by the report stage and third reading of item No. 4 with respect to the Judges Act. On Thursday we will return to yesterday's unfinished business, third reading of Bill C-155 with respect to the Excise Tax Act to be followed by all stages of item No. 26, the Income Tax Act Amendments. On Friday of next week we will call first the report stage and third reading of Bill C-8 with respect to Children of War Dead Assistance Act, to be followed by Order No. 39 providing provisional payments for unthreshed grain.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY AS TO WORKING LANGUAGE—SPEECH BY SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State will not be in the House tomorrow may I now raise a point of privilege. A week ago today he said he would make available to me a copy of the speech on which I based a question. I understand there are translation difficulties. I wonder if I could expect a copy of that speech in the near future.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the member has not received it, but I have already sent it.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NIGERIA-BIAFRA—ALLEGED FAILURE TO TAKE MEASURES TO RELIEVE STARVATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved:

That this House regrets that the government has failed to take adequate measures to relieve massive starvation in Nigeria-Biafra and, particularly, regrets its repeated refusal to assist Joint Church Air and Canairelief operations which have continued to deliver substantial relief despite great hazards, and urgently requests the government to change its policy in this respect.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all may I express my regret at the absence, through illness, of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). We had hoped he could participate in this debate and hope he will have a speedy recovery from his illness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: As hon. members of the House are aware, this day has designated "Peace in Biafra Day". Across Canada many Canadians are considering the plight of their fellow human beings in Nigeria and Biafra who, as the House well knows, as a result of a stalemated war are threatened with mass starvation. It seems to me entirely appropriate that this House, representing as it does all the people of Canada, should devote its time in an effort to determine whether more can be done to aid the prospective victims of starvation in those unfortunate areas.

There are two points on which I think all members of the House will agree. First, that the security of all of us depends on the creation of a world community in which basic human rights, and the most fundamental of all, the right to life, are respected. Second, that though Nigeria and Biafra seem remote to many Canadians, we are right to be concerned about the tragic fate facing many innocent victims of the war and right to do all within our power to relieve their plight. Where we differ is on what can be done and how it should be done. The motion which Your Honour put to the House contends that the government has not done enough in this field.

I ask these questions: What has it done, what has it left undone; what has it failed to do that in our opinions should have been done; and what can be done in future? I intend to be entirely specific in the answers I give those questions. Indeed, the motion itself is specific.

The government could have assisted the Joint Church Aid operations by providing aircraft and/or supplies and/or money. It has failed to do so. The motion urges that it do so in future.

First, Mr. Speaker, let us review what the government has done. On October 24, as indicated at page 37 of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the government had contributed $3 million towards food and relief supplies to be distributed in Biafra. If the Prime Minister takes part in this debate I shall be interested in hearing how that $3 million was divided. How much was spent on the federal side of the lines, and how much on the other side.

In October, 1968, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and I returned from a brief visit to Biafra. We pleaded with the government at that time to make Canadian Hercules aircraft available both to the International Red Cross, which was operating an airlift from Fernando Po to Uli airport, Biafra, and to the church operations which later became known as Joint Church Aid, which had aircraft operating to the same airstrip at Uli from the island of Sao Tome. If the government had accepted our request at that time the amount of supplies flowing to the beleaguered areas of Biafra would have been doubled. The government could have saved the lives of many hundred of thousands of people who made up part of the estimated 1.5 million people who have died of starvation in the area since then. The same plea on behalf of the International Red Cross was made by the Canadian Red Cross High Commissioner, Major-General Wrinch. But what happened?

The government dispatched a grand total of three Hercules aircraft to Nigeria and Biafra. They did not stay very long. The first aircraft left for Lagos on October 10, 1968. It was permanently grounded in Lagos until it returned to Canada a few weeks later. The pretext advanced for not using this aircraft was that two of the airstrips in the federally occupied territories were in a poor state of repair and that the Hercules aircraft would damage the runways. The other airfield available was being used, according to Nigerian authorities, for military purposes and therefore was not available. Mr. Speaker, one of these airports was Calabar, an internationally recognized airport. Hercules aircraft are supposed to be able to land in open fields. Actually, a Hercules aircraft did land at the improvised airstrip at Uli, in Biafra. The Canadian officer in charge of the operation expressed mystification about the alleged landing difficulties. The plain fact is that Nigerian government does not seem to have been interested, and there does not appear to have been any protest on the part of the Canadian government that the aircraft was not used in that region.

Another Canadian Hercules aircraft was dispatched on October 15, 1968, to Fernando Po, to assist in the airlift of the International Red Cross from that island to Uli. It made ten flights to Uli with about 200 tons of food. Most of the time the aircraft was grounded, and in about December of the same year, 1968, it returned to Canada where it has remained ever since. The third aircraft was merely a supply aircraft and need not be counted.

The reason given for withdrawing the effort was that one of the church operated aircraft had been shot at, and that the operation had become too dangerous. Nevertheless, the church operations continued. A second reason given by the Prime Minister in this House about a year ago was that the Biafran authorities would not accept daylight flights proposed by the Nigerian federal government. The Prime Minister made clear that this condition was made, that General Ojukwu would undertake not to use the airstrip during the daylight hours for arms shipments Here, we get the very first proposal of daylight flights subject to conditions of military significance. The condemnation of General Ojukwu as the obstructor of relief for his own people is used as an excuse for inaction. I will have more to say about this later.

The more we look into why this particular reason (the question of daylight flights) is being advanced and nothing being done, the more we see it is not an adequate or proper reason. I will explain my reason for this statement later. I would like to say if there were no daylight flights bringing arms into Uli, which General Ojukwu was asked to forgo, both the condition by the Nigerians and the refusal of the Biafrans are absolutely senseless. There is no point in asking for the condition nor any point in denying the condition. It is perfectly obvious that was not the purpose. There were in fact air flights coming in with arms and therefore the request had a military significance. If such flights were taking place bringing arms into Uli, General Ojukwu, hard-pressed in a war which he and the people he led thought was a war of extermination, was being asked to surrender his means of defence or in effect to surrender, period.

Of course, the Nigerians knew and I think others, including the Prime Minister, should have recognized that such an offer with this condition was bound to be refused. When it was refused he should have known that it was really a propaganda device, a device that unfortunately has been all too successful in alienating sympathy, not from the Biafran regime—that is not important perhaps—but from the innocent victims of the war.

As I have said, this Canadian effort through the three Hercules lasted a few weeks. It delivered to Biafra 200 tons in 10 flights. I want the House to compare that with the results of the operations of the churches which we, in this motion, are asking the House to support. The joint church operation, apart from the International Red Cross, of which Canairelief, the Canadian agency mentioned in the motion, is an agency and important component had at the end of October last flown 4,183 flights and delivered 45,000 tons of food and supplies into Uli. Yet the Canadian government effort is 200 tons compared with the churches and voluntary agencies 45,000 tons. There have been 10 government flights as against 4,183 church sponsored flights.

Since June, 1969 when an International Red Cross plane was shot down by the Nigerian air force in broad daylight, with its clear Red Cross emblem on it, the International Red Cross has ceased to operate. The joint church-aid operation has carried on, despite hazardous conditions and the loss of lives of crew members and planes, and is flying on night operations on the average of 15 flights a night, bringing in approximately 200 tons a night. This is not enough, Mr. Speaker. It is estimated the need to cope with starvation is approximately 500 tons a night, but nevertheless it is a substantial and magnificent contribution and the only organization doing an effective job at the moment. I submit it deserves the support of this country and this government.

It is this operation that the motion before the House asks the government to support. So far, the government has persistently refused to contribute. Yet that operation, together with the International Red Cross, is estimated to have saved three million lives and if given the tools and the means will save many hundreds of thousands of lives in the future. If we condemn this government, it is because it failed to support this operation and does not support it to the present time.

I want to examine some of the reasons for the refusal of the government. I will state them as fairly as I can and ask the Prime Minister and the House to consider very carefully whether these refusals are justified by the reasons I advance. In my view, they do not constitute valid grounds for refusal of assistance. They are pretexts rather than good grounds. I am sure the government holds some of its views with great sincerity, but I think if they will only look again, and look carefully, they will find them to be without substance. What are the objections? I will first list them and then deal with them in order to show why they are not valid objections.

First, it is said that the Biafran regime ought to accept daylight flights, but has refused, presumably out of sheer perversity, and is therefore the party primarily responsible for the starvation of the people. Second, it is said that the International Red Cross is the designated international agency for mercy operations of this kind and that this government can operate only through it.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Third, it is said that the Nigerian federal government, which is the sovereign authority over the whole area, will not consent to the joint church-aid operations and that to assist these flights would be an unjustifiable intervention contrary to the sovereignty of Nigeria. Sometimes it is put in more extravagant language. The Prime Minister said it would be an act of war. Fourth, it is said that General Ojukwu and the Biafrans are secessionists and rebels, and that nothing must be done to aid or encourage such breakaway regimes.

I propose to deal with each of these objections one at a time. The first is that the Biafran regime has refused to accept daylights flights and that this refusal is unreasonable and unjustifiable. This bald statement as it stands is not true, Mr. Speaker. Both the Nigerian and Biafran governments have accepted in principle the International Red Cross proposals for daylight flights. Both have found conditions proposed by the other side unacceptable.

I have in my hands a document containing proposals for relief flights by the International Red Cross to Uli and the document points out that it is as agreed by Professor Freymond and Dr. Cookey who represents the International Red Cross. The document is dated August 27 last. It is based upon the proposals of the International Red Cross of August 1. It provides for a controlling commission of representatives of a neutral state appointed by the federal military government of Nigeria and the Biafran authorities. The bases were to be Cotonou and Santa Isabel. It provides for detailed routings and corridors, for all aircraft to be identified by Red Cross emblems and that Nigerian air space can only be entered after nine o'clock in the morning and after six o'clock in the evening.

Apparently this proposal was unacceptable to the federal government. The Red Cross entered into a second document, which I also have here, this time agreeable to the federal military government, but unacceptable to the Biafrans. It excluded any representative of a neutral state appointed by the Biafran authorities. The host state, the federal military government and the International Red Cross were to be the commissioners. The operations was moved to Cotonou and Santa Isabel was ruled out.

All flights and routing emblems, etc., were to be agreed on by the International Red Cross with the Nigerian air force and the Nigerian army. It seems this provision would give complete control or at least a veto power over the flights to the federal military government's authorities. The flight time was cut down from nine a.m. to five p.m. Article 6(2) provided that this agreement was to be without prejudice to the military operations of the federal military government.

The agreement was to last for three weeks only. It is in return for this agreement that it is suggested the Biafran regime should surrender, or at least discourage, the night flights which were bringing them in infinitely more than this proposed Red Cross flight could possibly have done. The Uli airport is a small strip which can receive only a limited number of flights. Under the present set-up operated by the joint churches it is used for approximately 13½ hours, and some 25 flights come in each night. Some of these, no doubt, bring in arms. It is proposed by the federal military government in the International Red Cross agreement to cut down the period of daylight flights to eight hours. In effect, the Nigerian government is trying to discourage the night flights, which have been highly effective, in favour of a daylight program which they could control. How could anyone seriously doubt that such an agreement would have military implications? Yet the Prime Minister has given the Biafran refusal to accept this agreement as a reason for withholding aid from Biafra.

It is said that the Biafran government asked for military guarantees and then turned down reasonable proposals by the United States government and other countries. This should be looked into again. As I understand it, the Biafrans claim that the guarantees they want are guarantees of the security of Uli airport, their one lifeline and vital means of survival. It is not enough, they say, to guarantee, as has been proposed, that the IRC flights should not be used for military purposes. I do not suppose it was expected they would be. It seems to me this whole situation should be looked into carefully again.

Let us suppose, however, that the Biafran authorities are unduly suspicious of the intention of the federal military government to use daylight flights to their advantage. Is this surprising? They have been the victims of pogroms, massive expulsion, blockade, starvation, aerial bombardment of schools, hospitals, market places and other civilian targets. It is not reasonable to expect them to agree to anything which might lead to military defeat, as they fear extermination.

The second objection taken by the Canadian government to assisting this relief effort on the lines I have mentioned is that Canada recognizes the ancient and honourable tradition of the International Red Cross in the field of mercy operations during wartime. The government points out that international recognition has been given to that organization. This is not an unreasonable argument, but the Prime Minister himself, in his speech of October 24 to which I have referred, suggested it would have to be looked into again. Since June 5 no Red Cross flights have taken place at all, nor does there seem to be any reasonable prospect of their resumption. It is the joint church-aid program which is flying out supplies by night. This organization is no fly-by-night organization—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brewin: I did not intend to make a pun. It is true the organization does fly by night. It is supported by 27 church organizations, including the World Council of Churches, Caritas International, representing the Roman Catholic Church, and many other religious bodies. It is international; it is ecumenical, and it is doing a job. I think it deserves support. These church groups are not politically minded; they are committed to work of compassion and mercy. They operate on both sides of the line. If we can assist the International Red Cross when it is not in operation, surely we can help the churches in their task of mercy.

The third objection states that the Nigerian federal government is the sovereign authority over the whole area and will not consent to the church operation. It is claimed that to assist these flights would therefore be an unjustifiable intervention, even an act of war. But the right of humanitarian intervention in certain circumstances, even in the face of opposition by the nation state, has been recognized in law for centuries by many authorities. I shall spare the House a lengthy recital of those authorities but I wish to give some examples, on the basis of which I urge the government to reconsider its position. One is Ronald St. John Macdonald, dean of the Toronto Law School and Canadian representative at the third session of the United Nations 20th General Assembly. Dean Macdonald prepared a paper or memorandum on this important subject for a committee of this House, the External Affairs Committee, and from this memorandum I extract only the following clear statement:

> It is lawful for Canada to assist church agencies in sending food and medical supplies into Biafra.

Dean Macdonald is not one who speaks on such a matter lightly. Next, I want to read an excerpt from the review of the International Commission of Jurists written as recently as June, 1969, in which it is stated:

> In law as in fact, the conflict in Nigeria can no longer be regarded as a matter of purely national concern. The proportions it has reached and its significance in the decline of international standards and the violation of human rights require that it be solved as a matter of priority by the international community. Although previous efforts have failed, the United Nations, as the only collective organ of this community, could perhaps still take positive action.

Finally, as far as the legal aspect of the matter is concerned, I wish to refer to an article written by Professor Reisman of the Yale Law School. He said this:

> To summarize, international policy even before Grotius has been firmly and continuously for humanitarian intervention in those extreme cases where the most minimal of human rights were in jeopardy. Forceful intervention in such circumstances in the territory of another state is permissible and, for the signatories of the Charter and the Genocide Convention, is mandatory. The effect of the United Nations has been to develop a coordinate set of competence. In circumstances in which an authoritative organ of the UN or of a relevant regional organization can either not act or not act with sufficient dispatch, individual or coordinated collective non-UN humanitarian intervention is permitted as a substitute or functional enforcement of international human rights.

So much for the argument that there is no right of intervention. There is really no excuse for inaction on our part. It is somewhat ironical to hear it suggested that we cannot give this aid because it would amount to an act of war. If this were so, the United States, West Germany, Sweden, The Netherlands and other countries, which have given aid to joint church programs would be at war with the federal government of Nigeria. But as far as I know, they are not. The aid has been given directly and indirectly to joint church assistance programs.

The aid provided by the United States government has been very substantial. The United States sold four stratofreighters to joint church-aid and four to the International Red Cross for $4,000 each, or their scrap value. This aircraft is similar in capacity to the Hercules which the Canadian government would not make available to Canairelief or joint church-aid. In addition, the United States government has been making tonnage payments to church agencies flying relief supplies into Biafra, and this has greatly assisted Canairelief. It is ironical that the Canadian government should refuse to support a Canadian relief agency which is receiving substantial support indirectly from the United States government. Surely, the position of the Canadian government here is legalistic and not realistic.

The last objection to doing anything about this matter is that Colonel Ojukwu and the Biafran secessionists are rebels who should not be assisted even indirectly. If this be true, they were indeed reluctant secessionists, reluctant rebels. They were in effect thrown out of the federation by force. Efforts are now being made to force them back in again. They have fought valiantly for two years against superior odds for self-determination and the right to survive. I suggest in any event that judgments of censure in these circumstances, even if they are justified, are not the overriding factor. Political considerations do not justify denial of human concern and intervention by the peoples of the world.

The motion which we have introduced concludes with an appeal or invitation to the government to change its policy and provide assistance to Joint church-aid or, if it prefers, through Canairelief. It seems to me that the Prime Minister has left the door open. In his speech during the debate on the throne speech he made it quite clear, as reported at pages 37 and 38 of Hansard, that if other methods did not succeed new methods would be examined. Even in the rather harshly worded statement that he made on Tuesday of this week, the Prime Minister did not close the door.

We in this corner of the House would be extremely happy to withdraw this motion, which does imply some censure of the government, if the Prime Minister were to announce that the government would extend assistance to the starving people of Biafra through the only available operative agency, joint church-aid and Canairelief. I can assure the House that we seek no partisan benefit out of this tragic affair.

Every day, Mr. Speaker, you or whoever is in the Chair repeat to us the words from the Lord's Prayer "Give us this day our daily bread". Today perhaps the people of Nigeria and Biafra are saying to us in their hour of tragedy "Give us this day our daily bread". To the extent that it is within our power, we must respond. It is our belief—and this is the reason we have put forward this motion—that it is within our power to respond, and that the motion points the way to an effective response.

Mr. Whicher: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member's time has expired and he will require unanimous consent of the House to receive a question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whicher: I should like to ask the hon. member, who has just spoken so eloquently and sincerely on this subject, whether the New Democratic party of Canada has at any time contacted its fellow socialists in England to ask them to cease supplying arms to Nigeria. If they were to do so, it would do more for the starving people of Nigeria and Biafra than any other single act.

Mr. Brewin: The answer is simple, Mr. Speaker. The answer is yes. I know that the leader of this party has communicated with the leader of the British government and clearly expressed his distress at the actions of that government. I have spoken to my friends and colleagues in the Labour party in Great Britain and to those associated with the Labour party who do not agree with the government's stand. We do not defend, in fact we deplore, the attitude of the Labour government in Great Britain in this matter.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, usually one comment about the illness of a colleague is enough because we can all share it; but since there is a long list of speakers and we are caught in the system, as it were, may I with no less sincerity say that we of the official opposition are also sorry to hear of the illness of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and hope that he will soon recover. I think he had a very arduous trip to the Near East, and like a good many others in public life he is paying the price for this type of intense personal involvement in world problems.

This, sadly, is the resumption of what might be called an adjourned debate. My leader raised the issue of aid in the Nigerian civil war as his first question in the first session of the 28th parliament. Since that time both the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and members on both sides of the House have relentlessly pursued this issue.

May I say at the outset that the members of the official opposition support, without equivocation the motion that has been proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), since it presents a very easy—in the straight sense and meaning of that word—formula to enable the government to give direct assistance without getting into any nuances of diplomacy.

The last time that the House formally discussed the issue, journalists described the contribution I made as being emotional. Much as I have tried to drain any emotion from my speech in a debate dealing with a tragedy like this, I fear I will once again be open to the same criticism. I do not know how man is supposed to go through life untouched by human tragedy, unmoved by death or by a civil war that is so unnecessary.

Today the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has received a good many petitions. Those of us who are trying to revamp the system, to use such phrases as participatory democracy and other terms relating to responsiveness to government and to people's feelings, have been touched by the really national concern that has been so manifest today, a special day of peace for Nigeria and Biafra.

I have before me a rather unique petition in that it is signed by a good many religious leaders of this country and is also supported by people of no religion. This petition I will read because the record should be complete:

> We, the undersigned, appeal to the Government of Canada and to concerned people everywhere to bring political pressure to bear on those countries—amongst them the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and France, to do all in their power to end the supply of arms to Nigeria and Biafra, and to bring both sides to the conference table to begin the search for a lasting peace and a solution based on the will of the people.
> We draw to the attention of Governments the appeals made by His Holiness the Pope and the World Council of Churches, also the resolution passed at the Labour Party Conference at Brighton September, 1969 calling for international action.

The hon. member for Greenwood referred to the statement made in June, 1969 by the International Commission of Jurists, so I will not repeat it. This statement is included in the petition.

> We recognize that this is an African problem which will be solved by Africa but we are convinced that before this can happen outside pressures in the form of arms and finance must be cut off. In the name of two million dead and in the name of those who still survive we call for an end to all action that prolongs this conflict and urge men everywhere to think first and foremost of those in direct need of food, shelter and medical care.

• (3:40 p.m.)

This is a letter supported by the signatures of thousands of Canadians and it is signed by Most Reverend Philip J. Pocock, Co-Adjutor and Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Toronto; the Most Reverend H. H. Clark, Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada; Dr. Robert B. McClure, Moderator of the United Church of Canada; the Very Reverend D. H. Johnson, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Canada and Rabbi W. G. Plaut of the Holy Blossom Temple. It was dated Toronto, October 10. I felt it worthwhile to include this letter in my few comments because I feel it is really the focus of what this day is all about.

Herbert Gold, who was writing in the November issue of Harper's magazine, said:

Biafra makes bad dreams for people who refuse to dream.

"Hunger is a legitimate weapon of war", says one of the Nigerian generals, as the statesmen of the world rely on the end coming before they need make up their minds about the issues. This is a tragic indictment to have to make but this is part of what is happening in the United Kingdom. That country feels a unique responsibility for Nigeria. The Labour party at its meeting has repudiated the Government's action in this regard. The London Times in an editorial November 18, just a week or so ago states:

—if Britain was exercising a strict limit to arms supplies, she would be in a much stronger position to bring (as Sir Alec Douglas-Home suggests) the other suppliers, notably Russia and France, to a conference on the withholding of arms from both sides.

This opportunity, like so many others, has been lost, while the Government has equivocated. Whatever their problems in Lagos, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Stewart should realize that Britain stands in an especially vulnerable moral position over Biafra. It is essential that they should now not only put a ceiling on supplies but should reconsider their whole policy of maintaining them. The least they now owe to British opinion is a new and sincere effort to bring about a political settlement.

The truth is that Mr. Stewart's policy has been wrong at every stage. Again and again the false expectation of "the quick kill" has persuaded the government to continue arms, to continue as the munitions men when they should have been the conciliators. Both sides in Nigeria bear a terrible responsibility for this war; so does Russia, whose synicism is total and unredeemed; so does the British government.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

I think of all the indictments this is the most telling—waiting for the quick kill; the world standing aside unable to act, the United Nations using such phrases as "an internal matter" after 2½ years and 2 million dead. I really do not see why any young person should not wonder and get a bit hung-up about some of our institutions, both national and international, if this is the way we respond.

One of the most interesting statements on the whole issue was made by one Renata Adler in the October 4 edition of the New Yorker. She tells about asking a young Biafran, "Just whose children it is who are dying"? He replied quite seriously that it is the children of villagers who are not strong enough to trek near the front to buy what food there is more cheaply and trek back to market to sell it more dearly, for a little profit to support their families. It takes a high tolerance for the sheer, bitterly comic ugliness of human suffering to care much for these survivors out of the Bertolt Brecht.

Editorial writers for the western press, unlike reporters on the spot, often treat the Biafran position as morally ambiguous, as though the years from 1939 to 1945 had never existed, and as though killing and dying existed on a single plane of atrocity. It is possible that another ethnic population will be decimated before modern intelligence completes its debate about the extent to which the greatest crimes can be said to be the fault of the victims of them.

I obviously do not indict the government on this issue. I indict the representatives and all of us in whatever country we may be. I do indict the Government, however, for its failure to respond to the obvious need and request that has been made, with lots of time for consideration by the Government.

The point that has troubled me is the unrealness of much of the discussion; the withdrawal of world leadership behind fixed and, I regret to say, stereotyped positions. What would have happened if joint church-aid had spent its time arguing about who was at fault, who was to blame? What would be the toll now if joint church-aid had awaited the pleasure of the United Nations or begged admission to either parts of Nigeria from the Organization of African Unity?

I say again this unreality is symptomatic of our times, and I believe very sincerely that it accounts for much of the alienation, to use an ugly word, of so many people from our leadership, our systems and institutions. I admit it takes a far tougher hide than mine to have the atrocities of this tragic war share the few moments on the television news, and then have our leadership ask those who feel that help should be given to go through the proper and orthodox channels. It surprises me very much that in this era the Government is taken aback by the number of people who want something done.

I read, because it was short, the speech made at Sir George Williams yesterday by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) about participatory democracy. As a member of the administration he understands something about feedback. I suggest that the whole effect today is the result of the massive feedback the government is getting about the frustration of the citizens of this country regarding inactivity in the field of aid to joint church-aid.

I also believe sincerely that a good deal of the trouble, and here I may be on dangerous ground and others may shoot me down for it, in the world today is brought about by what I may call sterile ideological debate. These are the sort of positions that are taken. I listened to a debate of this type the other day at the United Nations on the China issue. You put your hand in a slot and out comes the same speech that has been repeated every year for the last 15 or 20 years. How in heavens name do you expect the practical issues facing man to be solved if there is no softening of the positions?

For making such a statement as this at a conference, not at Harrison Hot Springs, I was said to be soft on Communism. May I repeat that unreal discussions seem to be going on which have no relevancy to the problem that we are facing. The problem is hunger, starvation and death. The means are there to alleviate hunger, starvation and death and we are doing a sort of minuet about sovereignty. I hope the Prime Minister will tell us why it has not been possible until now to give help to joint church aid and its agent Canairelief. As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and I have said—and I will repeat it—they are doing the job now. This is the only source of food and medicine for Biafra. The International Committee of the Red Cross has not flown a plane since mid-June. I suppose if I wanted to do so I could start a moral condemnation of this attitude, but what good would it do? I will say this; Canada has taken initiative. I think it was at Istanbul, or at the recent meeting of the ICRC, that a formula for relief was suggested that would be part of the covenant of nations, in other words, exercising the right of innocent victims of war. I hope very much that this will take effect. I think the avenue for the government to follow is at hand. I believe it is really quite bitterly ironic that Canairelief is to such a large degree funded by the United States government and funds from several countries in Europe.

I believe it is irony compounded that Canairelief may be forced to close down its relief operations because of the withdrawal of the support of the United States government, as a result of the indifference of this government. May I add that while the government has been unable to act, today the hon. member for Greenwood and myself, as directors of Canairelief, were recipients of $28,000 from the Ottawa branch of the Miles for Millions. I think this is a commendable act on behalf of that charity.

Mr. Fairweather: I want to pay this public tribute to that organization. It is a pity that there is a bit of polarization in this Parliament in respect of this issue. I cannot believe, if this motion is voted upon, that there will be party positions taken on a human tragedy such as this. I do not believe, when I walk down the corridor with a friend and colleague from the government, that his view and my view are very different about wanting to do something. Are we to believe that government supporters are any less moved than the other members in the House by the tragedy the world faces? Truly, the world faces this tragedy.

Is party solidarity so necessary that a member would allow it to stifle his concern? Mr. Speaker, there is so much that could be said about this issue. In the article in the New Yorker there is a most interesting philosophical discussion of the whole issue—perhaps "issue" is not the word—the whole case of the world standing by to watch. The world stood watching too many times in this century. The world debated whether matters were internal or external from 1932 to 1945. I, for one, am not prepared to have it said that this House or even this government, because it is the government of Canada, was unable to act because a matter was an internal matter. We must be flexible enough to deal with the issue. The issue, as has been said, is relief and how to get it to those who need it. We can use the same flexibility in dealing with relief for Biafra that the Canadian Wheat Board, for instance, is using now in its dealings with the Peoples Republic of China, a government which we do not recognize. Nobody is doing a song and dance about that.

I am informed that a group of church leaders from Winnipeg has written to the Prime Minister asking him to appoint a mission to visit both sides in Nigeria and Biafra. The suggestion of these gentlemen is that Mr. Lester Pearson, who has a world-wide reputation, would be an obvious choice to head such a group. I received a bit of flak for making such a dangerous suggestion during the last debate. Surely, it is an initiative which might be recommended. The only qualification I would have is that the world is asking so much of Mr. Pearson at this stage. Jim Hoagland in last evening's edition of the Montreal Star, in an article entitled "Brinkmanship in Nigerian war", spoke of the mutual distrust. This is something which I think a really authentic or legitimate mission, if that is the expression, sent by the government of Canada could help alleviate. Mr. Hoagland said:

> The deadlock on talks at a time when they should be moving ahead seems to illustrate two important factors in the war that is Africa's agony:
> Neither side feels it can believe the other. The confusion over Biafra's November statements was matched by the incongruous incident of September, in which Nigeria's leader, Maj. Gen. Yakubu Gowon, said Nigeria would accept talks without pre-conditions, only to have his information minister, Anthony Enahoro, say two days later that Nigeria would not accept such talks.

If I might interpolate here, I think this too has been one of the problems in this country; that is, that Gowon, although a major-general and head of a military government is in effect a "captive" of more hawkish people within his cabinet. The article continues:

> Many analysts interpreted this as confirmation of a long rumoured split within the Nigerian leadership, with Gowon being in the dove camp that wants talks and Enahoro speaking for the hawks.
> The distrustful Biafrans will not accept even this possibility. Ojukwu's top advisers say the incident was carefully orchestrated to give the impression of Gowon wanting peace while doing nothing to obtain it.
> Neither side feels weak enough to bargain. The week following Ojukwu's press conference saw major air attacks by the Biafrans, which are likely to bolster the Biafran hopes that they can hold out until the Nigerians are willing to negotiate.
> The Nigerians retaliated, according to reliable reports, by resuming bombing of civilian areas in Biafra, and are capable of greatly intensifying such bombing if goaded into it.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

> Lagos also does not feel that it should gamble on losing at the peace table what it has won on the battlefield. The Nigerians are confident that, at the least, they can contain the Biafrans in the small enclave, and wait for them to crack.
> A visitor to both sides recently can see some of the frightening logic in each position. But the fruits of this logic are likely to become even more bitter for each side, unless meaningful talks are started—now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time expired a few moments ago. Does the House give unanimous consent so that the hon. member may continue?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the minute or two the House has graciously given me. I keep saying this each time I receive consent to continue although it shoots down my argument for shorter speeches. However, I think we were very interested to read just yesterday about the initiative taken by Biafra to ask Switzerland and several other neutral countries of Europe to mediate a cease-fire. I think this is a significant development, but it does not change the need for humanitarian aid forthwith.

• (4:00 p.m.)

In the last few minutes I want to remind the House that it was on October 12, 1968 that Dr. Herman Middlekoop of the World Council of Churches sent a telegram to Secretary General U Thant requesting humanitarian aid for Biafra. I find it a matter of very real and terrible frustration that 13 months later the body that was supposed to be the salve of human suffering has been so bound up by outmoded concepts of sovereignty that it has not been able to respond. Even now, as I said, the Red Cross in its meetings has not been able to devise a formula supported by most men that would result in bringing relief supplies to the innocent victims of the internal war. But two and a half years of war and hundreds of thousands of lives cannot be dismissed any longer as being some internal matter. I really do not know what an internal matter is anyway, unless it is the gobbledegook of internal relationships.

If the United Nations will stand by and watch this tragedy unfold, then the only thing that national governments can do is to respond in the ways that are open to them. What is needed is a cease-fire as a prelude to a settlement. What is needed is an end to the supply of arms. What is needed is immediate and substantial cash help to Canairelief by the government of Canada. What is needed is a mission headed, as some have suggested, by somebody of the stature of the right hon. Lester Pearson who will visit both sides—and this unfortunately has never been done by our special missions up to now. What is needed is a convention, as I mentioned earlier, guaranteeing to the innocent victims of war the right to food, medicine and shelter. I think that Canada has the credentials to be host to an international conference to begin what I suppose in the present mood of the world would be a long period of negotiation to devise an acceptable covenant which could be ratified by all nations.

Debates about whether death is an internal matter, and therefore beyond the ken of nations, or whether death is external and therefore an authentic issue for the concern of this country, seems to be a hollow debate indeed. I urge the government to accept the proposal advanced by the hon. member for Greenwood which has, I am sure, wide support, if the petitions from the people of this country are any criteria.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, we have before us a motion of censure of the government with regard to the tragedy that has been unfolding these last years in an important area of Africa.

I believe that the matter under consideration affects many Canadians, and not only politicians or churchmen, but also citizens interested in foreign affairs.

Last year, the house instructed the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to inquire into the Nigeria-Biafra tragedy. I myself was on that committee which heard several experts about the situation prevailing there.

Following that inquiry there was a debate in the house. In fact, the two previous speakers made recommendations to the government which dealt mostly with disarmament.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt there is a civil war going on there. It is not a war between two foreign countries but one between the people of the same country. Corneille had written that "civil war is the realm of crime".

Undoubtedly in Nigeria, not only on the battlefields but also elsewhere, tragedies are played out and grudges are paid off.

There is no doubt that this war has the same effect as any other as far as getting supplies to the ones who are not involved in actual fighting. We know that many people are dying of starvation and others are suffering from malnutrition to the point that even if we succeeded in bringing relief to them, it might be too late to save them.

In a war of this type the problem is always the same, i.e., providing for the ones who are not directly involved. Indeed getting supplies to the soldiers is of paramount importance for the country. I think that General Gowon's as well as Colonel Ojukwu's first concern is to supply his forces. Old people, women, children, and generally people who are not on the battlefield are looked after last.

And the necessary steps are taken on both sides so that supplies will not reach enemy forces to strengthen them.

The war that is opposing Biafra to Nigeria is not different from other wars. It will cause insurmountable problems as long as the two parties involved do not, through negotiations, find a way to end this conflict which has lasted much too long already.

We have been advocating such negotiations between Nigeria and Biafra, but until now without any really effective result. We have been told that Colonel Ojukwu has asked recently for assistance from Switzerland, a country whose neutrality is well known and whose interventions are often successful in seltling disputes between some countries.

Apparently, it is expected that the reply of Switzerland will be consistent with its traditional policy. The Bern government would be willing to offer its services if the two opposing parties so desired and if the mediation had any chance of succeeding.

But now one country is requested to act as a mediator in order to reach a settlement while conditions are imposed that make any agreement impossible.

Therefore, I wonder whether the two leaders in this war have any sense of responsibility.

The UNESCO Constitution states, and I quote:

> As wars originate in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that peace must build its defences.

I believe that it is on the two leaders that pressure must be exerted in order to bring this war to an end.

The government is asked to supply more food, more medical products and more supplies of all kinds to help the starving. That is fine, but at the same time all necessary steps should be taken to put an end to the famine and to the war that is the cause of it. An agreement should be reached on the necessity of a real truce in order to bring to a stop the hardship that is prevalent in that part of the world.

The dispute between the two countries has not only to do with the fact that the Nigerians want to protect their interests. Foreign financial interests are also involved.

During the inquiry made by the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, it was recognized that oil interests had contributed to the start of the slaughter which is taking place in this part of Africa.

Last year at the interparliamentary conference in Lima, a representative of Switzerland, precisely the country which is asked to act as mediator, said, and I quote:

> Economic and political interests are lurking behind this fatal aid.
> Without military assistance from Great Britain, the Soviet Union and a few other countries, the military government of Lagos would have been unable to launch a war against the Ibos.
> As for Biafra, it is not much better. France and Portugal also favour the secession to protect their own interests. By supporting Biafra, they hope to obtain some right on the oil resources of the Delta and the Niger. It is urgent to stop sending arms to either parties; to protect economic and political interests by supplying arms is one of the forms of neo-colonialism.

Mr. Speaker, in November 1968, when we dealt with the matter in this House, the Conservative member who has just resumed his seat moved, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), and I quote:

> That the Canadian government, alone or in conjunction with like-minded countries, should take initiatives to persuade nations supplying arms to the combatants in Nigeria-Biafra to stop the flow of arms without which the war would soon no longer be possible.

That recommendation is in agreement with the Swiss delegate's statement at the Lima Conference.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what extent the Canadian government has put the pressure on to stop the delivery of arms to the belligerent forces in this war. But it is no secret that that country is unable, by itself, to set up the industries needed to produce the arms used in the slaughter. Such arms, therefore, come from outside.

The first thing to consider, if we want to end this conflict, is that the delivery of arms to both parties must be stopped so as to make it possible to send the necessary relief supplies, namely food, drugs and building material, that country needs. Neither the Ibos, the Haoussas nor the Yorubas will be able to reconstruct Nigeria promptly, unaided, at the end of the war. They will need help and when that time comes I would like to see Canada take steps to supply everything they need to rebuild their country.

I therefore support the proposal that Canada should supply food and medical assistance to the agencies which have willingly faced danger to get relief supplies to those who need them. If the government is reluctant to put human lives in jeopardy and to risk damaging Canadian equipment to transport relief supplies, it can at least supply the required financial assistance, food and medical assistance and thus co-operate with the people who are ready to allay the distressing conditions prevailing over there.

And, in the very last place, I want to state once more that so long as the necessary steps to halt the war are not taken any assistance contributed will have to be constantly renewed. To put an end to suffering, we must stop creating victims.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to thank hon. members of the opposition who expressed regret at the illness of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I want to thank them also for the reasonableness and sincerity with which they led us into this debate. I will try to stick to that approach when speaking of the very horrible event that is taking place in Nigeria today. Any armed conflict is terrible, Mr. Speaker. But when events conspire to make children the principal victims, then the horror of all persons turns to revulsion. We should be less than human if we did not attempt to alleviate that suffering. The debate today asks if government attempts in that respect have been correct; if Canadian policy should be measured by one criterion—contributing or not contributing to a single charitable operation.

Canadians possess no secret formula for concluding wars; they are not gifted with any divine guidance into the rights and wrongs of the arguments of strangers. Canadians do believe, however, that political quarrels cannot be successfully concluded on a battlefield. The complex human relationships which must somehow be repaired and restored, the confidence which must be created in the place of fear—these difficult and sensitive tasks cannot be performed in an atmosphere of war. They can only be the product of consultation and negotiation.

Canada has repeated these views again and again to the combattants in this war, Mr. Speaker, and it has expressed publicly its attitude with respect to the supply of arms from outside. We have stated as well that we are anxious to do whatever we can to assist in such consultations or negotiations. Just as we made available senior and experienced Canadian military personnel to serve on the international observer team in Nigeria, we are ready to make available talented Canadian diplomats to contribute to the process of peaceful settlement.

To intervene when not asked, however, would not be an act of courage; it would be an act of stupidity. There are some 30 countries in Africa south of the Sahara which have achieved independence since 1957. Every one of these emerged into nationhood following a lengthy and anguished colonial history. No single act would be regarded with more hostility by any of them than the unilateral intervention of a non-African state into their affairs.

Mr. Trudeau: I say this, not from surmise, but because it was made very clear on at least two occasions by the Organization of African Unity. They have said that this is an African problem, and that outside interference in this conflict would not be welcome. Certainly, it is presumptuous on our part to think that we, white people who are far away in North America, know more about Africa than the 30-odd countries, the members of the Organization of African Unity which made the statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is not the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Because of that it would be wrong for the Canadian government to assist the Nigerian government militarily, but it would be equally wrong for the Canadian government to assist the rebel regime politically. Each is an act of intervention. Each would be a presumptuous step, an arrogant step, I would say, for a country so distant as Canada.

What Canada can do, and what it must do, however, is to attempt to feed the children who will starve to death without help. A starving child prompts an emotional response, and properly so. But that emotion must serve to assist the children, and not the reverse. It has been said by some hon. members opposite that this is the greatest human tragedy of our time. It may be, but I doubt it. The nature of man is so perverse that in the past few years there have taken place tragedies of indescribable proportions in several developing countries: the mass slaughters during the partition of India, the atrocities in Algeria, the massacres in Indonesia. Even while the Nigerian war continues, there have been bloody conflicts in the southern Sudan and in Chad. The Canadian government did not intervene, and is not intervening in these sad situations. No Canadian government did so, and no Canadian opposition party criticized those decisions, because of the inescapable limitations upon the effective actions which Canada can take.

The Nigerian tragedy does not become different from these others simply because some persons employ superlatives, or repeat accusations of genocide when these allegations have been proved demonstrably incorrect,—

Mr. Brewin: By whom?

Mr. Trudeau: —or relate highly inflated death rate figures. Nigeria is only different because we know more about it and because it is children who are the principal sufferers.

[Translation]

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there are several points on which there is no dispute among hon. members. We share a common revulsion to the suffering which has been brought about by this war. We share a common desire to aid the victims. We all recognize the fragile and inadequate nature of a night relief airlift which must share a single runway and surrounding airspace with competitive arms flights.

Where we differ is in our judgment of the best means to increase the flow of relief. On the basis of careful evaluations of reports received from qualified observers from many sources, the government has concluded that the only truly effective way of delivering adequate supplies of relief to Biafra is by way of daylight flights. Not only is a daylight airlift safer but because of the different flying conditions, many more airplanes could be accommodated in any one day than in any one night. When one adds to these facts the additional fact that the airport would not be used for arms deliveries in the daytime, then the flow of relief would increase several-fold.

These facts, which are indisputable, prompted the Canadian government to do whatever it could to persuade the parties to permit daylight relief flights to occur. In making these efforts we attempted to understand and to meet the objections which were raised by one side or the other to the principle of daylight relief flights.

I related to this House on November 4, 1968 and again two days ago the Canadian initiative which exacted from the Lagos authorities a guarantee of safety for daylight flights. I am able to reveal as well that it was as a result of the visit of my representative to Nigeria in June of this year that the two essential elements of any daylight arrangement were identified and agreed to. These are the identification of the aircraft involved, and the inspection of the cargo.

Canadian efforts since that time have been directed to a means of assisting in this identification and this inspection. We have taken the position that it is not for us to assess whether the military fears of one side or the other are reasonable or responsible. Rather we have sought to produce a formula that would meet those fears, a formula which would assure the Nigerians that relief aircraft were in fact relief aircraft, that relief cargos were in fact relief cargos, in short a formula that would assure to the Biafrans that the aircraft were not disguised bombers or troop-carriers; that food parcels were not tampered with; that daylight flights could not be used as a cover for a hostile military operation.

The negotiations conducted this summer by the International Committee of the Red Cross were based upon these principles.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I think it is slightly unfair to suggest, as was done by the opposition this afternoon, that the Red Cross has been bogged down and caught up with outmoded concepts. This is not the aspect which has deterred the Red Cross from attempting to bring its mercy flights to the Biafrans. That operation stopped, as the member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said, after a Red Cross aircraft was shot down in the middle of the night.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Nonsense; it was six o'clock in the evening.

Mr. Trudeau: Even though it may have been clearly marked, it was shot down in conditions of poor visibility—entre chien et loup. It was following that that the Red Cross stopped flying. It did so not because problems of sovereignty were raised, but because it realized, as I think we realized prior to that, that it would be infinitely better to reach agreement to fly by day. The reasons that agreement has not been reached, as I shall show in a moment, are not because of outmoded concepts of sovereignty, but because both parties have been unable to come to an agreement as to the conditions under which the Red Cross could pursue its mercy flights during the daytime. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is not a legal technicality. It is a question of whether the Red Cross is permitted to make its mercy flights during the daytime.

[Translation]

When the Ojukwu regime balked at the implementation of the proposed agreement because of fear of military disadvantage, Canada was disappointed but it made no public entreaties or complaints. We thought that the Biafran fears were unfortunate and, indeed, that they were unjustified, but we nevertheless attempted to meet them. We consulted with United States officials and in particular with Ambassador Clyde Ferguson who is President Nixon's relief coordinator and whose exhaustive trips into the area and discussions abroad have made him probably the most knowledgeable and qualified person in the world on this question. A formula of assurances was devised which we sincerely thought met every one of the Biafran military objections.

The government was shocked, Mr. Speaker, when that offer of assurances was turned down out of hand by Colonel Ojukwu. It was even more shocked when Canadian officials were informed by Biafran representatives that military assurances were not enough, that fear of military disadvantage was not the main reason for Biafran rejection of daylight flights, that desire for political advantage was the reason.

I have been asked, Mr. Speaker, to spell out the Biafran demands in these respects. I have been reluctant to do so because this would be a breach of the normal rules which regulate discussions of that sort. I will only add that Canada was asked for an assurance of a political character, and of a nature so extreme that no government could accede to it and still make any claim to non-intervension and non-support of the political aims of one side or the other. Those persons who have repeated so often their contention that Canada as an impartial country could play a mediator role would, I am sure, be the first to object to Canada placing itself in such a position.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder if the Prime Minister will permit a question?

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps you could ask the question when I have finished speaking.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If the Prime Minister will agree to be here, fine.

Mr. Trudeau: As far as I can answer them, I will. Perhaps I will be answering them during the remainder of my speech.

The resolution before the House urges the government to support Canairelief, Mr. Speaker. The government recognizes the courage of the pilots and crews of the joint church aid aircraft, and regrets that they are forced to risk their lives every night in order to carry out the task they have assumed. From my place in this House I have urged Canadians to support the efforts of Canairelief through generous financial contributions. I applaud the one which was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), but it is unfortunately a matter of record that those contributions have been far short of the amount needed.

It is also a matter of record that Canairelief qualifies under United States laws, as a carrier of United States foreign aid, for freight payments. It was for this reason that the hon. member for Greenwood was quite correct, Mr. Speaker, when he referred to the indirect assistance which Canairelief receives from the United States government. Those freight payments will continue so long as Canairelief carries cargoes of preponderantly U.S. origin. In the result, Canairelief, a private Canadian charitable organization, is employed as a cargo airline, engaged in the carriage of U.S. goods to Biafra, and is receiving payment for that task. I say this not critically but as an explanation of the position in which Canairelief finds itself. I say it also as a refutation of the totally baseless charge made Tuesday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and repeated today by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, that, in the words of the Leader of the Opposition, "the United States is likely to withdraw its support of Canairelief because the Canadian government will not support its own citizens". There is absolutely no foundation in fact for that allegation, because the support of United States government stems from the situation as I have described it, not as the hon. gentlemen mistakenly believe.

The Canadian government has not granted any support hitherto to Canairelief, Mr. Speaker, for two reasons. The first is that our contributions were made to the International Red Cross, which at that time was the only agency flying relief to both sides in the conflict. Supporting the Red Cross was consistent with our aim of impartiality in the war. The Red Cross amassed a proud record: 2,030 flights, carrying over 23,000 tons of relief supplies.

Our second reason stems from the argument I made in French a few moments ago: that in our view all government efforts should now be focused on daylight flights.

It will be remembered that Canairelief commenced its operations as complementary to the government-assisted Red Cross flights. It was correctly recognized that there were limits to the government's freedom of action, limits expressed not just by the Nigerian government but by more than 30 African governments in the OAU, and that there was a role to be played by a private Canadian organization. The Canadian government welcomed that initiative.

I have said many times that if Canadians, private organizations, and, I hope, members of the opposition and on this side of the House, want to help Canairelief it is an act of which we will certainly approve. I have said that many times.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That's generous, isn't it?

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised that the right hon. member does not realize there is a distinction between a government acting in political matters and private organizations—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government will do nothing; that is the distinction.

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. member says we will do nothing. I suggest that because that was his experience, he is now sitting in opposition.

Alleged Failure to Aid Biafrans

• (4:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I think that what the government, as a government, cannot do, private citizens can do and have done. For the government's part, while assisting the Red Cross we were at the same time pressing for daylight flights. Now that the Red Cross is no longer flying, it is all the more imperative that some massive relief operation get under way.

The government readily admits, and has said so before, that it faces a question which demands continual and urgent examination—whether to take steps such as assisting Canairelief, which are likely to be objected to by the Nigerian government, or to take steps such as dropping food by air in daylight which are again likely to be objected to by the Biafrans. I recognize that this could be interpreted as a decision involving a value judgment about which side in the war is at fault. I hope we shall not be forced into such a judgment but, instead, reach only a decision as to which is the most effective way of alleviating the suffering.

I suggest that this attitude on the part of the government and these persistent endeavours cannot in any circumstances be described as indifference, as partisanship or as stubbornness. We are doing what we think is right and what the overwhelming majority of African leaders tell us is right. Hon. members opposite would not suggest, I am sure, that compassion is to be found only on their side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Could I put a question to the Prime Minister? He has indicated that the Biafran authorities now expect political guarantees, though he has been reluctant to mention the nature of those guarantees. Are we to understand that they relate to some kind of diplomatic recognition? Is he not being somewhat unfair to the Biafran authorities by not clearing the air on this issue, by not indicating why he is taking his present position? Some of the things the Biafrans have said relate to certain kinds of sanction, which could amount to a kind of political recognition. Or was it more specifically stated than that?

Mr. Trudeau: I am referring to matters of this precise nature. From the question, I assume the hon. member has some very precise information about the type of conditions which have been made by the Biafran representatives. I can only repeat that the hon. member seems to know much about this. I have said publicly that if the Biafran authorities want to state publicly what these conditions are, I do not mind; it will be up to the House and to the country to judge whether or not they are tantamount to political conditions. It is our opinion that they are. I am not anxious to make public the details of discussions which took place between the two parties. I am sure that if I were to do so I should be blamed, just as the United States was blamed when it made public some discussions which had taken place in confidence between it and the North Vietnamese. Once again, if this were to be denied by the Biafrans and if they say there are no political conditions, we shall be delighted; I shall have been proved wrong in my information but we shall be able to begin the daylight flights. I repeat: the military guarantees which had been asked for by the Biafrans were all met as far as we can see. The Red Cross obtained consent from the Lagos government to meet all that was required by way of military guarantees. The Biafrans wanted more than military guarantees; they wanted political guarantees. These, we were unable to give for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): May I ask a further question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we should pursue the debate in this way. I see that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) all want to ask questions. I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood wants to ask a question. I am prepared for the House to proceed in this way, but it is not a practice I wish to encourage. Having said this, I shall call the hon. member for Greenwood and perhaps end the exchanges at that point.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a major question which has troubled parliament and the country for well over a year. We have had a number of special debates on it. I think the value of a debate lies in a real dialogue taking place, not in the expression of fixed positions from one side of the House or from the other. I think this is what the Prime Minister himself would wish. During these formal debates there is really not much time; an hon. member, or a minister, delivers a speech and disappears; it becomes a monologue, rather than a dialogue. If we wish to make progress, there must be real dialogue, not monologue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I may say I am as aware of that as is the hon. member. But we are not in committee of the whole and it is not our practice to proceed as if we were. I allowed the hon. member to ask a question and I now propose to allow the hon. member for Greenwood to ask a question. After that, I propose to recognize the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Brewin: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his impression of demands of a political nature made by the Biafran regime are based upon direct contact by any Canadian representative with that regime, or on secondhand information from some other organization. If the latter is the case, would the Prime Minister not seriously consider making some form of contact with the Biafran authorities—I am not asking for diplomatic recognition—as a result of which it could be accurately determined whether that regime was in fact insisting not on military consideration but on rather impossible political consideration?

Mr. Trudeau: I said two days ago that we have been in contact with the Biafran authorities. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was in touch with them in New York at a ministerial level; Canadian government officials have made contact at their level in Geneva, London and elsewhere.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: I am talking about the guarantees.

Mr. Trudeau: These Canadians have had various contacts with the Biafran authorities. I cannot say whether the particular guarantees to which the hon. member refers came directly from Canadian officials or indirectly through Canadian officials after they had been negotiated. I do know that most of the negotiation at this stage was conducted by the Red Cross and by Ambassador Ferguson. Surely, there is no suspicion on the part of the hon. member that the Red Cross is trying to find some way of not sending mercy flights to Biafra?

Mr. Stanfield: No one said that.

Mr. Trudeau: No one said that, but—

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Greenwood is now rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Brewin: The idea suggested by the Prime Minister was furthest from my mind. I never intended to say that the Red Cross was dragging. I merely asked the Prime Minister whether he had had any direct contact concerning the guarantees, or whether he was basing his judgment on second or third hand reports. I think he has now given us the answer.

Mr. Trudeau: If the second hand report was from the Red Cross—

Mr. Stanfield: Well, say that. That is all we want to know.

Mr. Trudeau: Why did the hon. member say: "If it is not first hand, why don't you get it first hand?" You cannot on the one hand say that to get reports second hand from the Red Cross is beautiful and on the other hand that I must get them first hand. We trust the Red Cross.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before recognizing the hon. member for Prince Albert I might interrupt the debate to announce the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment tonight. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Post Office; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Indian Affairs; the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean)—national defence.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NIGERIA-BIAFRA—ALLEGED FAILURE TO TAKE MEASURES TO RELIEVE STARVATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Brewin:

That this House regrets that the government has failed to take adequate measures to relieve massive starvation in Nigeria-Biafra and, particularly, regrets its repeated refusal to assist Joint Church Aid and Canairelief operations which have continued to deliver substantial relief despite great hazards, and urgently requests the government to change its policy in this respect.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the House has listened to a lecture by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on a matter that touches the hearts of all Canadians and in respect of which there is universal demand for action on the part of the government. The Prime Minister condescendingly told the House that any member of the opposition who wanted to contribute to Canairelief would receive his approval. This represents the attitude that has been shown throughout by the Prime Minister.

All I have to do, Mr. Speaker, is to recall some events. First of all, when the Prime Minister was asked during one of his visits to a part of Canada some 15 or 16 months ago what he was going to do about Biafra, he replied: "Where is Biafra?" That was a facetious observation. The other day during the course of the debate he turned to an opposition member and said: "Have you ever been to Biafra? I have". Yet, when this serious question was asked, the Prime Minister brushed it aside with an observation that had no basis in fact.

In addition to that, we recall very well an occasion in the city of Halifax when a number of young people gathered round the Prime Minister and asked him what was going to be done about Biafra. I am very pleased to see the Prime Minister leaving the chamber, because he knows he cannot face the facts.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This tells the story. Whenever the Prime Minister is worried about criticism, he always absents himself; he cannot stay to face the facts. What he means by dialogue is that one should listen to him. Apparently he speaks ex cathedra. When the members of the House dare to speak, he departs. This is because he believes in unilateral discussion in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister regards this institution as something of a debating society, and he appears whenever he or any of his selected ministers decide it appropriate to do so.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the fact. Will these trained seals explain to me why the Prime Minister left?

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I point out that all through the speech of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) the Prime Minister remained in the House. I presume the hon. member was speaking for his party, and certainly his remarks had much more relevance than the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEwan: You're a great help.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I might point out to the hon. member that he has hardly raised a point of order. The appeals for order that are being made on both sides of the House make it very difficult for the Chair to hear the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The right hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, today we received a lecture in the form of an alibi. Is the government of Canada going to contribute to Canairelief? The answer is that it is not. That was quite definitely stated, though it was suggested that following 18 months of consideration on the part of the government the government is still considering ways and means that might be taken.

Let me recall what happened in the city of Halifax when the Prime Minister was asked by a group of students whether he would do something on behalf of the poor people of Biafra. The Prime Minister's reply was: "Would you have expected to give support and food to the Nazis at Stalingrad?" That answer indicates a state of mind that is detrimental to fair and reasonable discussion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not mind the noise. Some of the members opposite make their best contributions when they interrupt from a seated position. But they know what is in their hearts. When they go back to their constituencies, they will say that they hope something is going to be done, that they know something will be done. They will say: "We cannot understand why the opposition presses for action, because for 18 months we have been trying to give consideration to this matter. We are giving the question our deepest thought and perchance at some time, somewhere, we will do something".

While this consideration is being given to the matter, tens of thousands of people are dying. They are dying because they have no food. They are dying because some African states say they know better what to do than humanitarian nations in other parts of the world.

No one has explained why this question was not brought before the United Nations. Can any member among those who were interrupting a moment ago tell me why this question has not been put before the United Nations? A year ago last October the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said: "If we find that that can be done, and it is necessary to be done, we intend to do it".

I want to refer to the record of a number of Canadians, many of them outstanding Liberals, who have been deeply disappointed at the fact that this government has adopted a squalid, nasty, unreasonable and hypocritical attitude to one of the most serious questions of humanitarian need that we have had to face in many years.

On October 28, 1968, there was an open letter in the Globe and Mail to the Prime Minister on the Nigeria-Biafra war. Under the heading "What is happening?", it reads:

> There is general agreement among observers recently returned from Biafra that several thousand civilians are dying every day from starvation. Within weeks this figure will reach tens of thousands when the last stores of bulk food are exhausted. Reporters are equally convinced that even an apparent military victory by the federal troops will not end the fighting since the Biafrans are determined to continue a prolonged guerrilla resistance.
> By sending some food and aircraft to Nigeria and Biafra, the Government has shown the Canadian people that it accepts a responsibility for international action where human suffering has reached disastrous proportions.

The open letter has other headings such as "What should be done?", "How can this be done?", "What should Canada do". Under that heading it states:

> Canada should greatly increase its efforts in cooperation with like-minded nations to:
> have a ceasefire resolution adopted at the United Nations—

Canada refused to place this matter before the United Nations, though it has been asked over and over again.

Secondly, the open letter suggests that there should be a stop in the supply of British arms to Nigeria. I think the strongest objection should have been made by this government to the Wilson Government for supplying Nigeria with arms and thereby prolonging the suffering there.

The letter then suggests that we should exert direct and public pressure to end the fighting and re-establish negotiations. This letter was signed by Stephen Clarkson, a Liberal candidate in Toronto for mayor; Allen Linden, chairman of the recent Harrison Hot Springs conference; Marshall McLuhan, the conscience of the Prime Minister; Tim Reid, M.P.P.; Peter Russell, Professor in Toronto and a leading Liberal; Professor John Saywell, who was one of the supporters of the right hon. gentleman for the leadership of the Liberal party; Charles Templeton; Leon Weinstein, the man whom Senator Keith Davey brought forward as a potential nominee for the Liberal party for mayor of Toronto.

They said this question should be brought before the United Nations and many others joined with them. These are outstanding Liberals but what did they get? They simply received, 13 months after they made that declaration, a pious statement by the Prime Minister that there is nothing that can be done—that in effect is what he says—except through assistance from private quarters.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) on the expression of their viewpoints which they placed fairly before the House.

The attitude of the Government is not that it is marking time but that it is standing still. It is defying the people of Canada openly, overtly and unjustifiably. People ask for action and they receive the reading of an essay on the subject of international relations. I will deal with that in a moment.

We have with us today in this city Mr. Stanley Burke, formerly connected with the CBC. He is a man who gave up his position because of the situation in Biafra and the appeal to his humanitarian sentiments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We think of the sacrifices of Canadians. Four of these brave men, as a price of their emergency flights, in the month of August, 1969 gave their lives. The Government of Canada dare not continue to defy the hopes and desires of the people of Canada. The Prime Minister can leave. Anyone who runs away lives to speak another day. He can leave, he can evacuate the House, but by his actions today he showed more clearly, more definitely and more assuredly his disregard for this institution which he is endeavouring to remake in the image of the Congressional government of the United States.

What can be done? Toward the end of last year the Biafran authorities completed preliminary surveys for a relief airstrip. In an undertaking with Canairelief and Joint Church Aid, the Biafrans cleared and levelled a strip to be used exclusively for relief purposes. If the Canadian government wishes to send any relief, and certainly the speech of the Prime Minister today indicates no such desire, it could complete this strip easily and quickly by laying down a metal military emergency grid. This could be done in a matter of hours by a military team. Biafran authorities have stated that such action would be deeply appreciated.

Dr. Otué, the senior Biafran representative in New York, is in Ottawa today and has given his personal assurances. Hercules aircraft could thus be flying in food by the hundreds of tons within a matter of days. The food is stockpiled at Sao Tome in thousands of tons. In addition, there are several thousands of tons of Red Cross supplies which have been lying around deteriorating since last June.

Sir, I am shocked by the attitude of the Prime Minister today. He represents all of the people of Canada. He does not want to engage in any dialogue, but would rather have us listen to his monologue. Isn't it about time this Government decided that it should act?

Since June 5, the Red Cross, jointly with Canairelief, has carried into Biafra over 30,000 tons of food, so that in contrast with the negotiations that are going on between the Red Cross and the authorities in Nigeria the population has been assisted to this extent. Canairelief, the Canadian company or group, has just completed its 500th flight. It uses, at the present time, 4 superconstellation planes, and could fly another four flights if additional funds were available. I say to the Government, furnish these funds.

Canadian people are responding well but there are limits. Do you mean to tell me that the Canadian Council of Churches or the other organizations which have joined together for action should be spurned in the way they have been by the expression of the views of this Government today? Why will the Government not contribute to Canairelief?

The Prime Minister today produced a legalistic formula. The request was made in August and there has been no reply made or there was not up to the day before yesterday. There has been neither a yes nor a no in reply. The Government has hidden behind protocol and pretended international legal principles in order to deny hundreds of thousands of starving people at a time when Canada has the largest surplus of wheat—1,400 million bushels—in its history. The Government says this cannot be done. Let us simply look at the facts. For a long time the Government said it was unable to get any information from the Nigerian leaders or those associated with them. That was in September and October of 1968.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

• (5:10 p.m.)

I decided, as a private member of parliament, to send a message to General Yakubu Gowon, State House, Lagos, Nigeria, imploring him to expedite the clearance of Canadian aircraft to permit relief supplies of food and medicine to be delivered to those parts of Nigeria affected by the civil war. The message continued:

> Along with tens of thousands of Canadians I heard you in August in an interview on CBC undertake to assure delivery of relief supplies to the afflicted whatever their political affiliations. The words you used were "I have told you the supplies will get through, I will see to it that it is done". Will you in the name of humanity now do that which you undertook and as a humanitarian assure that innocent children and others in need will secure the available supplies which Canada desires with all its heart to provide.

Within a matter of four days I received a complete answer thereto from Major General Gowon in which he pointed out that he could not understand my message. He said that there is nothing being done on his part or on the part of those associated with him to interfere in any way with food going into Biafra. He said further:

> I have at no time failed to honour my pledge to do everything possible to ensure that no one in this country suffered unnecessarily as a result of this war. Unfortunately there are areas to which the authority of my government cannot yet be extended and these are the areas from which the stories of harrowing distress issue but even then my government has made repeated offers of practicable means of getting relief supplies to them. Unfortunately the secessionist leaders have consistently turned down these offers and their supporters in Canada are taking the public for a ride by concealing these facts while parading statistics of the magnitude of distress.
> There need be no cause for you to be concerned that relief is not reaching those in need who can be reached. My government is ensuring that more and more of such persons are continuing to be reached.

Well, we know what the results are. We know that those statements made by him—although he did answer the request and the plea—were not based on facts. That we know. They tell me the latest excuse is that constitutionally this cannot be done. I have before me a constitutional summary respecting this matter and in particular the right of any country to give humanitarian aid to those who are suffering. Humanitarianism has no protocol.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Dr. Edward McWhinney, Q.C., Professor of Law, McGill University, on October 30, 1968 set out in detail the situation. He said there is no constitutional basis for the fatuous excuses being made by the Canadian government in refusing to act. He said further:

—we have heard a number of arguments, legal and otherwise, against using Canadian military planes to transport Red Cross non-military supplies to Biafra. It has been said that that would be a legal act of war; though since the test of a legal act of war, according to both Soviet and Western doctrine, focuses on the purpose to which the activity is directed—here a humanitarian one—this argument is surely legally untenable. Beyond this, a right of humanitarian intervention, limiting the internal sovereignty of any state when it acts contrary to the laws of humanity, has been recognized since the time of Grotius, the founder of modern international law, in the early 17th century. Further, in reaction to the crimes committed during the Hitler era, the World Community has moved decisively to limit the old absolutist claims of national sovereignty, by positive law measures like the Nuremberg War Crimes Tribunal, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the Genocide Convention itself, thus filling the gaps in the "old" international law. Not merely, therefore, would Canada or any other country seeking to have the UN General Assembly discuss the Nigeria-Biafra conflict not violate Nigeria's claimed sovereignty: in fact, we would be fulfilling a positive duty cast upon all members of the World Community, under the "new" international law created since the downfall of the Nazi régime, to bring up alleged violations of human rights for public discussion in the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the right hon. gentleman knows, according to the rules his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I would like to tell the hon. member that I agree to let him go on with his speech, but nevertheless I would like to point out to him that when he delivered his last speech—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ouellet: —on agriculture—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ouellet: —he also talked longer than he was allowed to according to Standing Orders.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: Tell him to sit down.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. What is now before the House is a question from the Chair whether there is unanimous consent. There would appear to be unanimous consent that the right hon. member continue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you very much. I was about to point out that there is no justification for the narrow interpretation of the government, that it has, in fact, the right, wherever the demands of humanity appeal to the hearts of people, to do that which we have asked for and which is being asked for today in the resolution before the House. Indeed, the World Organization of Jurists—and I shall not quote this because it is a lengthy quotation—which is representative of judges or former judges everywhere in the world has declared that there is a right to act on a humanitarian basis. But the government of Canada stands firm and unmoving. To me, this is one of the most callous and squalid stands any government could take in a time of need and suffering.

The Prime Minister reads to the House of Commons a dissertation to exculpate the government and in doing so indicates clearly that so long as he remains Prime Minister he intends to stand against any effective action being taken to meet this terrible tragedy which today fills the heart of all mankind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I join the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in regretting that the Prime Minister is not present in the House for the debate, although I must assume, and do assume, that he left because of some urgent appointment he may have had. I regret it, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is important. It is important that he hear what other members of this House have to say about his speech today and the statement he made on Tuesday which I can describe only as an apologia, an apology for his guilt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: The Prime Minister says quite rightly that all the compassion is not on the benches of the opposition. Whoever suggested it was? No member on this side of the House has any doubt that all members of the government are as concerned, are as decent, and are as willing to help as is any member of this House or any other citizen of Canada. But that is not the question. The question is that the government is in a position to do something and is refusing to do it. That is the question. Protestations of compassion, protestations of concern or self-righteous and self-serving assurances of a guilty heart do not feed a single baby in Biafra. This merely disgusts those who want to see some action taken. I say this because the Prime Minister gave us a series of excuses which I, for one, cannot accept. What we are saying to the Prime Minister and to the government in this resolution today—and it has been put very eloquently and simply—I can put in one sentence. Since June of this year the flights of the International Red Cross have not taken place those flights ceased last June.

• (5.20 p.m.)

Since June of this year the only aid to the starving people of Biafra has come through Joint Church Aid and Canairelief, and it is fatuous, callous and distressing for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to sit there and tell us—despite the fact that the only assistance that Biafrans have received since June of this year has been assistance through these church agencies—that he will not help them because he thinks Lagos will not approve. That is precisely what he said. He did not say that Lagos had been asked and has refused. He did not say that anyone from his office had gone to Lagos and said: "we want to help Canairelief. Can we, as a friendly nation, have your agreement to that?" He said that this government in Canada, in a straightjacket of heartless protocol, decided that it cannot undertake this help through Canairelief because of the possibility that Lagos may disapprove.

This is the issue before the House.

Mr. Kaplan: Lagos disapproves of night flights?

Mr. Lewis: So far as I can read, Lagos disapproves of anything that will help the people of Biafra to survive. I think that General Gowan would probably say: "Oh, I am a compassionate man. If I can be assured that night flights are only for relief, I will not stop them".

I do not know what Lagos approves or disapproves. There are inconsistencies in the government's position. I ask members on the government side of the House to stop being so shackled by partisan attachment and to look at facts honestly and with open eyes. The Prime Minister of Canada has implied time and time again, although he did not say it today: "when we sent Professor Head to Africa, we could send him to Lagos because we have relations with Lagos. But, if we want to communicate with Colonel Ojukwu, we cannot send him there because that would mean some kind of direct recognition of Biafra". So we send him to Tanzania to speak to Nyerere in order to communicate with Colonel Ojukwu. But in the next sentence the Prime Minister informs us with pride that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has been in touch with Biafran officials in New York. What kind of inconsistent nonsense is that? If it is possible for a minister of the Crown to meet Biafran officials in New York, why is it not possible for a representative of the Prime Minister to meet Colonel Ojukwu in Biafra? Can someone tell me that? The fact of the matter is—and this is what is so distressing in the situation—that the Prime Minister and the government are so completely enclosed in certain assumptions of protocol, and in certain political assumptions about secession from Nigeria, that they are determined not to do anything of which Lagos might disapprove even remotely. This is not good enough.

My friend and colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Fairweather) introduced the debate on a high tone. The Prime Minister expressed appreciation of that and so do I. Everyone in the House does, but it is regrettable that the Prime Minister was not frank with the House in his speech. It was regrettable that we had to listen to circumlocutions and tortuous explanations which made neither for consistency nor made sense and which represented nothing of the humanitarian approach which this situation requires.

The Prime Minister said that the Organization of African Unity does not want people from outside Africa to intervene. Who asked him to intervene? Who on this side of the House asked the Prime Minister of the Canadian government to intervene? We asked him to help save lives. If that is intervention, then it is about time we intervened. When you are in a situation where there are two sides in a conflict, one side of which, Nigeria, has a mass of territory, an approach from the water and most of the air space, while the other side, Biafra, is a little enclave with a blockade by land and a blockade by water so that food cannot be brought in in any other way than by assistance from the world, what protocol should prevent a civilized society such as Canada from offering that assistance?

If the Canadian government informed Lagos that it had decided to give direct assistance to Canairelief, in view of the fact that no other assistance is available to the Biafrans, I do not believe for a moment that General Gowan would dare object to that simple humanitarian act by Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what he said in a letter.

Mr. Lewis: It was significant the Prime Minister did not suggest that there was this kind of contact with General Gowan on this point.

The Prime Minister and the government have a diabolical preoccupation with daylight flights. Only daylight flights will satisfy the requirements of this government. First of all, the Prime Minister was simply wrong when he suggested that daylight flights, as agreed to at this time would bring more food to the Biafrans. This is not true. The number of planes would have to be increased by a great many more than are now available to the Red Cross to even approach what is being delivered to Biafra on the night flights by the joint church organizations.

Secondly, the desire of all of us is not limited to daylight flights. I think our government should not only be working for daylight flights but for both daylight and nighttime flights, as well as for the provision of assistance through the Niger River and, in time perhaps, the provision of assistance overland. Even if we obtained agreement to daylight flights, is it sensible to suggest that night flights be ended? Can one possibly deliver enough assistance to the starving millions in Biafra? Is it wrong to continue night flights, even when there are daylight flights? What is this obsession about daylight flights except for insistence on a tight protocol so as to satisfy every desire of Lagos.

I do not know what the Prime Minister is talking about when he speaks about agreements, unless he refers to the copies of agreements which I hold in my hand. One of them was made on August 27, 1969 between the Biafran authorities and the International Red Cross. This agreement laid down certain rules. Let me read the introduction, which is as follows:

> With reference to the note dated August 1, 1969 from the International Committee of the Red Cross to General Odumegwu Ojukwu, Head of State of Biafra, the ICRC proposes the following modalities.

I am informed, I am sure accurately, that these modalities were all accepted by General Ojukwu on August 27, 1969. They provide for controllers from neutral states approved by Lagos, controllers from neutral states approved by Biafra, and Red Cross participation in watching these flights and what goes into the planes.

• (5:30 p.m.)

There was no suggestion in that document about any military, political or other demands. I do not know what the Prime Minister is talking about. Maybe he knows. Perhaps there is something in his file that we lesser mortals have not seen, but I do not know what he is talking about. I do know there is a signed agreement between the ICRC and Lagos which was arrived at some time after the agreement with Biafra. As I piece the situation together—and my inquiries suggest that I am piecing them together accurately—the International Red Cross went to Biafra and obtained agreement on the modalities which it proposed. It then went to Lagos to get similar agreement from Nigeria, and Nigeria refused to agree to the ICRC proposals and made its own demands.

Listen to some of the demands.

> Cargo and personnel aboard the relief aircraft shall be controlled at the ICRC operational base by
> —a representative of the federal military government
> —a representative of the ICRC
> —a representative of the host government.

That is, the host government of the operational base. There is no room for a representative from Biafra in this arrangement for control; they are to be completely ignored. There is a proviso that the federal military government representative may function alone for certain of the purposes enumerated, to see what cargo goes on a plane and what people board it. The Nigeria representative may act alone as the sole controller in that situation. Further on there is a provision which my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood read, that the personnel belonging to other voluntary agencies may be on the planes; but how are they to get on? The provision refers to personnel belonging to other voluntary agencies recognized by the federal military government, so if Canairelief or Joint Church Aid is not, as is the case now, recognized by the Nigerian government, they cannot have anything to do with these flights. There is a further provision about the way the planes are to be marked. How are they to be marked? The agreement states:

> Routings to and from Uli, call signs, radio communication, emblems, types of aircraft and flight schedules shall be as agreed from time to time by the ICRC with the Nigerian Air Force and the Nigerian Army.

Then, this document states:

> This agreement shall be without prejudice to military operations by the federal military government.

Who is making military demands, Mr. Speaker? Is it Colonel Ojukwu? If the Prime Minister has not seen the document to which I referred earlier, I am sure it is somewhere in the files of the East Block and he ought to be able to get a copy of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker? In case there is no assurance that the Prime Minister can get the information, would the hon. gentleman place those records on Hansard, because they would be very useful?

Mr. Lewis: I read some of them, and I do not believe that as an ordinary Member of Parliament I can table anything. But I shall make them available, if the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) do not have them. Between my colleague and myself, we will provide copies. I think what is more objectionable, if anything could be more objectionable than the sections I have read, is the last one:

> This agreement shall be for a period of three weeks from a date to be agreed by the ICRC with the Nigerian Air Force and the Nigerian Army.

The date is to be agreed, not with the government authorities of Nigeria but with their military authorities. There is no time limit in the other document which Biafra approved. It is an agreement for daylight flights without time limit, which is the humanitarian approach. Who are the people genuinely trying to help the dying in Biafra?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Speaker, the reason, in part, that this debate arose and the reason why some of us cannot be cool about it is that time after time and day after day the Prime Minister rose in his place and either from a document or from his mind, laid all the blame on Colonel Ojukwu as the evil Satan in the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: That was partisan; it was narrow; it was uncalled for; it was unwarranted and untrue, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: This is why some of us feel keenly about the matter. The Prime Minister says the actions of the government cannot be described as indifferent, as partisan, as obstinate. Maybe those adjectives are a little too mild, Mr. Speaker, to apply to what we have heard here today.

An hon. Member: Very mild.

Mr. Lewis: There is certainly indifference when for almost six months no aid has reached the people of Biafra except that from church organizations. And this government says, "Red Cross or starve".

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Lewis: That is not an exaggeration, Mr. Speaker—"Red Cross or starve". For six months no relief has been brought into Biafra except through night flights, and the government of Canada says, "Day flights or starve".

An hon. Member: And the Biafrans say "Ammunition or we will starve".

Mr. Lewis: I do not know whether any guns got through, but I should like to remind the hon. and vociferous member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) that there is a war in Biafra and I have no doubt that arms are reaching Biafra. I do not blame the military leaders of Biafra for seeking arms to fight a war which they believe is right. I am not passing judgment on that point, I am not asking the government of Canada to pass judgment and I am certainly not asking the hon. member to pass judgment. I am not passing judgment; I am not asking the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether this is a good time to ask hon. members whether the hon. member has unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently he has.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member's reputation, aside from partisan debate, for being a very fair individual. He asked where the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was at the moment. Knowing the calibre of the hon. gentleman as an orator, and the right hon. gentleman who preceded him, nothing would have kept the Prime Minister from the House other than the fact that he had a very important meeting at five o'clock with a representative of Canairelief, which he felt was more important than listening to the eloquence of both hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did the Prime Minister not follow the usual parliamentary course of saying, "I have an appointment; you will excuse me"?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) has a question of privilege. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has the floor and he has only four minutes to go. Perhaps the hon. member for Egmont would indicate his question of privilege.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps as a question of privilege I might again raise the point I raised this afternoon and, through the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), ask whether we could be assured that in order for this debate to be productive the Prime Minister will be here this evening to report on the meeting with Canairelief as well as to listen to the remainder of the debate.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, we will have the privilege of hearing one of our representatives who has just returned from the United Nations.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Mackasey: I am only speaking to the point of privilege. I am sure the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Woolliams: Do you mean the observer?

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that there is no question of privilege and I invite the hon. member for York South to continue his remarks.

Mr. Lewis: May I say to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) that I did not ask a question. I said that I assumed. Without reservation I think I said—

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Did he know where the Prime Minister was?

Mr. Lewis: No, I did not, but I said in my speech that I assumed he left because he had an unimportant appointment. I am glad to hear that the appointment was as important as the minister states. I can only hope that Ted Johnson and the others who are with him and who are seeing the Prime Minister will get much more satisfactory answers than this House has received.

I am not going to abuse the kindness of the House, Mr. Speaker. I say this to the Prime Minister, through the minister, through the parliamentary secretary, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, even through the member for Burnaby-Seymour who has just returned from the United Nations and therefore will have, of course, unlimited wisdom to impart to us. I say it without having to consult my colleagues or the members of the official opposition. If the Prime Minister will come to this House and tell us, not that he has intervened in the struggle, made any political judgment or taken steps which he believes quite sincerely are wrong, that since no food is reaching the Biafrans except that flown in through the joint church organizations the government of Canada will assist Canairelief for that purpose, he will have the blessing of all who sit on this side of the House.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: That is all this motion is about and that is all it asks the government to do. It does not attempt to settle the differences between Nigeria and Biafra. There is not a word in it about going to the United Nations or anywhere else. It is simply what French speaking hon. members would call a cri du cœur, a cry for the heart, which is made to the government of Canada. That cry asks the government to stop using protocol and excuses for inaction which help no one because the government's action, without its intending it, condemns tens of thousands of human beings to starvation. It is the starvation that we intend to end by this motion.

There is still time for the Prime Minister to say, on behalf of the government, that he accepts this reasonable proposition and that we shall work through or with joint church organizations and Canairelief in assisting the starving people of Biafra, and that way save lives. That is all we ask. If the Prime Minister cannot give an affirmative answer to that plea, he will stand condemned in the history of this country as a man who is in a straitjacket of legalisms logistics and protocol which make it impossible for him to act as the human being he undoubtedly is.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, in view of the time, could we consider it as officially 5.45 p.m. and commence again after the dinner adjournment?

Mr. Speaker: I assume the hon. member is referring to the fact that there will be royal assent in a few moments. Since it might take a few minutes for that to happen, the hon. member might begin his remarks at this time.

Mr. Perrault: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have all listened attentively this afternoon to the eloquent expressions of concern about the fate of the youngsters in Biafra. It has been correctly stated that concern about the fate of these young people is not restricted to one party in this House; it is not restricted to the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party, the NDP or the Creditistes. We are all concerned about the needless and tragic death of little children. I regret that the right hon. gentleman who was so critical of the early departure of the Prime Minister did not himself come into the House sooner than he did today.

I have heard many arguments on this matter, but the nations of the United Nations see day by day what effort Canada is making to resolve this terrible tragedy in Nigeria and Biafra. Every week since September, Canadians have been meeting Biafrans and Nigerians—I can give the dates—and offering their good offices to arrange a permanent settlement of this tragic dispute. It is all right to talk about whether we are going to ship food during the day, in the twilight or in the evening; but the only way these youngsters' lives will be saved is by a permanent settlement of the dispute. That is the direction in which Canada is working.

Mr. Peters: That is unsupported propaganda.

Mr. Perrault: When I heard the irresponsible claptrap of a former prime minister who never at any time when he was prime minister of the country engaged in the kind of unilateral action he is suggesting to this government, and when I heard the government abused by the deputy leader of the NDP, I could only listen in magnificent wonder.

What is Canada's record at the United Nations? I heard the official representatives of Sweden, Norway, Finland and Denmark, the social democratic parties of Europe, and they all supported the Canadian position. The issuing of guns—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Segmour (Mr. Perrault) has the floor.

Mr. Perrault: I have the floor now, and I shall answer questions later. We have taken a great deal of abuse this afternoon and I think it is time for a reply. I met Dr. Otue, the Biafran representative in New York, yesterday afternoon and I heard that members of the opposition had been telephoning and telling him we would have a special debate on Biafra. They said to him, "Could you clue us in, Dr. Otue?". Do you know what he said? He said, "We are in a terrible way this week, Mr. Perrault, because tomorrow night the Labour government of Great Britain is sending a shipment of heavy artillery from Dover and it will be used against us next week."

I reiterate the position of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) and suggest that one of the most effective steps which can be taken by the clique in the corner of this chamber is to send a spirited delegation to Harold Wilson of Great Britain and say, "Stop the shipment from Dover." Mr. Speaker, why did Right Hon. Michael Stewart, the British Foreign Minister, say "No" to the Canadian government when it begged him to stop the shipment of arms? Is this the kind of enlightened, social democratic government we can expect from the NDP if they come into power?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member should be given an opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Stewart said, "We have important economic relations with Biafra"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest again the hon. member should be given an opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has clearly implied that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has not taken the sort of position that has been taken. The hon. member for Greenwood specifically said that our party was critical of the stand the Labour party of Great Britain took on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege in the normal sense of the word. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? The hon. member who has the floor should be given the opportunity to make his presentation to the House.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, there is at times a great difference in the quality of research undertaken in the House. May I suggest, with deference to members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, that they have not done very much sound research recently. I have in my hand a photostatic copy of a resolution of the Organization for African Unity. It concerns Nigeria. The resolution was passed by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government at Addis Ababa in September, 1969. This is what it says in the final paragraph:

> Makes a solemn and urgent appeal to all governments, international organizations, humanitarian institutions as well as to all political, moral and religious bodies in the world to facilitate the implementation of the present resolution and to desist from any action, gesture and attitude likely to jeopardize the efforts of OAU in finding an African solution to the Nigerian crisis.

I hear a knock on the door of the chamber, Mr. Speaker.

• (5:50 p.m.)

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Alleged Failure to Aid Biafrans

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

> An act to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NIGERIA-BIAFRA—ALLEGED FAILURE TO TAKE MEASURES TO RELIEVE STARVATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Brewin:

> That this House regrets that the government has failed to take adequate measures to relieve massive starvation in Nigeria-Biafra and, particularly, regrets its repeated refusal to assist Joint Church Aid and Canairelief operations which have continued to deliver substantial relief despite great hazards, and urgently requests the government to change its policy in this respect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault).

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It was my impression, and I am sure the impression of many hon. members in this House, particularly in view of the comments of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and others before supper, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would be here this evening not only to listen to the remainder of the debate but to indicate the results of his conversation just before the supper hour with the representative of Canairelief. I am wondering whether the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) or some other minister could inform the House whether the Prime Minister will be here some time this evening to indicate the results of his conversations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might point out that in my view that is hardly a question of privilege. If someone would volunteer this information, I suppose there is a way so to inform the hon. member.

Alleged Failure to Aid Biafrans

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, just before the dinner break I had endeavoured to point out that the Organization for African Unity had passed a resolution in Addis Ababa, the essence of which was that Africans want to find African solutions to the Nigerian crisis. They do not want the kind of charity that perhaps some of us would like to dispense and feel should be dispensed. A chap from one of the emerging states said to me last week, "How would you feel if you had a difficult situation in Canada and six African states decided unilaterally to make an airlift to Saskatchewan without reference to the government of the province or the government of Canada?" The leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) knows that these are the kind of attitudes that exist at the United Nations, because he must have encountered them while he was there. I am simply pointing out that, despite the attitude of the Organization for African Unity, Canadian initiatives to bring about a permanent and lasting solution to the Nigerian tragedy are among the finest in the world.

I have with me tonight a partial chronology of some of the things that we have been trying to do, but before I come to that let me quote the official Swedish position which that country adopted at the United Nations:

> We deplore the continuing difficulties in making that relief action effective.

Some of these difficulties were outlined by Gordon Pape in an article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of November 19, 1969. He is a respected member of the press gallery in Ottawa. In his article he said there is a growing feeling that Biafran aid is not being held up by government inaction at this end, but rather by General Ojukwu. His article goes on:

> The U.S. government, acting under direct orders from President Nixon, then proceeded to obtain guarantees from Nigeria that no such military operations would be undertaken and that the flights would not be molested.

That has reference to the daylight relief flights.

> Despite these assurances, Biafra again rejected the proposal October 24, opting instead to have relief supplies brought in by boat—an operation that is impossible—

There is virtually no sympathy at the United Nations for the intransigent attitude taken by General Ojukwu and the Biafran authorities. How can Canada be anti-Biafra when through Canadian initiative this agreement was negotiated? This agreement was to guarantee that airfields would not be bombed if daylight relief flights were to commence, yet the plan was rejected.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Stanley Burke, a man deeply dedicated to alleviating the plight of youngsters in Biafra, said the other day, according to a newspaper report—I hope he was misquoted—that Canada was doing nothing to alleviate suffering in Biafra. I should like to point out that up to the end of March this year $952,594 worth of aid found its way into Biafra, as well as $1,491,514 worth through the Nigerian route. The total amount of aid topped $2.8 million. In face of these figures, how can it be said that Canada has contributed no aid at all to Biafra.

I return to what the Swedish foreign minister said at the United Nations:

> The African States consider that their own Organization for African Unity has a special responsibility and a special possibility to contribute to a solution. We find that approach reasonable and realistic.

I would inform my social democratic friends at the other end of the House that Canadians, too, found this approach reasonable and realistic. Surely some of the members of the House who attended the session of the United Nations as parliamentary observers also realized, following the discussions that they had with the Biafrans and the Nigerians, that this approach was realistic. Conferences were arranged through the good offices of this government in order that they could hear the arguments on both sides. Some of these members significantly are not going to participate in this debate because they realize the difficulties that are being faced by Canada at the United Nations. They also appreciate all that is being done despite these difficulties.

The position taken by the representative of Norway was that the Organization for African Unity can solve the conflict, and he went on to say that his government is of the opinion that this organization is especially well qualified to find a basis for a negotiated solution. Similar positions were adopted by the other Scandinavian countries. They were of the opinion that the OAU approach to a settlement of the tragedy was a sound one. Canada supports that position, along with most of the leading nations of the world.

Today the members of the government are pilloried and condemned. The right hon. gentleman who is a former prime minister stated that we are defying the wish of the people of Canada; that we have refused to place the issue before the United Nations. I would inform him that a meeting with U Thant was held on September 16, at which the Canadian representative stated that perhaps the matter should be brought before the United Nations and suggested exploring ways in which this could be done. The answer of the Secretary General was that this would do more harm than good.

No man is working more diligently to bring about a settlement in Biafra than our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). On September 18 President Diori of Niger was in Ottawa and the minister discussed with him the situation in Nigeria and Biafra. While at the United Nations in New York, the Secretary of State for External Affairs discussed the Nigerian Civil war with the United States Secretary of State. He discussed the cessation of arm shipments with the French foreign minister and had meetings with the foreign ministers of Uganda, Ivory Coast, Tunisia and Ghana. This was followed by talks with the foreign ministers of Gabon, Dahomey, the Central African Republic, Italy and the Soviet Union.

In spite of all these meetings we are pilloried in this House by a former prime minister of Canada who lessens the hope of the people of Canada by saying that we are standing on narrow legalism and refusing to bring aid to these people. He said we are hiding behind protocol. As someone who has seen this team in action, I can assure all members of the House that government members are equally concerned about the plight of these young people. We are not standing on protocol.

Yesterday we met with Nigerians and Biafrans at the Canadian Mission in New York. We had a series of meetings. When the final story of the Nigerian civil war is written, Canada will have one of the brightest pages in that book. Let me tell hon. members this, Mr. Speaker: if they study the long story of this tragedy they will find that a number of initiatives were filed by certain nations. I do not want to name them on the floor of this House because the matter would receive too much publicity. This is the reason Canadian efforts are being undertaken more discreetly than would perhaps be the case with other nations, but our efforts are just as effective.

An hon. Member: They are non-existent.

Mr. Perrault: I feel sorry for the hon. member of the Opposition who feels he is such an expert, when really he does not know very much about the facts of the case. Anyone who has studied this question knows that no one can become an instant expert on it.

Was it callous disregard for the plight of refugees that a meeting was held on September 26 among the Nigerian Commissioner for External Affairs, Mr. Arikp, our Secretary of State for External Affairs and others? Did we fail when we met with the Ivory Coast representative on September 26, discussed the whole situation with M. Usher of that nation and asked for his co-operation in getting relief into this starving nation? Was it disregard for the starving youngsters when we discussed with the Uganda Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Sam Odaka, on that same day how we could get aid to the starving Biafrans?

What was the attitude of the Biafrans when they met with the Secretary of State for External Affairs on September 27? The whole object of the meeting was to plead with the Biafrans to at least test a system of daylight flights. If a man's youngsters are starving to death, I do not care where they are living, whether it be Biafra, Canada, the United States or France—it is worth taking some risks in order to help them. There is not one form of aid which might be extended at this point to the starving young people of Biafra which would not involve some risk. In this regard we asked for some assurance; we pleaded with them. These are the facts. Let us not be vague about this situation.

These are the names of the Biafrans who were present when Canada's plea was entered: Mr. Eni Njoki, president of the University of Biafra; Dr. Pius Okogbo, Economic Adviser to Biafra; Dr. Ifegwu Eke, Commissioner of Information for Biafra; Mr. Matthew Mbu, Commissioner of education for Biafra, and Dr. Nwonye Otue, Biafran Special Representative to New York. Hon. members know Mr. Otue very well; they have talked with him on a number of occasions.

Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs fail when he told this group that Canadians were concerned that inadequate supplies were reaching Biafra, and when he told them that unless daylight aid was brought to Biafran youngsters thousands were going to die and that in the opinion of Canadians the only way the situation could be relieved was by bringing in a great many more planes? We offered planes and we offered food. We pleaded with them. In spite of this we are told on the floor of this House that we lack human compassion. I think this is one of the most unfair types of accusation to make.

Great compassion has been a characteristic of Canada ever since confederation. This has been true throughout our history; it has not mattered whether the Tories, the Liberals or anybody else was in power. So why is there this trading in accusations and the suggestion that we lack sympathy and are not concerned about this tragic situation? Frankly, I am proud of Canada's external affairs effort. The MPs in the opposition who were down in New York were proud of the professionals in the Department of External Affairs. They are doing a very good job there. Some of them know of the plight of Biafra.

Only yesterday I had the opportunity of meeting Mr. Moses Ihonde, Nigerian Counsul General in New York. It was a good meeting, a meeting which again reflected the desire of Nigerians and Biafrans to see this war ended, and also to see an end to the suffering which has been afflicted on families everywhere in Nigeria. Only yesterday I had a meeting with Dr. Otue, Biafra's representative in New York. I understand he is in Ottawa today. He has some knowledge of Canada and is a very personable gentleman. It was a good meeting. I asked him this question directly, "Are Canadians doing enough to help your people?" I told him I would write down his answer and read it to the House of Commons. He said that the Canadian people are doing a great deal; they are doing magnificently, and Biafrans appreciate the help we are extending to them. He said several organizations have extended humanitarian aid at considerable risk, and they appreciate it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was not the government he was talking about.

Mr. Perrault: I told him there has been criticism by some parties about Canadian contributions to alleviate this tragic situation. I asked him what Canada should do to help. What was his answer? He thought for a while and then he said, "I hope you will do what you can do to de-escalate the shipment of arms to both sides. It is a power war now, with too much big power involvement. Let us try to end arms shipments. This may facilitate a peace settlement." That was his answer. There were no shrill exclamations from Biafrans that it is terrible that there is in Canada a government which lacks humanity, because it is not giving to Canairelief or trying to bring relief through the Red Cross. As a member of this House, I frankly hope that those people who contribute to the military build-up in Nigeria and Biafra will stop the shipment of arms.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Perrault: I appreciate the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker. Let me point out again that this is precisely what Canada has done in conversations with France and with Great Britain; we have proposed that arms shipments to Nigeria and Biafra be ended. Even if all official arms shipments were to be halted tomorrow, we know that the problem would not end there. We have discussed the problem and have expressed the view that arms shipments should be halted, but we are under no illusion that a large and thriving free arms market does not exist. We know that arms would still find their way to the combatants. As a result, there is a need for Canada and other nations to continue their efforts to bring about a peace settlement and to find a more immediate and effective way to bring in aid.

I want to report to the House that in the past 24 hours I have talked with the Organization of African Unity Ambassador to the United States, Mr. Thiam. He said Canada's position in this whole affair had been very commendable. He said there is no reason for relief to be denied the starving youngsters of Biafra. With Canada, they back the efforts of the Red Cross to get supplies in during daylight hours. He said this could be done and there is no reason why it should not be done.

Biafrans will read the debate in this House and will know of the program which is supported by the Organization of African Unity. There is no reason why this program cannot be carried out; rather than having destructive criticism and accusations made in the House. We think in this way we could perhaps get aid to these people at the beginning of next week.

Mr. Speaker, I must leave out much of what I had hoped to say, but let me say this: those who went to New York as observers will almost without exception gladly acknowledge the respect with which Canada is held by other nations of the world. Perhaps no other nation has established such an effective record of quiet, continuing effort to mediate and conciliate. This also applies to the time when my hon. friends were in power.

An hon. Member: More Liberal propaganda.

Mr. Perrault: It is not Liberal propaganda, because it refers to a time when a previous government was in office.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I think it is particularly destructive when we come in this House and say about one another such things that would never be levelled at us by any other country or any other person. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have had the most searching conversations with the Secretary General of the United Nations, U Thant, on the possibility of the United Nations considering this matter. Similarly, the Canadian permanent mission to the United Nations has consulted broadly on the prospects of United Nations initiative in this area. The Secretary General has stated publicly that he considers the decisions taken by the Organization for African Unity provide the framework for a just settlement of the civil war by peaceful means.

Let me again stress that I believe the Canadian people and the Canadian government are sincerely concerned about the tragedy which has befallen the people who live in this area. All political parties, indeed, are deeply concerned about the tragedy which has befallen Biafrans.

It is fair to say that those concerned about the question at the United Nations—and there are many—are convinced that daylight flights are essential if the children of Biafra are to be saved. Canairelief alone will not save enough lives. It is equally fair to say that the people who control Biafra do not seem to have a real interest in daylight flights, whatever their reasons and their motives. They have expended a great deal of energy in attempts to justify their rejection of a proposed agreement developed in very large measure by Canadians. They do not seem to have expended the same amount of energy in attempting to find an alternative way in which to bring relief to the starving. They maintain that they mistrust the federal military government, but both Canada and the United States have expressed willingness to assist in providing assurances to meet the Biafran fear of any military advantage flowing from the daylight flights agreement.

Regardless of the statements we have heard today, the most effective way to deliver adequate supplies of relief to the starving youngsters of Biafra is by daylight flights. That position will be endorsed by any responsible nation at the United Nations. This method is more effective than any other that is available. At the United Nations one can find no support for the Biafran opposition to these flights. Daylight flying is safer, more planes can travel and the present confusion of night flights involving both relief and arms would be ended, with the daylight hours reserved for work of mercy. What is wrong with that kind of arrangement? Yet, Biafran leaders feel that risks remain. I think it is a supportable contention that when one's children are starving you accept certain risks in order that they will live. I have here a statement from the New York Times of yesterday, to the effect that the dying children get nothing and that this would be wasting food. I wonder why dying children are the first to be denied food.

I think it is fair to conclude that the Biafran authorities are, above all, concerned with the preservation of their regime, and that the mass starvation of the people about whom they profess to be concerned may be only a secondary consideration. Canadians should say to Nigerians and Biafrans that since they say they are interested, they should agree to a trial period to see how much relief can get through under the Canadian plan.

In conclusion may I say that Canadians are concerned with helping people. Since the formation of the United Nations Canada has dedicated itself to helping humanitarian causes throughout the world. It has done this in order to save lives in Palestine and in the Middle East. Canada has been the third largest contributor to saving lives in the Middle East. We were generous even during the period when our friends to my left formed the government. We are told the Canadian people are deeply concerned about the failure of this government to extend more aid through the church organizations. The question is whether that aid at some point in time is increased to these organizations, or whether Canada and other nations are successful in persuading the Biafran authorities to permit daylight flights, with Canadian aid channelled through the International Red Cross.

There is no disagreement in this House about the need to extend as much aid as we can. Especially at this Christmas season it is to be hoped that millions of Canadians will take cognizance of the suffering on both sides of the line in Nigeria and that they will give to the Red Cross and to other organizations attempting to assist in the alleviation of suffering. Hopefully the Canadian government, on behalf of the Canadian people, will be able before the Christmas season to establish aid in a way which will be meaningful to the people living in this area.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, however entertaining it might be to engage in a debate with my hon. friend from Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), I prefer rather to deal with the issue before the House today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Certainly in respect of the suggestion of the hon. member, that no one has done more than this country in resolving the conflict, I suggest that no one will be more surprised to hear this than the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), because he along with others in the government will know of the uncertainty with which he and this government has approached this grave crisis. I mentioned earlier that I was concerned that a major part of this debate might develop into more of a monologue than a dialogue. It is unfortunate that this proceeding in the House should not provide for a better exchange in respect of the matter under consideration.

I hope in the next few minutes to deal with the specific areas because I was disappointed that the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon really contributed nothing new to what is a very complex and difficult situation. I think it is perhaps unfortunate the Prime Minister did not choose to more adequately inform the House on questions that he himself has raised, questions with regard to the conditions which have been attached to daylight flights. This has been a preoccupation of the government. Then there are the questions with regard to the activities of the combatants with regard to their own security in respect of establishing effective daylight relief flights. One thing, however, that bore in on me again this afternoon and evening is that there is still a willingness, apparently, on the part of the government to discuss but not to act. There never seems to be any action.

I recall the remarks of the Prime Minister in the House at the opening of the debate on the Speech from the Throne, with reference to getting relief to both sides. He said:

> —we are prepared to make further funds available when once the delivery blockage is removed. If it is not quickly removed, we shall take other appropriate steps.

Since then I have asked him to define what he means by "quickly". Five weeks have gone by. I shall not engage in a numbers game in respect of guessing how many more people have succumbed to starvation in Biafra, but I should like to know whether the government really intends to act quickly and when it finally plans to take some specific action in assisting the one organization which has continued to carry relief to the Biafran people. I am speaking of Canairelief.

I find it a bit incredible that we should now, all of a sudden, be hearing a suggestion from the government that it is considering an air-drop. I maintain that this would be a great deal more difficult than the problems in respect of daylight relief flights. I think it would be difficult to even conceive of an acceptable format for any kind of effective air-drop operation. I have come to the view, not willingly, that even the suggestion of an air drop is some form of subterfuge. There is a means open to us now. This is the operation, an international ecumenical operation, which has operated as often as there have been resources available to move the planes. There is a new element, however, this fall, and I should like to mention it at the outset. We might even consider it the fall offensive because I have detected in this Parliament, from the lips of the Prime Minister and in other places, a new offensive this fall.

It is an offensive in general against the Biafran regime but, more particularly, against General Ojukwu and the Biafran authorities. I ask myself, why has our Prime Minister taken this new offensive against the Biafran authorities? Then I look a little farther and I note—and of course the Prime Minister himself said this in the House—that the United States government has also substantially altered its own position in recent weeks, and I wonder why. Then I notice that in the United Kingdom the minister for foreign affairs, Mr. Stewart, has indicated an increase of some 15 per cent to 20 per cent in arms shipments to Nigeria, and I wonder why, knowing about the opposition from his own party. I know that there is a kind of coalition—I will not call it a grand coalition—of government interests in this country, in the U.S. and in the U.K., and I wonder whether, in face of the quick kill theory so popularly accepted and promoted by the British government a couple of years ago and now obviously a little too shoddy to be hauled out again, this coalition has given its assent to starvation as a legitimate weapon.

If you look at the war situation—if one is able to get an accurate picture of what is happening in Nigeria and Biafra—it seems to be relatively static. The lines have not altered substantially in the last few months. We have not had fresh word of new atrocities. We do not have any new information which would alter the position of these three governments. But there is one piece of news which perhaps can shed some light on what seems to be a very real hardening of positions in the last few weeks; that is that recently very important oil production—not only important to Nigeria but important to its allies—has been severely hampered by military offensives on the part of Biafra and by what could be described as the mini-Biafran air force which, in my understanding, has reduced the oil production of Nigeria by some 50 per cent. It has reached the stage where in fact a number of insurance companies are reluctant even to insure tankers approaching Nigeria to pick up oil.

Is there in fact some kind of an oil lobby or conspiracy that is exerting pressure which we are feeling perhaps not directly but at least indirectly? I think the question should be raised, because there certainly are lines that could be drawn very easily in recent months that show up clearly the fact that we are now acquiescing in starvation as a weapon of war with much greater ease than we should have even a year ago.

Today and earlier the Prime Minister referred in his shadowy way to political guarantees which have been demanded and which are tantamount to recognition. Of course, the diplomatic recognition of one of the combatants in a civil war is a difficult matter to resolve, and when the Prime Minister stated it, it suggested that perhaps Biafra is trying to achieve an advantage by linking daylight flights to diplomatic recognition as political capital.

The Prime Minister has indicated to the House and to the Canadian people that because of these unreasonable demands for recognition General Ojukwu was really trying to take advantage of the situation. But when he has been pressed, both inside and outside the House, to spell out these conditions, when they were raised and with whom, the Prime Minister very conveniently says, "It is not really for me to say. I do not want to break a confidence". It is amazing how he can suddenly respect the confidence of people who to him do not legally exist. It is also very convenient that he can put forward an interpretation without having to clarify it. This is what I tried to do this afternoon following his speech, because I think there has to be honesty at least if we are to expose the situation as it exists and as we are faced with it.

What is the situation? Why has the Prime Minister talked about political conditions or guarantees tantamount to recognition? I think we have to be honest and say that the Biafrans, in order to permit daylight relief flights, have as I understand it asked for certain kinds of guarantees. Quite frankly, they have been led down the garden path too often to accept merely goodwill or the suggestion of our being "hail fellows well met" not to realize that their own security—and after all this is what the war is all about—is at stake. They have asked for guarantees, not necessarily only from Canada but from other countries. I am impressed by the fact that they are still willing to trust us to that extent. They ask for guarantees which may be with regard to trade or perhaps having to do with diplomatic recognition, not necessarily in terms of recognizing Biafra but perhaps intending to cut off our recognition of the Nigerians were they to forego or break their own commitments on a negotiated relief plan or some kind of military guarantee.

The Prime Minister, of course, is right in suggesting that if we offer a guarantee on the basis of trade, diplomacy or military matters, we are in effect taking a position which is tantamount to recognition. But put on the basis of a fundamental requirement for their own security, as the Biafrans see it, it is a vastly different thing than when it is simply brought in as a sort of back-door proposition, as a bargaining point, or as a kind of extra for which the Biafrans are looking in trying to build up their political bank account.

I think we have to be realistic, and I am sorry that the Prime Minister in his comments was less than realistic. I am using a kind word there. Some of the things that were said when he quoted the secretary of state of the United States, Mr. Rogers, were certainly not the kind of things that would appeal to me if I were found behind the lines and in some way involved in the Biafran fight for survival.

What did Secretary Rogers say in his statement of November 12 in terms of the kind of guarantees that he was going to offer the Biafrans in order that they be fully protected and that their security not be violated? His first point was as follows:

> We sought and received the solemn assurances of the federal government of Nigeria that it would ensure that no hostile military action would be taken against the ICRC relief aircraft.

How utterly ridiculous it is for any person to believe that the first guarantee that would be meaningful to a combatant in a conflict is a pledge of good faith by his fight-to-the-death enemy. I find it absolutely incredible that any diplomat or government representative should make that kind of statement with a straight face. Surely it is sheer lunacy to believe that anyone could offer that kind of guarantee and expect it to be accepted as an assurance.

Further, it is a well-known fact that it has become increasingly difficult to know who speaks for the federal military government in Nigeria and who gave this solemn assurance. Was it General Gowan? Was it Chief Awolowa or Chief Enaharo? Was it one of the military commanders in the field about whom we have heard so much? One speaker at a conference that I attended many months ago was very quick to point out, on the information of the U.S. State Department, that General Gowan cannot really effectively control his army. As he said, each of the divisional commanders does his own recruiting, determines his own military strategy and has connections with one or the other power supplying arms. As a case in point, the House may recall that after June 5 when the Red Cross plane was shot down by the Nigerian military authorities and General Gowan was asked to comment, he said he was sorry; it was not his decision but rather a decision taken somewhere out in the field. How could anyone with any intelligence whatsoever accept the guarantees of a government which does not know who is in control, and expect the guarantees to be meaningful?

An hon. Member: What have they to lose?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): They have their lives to lose. Further, there has been a good deal of misunderstanding as to what was vital in this situation. Many people thought that what was in question were the planes themselves because, of course, many of the planes have suffered harassment. But what has been vital to Biafran security is the guarantee of the security of their airstrip which has served as a lifetime, with everything that means—relief, arms and everything else—for well over a year and a half. The Biafrans are looking for the guaranteeing of their airstrip, not the good faith of the Lagos regime.

We have been told that relief has been used as a cover for arms. Mr. Speaker, I find it incredible that anyone who is reasonably well informed on the facts as they relate to Nigeria-Biafra could continue to say that or imply it—and we have had some question as to whether it was really said. But in spite of the fact that people believe the church operation is used as an arms cover, let us look at the facts. On June 5, before six o'clock, a Red Cross plane was not down. For some days, stretching into two or three weeks, no relief planes operated—certainly not the church relief—out of Sao Tomé; nor was there any Red Cross relief. What was moving during those two or three weeks was arms shipments. To know this is a fact, one has only to speak to the people who were on the ground and saw the arms shipments moving in quite independently of relief, which had stopped altogether during that period of time.

Some people are prone to forget that the shipment of relief items is a recent phenomenon with respect to the war. It began some time around August, 1968, while the war began over a year before that. It is certain a war cannot be fought without arms. It is quite obvious that in the months prior to the air shipment of relief, arms were going in by every means possible, and that means by air as well.

Perhaps a more important question to be raised is why the arms shipments have been as effective, to some extent, as relief. To the best of my knowledge no planes carrying arms have been shot down by the Nigerian air force, which is reasonably sophisticated with its Russian and Czechoslovakian aircraft. There has been little or no harassment of these arms shipments. Also, more than 50 per cent of the arms have in fact been captured as the battlelines move back and forth and the Biafrans, skilled as they are, have been producing as much as they can of their own arms during the course of this conflict. Those who quite neatly slough off the relationship between relief and arms have not looked at the facts as they present themselves.

It has been suggested that Biafra is not interested in relief, or more particularly daylight relief. Just to deal with the first statement, those who suggest Biafra is not interested in relief ignore the fact that Joint Church Aid alone has since its inception 14 or 15 months ago made more than 3,000 flights into Biafra. All this month they have flown about 14 flights a night. They will continue to fly. Ask the relief workers, the pilots, the technicians, the missionaries, all those connected with relief inside or outside who have lines going in, and you will find how interested the authorities are in relief. As a person who is an ordained minister of one church, I would point out that the very fact the churches are able to work together must say something for the co-operation they are getting from the Biafran authorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It has been an incredible operation and could only have been successful with the utmost co-operation of those in control of the Biafran situation. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that there appeared in the Montreal Star, a New York Times Service article which told us, "Nigeria faces food, supply shortage".

For months now we have seen reports about the starvation in parts of federally-held Nigeria. What action is being taken to assist the people who can be reached by land, presumably? What is the fate of relief organizations working behind the Nigerian lines? We know the fate of Ambassador Lindt; he was shipped out when they ran out the Red Cross. We know—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I thank the House, Mr. Speaker, for its indulgence. We know that in fact the Red Cross had a great deal of difficulty in carrying on their operations inside Nigeria and have been threatened with being supplanted by a government organization which has come into force in the last few days. Thousands of Nigerians are now living under difficult circumstances, but there is little action by those who presumably have the confidence and the good will of the federal military authorities in Lagos. Quite frankly, I am disturbed, when the discussion centres on daylight relief flights, that we are caught in simplistic and naïve statements in regard to what is a complex issue.

In this House just a few days ago the Prime Minister spoke of "General Gowon's single condition for daylight flights". Were General Gowon here tonight he might be the first to deny there was a single condition in connection with daylight flights. I notice that today the Prime Minister talked about the two conditions of General Gowon, and I suppose in three weeks' time he will be talking about three conditions. In fact there are many conditions and the problem is to try to get both sides to agree to a set of conditions. I am not going to rehearse the spectacle of trying to get one side, and then the other, to agree to conditions. The closest any group came to effective agreement was the Red Cross in establishing agreement for daylight flights, but that agreement could not be considered generous when you consider that six flights were carrying only 90 tons and operating only three weeks. That is not ideal in this situation. Six flights does not compare with the program of Joint Church Aid which is operating 14 and 16 flights a night this month.

There has been too much innuendo and too much half-informed discussion on what is, of course, a very vital and basic problem. In the context of this debate I should like to ask why our government is clinging so strenuously to one agency in dealing with this problem. I am not here in any way to indict the Red Cross, and surely we sympathize as much if not more than most with the Red Cross in its difficulties in trying to work out an acceptable relief program. But why have we at this time so completely tied ourselves to the Red Cross? I suppose, as usual, the most obvious answer is that this was acceptable to the federal military authority of Nigeria. Why has it been so acceptable to the federal military government of Nigeria? Presumably, it is because no group has had more difficulty in operating its relief over the months than the Red Cross. That is obvious. It is significant that Joint Church Aid, which is still operating, will carry 10 per cent of its load for the International Red Cross. Joint Church Aid is presently sustaining Red Cross hospitals and feeding stations through their transportation facilities. The Red Cross has not paid one penny for this.

Alleged Failure to Aid Biafrans

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I should like to ask most sincerely—though it is unfortunate that the Prime Minister cannot be here—what the government intends to do. How much longer shall we have to wait? I can only adduce from what the Prime Minister said today and in earlier days that, to narrow it down to one phrase, in effect the Prime Minister is saying, "Biafra give up." We have succumbed to the situation. We believe now that starvation is a legitimate means of war; therefore, let it be used and used quickly in order that the conflict may be ended. To some that is an attractive theory. It is one that was espoused, and I am tempted to believe is still espoused, by the government of the United Kingdom. It is saddening to think that our government is fully supporting a policy of starving-out the Biafran people.

• (8:50 p.m.)

At a meeting in Montreal last night, the Canadian Council of Churches passed a resolution which I presume has come to the attention of the government. The council calls on the government as follows:

1. To extend its efforts to hasten the peaceful settlement of the Nigeria/Biafra conflict.

2. To register again its vigorous protest to all Governments providing any arms or permitting the transfer of arms to either side.

3. To express to Governments of both sides our concern for those undergoing prolonged and massive suffering and to urge these authorities to arrange an immediate cease fire.

4. To call upon the United Nations, the Organization for African Unity, other concerned Governments, and International agencies, to take all necessary steps toward a just and durable settlement.

The next paragraph applies particularly to the resolution before the House, and it reads:

5. To increase its programme of relief to victims on both sides, and to give maximum support to such non-Governmental agencies as are effectively providing relief.

I understand this resolution has been forwarded to the Canadian Catholic Conference which is meeting in Ottawa today and tomorrow. I take it that conference will pass a resolution similar to the one I have just read. Churches of all persuasions in this country and which represent millions of Canadians have asked that this government act. It is imperative for us not to be put off by subterfuge and unconvincing arguments. In the quiet and calm following this debate I ask members of the government to study the proposals that have been made, specifically by representatives of Canairelief who met government representatives today. It is fortuitous that the two key representatives should meet personally with the Prime Minister on the day we are debating this matter. All Canadians look forward to a positive report on action which the government intends to take. Specifically, we are hopeful that the Prime Minister will make a statement within 24 hours.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly honoured to have the opportunity this afternoon of seconding the motion moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). May I also say that I was disappointed to hear some of the remarks the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) made to us this evening. They did not add much to our debate. He said one thing in particular that struck me as odd. He was talking about some of the social democratic countries of northern Europe and said that they agreed entirely with the stand taken by the government of Canada. May I remind hon. members that countries belonging to that group, and Sweden in particular, have been giving aid to Joint Church Aid and that therefore their position is similar to the one we have adopted on this matter and to the one envisaged in this resolution.

In essence, the motion before us asks the government to help Canairelief, because that is the only organization bringing aid to Biafra at present. Tonight I appeal to hon. members, and particularly those of the government party, to treat this as a moral and not a political issue. Let us not talk of the complexities of international law, or be technical as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been, because in Biafra today 2 million people lie dead of starvation because of the war. They were not dying there until war broke out. Today they are dying because they are cut off from the outside world. I am informed that about every 40 seconds one person dies in Biafra. So while I am standing here talking, people are dying there. While hon. members on both sides of the House are discussing this matter, people are dying in Biafra. While we are engaged in the exercise of political polemics, people are dying there. We must try to relieve the suffering in that country by helping Canairelief do its job. We must also try to end this war.

If Canada acts, perhaps we can make a contribution toward ending the war and settling the dispute, because Canada is trusted by both sides. If we decide that we can contribute something constructive, and I think we can, and can do something about ending the war, let us stop hiding behind arguments about who is right or wrong. Let us stop bickering among ourselves about the different political implications that the war between Nigeria and Biafra has for us.

I am greatly concerned about what is happening in Biafra, Mr. Speaker, because little more than one year ago I and the Liberal member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) went to Nigera and Biafra to see what was going on. I remember leaving the island of Sao Tomé at night, not knowing whether we would make it into the airfield or whether we would come out again. We had to fly over anti-aircraft guns and land at a dilapidated airport where aircraft crashed sometimes on landing. There was also the possibility that we would be bombed on landing. The hon. member and I went to find out first-hand what was happening in Biafra and to gather as much information as possible so that we could be instrumental in alleviating the suffering there. I encourage all members of this House to go to Biafra and see what is happening, because most people who go there come back with the conviction that something must be done and all feel frustrated and helpless about what is not being done.

One wonders how the world community can tolerate what is happening in Biafra. I remember that the hon. member and I were standing in a place at seven o'clock one morning among 4,000 or 5,000 small children, all under ten years of age, and they were looking up to us and asking for help. Many of them did not have clothes on and many had swollen stomachs brought on by a protein-deficient diet. Their arms and legs were as thin as sticks. We asked ourselves: Just how concerned is the world community about all this suffering? How can it tolerate this situation?

I ask now: How international are we in our concepts, and how civilized are we? I often wonder if we do not wear just a thin veneer of civilization which, when penetrated, reveals the basic savage underneath. The world can tolerate only so much of this kind of thing before it affects all of us We can take only so much of it before the whole world blows up. I hope that Biafra will not become another gigantic Auschwitz. I hope that 20 years from now we will not look back and say that if we had done more to help 20 years earlier a great many people would not have died needlessly. We can, and should, do much to prevent something like this happening.

When I speak about Biafra, I do so from an international point of view. I see the problem there not just as an African problem but as something that affects all people no matter where they live in the world. After all, with technical progress, the whole world has become a global village; everything that happens over there must affect us here at home, and vice versa. Many of the problems plaguing Biafra are plaguing other countries, because one can see starvation, depredation and discrimination in many parts of the world. There is fear all over the world. Worse of all, not only the people of Biafra but those at home feel helpless. Powerless and underprivileged groups exist in our own society.

May I remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary General of the United Nations, U Thant, said a few years ago that as long as about two-thirds of the world's population were starving, suffering or living in a great deal of poverty, none of us would be saved, regardless of our country or industrial situation. It must be our objective and hope to try and alleviate suffering no matter where or how it occurs, because a blow to or scar on any society in the world is indeed a blow to all mankind.

Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and government must do something constructive. They must start acting on some of the new politics they have talked about for the last year and a half. They must move toward eradicating some of the injustice and starvation that exists in Biafra and many other parts of the world. They must bring Canada into the forefront and try to ease some of the suffering in Biafra. The only way we will do this is by making all members of the House concerned and aware of what is happening there.

Perhaps I could take this opportunity to remind hon. members of what is actually happening in Biafra. As I already said, many, many people are dying of starvation. About 2,000 people are dying every day. This has been happening for the last couple of years. When I was in that area last year, between 3,000 and 5,000 were dying of starvation every day. We were told this by the people who worked in the Red Cross centres, church organizations, people who were working with refugees and those in medical centres.

During our tour we visited refugee camps. We saw people from Biafra and Nigeria who were starving and suffering from many diseases. We toured feeding centres. We saw feeding centre after feeding centre where small children were being fed a bowl of soup, a glass of milk or maybe an iron pill. We visited hospitals where we saw babies dying of starvation. You also see other effects of the war. You could see many young people who had been to university, had started work and who are now suffering in hospitals because of the war. We had an opportunity to talk to people involved in relief work. We spent some time with government officials and the military.

We went to Nigeria the next week and compared notes. Biafra is a nation torn by death, suffering and fear. This is apparent everywhere. I shall give one example of a feeding centre we visited; I believe it was run by the Catholic Church. We arrived at six o'clock in the morning. The reason they were being fed at that hour in the morning was that they were afraid of being attacked afterwards. I remember the church people telling us that a couple of weeks before we arrived they were feeding 4,000 or 5,000 children when a Nigerian jet flew over, bombed the centre and killed some people. It was clearly not a military target. About half a mile away they were feeding 3,500 pregnant and nursing women iron pills and stockfish. This is what you see. This is what these people are going through every day of their lives.

The Biafran people are very determined. Life to them is a fight for survival. They will continue the war despite the starvation in their country, because they feel they have to. They will continue despite their inferior weapons. All this adds up to the possibility of a very long war. That is why we as Canadians and as parliamentarians must be concerned about it and try to help in the situation.

The churches are involved. They are getting food into Biafra tonight, tomorrow night and every night of the week. They are getting food into Biafra regardless of many of the technicalities and complexities that so many parliamentarians throughout the world are talking about. They say, "people are dying so we are flying." They have been doing this for approximately the last year and they are getting food into Biafra. The Red Cross has not flown since last June. This country still refuses to contribute funds to Canairelief. We try to hide behind protocol and many legalities and technicalities. The Prime Minister again outlined many of these things today. He documented excuse after excuse. He said that all of us as individual members can get involved if we want to, but he refuses to involve the government of Canada in contributing to Canairelief. I suppose we could say the refusal of the Prime Minister of this country to act is similar to that of a hesitant virgin.

He is asking us to send money to Canairelief but will not commit the government of Canada to doing the same thing. He knows there is a great moral injustice happening over there. At least he should know it. However, he still refuses to act. I believe one of the real handicaps of the Prime Minister is that he tries to parallel Biafra with Quebec. I think this is one of the hang-ups he has because of his concept of federalism. I suggest this is a very idiotic comparison. You cannot compare the two situations at all. He has chosen starvation in preference to contributing money to Canairelief.

Let us look at what has happened in the whole relief picture. It has already been mentioned that the Red Cross has not flown into Biafra since last June. When I was there the Canadian Hercules plane had just ceased flying. We are told that it made only 10 or 11 flights and flew about 200 tons of food into Biafra. Let us look at the other operations. Joint Church Aid, of which Canairelief is a part, up until October 31 of this year had flown 4,183 flights into Biafra with a total of over 45,000 tons of food. This is what the people of Biafra are existing on today. The need there is great. They are not getting enough food into Biafra.

Many people have stated that a minimum of 500 tons of food a day is required to keep the people of Biafra alive. I believe that today the churches are getting in somewhere between 100 and 200 tons of food, depending on what sort of night it is. What kind of solution is necessary? The Prime Minister talks about day flights and night flights and all the pros and cons of each. I suggest that we need both day and night flights. It is necessary to fly both night and day to get enough food into Biafra.

It is necessary to have some kind of overland corridor from either Port Harcourt or Calabar, or perhaps even a river corridor up the Niger River. Many members have spoken about daylight flights. Both sides must in principle agree with the concept of daylight flights. The difficulty is in trying to get both sides to agree to the same conditions. Previous speakers talked about the agreement between Biafra and the International Red Cross that was signed on August 27. A few days ago the Prime Minister was trying to say that Biafra had not signed an agreement with the International Red Cross.

Then there is the agreement between Nigeria and the International Committee of the Red Cross. This has also been commented on at great length by many people. The Biafrans would have been fools if they had accepted this agreement, because they would have been cutting their own throats. Basically, it was an agreement that was to last for only three weeks. They were supposed to fly only between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m., which is a very short time; indeed, it is much shorter than the flying time now being used by the churches in providing relief from Sao Tomé. Even those flights were to be controlled by the federal army and air force. The Biafrans would have been foolish to have accepted an agreement of that sort.

This is an issue in connection with which many of the complexities of international law arise. We get hung up deciding whether it is a civil war and whether genocide is being committed. The question of the sovereignty of Nigeria is raised. There are many complexities. But it is not a civil war as far as the sale of guns is concerned. Many countries are contributing guns and other arms to either side. Both the hon. member and I were in a bombing raid carried out by a Russian jet which dropped what were probably British bombs and the plane was probably piloted by a Japanese.

The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) mentioned oil. I suspect that the desire for oil is one of the main reasons the war is continuing. A British Member of Parliament told me, "We don't want de Gaulle to have the oil. We want it. That is the reason we are involved in the war." It is ironic that oil profits should receive priority over human lives, but this is what is happening in Biafra today.

Many distinguished authorities on international law say we do have the right to intervene in this war on humanitarian grounds by supplying food and medical aid. If we allow ourselves to become bogged-down in legalistic arguments, a lot of time can be wasted because both sides can produce convincing expert opinion to support their views. Let us not be carried away in debating technicalities of this sort while people are dying. What we should be considering is the course we should follow as a Parliament and as Canadians. What should the government be doing?

Basically our motion asks for just one thing: Since the Red Cross has failed to negotiate conditions acceptable to both sides, we should support Canarelief because that organization is getting food into Biafra, the only one which is doing so. In other words, we should join with the Netherlands, Sweden and many other countries which directly or indirectly have been supporting Canairelief or Joint Church Aid. This does not involve any infringement of the sovereignty of Nigeria as a whole. There are a number of further recommendations I would make.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member pursues his remarks I should draw to his attention that his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nystrom: I thank the House very much. I shall take only one or two minutes. We should think of other contributions we can make as parliamentarians. The war must be stopped. As long as the war continues, people will die of starvation or for military reasons. First, the Prime Minister should send one of his personal representatives to see Colonel Ojukwu in Biafra so that we can get the story straight, so that information is not received second-hand. We do not recognize communist China but we still trade with them. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was talking with Biafrans in New York, so there seems no reason why someone should not talk with them in Biafra.

Second, we ought to put pressure on Britain, the Soviet Union and France, countries which are supplying weapons to both sides, in an effort to prevent them doing so. If the supply of weapons is cut off, the war will stop. Third, Canada must do everything possible to mediate in this war. When we were there we noticed that Canada is among the more respected nations in the world. If we do not undertake mediation ourselves, we should encourage nations like Switzerland, Sweden and Yugoslavia to do so.

Alleged Failure to Aid Biafrans

Finally, we should put as much pressure as possible on the United Nations in an effort to get that organization to do something. If the United Nations does not act in connection with problems such as this, it will become even less important than it is today. After all, this is an issue of major concern; a couple of million people have died, and the world community ought to be involved. I conclude my remarks by once again asking the government to seriously consider making a grant of some type of Canairelief so that we can play a part in alleviating the suffering in Biafra today. If we fail to do so, how can we really establish a just society or participatory democracy?

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House, not just the opposition members, want the Nigerian war to end. They also want to get effective aid to the helpless victims of that war—innocent civilians, women and, above all, children. There can be no doubt on that score. The question is, how. What should we be doing?

At times, contemplating this disastrous civil war in Nigeria, so cruel, so destructive, so futile and, basically, so stupid, one wonders whether it is anything more than a fierce power struggle between two militant factions for the control and disposal of the human and natural resources of that great country—a power struggle to control and dispose of its millions of people and its vast resources of oil, minerals and other wealth.

General Gowon and his military group in deadly struggle confront Colonel, now General, Ojukwu and his military group, though only a few short years ago they were sitting round the table together amicably discussing how they would govern all Nigeria. They were then on a first-name basis—it was Jack Emeka, Bob and Harry.

Mr. Peters: Who's Harry?

Mr. Wahn: Is it anything more than the age-old, deadly power game in which ruthless military leaders contend for influence, wealth and power while their people groan and suffer and die? I remember an old Russian saying which expresses this thought very well, "When the nobles battle, the peasants have sore heads." Is this war in Nigeria anything more than one more example of the old power game?

Who is supplying the money to pay for the high powered publicity men and for the costly publicity campaigns which seem to be so necessary in our modern society to arouse people to indignation, to activism, to crusades? Who is paying the bills? Where is the money coming from? Is it coming from commercial firms who hope to recoup themselves by obtaining concessions from one side or the other to exploit the rich natural resources of Nigeria? Are members of this House being asked to be dupes and pawns in a power game? I wish I knew for sure. Some opposition members have spoken with great authority. I wish I had their confidence and the knowledge they appear to possess. Do they really know what the answers are? Do they really possess authoritative information which the rest of us do not share?

[Mr. Nystrom.]

The debate today has been wide-ranging. Some speeches have gone far beyond the terms of the motion, demanding for example that Canada should sponsor a United Nations' resolution calling for an immediate cease fire. Other speakers have said we should demand that the British, Russian and French governments immediately put an end to arms shipments to the combatants. Mr. Speaker, to respond to suggestions of this type would really be indulging in idle gestures on the part of the Canadian House of Commons. About this time last year the House referred to its Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence the whole question of the Nigerian civil conflict. After extensive hearings, our report was filed on November 6 of that year. In effect, it strongly recommended against any such flamboyant but, in the end, idle gestures. Instead, the standing committee made a number of practical suggestions many of which have been adopted and some of which were referred to in the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on this subject.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the hon. member indicate what was adopted?

Mr. Wahn: I would be glad to do that. However, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) for this time avoiding such flamboyant and idle gestures and for raising in his resolution a relatively simple issue, namely, should the Canadian government, as a government, financially assist Canairelief in making night flights to Biafra? That night flights to Biafra is the basic issue is also recognized by the official opposition. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made that fact clear not once but at least three times in his statement on November 25. At page 1196 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> I must charge the Prime Minister with stubbornness regarding aid that could be used to bring relief through night flights.

Later on the same page he is reported as having said:

> Let the Prime Minister and his colleagues act to assist Canairelief in taking supplies to that country by night;—

Still later on the same page:

> —the people of Canada will pass a harsh judgment on the Prime Minister for his failure to act in an area in which Canada can be of assistance, night flights, and I plead with the right hon. gentleman to move as rapidly as he can to make this important and helpful assistance available.

That is the basic issue before the House in this debate.

The hon. member for Greenwood also suggested the basic question, the answer to which will determine the conclusion that we will reach. The question is this: Is the Nigerian government sincere when it states to the Red Cross and to the Canadian government that it will permit daylight relief flights under reasonable conditions? If the answer to that question is yes, then the issue now before the House is settled and our government is right. I think all members will admit that daylight relief flights are the answer to the problem and are to be preferred over night flights if only they can be arranged. However, if the answer to the basic question is no, then our government, I agree, should immediately reconsider its attitude toward night flights.

Is the Nigerian government sincere in its offer of daylight relief flights? The hon. member for Greenwood has no doubts; it is all a plot, he says. It is not just a plot, but in addition a conspiracy. And it is not just a conspiracy on the part of the Nigerian government and some unnamed persons, but a conspiracy and a plot between the Nigerian government and the British government. At page 1197 of Hansard the hon. member is reported to have said:

> As long ago as last January General Alexander, a British member of the Observer team in Nigeria, according to The Economist of January 11 spoke of a Nigerian plan, in collaboration with the British government, to propose certain relief measures which for military reasons would be unacceptable to the Biafran authorities, and which could then be used for propaganda purposes by blaming Colonel Ojukwu for Biafran starvation. This is precisely what has occurred.

This is a very serious charge. The hon. member for Greenwood, who I regret is not in the chamber at the present time, knows very well that he cannot hide behind reports which he alleges to have been made by General Alexander or even by The Economist, because by repeating those charges from his seat in this House he has in fact adopted them as his own. If that was not his intention, he should immediately rise on a question of privilege and withdraw them. If, on the other hand, he refuses to withdraw them and adopts them as his own, he should be prepared to submit to this House evidence to support charges of such a serious nature involving conspiracy and plots on the part of the British and Nigerian governments. In the course of this debate I have been unable to find that the hon. member for Greenwood or any other opposition member has put forward any evidence which would warrant the House accepting any such allegations of deception and conspiracy. In the absence of such evidence, I repeat that those allegations should be rejected by this House.

A year ago when the Nigerian issue was referred to the external affairs committee, even more serious allegations had been levelled against the Nigerian government by some of the opposition members who levelled the most recent attacks. The allegations to which I refer were that the Nigerian government had been guilty of genocide, or of acts similar to genocide. After receiving evidence from numerous witnesses, including the Canadian representative on the international observer team, and after considering very carefully the reports of the international observer team, including representatives from the United Nations, all of whom were on the spot in Nigeria, the committee filed a report with this House, which report included a finding on this specific allegation.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A minority did not concur in that report.

Mr. Wahn: There were several members who opposed it, but the great majority of the members accepted the report and particularly the following part of the report:

> The evidence presented to us does not indicate that the Government of Nigeria has adopted a policy of genocide. On the contrary the evidence indicates it is doing its best to assist and to preserve the lives and properties of the people, including the Ibo people, in the area now under its control.
> The evidence indicates that many of the Ibo people now living in the secessionist area fear genocide. This fear is based upon a large number of factors. These include (without attempting to be exhaustive or assess the relative strength of these factors) religious, tribal and economic rivalries, jealousies and hatreds, the bitterness of a civil war and the past history of atrocities and improper treatment of minorities.

While there have been atrocities and extreme bitterness in this civil war, there is no evidence that troop formations are engaged in genocide. The evidence indicates the government of Nigeria is attempting to impose and maintain proper standards of conduct and discipline among its troops. A code of proper conduct has been issued by the government to the Nigerian troops. In general, the attempt to enforce proper discipline and conduct seems to be as successful as could be expected in the difficult circumstances which exist.

Since that time there has been less talk of genocide in Biafra. But the idea seems to die very hard. This is indicated again by the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood, as reported at page 1197 of Hansard where in referring to the Prime Minister he said:

—it is clear the right hon. gentleman is now aware of the great concern felt by the Canadian people about the immense tragedy which has already cost between one million and two million lives and which threatens to exterminate a whole people.

I think all members will agree that this is an immense human tragedy. But we do not agree that it serves any useful purpose to overstate the case and to suggest that an entire people is threatened with extermination. Hon. members will recall the statement made a few months ago by former Nigerian president Azikiwe. A press clipping that I have read as follows:

Former Nigerian president Nnamdi Azikiwe said today he was kept under house arrest by Biafra last year when he was supposed to have been a supporter of its cause.

He made the statement at a press conference called to mark his declaration—broadcast in Lagos earlier today—that Biafra should negotiate for peace.

In the broadcast, Azikiwe, an influential member of the Ibo tribe, said he no longer believed Ibos were in danger of extermination by other Nigerians —and said the time was right to make peace.

In the same press conference I believe he also indicated that almost 70 per cent of all Ibos now live in territory occupied by federal Nigerian forces, and far from being exterminated, many held high positions in that territory. This, of course, is in complete accord with the findings of the standing committee of this House.

Hon. members of the opposition really cannot expect to cry "wolf" too often; their allegations of genocide a year ago were not substantiated. Can this House tonight give any greater credence to the allegation of a plot and conspiracy between the Nigerian and British Governments to deceive the world with regard to the possibility of daytime flights? I remind members also that former Ibo President Azikiwe, in the statement to which he referred earlier, claimed that General Ojukwu has been too inflexible in his attitude toward daylight flights.

[Mr. Wahn.]

The basic objection to Canadian government assistance to night relief flights is that these might provide some cover for shipments of military supplies. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) addressed himself courageously to dealing with this particular question. I believe he is perhaps the only member of the opposition who has dealt with it extensively. But he did not, nor has any opposition member, provided convincing evidence that the night relief flights which the opposition recommends could not and do not provide cover for military shipments to Biafra.

Until further evidence is advanced by opposition members I suggest that the House must accept the view, which appears to have been accepted not only by Nigeria but by the International Red Cross representatives and by our own government—indeed, by most governments—that night flights are desired by Biafran military authorities to help provide cover for military shipments and to assist in breaking the Nigerian blockade on military supplies to Biafra. If that is so, and the weight of evidence might indicate that it is, and if the night flights are desired by Biafran authorities for that purpose, it might explain a great deal. It might explain the difficulties experienced not only by the Canadian government but by other governments as well in their efforts to bring relief supplies to Biafra in the large volume necessary to prevent starvation and death in that country.

At this point, I should say that it is most unfortunate the International Red Cross has been subjected to the type of criticism voiced in the course of this debate. If it has not been able to arrange daylight flights, I am convinced it is not because of any fault on the part of the International Red Cross. It is rather that the authorities involved have been unable to reach the agreement which is necessary to permit such flights. The Red Cross, which has a proud record in providing relief in international emergencies, should not be subjected to criticism in this House, express or implied.

In its report to this House last the External Affairs Committee said:

> Under no circumstances should Canada supply arms either to the government of Nigeria or to the authorities in the secessionist area.

If in fact night relief flights are being used to cover arms shipments to Biafra, then opposition members are in effect asking the Canadian government to assist in supplying arms to Biafra. Our committee opposed this contention, and I believe most members also take this view. One other argument made by—

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) has the floor.

Mr. Wahn: After I have completed my remarks I will answer the hon. member's question. One other argument made by the hon. member for Greenwood deserves brief attention. As reported at page 1197 of Hansard, he said:

> Why is it that this channel of help is being neglected?

He was referring to night flights. He went on to ask whether the Prime Minister was aware that the Red Cross contemplated only the delivery of some 90 tons of supplies over a three-week period, whereas Canairelief and Joint Church Aid were flying in about 200 tons of supplies nightly. He asked whether anyone in his right senses could expect that Colonel Ojukwu would accept daylight flights as a substitute for night flights. The entire argument breaks down if this assumption of the hon. member for Greenwood is incorrect. The assumption is incorrect. The proposed arrangement for daylight flights would be completely separate and apart from the night flights now carried on by Canairelief. At no time has it been suggested, as far as I am aware, that as a condition of obtaining daylight relief flights the Canadian government would be forced to bring any pressure whatsoever to bear upon Canairelief to stop its night flights.

The resolution before the House cannot be supported unless the opposition establishes that night relief flights are not being used to provide cover for military shipments and that the Nigerian Government is not sincere in offering daylight relief flights under reasonable conditions. Perhaps none of us can be entirely certain what the correct answers to these two allegations really are. Surely we can say this, however, that the onus is upon opposition members to bring forward convincing evidence, and in this debate today they have failed to discharge that onus.

Mr. Harding: Would the last speaker permit a question? In view of his last remarks that night flights are possibly being used as a subterfuge for arms shipments to Biafra, is he recommending that the present night flights cease?

Mr. Wahn: The position I take is that the government of Canada should not finance night flights unless it is clearly established that they are not being used to provide cover for arms shipments to Biafra. That is consistent with the attitude taken by our committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Indirectly, that is a charge.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member for St. Paul's has expired.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have noted throughout this debate that there has not been too much sharp partisanship, and I do not want to inject any into the debate. This is not the kind of debate or place for partisanship. I was impressed, however, with what the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) said. I was impressed by the fact that he quoted so much of the recommendations of a parliamentary committee. He knows and I know how much attention the government paid to many recommendations of that committee on many matters, and indeed on this very matter.

I am appalled by the suggestion that it is up to the opposition to prove that arms are not being brought in through Canairelief and other night flights. I am appalled that the government suggests and makes the implication that they are. I wonder how the government of Canada has knowledge of this matter, because so far as I know they have never sent a delegation or a group to speak to both sides in this war. They have had observers reporting on what they saw in Nigeria. That is hardly an objective appraisal of what is going on within Biafra and to the Biafran people.

I am not very proud of what our government is doing, or more particularly what it has failed to do. I am very proud of what some Canadians have been doing, and I endorse the remarks that have been passed about Canairelief and other groups of wonderful and inspired people in this country. It has been said more than once today that this is not surely a question of brittle formalism or narrow legalism. Surely, if ever there was a matter which should occupy the attention of thoughtful men and allow them to make their decisions on humanitarian considerations, this is one. Abraham Lincoln said that he was one of those who looked upon mankind through the pensive eyes of pity. Surely, we make no apology if we become emotional and profoundly concerned about this terrible tragedy.

I will not go over the discussions, the agreements broken or the confused statements and diplomatic obfuscations which have been so clearly and powerfully delineated by my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), and by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). This is a grim war that has brought agony, destruction and death to too many people for too long. Many months ago—it seems ages ago—I first raised this matter as a question to then Prime Minister Pearson. I cite this recollection as a mere and small matter of record and, heaven knows, not as a statement of righteousness.

I have been pained by what the Government has neglected to do.

Of late I have become concerned and shocked by the harshness of the Prime Minister's comment about Colonel Ojukwu and his struggle. I think we have missed so many opportunities. We have missed them within the Commonwealth. We did not move when we were on the Security Council. There were opportunities under the rules to have this matter placed on the agenda of the General Assembly. This was never done. We could surely have found some means whereby interested Canadians could have been brought in on both sides. I even thought at one time that perhaps the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association could have been a very active group in this regard. There is so much that could have been done. But today we sup the cup of opportunities missed and initiatives not taken. The suggestion of this debate is practical and pertinent. May I also say it is merciful.

The suggestion that tangible assistance be given to Canairelief is one which can be and should be carried out. I hope with all my heart this will be done. I am pleased that generally the debate has been on a high plane, although I cannot help but observe that the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour, recently returned from the international conclave at the General Assembly, seems not yet to fit neatly into the garment of non-partisanship. I thought the attempt on his part to score a debating point on the NDP by noting out loud that the Labour party is in power in Britain was not too germane to the issue. Is it significant that this was or still is a socialist party, or that the NDP is or was a socialist party? Is that really the issue?

Is it not reasonable to conclude that governments of countries speak on foreign matters to governments of other countries? Does not the Prime Minister of this country confer with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom? Is there not still a hot-line between Westminster and Ottawa? The time was when Canada's prime ministers gave leadership within the Commonwealth. It is not the NDP's major responsibility to talk to a Labour government. Surely the Prime Minister of Canada can confer with his opposite number there.

I am afraid that the United Kingdom's role in this tragedy has not been a glorious one. Along with the USSR and the UAR the United Kingdom is a heavy supplier of death-dealing armaments. I read with sadness that they intend to increase their contribution in that particular field. At an international gathering not long ago I heard a minister of the British government say:

> —I invite my friends in all parts of the Commonwealth to ponder over one overriding principle of international behaviour which the United Kingdom in relation to Nigeria finds it really must abide by. And this is when an independent sovereign nation, a free and independent member of this Commonwealth, deems that its integrity, its territorial integrity, is in danger. It has a right to turn to friendly countries, especially in the Commonwealth, for the supplies which it considers necessary to maintain that integrity and that independence.

That is a shocking suggestion. When I got the floor I took the liberty of indicating I thought it was a shocking suggestion that it is concomitant with friendly relations that one had the right to call on a friendly state for arms to suppress people within its own borders. There is much that could be said about the dreary prelude to the present sad situation. I do not know all the stories about oil. I am not one of the economic determinants, but I am concerned by what I read and hear. I do know that the former colonial power left a bitter legacy. I was impressed by a debate in the House of Lords not long ago where the Archbishop of Canterbury maintained that to get a federal Nigeria to work would be a political miracle. So it is not incumbent upon anyone to say that a structure once created by a colonial power is so sacrosanct that any group of people who suggest that it be altered are immediately to be hounded out of the land and be denounced and harried.

I think we must be positive. We note what has happened. We regret the leadership that was not given. I think, however, it is up to all of us in all parts of this House to try to adopt a positive posture and rally behind at least one remedial action or one avenue. The Canadian people, I am convinced, feel deeply about this question and are concerned about the suffering of mankind in a state that has suffered so much for so long. So I would join all those who plead and implore the government to follow the suggestion of this resolution. There still remains the whole matter of bringing about a cease fire and there is still ahead of us a challenge, but there is this one avenue through which we can do something. Let us, for heaven's sake, and for humanity's sake, do it.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is getting a little late in the day's proceedings; therefore, I shall be as succinct as possible. Before I become involved in the context of my brief remarks I think it probably is worth noting that with perhaps one or two exceptions no government member has really dealt with the resolution which is before the House. They have addressed themselves to a whole host of questions. I should like to remind government members what this debate is not about.

It is not a resolution which recommends that the government of Canada ship arms to Biafra or anywhere else. It is not a recommendation that we take this problem to the United Nations. It is not about genocide. It is not a recommendation that we support one side or the other politically. It is not a motion that we condemn the United Kingdom and the USSR. Nor, finally, is it a resolution that the government recognize Biafra as a political state. All these propositions could be very seriously entertained and they could be very seriously objected to. However, none of them are before the House today. But almost all the government members have chosen to speak on one or other of these matters which are irrelevant in this debate.

The motion before the House suggests that the government has failed to make adequate measures to relieve massive starvation in Nigeria-Biafra and, further, urgently requests the government to change its policy in this regard. That I suggest, Mr. Speaker, is what we should be discussing. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Goyer) when he speaks next will address himself to that question. I should like to go back, therefore, to the argument which I think was put forward in moderate, reasonable and rational terms by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) at the outset of the debate.

He tried to focus exclusively on this question and addressed himself to the problem which the government apparently has had in doing anything about the starvation in Nigeria and Biafra. The hon. member for Greenwood suggested that the government has given four reasons at various times for taking no action. He tried, in a very systematic way, to deal with each of these, and not one of them has been adequately answered by any member on the government side. First of all, he said that the government has recently concerned itself almost exclusively with daylight flights; it is not really interested in finding alternative methods to get medical and food supplies to that country. He pointed out, as has the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and others on this side of the House, that there are serious legitimate reasons for the hesitation of the government of Biafra to accept the various proposals that have been made concerning daylight flights.

It has also been pointed out that the government of Nigeria has raised serious objections to a variety of proposals that have been made concerning daylight flights. I suggest that daylight flights are not the issue and are not what we are debating tonight. The countless attempts by government members to turn the whole question of Nigeria and Biafra into a question of daylight flights must be seen as the kind of charade that it is.

The second point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, the second reason, he suggests, that the government has given for not becoming involved in this tragic situation, has been that the government has said that the Red Cross is the one institution which we should support in our efforts to provide aid to the people in Nigeria and Biafra. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and by others that the Red Cross has not been functioning there since June in terms of flights, and the government knows this very well. Why can we not give assistance to Canairelief or to Joint Church Aid? It has been pointed out that this organization flies in every night, as it is doing tonight. We will come to the reason for that in a minute.

We go on to the third reason given by the government for not involving itself. This has been brought out outside the House quite recently and certainly in previous debates by the Prime Minister. I am referring to the matter of sovereignty. It has been suggested that to take medical or food supplies in any way, by any means which do not meet with the approval of the Nigerian authorities, would constitute an infringement of their sovereignty and perhaps implicitly the recognition of the sovereignty of Biafra. This argument has been conclusively shattered by eminent jurists in this country and abroad. I will not repeat the point that was made on this score by the hon. member for Greenwood this afternoon.

There has been no answer from the government side of the House on the third reason that has been suggested. There is no question now, in terms of international law, that to send in food or medical supplies to another country, whether or not they agree, would constitute an act of war or aggression. On this question, incidentally—and this may be a trivial point but a logical one at least—if the government is so concerned about the question of sovereignty, why are they so busy negotiating with the representatives of mainland China? After all, officially they recognize the sovereignty of the Formosa government, but they are certainly being inconsistent in their refusal to meet openly and frankly with Biafran officials when at the same time they do not hesitate to meet the officials of mainland China.

The fourth point that has been made is that the Biafrans are secessionists and rebels, that they have broken away from a federal state, and for certain Canadians federal states are sacrosanct institutions and we must not contribute in any way to their disintegration. It is now beyond questioning by anyone with the most elementary knowledge of the history of Nigeria and Biafra—and I do not claim to be an expert although I have some knowledge of it—that the reason for the break-away of the Biafrans was that they were subjected to very considerable human pressures, to understate the case somewhat. On balance, any civilized person would reach the conclusion that they were very sensible in making their decision. However—and I stress this point as well—the right of the Biafrans to secede from the federal state is not being debated here; that is not the issue. We are not being asked to recognize the separate state of Biafra or to decide whether secession in any form is legitimate and, therefore, whether we as a government should support that kind of activity.

I have gone through the four arguments that have been raised by the government at various times and I have suggested that the hon. member for Greenwood presented them at the outset of the debate today. He argued in a rather conclusive fashion that none of the reasons that the government has put forward is tenable when we consider what we are debating today, which is whether the government has provided the kind of aid that it could provide to stop starvation in that unfortunate country. I suggested, further, that not one government member has tried to deal in a direct fashion with the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Greenwood. Therefore, at this point in the debate I can only conclude, being as objective as I can, that this side of the argument has won and that the case has been established.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I may either make a request or give the House word about an agreement. About an hour ago the House leaders conferred and we agreed on the number of people who would speak before we adjourn tonight. The understanding was we would hear from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and then hear from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Goyer), who would be the final speaker. I think hon. members will find there would be general agreement that the House continue to sit through these two speeches and that the late show questions which were scheduled for tonight be postponed to another night.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we would be quite agreeable if the House wishes to make that order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Broadbent: I will conclude soon, Mr. Speaker. Having listened to the debate which proceeded from the original argument by the hon. member for Greenwood, one would have to conclude that the government is convicted of the charge that is levelled at it in the resolution, and that if the government wants to extricate itself from the guilt of the lack of action that has characterized it in the past, it should begin to do something. Most specifically, it could begin by providing governmental aid for the night flights being conducted by Joint Church Aid and Canairelief. I would look forward, Mr. Speaker, to hearing what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to say on this question.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while civil war has been raging for over two years in Nigeria, the people of Canada have become aware of the situation and are increasingly concerned with the nature and the importance of this tragedy. They are concerned with the sufferings which this conflict has brought to the civilian population. It is of course this aspect of the situation which has preoccupied the Canadian government first and foremost. We have wondered what was the best way to bring relief to people in distress while the war goes on. And we have always kept in touch with those who try, by different means, to promote a peaceful settlement. We have kept ourselves ready to do our best to help, should an opportunity arise.

I should perhaps say more on this subject, Mr. Speaker, before examining the problem of relief supplies as such, even if the opposition is very much divided over the scope of this motion, since some members dealt with the political aspect of the conflict, while the member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—who is not the least important member in this house—took care to mention that the motion presented by the opposition was strictly humanitarian.

[English]

There are compelling limitations on what outside governments can do about furthering the settlement of this civil war. We can urge, as we have persistently, the critical importance of finding a peaceful solution, and the crying urgency of achieving this in order to shorten the agony of the conflict. We can, as the government has also done, make clear our readiness to help in any way the parties might agree upon in the elaboration and implementation of arrangements for peace. What Canada emphatically cannot do is prescribe for the parties to the conflict the concessions each might make to bring about a settlement. Nor, sadly, is there any formula whereby we could introduce from without the essential conciliatory spirit which alone could make peace talks meaningful and a peace settlement lasting. This essential ingredient can be provided only by the parties themselves.

It should also be borne in mind that in so far as mediatory assistance from outside may be of help, there has been no lack of well-placed and well-intentioned conciliators. From the early stages of the conflict, African countries have made clear their fully understandable concern that it should be recognized as essentially an African problem and that a solution should be sought in that context. This view was endorsed by the Secretary General of the United Nations in a letter to the SSEA, tabled in the House on September 30, 1968, and was again expressed when he had discussions with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about Nigeria early this month. The Organization for African Unity in September reaffirmed its position in this respect. The Organization for African Unity, which is duly recognized as a regional organization of the United Nations, has been actively seeking to bring the two sides together for peace negotiations, and those endeavours are continuing.

It is unfortunate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is unable to be here today to give us his views on the motion before the House. So many of his activities, especially in the past few months, have centered around the conflict in Nigeria. Elsewhere I will mention his discussions with Mr. Stewart and Mr. Gromyko about arms shipments to the area. He has also had many opportunities in Ottawa and in New York to have talks about Nigeria with the foreign ministers of other countries, including a number from the African continent. Hon. members will also recall the visits to Ottawa of two distinguished African leaders, President Diori of Niger and President Nyerere of Tanzania. These meetings confirmed the view of the government that Canada should continue to concentrate on the humanitarian problems and that a dramatic peace initiative on the part of Canada would not help get peace talks started. Indeed, such an action might have an effect opposite to that intended. Rather, it has been the minister's resolve that Canada should be ready and willing to grasp opportunities to be useful in ameliorating the situation, as in Canada's continuing participation on the observer team, or in helping to bring about peace negotiations. But until peace comes, the humanitarian problem of relieving the suffering of war must be faced. In the absence thus far of any role Canada could play in resolving the complexities of Nigeria's internal struggle, the government has concentrated on helping to mitigate its tragic consequences. Unfortunately, the effort made by the population of Canada cannot be compared favourably to the one of other countries.

Like most other governments, we have made our relief contributions available through the organization which has always served with such distinction and efficiency in relief distribution throughout the world—the Red Cross. Through the Canadian Red Cross Society and the International Committee of the Red Cross, the government has contributed almost $3 million to relief for victims of the Nigerian conflict and, of this, almost one half in the Biafran area.

I need not dwell here, Mr. Speaker, on the complexities and frustrations which have beset all efforts to get relief supplies through to the suffering. The relief programs which the Red Cross has co-ordinated on both sides of the fighting lines have been persistently pursued in the face of acute physical risks, formidable political complications—

An hon. Member: What has that to do with the motion?

Mr. Goyer: —and monumental administrative difficulties. The most severe problems, naturally, have concerned efforts to deliver desperately needed supplies of food and drugs to suffering civilians in the secessionist enclave, surrounded as it is by Nigerian government forces.

Mr. Broadbent: The speech was written the day before yesterday.

Mr. Goyer: And as the conflict has been prolonged, the tragedy of its impact on those innocent people has assumed ever more desperately urgent proportions in our relief efforts. In his statement to the House on November 25, the Prime Minister outlined the persistent efforts which this government and other donor governments have made, in co-ordination with and in support of the ICRC, to break the tragic impasse which obstructs the expansion of relief deliveries. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when we examine this record of relief delivery efforts—efforts massively supported by many governments and organizations which share Canada's concern about the suffering in Nigeria—we cannot escape a conclusion which can only be heart-rendering for all of us who earnestly seek to help relieve that suffering. It is not a conclusion which I derive any satisfaction from stating, but it is the single most relevant fact which we must recognize in the present agonizing dilemma over relief delivery. This is the abundantly tested and sadly demonstrated fact that the Ojukwu regime so far is not disposed to accept more effective relief delivery arrangements unless it thereby achieves political advantage.

• (10:10 p.m.)

If we failed to face up to this distasteful conclusion, we should not only be doing less than justice to all those who have striven to overcome the obstacles to a freer flow of relief; we should also be deluding ourselves as to what are the real prospects for achieving our urgent objective of getting more relief to the suffering. Perhaps, most important, by ignoring the essence of this relief delivery problem we should only further prejudice the chances of yet breaking this impasse over expansion of aid to the hungry and undernourished.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. parliamentary secretary permit a question?

Mr. Goyer: Yes, but later, please. This government bears the Ojukwu regime no ill will, but we have much good will and compassion for the people who are suffering in the territory which that regime controls. And when it is clear that Colonel Ojukwu's policies are directly instrumental in denying them the relief we are trying to provide, we must be frank in declaring where our essential concern lies. Tireless efforts have been made over a long period to get a larger flow of relief into the Biafran area. The Prime Minister reminded the House earlier this week that these efforts date from last year. They have been stepped up steadily in recent months and weeks. After the successful airlift operation last spring had to be stopped, the Red Cross determined to negotiate a firm arrangement which would allow a large, steady flow of relief supplies. They decided to press for daylight flights which the Nigerian authorities had indicated they might accept. I would like to point out that all observers, including Joint Church Aid and Canairelief, agree that daylight flights would be better and more effective than the hazardous night flights.

[Translation]

On July 10, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) informed the House of his offer to supply inspectors who would control the relief shipments. It was then obvious that the Ojukwu regime would not accept flights from Nigeria and therefore we had expressed the opinion that this kind of shipment inspection would make it possible for the Nigerian government to accept flights from elsewhere. Our proposal was well received and we think that it prompted the government to agree to another mode of inspection so that it could recognize direct flights from outside Nigeria into the secessionist area.

Early in August, the International Committee of the Red Cross proposed to both sides to set up day flights in the secessionist territory. By the middle of August, both sides had agreed in principle to these proposals; however, the Biafran answer stipulated that the Ojukwu regime would keep on using the Uli airport for its own operations. It is important to remember this point because, obviously, it has sometimes been forgotten when appraising subsequent events. There is no indication that the Ojukwu regime was then or later prepared to meet the only condition laid down by the Nigerian government to the effect that there should be no shipment of military supplies during the day as long as the proposed relief flights would last.

Although no agreement was then signed, the Red Cross felt encouraged to have these arrangements confirmed, which was done on September 13 by the Nigerian government. In so doing, the Nigerian authorities were making major concessions, namely the following which is the most important: relief flights would not necessarily have to leave from Nigeria but could reach the secessionist region from Dahomey, the neighbouring state.

The relief cargos could be inspected beforehand at Cotonou by representatives of the ICRC, the government of Nigeria and the government of Dahomey. The measures agreed to by the Nigerian government would have allowed numerous direct daylight relief flights while enabling them to make sure that the flights carried nothing but relief cargos and, in addition, they would have respected the condition made a long time ago by the secessionists, namely that they would accept no help from Nigeria.

Two days after the federal military government and the ICRC had signed an agreement for the implementation of this daylight relief flight program for an initial period of three weeks, a Biafran spokesman repudiated it. The Biafran press release invoked certain technicalities stating that the agreement did not give enough guarantees against Nigerian military exploitation against those relief flights. The only acceptable guarantee in this regard, said the press release, would be that of a third government or of a politically oriented international organization.

The Canadian government, judging that the September 13 agreement offered a practical solution to the pressing necessity of transporting more relief cargos, immediately attempted, in agreement with other governments, to meet the new requirements of the Ojukwu regime. In the course of discussions with the American authorities, we now studied the possibility of putting Canadian observers on board the relief planes. Ambassador Ferguson formulated specific proposals concerning the guarantees that could be offered to alleviate Biafran concern with regard to the military advantages that might be derived from daylight relief flights, but the secessionist authorities rejected those proposals.

The Canadian government, through the I.C.R.C. has also reaffirmed its willingness to consider every practical means of promoting an agreement. It has asked the Ojukwu regime to reconsider its approach. All these efforts have remained fruitless.

It is obvious—and I can prove it—that during the direct talks we had with them, the Ojukwu regime wanted to obtain political guarantees. In other words, the Ojukwu regime will not facilitate the relief flights its people so desperately need unless the Canadian government and the other governments concerned accept the de facto recognition of Biafra as an independent state. Such are the facts.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances, the government cannot be blamed for a lack of interest in the welfare or even in the survival of the so sorely tried civilians of the secessionist area of Nigeria.

The fact that we openly refuse to interfere in the political matters of another country cannot simply be termed a technical reason or a matter of protocol. The fact that the Canadian government is bent on acknowledging the resolutions of the O.A.U. cannot be termed merely a scruple. The fact that we respect what we have helped to build—in this case, a friendly country, a member of the Commonwealth—cannot be termed stupid.

All these considerations are still significant if we want to play our part in the restoration work that will have to be undertaken as soon as the Nigerian conflict is over, if we want to retain the respect of the African continent as a whole, if we want to preserve abroad the image of Canada as a responsible country.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but I must advise him that his time has expired unless there is a disposition to allow him to continue.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope he will be allowed to continue so that he can answer the question that he said he would answer at the end of his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With unanimous consent, the parliamentary secretary may continue.

Mr. Goyer: I thank hon. members. The Canadian government also believes that no one should send arms to the Nigerian war theatre. This is a firm statement which has been enunciated publicly many times. It has also been expressed to the leaders of other governments by both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the statement is well known to Britain, the Soviet Union and the other countries involved.

Recently Mr. Stewart, the British Foreign Secretary, and Mr. Gromyko, the Foreign Secretary of the Soviet Union, were in Ottawa, and when the Nigerian conflict was discussed during their talks here they were reminded of Canada's own policy of not supplying arms to this theatre, as well as our own view that none should be supplied. Those are facts; I suggest nobody can accuse the government of being passive.

Hon. members will agree that the cessation of arms shipments to the Nigerian side only will not necessarily bring about an end to the war. Arms shipments to both sides must be stopped. But those countries who are reported to be supplying arms to the Biafran side deny such activity. As a result, it is extremely difficult to find a means of stopping all arms shipments. The government of Canada again calls upon all who are supplying arms to the two sides in this tragic conflict to look again at their policies. A complete cessation of arms shipments would undoubtedly help bring the end of this tragic war more closer and would save the lives of many. To conclude, I might recapitulate briefly the fundamental elements of the government's position. First, we are prepared to make further substantial contributions to relief needs in Nigeria, through whatever feasible and appropriate means may be open to the government.

Second, we, like many others, remain convinced that the urgent inauguration of daylight relief flights offers the most practicable and effective answer to immediate relief problems in the secessionist area.

Third, while keeping in close touch with the persistent efforts to bring about agreement on daylight flights, the government is also exploring possible alternative means of improving the relief delivery situation. Fourth, we stand ready to assist, in any way that both parties wish we might do so, in promoting a negotiated peace settlement. Fifth and finally, we look toward an effective role for Canada in the work of rehabilitation and reconstruction which must follow conclusion of this tragic conflict. I know the whole House, with all Canadians, shares the government's earnest hope that the day when this reconstruction process can begin will not be much longer deferred. Nigeria has always been an important area for Canadian economic aid, as shown by the nearly $20 million that we have provided since independence, in addition to the $3 million in relief. Peace will allow these important programs to go forward with new vigour.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might now put my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I followed his remarks with interest, and I noted the things he said we cannot do. Granted, there are some things that Canada cannot do in the present situation, and granted that some relief efforts, such as those of the Red Cross, have broken down, is it not possible for Canada to support at this time the one relief operation that is being carried on; and is it not clear that that, and that alone, has been the purpose of this motion and has been our request throughout all of this day's debate?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, in view of the development of the conflict and the many practical reasons I have just pointed out, no doubt, it is not good enough merely to say: From now on, let us forget the past and seek other solutions.

We ought to consider new solutions keeping in mind the complexity of the Nigerian problem. It is in that spirit that we consider the negotiations with other organizations which now provide assistance to the afflicted population.

As stated by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in the House, the Prime Minister had consultations with representatives of Canairelief and, indeed, it is up to him to make his conclusions known.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, would the parliamentary secretary answer a further question? I am still a bit puzzled because of some of his remarks and I should like him to tell us whether he is in favour of or against this motion. Could he give us a simple yes or no answer as to whether or not we will contribute?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, indeed, the reply I have just given also applies to this other question.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58 the proceedings on the motion are considered to have expired.

It being 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONFERENCE DATES, RELEASING OF DOCUMENTS, FACILITIES

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that general agreement has been reached with the provinces that the third session of the Constitutional Conference will be held in Ottawa on December 8, 9 and 10 in the new facilities being prepared in the Centennial Centre. With the agreement of the provincial premiers, I hope to be able to table the agenda early next week, Mr. Speaker.

I might add that the federal and provincial governments have agreed that documents which they will be preparing for the conference will be released in advance of the conference next Thursday at two o'clock in the afternoon, or as soon thereafter as the provinces wish to do so. The federal government will be publishing a paper entitled "Income Security and Social Services". The Federal and provincial governments have also agreed that the meetings will be public and televised.

[Translation]

A few seats will be reserved for observers accompanying the federal and provincial delegates. As for us, we want all parties in the House to be represented. Since only so many seats are available, I would suggest that one seat be reserved for each leader of the opposition parties, two for the Speakers of both houses, one for the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, four for senators and 24 for members, the latter reserved on the basis of party representation in the House. Of course, it will be up to each party to select its own delegates.

• (11:10 a.m.)

[English]

Arrangements are also being made to associate with the federal delegation the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories, the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory and one Councillor from each of the Territorial Councils. This is the same arrangement which was made for the conference in February, 1969.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—SHARING OF COST OF PUBLIC SERVANTS' PREMIUMS

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government has agreed that it will, as an employer, share in the cost of employees' medicare premiums, as recommended by the National Joint Council.

The policy provides that the employer will share in the direct premium charges levied upon employees by provincial governments with regard to medical care insurance. The share of the government will be the lesser of:

(a) 50 per cent of the direct premium, or

(b) $1.34 for single persons, $3.38 for married employees and $4.87 for employees with families.

The specific amounts referred to represent the differences between the basic employer premiums under the Group Surgical-Medical Insurance Plan and the sum of the employer premiums for supplementary medical and hospital benefits available to employees under the Group Surgical-Medical Insurance Plan.

Government Sharing Cost of Medicare

In order to cover to some degree the period during which this review has been carried out and consequently provide a measure of retroactivity, the employer's contribution for the four months commencing on January 1, 1970, will be at double the agreed rate.

The government has decided that, as employer, it should continue to contribute 50 per cent of the premium required for the basic Group Surgical-Medical Insurance Plan still operative in Quebec, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, in the Territories and outside of Canada. The government has also agreed it should continue to contribute 50 per cent of the premium of the supplementary medical insurance plan which is operative in medicare provinces.

The government has undertaken to continue its contribution of 50 per cent of the premium for optional hospital benefits.

Other participants in the Group Surgical-Medical Insurance Plan such as Members of Parliament, members of the Armed Forces, the RCMP and pensioners would also benefit by these decisions.

These decisions have been taken by the government following detailed consultation with employee organizations through the National Joint Council. The government wishes to express its thanks to the council, and particularly to its committee on health insurance plans, for its assistance.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the President of the Treasury Board for having sent us in good time a copy of the statement he has just made. This is a practice we can encourage. I am pleased to say that we welcome this statement.

I recall that in July last I raised this question in connection with public servants in the province of Alberta, members of the Armed Forces and members of the RCMP who at that time were under a considerable disadvantage with respect to the medicare plan in that province. Now we find that persons in these groups, along with participants in the Group Surgical-Medical Insurance Plan, will, in one form or another, benefit in the same way as citizens who are not in government employ. I think this decision will be welcomed and that it will become the pattern for good employers. I am glad to see that in this respect the government has attempted to rehabilitate itself.

[Mr. Drury.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to thank the President of the Treasury Board for sending us in advance a copy of the statement he has just made. I should also like to commend the government on the decision which has been announced. One could remark that it has taken a few months for the government to reach this decision, but it has corrected that by the proposal to pay double amounts for the first four months of 1970.

In effect, what the government has done has been to place its employees and the others who are covered by this announcement back in the position they occupied before they were shifted to provincial medicare schemes. It has put them back in the same position as far as paying their medicare premiums is concerned in that the federal government will pay 50 per cent of these premiums, or up to a certain level. I have studied the formula carefully and, despite my penchant for finding something wrong with what the government does, I must say the formula that has been agreed on is a good one and that we welcome this announcement.

I realize that the President of the Treasury Board could not have overlooked this, but nevertheless I am delighted that the arrangement does include all those pensioners who come under the various federal pension schemes, such as federal superannuates, retired RCMP personnel, retired members of the Armed Forces and others. I am glad that they too will benefit from this announcement.

Speaking of pensioners, it is good to have this problem solved. It is one of two problems about which I have been bugging this minister for a long time. I hope the minister will soon rise in his place and make a similarly favourable announcement concerning increases in the pensions of our federal superannuates.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like, in my turn, to thank the President of the Treasury Board for sending us a copy of his statement in good French.

I should also like to thank the government for having accepted, for once, a National Joint Council's recommendation. We sometimes feel that the government pays little attention to its employees, but the decision it has just taken shows that it followed the recommendation resulting from previous studies to the effect that it should protect its employees' health by paying 50 per cent of the direct premium for medicare.

I hope also that the government will pursue the same course and consider the problem of the retired employees, as suggested by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce that there has been a discussion among the representatives of the parties with respect to the special order for the debate which we will have under way today and Monday. It is proposed that, for the purpose of debate on government order No. 32, Standing Order 31(1) shall be suspended and that the following time limits shall apply to debate on the item: no member shall speak for more than 20 minutes in the said debate, except that the first spokesman for each of the parties may speak for not more than 40 minutes.

This is not part of the order, but by way of exhortation I should also like to point out that I think it was agreed that nobody—and this means nobody—would seek an extension of those time limits. Perhaps the House would agree not to give any extension so that the maximum number of members might participate in this limited debate.

I have decided, even though the motion is in my name, to defer giving the House my views on the matter and I give way to the Minister of Finance to move the motion on my behalf.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking for a correction in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought the hon. member was rising for the purpose of participating in discussion of the proposed motion of the President of the Privy Council. I should first ascertain whether the proposed order is agreed to by the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DOMINION COAL BOARD DISSOLUTION ACT

MEASURE TO DISSOLVE

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-161, to provide for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the minister shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

POTASH—POSSIBLE U.S. IMPORT PENALTY—FREIGHT RATE INCREASE—EXPORT BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the very real fears of the potash industry in Saskatchewan and the people of that province that the United States may impose a mandatory penalty against the import of Canadian potash which would cost the Canadian industry millions of dollars and, in effect, the province, can the minister tell us whether he has undertaken any talks with United States authorities in order to deal with this threat?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): There have been talks before, Mr. Speaker. The regulations announced by the Premier of Saskatchewan last week are being studied now by different departments of the government, the Department of Justice, my department and others. They are being studied by the government and a commentary will be made when that study is completed.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in light of the recent announcement by Canadian National Railways of its plan to raise rates on the shipment of potash by 6 per cent, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the government to indicate to this Crown corporation the government's desire that it exercise restraint in increasing its rates in view of the threat of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will discuss that with the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Does he propose to interest himself in this proposed increase in freight rates affecting potash industry? Has he received any representations and, if so, what action does he propose to take?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received no direct representations. I do understand, however, that authorities in Saskatchewan have contacted the Canadian Transport Commission. I understand that subsequently a meeting has been arranged between representatives of Saskatchewan and officials of the railways and that it is to be held on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention of the government or is the government giving active consideration in co-operation with the government of Saskatchewan, if necessary, to establishing an export board to market potash and to develop new markets, for example, in eastern European nations?

Mr. Pepin: That would be included in what I said would be the commentary of the government on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, has the government determined if the minimum price for potash of $18.75 per ton to be enforced by the province of Saskatchewan makes it more difficult to deal with the U.S. anti-dumping decision and is the government making any representations to the government of Saskatchewan on this matter?

Mr. Pepin: The whole question is very difficult, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Is the government of Canada now interesting itself, vis-à-vis the government of the United States, in protecting Canadian interests in this whole question inasmuch as it is a decision of the United States tariff board which will be applied against Canada? It is in respect of this particular point that I think the federal government should be having discussions with the United States government.

Mr. Pepin: There was extensive discussion before the decision was made by the government of the United States. I personally telephoned the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, so the decision was made by the United States after the Canadian point of view had been put forward to them.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency and importance of this matter, would the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce consider making a statement on motions in the near future?

Mr. Pepin: I will consider that, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK PROFITS—INQUIRY AS TO OBJECTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising from the announcement this morning that the profits of the Bank of Montreal have increased by almost 20 per cent. This is the third bank to make such an announcement. In view of the government's policy of restraint, has the minister raised any objection concerning banks' rates and these excessive increases? If so, can he indicate what the response has been?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): It is very difficult to make objections to people because of increases in profits. I hope my hon. friend has noticed that the federal government's share of the profits of the Bank of Montreal through taxation went up to $37 million, more than half the profits. The shareholders will benefit, but the government of Canada and the people of Canada through the taxation levied will also benefit.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the minister's reply that it is the policy of the minister to encourage the profit margins of Canadian banks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary clearly is argumentative.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary—

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, a non-argumentative supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, is it then the policy of the government to encourage high rates of interest so that it will be able to collect more taxes from the banks?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I think it is the whole policy of the government's high interest rates that is responsible. I can see that I am embarrassing the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Clearly we are getting into the realm of argument. I do not think the matter should be pursued at this time. The hon. member has given notice of his intention to debate the matter at the time of adjournment.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

LETTER FROM MR. SAULNIER TO PRIME MINISTER—ACTION BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. My information is that Mr. Saulnier stated that he wrote a letter in April, May or June to the Prime Minister setting out the situation in connection with the Company of Young Canadians and the degree to which the group to which he referred was acting outside of the law. I ask the minister whether a copy of that letter was delivered to him as Solicitor General and was it placed in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for their attention?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Did I understand the hon. member correctly to refer to a letter I am alleged to have written to the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bell: Here we go again.

Mr. Woolliams: Put him in the Senate, Pierre; he needs it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister needs another hearing aid. Was the letter which Mr. Saulnier says was sent to the Prime Minister in April, May or June, in connection with the extraordinary and seditious activities of certain members of the CYC, brought to his attention and did he in consequence instruct the RCMP to act thereon?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made certain assertions about a letter. I have no knowledge of such a letter, and I do not believe such a letter was written.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister: did he receive such a letter and will he table it in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot remember ever having read such a letter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I may say, Mr. Speaker, that no such letter was ever sent or received.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sometimes people forget, even in matters of great consequence. Would the Prime Minister have a search made to see whether such a letter was received and, if so, will he have it tabled in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, surely the letter is hypothetical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not as far as Mr. Saulnier is concerned.

Mr. Trudeau: I have not heard that Mr. Saulnier ever said he wrote me a letter to that effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister answer this simple question: Will he have a search made—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to see whether it is lost and, if not, will he table it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I still want to ask a supplementary question, if I may. Refreshing his memory may help the Prime Minister. Are they hiding something?

Mr. Trudeau: I think the right hon. member may be alluding to the fact that yesterday I said that Mr. Saulnier had talked to me or had informed me about certain things, but this was not in writing; it was at the time I met him in Montreal. I know of no such letter, and if there were such a letter I would not hide it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And would not find it.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know if the right hon. member feels that somebody is trying to hide him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe other hon. members have supplementary questions.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I wonder if he would care to look under his bed to see whether the letter happens to be filed there?

An hon. Member: That is what you are around for.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the government does not intend to look for the letter because it is embarrassing.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I have a further supplementary question for the Solicitor General. When did the minister receive the report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the Montreal riots?

Mr. McIlraith: To which particular riots is the hon. member referring? I receive reports from the RCMP very frequently, several times a week.

Mr. Paproski: I have a further supplementary question. On what day did the minister receive the report?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question. The subject is of such importance that I believe I should answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We do not appear to be making much headway in this exchange of questions and answers. We will try the hon. member for York North.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I have to ask for the co-operation of the hon. member for York North. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre is seeking the floor.

Mr. Paproski: I should like to make a clarification and say that the riot about which I am concerned was on October 7, but since the minister has already said he has received reports I should like to ask him a further supplementary question, if I may. Would he give consideration to giving the reports to the committee investigating the Company of Young Canadians?

Mr. McIlraith: If the hon. gentleman, as he now indicates, is referring to the riots on October 7, I had reports of those during the time they were taking place and several times the next day and the following day. Those reports were verbal reports to me and were not in writing, but the matter was fully and carefully reported by the RCMP during the whole of the day on which it started, October 7, and on subsequent days.

[Mr. Walker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Now that we have disposed of the point of order, I recognize the hon. member for York North.

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the confusion, I wonder if the Solicitor General would consider planting the right hon. member for Prince Albert in the CYC as an undercover agent to supply us with all the facts?

[Translation]

SOURCE OF REPORTS RECEIVED BY RCMP

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Solicitor General.

In view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Justice to the effect that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had received reports about the activities of the Company of Young Canadians in the province of Quebec, could he tell the House whether the RCMP sent him any reports from provinces other than Quebec?

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. member is under a misapprehension. As I read Hansard, the reports to which he is referring were discussed in the House yesterday during the question period. These reports arise out of material seized immediately after the October 7 disturbance in Montreal, and that information has been coming forward from time to time since October 29 from the Montreal police to the RCMP. The major part has come after November 20. That information is passed on immediately, after the RCMP have looked at it, to the law officers of the Crown for an analysis and their opinion on it. I might add that this material is still coming and more of it is anticipated—

Mr. Woolliams: It will keep coming.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Calgary North seems to know a great deal about it.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister should know a lot more.

Mr. McIlraith: There is more of it to come, and until its examination is completed and the evidence is completed I do not think I will have much more to say to the House.

As to the question whether other documents came from other provinces, I do not see how documents of that nature could come, and the answer would have to be a simple no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow one further and last supplementary question because we do have to go on to other subjects.

Mr. Paproski: I wonder if the Solicitor General can say whether he is aware that the riots and all the other problems that have arisen in Montreal are part of a well organized plan by the international communist movement?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General would not be so irresponsible as to say that all other problems in Montreal are due to this factor. He would not give any such opinion.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED INVASION OF BUSINESS BY MAFIA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has he received any report of a statement made within the last day or two by a high officer of the John Howard Society in Vancouver that the Mafia have invaded the business field, particularly the small loans sector and, if so, what is being done about it?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): I have noted the statement, Mr. Speaker. It has been drawn to my attention but I am not in a position to make any report on the assertion, and indeed I think the hon. member will realize it would be inappropriate for me to say what has been done about the statement. The subject matter has been drawn to my attention, and the subject matter is of concern and is receiving attention.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Am I to assume that somehow it is being investigated by our police force?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, it has never been the practice here for ministers to say what suspicions of offences are being investigated. There is a very good reason for that, and that is why I tried to avoid answering that question.

POLLUTION

NON-PHOSPHATE DETERGENT RESEARCH

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the Solicitor General a rest by addressing this question to his seatmate, the President of the Treasury Board. Would he be prepared to direct the National Research Council to undertake a crash program of research into finding a non-phosphate detergent in view of the widely expressed concern that detergents containing phosphate should be banned from use and in view of the fact that statements by the industry indicate that no substitute is on the immediate horizon?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, a very considerable amount of work is being put into discovering or trying to find detergents which do not have the undesirable effects of the current phosphate ones. I do not know all the work that is being done, but I would be glad to find out and inform the hon. member.

SHIPBUILDING

APPROVAL OF CONTRACT TO DAVIE SHIPBUILDING LIMITED

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Has the federal government approved a $50 million contract awarded to Davie Shipbuilding for the construction of 24 freighters?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board why the federal government has deferred its approval of the $50 million contract awarded to Davie Shipbuilding?

Mr. Speaker: Order! I think that the information requested by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe should normally be given in a statement on motions.

If the minister wishes to answer the hon. member's question, he might do so immediately.

[English]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say I have no knowledge of such contract.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNITED NATIONS

RE-ELECTION OF CANADA TO CERTAIN BODIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps the minister would like to take it as notice. Is it the policy of the government not to seek re-election to the Industrial Development Board of the United Nations and the Committee on Program Co-ordination for Economic and Social Development because of a reassessment of priorities due to the staff freeze resulting from the current austerity program? Further, if the minister is to take this question as notice, I have a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fairweather: What is the rationalization—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member proceeds with the supplementary, perhaps I might be of assistance to him by suggesting to him that both the question and the supplementary be put on the Order Paper.

THE MINISTRY

ACTIVITIES OF PRIME MINISTER'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the recently disclosed information that the principal secretary to the Prime Minister is acting as secretary of an organization of 50,000 Liberals, a new and potent political arm, is the Prime Minister satisfied that this secretary, as capable as he may be, is able to carry on his public service duties which are about the most highly priced in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Waterloo.

Mr. Bell: No, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have to assume that I do not accept the question as being one that can be asked at this time. If the hon. member thinks there is urgency to the question it could be debated at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Bell: May I rephrase my question, Sir, if it is not in order. With your indulgence, sir, may I ask the Prime Minister if this principal secretary is engaging in these political duties and, if so, is he still carrying on his duties as one of the highest priced public servants in Canada?

[Mr. Drury.]

Mr. Speaker: The question should be placed on the Order Paper.

STUDENT LOANS

ALLEGED REFUSAL BY BANKS TO LEND TO CHILDREN OF WELFARE FAMILIES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has his attention been drawn to a statement by a Liberal member of the Quebec National Assembly who charged that banks are refusing student loans to children of welfare families and, if so, does he intend to make representations to the banks?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into the matter. It had not been drawn to my attention. I would hope such is not the case. I think the student loans program instituted by this government has worked very well, even though it is administered by the provinces—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: —and we would hope it would continue to work that way.

FINANCE

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING SELECTIVE BANK LOAN POLICIES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary but perhaps broader question to the Minister of Finance. Is he holding discussions with his friend, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in order to have the banks institute selective lending policies so as to ease the effects of monetary stringencies in slow growth areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a supplementary question, but as the question has been asked perhaps the minister might be allowed to answer it.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the banks have been urged to do this both by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and by myself publicly. May I say that I would like to get away from the idea that the Minister of Finance runs the banks in Canada. The banks are run by their shareholders and officers, and my dealings with them are through the Governor of the Bank of Canada who is responsible for banking generally in this country.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Governor of the Bank of Canada claims not to be in agreement with selective lending policies in regional areas, could the minister indicate what plans he has to resolve this conflict between himself and the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think what my hon. friend has said is exactly contrary to conversations I have had with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I would be pleased to look into the matter but I know that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has urged the banks not to impose as severe restrictions in areas of development in this country. I know that to be the case because it has been done in my presence.

HOUSING

PUBLIC HOUSING, URBAN RENEWAL—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of housing. Can we expect his long awaited statement on guidelines for public housing and urban renewal before the Christmas recess? If not, would he state the reason why not?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think I will be able to make some statement on both matters before the Christmas recess. The delay has been caused by long consultations with my counterparts in the provincial governments. We are receiving their recommendations now, and they will be carefully considered. We have not yet received them all. I think there will be further consultations with them before we make any definitive statement but I would hope, if it is at all possible, to make such a statement before the Christmas recess.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL

REDUCTION OF PERMANENT SECRETARIAT—
EMPLOYMENT OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the bearer of good news, the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns the representations which the minister said he was receiving from the Economic Council of Canada concerning proposed reduction of its staff and the curtailment of its contracts with outside consultants. Can the minister advise if the representations of this important and valuable body have received favourable consideration.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, representations were received some time ago and an answer was made to the Economic Council of Canada, the nature of which I outlined some few days ago in the House.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask very simply if the answer was favourable, such as that given to the Auditor General, particularly considering how much the government needs economic advice?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the definition of "favourable" is a very subjective one and perhaps depends a bit on where you sit.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON FARM LOAN PAYMENTS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the serious economic plight of the Canadian agricultural industry at the present time, would the minister give serious considering to declaring a one-year moratorium on interest and principal payments on farm improvement loans, Farm Credit Corporation loans and farm machinery syndicate loans?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this has not been considered at the present time, but I would be glad to look into the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is looking into that, would he give some consideration to the establishment of regulations governing the spread between what banks pay for money and what they charge for money?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to look into any suggestion made by the hon. member.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COST OF BORROWING IN CANADIAN MONEY MARKET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can he explain to the House how it is that in the face of the government's monetary and fiscal restraint policies the cost of borrowing in the Canadian money market hit an all-time high last week all across the board?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that situation is not confined to the Canadian money market but obtains throughout the world.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DELIVERY OF RELIEF SUPPLIES TO BIAFRA

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Following the conversations he had last evening with the heads of Canairelief, can the Prime Minister indicate whether the government is seriously considering participating directly in the flying in of food to Biafra during the night hours?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add beyond what I said in my speech, that we are looking at alternative methods of ensuring the relief of starving people.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board in his capacity as Acting Minister of National Defence. Have any preparations been made for the invasion of Montreal this weekend by the Saskatchewan Roughriders?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as a Montrealer I can say that adequate preparations have been made for their repulse.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, In the likely event that the defenders of Montreal are routed, have preparations been made to establish evacuation centres in the Ungava region?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY ORDER RESPECTING FROST DAMAGE TO FLOWERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is of great and immediate urgency to the florist industry of western Canada and arises from an order which has been made by the CPR, which I understand is also to be adopted by the CNR, whereby consignees of flowers henceforth will be required to take the risk of frost damage. This practically strikes a death blow at the florist industry. Have representations been made to the minister and will he bring those representations to the attention of the railways?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in this particular case I saw a most awesome demonstration of flower power. A protest was received yesterday along with a very nice bunch of roses. As a result, since this was done in such an amiable fashion, I have arranged for a meeting between the parties concerned and the railways. I believe that will be taking place on Monday. I have also indicated my sympathy for the florists in this matter.

INVESTIGATION OF MR. SAULNIER'S STATEMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General whether, following the statements made by Mr. Saulnier to the Prime Minister last spring, the Solicitor General at any time gave instructions or launched any sort of investigation with respect to any of these charges or matters arising out of any of these charges?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the information, as I understand it, was not in the nature of a charge or anything like that. There has been full information communicated to the Solicitor General and appropriate action taken throughout.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want to make sure the Solicitor General understands me. What I asked was whether, following the receipt of this information or these charges from Mr. Saulnier—perhaps the Prime Minister may prefer to answer this question—the Solicitor General launched an investigation or gave instructions with regard to any such investigation?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should, I think, deal with the matter this way. The hon. member is asking whether we launched an investigation. The work of the police authorities in this kind of activity relates to persons. The information was passed on to me; therefore discussion of the action being taken by the police in connection with the whole matter, intensified examination of any information they had and steps they should take to perfect what information they had, relates to persons. There is great confusion, I notice, in the question between persons and certain companies or organizations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask it so as not to be unfair to the Solicitor General or misinterpret him. As I understand it, he has not given any instructions leading to an investigation into those charges but has simply examined information or documents that may have been sent to him?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not a correct summary of the situation at all.

POSSIBILITY OF LIMITING CERTAIN ACTIVITIES

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. It has to do more with the present than with the past, in connection with the activities of the Company of Young Canadians.

Considering the serious nature of some of the charges or allegations made with regard to the activities of the CYC, would the Prime Minister inform the House whether the government has already considered the means at its disposal to curtail or limit some of the activities of the CYC until such time as the act may be amended?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether it is at present in the government's power to freeze certain funds placed at the disposal of the Company should it deem it advisable.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have studied that question. As the measures we could take under the act did not seem sufficient to us, we decided to refer to the committee of the House all questions related to the organization and to the structure of the Company of Young Canadians.

[English]

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General seem to have successfully thrown out a fogscreen, will the Solicitor General make a statement, consistent with his responsibilities, carefully outlining what did happen and what action was taken?

Mr. Trudeau: The fog is over there, with the opposition.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, there has been no fogscreen thrown out. The situation is that certain evidence is being given now before a committee of this House. It has also been stated that certain evidence has come from one police force to the federal police authority and that it is being examined by the law officers of the Crown. Until the examination of that information is complete and the work of the committee of this House is complete, I do not think any useful purpose would be served by the Solicitor General making such statement at this time.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary to the Solicitor General. It is not about information that may be coming to the responsible minister. Is it not a fact that the anti-subversive squad in Montreal is a three-party group made up of provincial, city and federal police authorities, the latter being the RCMP, and that they have been in on all these anti-subversive seizures and searches?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was going to say that the question was asked in an argumentative way, but it has been replied to. We have just three minutes left before the end of the question period.

HOUSING

UNITED CHURCH PROPOSAL RESPECTING RENT SUBSIDIES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the minister in charge of housing. In line with the proposal of the United Church of Canada, will the minister try to get a cabinet decision to permit him to use the $28 million now earmarked for a Canadian Pentagon to provide, instead, rent subsidies of $1,000 each to 28,000 Canadian low income families?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is rather in the form of a representation and to that extent I suggest it is not in order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

WABUSH—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FACILITIES FOR LANDING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to answer a question directed to him by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador a few days ago regarding statements made by officials of Quebecair raising serious doubts about the safety of the airport at Wabush, Labrador?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to assure the hon. member and the House that, as I explained to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications yesterday, with the navigational aids that are provided at Wabush and with operation in accordance with operating procedures established by the Department of Transport, flight operations at Wabush can be conducted safely at the same high standards as those in effect at other commercial airports across Canada.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PLACING OF SERVICEMEN'S GROUP INSURANCE WITH U.S. ACQUIRED CANADIAN COMPANY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister ready to answer the question I addressed to him on October 31 as to how and why group life insurance for the Canadian Armed Forces, worth between $1 billion and $2 billion, has been given to a foreign controlled insurance firm?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not only did I answer that question, Mr. Speaker, but I also indicated at the time that I believed a similar question was on the Order Paper and was going to be answered by the Minister of National Defence.

PENITENTIARIES

SALARY INCREASE FOR CORRECTIONAL STAFF

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the discontent of the penitentiary correctional staff over the proposed salary increase of 2 per cent, will the minister have this matter reviewed in the hope that these important public servants may be awarded a living wage?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the course of collective bargaining, like that of true love, is not always smooth. We are in the midst of collective bargaining negotiations.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF WHITE PAPER ON TAXATION REFORM

Hon. E. J. Benson (for the President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the whitepaper entitled Proposals for Tax Reform, tabled in the House on November 7, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is, I believe, very important in two respects. First, in referring proposals for changes in the tax system to a committee of the House for detailed discussion and for hearings before a bill is drafted, we are breaking new ground in Canada. The importance of this motion also stems from the fact that the white paper contains proposals for the most substantial reform of the Canadian income tax system since the Income War Tax Act was first introduced 52 years ago.

I will not catalogue all the proposals today because the white paper has been in member's hands for three weeks. Also, members were able to obtain some clarification of the proposals in a question and answer period immediately before the paper was made public. However, I do want to review the objectives which the government had in mind in framing these proposals. I will mention a few of the more important proposals by which we hope to attain those objectives.

First, we believe that there must be a fair distribution of the tax burden based on ability to pay. In keeping with this objective we have recommended that basic exemptions be increased to $1,400 from $1,000 for single taxpayers and to $2,800 from $2,000 for married taxpayers. We have also recommended that mothers with jobs be permitted to deduct child care expenses and secondly, that a general deduction be granted for employment expenses up to a maximum of $150. Further, our most fundamental proposal is that capital gains be brought to tax and that capital losses be deductible. Taken together the tax proposals would eliminate taxes for 750,000 Canadians. They would reduce taxes for another 3,000,000. About 800,000 would pay virtually the same tax, and to finance the relief to the lower income groups about 3,000,000 would pay more.

Our second objective was to see that the tax system interfered as little as possible with economic growth and productivity. Expenditure programs which tax finance foster economic and intellectual growth and the security of Canadians. But taxes taken by themselves interfere with economic growth and productivity. It has been one of our goals to try to design an income tax system which would interfere as little as possible with incentives to work and invest and with the direction our economy follows in meeting demands of consumers and other markets. In this connection we propose to give Canadian shareholders credit for half or all of the Canadian income taxes paid by their corporations, depending on whether they are widely held or closely held corporations.

Mr. Lewis: May I rise on a point of order? I hope this will not sound offensive to the minister because I do not intend it to be. I wish he would deliver his speech a little more slowly, perhaps by paying a little less attention to the extensive notes that he is looking at, in order that we may follow him.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to speak more slowly.

Mr. Lewis: I just want him to—

Mr. Benson: I hope hon. members will sympathize with me because I have a cold today and it is rather difficult to speak as loudly as I otherwise would.

We also propose to extend tax incentives to the mining and oil industries, although in a more direct and less costly way.

Keeping the tax system simple is an uphill battle, but we have tried. The growing complexity of our society and our economy requires a lot of rules if the tax system is to be fair. Nevertheless, we have tried to remove as many complexities as possible. For example, we propose to replace the surtaxes, the abatements and special taxes which have grown up over the past 15 to 20 years with a single, simple rate schedule. This would simplify tax calculations for all Canadians. Our proposals to bring capital gains into income include rules to reduce the difficulty of complying with the law. They would remove many of the uncertainties of the present system. Now, a taxpayer is often unsure of the tax results of a particular transaction. He fears that unless he hires sophisticated advisers who can twist the transaction, he will pay substantially more tax than others with advisers.

This ties in with another very important fact concerning our tax system. Ours is basically a self-assessment system in which the vast majority of our taxpayers comply in all respects with the tax laws. Our system must encourage them to continue to do so. The best encouragement is to demonstrate clearly that others in similar or better economic circumstances will bear their fair share of the tax. This can only be accomplished by closing loopholes in the law, and by treating capital gains as income.

A final important goal is to design a tax system that the provincial governments will adopt for their income taxes. For the past 30 years the tax systems of the federal and provincial governments have developed in fairly good harmony. Should some provincial governments step out in another direction, Canadians would find it more difficult to comply. The time spent on their annual task of preparing returns might be doubled. And for those taxpayers who have interests in more than one province, there might be overlapping and double taxation. Since the publication of the royal commission report, we have met often with provincial ministers and officials to discuss the commission's proposals, and the provinces have made their views known to us. We have had those views in mind in the preparation of these proposals. Now, the government plans to continue this process by consulting the provinces about the white paper. The first meeting of ministers will take place about two weeks from now.

I should also like to mention at this point that in bringing forth the proposals for tax reforms, it was not intended to solve the problems of distribution of tax revenues between the provinces and the federal government. All the proposals are intended to do is build a fair system of taxation as a basis for taxing income in Canada. The distribution of tax revenue between the provinces and the federal government is another matter, and one which will undoubtedly be under continuing discussion, but it is not basic to these proposals.

Taxation Reform

I mentioned earlier that we are following a new procedure in referring the reform proposals to a committee of the House. This procedure will permit interested Canadians to put forward their views concerning the proposed Canadian tax system and to bring to the attention of Parliament and the government particular situations in which for some reason the proposals might have anomalous results.

The white paper has also been referred to a committee of the other place. I hope that the two committees will co-ordinate their activities so that their programs for hearing witnesses do not conflict. I propose at some appropriate stage to bring in an amendment which, if accepted, would enable the committee to obtain staff as necessary to assist them in carrying out their examination of these tax proposals and also to study the numerous briefs which, no doubt, will be submitted.

We believe that the proposals outlined in the white paper would produce a good tax system, a system substantially better than the one we now have. Indeed, we believe that it would be a system better suited to the Canadian situation than any of the systems in other countries. But we do not suggest it is a perfect system. If Canadians, including members of the opposition, can put forward ways in which these proposals could be improved, the government will be quick to adopt them. What we are bringing forward, and I have said this before, are proposals for tax reform. We are in no way bound by these proposals; indeed, I have made it clear from the day they were brought forward that we want hon. members of this House and all other Canadians with suggestions to offer, to make them known for consideration.

I now wish to bring to the attention of hon. members two of the modifications which we are prepared to make. I think it is important to clear up a couple of the situations dealt with in the white paper. The first concerns a modification of details in the proposals concerning the application of capital gains tax to bonds and mortgages. In the white paper, it was recommended that if the value of a bond or mortgage held by a taxpayer was less on valuation day than the cost to him of that investment—or his amortized cost, if he bought at a discount—the recovery cost or amortized cost would not be taxed. As originally phrased, this rule would only have applied to bonds held on white paper day. It is now proposed that the same treatment be accorded to bonds and mortgages purchased between November 7 and valuation day. This would ensure that a market dip extending through valuation day would not cause taxpayers who buy bonds and mortgages now to pay tax on more than the yield they had expected at the time of their purchase.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: This should remove an uncertainty which might otherwise have complicated the marketing of new bond issues and bond trading between now and valuation day.

Mr. Stanfield: Better market those bonds.

Mr. Benson: Would you like to hear about the success of the new Canada Savings Bonds—the largest amount ever raised in an issue?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: And the highest interest rate.

Mr. Benson: The second example concerns dividends passing from a gas, steam or electric utility company to its parent company. At present, 95 per cent of the tax paid by these companies on their utility profits is turned over to the provinces, and the white paper proposes that it all be turned over in the future, that is, 100 per cent. Consequently, there would not be any net federal tax for which shareholders could be given credit. If the proposals were applied literally, there would be a federal tax on a dividend from a utility company to its parent, even though the provinces had received a tax of 48 per cent on the utility profits. This would be adjusted to 50 per cent when the 100 per cent of the tax is paid over. Individual Canadian shareholders of the parent company would receive credit for their share of this tax. However, the cash flow of the company would be reduced and shareholders who were either under a pension plan or not resident in Canada would not receive credit for their share of the tax. The government is prepared to remedy this situation. We would provide that a parent company can receive tax-free a dividend from a subsidiary that is a gas, steam or electric utility provided the dividend is paid out of profits which have borne the tax we are turning over to the province.

Naturally, these are not the only questions which have been raised with me in the past three weeks. Indeed, they are not the questions which have been raised most often. I should like to comment now on two or three of the most popular questions.

In my discussions with Canadians across the country I have been told the same story over and over again by taxpayers in the middle income group. They do not mind paying a little more in taxes if in doing so they will lighten the load for those with low incomes. But they want to be sure that those who are better off than they are will be pulling their weight.

Naturally, they are concerned when suggestions are made that taxes will go up more for those with middle incomes than for those in the upper income group. Comments like these are misleading. They ignore completely the effect on the upper income group of bringing capital gains into income.

When estimating the effects of the white paper proposals, we used a carefully constructed sample of 100,000 personal income tax returns from 1967, with adjustments to reflect the number of 1969 taxpayers, their incomes and tax rates. This sample is representative of the whole tax-paying population. By calculating the tax for each of those returns under the white paper proposals, we were able to derive the over-all revenue and incidence effects. With capital gains, we relied on the relationship between dividends received and capital gains, and to some extent on United States experience. But we believe the results are as good an estimate as can be derived.

The computer runs show the average increase or decrease in tax for taxpayers in various income brackets when all of the changes, including capital gains, are taken into account. They show that taxpayers now in the $10,000 to $15,000 income group would pay average increases in income taxes of $210. This includes both single and married taxpayers—all taxpayers. In the $15,000 to $20,000 group the average increase is $420; between $20,000 and $25,000, it is $445; between $25,000 and $50,000, it is $870, and for those with incomes over $50,000, the average increase would be $1,820. So, when we include the provisions concerning capital gains, we find it is a progressive tax up the scale; there is no upward movement affecting the middle income group particularly. There may be individual taxpayers, not realizing capital gains, who would not face as large an increase, but the upper income group as a whole would pay their share of the cost of the tax relief proposed for the low income groups. Let me say that the wealthy understand this. They have told me so—in Calgary and elsewhere.

Mr. Woolliams: They told you in Calgary, all right.

Mr. Benson: I would also point out that the reduction in the top rate from 80 per cent to 50 per cent would cost some $40 million while the revenue from capital gains, which will be derived largely from the same group of people, would amount to some $340 million. This confirms the data produced by the computer runs which I have just mentioned.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Taxpayers have also asked about the proposal that certain assets be revalued every five years. In view of some comments which seem to assume that all assets would be taxed every five years, it should be made crystal clear that this proposal applies only to the shares of widely-held Canadian corporations—the shares which give rise to half-rate gains. The proposal does not apply to any other class of asset. In particular, it would not apply to the shares of closely-held private corporations. The shares of public companies are readily marketable. Therefore, taxpayers can realize their gain or loss fairly readily at the time of their own choosing. In a manner of speaking, they would be on a voluntary tax system. The government feels that some limit to this type of postponement is desirable in order to distribute the tax burden fairly between those who own such shares and those who do not.

A revaluation every five years would reduce the lock-in effect. By "lock-in", I means the pressure on taxpayers to hold on to assets all their lives to avoid tax at the time of sale. This might interfere with the free working of the capital market. Periodic revaluation also has some technical advantages that are detailed in the white paper, and I refer hon. members to them.

We recognize that is is a new idea to Canadians, and that those who own shares in widely-held corporations may need some time to grow accustomed to it. Here again this is a matter that I think will receive a great deal of discussion, and rightly so, before the committee of the House.

I might also say that one of the difficulties that arises when one moves into the taxation of capital gains is that governments want at some time to realize the tax on the gain. If one is allowing a roll-over of the property—this applies to all property mentioned in the proposals—at death, it would be possible for someone to hold shares in widely-held public corporations, hold on to them through several generations with a consequent great increase in value, and the tax would never be collected. I believe that in the case of trusts in Britain there is now a periodic revaluation. In the United States, partially because of this sort of problem, I understand they are now proposing to put a limit on the life of a trust.

It is a difficult problem to deal with. One might say that one should only collect the tax when the securities are sold. If one did that and allowed a roll-over at death, which would not force people to pay the gains tax and the estate tax at death, the shares in question might pass through the hands of several generations without tax being collected on the increment in value, whereas other Canadians would be paying tax on the increment in value of other assets of which they had disposed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, at this point may I ask the minister a question. He dealt only with shares in widely-held corporations and closely-held corporations. Would this five year revaluation also apply to land, and other assets of that sort?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker, it would not apply to any other assets. Under the proposals put forward by the government in the white paper, it would apply only to shares in widely held corporations.

The third issue that has been raised with me in the past three weeks concerns so-called small business. In fact, as the discussion progresses it becomes clear that the real issue involved is the 21 per cent rate of tax that now applies to the first $35,000 of annual profits earned by a corporation.

It is important that we understand just exactly what we are discussing here. We are not discussing the businessman who runs the service station or the corner store. These people are not incorporated as a rule, so very few of them get any benefit from the 21 per cent corporate tax rate.

In 1967 over 450,000 Canadians paid tax on their business profits at personal rates because they were unincorporated. This group includes about 50,000 doctors, lawyers and other professionals who are barred from incorporating. However, this leaves 400,000 other business men who did not get any benefit from the low corporate tax rate. These, I believe, are the real small businesses in Canada.

Compared with the figure of 400,000 individual businesses, only 94,000 corporations paid tax in 1967. Of these, only 46,000 had assets under $100,000. These figures correspond with my experience when I was practising some time ago. Very few of my clients had the 21 per cent rate in mind when they went into business. Most of them went into business for other reasons and then incorporated to take advantage of the 21 per cent rate when the businesses concerned began to do really well. When they got to the point where they saw they could save money by paying the 21 per cent rate, whether or not they needed the money in the business, they would incorporate to postpone tax; and at interest rates that run up to 10 per cent, a postponement of taxes is very valuable.

Let us now try to put this 21 per cent rate in perspective. Under the existing system, an unincorporated proprietor or a wage earner encounters a tax rate of 23½ per cent as soon as his taxable income reaches $2,000. Just as Canadians want to be assured that the wealthy are paying their fair share of taxes, these proprietors, these small businessmen, these 400,000 unincorporated people, who are paying taxes as individuals, must be shown that those who own corporations are also paying their fair share.

The proposed system contains higher exemptions and rates have been raised to focus the benefit of those exemptions on the lower income groups. As a result the first rate in the schedule will be 21¾ per cent. Therefore, the 21 per cent rate for corporations would be even more unusual under the new system than was the case previously.

Some commentators have suggested that every incorporated business would suddenly face an increase in tax rate from 21 per cent to 50 per cent. This indicates that they have not understood the white paper. It is clearly indicated in the paper that the profits of closely-held corporations would bear tax only at the personal tax rate of the shareholders. In some cases, this would be accomplished by treating the corporation as a partnership, and in other cases by giving shareholders full credit for the tax.

What would this mean in some typical cases of corporations owned by a taxpayer with $3,000 of exemptions and deductions? This would be a married taxpayer, presumably with no children and with a $3,000 deduction. Suppose it was a really small corporation, with profits of, say $8,000 before the owner's salary, and the owner drew $6,000 in salary and left $2,000 in the corporation. Under the proposed system, the $2,000 would bear tax of 30 per cent instead of 21 per cent, or $600 instead of $420. This represents a difference of $180 for someone with a $8,000 income in the corporation.

If the company earned enough to pay the owner $6,000 in salary and still have $10,000 profit left, the proposal would increase the net tax on the $10,000 to 34 per cent from 21 per cent, or $3,400 instead of $2,100.

The only cases in which the rate would go from 21 per cent to 50 per cent would be cases where the shareholder had other income of $27,000 or more. And may I point out that the 30 per cent rate, the 34 per cent rate and the 50 per cent rate are the same rates as are paid by others with the same income who do not have a corporation.

The government feels that its proposed system is a fairer way of taxing small businesses, by giving the lower rates to shareholders with small incomes, which can file as a partnership, rather than to corporations which may have small incomes but be owned by Canadians with very large incomes. Nevertheless, it recognizes that the proposals represent a significant change. It is for this reason that we have proposed that the change proposed in the paper be phased in over five years.

I should also like to point out that comparing the 21 per cent rate with the 50 per cent rate is not quite fair in the case of closely-held corporations. The 21 per cent rate as it existed was the rate that the corporation paid. The way the money would be taken out of the corporation ultimately was either through the application of section 105 of the Income Tax Act, or through the services of a broker. In the latter case, a tax of 16⅔ per cent was involved, as one found out when taxing people who had gone through dividend strips, and made their claim stick. If the money were taken out through the application of section 105, one would take half of the money out by way of dividends, pay tax on them, and then take the other half out by paying a flat rate of 15 per cent.

So that the effective rate was not 21 per cent. The money was put into the shareholders' hands, but the rate was somewhat closer to 40 per cent or above. The important thing was the postponement of tax, a very advantageous procedure and one that is not justifiable in circumstances where someone is paying a 21 per cent tax on his first tax dollar of income in the future. However, as I said, these three questions I have mentioned are questions on which there has been wide discussion and on which we should like to see discussion in the committee. I am sure we can anticipate lengthy discussion in the committee.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Wahn: Would the minister permit a question, please?

Mr. Benson: I am just about finished.

The last item I should like to discuss is the increase in personal exemptions. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said in Edmonton last week that the really poor in this country do not pay income tax anyway. The proposed exemptions would mean that a single man with an income of $1,500 would be exempt. It would also mean that a married man with two children would be exempt on $3,500. In my opinion, people in these circumstances are relatively poor in Canada. I think it is a step in the right direction to be able to take the 750,000 people in these categories off the tax rolls of our country.

I am not claiming that tax reform is going to solve all of the social problems of our country, the problems of people on low income. Through tax reform the only people you can help are people who pay taxes. The other side of the coin has to be looked at in a review of social welfare schemes and systems in existence within the country. Indeed there is a committee of the cabinet, as you know, considering the Willard Report. They have been looking into this matter and ultimately will produce ideas on this side.

All I have been trying to do here is provide a fair and equitable tax system. We in Government believe that the system proposed is a good one. As I said, it is being put forward as a proposal for discussion, to be brought into study whereby it will be accepted by Canadians as being a good tax system.

Certainly, I can indicate to the committee that my department officials will be pleased to give all the assistance we can in order that the committee of the House of Commons may have hearings which are informed and have full explanations regarding any problems that may arise from the white paper. I think if all of us work in conjunction with the committee, then we will have acceptable legislation. We can use the proposal as a basis to be adjusted and end up with a tax system in Canada which Canadians will say is more fair and equitable than the present tax system and yet will not stifle the economic growth of our country. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question which is prompted by the presence in the gallery of the distinguished Premier of Newfoundland?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware of the objections and reservations the Premier of Newfoundland has about this white paper? Perhaps while the minister is on his feet he might avail himself of this opportunity to tell the House whether other premiers have expressed similar objections.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the only objections that I have had or have seen from government officials are the ones that have been briefly stated in the paper. I do not think we will ever develop a taxation system that will make everybody in Canada happy. I do think by moving through proposals such as we have, with everything to be discussed at public hearings before the committee of this House and the committee of the other place, we can at least receive the opinions of all sorts of people before we finally decide on a new tax system for Canada.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Speaker, I, too, should like to ask a question arising out of this statement. Is it the intention that Section 105 would continue to be available in respect of surplus amounts accumulated before the effective date of the new legislation? May I ask the minister whether the five year re-evaluation of marketable securities would apply only to individuals who hold marketable securities or also to corporations which hold marketable securities?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is getting into details with regard to the proposals. I would be pleased to answer the first question dealing with Section 105. It is proposed in the white paper quite clearly that existing surpluses can be cleared by the payment of a flat 15 per cent at times to be chosen by the shareholders and the corporation. So, this would involve Section 105 as modified. This would be easier than Section 105. Under Section 105 as it presently is, you have to pay out half in dividends and 15 per cent on the balance. With the new proposal, one could clear surpluses by the payment of a flat tax of 15 per cent.

In response to the second question, periodic revaluation would apply to corporations as well, but I should like to look into the detail of the particular situation my hon. friend may be thinking of because this is a rather complicated question.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's concern about the low income groups in the country, and his statement that it is a step in the right direction to increase exemptions to $1,500 for a single man and $3,500 for a married man, I wonder whether he has received any criticism about this increase in the exemptions? If not, will he implement or recommend the implementation of them as of January 1, 1970 to give relief to these low income groups?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, as soon as the proposals move through the committee we would prepare legislation and go ahead with it. You must remember that these proposals are in a sense designed to raise a similar amount of revenue. If one were to move ahead by simply increasing exemptions, without considering the other proposals with regard to personal income tax, bringing in capital gains and so on, this would mean a cost of a billion dollars. We would have to make more than one change at a time.

I do not think I have received criticism in respect of the exemption, but I have had the question raised in some letters to me as to why we do not go further. The answer is simply that to move up $400 for single people and $800 for married couples costs $1,000 million which has to be raised from other taxpayers through redistribution within the system. It is a matter of opinion as to how far you can go in shifting the burden at a particular time. I think we have made a substantial step.

Mr. Lewis: Is that $1,000 million a year?

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since I am limited to 40 minutes in speaking to the motion to refer this white paper to the committee, there is time to do no more than touch upon some of the main considerations involved as I see them. My colleagues will deal with particular aspects in detail and, of course, the committee will have an opportunity to examine the Government proposals point by point together with the alternatives that will be suggested by us and by others. Today I simply want to call the attention of the House to certain matters I consider to be of particular importance.

It should be emphasized at the beginning that the white paper deals with only part of the taxation field. That shortcoming is fundamental. Last winter we protested that the changes then made by the Government in the estate tax field could only be judged in the context of other tax measures, especially income and capital gains tax, and suggested changes which we had not then seen. Likewise today it is not really very sensible and not just to ask Canadians to accept these changes in tax laws that are proposed without knowing what the policy of the Government is with regard to the rest of the taxation field, especially the so-called consumption or sales taxes.

To read the white paper, one would almost think that the provinces and the municipalities did not exist. It is ridiculous to be trying to devise a more equitable taxation system while ignoring for all practical purposes that the provinces and municipalities are also imposing taxes on the same Canadian citizens. The federal government has turned a deaf ear to the demands for consultation on a comprehensive federal-provincial tax system. The minister shakes his head. He is prepared to listen but that is about it.

Mr. Benson: I spent two hours with the minister for Ontario yesterday.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: Until this is achieved, Canada will be a long way from sanity, much less justice, in its tax system. The Canadian citizen will continue to pay a high price for this disorganization and rivalry among the three levels of government. The proposal in this white paper to subject bursaries and scholarships to income taxation will have an obvious effect upon the provinces. It is well known that the federal government is not in the bursary field, despite certain commitments made in the past. The burden for this will fall in large part upon the provincial treasurer who will have to supplement the bursaries accordingly to enable young Canadians to attend school. This will mean, in effect, a transfer of the burden from the federal government to the provincial treasurer.

There are very serious objections to some of the proposals and some of the methods proposed in the white paper. I think some of the defects can easily be corrected, and I hope the government will move to amend its proposals or that the committee will move to amend them right away. For example, I think all Canadians will approve of the intention to bring tax relief to the lower income levels, although the minister's expectation that it will benefit 700,000 or 750,000 Canadians is on the basis of this year's incomes. The minister cannot say how many will be exempt when these laws become effective, say, in 1972 because with the rate of inflation we have the exemption may apply to several hundred thousand fewer Canadians. I suggest that the minister's statement is almost misleading because it is made on the basis of 1969 incomes and is not made on the basis of what incomes might be in 1972.

An hon. Member: 1968.

Mr. Stanfield: 1968 or 1969; it is certainly not on the basis of what might be anticipated in the future.

As an anti-poverty measure, of course, the exemptions are of very limited value. By the time the legislation comes into operation they will be considerably less. Many thousands of Canadians who, on the basis of incomes this year, would be exempt will not be exempt in 1972 as a result of the inflation which is going on today and which by all signs will continue at some rate at least.

The proposal to grant some relief to working parents who must pay for child care is very welcome. Again this does not help the working parents who most need it. I am sure the minister will agree with this. I have in mind those parents who do not pay any income tax at all. I suggest it would be far more equitable for the government to provide what relief it does not in the form of an exemption to the parent, which is the method mentioned. I believe it should be provided entirely in the form of a tax credit which would be of as much value to the relatively low income parents as to the high income parent. This is something to which the committee should give its attention.

What I call attention to is the fact that the proposals in the white paper do not provide sufficiently for parents with dependant children. The answer of the government to this criticism has been that the forthcoming white paper on social welfare will cover this omission. We will see, and I hope we will have an opportunity to examine these proposals and the new proposals together.

There are many highly technical questions which arise. For example, there is the matter of trusts. I suspect and believe that the authors of the white paper are strikingly oblivious to many of the implications of the proposed taxation changes upon trusts and the receivers of income from trusts. This is something which I am sure the committee will have to examine very carefully. There is every indication that many questions have not even occurred to the authors of this white paper.

I should like to deal now with the extra burden the minister intends to impose on Canadians in the middle income groups. It is on this aspect of the white paper that the minister in the past few weeks has been attempting to pull off what I believe to be one of the greatest "snow jobs" of this or any other century. I think it is obvious that the minister's public relations advisers planned a campaign that is literally incredible and literally unbelievable. Worse still, they have taken the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and made sort of a huckster out of him.

I think the minister would like to think of himself as sort of a Robin Hood. I do not know about that, but many Canadians are beginning to think the minister is some kind of a hood. He is trying to convey the impression that the wealthy will be taxed more heavily than the less wealthy and that the less wealthy will be better off. That is not true. The minister appears on television and talks about the powerful interests which will protest. Who are these powerful interests? The taxpayer who is single and earns more than $4,000 a year will pay more under these proposals. The taxpayer who is married and earns about $9,000 per year and up will pay more. These people will be surprised to find themselves classed by the minister with the powerful interests. They will be quite astonished to hear that the minister thinks they are wealthy if they earn more than $4,000 single or $9,000 married.

Of course any person who thinks, as the minister does, that one can live on $30 a week—

Mr. Benson: I never said that.

Mr. Stanfield: —is bound to think that anybody with $9,000 is rich beyond the dreams of avarice. The minister has since clarified this statement. He really meant that $30 a week could be lived on in certain parts of the country. So much for the government's regional disparity policy.

I believe it is inequitable that those in the general area of $10,000 to $15,000 will, in most cases, be faced with a larger increase in respect of their income tax payments than those in the $25,000, $30,000 or $35,000 a year bracket. At this point I wish to say I do not have one of those evil minds that would dwell for long on the fact that the minister and some of his senior advisers are in that $25,000, $30,000 or $35,000 area—

Mr. Benson: What is your bracket?

Mr. Stanfield: —but I think I should tell the minister confidentially that there are a lot of suspicious people in this country. They think they hear the sound of grinding axes coming from the minister's office. I assure the minister I shall do my utmost to persuade people that this remarkable coincidence is purely accidental. What cannot be accidental, of course, is the attempt by the minister to distort the meaning of the increases because the comparison the minister attempted to draw between his proposals in the white paper and the situation of a taxpayer in the state of New York is, as the minister ought to know by this time, blatantly misleading. New York state has about the highest income tax of any major state. This was mentioned as long ago as the Carter report.

Furthermore, the minister's table took no account of the fact that a substantial tax reduction has been announced in the United States. Apparently the surtax is to be taken off and there is talk at least of further reductions. Finally, the minister's calculations simply omitted to allow for the fact that a number of Canadian provinces have their own income taxes in addition to those proposed here. In other words, he attempted to compare the lowest federal and provincial income tax in Canada with the highest federal and state income tax in the United States, that of the state of New York. I suggest the minister or whoever prepared the white paper—and the minister must accept responsibility for it—is guilty of a cheap manipulation of figures in this regard. This kind of political statistic is useless, and the use of misleading comparisons is offensive to Canadians who try to make a serious analysis of the government's proposals in this white paper.

It is my view that the rate of progression is too steep on the personal income tax, and that it is indefensible in the context of the present and proposed tax system to impose a heavier increase on the incomes of the $10,000 to $15,000 a year group than on the higher groups. Furthermore, let me say just for the record that I do not see anything sacred—again, certainly not in the context of the tax system proposed by the minister—about a 50 per cent maximum on the extremely wealthy. The 80 per cent limit would be absurd, particularly in the light of the capital gains tax, but, as I said, I do not see any justification for the rate of progression on the lower and the middle income tax as proposed.

The minister will no doubt talk about the billion dollars in revenue that is being dropped as a result of the increase in the exemptions. Let me point out three ways this loss could be overcome, other than by tax increases. First of all, the loss about which the minister speaks is computed on the basis of 1969 incomes, not 1972 incomes, and when allowance is made for inflation far fewer people will get the benefit of these exemptions or will be totally exempt in 1972. There will be still fewer of them in 1973 and still fewer in 1974. Therefore, the cost of the proposed exemptions will be far less than was suggested, and the minister is using an inflated figure because he is using the 1969 figures.

Mr. Benson: Take a look at the table at page 95.

Mr. Stanfield: I am taking a look at it and those figures are proposed on the basis of 1969 incomes.

Also, when you consider what a given tax structure will produce, and when you consider it in an inflationary context, you have to bear in mind that revenues from federal taxes, particularly income taxes, increase more substantially than the gross national product. In other words, government revenues rise even more than the rate of inflation. If, for example, there is an increase in the year of 5 per cent in the gross national product, the take of this government from the safe level of income taxes is substantially more than 5 per cent. This must be taken into account when one tries to compute what a particular tax structure will in fact produce. The minister has not made any attempt to tell us what that would be, and of course he cannot. But the committee must bear in mind that inflation is here, that it may very well continue, and the committee should by no means agree to the rates that are proposed for the lower and middle income groups on the basis of any information that they have yet received from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Furthermore, the package that he has proposed provides just under $200 million in additional revenue immediately, and some $630 million after it has been in operation for five years, that is a 5.7 per cent increase in rates. In other words, the minister is using this device not only to bring about some reform but also to slip in a little tax increase at the same time, to the extent of $630 million.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: So, when the minister speaks about losing a billion dollars, one must put this in the context of inflation and what the incomes are likely to be in 1972. One must put it in the context of the additional revenue that the minister means to collect in any event, some $630 million. It will then become apparent that there is no need to take this crack at Canadians in the lower and middle income brackets.

The minister has not made any case at all, particularly when one considers that these people are now paying substantially higher taxes than are paid in most states. In many cases these middle groups are composed of professional people and middle management groups who will be the leaders in the professions and management in Canada tomorrow, unless they are encouraged to depart to the United States.

As to smaller businesses, it must have been in the start of the life of the just society that somebody decided that smaller businesses do not really count very much. Certainly, there has been an open season on smaller business for the past year or two. The Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) has added substantially to the cost of doing business. The so-called two level system of corporate taxation has been applied equally to small and large corporations, which is quite unnecessary I agree. Furthermore, I realize it has been subject to some abuses. But to abolish the lower rate in order to prevent abuse, and to end up by crippling many small businesses which in many cases will become the medium business of the future unless they are crippled, displays a certain intellectual bankruptcy unusual even for this government. This proposal will be very serious for many small corporations.

The minister spoke about the number of unincorporated companies. I agree there are many of them, but on the other hand anyone engaging in small manufacturing or in any company which, like any organization, is likely to develop, is pretty well certain to become incorporated for reasons of limitation of liability, quite apart from any question of taxation.

The government should give an undertaking right away that it will not abolish the two level system until some appropriate alternative is found to help small businesses get under way and to help them compete as well as raise the money they need for expansion. This will also apply, of course, to farmers who are incorporated. It is quite certain that the minister is proposing to seriously reduce the cash flow of small corporations. The two level system must not be abolished until some offsetting provision is devised to try to overcome the bias of the capital market against the small corporation because the small businessman trying to expand cannot go to Wall Street or Bay Street to raise money. I suggest that the government proposal is stupid and we will oppose it as hard as we can until some way is devised to overcome it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I see it is one o'clock and I do now leave the Chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, when I broke off this morning I was discussing the effect of the white paper proposals on the small corporation. As the minister himself stated, it is not so much a question of a tax differential in the long run. The shareholders of a small corporation that pays a 21 per cent rate are paying a substantially higher tax in the end, and the question really is whether it is sensible to impair the ability of a small corporation to compete, to remain modern and to expand in view of the difficulty that this kind of corporation encounters, generally speaking, in raising money. It does not seem to me to be sensible, Mr. Speaker. It is a definite discouragement and in my opinion will definitely make available a larger percentage of the Canadian market to the large corporation, and make it difficult for the small corporation to compete and develop.

I do not propose to say very much about the proposals regarding natural resource industries. No doubt others will discuss at some length the effect of the white paper proposals on these industries. I believe it is essential that our tax policies encourage the exploration for and development of our natural resources, and that we should be generally competitive with other countries whose natural resources are comparable with ours.

I would just like to say that with regard to the new incentives that are being substituted for the old, I believe that under the new ones there will be less encouragement for the development of resources, of mines, and of oil explorations in the more remote areas. I believe that this change may make it somewhat more difficult for the Minister of Regional Economic Development (Mr. Marchand) to achieve his purpose of reducing economic disparities.

I wish to spend some time this afternoon on the proposed changes relating to capital gains. I want to make it very clear at the outset that I do not oppose a capital gains tax in principle, but I serve notice now, Sir, that unless some important changes are made we will have to fight this proposal in its present form just as vigorously as we know how.

I would like to make four points in connection with the capital gains aspect of the proposals. First, in the present Canadian economic context it is absurd for any government in Canada to contemplate a capital gains tax at the rates proposed, or anything like them, that does not take account of inflation. Indeed I think the committee should consider very carefully the effect upon Canada of having a capital gains tax at rates substantially above those prevailing in the United States.

In recent years we have had an inflationary factor in our economy of some 4 per cent or 5 per cent. There seems to be very little likelihood of any easing in that trend, given the inability of the government to decide on an anti-inflationary policy and to stick with it, and the hapless and rather pathetic gestures of the Minister of Consumer Affairs and Higher Prices. Given the present situation, the government proposal to tax what is simply an inflationary gain, not a gain in real value but an illusory inflationary gain, surely cannot be defended. I know it is suggested there is no logical distinction between taxing inflated incomes with an income tax rate and a capital gains rate, but I think there is a great difference, Sir. The income tax rate is the rate applied by Parliament each year affecting the income of any given year, whereas the capital gains tax is the tax applied to a change in value which may have accrued over many years. Serious as it may be, inflation automatically involves a reduction in the value of exemptions for income purposes and automatically involves an increase in tax rates. This is something Parliament can deal with each year, whereas a tax on a capital gain that has accrued over the years is in a very different category. So, sir, this is an aspect of the proposals that must be given very serious consideration.

Secondly, the capital gains tax to be imposed should be related to the rest of the tax system from the point of view both of incentives and equity and, especially, it should be related to the estate tax. In other words, the introduction of the capital gains tax should be accompanied by a review of the estate tax structure which was adopted during the last session, and especially the way that structure affects smaller and medium sized estates. May I remind the House that under the new proposals, and even after they were modified they were opposed by every opposition party in the House, the estate tax reaches a level of 50 per cent at the $300,000 estate level, whereas formerly that rate applied to estates of $1,800,000. Furthermore, the $300,000 estates are worth that much less in depreciated currency. This is something that must be investigated. Introduction of a capital gains tax ought to involve a re-examination of our entire estate tax legislation.

Thirdly, the averaging period proposed in the white paper must be examined. It should be extended over a longer period, and the averaging should be a real averaging without the so-called threshold amount—it might be called a strangle hold amount—proposed in the white paper. Unless there is a longer averaging period, farmers and others, for example, who hold assets after a lifetime's work are going to suffer very severe hardships. I would hope that at least the government might consider something in the nature of a moving ten-year average so that a person—say, a farmer in the future, who sells his farm at the age of 65 in order to retire—would not suffer from having kept his farm, thereby possibly deriving a low return on his investment and a small income, over 20 or 30 years. That is practically a lifetime. This will turn out to be a confiscatory rate of tax if the inadequate averaging provisions suggested by the minister are adopted. Indeed, the present proposal of the government may be confiscatory. It may be said that difficulties would be created in lengthening the period; but the government so much as admitted in its white paper that even with the five-year averaging proposal, it will no longer be possible for the ordinary citizen to compute his taxes. They will have to be computed by the tax gatherer. If that is the case—

Mr. Benson: It is not.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the minister shaking his head?

Mr. Benson: It does not have to be so computed. The hon. member could compute his own.

Mr. Stanfield: One could compute one's own tax, but the government recognizes in the white paper that it will no longer be feasible for some taxpayers to do so, Mr. Speaker, because the taxpayer in many cases will have to rely on the tax gatherer in computing taxes. If that is so, then why not make the averaging period as equitable as possible? Why not make it longer, so that the fellow who works an asset like a farm all his life will not get kicked in the teeth at the end of his working life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Fourthly, I wish to state my opposition to what I call the revaluation tax in its present form. I am speaking of the appreciation tax which is to be imposed every five years. If a person owns a piece of real estate or a work of art or some shares in a closely held company, he will pay a capital gains tax if and when he sells those assets and realizes a profit. But if a person has some shares in what is called a widely held corporation, which might be described as the sort of company that is listed on a stock exchange, he not only pays a capital gains tax if and when he sells those shares at a profit but, in addition, every five years he has to pay a tax on one half of the assessed increase in value of those shares he has held and not sold; losses, of course, being deducted. This is actually a value appreciation tax, a tax on capital, a tax on the growth that Canada needs. I say in all sincerity, sir, that no Minister of Finance has ever made a proposal that would leave future successful Canadian enterprises more vulnerable to United States take-overs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope the Minister of Finance does not run into Walter Gordon in a dark alley, because he might not come out. The white paper makes a distinction between shareholders of so-called closely held corporations who are usually closely linked with management of the company, and the general run of shareholders who hold shares in the larger, more widely held corporations and may have no connection at all with management. I understand that distinction; we all do. The difficulty is that the minister has applied the same distinction with respect to those shareholders who, in the larger, more widely held corporations, are connected with management—in order words, the controlling shareholders. The minister has applied standards that may be valid for the general run of shareholders to individuals or groups which control a Canadian corporation, and that is likely to have disastrous effects for this country.

I want to see someone on the government side of the House get up and defend in detail the implications of the confused thinking behind this proposal. If a Canadian, or a group of Canadians, begins a company—a new mine, let us say—and, in order to raise capital and develop the mine he sells shares which are listed on a stock exchange; and if the mine is one of the relatively few successful mines which in the past have strengthened the economy of the country and as a result its shares rise substantially in value over a five-year period, I ask, how is the controlling shareholder, or shareholders, to pay the heavy appreciation tax? Generally, that shareholder will have to sell shares in the company in order to pay the tax, and will thereby risk losing control of the company. If he does not lose control after the first five years when the appreciation tax is imposed, he will very likely lose it after the second five years.

Mr. Woolliams: That is what the minister wants.

Mr. Stanfield: It is difficult to conceive of any proposal that is more absurd on the part of any government that has the slightest interest in maintaining, let alone increasing, Canadian ownership and control of Canadian resources and enterprises. This will also encourage the take-over of closely held corporations, because closely held corporations will not be able to raise capital by listing their shares in the future. They are not going to take that step because it will be irreversible if the white paper proposals are adopted. If they need capital to expand, they are going to sell out rather than enter the trap set by the Minister of Finance.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I am not suggesting the successful Canadian controlled corporations ought not be subject to taxation on realized capital gains. I say it is absurd for a government of Canada, talking about a Canada Development Corporation in order to maintain control of Canadian corporations, to propose a measure which will vastly increase the difficulties of Canadians keeping control of Canadian companies.

The measure proposed by the government will encourage foreign take-overs of Canadian companies, Mr. Speaker. This would not be offset by the establishment of a number of Canada Development Corporations. The minister talked about the "locked-in" provisions. This kind of difficulty applies even to closely held corporations. There is no argument that it applies less to widely held corporations. If there was ever a half-baked proposal to a country concerned about foreign ownership, this is it, Mr. Speaker. This proposal will make it virtually impossible for Canadians to maintain control of successful enterprises, be they mining or manufacturing, and will result in a depreciation of the shares.

There are many other points, Mr. Speaker, but why must the minister apply this capital gains tax to the homes of ordinary Canadians? I understand he does not expect to receive any revenue from this. The result will be that everyone will be snarled up in a lot of red tape.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I think the committee should take a good look at that. The minister will forgive me, and the House will understand, that I am not dwelling on those aspects of the white paper that I approve of, although I did mention some. I think we can take it for granted that the members of the government will overcome their natural modesty long enough to draw attention to the good points, perchance even to exaggerate them slightly.

Taken as a whole, the white paper moves in the direction of "disincentives" rather than incentives to Canadians. What comes through loud and clear is that the government is complacent, almost foolishly complacent, in its belief that nothing can stop Canada from achieving its potential economic growth.

Small businesses that are incorporated will be hard hit. People in the low and medium income bracket, who are already at a substantial disadvantage compared to their United States counterparts, are to be put at a greater disadvantage. The more successful a future Canadian enterprise is, the more likely it is that the control will be taken over by some outside corporation because Canadians will have to sell their shares in order to pay the tax the minister proposes to impose, thereby losing control.

A capital gains tax is to be imposed that is considerably more than that of the United States. There is in the white paper a strong "disincentive" to capital formation and reinvestment. There are some "disincentives" that will clearly affect certain regions. If Canada is to grow economically, the main impetus in the context of these proposals in the white paper will not come from Canadians, but from foreign countries. I suppose some people will say "So what else is new?", but I think most Canadians will regret it. They will regret that the government, given an opportunity to develop a tax system that would not only be more equitable, but would help provide a greater opportunity for Canadians to control our own economic growth, failed to do so.

The government can set up the Canada Development Corporation, but I say in all sincerity that 50 Canada Development Corporations would not undo some of the damage and some of the "disincentives" that are contained in this white paper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I have made some suggestions. We will be making other alternative proposals in committee. Our aim will be to relieve some of the inequities that are perpetuated or worsened by this white paper, to eliminate some of the glaring "disincentives" and try to build a tax system that will maximize opportunity for individual Canadians.

I move an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), that the motion be amended by adding the following to it:

—with instructions to develop alternatives to the proposed "disincentives" affecting middle income groups and small businesses in particular, and which increase the vulnerability of Canadian enterprise to foreign take-overs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I prefer to take the amendment under advisement in terms of putting it to the House until I have had an opportunity to consult with Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, some of the criticisms which the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has made of the white paper we agree with, but many of the statements he made we do not agree with because of the basic difference of approach to what we are trying to do in and for our country.

The minister emphasized during his speech that this was the most thorough tax revision since the Income War Tax Act was introduced many years ago. I say to the minister that all the greater is the pity that instead of building a genuinely equitable and desirable tax system, he has in major part only tinkered with it and produced something that does not meet the needs of the 1970's and the ideas of equality which the Canadian people now accept.

The minister boasts about the fact that 750,000 people are off the tax rolls. He speaks of it in such a way as to suggest that all of us, particularly the 750,000 who are no longer to pay tax, are to genuflect before him for his immense generosity. I refuse to do that, Mr. Speaker. I think the 750,000 people should have stopped paying taxes years ago and the fact that, belatedly the minister finally made some adjustment that clears them off the tax rolls will not win him a seat in heaven. It may win him a slightly less uncomfortable seat in the other place, but it is nothing to cause us to genuflect before him.

Mr. Benson: You and the Leader of the Opposition will be there with me.

Mr. Lewis: The minister talks about losing $1 billion in the same sentence that he talks about 750,000 people being taken off the tax roll. They were off the payroll before, Mr. Speaker. I do not suggest that he is implying by that that he is losing a billion dollars from these people, but it is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that these 750,000 people who unfairly and unjustly were forced to pay taxes before will account for approximately $30 million of his thousand million dollar loss. This is what the situation is.

Taxation Reform

I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic party that we look on the tax system of Canada as an expression of the social goals which a society seeks at any given time and of the social philosophy and social ethics of that society. We want the tax system to be an example, a reflection, of what we agree to be the proper relationship between the state and its citizens. Who is encouraged by the tax system? Who is rewarded by it? Who retains the power to control the economy; how is the economic power distributed? What are the values which underlie our tax system? These are the criteria by which we think the white paper before us should be measured.

A tax system, it is agreed, should be equitable. This white paper does not propose an equitable income tax structure. A tax system, it is agreed, should be comprehensive so that all the income of a taxpayer is included. This white paper does not provide a comprehensive tax base from that viewpoint. When considering a tax system, all people pay some kind of homage to the proposition that it should redistribute income. This proposed tax structure does not redistribute income; it leaves the lower and lower middle class income groups in a devil of a spot. A tax system in our opinion ought to deal with the income and wealth of a country in such a way as to reduce the power of the large private corporations and redistribute power in such a way as to give the ordinary people a greater say in decisions reached on their behalf and for their future. This white paper does not do this. A tax system, in our view, should be so constructed as to enable the central authorities, both federal and provincial, to do some meaningful spending within the economy and bring about some meaningful planning of the economy to serve socially desirable purposes and to serve the ends of the common people. The paper before us does not do this.

Above all, in our view a tax system ought to be so designed as to encourage provision of funds, where necessary, to provide the public goods and services without which life in modern society is simply not liveable. The white paper does not do this. Indeed, it does the contrary; it encourages the dividend holders and discourages lending to public authorities, federal, provincial and municipal, to enable them to carry on the basic work of the country and to make life liveable for larger numbers of our people.

[Mr. Lewis.]

We have said many times that in a modern society government activities are expanding and will continue to expand. I have said this myself both inside and outside the House, and it is here that I cannot agree with what was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). Whether some hon. members like it or not, I say emphatically that government activities will continue to expand in the future. None of the difficulties facing Canada today—none of them—can be resolved at all if they are left to the private corporate powers in this country. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has been flailing around in the polluted atmosphere of price increases—and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) supported by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has joined him in this pointless little dance—saying to the corporations: Please be good. The corporations listened—and hiked their prices. The hon. gentleman makes statements here about the need for restraint, to which no one pays any attention. The fact is, these continual increases in price, the pressures of inflation on those with low and fixed incomes, are becoming intolerable and they will not be stopped until federal and provincial governments have the imagination and the courage to take the necessary legislative steps to prevent the gouging corporations from increasing prices. The efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite will continue to fail. All the homilies, all the pleas, will fall on deaf ears in a system in which the maximization of profit is the major consideration. No success will be achieved until government has the courage to step in and control prices directly.

We talk a great deal in this parliament about the need to end regional disparities in Canada. Every one of us says "Amen" when such hopes are mentioned. It is not only unjust and unfair that people in the Atlantic provinces should receive a per capita income so much lower than the national average, but this situation is also one of the major agencies in the promotion of national disunity. It is one of the major causes of disenchantment with the federal government and with Canada as a whole. When this resentment is related, as it is in the Province of Quebec, to issues of language and culture, to legitimate requests and aspirations of the people, the fact that per capita income in the province is so much lower than it is in Ontario, that the rate of growth is so much lower than it is in Ontario, that the general situation is so much worse than it is in a neighbouring province, is one of the factors which has promoted and is promoting a disenchantment with federalism and has resulted in a real threat to the future unity of our country.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, not in any dogmatic way but in a realistic way, that none of these disparities will disappear on a permanent basis if it is left to private corporate enterprise to do the necessary investment and build the necessary industry. Private enterprise has not done anything for the last hundred years because it was not profitable to establish industry in those areas, and it will not do anything for the next hundred years because it will still not be profitable to do so. The only way in which to meet the challenge of the 'seventies, the 'eighties and the years to come is by making a much larger, indeed, a massive infusion of public investment and public ownership in the disadvantaged areas of this country. This might often be done in partnership with private investment and private ownership, but the direction would have to come from public agencies and, primarily, from the federal government. This is the only way to deal with regional inequalities, increasing prices, pollution, urban renewal and all the other issues which face this country.

The need is for more funds, not less, in the hands of the federal government, and more funds in the hands of the provincial governments. A tax system which puts a premium on private ownership as against the development of public goods and services in this country is a reactionary and retrograde tax system. Yet this is exactly what the white paper proposes. This white paper falls short of such criteria which to me seem essential to any decent tax system.

Improvements have been made; no one denies that. Even the Minister of Finance, when setting out to change the present inequitable and deplorable tax system, could not avoid improving it. He started at the very bottom and had nowhere to go but up, so even he could not make it worse. I do not propose to praise him or to thank him for that. He has set out to make the system a better one, but I suggest there are many more things he could have done to make our tax system a really equitable one.

Let me deal with some specifics of the white paper. Everybody agrees that a taxation system should be equitable, and let us look at the equity of the proposed system. Despite the fact that the exemptions have been raised, during the last 20 years, since 1949, the cost of living index has increased by 64 per cent. Yet the increase in exemption is only 40 per cent. This means that the taxpayers are not even in the position they were 20 years ago, let alone having their position improved.

On the whole, exemptions favour those in the upper income brackets. No one has stated this more eloquently than the Minister of Finance did in 1962, when the minister was sitting in opposition. He said, as reported I think at page 1696 of Hansard, that an increase in exemptions merely favours those in the higher income brackets and does not benefit those in the lower income brackets. This is always the pattern when you lower or increase the exemptions.

When you increase a single man's exemptions from $1,000 to $1,400, those in the lower income brackets may save $20 or $30, whereas those in the higher income brackets will save $200 or $300.

Mr. Benson: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he realize that through the adjustment in the rates the people who are going to benefit are those who are single, up to an income of $3,400, and married people up to an income of $9,100. Those earning more will pay more tax. There has been a change in both exemptions and the rate of tax.

Mr. Lewis: I assure the minister that I am aware of what he says, but I contend it is not very helpful to his case. He would have to show me that the entire $200 or $300 saving from the exemption accruing to those in the upper income brackets has been offset by the increase in the tax rates, and it has not, as I will point out in a moment.

I suggest that we do not need exemptions any more. Anyone who has studied modern tax systems realizes that merely increasing exemptions favours those of upper income, not those in the lower income brackets. The Leader of the Opposition will correct me if I am wrong, since I did not make a note of what he said, but he pointed out that working mothers' allowances would favour the wife of an upper or middle income husband who wanted a career for herself, to which of course she is entitled. She would be in a much better position than the wife of a working man who makes $5,000 and pays a much lower rate of income tax. The same is true not only of working mothers' allowances but also of personal exemptions.

I contend that you cannot build an equitable tax system by retaining the traditional, old-fashioned, conservative exemptions, lacking the courage and vision to replace them with a modern system of tax credits which will return money to those people against whom tax should not have been levied.

Losses can also be immensely reduced by a system of tax credits. The minister stated that the government lost $1 billion by raising tax exemptions. According to a calculation we made, though I do not vouch for its validity, if a tax credit system had been applied to every taxpayer of Canada, one third of this $1 billion would have been saved. If tax credits had been applied only against the lower income group, you would probably have saved about two thirds of the loss. I suggest this also stamps the white paper proposals as inequitable.

The most striking inequity in the white paper is the continuation of the double standard of taxation. The white paper proposes to allow a self-employed person to deduct from his taxable income all of his reasonable and legitimate expenses. Although there are many more wage earners and salary earners in this country than persons who are self-employed, they are allowed only a 3 per cent deduction, up to a maximum of $150.

I go further and say that this proposal is a snare and a delusion. I suggest everybody could take advantage of it. It could be used—I do not know whether it will or not—by members of Parliament, who already have a pretty hefty tax free allowance. The maximum of $150 could also be used by every wage and salary earner as a straight addition to the exemption. Where is the sense in this?

Some people incur no expenses with regard to the earning of their income. So why should they be given a further $150 exemption? There are many wage and salary earners, on the other hand, who for years have incurred expenditures much higher than $150 and who will not receive any relief except up to the $150. In all earnestness, I suggest this proposal is not only unfair but to my mind totally immoral. It is setting one standard for the majority of Canadians whose livelihood brings them a salary or wages, and a second standard for the minority of French Canadians who are self-employed or earn their income in some other way.

Mr. McGrath: French Canadians?

Mr. Lewis: Why the different standard?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Stanfield: It will affect English Canadians too. My hon. friend said French Canadians.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry I made that slip; I was referring to the minority of Canadians. I was referring to those Canadians who earn their incomes in some other way; I do not know why French Canadians came to my mind.

Some of the tables in the white paper indicate that the increase in taxes up to the $15,000 income level is not inconsiderable, and that when you get to the $20,000 income level the tax increase tapers off down the line. The minister keeps shaking his head. I am aware of his addendum of the capital gains tax and I will come to that in a moment. The application of the 51 per cent maximum means that those in the really high income brackets will be paying $5,000, $6,000 or even $30,000 less tax than they are paying now.

The minister's reply will be that he has now introduced a tax on capital gains, and that when this tax is added to the other tax these people will not pay less tax than they did before. We of this party do not buy that proposition, Mr. Speaker. We believe that the capital gains tax ought to have been on the statute books of Canada many years ago, because a capital gain is but another source of income.

We suggest that just because the minister is going to tax, in our view inadequately, this particular source of income is no excuse for making the tax burden on employment earnings of those whose income is $20,000 or over less heavy than the burden of those earning $15,000 a year or less. If I earn x dollars salary, and for years have also been making x dollars from capital gains which were not taxed, then I see no equitable reason or social justice for reducing my tax on the first part of my income because I am now going to be taxed on the second part of my income, assuming, of course, that I had that kind of income. Why this kind of double standard? We object to that. Therefore, on the basis of equity, this white paper falls to the ground.

There is another thing that has annoyed me about the proposal of the minister, and I want to say a word about that. Why could he not have introduced the goodies in the white paper now? Why does he have to wait until 1971? If they could not be introduced now it was certainly possible for the minister to plan to make the changes in the spring of next year, during his budget, applicable to the taxation year January 1, 1970 so that the taxpayers who are going to be helped by some little improvements could have benefited in the year 1970. Even if the minister needed some months for study and discussion, he would still have some five or six months between now and the spring of next year. He could have introduced his budget and made these amendments in that budget applicable to the taxation year 1970. Why did he postpone them until 1971?

The hon. Leader of the Opposition said he is not a suspicious person. I must admit that in this case I am suspicious. I had a look at the calendar and I found this result. You produce a white paper in the fall of 1969 and you boast about it until 1971. You introduce these proposals in the budget of 1971, applicable to the tax year 1971. The returns for the tax year 1971 will not be made out until April, 1972, and two months later you have an election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: That is the timetable of this white paper.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Benson: On the point of order, I should like to ask a question. If the hon. member and the hon. Leader of the Opposition think the white paper is so damn awful, why do they turn around and say it might be an election document?

Mr. Lewis: Don't let the minister be so obvious and so disingenuous. He has been given a great deal of time on radio and television, and no doubt will be given a great deal more. I am not saying that enviously because the more often he appears the better it is for those who oppose him. He will have a great deal of time to boast about these 750,000 who will no longer be on the tax roll and a great deal of time to boast about the $150 and the allowances for working mothers, but he is leaving it until the election year before making them effective. I think this is pretty shoddy politics, Mr. Speaker. I think to deal with a question such as the reform of the tax system on that kind of carefully calculated timetable is to do an injustice to the people of Canada and to the country.

Even if the minister could not bring his proposals into being earlier, certainly the relief to the poorest in this country, the 750,000 people who have been unfairly and unjustly on the tax roll for years, should come next year and not the year after. That relief should come now.

On November 8, 1962, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was in opposition, he made quite a speech about taxation in this country. This was not my leader speaking or the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), who has often spoken on this matter, or myself, and I have sometimes spoken, but this was Mr. Benson, the same man only now a little corrupted by the power he holds. This is the same man and this is what he said, as recorded at page 1464 of Hansard for that year:

> The oil and gas industry as such will contribute very little to the income tax revenue of the federal government even though its gross revenue exceeds $500 million.

Today, that gross revenue is probably much more than that. He went on to say:

> I can think of no other industry in Canada in this favourable position.

Then, he went on to say that what we need for this industry are other things rather than tax concessions. He said, as recorded at page 1464 of Hansard:

> It has been claimed that this industry needs further encouragement to find reserves.

This was in 1962 when reserves in Canada were much smaller than they are now. He continued:

> According to figures produced by the Canadian petroleum association at the end of 1961 reserves on hand in Canada amounted to 18.9 year's supply.

Today, these reserves are much higher than that. Later on, he went on to say:

> What we need is more and faster growing markets for petroleum products.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) should listen to his colleague in pre-incarnation. He said:

> If we had these we would not need tax concessions to stimulate the search for oil.

All I say is, amen. What was true in 1962 is doubly true in 1969. The minister is merely showing disregard for fairness and equity in this way by continuing the present gas and oil concessions until 1974 and then making some changes but continuing the privilege none the less.

We think this also makes the white paper inequitable and unjust. In judgment of these concessions to the mining, gas and oil companies he had not only to say what I have read, he also said this:

> I would think the next thing to consider is, who is going to benefit from these tax concessions contained in resolutions 6 to 10? Foreign control and ownership of this industry has been increasing and this legislation, I submit, will do nothing to discourage foreign ownership and encourage Canadian ownership. In this particular type of industry you have to go into the business wholeheartedly and operate in a big way to make a success of oil and gas exploration and development. Permitting other Canadian interests and industries to dabble in this type of activity is no way to ensure the expansion of Canadian investment in this field.

This was the Minister of Finance talking seven years ago. The same thing is true today. The same widespread foreign ownership and control exists today as existed in 1962, and the same foreign multi-national corporations will benefit from the tax concessions which he continues in his white paper. He condemned them then. He has either changed his social outlook for the worse, which I imagine is what has happened, or he has forgotten what he said in 1962, because there is nothing to justify a continuation of these tax concessions amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars a year to foreign owned and foreign controlled corporations at a time when the reserves of oil and gas are already far higher than needed, and when the industry is over-capitalized on almost every basis of calculation or consideration. So, we say that the white paper falls down on the basis of equity on this point as well.

We are very concerned about the fact that there is no limit suggested in the white paper in so far as the deduction of advertising expenses for tax purposes is concerned. We are concerned about that because we are concerned about the total effect of modern advertising in the North American world in particular, and perhaps throughout the world.

We are concerned about the immense power which the corporations now have, not to respond to the market but to control it, not to meet the needs of the people but to create unnecessary wants, not to respond to what the people of this country really need and desire but to distort and pervert the social objectives of society. That is what modern advertising in the large means and does. Yet the corporations will be able to continue spending as much in this field as they like and will have 50 per cent of it paid by the federal treasury. That is what it amounts to, if they deduct it from their income for tax purposes. Then, of course, we the taxpayers take a 50 per cent loss in the federal treasury in respect of the amount the corporations have deducted. I submit that this, too, is an indication of the kind of social philosophy, the sort of social objective which has motivated this government and the Minister of Finance.

If people have heretofore been misled by talk about this government being progressive and small "l" liberal, I hope from now on that because of this white paper, the failure of the government to deal with price increases and the inequitable measures in our tax system, no one will have any illusions about progressivism, small "l" liberalism or anything else worth while in the 1970s in this country. I hope no one in Canada will be fooled by the tendency of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), repeated again and again by other spokesmen, to talk in generalizations about the need to adapt to change, merely talk instead of action. I hope these things will become clear to the people of this country.

Other members of this party will deal with the capital gains tax and other points on which the white paper displeases us. I do not have sufficient time to do so, except to say we are dissatisfied with the capital gains tax; we think it is inadequate in the circumstances. I will leave this subject to my colleagues, particularly the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), to deal with in greater detail.

In the time remaining to me I wish to turn to the subject of public versus private goods. I would point out that the white paper continues the practice of promoting and encouraging the creation in this country of private goods and services, of promoting and encouraging the kind of economic development which creates a plethora of unnecessary private goods competing with each other for no other purpose than to make the corporations producing them richer and more powerful. This produces a disincentive in raising the funds that are necessary to provide the public goods and services of this country. A good many people believe in the present order of society because of the talk about the benefit of private enterprise—if it exists—and of free enterprise, which I know does not exist in the modern economy.

Let me say to these people in all seriousness that in our modern system, life would not be livable were it not for the public goods and services created, the public housing and urban renewal, the planned cities which make life liveable in the megalopolies that we now have and the opportunity of young people to find a useful, meaningful and creative life which depends on education at all levels. All these things, and many more, will not be created by private corporations and will not be created by private goods. They can be created only if the federal government, provincial governments and municipal governments can find the funds to promote, initiate and develop plans in all those fields. That to me seems to be elementary in our present society. One does not have to be a dogmatic socialist or anything else to recognize this fact. One does not have to rely on lengthy doctrines in order to recognize that in our modern society the money, goods and services that people require in order to live a life that has any quality at all, depend on public investment, public initiative and public ownership.

Yet what does this white paper do for us? The white paper and the Minister of Finance who produced it make sure that those who hold shares and clip dividend coupons will have concessions but those who may be encouraged to invest in bonds or securities of federal, provincial or municipal governments will have no concessions at all. The entire white paper is pointed in the direction of equity share capital to make the bond market much more difficult in the future, and in the direction of increasing interest rates. This makes it more and more difficult for the government of this country to carry out its duties without mortgaging future generations for years and years at ever higher rates of interest.

This is a perversion of the social needs of a modern society; this is a betrayal of the social needs of a modern society. A tax system ought to make it as easy as possible for governments to raise their funds at the lowest possible interest rates, instead of placing roadblocks in the way of federal, provincial and municipal governments obtaining the funds for these essential services and goods for which they are responsible in our society.

Mr. Speaker, as I have only another minute I shall conclude by saying briefly, if I can put it adequately, that to me this White Paper merely reflects the determination of this government to encourage foreign ownership and control of the economy in the same way the government has encouraged it until now. The continentalists are all on the treasury benches. This White Paper reflects a determination by the government to do nothing to reduce either the competition or the power of the rich and the powerful. It reflect a reactionary attitude toward modern society in the government is not concerned at all with equality in the condition of life of the Canadian people. The government would seem to be concerned only with making sure that their friends, if they are a little angry, are not angry enough to stop giving the support which they require in order to continue in power.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say what I have in mind about the White Paper.

Mr. Speaker, the so-called White Paper has turned red. I do not know why, but I think it is from shame due to the tax increase, particularly on capital gains.

We have a lot of things to say about the White Paper which will put our economy further off balance as a result of tax increases and higher interest rates, and as a result of the exaggerated profits that some financial institutions realize, which while degrading the population brings unparalleled prosperity to these institutions.

• (3:10 p.m.)

We have no time to suggest alternative solutions to replace the findings of the report. However, we realize that there is a need for constant fiscal study and reform of our present system, to alloy its injustices.

The Carter Commission rendered a great service by accomplishing its task. We consider that a fiscal reform should immediately challenge abuses and eliminate the injustices which result therefrom.

That is what the White Paper should have done. But taxes are levied on a sector of the population that does not have enough money to cope with its needs and to balance family, city, school and provincial budgets.

The report does not speak well of the authorities insofar as the tax reforms of the last few years are concerned. The persistency of that outlook requires from the government unceasing concern and effort. It must see to it that the public has confidence in the tax system and that all taxpayers are treated fairly.

I would like to express the grievances of the Ralliement créditiste against the present system. We talk about reform, but what the White Paper proposes is not reform, it is a distortion of our economy, a distortion which will make it increasingly difficult for our Canadian citizens to reach their goal in life and to secure a decent well-being in an immeasurably rich country.

I would like to find the root of the evil, to determine the main causes of the economic crisis that has arisen, because tax increases undermine the morale of the people and unfortunately lead them to dishonesty.

Several citizens, business men and professional people betray their conscience to keep their standing, because they are too heavily taxed.

Why criticize and denounce the present financial system? Simply because it does not play its role which is to finance the production of goods and services, as well as their fair distribution to all the people and not only to a small number of them who make money through taxes and higher interest rates. It is in this way that big institutions get richer in Canada and the measures we take contribute only to increase substantially their assets.

Why does not the present financial system play its part? Because public and private assets are perfectly realizable but certainly not under the present financial system. Many physical assets are realizable now but we cannot develop them due to credit restrictions and to excessive rates of interest. Such a situation delays progress and paralyzes even more the economy, while unbalancing it further.

Production is impossible in many cases because it is not financed. However, the necessary goods and services are offered to the people who cannot get them because the financial system does not subsidize consumption. This is undeniable.

In fact, how is production or consumption financed? Through various means. It may be metal or paper money, legalized money or cheques drawn on bank accounts. From where do such means get their value? From where does financial credit get its value?

It is worth its true credit value, that is the productivity of a country. Money, whatever the type of currency, has some value only because countries can produce goods and services to meet the demand of the population. A country's productivity is the real credit through which it is hoped to obtain the goods and services necessary to the well-being of the population.

However, that is not the case in this country. We have everything we need. Available to us are all the proper techniques to further our development and the prosperity of individuals in Canada, nevertheless, we follow another course because we flatly refuse to apply the main regulators that could balance our economy on a continual and permanent basis, so as to satisfy our people who ask nothing but to work.

Our present financial system precludes any progress. It annihilates all these advantages and puts an end to the building industry. Whole families, large families sometimes, live in two or three room dwellings. This is illogical in a country like Canada which has everything to build and to enlarge houses so that these families can be properly accommodated. The restriction of credit, which was made necessary by inflation, and the increase in interest rate, which is said to be satisfactory and able to regulate our economy, are injustifiable measure because it is the exact opposite which is necessary. And if we have now an increase in the cost of living while faced with inflation, it is precisely because of an increase in the interest rate which has no precedent.

So, we speak of national production which does not mean nationalized production. It is the general productivity that must ensure every citizen the means to satisfy all his essential needs.

Who owns the financial credit? Nowadays, it is those who take advantage of the raise in interest rates to increase their fortune. Originally, the financial credit belongs to the community in the same capacity as the real credit from which its value is derived. It is a collective asset which must profit to each and everyone in one way or another, without restriction. Like the real credit, the financial credit is, by its very nature, a social credit, that is a credit based on life and society.

Is it possible to get from the general economy of a country all the financial credit so that each individual may be able to control himself the production of goods and services he must have to meet his essential needs? My answer, without any hesitation is yes. But under our economic system, this is impossible because it is contrary to common sense and social thinking.

It would be possible provided that the actual credit could be adapted without violence to the actual situation. Our financial system should reflect the capacity to produce instead of opposing it, should speed up distribution instead of containing it, should serve man for purposes of fulfillment and not of frustration.

At the present time, we know only of frustrations. Economically speaking, we have never known a balanced system and we have always experienced recessions and wars. We have never recognized the individual as a component of any society or economy. Any economy should be based upon the family and the human being, and unless we follow this principle, our efforts will not be successful. This is one of the reasons why we experience disasters, revolutions, strikes and discontent in every field to such a degree that any progress has become impossible. In fact, interest rates are so high that they have turned out to be an odious exploitation of the people.

Credit costs but a few drops of sweat and ink to those who create it and exploit people by charging excessive rates of interest on credit created out of nothing and which is based on nothing. There is no consideration for the needs of the people but only for the confidence financial institutions may have in someone. No consideration is given either to the economic factors that Canada can offer to sell to Canadians the services they need.

All democratic parties recognize man's political rights but ignore his economic ones. That is just what we are doing now. Every individual's economic rights are totally disregarded. The economic rights of a few individuals only are recognized and in a few minutes I shall quote statistics in this regard.

Let us not be too surprised at the fact that experts on the current economic situation are different from us. Their views are "superterrestrial". They sail on lunar orbits, from where they criticize everything on this poor planet, except our splendid financial system, which is the quintessence of a deranged civilization. They find it very difficult to distinguish between the capacity to produce, sell, eat and pay, just like those who can barely see the difference between the ability to think and to flatter.

I submit my proposals should be accepted by at least a great number of the people or by many hon. members who are elected, in my view, to serve the people and not merely to exploit them. As a matter of fact, everyone will agree that the financial system should be made to serve the people and not merely a few individuals who exploit the rest of the people. I would like to describe the chronic disease of the financial system: the madness of indebtedness, prices and full employment, and of accepted inflation. We are all involved in this madness and some of us are aware of it. We can hardly realize that we are involved in one of the greatest economic aberrations in the course of history.

The financial system is out of gear. It is obvious to everybody except, apparently, to those who keep it going and thereby enjoy a number of privileges. Maybe they realize the system is all topsy-turvy and cannot be corrected; and that is why they are proud to rule the world.

The people of the top I have just described know that the system did not create itself and that it is not just anybody who can manage it.

When you talk about taxes, you talk about finance. And when you talk about money or financial credit you talk, roughly speaking, of about 90 per cent of today's money, money that the banks have created out of nothing.

• (3:30 p.m.)

You cannot create money out of nothing, it does not grow on trees, as stated more than once by the various Ministers of Finance, even though they do not seem to know where it comes from. But they know that financial credit does not come and go all by itself. So if it leaves debts behind, it is not just by accident; it is because it can only be in circulation by means of a debt machinery invented and conditioned by men. Not by hon. members, nor by me, nor even by the Minister of Finance, but by citizens much above him, by citizens who have the power to tell the Minister of Finance what they want and what they want him to do, that is, those who control credit. That is the reason for the wild increase in taxes.

Developments are the admirable work of brains, and brawn and courageous hearts; but as that wealth is created, those who control money and credit, high-class parasites, sink the producers of wealth into debt, which means that the wealthier the country becomes, the more indebted it is. Does that not indicate insanity beyond words, due to the inefficiency of the system and the astuteness of those who control it? Even though they may not want, deliberately, some of the results of the system, they derive enough power from it to persist in maintaining it, and enough profits to be able to corrupt those in influential places.

I have spoken about the insanity in prices due to the increase in the rates of interest. When we speak of prices, we do not speak of goods or services, for they constitute real wealth, the fruit of the economic activity.

Indeed, prices are only one of the financial aspects of the economic system; they are no more than an assessment, expressed in figures.

There are citizens who benefit from the labour of the pioneers. To give you proof of this, I shall demonstrate that here in Canada, although there is unemployment, we contribute, through technology, to increase our production to a marked extent.

Thanks to technology, and in spite of the reduction in the labour force, we increase our production which amounted to $72 billion in 1969, while consumption amounted to $44 billion, and capital investments to $28 billion.

Since consumption equals the production, if consumption in Canada amounted to $44 billion and production to $72 billion, the total price consumers should pay for that production should be $44 billion. The balance represents a surplus.

If we have surpluses in Canada, they should be distributed to the people. So, we should not create inflation by increasing the interest rate and the salaries of professional people, as this gives rise to an increase in the cost of living.

To solve this problem, consumption should reach $72 billion instead of $40 billion, even if we have $28 billion difference which had to be distributed as a compensatory discount on prices, instead of creating new taxes or increasing the old ones, as the minister is now suggesting.

In so doing we would act as competent economists anxious to help the people, to meet the needs of all Canadians rather than to exploit them shamelessly as it is the case at present.

The White Paper recommends to tax capital gains because it is impossible to tax more heavily the small wage earners who already have reached the point when they have to borrow money to live.

Taxing the low or middle income taxpayer is no longer possible because both are facing bankruptcy. But steps are contemplated to tax the small business which survived painfully with loans, to tax debts on debts, and taxes on taxes, because we are unable to find other solutions.

What should be taxed is capital gains and hidden profits. At the present time, preparations are made to tax even more the middle income group, but those who go too far, who pile up reserves of all kinds, will not be further affected.

To support my claims, I would like to give you statistics covering a number of years, namely from 1957 to 1966. In my opinion, it is appropriate to say that the big businesses make profits thanks to our present financial system. Those who, directly or indirectly, capitalize make a great deal of money that is never taxed. To me, the White Paper does not provide for the adoption of harsh enough measures against those who make considerable profits.

For instance, in 1957, the profits claimed by the major financial institutions totalled $3,056 million, while the hidden profits amounted to $7,335 million. In 1958, the profits claimed amounted to $3,075 million and the hidden profits to $6,975 million.

• (3:40 p.m.)

In those ten years large corporations and financial institutions have declared total profits of $45,112 million for tax purposes and failed to declare profits of $96,050 million.

If these corporations and institutions are so wealthy, it is because governments accumulate debts and deficits and because the people who work for such companies live from day to day and lack bare essentials.

However, these businesses are only tools of production or administration of goods and services, material intellectual or spiritual, to meet the needs of the human beings who make up our nation.

In order to show clearly and throw the light again on what has been done by our financial institutions in the past 12 months, I shall give some statistics. There are many institutions, but I shall speak mostly about financial institutions because they are the most important.

The assets of Canada's nine chartered banks went up from $33,677,990,000 on July 31, 1968 to $40,325,792,000 on July 31, 1969—an increase of $6,647,802,000.

This increase in assets represents double the total number of notes issued by the Bank of Canada in the last 35 years, or $3,287,000,000.

The seven English chartered banks alone have total assets 3.3 times greater than those of the two French-Canadian banks, the Banque Canadienne Nationale and the Banque Provinciale, whose total assets of $2,350 million are only approximately 6 per cent of total assets of $40,325 million and this, for 28 per cent of the population of Canada. We are certainly far from making any headway.

According to me, the chief trouble lies in the fact that our French-Canadian banks have not yet caught on to the game of issuing currency through loans on notes or bonds to individuals or to institutions, or have not started playing it in time.

These statistics clearly show that chartered banks are empowered to issue credit money to the extent of twelve times the amount of notes issued by the Bank of Canada. This of course has an impact on the development of industrial, agricultural and financial activities in Canada.

It is not that the banking system is despicable in general, but it must be appreciated and better known in order to get the best out of it for ourselves and for Canada.

When one looks at the part played by the presidents and directors of the seven English banks in the large Canadian institutions, such as companies, trusts, universities and hospitals, it is a pity to see the part played by the directors of our two French-Canadian banks.

If through finance and mass production English-speaking people have dominated the Canadian scene since the turn of the century, we still have to balance our national economy by demanding that the right to live of every citizen whether he be without work, without a capital, without a personal income, be recognized.

Then, in a democratic system, capitalizing is desirable, and various institutions should be allowed to make huge profits, but it is also essential that Canadian citizens be able to live a decent life.

I read the following in yesterday's La Presse:

> The White Paper Drives a Company Out of Quebec
>
> Some provisions contained in the White Paper on Taxation have prompted a mining company, the Asbestos Corporation Ltd., to review its plans in connection with the operation of an asbestos deposit of the Ungava peninsula, in New Quebec.
> And it is in Belgium that the company expects from now on to invest $13 to $14 million with a view to setting up a plant to process asbestos extracted in New Quebec.
> Mr. I. C. Campbell, vice-president and secretary-treasurer of the company, who confirmed that the original plans for the development of New Quebec included the construction on the spot of a processing plant, specified that two of the measures recently proposed by Mr. Benson concerning the mining industry made the carrying out of the whole project prohibitive.
>
> Asbestos Corporation of Thetford Mines had already announced that following its exploration work in New Quebec, it intended to develop an interesting asbestos deposit in the area of Deception Bay.
> According to the original plans, that development was to be done in conjunction with the setting up of a plant for the processing of the product and would entail the creation of a quite costly urban complex, due to the climatic conditions and the distance factor which must be taken into account for the implementation of such a project.
> However, the company had deferred making a decision until the White Paper was published. The proposal to abolish the tax exemption granted to new mines in the first three years of operation and the proposal to apply new conditions to depletion premiums would, according to the vice-president of Asbestos Corporation, make the proposed undertaking unprofitable.

One of the main faults of the White Paper is to impose a capital gains tax.

I would have much more to say but before concluding, I would like to deal briefly with a brief submitted by the Canadian Association of Insurance Companies to the Minister of Finance. It is an economic and financial evaluation. On page 12, one can read the following:

> It does not seem fair that the most important chance gains resulting from the reform would favour the status quo—except in the fields of mining, oil and life insurance. The corporations that would benefit most from the implementation of the proposed system would be the medium-sized and smaller ones, engaged mainly in operations in Canada and having at their disposal a sound capital stock quoted on the Stock Exchange. Big resident and non-resident investors would make a substantial windfall on the stocks and shares market.

This means that only companies with a large capital stock will be able to survive, while small privately owned companies or companies with indirect capital or borrowing money will not be able to hold out. This is what this report says.

The repercussions would seem unfair to two groups in the low income bracket: young couples who are just settling down and the older citizens who are retired or dependent on someone. Due to the increase in the interest rate on loans, the increase in rents will seriously affect the young couples—member but his time has expired unless he has the unanimous consent of the House to continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to take too much time. But I would have several more things to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I am sorry but there is not unanimous consent.

[English]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: Maybe at another time.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): In the few weeks since the white paper on tax reform was published, Mr. Speaker, it has received very wide attention. It is significant, and perhaps it is a good sign, that no class of taxpayer is jumping for joy about it. Taxation is not a popular government activity, and tax reform is perhaps only a little less unpopular than taxation itself.

• (3:50 p.m.)

One of the most disappointed groups is the one which had hoped that the highest priority would be given by the government to the promotion of economic growth, the encouragement of saving, investment and reinvestment, the development of the Canadian economy and increased reward for success in business. This is the group whose complaints, after some initial expressions of satisfaction or at least of relief, are beginning to dominate the nation's financial pages. I would like to direct myself to the issues being raised by this group.

What I have to say at this time, Mr. Speaker, should be taken as preliminary, because as a member of the special committee which will be receiving the white paper for review I shall be looking forward to the widest possible public reaction and comment before coming to final conclusions. By this statement I hope to indicate the frame of reference in which at least one committee member will be expecting public discussion by business interests to fall.

Much could be said for a white paper which puts economic stimulus first. Something could be said for imposing an increased burden on the mass of taxpayers to help remove some of the purchasing power which may be accelerating inflation. Such a priority would be related to the promotion of economic well-being. But while the first of these objectiveness has clearly received considerable attention in a way which I would like to review, neither of these goals has been the main one. The main goal has obviously been the instant relief afforded 750,000 Canadians who have been taxed in the past and who are living in poverty. This group has not only been paying income tax and more than its fair share of sales tax but it has been paying, more than any other segment of society, the cruel tax which is represented by inflation. Our poorest citizens are those who are most exposed to inflation because they cannot easily bargain for increases in the way that unionized workers and primary industries like the nickel industry can do as their own costs rise.

The highest priority has been given to the poor people's needs for some justice out of the tax system. Some have complained about the white paper on the ground that it would reduce savings by half a billion dollars a year and would stimulate an inflationary pressure for consumer goods. I cannot be too sympathetic toward this complaint, because these critics are simply recognizing the fact that when poor people obtain tax relief they use their tax savings to buy better food, clothing and shelter. They do not use their tax savings to buy Canada Savings Bonds or stocks, or to open small businesses.

If their obvious economic choice tends to work against the goal of encouraging saving and of economic growth, and is inflationary, I think we just have to live with that, because we should not tolerate a tax system which adds another burden on those who live in poverty. Having said this, I would like to add that some critics on the other side have missed the point that a taxing statute can go only so far in the relief of poverty. Poverty cannot be eliminated by mere tax reform; other social measures are required to finish the job. To criticize this proposal for failing to do more is like criticizing it for failing to lower the voting age. It just is not the right tool to do the job most efficiently. In this connection, we have to wait for the white paper on social assistance which is promised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro).

While the bringing of tax relief to people living in poverty was of the highest priority, it has obviously also been kept in mind that income tax is imposed in order to raise revenue, and revenue that is lost must be replaced. This fact was lost sight of by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and by his hon. friend for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) when they suggested that provisions to relieve poverty ought to be introduced right away. Similar problems are now being encountered in the United States. Some very interesting tax relief measures have been introduced in the United States lately, but the over-all tax base has been reduced without thought to the importance of maintaining government revenues. This irresponsible attitude on the part of legislators was criticized in yesterday's New York Times. While American problems are different from ours, I think it would be useful if I read a few sentences from this very relevant editorial. It reads in part.

> What Congress never likes to think about in such bursts of generosity is the expensive and lengthy agenda of unmet national needs clamouring for governmental attention and action. Hundreds of billions of dollars are required in the next decade or so to do what is even minimally essential in rebuilding the nation's cities, cleaning up the polluted air and slowing down, if not actually reversing, the forces that are converting the nation's rivers and lakes into open sewers.
> On every side the American people are surrounded by dismaying evidence of urgent and unsatisfied priority requirements which can be met only by large-scale government expenditure dwarfing any in the nation's history. These needs are so great that even an end to the Viet Nam war, if it comes soon, will not free nearly enough money for the tasks ahead.

I think therefore, that the question which businessmen should be asking themselves is not simply what the government can do in the way of tax reform to encourage the development of a bigger gross national product so there will be more for all of us, but how can we do that while meeting the tax bill for an extra half billion dollars a year, which will result from the sweeping proposal for tax relief at the bottom of the income scale.

One way of filling the gap is by eliminating the unequal tax treatment of individuals who are basically in the same economic circumstances. The man whose economic well-being is derived from capital appreciation is put in the same boat as the man whose income comes from his employment. The man who has been able to shield his income in a corporation is put in the same position as one who could not or did not do so. The man and woman, particularly the working woman—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member, but we are approaching four o'clock and before proceeding further with this measure I thought I should bring to the notice of hon. members that I have had an opportunity to study the amendment proposed to the House by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

The hon. member for Peace River has been informed through the usual channels that the Chair has serious reservations about the admissibility of this motion, on procedural grounds. It should not be debated for some time and then ruled out of order, so I think a decision should be made one way or another at this time and the hon. member for Peace River should have an opportunity to make a case before any ruling is made. In fairness to all concerned, I invite the hon. member for Peace River to indicate his views on the question. I am sure he is aware of the difficulties in connection with the amendment.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In addition to the fact that I seconded the amendment, Mr. Speaker, there are other reasons for its validity. I call to Your Honour's attention, first, the provisions of Standing Order 68 which are to be found at page 71. That Standing Order provides that standing committees shall be empowered to examine and inquire into all matters referred to it by the House, and to report from time to time. Your Honour is well aware of that rule, and we start on this basis. While the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) does not mention anything about a report, the right to report is inherent; it is possessed by all committees by virtue of this standing order.

The report that the committee is being directed to examine is that referred to by the terms of the motion of the Minister of Finance, which reads:

> That the white paper entitled Proposals for Tax Reform, tabled in the House on November 7, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you must read into that the words "and that the committee do report to the House in respect of this particular term of reference." What is the committee going to report? Is it going to report that we have examined this 91 page document; that the committee has looked into the whole lousy can of worms, if I may use that expression; that the members of the committee like what they see and that they have certain recommendations to make? I think Your Honour can take some parliamentary notice of what the Minister of Finance has been saying in various parts of the country, which is something to this effect, "We are going to have everybody look at this white paper. We will send it to a parliamentary committee. We will be to some extent guided by what the committee may say about it. We will also refer it to other people in the country".

In other words, the Minister of Finance is saying, "Here is a paper. Take it, look at it, chew on it, and come back with some recommendations." I have given the Minister of Finance more credit than he is entitled to; I note the motion is in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), not the Minister of Finance.

Consequently, when considering the white paper we, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, say there are some things in it which we like. Perhaps it is medicine which the country must take to pay for some of the stupid, past actions of the government. We may say that certain tax changes should be made. But with respect to certain parts of the white paper, we say that there are not the incentives which should be the founding and basic motive of any tax proposal, but there are disincentives.

As an aside, let me say I think we have had enough of this government instructing committees to do things. We think it is about time the House of Commons instructed some committees, and we say we should instruct this committee to develop alternatives to those proposals which are disincentives. We are not contending that the committee should be instructed to develop alternatives to the white paper—God forbid! We are saying the committee should be given instructions to develop, and I presume to report to the House, alternatives to some of the proposals which, in our opinion, constitute disincentives.

I am not allowed to enlarge on this argument. In any event, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made a tremendous case and established beyond any measure of doubt, except for those who are partisan, that there are disincentives in the white paper. Under these circumstances, I submit that what we are doing falls within the provisions of citation 201 of Beauchesne, which reads:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon.—

Speaking for myself, I would have the greatest difficulty voting for the motion, because in the absence of some instructions to the committee I fear the reference of the white paper may well be a waste of time. I would be far more inclined to vote for the motion than I am at the present time if there were added to it an instruction to the committee to develop some alternatives. I suggest we must read into the amendment an instruction to the committee to put forward in its report to the House some alternatives to the proposals contained in the white paper.

If a simple, ordinary, harmless amendment of this nature falls beyond the scope permitted hon. members of this House in dealing with a proposal by the government to send a document to a committee for consideration and report, then there is really very little we can do at all. There are a number of citations dealing with this point, but I am sure Your Honour has looked at them. I suggest to Your Honour that we are brought squarely within the ambit of citation 201. We are offering an amendment which will make this proposition far more palatable to the members of our party.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I find myself at a disadvantage. Although Your Honour did indicate you had some reservations, you did not say in which area you might find the amendment repugnant to the rules. I am sure Your Honour would not expect hon. members to argue in a vacuum, or to try to cover the whole spectrum in the hope that some of the objections they raise might anticipate some of Your Honour's reasoning. I have some difficulty understanding what the objection is here. Is Your Honour bothered about whether it is a substantive motion requiring notice? I am not, of course, questioning Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I might intervene to tell the hon. member that there are a number of things that I thought might be doubtful in connection with the amendment. However, the hon. member for Peace River, who is an expert on the procedures of the House of Commons, put his finger on the difficulty and without question went straight to the point and put forward an argument in support of the acceptability of the amendment. In doing so he argued exactly the point about which I do have some reservations. If the hon.

member would pursue the type of argument that was made by the hon. member for Peace River, it would be helpful to the Chair.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I thought we had zeroed in on the right point, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the amendment is correct in form, in that it is reasoned and does modify the original proposal. It is not negative in the sense of being a double negative. Therefore, I think in form the amendment is in order. As to whether it is a substantive matter, something that is new, again I strongly support the argument of my colleague from Peace River. The rule imposes an obligation upon the committee. I think we must interpret rules as having some purpose behind them. The rule in question here says that the committee shall be empowered to consider and to report. The purpose of the committee is to report on the white paper. If I may follow some of the suggestions made by my colleague, if that were not the purpose one could say the committee could take the report and flush it down the drain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But that is going from the sublime to the ridiculous and is well beyond a reasonable approach. I put it to Your Honour that the purpose of this rule must be effected.

• (4:10 p.m.)

If anything else was meant by rule 65(8) and the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) that the committee should consider the white paper and then report its recommendations to the House, some other direction would have to be given. If the government had included the direction that the committee should hear witnesses, that part of the motion would be redundant because the committee is already empowered by the rule—in fact, directed by the rule—to do these things, and how to conduct itself. That has been our practice, and this is our understanding of the rule. This is the only effective way the rule can function.

The white paper shall be referred to the committee, which shall consider and report. It may call witnesses and it may make recommendations. It could merely report, but in so doing I would say it would be putting the House in the almost ridiculous position of directing a committee to consider certain aspects and then report and, if it sees fit, to make recommendations.

If it is open to this House to give these directions, I say to Your Honour that it is open to any member of the House to bring forward an amendment within reasonable terms, that is, it must be relevant to the motion, and so forth. Therefore, this motion is quite in order; otherwise, I put it to Your Honour that there is no sensible way in which a motion referring any matter to a committee could be amended. We would then come to the ultimate position that such motions are unamendable by this House. I do not think that is the proper interpretation of the rule or its intent. Not must we give effect to the letter of the rule, but we must give effect to its intention. I submit that on these grounds the amendment is completely in order.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments in respect of the motion. I hope to be as helpful to the Chair as others who have commented on it. Order No. 32 listed under Government Orders on today's Order Paper reads as follows:

> That the white paper entitled Proposals for Tax Reform, tabled in the House on November 7, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

That is the broadest kind of resolution, designed to place a government proposal in the hands of a committee with the broadest possible opportunity to examine every aspect of it, to call witnesses and to report upon the proposal in any way it sees fit. As I understand the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), if it were to pass the motion would read: "That the white paper be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with instructions to develop alternatives to the proposed disincentives affecting middle income groups and small businesses in particular, and which increase the vulnerability of Canadian enterprise to foreign take-overs.

This is a restrictive amendment which reduces the function of the original motion to an examination of the white paper for a certain specific purpose. The amendment does not carry out the intention of the original motion and, in fact, changes it to something quite different, that is, a restricted examination of some aspects of the white paper.

If I understand the purpose of today's debate following the very general motion of the minister, it is to give all members of this House an opportunity to advise the House of Commons, and specifically the members of the committee, what they think of the proposals in the white paper, and to advise as to the areas that should be looked at when the committee is in session. This was done by the Leader of the Opposition today when he made his speech. He spoke of some aspects of the white paper of which he disapproved. Presumably, the members of his party who will sit on the committee were listening to him and taking notice of the points he was making.

It is my submission that when we refer a white paper of this kind to a committee for examination, it is never our intention as members of the House of Commons to place restrictions on the way in which that white paper should be examined, or to narrow the examination of the policies set forth in the white paper. The intention is that each member of the House, no matter whether he sits on that side or on this side, should be free and unfettered to attend the committee, investigate every aspect of the white paper and report upon it in the best way possible.

If hon. members opposite had faith in their own members of the committee, having told them in this House what their views are they would find an excellent report coming back from the committee. I do not suppose it was really the intention of the Leader of the Opposition to restrict his members in the work they do on the committee. I suggest that for these reasons the amendment does not add to what we are doing here, but rather detracts from it.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question? Would the hon. member agree that it would be the right of any member of the committee to move a motion along the lines contained within the four corners of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Deachman: I certainly think it would be a right. Having listened to the views of hon. members opposite, I am sure those members of the hon. gentleman's party who are interested in moving such a motion will do so in the committee. Why should hon. members opposite who will attend the committee meetings be given this kind of restrictive instruction to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That aspect of the debate might be pursued in the committee. I think at the moment we should limit our discussion specifically to the procedural aspects of the motion.

[Mr. Deachman.]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to repeat the arguments that have been put forward, but I should like to read part of Standing Order 5(8) as follows:

> Standing committees shall be severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House, and, to report from time to time—

It then goes on to list the duties. If the amendment instructed the committee to obtain counsel or do certain things in order to examine this red manifesto—it is not a White paper—I do not think Your Honour would have any difficulty with it. We have to get around, and I think this is what is bothering Your Honour, any instructions in the amendment that in fact change those matters which the committee is to examine. That might be a matter of argument or inference, and it is probably a matter for the committee to decide. Surely, specific and proper instructions can be given to a committee.

I think now is the time to point out this important fact. We were told, when committees were changed and took over the right of the House of Commons to sit as a committee of the whole to examine bills and estimates, that they would be non-partisan and would function as such, along the lines of Congressional committees. We have found that this is not the case.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, I think it is putting too much onus on you to ask Your Honour to make a decision in this regard. I think this is a matter on which Parliament should vote in order to decide whether this amendment should be allowed in respect of the red manifesto. It is a red manifesto, because it is red and it is a manifesto. We are saying that when the committee takes a look at the white paper, whether or not it has counsel, expert or other witnesses before it, it should have certain instructions, and those instructions should be to develop alternatives to the proposed disincentives affecting middle-income groups and small businesses in particular. We should zero in on these things.

Surely the instructions do not say that we cannot examine those parts which take away all incentives. The committee must look at this aspect of the matter because this red manifesto is very hard on Canadians in the middle-income group. I can understand Your Honour's problem. If it were a matter of saying that the committee was to have before it counsel and certain witnesses, that would perhaps be adding to the instructions of the committee. All you are properly concerned with, Mr. Speaker, is whether this amendment altogether changes another document.

I am like Browning; I believe that only God and the people who drew the document really know what is in it. The government really thinks the committees are creatures of its creation. Parliament controls the committees, and surely we can say what we should do when studying this difficult and comprehensive document. I think this is the problem. Surely my good friends are not frightened of this amendment coming to a vote.

Mr. Baldwin: They almost were the other day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) seems to want to add to the argument. I doubt that anything new can be said at this point. I have heard learned argument from experts in procedure. Having said that, however, I would be pleased to hear also from the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to steal the show from the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the experts on rules and procedure, but I do wish to raise one point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How did I get into this?

Mr. Lundrigan: I gather that Your Honour is concerned that perhaps the amendment tends to eliminate the original motion. I certainly would not support any amendment that was so restrictive that it directed the committee to take specific action such as was the situation, for example, a few days ago when a committee was directed to reduce the voting age to 18. I should like to draw attention to something that was touched on by the hon. member for Peace River. I believe that on two grounds the amendment ought to be ruled in order. First of all, it does not give specific direction to the committee. The amendment is very broad. It refers to developing alternatives, and in that regard it is in very broad terms.

Having spent the last two weeks studying in detail the white paper on taxation, I suggest to Your Honour that the amendment gets at the very guts, if I may use that term, of the white paper. The very broad areas in the white paper to which we feel Parliament should take exception are covered in this amendment. On the ground that we are giving the committee very little direction, and on the ground that the amendment we propose gets to the essence of the objections of the House to the white paper, I support the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). On the basis of Standing Order 65(8) I feel we have no alternative but to let the House rule on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their counsel. I thank each one in turn for the assistance he has extended to the Chair. Hon. members must realize that the Chair has to rule strictly on procedural grounds. A number of the arguments presented were in some way substantive. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) referred to the substance of what he called the red manifesto. I think he indicated that perhaps the Chair should study this document and decide whether the amendment would or would not affect the substance of it. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) presented an argument along much the same lines. Fortunately, the Chair does not have to go into that aspect of things before rendering the type of judgment it must render at the present time. The situation is more simple than that.

The hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in the course of their arguments have shown that they understand exactly what the difficulty is. It is not necessary to indicate to them what are the worries of the Chair. What we must determine now is whether it is possible to amend this type of very simple and basic motion to the effect that a certain document be referred to a committee. In my view, it is very difficult to amend this kind of motion. I find it difficult to imagine any amendment that would be in order. Hon. members might even wonder whether it is necessary, in the first instance, to have this type of motion at all. That might be a very good point to consider. But that is not the kind of argument in which the Chair should become involved.

The effect of the motion is that this document be referred to a committee. That is the only proposition with which I must deal. The hon. member for Peace River said that in his view there are many arguments to support the proposition that the amendment is acceptable, the best one of course being that he seconded it. I might say that perhaps that is the only good argument for accepting it. I wonder whether it is necessary to do this, but for the record I shall read the motion again.

That the White Paper entitled Proposals for Tax Reform, Tabled in the House on November 7, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

As I have indicated, it may well be that the committee could have easily, on its own initiative, studied this document without the initiative of the government in referring the document to the committee. However, this is the motion which has been proposed and which is being considered by hon. members. That is the motion which is before the House for debate today and on Monday. The amendment reads as follows:

That the motion be amended by adding the following to it:

with instructions to develop alternatives to the proposed disincentives affecting middle income groups and small businesses in particular, and which increase the vulnerability of Canadian enterprise to foreign take-overs.

As I said, the motion is a simple one. It proposes the reference to a standing committee of a document which deals with tax reform. The motion before the House can, I suppose, in some way be amended. But certainly the amendment proposed would have to be relevant to and have the effect of amending the main motion. It must not seek to amend the question which the motion would refer to the committee for consideration. That is the whole point of argument. What we are trying to do through this amendment is go behind the motion and alter or affect in some way the substance of the question which will be considered by the committee if the motion were adopted by the House.

• (4:30 p.m.)

In my view, the amendment endeavours to reach behind the motion and attempts to direct the committee to consider certain propositions which would appear to be outside the scope or the content of the motion which is before the House. In effect, the proposed amendment is not only irrelevant in the procedural sense to the motion it purports to amend, but it also seems to raise a new and substantive question which under our standing orders can only be moved after the appropriate notice. In other words, there is the additional difficulty that it not only goes beyond the terms of the simple motion before us at the present time, but it is also in the form of a substantive motion which can be moved only after appropriate notice.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I should say that Standing Order 47 has the effect of precluding an amendment of this kind. For the benefit of the record I will read the standing order. It reads:

47. A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to a Committee of the Whole, or any Standing or Special Committee, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

I think that hon. members who sought to enlighten the Chair on the question were silent on the effect of Standing Order 47.

Mr. Baldwin: We realized Your Honour would find it!

Mr. Speaker: In the circumstances it is very difficult for the Chair to overlook the provisions of Standing Order 47 and to rule in any other way except that the amendment should not be put to the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask Your Honour a question? On the basis of your ruling, under Standing Order 47 it would be impossible for any member of the opposition or of the government to advance an amendment stating that the committee shall report by date "X", if that were the sense of the House as a result of discussion. I find that rather difficult to accept.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who just asked the question, having illustriously occupied the chair before the present holder of this office, knows that the Chair does not reply to theoretical questions.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might seek the permission of the House to conclude my remarks. I would require an additional seven minutes.

Mr. Speaker: This would, of course, require the unanimous consent of the House. There is a difficulty in that the hon. member whose motion was to be considered by the House during private members' business may feel that he is being deprived of an opportunity to present his case. I assume that hon. members would want to ensure that the hon. member who would be affected adversely this way would be given an opportunity and priority to present his motion on another occasion. This matter might be considered at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: We are quite impartial as to whether we hear the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) or the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). We have no feelings about it one way or the other.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) is a very generous and co-operative person and is willing to agree. I think, also, that if we adjourned seven minutes from now there might be some disappointment among all these friends of ours in the press gallery who anticipate something happening at five o'clock. So we have to stay here anyway.

Mr. Saltsman: I am willing to allow the hon. member for Don Valley to proceed. There will be enough time left for me to present my motion.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the House, and in particular the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) for affording me this opportunity. In my consideration of the white paper I was speaking of its effect on small business. Many critics regret that more attention has not been paid to the importance of small and independent business. I regret this as well, and I want to make a few comments about it. But before doing so I would like to contradict those hon. members who suggest that small business has now been put on the same basis as big business. This is just not true. Although initial rates are the same, the closely-held business tax can be fully integrated with the personal tax of the owner, while the tax on the big, widely-held corporation can only be half-integrated. By my reckoning, this still gives the successful small businessman more than $10,000 a year less tax than the man who shares the profits of big corporations. Moreover, as a further preference over big business, he is not subject to the peculiar and difficult obligation to pay a tax every five years on the increased growth and value of his business.

But the white paper as it stands has met some criticism from small business in spite of its continued favoured treatment vis-à-vis big business, and I would like to deal with these complaints. The complaints are partly legitimate, partly not. It does not seem fair to me that the small businessman should be able to continue to pay less tax on his disposable income than the fellow who may be an independent professional, a salaried worker or an incorporated businessman. That is the effect of the combination of a low rate on corporate accumulation and the variety of techniques available for extracting retained earnings at lower rates of tax. On the other hand, unlike the professional or salaried employee, the small businessman has a special need for capital to grow, which the low rate in the past provided.

This low rate encouraged him to leave profits in the business and to use them constructively. Much has been said about the value and importance of small business in our economy. It is not necessary to repeat it, but to highlight the special problem of the businessman who wants to expand, I need only observe that the cost of increasing inventories of goods and the expenses of plant expansion are not deductible and never have been. The least that can be said for the low rate is that it gave some relief to the businessman who wanted to apply his capital to either of these socially worth-while objectives.

So that while I am against the preservation of the low rate, I would like to propose a measure which is not inconsistent with the white paper in its present form. It will also assist small business in its need to have the use of capital to expand which, so far as I can see, is the only legitimate claim the small businessman can make for special treatment. In this respect, the small businessman's problem is heightened by the reduced availability of capital from conventional sources. At the same time, while providing capital to growing businesses, the proposal will not narrow the tax base or reduce the ultimate tax payable to the government.

What I would like to suggest might be called an expansion allowance. Like a capital cost allowance, it would permit the acceleration of deductibility of certain costs of inventory and plant expansion, and I hope that it would apply to 100 per cent of the costs concerned up to a reasonable maximum of, say, $15,000 per year. To achieve its purpose of encouraging businesses to grow, it would be applicable only to increases in inventory over the prior year and to increases in classes of capital expenditure. Eventually, when the concern's growth slowed down and the special claim for capital was no longer present, the expansion allowance would no longer be available. The deferred taxes would then become payable through liability to tax at the normal rate but still, of course, subject to the tax advantages over the widely-held corporations which I described.

The proposal for an expansion allowance will remind some hon. members of the proposals of the Carter report for special capital cost allowances for new businesses to the extent of $250,000. The expansion allowance has the advantage that it is available for small but growing businesses and not just for new business, that it applies to inventory as well as capital assets, and that it is not subject to the abuse of encouraging new incorporations and re-incorporations, as the Carter proposal does.

The white paper promises a new look at the question of capital cost allowance. I urge the government to consider adapting the capital cost allowance system to the expansion allowance which I have proposed. There are a number of other aspects of the white paper about which I would like to have spoken—entertainment expenses, for example, where serious abuses have occurred under the present system but where there is a legitimate interest in the continued deductibility of genuine business expenses for entertainment. I would also like to have had time to deal with the effect of the capital gains tax on five-year accruals not applying to foreign investments. But as a member of the tax committee, no doubt I will have the opportunity to do so later. I thank the hon. member for Waterloo for his indulgence, Mr. Speaker.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. TRUDEAU—REFERENCE TO LETTER FROM MR. SAULNIER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. In reply to questions asked of me this morning by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), asking if I had received a letter from Mr. Saulnier with respect to the activities of the Company of Young Canadians, I replied in the negative. Notwithstanding the admonition of the right hon. gentleman that memories can be faulty, I nevertheless insisted that I knew of no such letter. I added, however, that "if there were such a letter, I would not hide it."

Mr. Speaker, I should have heeded the wise counsel of the right hon. gentleman. On examination of my files I find that Mr. Saulnier did indeed write to me on March 17 of this year on this subject. I wish to apologize through you, Mr. Speaker, to the House and to the right hon. member for my erroneous reply. I have taken this earliest opportunity of correcting the record.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

I hasten to add, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection whatever to tabling Mr. Saulnier's letter and my reply thereto. Because Mr. Saulnier had written to me on a personal and confidential basis, however, I must seek his consent to such tabling. I shall try to reach him this week end and see if it is possible. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this correspondence followed shortly upon my conversation of last spring with Mr. Saulnier, about which I talked to the House yesterday, and perhaps for that reason the two events became confused in my mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It being after four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nowlan: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So am I, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I said a few minutes ago that the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) was willing to take a truncated period for his public bill, but now that the time has been shortened to only 15 minutes, and in view of the fact that we have had the statement from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that we were anticipating at five o'clock, my hon. friend would prefer if we cancelled the private members' hour today, so that there would be the full period for the discussion of his bill on another occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order as a result of the Prime Minister's point of privilege. Mr. Saulnier in his evidence last night and today before the parliamentary committee said that he would table the letter that he wrote to the Prime Minister, but since he did not have it in his files he would return to Montreal and send it. While the Prime Minister may very well be able to contact him this week end, before or during the Grey Cup, in view of Mr. Saulnier's evidence before the parliamentary committee I do not see what harm there would be in having the letter published in today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: That is an argument advanced by the hon. member in favour of the suggestion that the letter be tabled now. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated the reason why he should delay tabling it until the start of next week. I believe that the matter could easily rest until Monday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move that we now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 4.47 p.m.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

TABLING OF LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MR. LUCIEN SAULNIER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House last Friday afternoon, during the week-end I sought Mr. Saulnier's permission to my tabling the letter he sent me on March 17, as well as my reply dated April 1.

[English]

I did obtain this permission from Mr. Saulnier, Mr. Speaker, and I am prepared to table these two letters now.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I desire leave, by unanimous consent, to introduce under Standing Order 43 a motion which I consider to be of urgent and pressing necessity. I do so on the following grounds:

1. The statement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion on November 26, reported in Hansard at page 1268, expressing the hope that the committee "will be able to meet as soon as the House returns in January", meaning that the government does not intend to propose to the House an order of reference for the committee before seven weeks have passed at the earliest.

2. The statement made yesterday on the CTV network by Dr. John Young, Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, that if present trends continue unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces would be very serious by March.

I therefore move, seconded by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the Standing Committee on Regional Development be empowered to examine and inquire into the following:

The present and worsening unemployment situation in the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces; and that the first report thereon, with its recommendations, if any, be submitted not later than December 19, 1969.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East. According to Standing Order 43 the motion can be put before the House only if unanimous consent is obtained. I have to ask whether there is such unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: The government said no.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege. In view of the fact that unanimous consent to put my motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 has been withheld, and in view of the urgency of this matter, I wish to serve notice on the leader of the House that I shall be instructing forthwith the Chief Clerk of Committees to convene immediately a meeting of the Standing Committee on Regional Development so that the committee can elect a chairman and vice-chairman and obtain the appropriate reference from the House to proceed with an examination—

Proposed Legislation

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East will probably have expected my ruling that this is not a question of privilege.

NEWFOUNDLAND TUNNEL AUTHORITY

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to establish an authority to undertake all preparatory steps necessary with a view ot the ultimate construction of a tunnel between the island of Newfoundland and the mainland of Labrador, with the objective of promoting an all-weather, multipurpose connection between those two land masses in the general interest of the national economy.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION RATE OF RETURN

Question No. 80—Mr. Rose:

1. Is the Government of Canada and/or the Canadian Radio-Television Commission presently giving favourable consideration to imposing formal limits on the financial rate of return of Community Antenna Television (CATV) systems in Canada?

2. If so, when is a decision expected on this issue?

3. If not, what are the reasons for not imposing a formal rate of financial rate of return?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State):

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. I am informed by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission that the CATV undertakings licenced by the CRTC are not public utilities subject to fixed rate of return structures determined by statutory bodies. However, the CRTC recognizes that its duty to implement the policy of the Broadcasting Act in the public interest may involve considerations of costs to the public and a licensee's responsibility for programming, both of which may affect the financial rate of return.

HOME MAIL DELIVERY

Question No. 99—Mr. Mather:

1. Which Canadian communities presently have the population to qualify for home mail delivery but are not receiving such a federal service?

2. What are the reasons for this discrimination and when is it expected that the above communities will be given home mail delivery?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. The basic requirement for the establishment of an independent letter carrier delivery service is the availability of 2000 points of call. No figure has been set as to required population. The communties having 2000 potential calls are: Amherstberg, Ont.; Arnprior, Ont.; Bridgewater, N.S.; Castlegar, B.C.; Chatham, N.B.; Coaticook, P.Q.; Courtenay, B.C.; Delhi, Ont.; Fergus, Ont.; Hanover, Ont.; Hespeler, Ont.; Lac Megantic, P.Q.; Louiseville, P.Q.; Mont Laurier, P.Q.; Perth, Ont.; Sherwood Park, Alta.; Sidney, B.C.; Stephenville, Nfld.; Terrebonne, P.Q.; Whitehorse, Y.T.; Windsor, P.Q.

2. As part of its program to comply with general government policy for the control of inflation, the Post Office Department is not establishing new letter carrier delivery offices at this time. When future conditions are such as to accommodate the establishment of additional letter carrier delivery offices, consideration will be given to providing door-to-door delivery in communities having 2000 points of call.

NEW GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS, OTTAWA

Question No. 102—Mr. Mather:

Which federal government buildings are anticipated to be built in Ottawa, starting construction in the calendar years 1969 and 1970?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Headquarters Building for the Department of External Affairs; Canadian Police Information Centre (R.C.M.P.); Office Building for the Dominion Bureau of Statistics; Greenbelt Farm—Intensive Research Sheep Barn; Greenbelt Farm—Minimal Disease Livestock Barn; Headquarters Building for Department of National Defence; and The National Science Library. Consideration is also being given to the construction of: Office building for the Department of Energy, Mines & Resources; Building for National Police Services (R.C.M.P.).

STATUS OF MISTASSINI INDIANS

Question No. 146—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. Do the Mistassini Indians in Northern Quebec come under the federal government's Indian Act?

2. Is the Department of Indian Affairs aware that the Mistassini Indians are being subjected to provincial game and fishing laws and, if so, what action is contemplated by the Department?

3. Are the Indians of the Mistassini tribe permitted to hunt in the Mistassini game reserve and, if not, why not?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is aware that the Mistassini Indians are being subjected to provincial game and fishing laws beyond the immediate confines of the Mistassini Indian Settlement. Although this matter is within the provincial jurisdiction, possible action is now being discussed by Quebec Government officials, Association of Quebec Indians and officials of this Department.

3. Except for the provisions of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, the regulation of hunting in the area is a matter within the jurisdiction of the province.

CBC POLICY ON TELEVISION PROGRAM VIOLENCE

Question No. 150—Mr. Mather:

1. What presently is the general policy of the CBC on violence in television programming and its effects on viewers, especially children?

2. What are the results of the review of CBC policy regarding violence in television programming, as indicated in answer to Question No. 2,100 in Hansard of May 14, 1969, page 8683?

3. For the years, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969, which feature films and program series have been refused because of their violent character as mentioned in answer to Question No. 2,100?

4. Does the CBC consider that its new fall broadcasting program has not an undue content of violence?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. It is CBC's practice not to broadcast entertainment programs which unduly exploit violence and not to schedule a large number of program series built around themes of violent action. In its news and public affairs programs the CBC has acted with restraint in showing scenes of violence; for example, from battlefields or riots. It continues to be CBC policy to reflect the reality of violence in the world in its information programs but not to dwell on scenes of violence for their sensational effect. In all programs the use of violence must be justified by strict standards of dramatic integrity and by its honest reflection of reality. The use of violence for its own sake or as a substitute for other dramatic values is not acceptable. The CBC practice regarding violence in children's programming is based on its general policy of programming for young people. It is not CBC's view that young people should be sheltered from the realities of life; but neither is it CBC's view that children are prepared for adult entertainment. The CBC has tried to produce programs and to select films whose content and treatment are consistent with what is known about the creative growth and development of North American children.

2. The previous policy, particularly as it related to programs for adults, was strengthened. Program staff were provided with a general policy statement supported by specific examples of what must be avoided.

3. No record has been kept of feature films or syndicated program series which have been refused because of their violent character.

4. The Corporation is satisfied that its schedules for 1969/70 meet the tests specified in (1) above.

CBC—REDUCTION OF PROGRAM VIOLENCE

Question No. 151—Mr. Mather:

1. Is the CBC giving favourable consideration to reducing the number of T.V. programs containing violence?

2. Is the CBC giving favourable consideration to the elimination of violence from Children's cartoon T.V. programs?

3. Is the CBC giving favourable consideration to the scheduling after 9 p.m. of all T.V. crime programs and western and adventure stories which contain violence?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The CBC does not consider that it has in the past scheduled an excessive amount of violent programming. The Corporation has, on the whole, successfully applied a policy of restraint in this area of its programming and will continue to do so.

2. Aside from one series on the English network, which will be discontinued as soon as the present contract has expired, the Corporation is satisfied that its programs for children meet the standards outlined in reply to Question No. 150, Part 1.

3. Each program must be judged on its own merits and it is difficult to generalize in terms of broad program categories. However, the Corporation will continue to minimize the exposure of programs which could be construed as violent, in keeping with CBC policy as outlined in reply to Question No. 150, Part 1.

CBC NEWS COVERAGE ARRANGEMENTS WITH U.S. NETWORKS

Question No. 175—Mr. Broadbent:

What arrangements does the CBC have with U.S. television networks for coverage of (a) U.S. news (b) World news?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: The CBC has access to U.S. world news coverage of the two major U.S. networks, NBC and CBS. In return, the CBC provides these networks with access to CBC coverage. There are other available sources of U.S. world news coverage, including CBC overseas bureaux, the Commonwealth newsfilm agency known as Visnews and such world news agencies as Associated Press, Reuters, United Press International and Agence France-Presse.

BANK OF CANADA—RESEARCH STUDIES

Question No. 265—Mr. Burton:

1. For the fiscal years 1968-69 and 1969-70, what specific research studies have been undertaken by the Research Branch of the Bank of Canada?

2. Who are the individuals involved in these studies and when is it anticipated that these studies will be completed?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. Much of the work undertaken in the Research Department of the Bank of Canada involves the continuing analysis of current economic and financial developments in Canada and abroad for internal use within the Bank. Special studies of particular subjects are also undertaken for the same purpose. These concern the internal administration of the Bank on which it is not appropriate to answer questions.

In addition to the research studies referred to in the preceding paragraph, certain aspects of the Bank's research program have been reported in a series of reports published by the Bank known as Staff Research Studies and in professional journals. The following Staff Research Studies have been published: No. 1, Quarterly Business Capital Expenditures by R. G. Evans and J. F. Helliwell. No. 2, Canadian Inventory Investment by R. G. Evans. No. 3, RDXI by J. F. Helliwell, H. Shapiro, I. A. Stewart and L. Officer.

The following Staff Research Studies are to appear in the near future: No. 4, Government Sector Equations for Macroeconomic Models by J. F. Helliwell, R. G. Evans, F. W. Gorbet, R. Jarrett and D. Stephenson. No. 5, The Dynamics of RDXI by J. F. Helliwell, H. Shapiro, I. A. Stewart and L. Officer. No. 6, Canadian Housing and Mortgage Markets by Lawrence B. Smith.

The following articles have recently appeared or will appear in professional journals: "Consumer Attitudes, Buying Intentions and Expenditures: An Analysis of the Canadian Data," by H. Shapiro and G. Angevine, "The Canadian Journal of Economics," May 1969. "Labour-Force Participation in Canada," by L. Officer and P. R. Andersen, "Canadian Journal of Economics," May 1969. "A Structural Model of the Foreign Exchange Market," by J. F. Helliwell, "The Canadian Journal of Economics", February 1969. "An Econometric Analysis of Policy Choices for an Open Economy," by J. F. Helliwell, H. Shapiro, I. A. Stewart and L. Officer, "The Review of Economics and Statistics", November 1969.

COMPENSATION FOR COUNTERFEIT MONEY

Question No. 309—Mr. Caouette:

What steps does the Bank of Canada intend to take to compensate people who receive counterfeit money including banking institutions?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The Bank of Canada does not compensate individuals or institutions who receive counterfeit banknotes. The Bank points out that such a procedure would make more difficult the task of controlling counterfeiting since the public would be less on guard against counterfeit notes if holders were to be compensated. The Bank is concerned about the incidence of counterfeiting in Canada and is engaged in a continuing program of investigation to make its notes more and more difficult to forge. However, it believes that careful public scrutiny is and will remain a major deterrent.

STUDENT LOANS

Question No. 370—Mr. Robinson:

Is it the federal government's intention to increase the amount of the student loans in view of the inflation and increase in the cost of living that has taken place during the last five years since the program was initiated?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Amendments are currently being considered by Parliament which increase the level of loan provision under the Canada Student Loans Act. It is not proposed to alter the amounts which an individual student can borrow under the program.

POLLUTION ABATEMENT EQUIPMENT TAX INCENTIVES

Question No. 374—Mr. Goode:

Does the Minister of Finance presently have plans under consideration to extend Income Tax incentives now granted to industry for water pollution abatement equipment to include incentives for air pollution abatement equipment and does the Minister plan to initiate action to eliminate federal sales tax from both these types of equipment?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This is a matter of government policy. If the government proposes amendments to the Income Tax Regulations or to the Excise Tax Act they will be announced at the appropriate time.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT—TAX COMPENSATION TO QUEBEC

Question No. 440—Mr. Dionne:

1. What was the amount of tax compensation granted to the Province of Quebec since the adoption of the Canada Student Loans Act and in what form was such compensation granted?

2. How many students from each province have benefited from a loan under this Act?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. There is no tax compensation to any province with respect to the Canada Student Loans Act. However, the Province of Quebec has received the following alternative payments under the Canada Student Loans Act—

Loan Year in Respect of which Payment Made	Amount of Payment
1964/65	$ 74,262.00
1965/66	$ 757,448.00
1966/67	$ 1,230,572.00
1967/68	$ 2,402,552.00
1968/69	$ 2,915,698.00

The alternative payment is a cash payment to the Province of Quebec and is determined by applying the ratio of the general population in the 18 to 24 year age group in Quebec to the same population in the rest of Canada at the beginning of the loan year to the total of the statutory costs incurred by federal government during that loan year.

2. Number of certificates of eligibility issued to students by participating provinces—July 1, 1964 to June 30, 1969—

PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYEES' WAGES

Question No. 456—Mr. Caouette:

What steps are taken or contemplated to ensure that wages paid to employees of the Department of Public Works are on a par with those paid to Department of National Defence employees, including the Canadian Forces, when both Departments co-operate in joint or combined programs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Rates of pay for most employees of the Public Service are determined through the collective bargaining process. In the case of employees excluded from collective bargaining because they are employed in a managerial or confidential capacity, rates of pay are established by the Treasury Board, which takes into consideration the salaries prescribed in collective agreements for employees in the relevant occupational group and level.

The collective agreements signed by the Treasury Board and the bargaining agents apply to all members of the bargaining units regardless of department. Consequently, all employees classified in a given occupational group and level are paid the same rate of pay, whether they are employed in the Department of Public Works, National Defence, or any other department.

For some groups in the Operational Category, rates of pay vary according to geographic location. In these cases, employees classified in a given occupational group and level would receive different rates of pay depending on the geographic location of their place of work.

[Mr. Benson.]

Where the Departments of Public Works and National Defence are cooperating in joint or combined programmes, the Public Service employees involved receive the rate of pay that is prescribed in the collective agreement for their classification and locality of employment. If differences are found to exist in the rates of pay of employees, they can be attributed to the fact that there are differences in classification levels, or differences in the locality of employment if the employees are under a zone system of pay.

The rank and classification structure and the terms and conditions of employment of the Canadian Armed Forces are significantly different from those of the Public Service. For this reason it is possible that on a job-for-job basis there may be differences in rates of pay as between members of the Forces and Public Service employees. On the other hand, every attempt is made to ensure that the level of salaries in the Forces is generally comparable to that of the Public Service, taking account of differences in terms and conditions of employment.

VANCOUVER DISTRIBUTION OF PROPOSALS FOR TAX REFORM

Question No. 463—Mr. Harkness:

1. How many copies of the Proposals for Tax Reform were sent to Vancouver for distribution there?

2. How many of these copies were in English and how many in French?

3. If French copies were sent to this area and distributed to English-speaking firms, what reasons would the department have for such action?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. 1,075.

2. English, 1,050; French, 25.

3. So far as is known, French copies were distributed only to those firms or individuals who specifically requested them. Any distribution to English-speaking firms which had not requested copies in French would have been unintentional.

SPEECH BY MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 464—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. Did the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development deliver a speech on October 2, 1969 to the Saskatchewan Liberal Women's Federation meeting in Regina and, if so, was this speech distributed and to whom?

2. How many copies of this speech were reproduced?

3 What was the total actual and estimated cost of preparing, reproducing, collating, stapling and mailing of these copies?

4. Was this same speech with minor modifications reproduced under a title page entitled, "Statement by the Honourable Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development based on a speech delivered in Regina, October 2, 1969" and, if so, was the reproduction distributed and to whom?

5. How many copies of the reproduction referred to in part 4 were reproduced?

6. What was the total actual and estimated cost of preparing, reproducing, collating, stapling and mailing the reproduction referred to in part 4?

7. What minor modifications, in detail, were made to the original speech?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes—M.P.'s and Senators, Press Media, Chiefs of Indian Bands, General Mailing Lists.

2. 3573 (English), 600 (French).

3. $247.

4. Yes. To general mailing list including subscribers to the Indian News. The remaining copies are used to answer public requests on the subject.

5. 57,500.

6. $4,600.

7. Original speech with minor modifications in detail follows.

"The Government Policy on Indians
What is the Debate About?"

A speech by the Honourable Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to the Saskatchewan Women's Liberal Federation, Regina, Saskatchewan, October 2, 1969.

In June I announced the Government's proposals for an Indian policy. I hoped that a vigorous debate might start over the policy proposals put forward. The debate duly began and is continuing, but much of it is not over the proposals advanced by the government. The debate has become clouded because of misunderstandings, misinterpretation, and a lack of knowledge on the part of the Canadian public of the Indian situation.

The policy Statement is pretty clearly written. The English, French and Cree texts agree with each other. It is a straightforward document. But while in this age of instant communication everyone knows within minutes that an announcement has been made, few seem to find out what it was that was announced.

Let me explain.

The statement is NOT a final policy decision to be implemented regardless of what anyone else says.

The Statement does NOT propose or suggest that Indian reserves should be abolished.

The Statement does NOT propose that the provincial governments should take over responsibility for Indian land.

The Statement does NOT propose to disregard the Treaties and end them unilaterally.

The Statement does NOT propose that the federal government "abandon" the Indian people to the provinces without ensuring that the provinces have the resources to maintain and improve upon the existing level of programs and services.

The Statement does Not suggest that Indians, or Indian bands should be given clear, freehold title to their land within five years—or indeed within any period of time at all.

The Statement does NOT advocate any weakening of Indian culture or identity. It does NOT advocate the assimilation of Indian people.

The statement is clear on all these points. On many occasions, both privately and publicly, to Indian and non-Indian people alike, I have tried to clear up these misinterpretations.

Now what does the policy statement say?

It says that the time has come to change a system which has been discriminatory and paternalistic towards Indian people.

It says that the proposals contained in the policy statement are to be discussed with Indian people, provincial governments and the Canadian public before any of them are implemented.

It says that provinces should extend the services to Indians that they extend to others who dwell within their domain and that the federal government will transfer funds to help them do it.

It says that representatives of the Indian people should be involved in discussions with the provinces.

It says that federal departments will do this concurrently with those provinces which agree.

It says that the Indian people should control their own land.

It says that those bands which want title to their land should be able to take it.

It says that if the provinces extend their services to Indians and other federal departments besides mine do likewise, the Department of Indian Affairs would be phased out of operation. After all, Indian Affairs has been attacked by everybody. Who could complain if the Government believed that the critics had meant what they said?

The Statement says that it hopes the phasing out could be done in five years. And this reference to five years applies ONLY to the phase-out process. It goes on to say that the matter of Indian control of Indian land will take longer. Among the numbers of years which are greater than five, there is wide range of choices. But everyone has fixed on five years, which is impossible. There are 550 bands. There are more than 2,000 reserves. An Indian Lands Act is necessary to protect the land. Such an Act will have to be talked about, consulted about, drafted, made into law and put into effect. In five years? Not at all. We know, and Indian people know, that this will take time.

The Statement said that the Treaties would be reviewed by the Indians and the Commissioner for Indian Claims to determine the best way of adjudicating claims arising from them.

The Statement said that the Government recognizes that all Canadians should acknowledge the virtues, strengths and richness of Indian culture and languages.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

The Statement said that the Government would develop, with the Indian people, programs to enrich their cultural heritage and their sense of identity.

How can these proposals be taken as an abrogation of Treaties? Do they sound like cultural genocide? I do not see how anyone can suggest that they are.

As soon as the policy proposal was made public, there were headlines about "turning the Indians over to the provinces".

Shortly after the headlines, there were editorials about the problems involved in doing that which was never suggested should be done.

At the same time some Indian leaders began telling the government it ought not to do that which many of them had sought for years.

What is needed now is a sensible and meaningful discussion about the steps to be taken and to separate the principal components of the problem so that they can be dealt with one after another, or jointly where possible.

We want to talk. We want to have a dialogue with Indian spokesmen and we want the provinces to join in the talks.

I can well appreciate the reaction of Indian people towards the policy proposals. The proposals represent a dramatic break with the past. Spokesmen for the Indian people have asked for time to consider the proposals and to draft alternative proposals of their own. This is a reasonable position to take.

Indian people, because of past experiences, have a deep distrust of governments, both federal and provincial, and tend to regard the proposals with suspicion. In private meetings with representatives of the Indian people I have explained the policy proposals, and I have listened to their comments and criticisms. These meetings have been helpful and many more will be held.

There is room for disagreement about what is to be done. There is room for a great deal of discussion before anything is done.

There is no room for rejecting out of hand that which was never proposed at all.

Last year a series of meetings with spokesmen for each band of Indian people were held. It soon became apparent that the Indian Act, as such was not the first priority of many Indian people. It also soon became apparent that the restrictions imposed by the present Act had outlived their usefulness. It was clear that the Government could not sit back. It had to respond to what Indian people had been saying.

It was clear to the Government that many Indians were preoccupied by considerations of their treaties and rights. It was equally clear that this is a complex matter that cannot be resolved quickly.

The Government does not believe that the whole matter of the Indian people's wellbeing should be set aside pending resolution of treaty problems and claims. It is the Government's view that the various elements of the problem should be separated. Treaties include land entitlement. This major factor is dealt with as one which must be worked out on a band by band basis over an extended period of time.

The Government recognizes that many Indians want to see some safeguards which will insure that their land is not alienated from Indian occupancy, remains with the band, and cannot be grabbed by land speculators. The Government hopes that an Indian Land Act can be evolved to provide Indian people with both control of their own land and the degree of protection for it which they feel is appropriate. The legislation will have to be flexible so that the degree of control and protection can be worked out and applied band by band.

Indian land will stay Indian land. It will not be up for grabs by speculators. This does not mean that the present federal trusteeship for Indian land—which is both bureaucratic and paternalistic—should remain. This does not mean that the Minister of Indian Affairs has to make every decision about every summer cottage site leased on Indian land.

It does not mean that Indian people should have to turn to Ottawa every time they want to act.

I would like to see a vigorous debate about what is proposed and what is needed, but I am not very enthusiastic about a debate based on badly written headlines and misinterpretations about the proposals. If people have alternative proposals, they should make their views known.

One thing is certain—the time has come for basic and fundamental changes in a system which works against the interests of Indian people. The federal government has made a series of proposals, aimed at creating a non-discriminatory society, for discussion with Indian people, provincial governments, and the Canadian public as a whole.

We have made these proposals in good faith, knowing full well that they would be controversial, but knowing also that if an attempt was not made to break the pattern of discrimination and paternalism of 100 years, that no progress could be made in solving the problems which have plagued Indian people for so long.

At the root of the Indian reaction to the proposals is distrust of government and Canadian society as a whole. This must change. Concerned Canadians should consider this problem, to be certain that each of us is doing his part to open the doors of opportunity and remove the blight of discrimination from this country.

It is Canadian business that has the jobs to offer Indian people. It is Canadian society which must break down the barriers of misunderstanding.

We cannot solve our problems in isolation. Everyone has a part to play.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

AUTOMOBILE, STEEL, NICKEL AND OIL PRICE INCREASES

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the need for public inquiries to be held into the sudden rash of price increases in the basic Canadian industries of automobiles, steel, nickel and oil, a course of action supported by the labour leaders involved in wage negotiations in these industries.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has given the Chair notice of his proposed motion in accordance with the requirements of this Standing Order. I have studied the motion and given this matter very serious thought. Undoubtedly the matter raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is one of great importance and one of serious concern to all hon. members. This does not mean, however, that it is acceptable under the provisions of Standing Order 26. In my view this rule is not intended to apply to circumstances such as those described by the hon. member in his proposed motion. Although he has used the words "sudden rash of price increases", the motion seeks to deal basically with a situation that has obviously existed for some time. This is evidenced by the number of questions which have been asked in the House for some weeks now on every one of the topics alluded to by the hon. member. The Chair must rule, therefore, that the question cannot be put to the House at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR RELATIONS

INCO STRIKE—ALLEGED DISCOURAGEMENT OF QUICK SETTLEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the interview yesterday with the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, will the minister say what department or agency of government discouraged a quick settlement of the Inco strike?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I watched the broadcast to which the hon. gentleman refers and I am not sure what his question has reference to.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I think the question is clear enough. I asked the hon. minister whether he would say what department or agency of the government discouraged, privately or otherwise, a quick settlement of the Inco strike last summer.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I should like to check the transcript of the broadcast as I am not aware of any department that intervened in the way the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, will the minister say whether the Prices and Incomes Commission in the course of this strike suggested any guidelines or limits of restraint within which the settlement should be made?

Mr. Basford: As I have explained before, and as was explained on the program to which the Leader of the Opposition made reference, the commission has been endeavouring to work out with private price and wage-makers in the country an acceptable formula of restraint.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister say categorically or will he not say categorically whether the government or an agency thereof discouraged settlement of the INCO strike last summer or, specifically, whether the government or an agency of the government suggested specific guidelines within which the company ought to try to settle the strike?

Mr. Basford: As I said, I will check the transcript of the broadcast. As I also said, I am not aware of any such action by the government but because of the hon. member's question I will check that.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Will the minister accept this copy of the transcript and give his answer right away? I will send it to him.

[Later:]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A while ago I was asked questions by the Leader of the Opposition and I have now been sent a copy of the transcript involved by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. I am very grateful, but it would seem to me the questions were based not on a quote from Dr. Young but on a question to him, not on an answer from him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not aware that the question was not disagreed with by the chairman?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: In other words, he agreed with it.

Mr. Speaker: May I have the co-operation of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. I would think this is hardly a question of privilege and I do not think the matter should be pursued further. The hon. member may have an opportunity later to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Hees: I was not speaking on the question of privilege, just a question of order. I asked the minister a straightforward question, which he will not answer, of course, because he never does.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he would give a perfectly simple straightforward answer to the question I asked and not to the question I did not ask. WIll the minister say yes or no as to whether the government, a department of the government or an agency of the government privately persuaded Inco from an earlier settlement of the strike and, alternatively, whether the government or an agency thereof indicated specific guidelines it did not wish exceeded in the case of that strike?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I can only answer on what I have responsibility for and in that light the answer is no.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STEEL, NICKEL, AUTOMOBILE AND OIL PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to make a statement on whether he will have a public inquiry made into the recent price iincreases in steel, nickel, automobiles and oil?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it might be helpful for me to say two things. First, it was envisaged in the white paper on price stability that inquiries by the commission would be conducted in private in order that they might be conducted as quickly as possible and that public reports would be made for examination by a committee of this House.

Second, perhaps I might read, in view of the hon. member's question and the previous motion, a telegram from the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission to Mr. Larry Sefton, director of the United Steelworkers of America, in which he says:

> As you know the Prices and Incomes Commission has been exploring with unions, business, farm and professional groups and governments the feasibility of reaching agreement on some generally acceptable form of price and income restraints. If a set of commitments of this kind were in place today agreed criteria and review procedures would exist for judging whether or not the recent price and wage increases at the International Nickel Company were justified. As you also know, however, the two major trade union federations—

Some hon. Members: Order!

[Mr. Hees:]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to make a lengthy statement it should be done by asking for the consent of the House to revert to motions.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer does not bear directly on the particular question I asked. Would he agree to have a standing committee of the House conduct an open, public inquiry?

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, it was made clear in the white paper to which I referred that the commission was intending as a general rule to conduct private inquiries, the reports on which would then be referred to a committee of the House for public examination and inquiry. As the chairman of the commission said in his wire, if the two major trade union federations had not rejected the approach of the commission but had agreed, there would now be in place agreed criteria for judging such increases.

LABOUR RELATIONS

VANCOUVER—DISPUTE BETWEEN GRAIN WORKERS UNION AND ELEVATOR OPERATORS

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the Minister of Labour. Because of what I consider a mutual desire that there be no more waterfront strikes in Vancouver, may I ask the minister whether he has sent a federal conciliator, as requested, to attempt to resolve the difficulties between the grain workers union and the elevator operators? If so, can he report on any progress that is being made?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Last week in Vancouver I met with both the union and management. Contrary to public opinion, both sides seemed to be encouraged that they would be able to reach settlement without a conciliation board.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand that a conciliator was not requested as reported in the newspapers?

Mr. Mackasey: I have not read the papers on that particular subject.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

OPINION OF LIBERAL COMMITTEE MEMBERS AS TO JUDICIAL INQUIRY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Does he agree with the viewpoint put forward over the weekend by a majority of Liberal members who sit of the committee investigating the operations of the Company of Young Canadians and who objected to a legal inquiry being conducted before the committee's report is officially released?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of any such discussion, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

TRADE

POSSIBLE BRITISH ENTRY INTO ECM—SAFEGUARDING OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of present negotiations for the entry of Britain into the European Common Market, what steps is the Canadian government taking to safeguard private Canadian trading interests, especially with relation to agricultural products, which would be affected by British membership in the ECM?

Mr. Speaker: The question is perhaps rather wide in scope but the Prime Minister might wish to reply to it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you do not have to take into consideration that the department will be answering questions tomorrow, but personally I would like to take that into consideration.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

LETTER TO PRIME MINISTER FROM MR. SAULNIER—ACTION BY SECRETARY OF STATE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Now that the letter from Mr. Saulnier and the reply of the Prime Minister have been tabled, will he tell the House frankly what he did after this matter was brought to his attention some time between March 17 and April 1? Did he get in touch with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or with any representative of the police? In short, what action did he take to put an end to the suggestions contained in the letter from Mr. Saulnier?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have already had an opportunity to explain very fully to the committee inquiring into this matter that—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are here in the House of Commons, not in the committee. You are to answer in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, that is what I was about to do. But there have been rumours—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Dont give us more of that supercilious contempt.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: —and I say it once more in the House, I have done what the minister could do, within the scope of my extremely limited powers under the act. I met the executive director of the Company of Young Canadians. I informed him of the concern expressed, as I have always done each time I have received expressions of misgivings, whatever the source. I also contacted the Solicitor General from time to time to ascertain whether he had any information he could pass on to me of a nature to either confirm or refute the complaints which had been placed before me.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on what date, following the receipt of that letter from Mr. Saulnier, did the minister first call in the director of the CYC and also communicate with the Solicitor General?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, since I do not keep a personal diary, I cannot give the exact date and I must answer: A few days later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it because he did not keep a personal diary that he allowed this matter to be brought before the House the other day and remained silent when he knew of the existence of the letter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor

General when the letter was brought to his attention, and when he had a conference with the Secretary of State in this regard? I am referring to the letter to which the right hon. member for Prince Albert referred a moment ago.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the letter was communicated to me immediately after the discussion between the Prime Minister and Mr. Saulnier took place, referred to in the Prime Minister's answer last week in the House of Commons. After that took place there were many discussions between the Secretary of State and myself on this subject, and all relevant information that would have a bearing on the matter was communicated to him by me and from him any that he had to me. Those conversations started immediately after the conference referred to by the Prime Minister and after he reported it to me.

An hon. Member: And vice-versa.

Mr. Woolliams: I am most interested in the Solicitor General's reply. When did he have a conversation with the Secretary of State and communicate it to the Prime Minister, if it was so important? I see the Prime Minister whispering to the minister, filling him in.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister suggest that he now remembers the letter and the fact that its contents were communicated to the Secretary of State right after the letter was received, although for the last couple of days there has been nothing but silence on the part of the government in regard to this important matter?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Solicitor General should be allowed to reply. Hon. members will recognize that considerable leniency has been allowed in the asking of these questions. This is the question period, not the cross-examination period—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: —but in view of the general interest in the matter raised by these questions I thought some leniency should be exercised and that the ministers questioned should be given an opportunity to reply. That is why I would allow the Solicitor General to reply to the last question.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for permitting me to answer this question by the right hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman, if he had listened to the answers—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which answer?

Mr. McIlraith: —I gave, would have noted carefully that I spoke of the subject matter that was in the letter. I did not see the letter nor did I know of it at that time, but the subject matter was disclosed to me at the time of the interview.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By whom?

Mr. McIlraith: By the Prime Minister of this country, who is very careful about these things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McIlraith: And it was communicated to me right after the discussions between Mr. Saulnier and the Prime Minister in Montreal. As I indicated to the House last week in answer to a question, I did not see the letter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Methinks you do protest too much.

Mr. McIlraith: —but I saw the letter on Friday afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE— STATEMENT BY JAMES EAYRES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence which arises out of his recent statement that Canada's role in chemical warfare is strictly one of defence. In his absence may I ask his Parliamentary Secretary to take notice of the question. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement reportedly made by Mr. James Eayres, Professor of International Relations at the University of Toronto, to the effect that Canada has always opened her gas chambers and germ tunnels at Suffield, Alberta, to British and U.S. establishments and that Canada's role has been one of "reckless hospitality"?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I have some doubts as to the form of the question.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION TO REDUCE SUPPORT

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the opposition of the Association of Dairy Farmers of Canada to the decision to reduce dairy price support by $10 million, is the minister reconsidering this decision?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have asked the representatives of the dairy industry and the many organizations concerned to give us their opinions as to the design of a dairy program for the 1970-71 fiscal year based on $115 million, and they are co-operating in providing us with their assistance in designing this program.

Mr. Moore: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was there any consultation with the representatives of the dairy farmers of Canada prior to the announcement by the minister?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, usually all of the changes in programs are announced only a day or two before the beginning of the dairy year, which is April. This year for the first time we have advised the dairy industry, and other industries respecting other matters, four months in advance so that they can help us to do the design work on the program.

[Later:]

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture related to the one asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. In reviewing the dairy policy between now and April 1, 1970, will the minister take steps to restore the quotas to the prairie west, representing some four million pounds of butterfat for Saskatchewan, two million pounds for Manitoba and two million pounds for Alberta?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put the question in the form of a representation which he has to assume will be taken into account.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF MATTERS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports emanating from the Outlook Conference that the 430,000 farmers in Canada may well be reduced to 150,000 in the coming decade, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture to tell us when he will refer some of these matters to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that they may receive the attention they deserve from the members of this House?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman read the reports of the Outlook Conference or the papers presented there as indicating that the number of farmers would be reduced to 150,000 in the next decade, then I suggest, Sir, that he did not read them very well.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister was: Will he give consideration to referring some of these urgent matters to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that it can meet and discuss them?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there will be a number of matters referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, such as the legislation that will be brought before the House, as well as the Department of Agriculture estimates and a number of other things. However, I think the hon. member realizes that there are a number of committees meeting now and it is not easy for members to find sufficient time to attend all of the committee meetings.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRAMS TO PREVENT INCREASE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the statement yesterday by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission that he considers that by next March unemployment east of Montreal will be unacceptably high, will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline what programs he and his department are planning to introduce in the immediate future so that this very serious situation does not develop as predicted by the chairman of the commission? On your feet!

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Colonel.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

As everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, the department under my jurisdiction is seriously getting to work.

We have received a great many applications concerning new industries. We have reached an agreement with the provinces about the creation of growth centres. The effect of our new policy will undoubtedly begin to be felt early next year.

[English]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Has the minister honestly not got anything more than these general hopes and wishes for the future? Can he not give us some concrete plans?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, when the Golden Eagle Company builds a plant at St. Romuald and the federal government pays them a $10 million grant, I think it is more than a general statement. In addition, when the McCain Food Company sets up a plant in New Brunswick, it is also more than a general statement. On the contrary, these are concrete solutions.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. What does the government propose to do about the growing and serious unemployment problem in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Speaker: The previous question, as I understood it, was whether the minister would make a statement on motions. I would think that the information now sought by the hon. member for St. John's East would normally be given to the House by way of a statement on motions and not by way of answer to a question at this time.

BROADCASTING

SALE OF TELEVISION STATION CKLW—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. It concerns the sale of Windsor television station CKLW. Is the minister giving favourable consideration to permitting the CBC to purchase this station in Windsor?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier.]

Mr. Speaker: The question should be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Rose: On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask a related question.

Mr. Rose: This is a related question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Secretary of State when he feels he can make a statement on motions, as he indicated in the House on November 26 he would consider doing?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): All I can say in reply, Mr. Speaker, is that the matter is being studied concurrently by several agencies, and this will not allow us to give answers or to come to decisions as quickly as if there were only one agency concerned.

[English]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CAPE BRETON—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF CO-ORDINATING COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion. I would ask the minister if the government has yet decided on a chairman for the co-ordinating committee in respect of development in Cape Breton?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member speaking on behalf of the president of Devco?

[English]

Would you repeat the question?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, might I be allowed the observation of calling the attention of the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that the minister asked the hon. member if he would kindly repeat the question as he did not understand or hear the question.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it would appear I got an answer before I asked the question and I was asked another question. Why answer one question—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has had a reply. We will go on to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister not to answer until he gets the question first. Has the government decided on a chairman for the co-ordinating committee with respect to the development of Cape Breton?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government made any arrangements for setting up this committee?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question really is supplementary to the question raised by a number of hon. members regarding unemployment in Atlantic Canada. On November 24 the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicated that any plans the department had would be announced in the House. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether in fact there are any plans by his department to alleviate the heavy unemployment and if he could indicate when he would be prepared to make a statement concerning the nature of these plans?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the original answer still stands.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister is passing out tidbits indicating he does have plans. I wonder whether we could have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DATE OF BY-ELECTION IN SELKIRK CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there has been a vacancy in the representation in this House with respect to the constituency of Selkirk for nearly six months, is the Prime Minister now in a position to say when the by-election to fill that vacancy will take place?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very shortly going to make an announcement to that effect. A decision has been taken and I had the impression it had been announced but perhaps it has not. I shall make the announcement very soon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister knows the date and if he thinks we all know it, why doesn't he tell us?

SOYABEANS—INQUIRY AS TO MARKET STABILIZATION PLAN

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister ready to announce to the House yet any government plan to stabilize the Canadian soyabean market, especially in view of recent representations by the producers organization regarding the present alarming situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have received some representations in this respect which, as the hon. member knows, we are considering very carefully.

OILSEEDS—STEPPING UP OF DELIVERY

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the current very low overseas shipment of wheat and the fact that the minister has suggested to agricultural producers a switch in production from wheat to other grains, would the minister give urgent consideration to having delivery of oilseeds stepped up in order that the producers of these seeds may be encouraged to make the necessary switch in production for the next crop year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in this current selling season the Canadian Wheat Board is in fact taking that into account and making special arrangements so that rapeseed and other oilseeds can be put in an export position as rapidly as there is a demand for them to be shipped into the export market.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I just want to fully understand and the people of Saskatchewan are naturally interested that when rapeseed has a foreign market the government will permit it to be sold. In view of the fact that Mr. Joe Caplan of Prince Albert was down here for several days a few weeks ago trying to get the consent of the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the right hon. member please ask the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to the sale of rapeseed for which there are orders abroad and hundreds of thousands of dollars available in foreign exchange, does the statement the minister just made mean that rapeseed may be sold outside the quota?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I have also had a meeting with Mr. Caplan and what he advocated through the resolution and so on was not a sharing of the market for rapeseed although he is one of the exporters; What he is asking is for him and his associates to have some special consideration so that they may move their rapeseed ahead of all the other farmers. I do not subscribe to that theory.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not true.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will the government consider taking steps to end the confusion that exists and the lack of co-ordination by putting rapeseed and flaxseed under the total jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Baldwin: A couple of resignations would help.

Mr. Olson: There is no confusion except perhaps in the minds of hon. members opposite who refuse to try to understand the situation.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—LABOUR UNREST—CONTINUITY OF OPERATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and relates to the day-long strike on the Canadian National car ferries between Tormentine and Borden. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether he has received a request from the government of Prince Edward Island and whether action is being taken to alleviate the labour unrest among Canadian National personnel on the Northumberland Strait car ferry system, as well as ensuring continuity of service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland as guaranteed under the terms of Confederation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If there was such a request by the end of last week, the matter has not yet been brought to my attention.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. When investigating this matter, would the Prime Minister ascertain whether such necessary maintenance as is required to service the car ferries can be obtained in the home port of Borden, thus perhaps alleviating some of the labour unrest there?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACCIDENT CAUSED BY SPILLING OF SULPHURIC ACID FROM TOY CAR

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and is related to the question the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway directed on Thursday last to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerning a toy car with a sulphuric acid battery that may be dangerous to children. Would the minister check with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and advise this House if in fact a public affairs program, prerecorded on November 2 for showing on November 27, the same day as the hon. member asked her question, was in fact cancelled and the producer subsequently fired after he pointed out in letters to his member and also to the management the potential hazards of this sulphuric acid battery propelled toy which is now on the market and being pushed in metropolitan areas of Canada in view of the season?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to check whether the allegations made by the hon. member are justified.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a related question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Because of the continuing safety hazard in some Christmas toys for children, will the minister take immediate steps to establish safety standards for toys so that parents and others can buy them without fear of possible consequences to their children?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been working on this for six months now and hope to draw up a safety standard. The matter is extremely complicated. The British have been working eight years drawing up such a standard. I am confident we will be much quicker than the British.

SPORTS

ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN SKI PATROL

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do so because I understand it comes under his jurisdiction. As a result of my question addressed to the Prime Minister some two weeks ago, has reconsideration been given to granting financial aid to the Canadian Ski Patrol during the present ski season?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

GERUSSI PROGRAM—ACTION RESPECTING REMARKS BY FRED DOBBS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State in his capacity as spokesman in the House for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Will the Secretary of State make inquiries as to why last Friday morning, on the CBC Gerussi program, one Fred Dobbs, a guest of Mr. Gerussi, was cut off the air when he made some unpleasant and unflattering remarks about the Minister of Finance and the figure of $30 a week compared with a salary of $800 a week?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISPOSAL OF CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE INSTRUMENTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wanted to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker, but in his unfortunate absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. It relates to the recent statement of the President of the United States having to do with the use of chemicals in war. Can the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether Canada has assurance from the United States that in the course of disposal of the stockpile of chemical and other warfare instruments of this nature the ocean deeps will not be used?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take the question as notice and I will inquire to find out whether such discussions took place.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could indicate to the House whether a statement could be made by the minister in order to alleviate any fear that this might possibly happen?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, whoever makes the statement on behalf of the government, the responsibility is always the government's.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITALIZATION—INCREASE IN GRANTS TO SETTLE SASKATCHEWAN DISPUTE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact the federal government contributes upwards of 50 per cent of hospitalization and medicare costs and in view of the fact that approximately $8,000 is all that is needed to settle a dispute at one of the hospitals in the province of Saskatchewan, can the minister say whether any increase in grants necessary to settle this dispute will be shared by the federal government?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question as asked is in the form of an argument. In this respect it is not acceptable.

Mr. Skoberg: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it certainly was not meant to be in the form of an argument. I can assure Your Honour it is of the utmost concern to the people of Saskatchewan. If I may reword it I will try not to put it in argumentative terms. In view of the federal government's participation in hospitalization and medicare costs in Canada, could the government at this time say whether it will share in the added grants necessary to settle the dispute in the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the Hospital Act the amount of federal sharing is well known in terms of operating expenses of hospitals. We will share in accordance with that well known formula with the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Skoberg: Will the minister say whether any request has been received from the premier of Saskatchewan for any increase in grants to settle this dispute in that province?

Mr. Munro: Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): My question is to the President of the Privy Council. Is the government prepared to introduce measures to counteract the depressed state of western football following yesterday afternoon's proceedings?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will do my best to prevent this from becoming a further cause for western alienation.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister give consideration to making a full statement before the Christmas recess as to the future construction of the several hospitals which were to be commenced next year under the guidance of his department and which have now been shelved, such as the hospital planned at Hudson, Manitoba?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will look into the particular hospital the hon. member referred to.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have there been any discussions between him and his counterpart in the province of Saskatchewan or between him and the government of Saskatchewan relating to the conditions of payment of the provincial and federal share of costs of hospitalization in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, the discussions that have taken place with the health minister for Saskatchewan are of the same nature as those discussions which are being carried on with every other provincial health minister, namely, going into methods by which the federal and provincial governments can co-operate in limiting costs in this whole area.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN AID OBJECTIVE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the doubt that now exists whether the government of Canada intends to achieve the objective of providing 1 per cent of the gross national product for foreign aid in the early 1970's, when will the Prime Minister be able to indicate to the House the government's objective in this regard and whether the 1 per cent objective still remains? Also, in what year does the government propose to meet this objective?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, subject to correction I believe I did say in the month of August when I announced the guidelines for the ensuing year that we would not be moving toward this objective in the coming year, but that we would be keeping the same position in the sense that we are going to be giving substantially more, many millions of dollars more, to external aid in the coming year. We are not, however, increasing our contribution measured as a percentage of our gross national product.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to assume that the government has at least temporarily abandoned the goal it previously adopted of achieving a level for foreign aid of 1 per cent of the gross national product in the early 1970's?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. We have not abandoned it but we have not reaffirmed it for the coming year because of the reason I gave. We decided that we were going to be giving more but that we could not increase our percentage. We felt that this was necessary in view of the over-all guidelines expenditure program which we announced last summer. We tried to freeze most areas of government spending. This particular area we did not freeze. We increased the spending but not the percentage.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of hon. members seeking the opportunity to ask supplementary questions at this point. Other hon. members, including the hon. member for South Shore, have been waiting quite a while to ask questions this afternoon. As the question period expired some minutes ago, I have to call Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF WHITE PAPER ON TAXATION REFORM

The House resumed from Friday, November 28, consideration of the Motion of Mr. Benson (for Mr. Macdonald, Rosedale):

That the white paper entitled Proposals for Tax Reform tabled in the House on November 7, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the debate on the white paper I might say at the outset that like other hon. members I, too, have studied the white paper. I listened carefully to the speeches made in the House of Commons on Friday, particularly to the speech of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). It set out our position very carefully on the major items contained in that paper.

I have read the Carter Report. I have read the briefs submitted to the Carter commission by trade unions, industry, farmers and ranchers, the extractive industries, the petroleum and mining industry and professional people. As a result of that study, I have come to certain conclusions.

Twenty minutes is not time enough to analyse the complete white paper. As I said on Friday when speaking to a procedural matter, after studying the white paper and reading the briefs, I have come to the conclusion it does not actually contain a tax doctrine. It really changes the whole social being of our nation. In fact, I am not afraid to say immediately in my opinion it is a red manifesto. The government, particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), is being very silent about one matter. The minister has made no recommendations at all with regard to something that lies at the very heart of our tax problem, and that is a matter for regret. I refer to the swelling volume of government expenditure.

We have heard on television and through all the other media of communication what a wonderful doctrine is set out in this white paper which I call a red manifesto. I shall have something to say about that aspect later. The government has been strangely silent about its own rising expenditures, but unless hon. gentlemen opposite discharge their responsibility for setting out strict guidelines for coping with rising expenditure the tax burden is bound to increase. It is essential that this tendency to increasing expenditure be resisted and controlled. I shall give a good example. The government makes it clear that people earning $9,000 and upward will be called on to pay more taxes.

Mr. Stanfield: Four thousand and upward.

Mr. Benson: If you are single.

Mr. Woolliams: In 1963, the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State amounted to $4,788,000. By 1969 they had risen to $342,613,000. In other words, they had increased by 6,800 per cent. If this is called a cutback, what would a real cutback amount to?

This, Mr. Speaker, is what has happened in the case of the estimates of one department since 1963. The Secretary of State is the real czar of this government. In my opinion, the government should establish guidelines and controls concerning the expenditure of the taxpayers money before it embarks on additional taxation measures affecting the wage earning and property owning classes of people as well as others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: What effect will these proposals really have on the poor, on those in the low income tax brackets? What effect are they likely to have on trade unionists, on wage earners generally, on ranchers, farmers and small businessmen? I say immediately that the proposals here will not really improve the lot of those living below the poverty line and I intend to set out my reasoning in this regard. Above all, I say they would seriously curtail Canadian investment and restrict the productivity from which all jobs flow and from which all government revenues ultimately flow.

What is this white paper? What is it all about? It is as I have described it—a red manifesto; white pages with a red cover. It is not a tax doctrine but, rather, a policy which if adopted would change the whole democratic process in this country. In ten years, if carried out, it would take over the property of our people together with the means of production as effectively as if it had been done by revolution. In my opinion, it smacks of totalitarianism.

Consider the position of the small businessman, the small corporation or the motel operator in one of our urban centres or in one of the national parks. His tax in the past has been 21 per cent on profits up to $35,000. The money he leaves in the company is used to enlarge the business in order to better serve the needs of Canada. Under these proposals, 50 per cent of that income would go to the government. Let us suppose that in order to comply with parks regulations or urban planning directives he is required to embark on new capital expenditure. How is he, in these circumstances, to raise the money required? Both the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance have told the banks to tighten the money supply. What will be the consequences of this? The smaller enterprises to which I have referred will no longer be able to serve industry effectively, productivity will fall, and unemployment will reach even higher levels than those which exist today.

What will happen to the farmers and the ranchers if this proposal for a capital gains tax is adopted? Every five years, if the present trend of inflation continues, a farmer will have to raise money to pay this tax.

Mr. Benson: I wonder whether I might ask the hon. member a question; I am sure he would not want to be wrong about his facts. The five-year revaluation applies only to shares in public companies.

Mr. Woolliams: All right. But the minister has not told us what will happen to those farmers who own farms upon which they are not living—farms which are held, in some cases, as investments. Production in Canada is not based on the amount the government spends but on the development of our resources and services.

This paper endeavours to lull the average taxpayers into its acceptance by holding out the prospect of reduced taxation. There is talk of increased exemptions, but their benefit is likely to be destroyed by the effects of continuing inflation. In my opinion, the only fortunate thing is that the government itself will, in my opinion, be destroyed before Canada makes the mistake of carrying out this plan. The hon. minister reminds me—and I hope he will not take offence at this—of a small town bookkeeper. When he tells us that 750,000 people will be taken off the tax rolls, I say to him that this is a false statement, that he is using a pernicious argument. I seriously challenge his figures and trust knowledgeable financial journalists at all levels will not only question the basis of this vexatious argument, but explode it. Let us not gobble up the dogmatic, uneconomic dogmas of this little bookkeeper. If the tax saving to the average taxpayer amounts to between $15 and $20 a year, how are those presently living at the poverty level to be assisted? All this confirms the minister's statement that he believes people can live on $30 a week. What fraud! What hypocrisy!

I turn now to the effect as far as the provinces are concerned. We have all heard of those conferences at which provincial premiers meet with leaders of the federal government, and are familiar with complaints that the federal government has, in effect, changed the nature of the constitution by altering the financial set-up and the relationship between itself and the provinces. Whether it applies to medicare or to any other cost-sharing program between the federal government and the provinces, the result is the same: the central government thrusts the program on the provinces, says it will pay its share and then leaves the provinces to bear the financial burden. If the minister is right in saying that the average taxpayer will pay less in federal taxation he is, in effect, saying that the provinces, which have to bear the burden of such items as medicare, will be forced to impose higher sales taxes in order to meet their obligations. Municipal taxes will also increase. So, the average taxpayer will have to pay more, in the over-all picture, even if his income tax does not increase.

I maintain that the position of the provinces and of the municipalities has been overlooked. The minister has not taken into account the effect of these proposals across the whole board. I agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis); the fact is that the effect of removing 750,000 people from the tax roll does not amount to $1 billion. He can shake his head, but he did not deny it on Friday and he cannot do so today.

Mr. Benson: I do deny it now.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, time will prove whether I am right or not. But I do not think he can deny that the effect of this white paper would be to cause provincial and municipal taxpayers to pay more. They are likely to end up with less take-home pay.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: I deny that too.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister can say what he likes. The fact is that this document contains a hybrid dogma which purports to take over the means of production and puts union workers into an economic straitjacket. It is socialistic; it keeps the rich rich and privileged. In that regard it has a fascist approach. The document is inflammatory and revolutionary. In my home city, the Liberals held a dinner to support the Liberal party and to raise money for the government. Yet the minister was booed by his own supporters.

The small businessman, the small corporation, the farmer and rancher will be forced out of business as a result of the proposed capital gains tax. The implementation of a capital gains, which requires such gains to be added to one's income, is confiscatory and will force sales of farms and businesses either during the lifetime of the owners or at their death, when many farms and ranches in western Canada are passed on to the sons.

Mr. Benson: There is no capital gains tax on such transactions.

Mr. Woolliams: If the minister does not call an estate tax a capital gains tax, then I do not know what he would call it. I would be very concerned at the implementation of the kind of capital gains tax proposed by the white paper. It would be different if a certain percentage were applied on capital gains, so the people would know where they stood; but on the basis of the proposals of the white paper the minister would have to confiscate property and put our farmers and ranchers out of business in order to collect his tax.

The will of the average Canadian cannot be shattered; it must be softened, bent or guided. I am not suggesting that the minister is trying to tyrannize the Canadian people, but I do suggest that his proposals are going to compress, enervate, extinguish and stupefy us all. These liberal Liberal hybrids are endeavouring to reduce this nation to nothing but a flock of timid, industrious folk of which the government will become the arrogant, dictatorial shepherd. According to Francis Neilson in "The Cultural Tradition", the greatest insult you can offer to the human race is to regard it as a herd of cattle to be driven to the selected pasture.

What the minister is really doing through these proposals is to follow his own profession. He wants to reduce Canadians to a nation of small, petty bookkeepers. Instead of energizing our human resources, he wants to engage us in the task of keeping the nation's books. The minister and his socialist friends see themselves conducting bookkeeping courses and setting up offices in the living room of every suburban home and farm kitchen. Everyone will be a bookkeeper.

I should like to know who is going to pay for all the appraisers who will be required to evaluate property. We will experience complete chaos, the same kind of chaos that occurred in Great Britain when they introduced the capital gains tax. Perhaps the minister himself never experienced, prior to his appointment to the government, how hard it is to make a dollar.

The people who will be most affected by these proposals possess talents which are highly rewarded here, as in other nations, irrespective of political system. We will suffer a further brain drain to the United States, and there will be a deterioration in capital investment here in favour of more go-ahead nations. The university graduates of the nation, after spending several years at university, are going to be asked to bear the main brunt of this country's tax burden. If life seems more attractive to them in the United States, the brain drain will increase. To my mind, these proposals mean that we will lose our scientists and those in the professions.

As the Leader of the Opposition said, nothing will give greater assistance to foreign powers to take over the capital resources of this nation than the capital gains tax that is suggested in this so-called white paper. As the minister knows, desire for monetary profit competes with other factors, such as preference for leisure and other pursuits. Work also entails fatigue and anxiety. Therefore, it follows that when monetary reward is lessened by taxation, personal situations must be reassessed.

This white paper will not be endorsed by members of our labour unions. Many workers in labour today earn up to $10,000, even $15,000, and they are the people who will be most affected by these proposals. They will have to carry the tax burden of the nation. I should like to hear what the union leaders of Canada have to say about the minister's white paper.

In addition to the cost of appraisers, who is going to pay for the expensive litigation proceedings which will surely arise from such a complicated tax structure as this? I should also like to know how these tax changes will affect provincial revenues and the dollar thirsty urban centres, where at the present time education imposes such a high tax burden. Nothing has been said by the minister about whether the federal government will increase its share of the cost, and the white paper also sheds no light on this point. In fact, I believe the statement was made at one of Liberal Party's thinkers' conferences that they had nothing to do with urban centres or municipalites; that if they were in financial trouble, it was their own responsibility.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question. On this question of sharing with the provinces, has the hon. member looked at table 13 on page 94 of the white paper?

Mr. Woolliams: The provinces have already examined the minister's tables, and the premier of Saskatchewan for one is not enthused at the revenue sharing proposed. Even the Liberal premier of Newfoundland, Premier Smallwood, is not happy with this Liberal government, so I do not know why I should be impressed by the minister's tables. These Liberal provincial premiers have been telling the Minister of Finance that his proposals are going to cut down the revenue of the provinces, which in turn means reducing the amount paid at the urban and municipal level.

Mr. Benson: You just have not read them. You are not doing your homework.

Mr. Woolliams: Talking of homework, you said that 750,000 people would be taken off the tax roll.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Both the minister and the hon. member who has the floor are forgetting the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry, Your Honour. I became so enthused with the "red manifesto" of the Minister of Finance that I forgot myself for a moment or two. Before I was interrupted by the minister, I was asking who was going to pay for the property appraising that will be required under the capital gains tax, and for the expensive litigation that will follow. I also say that provincial revenues will be cut back as a result of these tax changes. They will do nothing to assist the provinces or municipalities, and I suggest chaos will be the result.

When a dispute over payment of income tax arises in this nation, what happens? The department, sometimes with the assistance of the "legal beagles" of the Department of Justice, take over companies' books and statements while the owners of small companies fight the government for their rights under the nation's tax structure. When this valuation day comes, in spite of what the minister will say, what will happen in respect of farms, ranches, stock and those properties to be valuated? Who will do the evaluation? Who is going to evaluate the millions of acres of land in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and the rest of Canada? Who is going to evaluate the development in urban centres in Canada? I say this will reduce the whole thing to chaos.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired unless he has the unanimous consent of the House to continue.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about how this white paper will affect the co-operatives, the farmers and the people who work in my constituency and in my part of Canada. Let me congratulate those who prepared the paper. It has a very nice cover, some very nice designs and some very nice artwork. However, most of us are concerned about what the proposals it contains will do to the Canadian economy as a whole and whether our institutions will function better. We are wondering whether, as a result, we will have a better society.

I am very much concerned about one proposal in this white paper which relates to taxation of co-operatives. Co-operatives have been very important to the rural areas and those regions in Canada which have been at an economic disadvantage. I have in mind those regions which find themselves at a disadvantage vis-à-vis the concentration of economic power. These are the areas in which these co-operatives have grown and flourished. The leaders were people who attempted to achieve some bargaining power and to provide the things these areas needed at lower cost.

Let me refer to the views expressed in the Financial Post on November 22, 1969 regarding this white paper. The article reads:

> What complicates consideration of the impact of the white paper on co-ops and credit unions is that it is a tax package. These organizations are holding back formal responses until their advisers have looked at the whole package.

The Equitable Income Tax Foundation did not hold back its opinion until the whole package was considered. It said, and I quote from the same article:

> An official of the Equitable Income Tax Foundation, which has campaigned to have co-ops taxed exactly as other corporations are, suggests that the white paper might still leave co-ops with some tax advantage. However, it would not be so marked an advantage as it was.

In other words, in the opinion of the Equitable Income Tax Foundation these proposals will result in a more severe tax on co-operatives than ever before. If the Government, in its wisdom, is convinced that it is no longer necessary to encourage co-operatives to grow and develop I suppose it is justified in following such a course. There was a time when the government did consider that co-operatives were important and absolutely essential to the improvement of conditions for people in certain areas of Canada. It might be worthwhile to call to the attention of the government some of these instances.

I should like to quote from a book entitled "Prairie Progress," which is a history of progress in western Canada. It was written by J. F. C. Wright. On page 10 of this book appears the following:

> Today (1955) the history of Saskatchewan agriculture and therefore the essential history of the Province of Saskatchewan since the turn of the century, cannot be evaluated without an understanding of parallel co-operative development. Nor can the significance of this co-operation be grasped without a comprehension of early prairie settlement and the economic problems confronting pioneers of European heritage taking over a vast and potentially agricultural land from scattered tribes of nomadic plains Indians—

He goes on in that book to describe the development of co-operatives by stating:

> It was out of the organized prairie farmers' early struggle with railroad and grain elevator companies and the Winnipeg grain exchange that producer (marketing) co-operative enterprise emerged to condition prairie farmers for subsequent development of consumer co-operation.

I wonder whether this government considers that this phase has ended. Does it consider it unnecessary to administer the taxes and the policies of Canada in order that co-operatives may continue to accumulate capital and do the necessary job? If this is the case, and if that is the position the government is taking, I think it is sadly wrong.

At the present time in western Canada we have a need to reorganize grain handling facilities. At least two thirds of these facilities are in the hands of co-operatives. These co-operatives will have to absorb a considerable loss in depreciation if these grain handling facilities are to be effectively reorganized. This proposed reorganization is not an attractive undertaking. The only major terminal elevator which has been built since the 1930's was built by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool in the Vancouver area. The money was raised locally in Saskatchewan through participation by farmers like myself. They contributed to the cost of these handling facilities because they were absolutely necessary, not because they would be profitable. The same thing is true of our local facili ies on the prairies. The government at this time should be considering ways to make it easier for co-operatives rather than making it more difficult for them to raise and retain capital. The government should make it easier for these organizations to serve those regions in this country which are at a disadvantage.

• (3:30 p.m.)

We might take a look at the situation in respect of co-operatives, such as Canadian Co-operative Implements, the establishment of which is another major attempt to give farmers some advantage on the consumer side. When Canadian Co-operative Implements was established, not one but three governments provided capital to meet the challenge that existed in respect of getting a better price for farm machines. The Saskatchewan government, at that time a Liberal government, offered financial support to a wholesale co-operative in order to investigate and formulate a practical plan to deal with the problem in respect of farm machinery prices. In 1944, when Canadian Co-operative Implements Ltd. took definite action to purchase a factory in Winnipeg, funds were made available by the three prairie governments. A loan in the amount of $250,000 was to be repaid on a 20-year amortization basis.

Now, when we have a commission which has been working for two years in an effort to find an answer to high machinery costs and a way to meet those increasing costs, we have a government that intends to increase the taxation for one of the few organizations, Canadian Co-operative Implements, that is attempting day by day, through its factory in Winnipeg, to deal with the problem of machinery prices that faces farmers. I do not need to mention only western Canada. In rural Ontario and in the maritimes there are co-operatives through which people attempt to meet the economic conditions they have to face. Maritime Co-operatives is the single most important agency in the Atlantic provinces. It imports feed grain and supplies the farmers of that area with the feed grain they need. Co-op Fédérée, a local co-operative in Quebec, is performing the same function. Surrey Co-op, on the coast of British Columbia, is also performing the same function. Does the government not know the role that is played in the economically disadvantaged areas in Canada by the co-operative movement?

Surely, big business in Canada is not worried about the co-operatives, how big they are and the role they are playing in Canada. Can they be considered a threat when in Saskatchewan, after all these years, the co-operative movement probably does not handle more than 7 per cent or 8 percent of the retail business in that province? It is not the Federated Co-op, with its oil refinery at Regina, that dictates the price of farm fuels in Saskatchewan; it is Imperial Oil, Gulf, Shell and Texaco. However, so far as I know in western Canada the co-operative refinery has the only significant refining and production capacity that is totally Canadian owned. The balance is owned outside Canada. Do we wish to make it just a little more difficult for them to operate or, perhaps under this proposal, a great deal more difficult?

If there is one area to which the government should be urged to direct its attention, it is this area and the area referred to by the previous speaker. Before the government puts these changes into effect I say it should ask itself two questions. First, was the type of tax legislation which was designed to fit the needs of the co-operatives justified in the first place? If the government can say that taxation policy was not justified in the first place, then perhaps it has the right to say it is not justified now. But if the government cannot say it was not justified in the first place, then it certainly cannot logically say it is not justified now, because the circumstances in these disadvantaged areas have not improved that much.

A Canadian press story which appears in the Ottawa Citizen of November 24, 1969 bears the headline, "Too many farmers, not enough money". Do not forget it is probably the farmers more than any other group who are served by the co-operatives. Labour, to a very great extent, has depended on the labour unions to protect it within the financial milieu we have in Canada. The farmers, to a much greater extent, have relied on the co-operative movement. Let me give you an example of the load some people wish the co-operatives to absorb. In the Toronto Globe and Mail of November 26 there is an item headed "Export company may be formed by Alberta Pool". The reference is to the Alberta Wheat Pool. Of course, I would forecast that if such an export company should be formed it would be formed in concert by at least the three prairie pools, and perhaps the United Grain Growers. This would take a great deal of financing. A great deal of capital would be required. If it is done, it will be done only as a service to the farmers of western Canada and not as a profit-making operation. Anyone who is knowledgeable about the grain handling and marketing situation in western Canada is aware of this.

The history of the co-operative movement will show it is a movement that serves the people and is not a movement primarily for the purpose of making money; that never was the purpose. Perhaps some members on the government side should do a little reading and discover that this is the situation.

Finally, I should like to say something about the proposed changes which will affect the farmers. These are nicely wrapped up in the white paper. The changes which are proposed are set out, but the whole idea is contained in the first paragraph. A number of the proposals would have an impact on the farmers who are taxable under the present system. It is estimated that 70 per cent of the farmers who file taxation returns will have a reduction in their tax, while about 30 per cent will have an increase in their tax. The method that will be used to do this will be the imposition of a tax on capital gains, most of which would come from the turn-over on machinery. Again, the proposal refers to the same industry which was mentioned in the story on the outlook conference by the Canadian press headed, "Too many farmers, not enough money." According to this same article, over the next years there will have to be a considerable economic adjustment. There is a reference to the number of farmers being reduced from 450,000 to 150,000. Even if a quarter of that number of farmers were to stop farming it would be disastrous.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion many of the white paper proposals for tax reform are excellent—there is no mistake about that—but they can be improved upon. Certainly capital gain, if a true capital gain, should be treated as income. No one questions the fact that the cost of child care and unemployment insurance payments should be deductible. But while the approach appears sound from a taxation review standpoint, it is really a document for social change which appears to have been drawn up by economists without consultation with social scientists. Has there been sufficient consideration of the long term effect on society when the approach, although a rational one, is substantially directed to the transfer of taxation burden from one group to another, which is already heavily burdened.

I should like to refer to some statistics. All governments in Canada hope to raise, and will spend this year, approximately $27.6 billion, of which $7.8 billion will come from income taxes. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported that in 1967, the two and a half million wage earners, earning between $5,000 and $10,000 earned 46 per cent of the income and paid 44 per cent of all income taxes; that a much smaller group of less than 500,000 or 7.5 per cent of the total had incomes of over $10,000 and paid 35 per cent of the total income taxes—the taxes in the upper income levels being as high as 80 per cent. The proposal is to obtain even more from this group as capital gains are brought into income. Under the proposed reform, taxes would remain the same for about 820,000, be eliminated for 750,000, reduced for 3,100,000, and increased for about three million.

The basic philosophy of the paper in respect of personal income tax is found in paragraphs 1.6, 1.9, and 1.19.

Paragraph 1.6 reads as follows:

> A number of goals and standards have guided the government in its approach to reform. They include a fair distribution of the tax burden based upon ability to pay; steady economic growth and continuing prosperity;—

Paragraph 1.19 reads:

> More than any other tax the personal income tax can be carefully adjusted to the income of the individual and the circumstances which affect his ability to pay—

Paragraph 1.9 reads:

> There is no single or simple rule for increasing the tax rates up the income ladder that can be said to be the "right way". It is a matter of opinion, of judgment.

The criteria seem to be the ability to pay and the recognition of modern social needs, but tied to steady economic growth with continuing prosperity.

Exemptions from taxation for 750,000 and reduced taxes for 3,100,000 is an admirable and I believe a realistic goal. I am sure every member of the House wishes we could afford to exempt or lower taxation for even more, but desirable as this is and recognizing that it must come, can we afford to accomplish it at the expense of an increase on the middle group? I agree with the principle. I question the timing. When do we load the bus to the extent that it cannot reach its destination?

This summer I took a trip through communist socialistic countries. In Bulgaria in particular it was apparent that they had taken over all accumulated wealth. Then, they divided up the pie and had a banquet, but no one was left with capital or incentive to provide dough for another pie. Obviously, they killed the goose that produced the eggs. Now, they are in real trouble, begging for tourist dollars, but they do not have people with capital or the profit incentive to create the desired tourist industry.

The middle group and the upper 7.5 per cent now pay a very large share to provide old age security for their own parents and all of the other parents as well as for family allowances and other social benefits for themselves and all the others. In addition, they pay taxes to relieve regional disparity in less fortunate parts of the country.

Humane and desirable as it may be to reduce taxes and to increase modern social services, is it right to further increase the load on this middle group? Is it their responsibility to accept this added load now, or is there another way? Can we not say: here is our objective, here are our priorities? As we become more efficient and learn to save, as our national income increases, we will do these things in this order. Our gross national product, and thus our tax base, is bound to increase substantially. The labour force, and thus the number of taxpayers, is increasing rapidly. Wages, and thus taxation, are increasing. Regional development is converting certain sections of the country from a loss to a profit position, and the increase in the national product, with corresponding increases in sales taxes and other revenue, could accelerate if we do not lose confidence. We could implement this program of reduction in a year or two without increasing taxation on the middle group except to treat their capital gains as income.

As I said earlier, the philosophy of the paper seems to be a distribution of the tax burden based upon ability to pay and a recognition of modern social needs, tied to steady economic growth with continuing prosperity. Nowhere in the criteria is incentive mentioned. Nowhere do I find any attempt to establish that a further increase in taxation on the middle income group will not cause a reduction in recovery in 10 or 20 years. Let us not go too far along the well meaning but destructive road of socialism. Look at the example of England which socialism turned into a welfare state but dragged down to a third rate producer of wealth.

I agree there is a need to help, but I question the timing. It is not a kindness, but is in fact a gross blunder, to increase the load on the middle group if we impair incentive and thus impair production and the accumulation of wealth. We might lessen confidence and, as a result, adversely affect the steady economic growth and continuing prosperity which is part of the criteria.

Today, few decisions of major importance are made at universities or in big business without all of the disciplines being brought into consultation. I had the feeling after reading the white paper that it had been prepared by economists who worked from statistics only. Basic research in social science is not immediately available in Canada, but before taking such a major step I suggest that historical economists check to see what happened to incentive in England at this stage of the tax climb, that this be looked at from the sociological and psychological point of view to see whether this step would be harmful to the nation.

Think of the young couples starting out in life hoping to accumulate sufficient savings to start a business and buy a home. Their taxes are high enough now. It may be said in reply that this is not a large increase, but we must look at the whole picture.

[Mr. Chappell.]

In 1970 municipal taxes in Ontario, and I expect in other provinces, will go up substantially. So also will provincial taxes. How much can these people take before they begin to believe that incentive and energy are disadvantaged, and that it is impossible to buy your own home or start a business? Will their attitudes change to why bother? Will we be encouraging them to join some protest group demanding that education be completely free for their children, that they get a larger pension at a lower age? Will they simply give up and begin to believe that they are owned by the government and they, in turn, must demand everything from government? What would the social research people say about this?

We are a young nation with a great future if we handle our resources correctly. Surely, the main resource is the imagination, enthusiasm and the energy of the people. At what point can we say to them that federal taxation is stable and that they can push on with their plans within a known framework of tax obligation?

As I said earlier, I agree with taxation on capital gain. There is no reason why this source of income, to all groups, should not be taxed in order to increase exemptions and lower taxes for those in the lower income group, but there should not be any tax on a bona fide home or homestead, or on the furnishings except where the value of these furnishings is relatively high.

Paragraph 3.19 reads in part, "Generally, capital gains on the sale of homes would not be taxed." I disagree with this interpretation. In my opinion, there would be taxation in almost every area in Canada where there is growth.

Paragraphs 3.22 and 3.23 provide for a tax on personal belongings and furnishings such as stamps, jewelry, fur clothing, paintings, sculpture, rugs, books and other works of art if the sale price exceeds $500.

A homeowner would be allowed an increase of $1,000 a year, plus $150 a year for improvements. The average person would spend, say, between $500 and $700 a year on improvements so a complete record of screen doors, storm windows, new hinges, new water taps and roof repairs would have to be kept. In many cases, these records would have to be maintained for as long as 40 or 50 years. Unless there were audited statements, imagine the difficulty to prove that accounts for improvements were authentic, after even 10 years.

Almost every home would have to be evaluated at or close to valuation day, presumably some time in 1970. To prevent abuses, the government would have to evaluate also. For those with rather expensive homes they would be wise to have two evaluations. At the moment appraisers are scarce and expensive. I expect the cost to appraise a home would be from $200 to $1,500. If only 50 per cent of the owners wished to have their homes appraised as of valuation day the available appraisers could not complete the task in 40 years and I expect the fees would become ridiculous.

It may be argued that evaluations are not necessary, that both the owner and the government can reply on the sales recorded in the registry office as of valuation day, and that people won't want their valuations too high because they could be used for succession duty purposes. However, the vast majority of homeowners will sell their present homes and pay capital gains tax long before their estates will be called upon to pay succession duties. Moreover, the records in the registry office are very little help in determining value if the home is any way different from the others on the street or if the owner has made improvements. In all of these cases, the real value can only be established by adjustments after inspection by experts.

I have seen valuations vary as much as 100 per cent between owners and metropolitan Toronto authorities, between owners and the Ontario government, and between owners and the federal government. For a relatively modest home worth perhaps $32,000 there could very well be a difference of $4,000, which could cause an owner to pay on a capital gain of $3,000 if he sold one year after valuation day. I can see no reason for assuming that these differences in valuation won't exist between the Department of Revenue and owners as they have in the past between expropriation authorities and owners.

If one goes to the trouble to have his home evaluated he should be able to call upon the department to accept it immediately and, if there is a difference, that a tribunal be immediately available to determine which figure is correct. It is not the same as determining the value for succession duty purposes. In that case the home is there for an inspection and evaluation at the date of death, but for capital gains tax on the first sale after valuation day we must establish value as of some day in 1970. It cannot be left until an owner sells in five, ten or 20 years to establish what the value was in 1970. The witnesses would no longer be available and the owner himself might be dead, leaving the dispute to his widow.

Add to this the need to valuate paintings, sculpture, rugs, jewelry, fur clothing, books, silver and other works of art. Evaluators in these fields are even more scarce and less qualified, but many homes would require the services of from one to five of these experts. The cost to the government to collect, and the cost to the owner and the government to evaluate, would far exceed the recovery. The nation would have injured itself.

Trying to keep and maintain records of home improvements and articles purchased and sold would require a bookkeeping system and an office. Our wives would become badgered bookkeepers rather than homemakers. It is an invasion of privacy. We would have the constant presence of the tax collector in our homes. Big Brother would want to know every last detail of our personal affairs. The tax would be even more annoying than the radio licence of the past.

The family that sacrificed present pleasures in order to collect a few paintings and other works of art would be penalized for this contribution to society. Much that would be taken would not be capital gain but straight confiscation. Three bedroom homes in the Toronto area now sell for around $35,000. These homes have been going up at the rate of one per cent per month because of the increasing construction cost. It just happens that inflation is at its peak in the construction industry.

If an owner sells his home he must replace it with another. There is no way for him to get along without a home. To take away from him part of the inflated price which he received for his home without taking into allowance the inflated price which he paid for the new one is confiscation. A home that sold three years ago for $40,000 would now sell for $53,000. Under the new system if the owner sold for $53,000 he would have to pay $53,000 to replace it, but he could not. He would be allowed to deduct $1,000 a year, or $3,000, and pay perhaps $5,000 of the $10,000 increase in value in taxes. He would then have to settle for a $48,000 house. Even a relatively modest home worth, say, $32,000 goes up at least $2,000 a year and the owner would have to pay taxes on half of it.

It would be an interference with freedom. No longer could an owner change homes every five or ten years as his family changes. He would be nailed down to the same home for life. It would be no answer to say he can go into an apartment. Apartments are now being converted to condominiums, and the prices of condominiums are following the prices of homes.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat the warning that appraisers will be over-burdened with evaluations of commercial and other income properties without touching homes.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, on reading the white paper proposals for tax reform I came to the conclusion that anyone in the business community, in fact any citizen of Canada who wished to ascertain what the government proposed to charge individuals to reside in this country of ours, this so-called land of the free, should consider the white paper required reading in order that they will understand the ramifications of the proposals for tax reform.

It is my considered opinion that the citizens of Canada do not fully understand the proposition of the government under this heading of tax reform. As a result of all the publicity in the media and the advance propaganda that has been put forward by government members, the citizens have understood that the government was embarking on an investigation and a study, the prime purpose of which was to institute a tax reform. I believe the people understood the term "reform" to mean there would be an attempt by officialdom to bring some consistency out of the chaotic condition of taxes at the various levels of government. I believe they felt the prime purpose would be to make a more equitable basis of taxation for all the citizens of Canada, to close the loopholes and ensure that everybody paid a fair share. In this way there may be some hope of tax reduction, especially for those overburdened with taxes at the present time.

One does not have to look at this paper before us for very long to realize that it does not cover that aspect of tax reform. By the admission of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) himself, the paper is nothing less than a carefully worded economic document which will, in the main, increase by millions of dollars income tax derived from the citizens of this country. In my estimation it is not a proposal for tax reform. As far as the middle class wage earner is concerned, the farmer and the fisherman, in reality it is not tax reform but confiscation by taxation. Time and time again when this government has wished to pursue its policies on any controversial subject raised in this House, it has pointed out that the action taken is as a result of a mandate of the people of this country. I contend that the government has no mandate for these proposals for tax reform. Their mandate in 1963 was on the basis of a balanced budget without tax increases; their mandate in 1968 gave no promises but stated that there would be balanced budgets and that things would be different under the just society.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, what an investigation of the "balanced budget" and "no increased taxes" means. Since this government took office in 1963 we have had an increase in income tax; we have had an additional surtax; we have had a social development tax; we have had a corporate refundable tax; a tax on building supplies; a compulsory tax for the Canada Pension Plan; a tax for the Canadian Medicare plan and, in addition, the introduction of a new estate tax. All that these proposals do for the people of Canada is indicate still more taxes at a higher rate. I think the government is moving away from the basic principles of taxation. I have found, as I am sure other hon. members have, that Canadians are willing to pay their fair share. But when we consider that in addition to federal taxes the people must pay provincial taxes, municipal taxes, all types of sales taxes both apparent and hidden, the tax burden is very onerous indeed.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the primary purpose of government is to raise funds by taxation for the purpose of accomplishing those aims and objects, of providing those goods and services which cannot be obtained by the action of the individual, the municipality working in concert or by the province itself. With this in mind, the government should set down certain guidelines to see that expenditures do not exceed revenue. This is not the case today. With the competence of the new IBM machines and the ability to mechanically forecast future trends, it seems to me the object of the government should be to take into account average expenditures through the years and project them to the future to see how much is needed. The appropriate taxes could then be levied to accomplish the government's goals.

May I illustrate some instances in which I feel the government has been absolutely wrong in this regard? Through this tax proposal we are being asked to legislate greater tax burdens on many Canadians, but looking at the record for the past few years how can this be justified? Just look at the increase in expenditures of government departments. The addition of new departments over the past three or five years has cost literally hundreds of millions of dollars. Had this money been diligently applied to slum clearance perhaps it could have solved some problems in our major cities. But the money was not spent that way, Mr. Speaker, so this tremendous project is still ahead of us.

Imagine what those hundreds of millions of dollars could have accomplished in the attempt to obtain clean water, air and soil. Then there is the increased expenditure in the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) office itself, and the refurbishing of all those other offices over the past three or four years. I do not object to refurbishing nor to ministers having up-to-date equipment, but the cost of all this would have provided new schools for Indians and Eskimos. These will have to be provided anyway, and the taxpayer will have to pay. And what about the cost of refitting the Bonaventure, our aircraft carrier, now destined for disposal by the government? This expenditure alone could have provided $1 million for every province in Canada for a new high school, a new sub-college or a new school for Indians and Eskimos.

Then, there is the Company of Young Canadians, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to deal with their present problems but the money allocated to this group alone, without supervision, would have been ample to pay in two years' time for all the grants to small fairs and 4-H clubs that are being cut off this year as an austerity measure. It seems to me that the government is not moving in the right direction. We are faced with the dilemma of the government seeking increased funds and those who are forced to pay are wondering when these monies will be channelled in the right direction.

The minister has indicated that this is a motion to refer proposals for tax reform to a Parliamentary committee for study, and this is true. I hope that the history of this committee will not be the same as the history of past committees of this parliament in which the opposition members sat as a minority and the chairman was a member of the government Party. If this were the case it would then be possible for the majority in the committee to produce recommendations to the government on tax reform. I hope there will be ample time provided for all those who are concerned with making recommendations on tax reform. I trust some of the matters that have been outlined by my leader in this House, and which are of such vital importance to Canadians, will receive adequate attention from all sides. Only in this way will it be possible to present a fair case, I hope the history of some committees will not be repeated, and that this committee will be genuinely interested in the welfare of Canadian citizens. I hope that the Committee's study and report will indeed be the basis for a tax reform meant to bring about equality of taxation and not place the burden on any individual class in this country.

As a result of the actions of this parliament, Mr. Speaker, we have over the past few years lent hundreds of millions of dollars to small businessmen, farmers and fishermen. We have established new businesses and attempted to develop economic units in all fields so that the over-all productivity of this country could be expanded. Now, what are we doing, Mr. Speaker? Now that we have placed a tremendous number of citizens of this country into that category, by these proposals we are taking away from them the funds necessary to develop their business. We are taking away from them all incentives to build up a business or establishment, with pride of ownership for themselves and something that can be handed down from family to family.

If I have one main objection to this paper, Mr. Speaker, it is the feeling it is designed with the aim of making it practically impossible to hand down any type of business from one generation to another. I feel this is disastrous in this day and age because, to my way of thinking, this has been one of our greatest incentives. This practice has been the driving force that has given us our wheelers and dealers, the men who take a chance not only for the love of business and business combat, but for the fact they are going to create a legacy for those who come after them. I feel these proposals will destroy this incentive and will thus destroy the very fibre that has made Canada great. We cannot survive under these proposals. There must be a steady growth in gross national income. All that we are doing is removing the incentive I have described, as well as the necessary capital to accomplish these ends.

No matter how you approach it, the financial policy of this government since 1963 has been formulated around the single principle of removing from the control of individuals the greatest possible amount of capital in order that Canada's economy would no longer be directed by the private sector, but would be under the direct control of the federal government. This has been apparent from their regional directives and the direction of all kinds. I feel this is one more step on the road to ruin for many thousands of Canadian people. They do not deserve this treatment. I am sure once hon. members of this House realize the end result of the changes in taxation brought down by this white paper, they will do everything possible to bring about amendments that will give Canada a working tax base that will be a credit to Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, having reread this morning the speeches made Friday by the members of the opposition on the tax reform proposals, I cannot help saying that, in their criticism, they have taken advantage of the great freedom enjoyed by those who are not burdened with the responsibilities of government. On second thought, I admit that this does not necessarily show irresponsibility or lack of logic on their part. It is quite possible, as a matter of fact, that they have not really understood this tax reform program or that they have not read the white paper carefully and from cover to cover. How else can their somewhat illogical positions be explained?

I do not dare think that they are being stupid. I would prefer to believe that considerations of a purely political nature have brought them to this. However, I do wish to tell my colleagues in the opposition that last year's experience should have shown them that the public is no longer satisfied with fine promises, no more in the field of taxation than in that of underwater tunnels linking undeveloped areas.

Those who criticize the white paper should not forget some obstacles which interfere with any tax reform: the general need for revenue, the not very profitable nature of other taxation sources and the economic context.

The government, while taking such factors into account, has nevertheless tried to work out tax reform proposals which would bring about the most equitable system.

My colleagues in the opposition know very well that the taxation system revolves around the income tax, because at the present time it represents almost 30 per cent of government revenue. So it becomes important to change first the Income Tax Act—if one intends to be fair, of course.

It seems that such is not the view of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), since he contends that the government should also have introduced a program of reform concerning the sales tax, which would have resulted in delaying study of the fiscal reform, thereby affecting the small wage earner, he who will benefit most from the raise in exemptions; and certainly more time would have been needed to prepare a general reform of the taxation system.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, everyone is aware that the sales tax system, because it is uniform and applies to all—since everyone pays the same sales tax—does not take into account the particular situation of every individual. The income tax, as opposed to that, is much more equitable, for it takes into account those particular situations. As regards the tax reform, we think that the part concerning personal income tax has priority, and the Canadian people will appreciate it.

In addition, fiscal reform proposals allowing for the establishment of a system which would yield globally the same revenue than the former one should be made. This implies the notion of compensatory changes, that is to say, the effect produced by a change in one sector of the fiscal system must be balanced by a change elsewhere. Some have suggested that this tax reform was a disguised means to introduce a new tax rate increase.

The main reason for the increase in revenue, Mr. Speaker, which will amount approximately to $630 million in five years from the implementation of this system, is due essentially to the widening of the tax basis of assessment. This will result in a gradual increase of about 5 per cent.

Naturally, these figures are only estimates because I think nobody can extrapolate. It is easy to infer what the figures will be in the future years, but one is never quite certain of the results.

And yet, is it possible to actually reduce the existing tax rates in order to avoid a surplus of revenue after five years, as advocated by the Leader of the Opposition? In short, there must be a perfect coincidence between the revenue of the two systems.

A study of the forecasts for the first year of operation of the new system tells us that the revenue will increase by 1.5 per cent, which for all practical purposes may be ascribed to the inaccuracy of the forecasts. To reduce the existing rates in anticipation of revenue that will be collected in five years would bring, in effect, right in the first year, a very substantial deficit. Is this one of the brilliant solutions advocated by the Leader of the Opposition in order to check inflation?

Let us consider now the position of the Leader of the Opposition and examine some of his arguments. Generally, the position of my hon. colleague is completely inconsistent. In short, the tax reform is doing both too much and too little. In fact, according to him, the exemptions suggested are not sufficient in the case of low income tax-payers. The income tax levied on the middle class is too high, and on the wealthy too low.

It must be understood that the structure of Canadian earnings seriously limits any change in the Income Tax Act. Statistics show us that over half of the tax-payers have an income of less than $5,000. On the other hand, if all tax-payers with an income over $25,000 paid an additional tax of $1,000, the extra revenue thus obtained in 1967 would have amounted to $48 million, but each tax-payer whose income is less than $5,000 would have paid only $13 less.

The government chose to recommend an increase in basic exemptions and in order to do so, it must find the necessary money by taxing capital gains, on the one hand, which will mean increased taxes for the well-to-do taxpayers and, on the other hand, by placing part of the tax burden on the middle-income taxpayers.

The Leader of the Opposition—I think he was once premier of Nova Scotia—should know that an administration has to look somewhere for the funds required to balance its budget, unless he was suggesting that this year the administration should simply show a deficit or else should not increase the basic exemptions, as his plea for the middle-class people would make us believe. The correspondence received up to now allows us to assume that the middle-income taxpayers understand the intentions of the government much better than the Leader of the Opposition and are willing to pay the price for the amendments.

His argument that inflation will erase the proposed increase in basic exemptions and the solutions he offers demonstrate the contradictory position of the Leader of the Opposition.

It is obvious that everybody is affected by inflation, including the government. Consequently, if the exemptions are raised proportionately to inflation, interest rates should also be raised. Finally, this is only feeding inflation.

Is this another brilliant suggestion from the Leader of the Opposition to fight inflation?

In any case, a $400 raise in the basic exemption for a tax-payer earning $4,000 represents one tenth of his income. On the contrary, for a taxpayer with a $40,000 income, this is only one hundredth of his income. I think this is a very strong argument to demonstrate that even though all the tax-payers should benefit by the raising of the basic exemptions, it will be more advantageous to the low income than to the high income taxpayer.

On several occasions, the Leader of the Opposition has alluded to small industry without being specific. I noted he listened very carefully to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and brought the matter up again.

I should like to know what he means by small industry. Does he mean a business with few employees, with a limited capital stock, with a small sales volume, or a company that does not pay much tax? Or does he mean, for instance, a company the owner of which decides to issue 1,000 shares, and gives one of them to his accountant and another to his lawyer in order to become incorporated and benefit from the preferred treatment accorded corporations and pay the tax on the first $35,000 profits at a rate of 21 per cent whereas most other taxpayers, such as employees and professional people, are not entitled to such treatment?

• (4:20 p.m.)

Finally, Mr. Speaker, a closely-held company is not necessarily a small business. If, on one hand, this small company is owned by an individual, there is no problem because the tax collected will be the same as if it were on personal income; on the other hand, if the company is owned by a financier who has a chain of small enterprises, fairness requires that he pay his normal share of taxes.

Does the Leader of the Opposition suggest that companies pay proportionally less tax on the first $35,000 of profits than the small taxpayer does on his first $5,000 in wages, as is now the case?

Does he suggest that the system have a double standard, a double yardstick? Since he appears so concerned with matters of incentives and disincentives for economic expansion, does he not believe that preferential treatment for small enterprises will not prompt them to avoid by various means to exceed a certain level of profit in order to pay less taxes, or to elude taxes—which is perfectly legal—through the establishment of multiple enterprises, in order to take advantage of the 21 per cent rate for each of them? When the Leader of the Opposition wonders why the white paper proposes to lower to 50 per cent the taxation rate of well-off taxpayers, he shows great naïvety or an unusual slowness of mind. In proposing this reduction, the government wanted to restore a certain balance by preventing a perfectly legal tax evasion.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is indeed possible for an individual with a large income to set up a personal incorporated company in order to take advantage of a reduced tax rate, that is a rate of 50 per cent. The proposed reduction will do away with this tax evasion. And for those who scrupulously refrained from availing themselves of this loophole, the 80 per cent rate was unfair.

I might perhaps remind my friends of the opposition that in 1967 there were less than 140 taxpayers who were assessed at the 80 per cent rate and less than 50,000 taxpayers at 50 per cent and over. It is therefore impossible, if the purpose is to raise the basic exemption figures, exempt from taxation 750,000 taxpayers and reduce the taxes of 3 million more, to have the cost of these changes borne only by those few taxpayers who pay 50 per cent and over.

If the Leader of the Opposition proposes that a rate of more than 50 per cent be applied to this group, he will also have to increase the rates applicable to corporations, otherwise, it would be an injustice. If I am not mistaken, this is another brilliant initiative of the Leader of the Opposition with a view to promoting economic activity.

[Mr. Côté (Longueuil).]

As for the capital gains tax, it reminds me of some rodents which will attack a small part of a building but, in the long run, will cause it to collapse. For instance, the argument to the effect that a five-year extension period is unfair to farmers in particular does not make sense. In fact, any farmer can sell his farm and hold a mortage, and as a matter of fact, that is very often the case. This formula allows to spread the proceeds of the sale over a much longer period, for the duration of the mortgage.

On the other hand, to say that the capital gains tax will be much higher than in the United States is completely false and a close look at the white paper is enough to convince us it is not so. The United States impose a 25 per cent tax on public companies shares. The white paper suggests a 50 per cent tax on half the gains, which represents a real 25 per cent tax.

The white paper also proposes granting an annual $1,000 exemption for the main residence of taxpayers, in addition to the allowance of $150 for repairs, which is a much better taxation method than the American one.

In submitting the white paper on tax reform, the government wanted to encourage a discussion of those proposals by all individuals concerned. Discussions have already been held with the various provincial representatives. It is clear that the government is ready to hear any constructive criticisms and to consider any worthwhile solutions. And I hope, Mr. Speaker, that those who have and who will take part in the debate in this house will readily attend the meetings of the parliamentary committee and that they will put forward more constructive proposals than those they made in this house up to now.

I would now like, Mr. Speaker, to make a few comments about the position of the hon. member for York South on the white paper. When I read his speech over, I realized how true is the saying that one quickly burns what one had formerly worshipped. Not so long time ago, the hon. member for York South considered the Carter report as his bible on tax matters. Yet, the Carter report did not recommend increases in basic exemptions whereas the white paper does. The report recommended that the income tax rate in higher income brackets be lowered from 80 per cent to 50 per cent, the same as the white paper.

Finally the Carter report proposed a 100 per cent reduction in income tax on the dividends of widely-held Canadian corporations. The white paper suggests an exemption of 50 per cent only in order to maintain a balance between shares and bonds.

Through what crooked reasoning can the honorable member for York South justify his present opposition to the white paper proposals?

As regards basic exemptions, how can he now turn about and state that the Carter report is not up to date in this matter and in the same breath say, trying to prove his point with statistics, that the increase is inadequate and should have been granted long ago?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté), the nation's tax collector, reading his speech, my first observation to him would be to ask him for goodness' sake to read the white paper. Having also had the privilege of sitting here for the past two hours while the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has absented himself, it is rather discouraging in a two-day debate—

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The Minister without Portfolio on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gray: The record should show that the Minister of Finance had to leave the chamber temporarily on urgent public business, and that I represent him in my own ministerial capacity.

Mr. Lundrigan: I do not accept that at all. That is not a question of privilege. The Minister of Finance has a responsibility to the Canadian people to be in this House to listen to the arguments of hon. members. I have attempted to consider the white paper—or what the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) referred to as the "red manifesto"—on the basis of its effects upon Canadian taxpayers, its equity, its fairness of tax distribution, as well as something that the Ontario Economic Council refers to as incentives in the tax structure. These incentives relate to the proposed reforms that govern the extent to which our economy can expand, as well as the extent to which individuals exercise their ingenuity and eagerness and display aggressiveness in developing their own businesses. In other words, when I think of incentives I think of fattening the animal, of building a little more muscle in the Canadian economy, so we can afford to pay for those services that the Canadian people deserve and demand.

If the Minister of Finances reads my speech, I hope he will not think I am being partisan when I say that I can find no way in which the white paper succeeds to any measurable extent on either count, whether in terms of equity or in terms of incentive. With regard to fairness of the tax distribution, in other words equity, having listened to the Minister of National Revenue and to the speeches of a number of other ministers, including the Minister of Finance, I am still convinced that the small increase in the basic exemption does nothing more than cloud the issue, befuddling the Canadian taxpayer into thinking he is getting a break. In actual fact it is nothing more than an increase in taxation; and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has done a masterful job in pointing out the effects the tax changes will have upon the average Canadian. By the end of two years when these tax proposals come into effect, inflation will have eaten away most of the benefits. Why are these benefits not brought in now? Why do we have to wait for two years if we are interested in helping the little man?

What about the tax credits to which the Leader of the Opposition referred? This appears to have quite a bit of relevance. Why was the alternative of "'tax credits" not considered and recommended to the committee for study? Let me leave that point, Mr. Speaker, because there are a number of other members who want to talk about that.

I am interested in the consideration of the effects of the white paper on the Atlantic provinces. This is a poor area in Canada about which we have had numerous discussions. In this regard, we must consider the unemployment situation. In consideration of the measures proposed in the white paper I think that if many of the proposals are implemented the Atlantic provinces might just as well forget about Confederation. That area of Canada will be at such a disadvantage it will literally have to close shop. The minister reminds me of a hibernating bear when he talks about these tax proposals. He thinks the Canadian nation will literally live off its own fat. There are no incentives and the proposals in the white paper must be considered as being disadvantageous to Atlantic Canada.

What kind of an economy do we have at the present moment in Atlantic Canada? We have the highest unemployment rate of any part of this country and reference has been made to this fact. Let me mention two or three statistics to verify this fact. These statistics do not exaggerate the situation, as a matter of fact, the situation is worse than the statistics suggest.

In October 1967 we had 4 per cent unemployment in Atlantic Canada. The situation was actually worse than the statistics indicate. I understand the sampling procedure used by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not accurately reflect unemployment. In October 1967 we had 4 per cent unemployment and in 1969 we have 5.2 per cent unemployment. In October 1967 New Brunswick had slightly more than 3 per cent unemployed, yet in October of 1969 it had 5.7 per cent. In October of 1967, Newfoundland had over 5 per cent unemployment and in 1969 has 7.4 per cent, the highest level since I was born a Canadian.

Again, we have a tight money situation in the Atlantic provinces. When there is a tight money situation in Canada we see the effect immediately. Investors do not want to move into areas where there is speculation and risk. Again, the economy of our area is related directly to small businesses which suffer a very high mortality rate. This area is made up mostly of small businesses. We do not have many of the large corporate clusters like metropolitan areas of Toronto, Montreal and Pittsburgh have. We have a multiplicity of small businesses. This is the economic fibre of that part of Canada.

Let us consider the type of economy we enjoy and the effect the proposals contained in this white paper will have on Atlantic Canada. Small construction firms build apartment blocks, houses and so on. Under the present tax system there is an incentive in respect of capital cost allowances. Now when they are faced with this recapturing clause that will apply to each property independently they will no longer have incentive to expand their operations. I hope there will be changes made when the committee studies this white paper. The minister suggests that the loophole under present recapturing arrangements will be plugged. This will remove that incentive and force each property owned by a business man, to stand on its own merit. When these small construction companies sell a property they will face the recapturing clause immediately. This proposed change will make it impossible for the small construction firms to expand or get into new business. They will pretty well have to retain existing properties. This is the "disincentive" about which I am talking.

Again, in the past some small builders have, as a result of ingenuity and effort, been able to build houses for resale at a profit of $10,000 or $12,000 in respect of a real expensive home, or $4,000 to $5,000 on a lower priced home. This present proposal will completely eliminate the incentive for these people to get involved.

I could not go on without reference to the Home Owner's tax, a tax which will be applied to a man if the sells his home and makes a profit. I really cannot see the advantage to Canadians of this aspect of the white paper. On the contrary, I think this will put many people in a mess. This is true because of the administrative costs and red tape involved. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not want to go into the bedrooms of the nation, but he is coming damn close to doing so as a result of this proposal. The Government is forcing Canadians to be materialistic. They are becoming the victims of government involvement in their own affairs. The government is trying to play the role of a political pinnochio when it sticks its nose into the affairs of every Canadian. As a result of government red tape the average Canadian is no longer a free man in his own home. A man's home used to be his castle. It is now becoming merely a piece of property. I could go on and on in this regard, but time does not permit me to do so.

Reference was made earlier to small business. The Atlantic provinces are made up of small businesses. With the elimination of the 21 per cent concessional provision, the small businesses will now have to compete with large corporate businesses. I have in mind small lumber dealers as well as primary, secondary and tertiary industries which net $20,000 or $30,000 per year employing 25 to 30 people more or less. These companies are already faced with stiff competition. They are also faced with the difficulty of raising funds. Banks have tightened up and are demanding high collateral. These firms can no longer get the money they need to expand and develop markets. They face difficulties not faced by big companies. As well there is a great deal of speculation involved in small business ventures and a very high mortality rate.

In view of the present proposals of the minister, these small businesses will have to close shop. They will be faced with a 50 per cent tax if they make $20,000 to $30,000 a year or more. I am amazed that there is not a greater conflict between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). One minister, the minister of Regional Economic Expansion, recognizes that incentives must be provided to small businessmen in the four Atlantic provinces who want to expand. In the case of a company which plans to expand and invest $30,000 there is a 20 per cent incentive. If such a company wishes to establish a new business costing $60,000 or more it receives a 20 per cent incentive. These companies must face initial high labour costs and the new Regional Development Department is to help with these costs.

In spite of this recognition by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Minister of Finance takes an opposite view. One minister says we should not discourage small businesses from getting on their feet, yet the other uses the excuse that small businessmen ought not to be encouraged by the 21 per cent concessional arrangement. We have become involved in a political push-me-pull-you. The Government is moving in both directions. One minister wants to build incentives into the Atlantic economy while the other minister is cutting his legs out from under him. I should like to tune in on cabinet discussions when this matter is considered.

A great deal of the employment in the Atlantic provinces is created by the exploration of extractive industries, namely the mining operations. This is where a lot of our growth has taken place in the last few years. Recently I read in the Ontario Economic Council report that there has been one billion dollars annually put into the Canadian economy by oil and mining companies through exploration work. A great percentage of that has been investment in northern parts of Canada. Much has been invested in Quebec, Labrador, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick where there is a great deal of undeveloped resources. In other words, the aim should be to build incentives in these areas to encourage industry to Atlantic Canada to develop our resources.

In other words, there should be extra incentives for companies which are willing to gamble and explore. If they make good, they are really protected. But this white paper, if it should be accepted, would eliminate practically any incentive to a mining operation to move into an area in which there is a danger of failure. It eliminates the three-year protective tax agreements which have been in existence. This will really disrupt mining in Atlantic Canada. The government says, "If you move in and do not make it, thanks anyway; if you do make it, pay up". The government says, "If you pay for your capital and operating costs, then start paying your taxes". In other words, there is no real incentive to large companies to move into areas in which there is a need for development and where there should be incentives.

I could refer at length to evidence in support of my position if time permitted. However, I shall refer to something which perhaps is of great concern to some people. In reply to the hon. member who mentioned that the provinces are very dissatisfied the minister said, "Refer to Table 13." I have referred to it. It indicates that every province will get an increase as a result of this proposal and that there will be $165 million generated by the tax proposals. You may refer to page 85 for that statistic. The government says that, as a government, it is prepared to give all 10 provinces a total of $20.4 million. I am not a mathematician, but it seems to me that is $20 million to the provinces and $145 million to the federal government, which means the federal government receives 88 cents out of every dollar and that the provinces combined receive 12 cents.

I have computed the average percentage of increase to the provinces. These are the percentages of increase in income tax going to the provinces along with the equalization payments: Newfoundland less than .5 per cent. The province of Nova Scotia will receive an increase of .8 per cent from Ottawa on the basis of the income tax and equalization payments. Prince Edward Island will receive .8 per cent; New Brunswick .7 per cent; Quebec, .6 per cent; Ontario, .6 per cent; Manitoba, 1.2 per cent; Saskatchewan, .6 per cent; Alberta, 1.5 per cent and British Columbia, 1 per cent. This represents an average increase of less than 1 per cent. The provinces are supposed to be satisfied with this amount. There is no reference to the need for reviewing the tax-sharing arrangements with the provinces. How can one blame the premiers of the various provinces for expressing regret at the almost complete contempt the federal government has shown for the provinces. This is really discouraging. At the Hot Springs conference when the Prime Minister was asked about the provinces, the Prime Minister said he would tell the provinces that perhaps they ought to consider doubling their taxes. This is the federal formula for helping the provinces—one times two, double your taxes. This is what the Prime Minister tells the provinces. He tells them that if they want services they should double their taxes. How can they double their taxes in the face of these income tax increases, as well as other increases by the federal government.

If this white paper is to make sense, it would seem to me there should be some study of the tax-sharing arrangement with the provinces. This is not a reform of our tax structure. As a new member I expected some proposals to change the balance of our tax structure in Canada. This is a disguise for an increase in taxation.

I could continue and give more details, but I wish to sum up my feelings about the impact of the white paper on Atlantic Canada. First, it will force the provinces to increase their taxes because of the heavy demands for new services and the imposition of certain programs by the federal government which the federal government plans to vacate, in some cases by the year 1975 and earlier in other cases. It will pretty well ruin the small businessman in Atlantic Canada. It will discourage mining exploration and in that sense will lessen the opportunities of Atlantic Canada to develop its resources. It will bring about a substantial increase in the number of unemployed which is now being increased by present government policies.

I see that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) is blushing. I can appreciate the reason he is blushing. It is because of the lack of support he receives from his cabinet in his efforts to improve the situation in Atlantic Canada. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion could not take it; he stayed away. There will be an increase in unemployment in Atlantic Canada, a situation which is chronic because of present government policy. There will be a reduction in the standard of living and a dampening of incentive. There will be a need for more welfare because fewer people will be employed. All I can say is that from now on I hope for goodness sake the government will very seriously consider the need for an increase in regional disparity grants. There will have to be an increased effort to feed the people of Atlantic Canada because this is what the government will have to do if some of the basic tenets of this proposed white paper are adopted.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House of the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment. The questions are the following: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—consumer affairs—Canadian price of Ford "Maverick"; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Indian Affairs—Band council borrowing regulations—provision of fund; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Highways—Atlantic provinces—cost-sharing formula.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I believe there would be general agreement to waiving private members' hour so that more members might participate in this discussion on this motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF WHITE PAPER ON TAXATION REFORM

The House resumed consideration of the Motion of Mr. Benson (for Mr. Macdonald, Rosedale):

That the white paper entitled Proposals for Tax Reform tabled in the House on November 7, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to follow my good friend from Gander-Twillingate, but I was considerably disturbed to hear the hon. member who is from Newfoundland criticize to such a great extent the white paper on tax reform because it has been my thought that the white paper was designed to help the low income provinces.

It was with a great deal of interest that I listened to the speech given in this House on Friday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). The minister, as usual, was well prepared and articulate as he outlined the proposals for tax reform. Let me say now that I believe the great majority of those proposals are sound and will shortly be the basis for excellent legislation which will recast our present outdated tax structure in a form more in line with the concept of fairness and justice which most Canadians desire.

Lest the minister get too comfortable, I should warn the House that this is the last kind word I will speak about the white paper today. My concern is with the plight of the small businessman. When we talk about the small businessman in Canada we are talking about a man who, to complement his ingenuity and resourcefulness, often works 10 or 12 hours a day. We are talking about a man who finds himself competing with large firms, many of which are international or even multi-national in character. He is a man who cuts short his summer vacation, if he has any at all, in order to return home to deal with his business problem; a man who rises from the supper table and heads, not for the t.v. set but for the den to work out business problems; a man who must fight long and hard to keep his small part of the market. The small businessman in Canada stands as a living example of the difference between socialism and free enterprise. Let us not take from this man, who has pride in both the growth of his company and his country, the incentives which he needs to carry on his business. At present, the tax rate is 21 per cent on the first $35,000 of corporate earnings and 50 per cent on any amount over that. If the proposals in the white paper were to be adopted, the 21 per cent tax rate would ultimately be abolished and the 50 per cent rate would apply on total corporate income. This would be disastrous for Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) proposed that the new 50 per cent rate be phased in over five years with the 21 per cent rate applying only to the initial $28,000 in the first year, $21,000 in the second, $14,000 in the third, $7,000 in the fourth, and be eliminated in the fifth year.

Why has this new so-called reform been suggested? In his speech to the House on Friday, the minister gave his answer to this question. He believes that the main reason Canadians set up corporations is to avoid tax. My belief is that this is not the case. I believe that there are many reasons for setting up corporations, but the most acceptable is to limit the liability of the persons involved.

The small businessman does not seek to avoid paying taxes. He merely wants to remain in such a position as to be able to use his profits to expand and improve his operation, in other words, to re-invest in the country. Are we to stop this re-investment? After all, the small businessman does not realize any immediate personal gain or see any instant improvement in his own standard of living by plowing profits back into the company. He needs this capital to enable his small corporation—a Canadian corporation—to develop and enlarge, perhaps by purchasing more sophisticated equipment to produce a superior product.

However, I realize that there may be some persons who, under the present tax structure, have made a practice of leaving corporate income for an indefinite period of time in the company, particularly in a closely held corporation or series of such corporations which boast incomes of $35,000 or less. Clearly, in such cases the tax revenue of the country suffers because the corporate profits are only being taxed at the rate of 21 per cent.

What is the solution? I propose that the solution is not to tax 50 per cent, which cuts down the incentive. I propose that the closely held corporations which have incomes of $35,000 or less be allowed to retain the present 21 per cent tax rate for five year periods. At the end of any given five year period, the businessman would be taxed on the profit of each consecutive year in the period at the rate he would have been taxed had his corporate income been treated as personal income. In other words, the small businessman would only be deferring his payment of taxes. He could not avoid payment. For the privilege of delaying tax payment he would pay interest to the government on the amount of the deferred taxes at the rate of 1 per cent above the long-term borrowing rate of the federal government. It would also be stipulated that to benefit under this deferred taxation plan a corporation would have to be at least 51 per cent Canadian owned.

I feel that my proposal is a good compromise between the recommendations in the white paper, which would lead to greatly restricted growth of existing Canadian small corporations as well as to the discouragement of individuals with exciting ideas from going into business for themselves, and the present legislation which admittedly is open to some abuse. The solution I put forward in my brief remarks today would allow legitimate businessmen with closely held corporations to retain the internal source of expansion capital they so desperately need to compete, while at the same time not reducing over-all the taxation revenue due our country.

In conclusion, I would like to read from an editorial entitled "Profit and Loss" which appeared in the November 11 issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail. It reads as follows:

> Canadians cannot know how much of their productivity and prosperity has depended upon creative men who started small, with the aid of the low 21 per cent rate, and eventually grew big and forced their competitors to grow also, and thereby provided wealth and jobs all round.

All the Canadian small businessman wants is to be allowed a chance to survive and the opportunity to grow. My hope is that the minister will not decide to take away that chance of growth.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, so much has been said about the good features of the white paper on tax reform—mostly by the minister—that the public is in no danger of overlooking them. Indeed, after his prodigious efforts in promoting this particular package of payments, the minister could well take on the job of advertising the advantages of bikinis to the belles of Baffin land. Probably it would prove an even more agreeable task than winging his way across Canada accompanied by the white paper.

In any event, I shall say at the outset that there are measures in the white paper which distribute the tax burden a little more fairly, and where these exist we favour them as far as they go. But the net result falls far short of an equitable and effective taxation policy for Canada. I am glad of this opportunity to indicate some of the reasons.

In his speech opening the debate the other day, the Minister of Finance said that people in the middle income group of taxpayers want to be sure that those in the upper income group are pulling their fair share of the load. If middle income taxpayers need this assurance, it is doubly necessary for those in the low income groups, and extremely urgent for those who do not get enough income to be taxed at all. For it is only when those in the upper brackets are paying their full share of taxes that those on low incomes can keep their heads above water. Fair taxation of the wealthy is the only way to provide the public goods and services which alone can prevent the cancer of poverty from spreading in this country.

In the opinion of the New Democratic Party, the proposals of the white paper do not ensure taxation according to ability to pay, nor will the imposition of a capital gains tax redress the balance. As long as there is a ceiling on the tax rate, we shall not have taxation according to ability to pay. We do not intend to settle for anything less than the removal of the ceiling.

Various ideas have been given in this debate about criteria to be kept in mind when designing a tax system. Our deputy leader gave an admirable summary of our ideas the other day. But I would like to add just one more thought. To me, the most important thing is not how much you pay in taxes; it is how much you have left to live on after you have paid your taxes. Judged by this standard, taxpayers in the upper brackets will not have too much to worry about, not if the recent statements of bank incomes and corporation profits mean anything. Judged by this standard, however, there are a lot of people in the low income brackets who do have plenty to worry about, to say nothing of those millions of Canadians below the taxation and poverty levels altogether.

The Economic Council says that one Canadian in five is living below the poverty level now. That verb "living" is inaccurate. The proper one is existing, and existing in a state of insecurity and misery impossible for any of us in this chamber to comprehend. In today's conditions, the minister's suggestion of $30 a week provides the kind of existence that no modern prison or penitentiary would dare to tolerate. In this connection it is interesting to note a reference in today's Globe and Mail to the minister's visit to Vancouver. It shows that his hotel suite there cost $45 daily, in other words enough to keep a $30 a week man for a week and a half, yet that was merely for lodging in the hotel room for one night.

The minister boasted that the white paper will take three quarters of a million taxpayers off the rolls because of their poverty. The Economic Council says poverty begins for a single person below $1,800, and for a family of four below $4,200. Senior citizens' organizations and others have been campaigning long and hard for income tax exemptions of $2,000 for single persons and $4,000 for married couples. Yet the minister sets the new exemptions at only $1,500 a year for a single person and $3,500 for a family of four. What kind of justice is this? What kind of sense? It has been said that you cannot get blood from a stone. Well, the minister is having a good try. What he fails to recognize is that these poverty striken taxpayers are not stones. They are men and women of flesh and blood and feelings, and have the same kind of needs as the rest of us.

The proposed exemptions should be raised, and raised well above poverty level. Our recent New Democratic Party Convention in Winnipeg put our policy in a resolution in these words:

> Tax reform to make the over-all tax system truly progressive: integration of the income tax system with the minimum income so that no income taxes are paid by persons below the poverty level and the income tax form can be used for determining eligibility for the minimum income.

The minimum income? That brings me to another point of criticism of the white paper, a point which has been dealt with already but which needs much emphasis. You cannot make a proper assessment of the value of these proposals without knowing what other proposals the government is going to make in interrelated fields.

What is the government going to do about the rising cost of living? Establishing boards, councils, committees, task forces and other similar pieces of machinery is not action. It is merely buying time for inaction. The public, and the members of Parliament here who are their representatives, need to know what is going to be done to stop inflation and rising living costs. They need to know in order to pass judgment on the validity of the white paper proposals. Yet all our inquiries in this direction are met by smiling secretiveness. The masterpiece will be unveiled in due course. Meanwhile it is government property. Keep out! The taxpayers are beginning to get tired of this. They have paid for the machinery. They want to know what, if anything, is going on. They have a right to get value for their money.

A second question relevant to the proposals in the white paper is: what is the government going to propose at the end of its long review of existing social security programs? Is it going to penny pinch still further by applying the means test to all of them? Is it going to face reality by making long-overdue increases? Is it going to replace the outmoded patchwork by a guaranteed income?

The Prime Minister's recent answer to that question when I asked it was not too reassuring. He said, "... as a government we are not yet satisfied that this is a realistic step." Not realistic? With four and a half million Canadians existing below the poverty line, with all that such an appalling figure indicates in the way of public taxation for unnecessary social assistance, disease, delinquency, crime, divorce, drugs, mental breakdown, and ultimately the outbreak of civil disorder in our great cities.

Not realistic? With the average gross income of a manufacturing worker only $5,723, and his family exposed to the hazards of unemployment and all the other risks which become so acute where income leaves no margin. Not realistic? How realistic is this government? And how long will it refuse to face reality in the matter of a fair distribution of income?

If this is the government's answer, what other social security proposals does it have in mind? If we are to assess the proposals in the white paper we need to know. Then, there is the sales tax. What does the government intend to do about it? For years now the public has been clamouring to get rid of it as a brake on production, with particular reference to housing. We need to know the answer to this one, too.

Undoubtedly these and many other relevant questions will be raised when the white paper is in committee. Until the answers are provided the public can get no accurate and comprehensive idea of the effect of the white paper proposals on the individual taxpayer and on the state of our economy as a whole. What is the sense in granting increased exemptions if the cost of living and other kinds of taxes are going to gobble up the increases?

One feature that we in this party deplore is that the white paper proposals perpetuate the double standard of income tax deductions which exists in our present tax laws. There is one standard for the self-employed, the professional and business taxpayer, who can deduct all sorts of costs as expenses of earning his income. There is quite another for the wage and salary earner who can deduct practically nothing. True, the white paper proposes a slight easement for the wage and salary earner, 3 per cent of his income, with a maximum amount deductible of $150 a year. But for the self-employed there is still no maximum to the amount he can deduct.

Nowhere does this double standard of deductibility show up more glaringly than in the new proposal of child care expenses for working parents. Let me say at once that we welcome the idea of helping working parents bear the burden of expense for their children while they, the parents, are working. The proposal to pay up to $500 per year per child under the age of 14 is one small and very belated step to protect family life. But upon examination it is really a very limited one.

Why cannot a working mother, a taxpayer, deduct the actual cost of child care as an expense of earning her income in the same way as the self-employed taxpayer can do with his expenses? Surely, if the principle is right in the one case it is right in the other. The new child-care provision is thus manifestly discriminatory against the working mother who earns a wage or salary. Alimony and child care payments made by men have always been tax deductible. Why not baby-sitting or nursery school expenses for women?

The white paper proposal sets a limit of $2,000 per family for child care services. In other words, the government is saying clearly to parents across Canada, "Four children is enough." I am inclined to agree. But what about existing families of five or six or more children, children in mother-led or single parent families where the need for child care is great?

You will say, of course, that if a woman or a parent has a number of small children her place is at home, bringing them up. Bringing them up on what? Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have here a powerful argument for the measure I have urged in this house on a number of occasions—the provision of an allowance which would permit mothers of young children to stay at home and look after them instead of having to take jobs outside the home to get enough to feed and clothe them and keep them in decent surroundings. Such a measure has been in effect in France for a number of years now. I would hope that our government would soon consider this kind of family protection for Canada. If it will not do it for the family, let it do it for the taxpayers who have to pay all the costs of neglected homes and neglected children.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

Another shortcoming of the white paper child-care proposal is that the $500 figure bears no relation to the actual cost of child care. One organization of single parents, Single Parents Associated, with headquarters in Toronto, summarizes the actual cost per year of child care service for one child. The figures are based on a 50-week year and enumerate the various forms of child-care which now exist: live-in help $4,200 per child; daily help $3,550 per child; outside day care $1,000 per child; nursery school $1,680 per child; and private school $3,000 per child. Obviously the white paper has not priced the actual cost of child care before setting its tax deduction figure because the two have no relation to each other. Further, it is true that every single form of child-care service enumerated is in short supply and would have to be greatly augmented if even a small fraction of the children of working parents were to be adequately protected.

• (5:20 p.m.)

One further criticism of this child-care proposal that is the need to keep receipts in order to qualify for the deduction. It seems to me that this is an almost insurmountable and quite unnecessary obstacle. Working parents and the baby sitters they employ are just not geared for such paper work which is the delight of public servants like those in the minister's department. The income tax form clearly sets out the occupation of the taxpayer and the number of his or her dependants. Why not permit him or her simply to deduct a definite amount per year for child care, in the same way that for years all taxpayers were permitted to deduct a flat $100 for medical expenses? To me, this would seem a much simpler way to do it.

There are many more things Mr. Speaker, I should like to say about the white paper if time permitted. But I want to end with just one more observation which seems to me very important. A greal deal is said about the serious consequences of endangering incentive by taxing the upper income brackets their full share. We are told it would be fatal to the future of Canada to make these taxpayers feel that their efforts were going to be curbed. I have come to believe that there is a far greater danger in frustrating the initiative of the people at the lower end of the income scale. A great many of these people have never had a chance to exercise that initiative and in too many cases it is atrophied. The cost to the taxpayer of carrying these people along in idleness because their initiative cannot find an outlet, is very great. Too many children are growing up who have never known what initiative is because their parents, too, were born and raised in poverty and insecurity. They have no chance to exercise their initiative and no incentive to do the sort of thing that is natural to people in higher income groups. How can such children be expected to develop initiative? The very limited success of the Head Start Program and other programs designed to coax out this almost dead initiative in children has indicated the seriousness of allowing this to be stifled at the source.

To my mind we need an income tax policy which, by taxing according to ability to pay, right up to the top of the income scale, will encourage the initiative of those low income citizens whose efforts could add so much to their own lives and the life of this country. I do not believe this white paper provides such a policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate on tax reform proposals though, in my opinion, it seems somewhat premature and this for two main reasons. The first one is that it was absolutely impossible in the short time we have had at our disposal since the white paper was tabled to assimilate it entirely and to understand fully all the recommendations it contains. The second reason is that it might perhaps have been more appropriate for us to hear from the various agencies that might have wished to submit briefs.

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Bar Association, the Chambre de Commerce, the Board of Trade intend to submit briefs which, I am sure of it, would have been very useful to the members of the House before they got ready to take part in the debate.

As far as I am concerned, I am interested in talking about these problems, both as a member of parliament and as an accountant. My constituents in the riding of Laurier are poor people, but they nevertheless were pleased with some recommendations, particularly the one relating to basic personal exemptions that are increased from $1,000 to $1,400 for single people and from $2,000 to $2,800 for married people as well as the exemption that applies to working parents. In such a case, a deduction would be allowed for child care expenses, up to $500 per child under 14 years of age, or 2,000 per family.

They are also satisfied with the one allowing a deduction of 3 per cent of the salary for professional expenses up to a maximum of $150.

Mr. Speaker, some years ago I had an opportunity to take part in a debate and I chose to speak on the report prepared by the Bélanger Commission after its study of possible tax reforms in the province of Quebec. I then opposed the capital gains tax and I used as main argument that it might keep eventual investors away.

However, considering the new philosophy established by the minister in the proposals for tax reform, I have to side with him, because, at the present time, the point is priority and equity for the Canadian taxpayers. At the beginning of the paper entitled "Main points", it is said and I quote:

> A number of goals and standards have guided the government in its approach to reform. They include a fair distribution of the tax burden based upon ability to pay; ... steady economic growth and continuing prosperity; the understanding of modern social needs... a system that can and will be used by the provinces.

Naturally, the minister immediately states that the co-operation of the provinces will be needed if we are to be in a position to apply the recommendations that will be made. It would therefore be fitting that we meet with the provinces for a joint conference on the recommendations of the white paper and that we endeavour to find a uniform tax system for the country, that would be equally applicable to the provinces.

As an accountant, I naturally have a number of questions that I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in order to obtain more information about certain matters which, at the present time, appear rather obscure.

Taxation Reform

• (5:30 p.m.)

Recommendation 5.5 of the white paper says:

> The government proposes to create a new depreciation class which would sweep up all of these nothings and would enable the taxpayer to deduct 10 per cent of the book value of this class each year.

The first question would be: What does the minister mean by the book value? It would seem advisable to me that the minister give us, whenever he feels it is the right moment, a definition of the expression "book value", so that we can understand the exact meaning of the recommendations when they are approved, with or without amendment.

It is proposed that 10 per cent of the book value of assets be deducted each year, but it is not said whether this deduction will apply on a direct line basis or whether it will be calculated on the basis of the residual value, as is the case now throughout the nation. This is another element to consider and on which to obtain more explanations.

What surprises me somewhat is that recommendation 5.14 again mentions depreciation, and I quote:

> Therefore, the government intends in due course to invite briefs on the system and rates of capital cost allowance.

Yet, if we are revising all the rates, it may have been somewhat premature to set a 10 per cent rate, as we would like to know the views of experts in this field before setting or revising rates.

Recommendation 5.8 concerns the selling of goodwill, and I quote:

> —taxpayers who sell goodwill in the first year of the new system would be taxable on 40 per cent ... if in the second year. taxable on 45 per cent and exempt on 55 per cent; and so on, with the taxable portion increasing by 5 percentage point each year until the thirteenth year—

Now, it would seem, at first sight, that such a way of taxing the selling of goodwill is not very equitable, that the 40 per cent tax is arbitrary and that, consequently, it might be appropriate to know the reasons behind it.

If an individual sells his shares instead of the goodwill, it would seem that the tax would not apply and, consequently, there could be an injustice with regard to the sale of the goodwill. I wonder why we could not, when the minister sets evaluation day, evaluate the goodwill of the various business concerns according, naturally, to recognized accounting criteria.

[Mr. Leblanc (Laurier).]

What about the criterion whereby the number of years during which the business has existed should be taken into account? Indeed, if an individual has been in business for five years, he could perhaps spread the tax over a five-year period; he could do the same if he has been in business for ten years, perhaps at a maximum rate of 5 per cent per year. On the other hand, the tax levied could go from zero to 5 per cent per year; thus after a 20-year period the whole amount would become taxable.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion, or at least the translation of some articles would seem to be misleading. I should like to mention, in particular, recommendation 3.20 which says in French:

> ... le Gouvernement propose que les contribuables qui, en raison de leurs occupations professionnelles, sont appelés à se déplacer d'une région à une autre au Canada, soient autorisés à considérer la vente de leur maison et l'achat d'une autre résidence dans la nouvelle région comme une transaction non imposable, ...

The English text is somewhat different. It might be advisable to know which text is the right one. This is what we have in English, and I quote:

[English]

> In addition to the exemption, the government proposes that a taxpayer who moves from one area to another within Canada in connection with a change of job—

[Translation]

In French, the term "change of job" has been translated as follows:

> —en raison de leurs occupations professionnelles,—

Does it actually mean therefore that the individual should also change jobs or whether he only has to move from one city to another. For instance, if the comptroller of a large company in Montreal was called back to the head office in Ontario, in order to perform the same duties would it be considered as a change of job or a transfer for professional purposes?

This could apply to salesmen as well as to accountants or lawyers who, for one reason or another, must travel from one province to another in order to do their job.

As to recommendations 5.46 and 5.47, the English text is much more precise than the French text.

Recommendation 5.47 reads as follows, and I quote:

En conséquence, le Gouvernement propose que ces contribuables soient autorisés à échelonner la déclaration de ces sommes sur plusieurs années. En d'autres termes, ils les feraient figurer dans leurs revenus déclarés à mesure que diminueraient leurs créances et leurs stocks.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Now the English text says—and I quote:

[English]

Specifically, they would bring them into income as their total outstanding receivables and inventories are reduced.

[Translation]

So the English text contains the word "total" which does not appear in the French text. As to the word "outstanding", it means exactly what the government has in mind but it does not seem to be translated faithfully in French.

By the way, the C.C.H. produced recently hypothetical model figures about the recommendation to place the book-keeping system of business men and professional people on an annually increasing basis instead of maintaining the present collection basis.

The C.C.H. gives the following example: If there are $25,000 in bills receivable in 1970, they will have to be entered in the books and in 1971 there would be bills totalling $40,000. There would be at the end of the year $30,000 in bills receivable and $35,000 in cash received.

One would have to know the exact taxable amount, as there seems to be some confusion among accountants as to this. Indeed, the figures published by the C.C.H. are merely an interpretation and are not necessarily the same as the ones obtained by some accountants.

I believe it is important that this matter be cleared up. If professional people and non incorporated owners have to set up their accounting system on a new basis, will they benefit from the same exemptions that are granted to corporations, especially as concerns pension fund contributions for current and past services, since corporations may deduct from their income tax their payments in that regard under contracts signed with their employees. Professional people cannot, at the present time, deduct them.

If we require equitably professional people and other businessmen who are not incorporated to pay taxes according to another system, we could perhaps grant them the same exemptions that can exist, particularly in relation to the pension funds, for current and past services.

Chapter 4 deals with the granting of a fiscal benefit to shareholders. Indeed, a shareholder who receives a dividend will also obtain from the corporation a credit that will be proportionate to the taxes that have been paid.

This is obviously an advantage as far as promotion is concerned. It amounts, I think, to an incentive to industry as a whole. There is perhaps the danger of some difficulties arising in the bond market because those who will get interest will have absolutely no credit that might minimize the amount which they receive in that way as interest. And we can wonder if these people will buy the bonds issued by the three levels of government and by the school boards since they will have no credit to offset their amount of taxes. This could perhaps bring about—if my assumption is correct—an increase in the rate of interest in order to find buyers. Thus, if you increase the rate of interest for the municipalities, you might get an increase in taxes, in rents and finally in the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, due to all my other tasks, it was impossible for me to go through this white paper. I agree with its main philosophy, which is to ensure the imposition of a fair share of taxation based on the ability to pay, and I hope that we shall soon be more enlightened on this matter, after the Minister of Finance will have given us additional particulars and after hearing the various briefs that the experts intend to submit to the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee.

[English]

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in any discussion of a matter as important as tax reform I am sure consideration as to the reasons for such reform and the events leading up to it is vital to an understanding of the situation presently brought to the attention of the House by the government. I shall confine my remarks pretty well to general observations, consistent with the limited time at my disposal, and I should like to consider first of all the first chapter of the white paper, the document which has been referred to as a red manifesto.

Mr. Gibson: By whom?

Mr. Flemming: I did not say by whom. I said it had been referred to as such, and that was a proper statement of fact. Under the heading Tax Reform, the imposition of a fair share of taxation based on the ability to pay is mentioned as the objective of the tax proposals. I rather object to soaking the person who has the ability to pay. It seems to me there should be considerations other than just the ability to pay; there is more to it than that.

Ability to pay is derived from the willingness of individuals to work to earn money and to acquire that ability. It does not just happen, and I do not think it should be taken for granted by any government. I feel that the person who has made an extraordinary effort should not necessarily be discriminated against. I am thinking, now, of the individual who has ambition for himself and for his family and who possesses a desire to improve, create and accomplish something.

Surely such a person deserves special encouragement rather than simply being soaked, which is the suggestion in this paragraph of the white paper. Why should he be penalized? This is a point which the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray), representing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) here this afternoon, might well bear in mind when the subject is further examined. I urge the government not to be induced into applying the principle embodied in the ability to pay theory. It is not automatic; government must be careful not to kill the goose which lays the golden egg; it should not discourage ambitious people. There are some who are willing to make the utmost use of the opportunities which present themselves, and there are others who do not possess such ambition. To my mind, the function of a government is to create a climate of opportunity and then encourage the individual to take advantage of it.

The phrase "tax reform" pretty well suggests a necessity for taxation. Under our system, taxation is essential inasmuch as it provides for the needs of government. Whether this is a good thing or not does not come into the question at the moment; it is simply a fact under our system. The state today is taking more and more of the pay checks of individuals; it is having deductions made from pay envelopes, it is asking people to pay in advance if they are eligible to pay. The suggestion is that the government can spend the people's money more wisely than the people themselves. There may be an argument against it, but that is our system. In recognizing the system, however, there is a danger that with it comes altogether too much freedom in taking liberties with people's earnings, and it is my opinion we should frown upon the free and casual use of this sort of liberty by any government, regardless of its authority.

I wonder whether anyone has looked up the meaning of the word "tax". In the context of this discussion it means: "Forced contribution of wealth to meet the need of a government." Another meaning is: "A disagreeable and burdensome duty or charge." These are not very pleasant meanings for a word to have. I submit we are dealing here with something we should not be very happy about; it just happens to be a necessity that individuals shall be taxed. A noted authority has said that "the power to tax is the power to destroy". This brings into sharp focus the danger of a careless or excessive use of that power and the serious effects unlimited taxation can have upon the financial conditions of many people. It could destroy them. I am also concerned about the effect it could have upon individual initiative and effort, because it could destroy that too. It could also destroy the incentive of individuals to make full use of opportunities presented.

In the government's proposals no mention is made of governmental responsibility properly to administer and to conduct financial affairs. No mention is made of control of governmental expenditures. The government is asking the people to accept tax reforms as a responsibility of the people, but makes no mention whatever of what the government will do on behalf of the people in the disposition of tax dollars collected from them.

I submit that the white paper should not only underline the responsibility of the people to accept the principle of the collection of taxes, but it should also commit the government to undertaking a proper financial operation with proper stability by not increasing its expenditures beyond a certain percentage of the gross national product.

The proposed tax reforms have been referred to as a movement toward socialism, and other labels have been applied to them. But, surely, in any far-reaching tax reforms the government should be responsible to Parliament, and through Parliament to the people, clearly to set out the measures it proposes to adopt in the interests of the people. This policy is rendered imperative by the inflation that exists and an apparent willingness on the part of the government to accept inflation as inevitable.

Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? In respect of the last issue of Canada Savings Bonds purchasers are guaranteed that their investment will be doubled in a period of eight years. I say this in itself is inflationary beyond question. It is probably the greatest indication of inflation today. My point is that if the government regards inflation as inevitable, it must take some measures that benefit the interests of the taxpayers, instead of merely soaking them with increased taxation. In my opinion, inflation is not inevitable. The government can cure inflation by applying business methods to meet the problem. The government is going to phase out some expenditures and live within its income. In other words, the government is going to do what Israel and West Germany have shown can be accomplished by hard work, thrift and the adoption of proper financial measures. Canada can well take a lesson from these two countries.

Since 1963 either this government or a government of the party of our friends opposite has been in office. What has been accomplished, Mr. Speaker? I should like to list some of the accomplishments. First of all, there has been an almost continuous series of deficits on ordinary account. Second, there is a degree of inflation which has brought about the highest cost of living in our history. Third, we now have the highest cost of money in history, as well as the highest expenditures. Similarly, we have had the greatest increase in taxation of any similar period in history, as well as the greatest increase in the number of bureaucrats, paid large salaries for mediocre performance, ever to be on the payroll of this country.

Deficit financing is justified only in times of high unemployment and limited economic activity. I acknowledge there have been times when this sort of situation existed and it was necessary, so to speak, to prime the pump by adopting deficit financing. However, since 1963—in fact, since 1961—all economists have agreed that we have been living in what has been termed the affluent society; times have been good. Yet successive Liberal governments have paid no attention to conditions. They have acted as though the affluent society did not exist. They have continued to borrow money and to compete with private industry. Instead of allowing private industry to take care of capital expenditures, Liberal governments have competed with private industry for labour, for materials and for money. To a very great extent the government is responsible for the inflationary situation that now exists in Canada. The government was warned by the Governor of the Bank of Canada several years ago that this was happening, but paid no attention. Only when the situation became serious was drastic action taken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may want to call it six o'clock. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude these remarks by reference to a capital gains tax. I feel strongly that an underdeveloped country like Canada should make a great effort to attract risk capital. Our three-year exemption from income tax and the absence of a capital gains tax attract this type of capital, the beneficial results of which have been very apparent in recent years. My leader, in the course of his speech on Friday, made our position very clear. He stated that under the government's proposals there will be less encouragement for the development of mines and of oil exploration in the more remote areas. This is undoubtedly true. The factor of capital gains caused by inflation is surely something which will be most unfair to tax in any form whatsoever.

I can understand a government proceeding with a plan to do so, but I want to refer to the suggested mechanics of applying the capital gains tax. To accept a valuation on a certain date as being final and then apply a five-year revaluation at the end of that period, regardless whether the capital gain has been realized, constitutes a tax on capital rather than a capital gains tax. I submit that a country like Canada, needing capital investment for development purposes, should not apply a tax on capital at any time. This is especially true when the rates suggested in the white paper are higher than those presently in effect in the United States. I ask the minister and the government to recognize the difference which exists, so far as tax payments are concerned, between small business and large, widely-held business. I have some knowledge of the former because I have an association with companies which qualify under that heading.

In the first place, small companies often find it difficult to raise funds with which to pay the tax bill as rendered. In many instances the owners are active in the management. They draw as salaries the minimum amount needed to meet living costs. They use all the available capital to effect improvements in operation by purchasing equipment, machinery, erecting buildings and making other capital expenditures designed to improve their productivity and ability to compete, sometimes with other countries for world markets. To be asked to pay in cash the capital gains tax on an accumulated basis for all their improvements in value, when their liquidity does not justify the same, leaves only one alternative; and that is to sell out, even at a price which involves a substantial sacrifice.

Then the question arises, to whom do they sell? With Canadians facing the same tax laws and having the same general limited financial resources, the prospect of their having the financial ability to purchase seems remote; so they have no choice except to sell the business, at the best price obtainable, to foreign buyers. This is a hard blow to Canadian ownership. The chances are that the buyer will be a United States company.

I have never been very worried about United States ownership of Canadian companies so long as they observe Canadian laws, if such ownership has been the determining factor in creating and developing industry. But to have tax laws which are likely to drive Canadian companies into U.S. hands through a forced sale for the reason that it may be not only be the last but perhaps the only place to go, seems most undesirable. Governments should take a very dim view of presenting such legislation.

The government must recognize the need for incentives rather than discouragement, attractive tax rates rather than the utmost in extraction, and decisions leading to growth rather than to sacrifice sales. In the language of my leader on Friday last, Canadians will regret that this government, given an opportunity to develop a tax system that would not only be more equitable but would help provide a greater opportunity for Canadians to control our economic growth, failed to do so.

[Mr. Flemming.]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, if an independent observer had listened to this debate last Friday and today, he would wonder whether the speakers were talking about the same white paper. Conservatives have described the white paper as a socialistic document and, even today, as a red manifesto, while the socialists, members of the NDP, have described it as a very conservative document.

In my opinion it is unfortunate that opposition members have taken such a partisan approach to this white paper, because when the minister introduced it he said he was putting forward proposals designed to bring about more equity in the tax system, balanced with incentives for economic growth. He said he was putting forward these proposals and wanted to hear discussion, criticisms and alternatives. However, all he got was criticism without any facts and figures behind it, and no alternatives suggested.

When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was speaking on Friday he said this was wrong in the white paper, and that was wrong. He criticized the increased income tax rates in the middle-income bracket; he criticized the revaluation and the five year period; he criticized other things. But he did not say how we should raise the money that we would lose if we increased exemptions at the lower level. He did not say how we would make up the $1 billion that would be lost by increasing these exemptions and adding new ones. He spoke very much as though he is in favour of everything good, and he opposes anything that is hard to take in the system. He appeared as a very lean Santa Claus in the House of Commons at this time as we approach Christmas. In his speech he almost appeared to favour motherhood.

If I could be convinced by the opposition that anything in the white paper was bad for the economy, I would certainly agree with them. However, I do not want just broad criticisms in general terms about these measures. All we have heard is wide criticism of measures. Let us know the exact dollars and cents picture behind those criticisms. If hon. members approve of the exemptions at the lower level, let them tell us how we are going to make up the money that will be lost. Such a loss has to be made up. Let them tell us in dollars and cents where that money is to be found. Let us not have this type of speech in which hon. members say they approve of the exemptions but disapprove of the increased rates in the middle brackets and disapprove of the capital gains tax. Let us hear alternatives in specific terms. If hon. members convince me, I will vote with them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: I put the challenge to you. If you cannot meet that challenge, that is a failure on your part. I am interested in seeing good tax law, as I am sure the minister was when he put forward these proposals. He has put the challenge to hon. members and I hope we can have a reasonable discussion with suggested alternatives. It was my impression that this two day debate on the motion referring the white paper to the committee would provide an opportunity for members of this House to find out whether, and where, there was agreement in respect of the white paper among members of this House, as well as where there was disagreement and what the alternatives might be. In referring the white paper to the committee I felt we might have a non-partisan approach with alternatives and constructive criticism.

This afternoon the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) criticized the white paper. He is a government member. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) criticized the white paper. These hon. members did put forward what I thought were constructive alternatives. Some hon. members of the opposition have done so but many others have not, including the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the lead critic for the New Democratic Party.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) suggested we would lose approximately $1 billion by raising the income tax exemptions at the lower level. The hon. member for York South said "nonsense", but he did not say how he calculated these increased exemptions, nor did he mention what type of losses would result. He said "nonsense", "bunk" and then turned to another subject. If hon. members do not think that $1 billion is the correct figure, let us have their figures and let us hear their alternative proposals for obtaining this extra money. If they do that, I will consider their proposals seriously.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: We will be very informative.

Mr. Allmand: I hope so. I hope we have not lost all opportunity in this debate. There will no doubt be other spokesmen and I am sure they will put forward some constructive proposals as alternatives to the measures in the white paper.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) this afternoon suggested it is not necessary to increase the rates in the middle-income bracket in order to make up losses at the lower level. He said we should cut our spending; that we should be more careful with our spending program. I was surprised to hear him say that because this summer in the month of August the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) put forward one of the most pervasive and widespread systems for reducing the operations of all government departments.

An hon. Member: Look at the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Allmand: That was an exception. When that system was put forward this summer, the Prime Minister said that the program to deal with bilingualism would be an exception. Not only that, but let me quote what the Leader of the Opposition said when these cuts were put forward by the Prime Minister. He said that it is a pretty rough kind of axe, meaning that because of this program some civil service positions would have to be eliminated. That is true; but we cannot have it both ways. You cannot restrict government spending and expect everybody to applaud. It is a tough decision to make.

Whenever we discuss the matter of restricting government expenditures, members of the opposition always want the cuts made in an area which will not affect their constituents. If you live in Montreal and are a constituent of mine, and a cut is to be made which will affect something in the city of Montreal such as the airport or harbour, you would probably say "Oh, no" and suggest that the cut should be made perhaps in respect of the Prince Edward Island causeway. I do not agree with my constituents when they say that.

Mr. Speaker, I have sat here for two days listening to hon. members opposite. I was very quiet when they spoke. I must be touching their sensitive spots now because they are becoming excited and do not appear to want to listen to me. If hon. members are really serious in suggesting to the government where cuts in spending can be made, they should be specific. They should be honest about it. If they have in mind a certain area, they should mention that area. I suggest that recommendations in respect of cuts in expenditure should not be made in a general way.

On the point of increasing the exemptions at the lower end of the income tax scale, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said that with the increased exemptions we would lose $1 billion in revenue.

Mr. Woolliams: $1 billion.

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: Get your figures right.

Mr. Allmand: That is what I said, $1 billion. I have not heard what figure you have calculated. The Minister of Finance also pointed out that when you increase the exemptions in this manner, you do not have too much room for manœuvring. He said there are not too many areas where you can raise that amount of money without raising the income tax of the middle income groups. At the beginning of the white paper the minister points out that 39 per cent of the taxpayers are in the group having incomes between $5,000 and $10,000, and that this 39 per cent pay 44 per cent of all the income taxes. He goes on to point out that fewer than 500,000 taxpayers or 7.5 per cent of all taxpayers who have incomes over $10,000, pay 35 per cent of the total income tax. So if the intention is to raise the exemption at the lower end of the income scale, and if that $1 billion is to be made up, it will necessarily have to be done in the middle-income area.

Mr. Broadbent: What about those at the top?

Mr. Allmand: The top too, but you cannot get it all from the top. I will put a challenge to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), who I assume will be speaking in this debate. If he can show me how $1 billion can be raised in the top area without affecting the people in the middle-income area, I will go along with him; I will accept his argument.

Mr. Woolliams: You did, and then came back and voted against it.

Mr. Allmand: At page 9 in the white paper the minister points out that if additional tax of $1,000 was paid by every taxpayer with an income over $25,000, the additional revenue in 1967 would have totalled $48 million, enough to reduce taxes by only $13 for each taxpayer with income under $5,000.

Mr. Woolliams: Tell us more.

Mr. Allmand: This afternoon a spokesman for the New Democratic Party stated that they did not want any limit on the upper level. I do not know what they were suggesting. I would presume one would have to balance out the possibilities for revenue from all sources and make satisfactory decisions. It could be that it would still be possible to increase the upper level and lower the middle-income level by some figure. As I say, if a rational approach were put forward in that regard, I would accept it. I would agree with hon. members that a laudable principle is—and I would support it—that we have an equitable income tax system with graduated and progressive rates. I think this is what we should try to work out in the committee. If it can be established that it is unfair to have the levelling off on the rates of income tax at the upper levels, compared with the middle levels, let us have suggestions in respect of rates that would be workable and just.

I am quite willing to look at this question very seriously because I fully support the statement in the white paper that at present our income tax system is not equitable and that something must be done. As the minister said, we must combine incentives and economic growth with an equitable income tax system.

Although I support the general principles contained in the white paper, there are certain things I should like to see in it which are not included. I wish to mention these briefly. For example, I think that the $500 exemption for those who are 70 years old should be granted at age 65. Let us assume there are two old age pensioners, one of whom is 68 and the other 70; they each receive the old age pension, and nothing more. One would get an extra exemption because he is 70, while the other who is under 70 would not get it. I think this is an inequity, and yet it is suggested in the white paper. I believe that if there is to be an exemption for people on retirement, it should be given to all those on retirement at the age at which they receive the old age pension from the government.

Another point in the white paper with which I am not too pleased is the limit of $150 on the personal exemption in respect of people on salary. I cannot understand why a person who is working for a salary should be restricted to $150, while his colleague who may be working on his own in the same trade or profession should have no limit. I know that when I was working as a lawyer, I worked for a salary—I never worked in my own business—and if I wanted to buy law books or buy my legal gown or the other things that are necessary for the carrying on of my profession, I received no exemption whatsoever. I had to operate under conditions which were not the same as those which applied to persons practising on their own.

Another matter in the white paper which I do not understand very clearly is the rule with respect to personal residence. I think that if we accept the premise that the personal residence should be exempt from capital gains tax, it should be exempt altogether. I cannot see the rationale behind the rule which introduces the $1,000 per year principle. I favour a system according to which the personal residence is completely exempt from capital gains tax.

Another item about which I have been concerned for several years is with respect to medical expenses. I know many people who have to buy medical supplies, such as syringes and needles for diabetics, which expense they cannot deduct under the provisions of the Income Tax Act although other people can deduct the cost of their medicines. I could never understand why a diabetic who had to buy these needles and syringes each week could not deduct their cost, just as those who had other ailments could deduct the cost of their medicines. However, there is nothing in the white paper which refers to that problem, and I would like the committee to deal with it when it meets.

There is also the question raised by paraplegics. There is a $500 exemption for people confined to a wheelchair. Originally this exemption was to help those people because they had to take taxis or pay for other means of transportation to get to work or to carry on their everyday affairs. However, the $500 exemption is out of date now. It does not in any way cover the expenses that a paraplegic or a person restricted to a wheelchair must bear. Paraplegics in my constituency have given me the exact figure, and it far exceeds $500 per year.

These are a few of the things in the white paper with which I am not too happy, and I would like the committee to deal with them if possible. There are a few other matters which have not been referred to by many people but which I think are good points which did not receive much publicity. One of them is the right to deduct gifts to national amateur athletic associations. That is a step in the right direction. It is in accord with the recommendations of the task force on amateur sport. I think it will do much to stimulate the groups that are trying to promote amateur sport in this country. I think amateur sport here needs a great deal of support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to express my opinion on the white paper that was tabled.

That document, I feel, might create a very poor impression on any clever person. To describe that document, I shall use the words of Mr. Charles Neapole, president of the Montreal Stock Exchange and of the Canadian Stock Exchange, who terms that measure "nonsense". I shall base my statement on four main points.

To increase taxes by $500 million, as stated, is, I believe, a patent theft, that penalizes small enterprises, but in no way helps the consolidation of the provinces, who considers this bill with some suspicion.

I should like to deal with a point which seems to me to reflect perfectly the policy of the present government, which is proposing to tax scholarships, among other things. If I give $2 to someone and the next day I take back 50 cents, he will think surely that there is something wrong with me. Why not simply give him $1.50 instead of giving him $2 and extract from him 50¢ the next day. Would it be that when I gave him $2, I wanted to make a good impression or that I am not smart at figures? If I give money to a taxpayer and take back some of it the next day, it is because I am a flatterer or because I do not know how to count.

This is the position of the present government: Either the minister is not smart at figures—and this does not say very much for him—or he wants the scholarships recipients to think highly of him, even though he intends to take these grants away by way of taxes later on, and this is nothing else but false pretences.

I humbly suggest that this is a most realistic image of the government system as it is administered by our ministers, or as it is described in the white paper. It is nothing more or less than giving money to the taxpayer with one hand, either by means of scholarships, loans, allowances or anything else, and taking it back with the other, but with a smile and a flower in a button-hole.

Mr. Speaker, I want to deal now with the tax increase of $500 million. Whether this amount comes from the rich or the poor, everyone must realize, I think, that the government will take $25 more from every Canadian taxpayer. And they say that will help the Canadian people. How can the government make us understand that?

I contend that it is a patent theft as far as Canadians are concerned, and I do not believe I am the only one who thinks so, because Mr. W. H. Rapsey, former president of the Canadian manufacturers' association of electrical appliances said, and I quote:

It is patent theft.

Taxation by the government of Canada, at the stage where things are at present, is especially very contradictory and I explain myself. There are, indeed, unsold products, people condemned to unemployment, unused productive power on account of products failing to be sold and because of the lack of purchasing power, reduced for a great part by taxation. I think that all that is simply ridiculous.

Thus taxes are equal to theft nowadays because they should exist but only to take surplus money out of circulation while there are too few products. When money is needed, taxes should not be levied but purchasing power should be distributed through the grant of a national dividend and a compensatory discount, which would bring prices down to the real cost of production.

The financing of governments, of public investments must be made through new credits according to the actual needs and the production capacity of Canada, not through a tax increase at the expense of producers. Which brings me to tell the house that small businesses will therefore be the most hardly hit by the proposed reforms.

We are back where we started. Indeed, a year ago, the Post Office Department curiously strangled a good deal of small publishing businesses, under the pretext of serving the interests of the Department which, I insist, must serve the Canadian people; the opposite should not be true.

Now, I would like to quote an article of Mr. Fraser Robertson published in the Globe and Mail of November 12, in which he noted how contemptuous of small businesses the government seems to be, according to the contents of the white paper. Here is what he said:

In his proposals he chose to term a tax reform, the Minister of Finance obviously endorses the views of the Economic Council of Canada, namely that what Canada needs is the development of a few powerful monopolies which could easily fall under the responsibility of other cabinet members. He scorns small businesses, especially family ventures, thus reflecting the arrogance of our times.

Recalling that big companies such as General Motors, IBM and Massey Ferguson had modest beginnings, that they were small concerns before becoming powerful monopolies, Mr. Robertson said that even now, big businesses must rely on the small ones to obtain the raw materials they need.

He recalls that General Electric, for example, has more than 10,000 small suppliers.

By stifling small concerns, we must not forget that the government will be hurting the monopolies and will not encourage the Canadian economy. Those proposals are therefore contrary to those which should be set forth in the white paper.

Mr. Speaker, should a capital gains tax be levied, private industrial investments are going to be curtailed and the people's consuming power is going to be greatly reduced.

As a matter of fact, if capital gains are taxed, foreign and even Canadian businessmen will not be interested any longer in investing in our country. As a result, the productive sector which is kept rolling by investments—you will agree with me on that point—will be greatly paralyzed, hence unemployment, our natural resources left unused and high prices for our products. In a word, it will be a big setback in every field of our country's economy, even though our country is regarded as highly industrialized.

I believe that the fiscal reform proposals, if adopted as they are, will demonstrate an approach both ultra-conservative and ultra-reactionary since studies carried out by top economists have established that the government should use the budget to carry out a fiscal policy over an economic cycle in order to maintain current production at a level as close as possible to that of potential full-employment and maximum production and to balance the budget from year to year, a policy followed by the governments before the 1929-1930 economic slump.

It seems to me that the government does not follow a functional, modern financial policy, which would centre on the means to have an economy of full employment while avoiding unwarranted price increases.

For this reason I think that the government, in submitting its white paper, is acting contrary to all modern principles of government. I suggest that the Minister of Finance should consult other competent economists so that he can present tax measures designed to ensure the progress of our economy and not its regression.

In an article published last Saturday in La Presse, Mr. Paul Allard, Minister of Natural Resources in Quebec, wonders seriously about the federal proposal to tax capital gains and to modify the tax rates, and I quote:

Speaking at the Universal Motel in Quebec, Mr. Allard stated that a certain danger might result from such policies, that "investors might prefer putting aside some no doubt productive but somewhat risky investments and concentrate on those offering higher dividends."

"Such a reaction" Mr. Allard added, "may have disastrous effects on the opening of new industries especially with regard to natural resources. It would be too bad if, through some action designed to give a more equitable tax system, the government should cause a slowing-down of the economy and as a consequence an increase in unemployment and in the cost of living."

I believe that federal-provincial relations are truly in need of a catalytic agent in order to develop in a peaceful climate.

The white paper on taxation, far from promoting understanding, is rather another vexatious measure imposed on the provinces by the federal government.

In British Columbia, Mr. Dan Campbell, Minister of Municipal Affairs, indicated that this document does not mention at all the provincial or municipal authorities whose views must, of course, be taken into consideration in any fiscal reform.

Premier Harry Strom of Alberta, in conjunction with other politicians in that province, regrets that nothing is done to alleviate the tax burden of the provinces and the municipalities in his own province.

Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland fears that the capital gains tax will jeopardize capital investments in Canadian industry.

In closing, I wish to tell the House that a tax reform is a good thing in itself provided it is not negative and does not interfere with the economy, since it is a pyramid in which the biggest businesses depend on the smallest ones, while the smallest ones depend on the individual.

Now, if the government strangles the small businesses, the big consortiums will be in a bad predicament and this tax reform will be detrimental to the workers, because if the owners of small businesses are forced to sell to pay their taxes, this will lead to unemployment and many other problems.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I think that the document we are discussing is misnamed a white paper. In reality it is a murky grey. It is as difficult to see its real purpose and to judge its actual impact as it is to see the outlines of anything in a heavy fog. The economic objectives of a democratic society in which the greater part of economic activity is managed by free enterprise are generally considered to be as follows: full employment, reasonable price stability and a satisfactory balance of payments, all combined with an adequate rate of economic growth. The white paper proposals must be judged by their efficacy in fostering these goals. The position of the people who drafted the white paper on taxation is that Canadian national identity is so fragile that if outside economic influences are not restricted by using government action, the absorption of Canada will inevitably take place. By implication, anything Canadian per se is valuable, and outsiders less valuable. The white paper proposes many measures to foster this point of view.

To begin with, it is questionable whether these proposals will produce the benefits to the Canadian people that are claimed for them. They are more likely to have the effect of countervailing action or, at best, benefiting particular groups of Canadians at the national expense. The arguments that have been trotted out are the customary old fallacies: inability to compete with foreigners in free competition demonstrates their superior potential efficiency lurking beneath the surface, so that a subsidy of one kind or another is justified.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in explaining the aims of his tax reform proposals, said they were to attain a more equitable application of the tax burden, to maintain prosperity and steady economic growth. An examination of the white paper indicates to me that not only will its provisions not attain these objectives, but they are more likely to achieve results diametrically opposed. The minister proposes to take away any trace of a tax burden from a large segment of low-income Canadians, lighten it considerably in respect of Canadians who enjoy very high incomes, and sock it to the middle-income group. This is a deceptively simple explanation, and when coupled with the claim of greater equality it is somewhat dishonest.

The group he plans to sock it to are the very people who are currently carrying the greatest share of Canada's total tax burden. They are, largely, the creators and the doers, the producers of national wealth and development. They are also the same group that pays for education through municipal property taxes, and for soaring costs of higher education and welfare and health programs through provincial taxes of one type or another. There is a real danger here of the minister killing the geese that lay the golden eggs.

Lower income groups would be helped by raising the annual exemptions, for single taxpayers from $1,000 to $1,400 and for married taxpayers from $2,000 to $2,800. If both parents are working, an exemption of $500 per child is provided for costs connected with the outside supervision of children. Of the estimated 7,700,000 taxpayers, theoretically 750,000 would be removed from the tax rolls. This contrasts with the widely accepted theory that everyone should file a tax return and pay some tax even if it is a nominal one only, so that he realizes he is part of the community and not just a guest here. Taxes for about 3,000,000 would supposedly be reduced slightly, but the burden of taxes would be shifted to those who earn more than $9,100 per year, hypothetically 3,000,000 other taxpayers. On the other hand, the maximum tax rate would be lowered from 80 per cent to 50 per cent, but this would not affect very many because few taxpayers actually pay more than 50 per cent over-all, even under the existing schedules.

Income redistribution to favour lower income categories would be of some assistance to handicapped people who cannot function effectively. Tax relief to lower paid Canadians in some measure helps those who are starting their working careers and whose small incomes do not reflect their actual conditions. It would have been more fruitful to recognize the social needs of the disadvantaged in other ways. For example, the government could permit voluntary workers and teachers to include the cost of the time they spend in assisting the handicapped. Advisory work, employment counselling and voluntary teaching could have been given a boost if the time spent by volunteers were allowed to count as a tax reduction for these workers, at reasonable rates. Also, professional advisory training and job counselling firms specifically geared to help the handicapped should have been given tax considerations as an effective way of encouraging the private sector to participate in the effort needed to alleviate distress.

The estimates of the number of taxpayers who would be aided and/or hurt by the income redistribution proposals were based on 1967 figures. Inasmuch as wage gains have been averaging about 8 per cent per year compounded, by 1972 the number of taxpayers in the middle-income bracket would be nearer 4,500,000, not 3,000,000 which is assumed by the white paper. Middle-income taxpayers would bear the brunt of the tax increases proposed by the government. Similarly, the number who would gain from the revisions would be less than the white paper estimates and fewer than 750,000 would be dropped from the tax rolls.

The white paper is more of a social and political document than an economic one. No doubt there is a rich harvest of votes to be had by anyone who can remove 750,000 people from taxation. No doubt the proposals suggested will help to get this government off the hook of the overambitious and vastly expensive social welfare programs it plans to launch or has already launched. But the real problems of Canada have been deliberately avoided and sacrificed to political popularity and expediency.

The Economic Council of Canada emphasized what was already very clear, that each year this country must create thousands and thousands of new jobs simply to keep our economy turning over at the same pace, let alone speeding it up. Yet the reforms suggested in the white paper will sorely cripple, if not kill, the business expansion, the new economic initiative and the spirit of development vitally necessary to create these needed jobs. "The word 'reform' is an euphemism for increasing taxes", a leading Manitoba tax expert, I. H. Asper, said in a recent speech about the white paper. Even increased taxes might be supportable if it were certain that the new taxes would go for positive, productive development programs and not simply to carry Canada's multitude of ill-conceived, badly constructed and foolishly expensive social welfare schemes.

This, of course, brings us to another major weakness of the tax reforms suggested, the failure to consult about them with the provinces, the failure to take the growing crisis in federal-provincial tax and financial relations into account and above all, the disastrous effect the tax reforms will have upon our already grievous regional disparity.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that one of our most grave economic complaints, one that intimately affects the federal and provincial governments' need for more tax revenue and their inability to undertake many much needed development programs, is the unbusinesslike manner in which our major social welfare programs operate. Take any of them, medicare, hospitalization, and so on; they all appear to operate without even the most primitive form of cost control. The result is that all levels of government in Canada today are caught in a vortex of rapidly accelerating costs which they do not seem to know how to check or control. It is little wonder that people like the Minister of Finance will attempt any subterfuge, underwrite any wild scheme, to procure the great quantity of tax revenue needed every year by these open-ended programs that apparently cannot be changed and certainly cannot be abolished.

As to regional disparity, many provinces, including my own province of Manitoba, suffer from several severe economic handicaps. They are discriminated against in such matters as tariffs, freight rates, immigration policy, regional development and half a hundred other areas. What they all desperately need—in fact, it is a common No. 1 priority—is industrial growth; and it is industrial growth that suffers most from the tax reforms suggested in the white paper. They actually penalize small business, individual initiative and enterprise. These factors are the whole foundation of industrial development and expansion.

New tax rates on business also would affect middle-income groups in other ways. The existing 21 per cent tax rate on small business is raised to 50 per cent, whether it is paid out in dividends or in gains in selling shares in these "closely held" businesses. This hurts family-controlled concerns and other small establishments. It is detrimental to growing enterprises. The natural urge to plough back earnings for growth expansion is squelched, and growth is thus diminished. Therefore, it would encourage small business to sell its shares to the public as widely-held Canadian shares listed on exchanges and becoming subject to the lower 25 per cent capital gains tax.

Dividends received from Canadian corporations would entail a credit equal to the tax paid by the corporation. Thus, if a Canadian corporation paying 50 per cent tax to the federal government declared a dividend of $1 per share, the recipient would "gross up" his dividend to $1 plus the 50 per cent rate of taxation, or $1.50 per share, and the shareholder would receive a credit of 50 cents per share in respect of his own tax. This is the main and only true sweetener for investors and would replace the present 20 per cent dividend tax credit. This would be a discrimination against those holding bonds and mortgages, because until the taxpayer reached an income of approximately $17,000 it would be greatly to their advantage to have shares in widely-held Canadian corporations and not hold mortgage or bond issues.

Pension funds would be obligated to have at least 90 per cent of their assets in Canadian investments or they would be subject to tax. This would replace the present requirement that only 10 per cent of the income of pension funds could be derived from non-Canadian sources. There is an assumption here that the primary obligation of pension funds is not to ensure maximum safety for the pension fund recipients at the least cost to the contributors; rather, it is suggested that pension funds should invest in things Canadian regardless of their relative merit.

Income from non-Canadian sources would be penalized so that Massey Ferguson, Moore Corporation or a distillery company would not be entitled to pass on a dividend credit to their Canadian share-holders on taxes paid outside Canada. International companies such as these would be discouraged, therefore, from locating their headquarters in Canada.

Similarly, subsidiaries abroad would be discouraged. Interest charges incurred as part of the debt structure of these subsidiaries would not be allowed, and the low rate of taxes of such subsidiaries would be discontinued. In many cases firms establish subsidiaries abroad in underdeveloped areas where they receive a several-year tax exemption from the host country; but now these tax-free earnings will be taxed by Canada. Consulting firms, among others, would no longer be likely to set up a foreign subsidiary in these havens. This would tend to discourage Canadian exports, because consulting firms and other subsidiaries usually promote the use of products and equipment with which they are familiar.

Any analysis of the white paper must take note of the careless anomalies which are present. For example, Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, E.I. duPont, Ford, Union Carbide and others would be obligated to pay every five years a tax of 25 per cent of the "paper" gains in the value of their Canadian subsidiaries based on market price changes of their stock. The five-year assessment of unrealized gains could not work for individual shareholders of many Canadian stocks classified as widely-held, because of the limited marketability of many issues. There are innumerable other examples which illustrate the impractical nature of the proposed legislation. There is no point in dwelling on this aspect of the white paper except to state that the improper drafting will inevitably mean that many of the proposals will have to be redrawn, even in the unlikely event that the basic concepts were accepted by the nation.

The onerous nature of many of these proposals, some apparently serving no purpose other than sheer maliciousness, such as the arbitrary periodic taxation of gains whether realized or not, will encourage tax evasion on an unprecedented scale in Canada. Enforcement, after all, depends ultimately on the consent of the taxed. The valuation of personal property, improvements of houses or farms and taxing gains in foreign securities would be so difficult to police that tax avoidance would become commonplace.

Without industrial and commercial growth there can be no new profits to tax, no new salaries to tax and no accumulated capital either to employ or to tax. If this growth slows because of discriminatory taxation or for any other reason, if it begins to dwindle, then so will tax revenues and the standard of life. If we ever allow this to happen we are simply creating for ourselves more non-productive social deadweight that will require a great expenditures of tax money to carry. This is why, in my estimation, the tax proposals as they now stand are so short-sighted and so damaging.

Capital, business ability and imagination always seek a congenial atmosphere. They take freight easily and move away swiftly. There is nothing in this proposal for tax reform that is congenial to capital or business, and in many respects it is freightening. At the very time we Canadians should be bending all our efforts to encouraging capital and business enterprise and know-how at home, we are by this white paper threatening them. If you doubt, as the minister professes to doubt, that individuals or small businesses will pull up stakes, let me give one or two examples. Take the case of a man in Winnipeg earning about $13,000 annually, smack in the middle of the group the minister has threatened to soak. In some instances under the new tax proposals he would pay $3,100 in tax, while a man with the same salary across the United States border in Minneapolis would pay only about $1,100. There is the example of a Winnipeg company manufacturing a certain product which it sells 90 per cent of in the United States. If he moved his business to Minneapolis, the proprietor of that small business would increase his after-tax profit by 50 per cent strictly on the basis of differences in the tax systems.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

All one needs to do is look at the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figures regarding the natural population increase in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Manitoba's population increased naturally by 70,000 during the years quoted in the figures, and Saskatchewan's population increased naturally by 75,000. But with a net migration for Manitoba of 28,000 and for Saskatchewan 45,000, Manitoba was left with an actual increase in population of only 41,000, and Saskatchewan 30,000. Canada must stop the haemorrhage that is bleeding us of brains, capital and know-how. These proposed reforms will only quicken the bleeding.

I mentioned the murky look of this white paper and the difficulty of seeing clearly what it intended. There are many who see much greater dangers in it than any I have mentioned. A highly respected Montreal financial and investment firm, Jones Heward and Company, were quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press as saying in part:

> The white paper is no simple Robin Hood approach to society, no simple accountant's concept of a redistribution of income, but a pure and simple attack on the free enterprise system embodying a punitive and discriminatory capital gains tax, a capital levy every five years, and an increased tax burden on the middle income productive group of Canada. There is no room for the small business with enterprise and imagination.

The same firm stated that "wealth is to be destroyed". Surely, Mr. Speaker, when such things can be said by responsible and knowledgeable Canadian firms, it behooves us all to take the closest look at the subject of the charge. After all, the cardinal tenet of Marxism is the destruction of private wealth. Other reputable authorities have made similar grave charges and have seen in this white paper, not a makeshift economic program but an extremely radical blueprint for social and political change.

The assumptions of the white paper are that the government needs more revenue because more than $1 billion would be collected if the scheme were fully operating, given present levels of the economy. There is no mention of the fact that taxes can or should be used for economic stabilization or growth. Little consideration is paid to the implication of these tax levels on the economy, incentives for work or capital accumulation. The radical nature of these proposals is somewhat surprising in view of the fact that Canada's economic system is working reasonably well. There is an assumption that the people who build and run this country are stupid, because thrift and productivity are to be discouraged.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how often a participant in a debate in this House begins by outlining those things which he proposes to avoid. Perhaps unlike the speakers who contributed to this debate last Friday and today, I do not intend to deal specifically with the widsom or otherwise of releasing some of the tax burden from the low-income people, although in my constituency there is a very heavy preponderance of people who carry a lunch-pail and punch the clock. It was welcome news that the government intended to alleviate the tax burden on that taxpayer.

I will not comment on the wisdom or otherwise of increasing the tax rates for those people whose incomes fall in the $10,000 to $30,000 bracket, nor will I talk about the crack-down on expense account living. I will not comment on the capital gains tax, although it certainly has a very direct effect on my constituency. Nor will I talk about the wisdom or otherwise of changing the situation with respect to the mining industry and the tax holidays they have enjoyed in the past.

The reason that I am not going to deal specifically with subjects of that sort, Mr. Speaker, is that I think they are matters of individual taxation approach and are not so much a question of the broad philosophical concern that we should be dealing with at this time. In any case, even if it were a proper consideration to be debated in this chamber, I would draw attention to the fact that when the white paper on taxation policy is about to be transferred from this chamber to the standing committee, is not the time to be dealing with these specific items, the specific concerns of pages 1, 2, 3, 20 or 30 of the white paper.

This is, in my opinion, the time for us to concern ourselves with a more philosophical approach. I suppose hon. members who have had more experience in this chamber than I will be somewhat surprised to find someone standing up and talking about the philosophy of government or the basic principles of government in a democratic society, of government for the people, of the people, by the people, or whatever combination of those words one wants to use at any given time.

Some of these phrases may sound a little tired, or as if they came from an essay by a political science student. Nevertheless, I think it is an appropriate time for us to consider the basic philosophic principles underlying our system of government. I say this because today, perhaps more than at any time in the history of our country, we are aware of the influences which are attempting to divide us as Canadian citizens, to set provincial governments against the federal government, province against province, east against west, citizens of one linguistic group against those of another. These forces are stronger now than at any time in our history.

When we talk about separatism, or the tendency to try to divide us and break up our institutions, we are not taken as lightly as we were a few years ago. Of course, it is not radical to talk about the fact that there are forces at work in this nation today which would divide us and break up confederation. But the ideological forces which compare our system of government with the systems in vogue in other countries are no longer distant, no longer theoretical. They are present in our country today, taking their place and making their influence felt. It is no accident that people are talking about separatist influences and subversive influences in everyday speech in this country.

When people in various parts of our nation are talking in these terms and, particularly, when the young people in our schools and universities are telling us that our political system is out of step and irrelevant, it is surely time for us to become concerned. When they come to us, as they came to the recent convention of our party, not to tell us, not that they support some other political party, or that our party is not as good as one of the other opposition parties, but to tell us that all our parties are irrelevant to the needs of the Canadian people today, we had better wake up and consider whether our system of government can stand up to this kind of scrutiny.

I think this is an appropriate time at which to consider whether the approach we are taking to the subject of taxation in this white paper is, from all points of view, the correct one, the democratic one, so that regardless of our individual political differences, regardless of the narrower approach which individual hon. members may take, we can all of us in the long run say we are proud of the system we employ to govern ourselves and that we believe it will stand up to the scrutiny and attacks of those in our country who deride and denigrate it, try to separate us and break down confederation rather than support it.

When we examine our system of taxation as a whole we realise we are not dealing with a piece of legislation which affects one part of the country; we are not dealing with a piece of legislation which has to do with a particular region or a particular pressure group; we are not dealing with legislation which concerns one particular facet of Canadian life; we are dealing with something which touches every citizen of every age, in every walk of life. Thus it is appropriate to ask ourselves whether our handling of this important and comprehensive subject is consistent with our understanding of good democracy and representative government. It involves the power of the government to collect money, and this in turn influences directly its ability to continue its programs or embark on new ones, to spend money, much of which will be redistributed among our citizens. It affects every citizen, every possibility, every potential, every hope which Canadians have for the future. More important still, it represents our approach in 1969 to the correct government policy involved in the redistribution of the wealth of this nation. If this is not sufficiently important from the point of view of every taxpayer, I cannot imagine what is.

If there is one area in which the federal government must take a lead at this time, if there is one clear, consistent and strong reason for supporting the federalist type of governmental system in this country, it is the necessity for a central government able to assume primary responsibility for redistributing money to the citizens among the economic groups of all the regions. The federal government must see to it that the power to collect taxes and the consequent power to spend money is used in such a way as to promote economic equality. So we are testing the very fabric of the government, which involves the right to tax and the method of doing so.

We are testing its programs and its ability to take money and spend it among the less privileged of our nation; we are examining the role of the government in redistributing the wealth of our nation. The final test of any governmental system is: to what extent does it see to it, through our system of taxation and spending, that all citizens have a reasonable opportunity to enjoy a decent standard of living? In doing this, we are examining what I believe to be the very basis of our system of government. In this respect we should take pride in the fact that we have advanced to a stage at which we can abandon the archaic system under which changes in taxation policy could only be implemented under conditions of the greatest secrecy and could only be enforced by means of a budget which was kept secret even from members of this House until it was announced. Measures thus introduced take effect with stunning force and the citizens directly concerned wake up to find themselves suddenly confronted by news of the way in which the government proposes to collect money from certain sources for redistribution to others.

This atmosphere of secrecy was, in my opinion, a weakness in our system of government. The fact we have now progressed to a stage at which we are able to adopt a white paper approach, and table in this House complete background information outlining in detail the policy of the government on taxation matters, is something which I profoundly welcome. This gives the nation an opportunity to react, an opportunity to understand the background and to express its views, an opportunity for citizens to discuss the measures proposed and apply them to their own way of life, to their own spheres of activity, to their own line of work or class of business. This in turn enables them to take part in our democratic and representative way of government by voicing their reactions.

In addition, I take pride in the fact that we will also be using extensively the facilities of the standing committees' system. When this debate is concluded the matter will be transferred to a standing committee. In line with the rules changes recently made in this chamber and the increased responsibilities given to our standing committees, a full discussion and detailed examination of this document will there take place. All members of the chamber will have an opportunity to question those responsible for this white paper, to examine the government officials involved and, more importantly, to bring to the floor of the standing committee the views of their constituents as to the wisdom or otherwise of every page and paragraph, every proposal and provision contained in this white paper on taxation policy.

This is an important debate because we are discussing for the first time the white paper approach to a comprehensive taxation policy for Canada. When the matter is put on the floor of the standing committee for extensive and detailed study, we will be able to test our system of government further, and in two ways, the first being the capacity of every citizen in his country to voice his reaction to this important policy.

Since the introduction of this document I have spent a number of hours on week ends in my own constituency talking with various people about the white paper. Certainly it adds nothing new to this debate to put on record that the people at the lower end of the income scale are, generally speaking, happy at the fact that their tax burden will be lessened if these proposals are implemented. Neither is it surprising, I am sure, to inform the House that the people who are expressing greatest concern at the present time are those businessmen and others whose incomes fall within the $10,000 to $30,000 or $35,000 bracket.

Over the past weekend I discussed at great length these proposals with what I consider to be a good cross-section of my community. For example, I talked with the operator of a dry cleaning business, with the operator of a refrigeration business, with an architect, an accountant and the regional sales manager of a very large manufacturing concern. Each of these persons expressed different concerns and problems that he felt he would meet if these proposals were introduced.

With regard to the crackdown on expense account living, the feeling was that although others were able to advertise and charge the cost as an operating expense, under the new proposals they would be unable to take advantage of tax exemptions on money spent entertaining clients personally. However, such details are not the important matter; what concerns me is the opportunity that each of these persons, in his own individual capacity, will have to make a forceful representation to this House in regard to the problems he will face if these proposals are introduced.

All members of this House—not simply government members, or opposition members in their narrow political capacities, but all members—are faced with a challenge, and it is this: Are they going to use the views of their constituents to their own political advantage, or are they prepared to make a full contribution to the representative and democratic process that is involved in examining that most important facet of government, the power by taxation to raise and to spend money?

I suggest we face not one but two challenges. First of all, by being responsible members of this House we have to assist each individual citizen to react to this white paper. In addition to that, through our work on standing committees and in our contributions to this debate, both before and after the subject is studied in the standing committee, we must see to it that this chamber possesses the capacity to evaluate public reaction and apply it to government policy.

If we are successful, then in the final analysis, when these proposals are implemented in a year or 14 months from now, we will be secure in the knowledge that the white paper has had the best possible exposure to the democratic and representative process of government. Whatever be the final policy of the government, we will be able to say with pride that it has resulted from good democratic, representative government in Canada today.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I cannot help but comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) who has just taken his seat. He spoke at length on the democratic processes of government. He dealt with the idea of taxation policy being put forward in the form of a white paper, which is a sophisticated way of flying a kite. He then expounded at length on the fact—I think he repeated this three times—that this white paper will be referred to the standing committee and that the standing committee will examine it. Then he went on to accuse opposition members of being partisan. I say there is not one man on the government side who can stand in his place and declare that the government has not been manipulating the committees of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: Certainly the government manipulated them last year and also the year before. For example, look at what happened to the transportation committee. As soon as we had the government members licked in the committee, they were withdrawn and members more in line with government thinking took their place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't start raising nonsensical points of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) just stated that I accused members opposite of being narrow and partisan. I did no such thing. I said that the question we will have to ask ourselves is whether the members opposite will become partisan. I made no accusation at any time with respect to the hon. member.

Mr. Horner: I hope the hon. member is not withdrawing his remarks through the use of such a fictitious point of privilege. My point was that the committees system adopted by this government is a farce. The committees are used as tools of the government. There is no way in which this white paper will receive fair and non-partisan scrutiny by the standing committee, because as soon as two or three government members begin to criticize the white paper they will suddenly find their names withdrawn from the membership of the committee. They will be sent to New York, to Siberia or somewhere; in any event, their names will be conveniently withdrawn. This is what happened with the transportation committee last year and again this year, and I imagine we will see it happen with other committees too. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his henchmen understand the democratic system, committees are nothing but tools to be used by the government.

Let me now address myself to the white paper. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has used this white paper as a sophisticated method of flying a kite and is trying to sell it to the Canadian public. However, once they take a close look at it they will soon realize what is really happening to them and to their country. The finance minister of this country—this applies to any country, for that matter—must remain credible. We all remember what happened, when a former finance minister, Mr. Gordon, brought in a budget a number of years ago. He destroyed himself and his credibility. In fact, he nearly brought down the Liberal Party.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: That was one of his better contributions.

Mr. Horner: He could not implement what he brought in and he never fully understood the implications of what he brought in. If the present Liberal government is not careful and continues to support the Minister of Finance, and if that minister does not withdraw many of the proposals listed in the white paper, the government may well be brought down again.

Let me read from an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of November 21, written by John Meyer. He had this to say about the white paper under the heading "Collecting those taxes won't be easy or cheap".

> The Benson proposals, for all their apparent simplicity raise more questions than they answer on application. This is becoming so evident that there is now a strengthening belief that many of them must be either substantially modified or else withdrawn. Once this is set in motion before the parliamentary committee it is quite possible that enough of the main thrust of the reforms will be blunted to make them acceptable.
> Some of the difficulties are in the area of collecting the tax. The best examples are to be found in the tax on gains and the five year valuation. The proposal to tax all gains from an investment in a foreign security, instead of half of the gains as in an investment in a Canadian security, simply encouraged the investor to set up an account in the U.S., something quite easily done.

Many members of this House have spoken about the fact that the proposals in the white paper hit hardest at the middle-income group. I am not sure they do not also hurt the people at the bottom of the ladder. Perhaps they hurt those people the worst. I have always been proud, as a Canadian, that an individual with nothing can rise to the very height of success. A Canadian does not have to be born with a silver spoon in his mouth, but can through his own efforts become successful. What would this white paper do for these people? It would allow them to earn $1,400 instead of $1,000 tax exempt. Isn't the government being big? It would give these people an

It is a sham to suggest that this document ment do to allow him to earn $400 extra? Let us look at page 24 of the white paper.

It shows the combined federal-provincial tax as it was, on less than $909, as 14.80 per cent. The combined federal-provincial tax as proposed in this table in the white paper, on anything less than $1,000, is 23.04 per cent. This represents an increase of about 9 per cent. As soon as the individual who is suffering what I refer to as poverty gets the $1,400 exemption, or an additional $400, and attempts to crawl out of the mire, he finds himself right back in a situation of poverty with an increase in tax of 8 per cent of the first $1,000. This destroys one of the cherished beliefs I have always had as a Canadian. I have in mind the fact that someone from the prairies or from an area of economic disparity could rise to great heights in this country of ours. One could do so more easily in Canada than in any other country in the world. The proposals in the white paper shatter that belief because they would build a wall around those people who are in desperate need. This white paper does not encourage them to get out of that mire step by step, small steps at a time; it knocks them right back in. They will very seldom have the opportunity to get out.

I am pleased to see the Minister of Finance come into the House and take his seat. One might suggest I am misinterpreting this table in the white paper, but the same principle applies to small corporations, which represent another step forward in our economic society. These small corporations are just barely getting started and in many cases have borrowed money for funding capital. They will now have to pay 50 per cent tax instead of 21 per cent. The minister might say there was a loophole here which had to be plugged. Surely he does not believe that the small grocery store, wholesaler, farm corporation or mining company should be taxed to the same extent as General Motors. Surely if there was ever any foundation for establishing the $35,000 criteria, it is more apparent today than it ever was.

If the minister felt that $35,000 was too high why did he not lower it to $20,000 or $25,000? If he felt that 21 per cent tax on corporations earning less than $35,000 was too low, why did he not raise it to 25 per cent or 29 per cent? Certainly, anything would be better than 50 per cent. If the minister considers the number of small corporations that will go broke after the implementations of these proposals in the white paper, I am sure he will have grave second thoughts about these proposals.

What else does the white paper do? We have always been proud of this young country, with its tremendous development. Do the proposals in this document encourage us to get out and develop our own country? Do they encourage us to get out and own this country? I suggest they do not. This white paper discourages incentive. It discourages the individual who is now at the bottom of the mire and is trying to crawl out. It takes away the incentive of small corporations, farmers and people who may have some money and are prepared to invest it. It discourages big corporations from plowing money back into Canadian companies.

Does the white paper encourage Canadians to develop capital for the development of this country? I suggest it does not. This white paper discourages the accumulation of capital and the re-investment of that capital. What does the white paper do to the mining and oil companies? It certainly does not encourage them to continue exploration. This document discourages the growth of Canadian-owned companies because of the five-year valuation period. This proposal will in fact encourage United States takeover. The NDP does not have a monopoly of concern in respect of United States ownership of Canadian resources. Most Canadians are concerned about this, and most Canadians have a different idea as to how to go about recovering ownership of these companies. The white paper encourages takeovers by United States and foreign interests.

What does this white paper do for homeowners in Canada? I suggest it makes every homeowner a bookkeeper. Every homeowner will have to keep track of every little item of expense in order that he does not lose money. If he sells at a net gain, the pipe-smoking Minister of Finance will come along and scoop up that profit. What does the minister think he is doing in respect of the capital gains tax? Does he really think this will benefit the Canadian public? The Canadian public is today concerned about business efficiency and efficiency in government. We have heard all kinds of advice about a capital gains tax and whether it really pays to collect it. Surely it is not efficient to pay three civil servants to collect an amount equal to the salary of four.

The application of a capital gains tax as proposed in this white paper will be more severe than the capital gains tax in the United States. I suggest it will not accomplish anything if one considers the high rate of inflation we have experienced since the Minister of Finance and his cohorts took over.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him what the position of his party is in respect of a capital gains tax.

Mr. Crouse: We are not in power, Mr. Minister. You are, and it is up to you to do something.

Mr. Horner: This is an interesting question. I am sure the minister knows the answer. I am not in a position to speak for the party of which I am a member.

Mr. Benson: Why?

Mr. Horner: That would require a long answer. I do not have the time to explain that. I wish to deal with the question of what effect the white paper has on farmers. I cannot be sidetracked by such remarks from the Minister of Finance. What does the capital gains tax on farm land have to do with the farmer? The minister shakes his head as if to imply nothing. It is obvious that he is not a farmer. We saw evidence of this in respect of the Estate Tax Act. He does not concern himself about the farmers. He says the effect of the white paper would be to increase the tax on only 9 per cent of the farmers. Where are the farmers who pay income tax in this country?

Eighty per cent of these farmers are from western Canada. Is there a farmer in western Canada who can stand an increase in income tax? If there is, I do not know him. If the Minister of Finance knows one, perhaps he would place his name on the record so that all the other farmers in western Canada can visit him to see how he does it.

Mr. Woolliams: Just Harry Hays, the millionaire.

Mr. Horner: Because the effect of the white paper would be to increase the tax of only 9 per cent of the farmers engaged in agriculture in this country, the minister thinks it is not bad. What percentage of the farmers pay any income tax at all? Something like 18 per cent, and many of them are in western Canada. Most of the farmers are from western Canada. Not too many of them can even now afford this, and by 1972 perhaps they will be worse off because of the rate of inflation. What effect would the white paper have on the livestock industry? It would completely destroy the effectiveness of keeping a basic herd. The minister shakes his head. He knows nothing about agriculture. Let him read his own white paper. The basic herd principle will be of no real value to the farmer if the white paper is implemented.

What will the effect of the white paper be in respect of the depreciation of farm machinery? Up until this time there has been a capital gain in respect of the sale of used farm machinery. All of a sudden this will become taxable. In the long run this might have the effect of bringing down the price of farm machinery, but it will be so far away that both the Minister of Finance and myself will be in our graves. To me this represents an increase in taxation to the farmer. What happens to the five-year averaging principle by which farmers for years have been able to average their income over a period of five years? With the ups and downs in agriculture, particularly western agriculture, this is very necessary. The five year averaging principle which has been beneficial to farmers will now be completely eroded by the effect of the white paper.

Mr. Benson: It is not changed.

Mr. Horner: The minister says it is not changed. He does not know what he has written in his white paper.

Mr. Benson: It is not. Did you read it?

Mr. Horner: It is changed; there is a different formula. The evaluation principle is taken into consideration in the averaging of the five years.

Mr. Benson: Not for farmers.

Mr. Horner: Well, for how many years will it not be for farmers?

Mr. Benson: Come on, read it.

Mr. Horner: What effect does the white paper have on farmers who wish to borrow money from the Industrial Development Bank, from farm credit organizations or from other lending institutions? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) stood up in this House and said that the avenue to success in agriculture is to become a farm corporation, a corporate entity. He said that farmers should band together. If the family farm was O.K. previously, it may not have the same success today. What will happen to the small farm corporation? Will the minister stand up in his place and say that the small farm corporation will not be hurt by the increase from 21 per cent to 50 per cent?

Mr. Benson: If they have more than $24,000 profit.

Mr. Horner: If they have a profit of more than $24,000 they will be taxed at the rate of 50 per cent, but less than $24,000—

Mr. Benson: No—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would prefer to hear the hon. member for Crowfoot. We are not in committee of the whole and I do not think we should proceed with this type of exchange.

Mr. Horner: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister continually nods and shakes his head, and it has been difficult for me to continue because of the way he has been carrying on. What effect will this have on the provinces? The basic implementation of the white paper will bring about an increase in taxes over a five year period of $560 million. The federal government's share will be eight times the share of the provincial governments. Anyone who has studied revenue needs over the past two years will agree that municipal and provincial revenue needs in the next two years will increase faster than the revenue needs of the federal government. What did the minister take into consideration here? Did he consult the provinces? Did he concern himself with the plight of the provinces in respect of money? Not very much.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I understand there are only two more speakers who wish to take part in this debate. In view of the fact that it would be desirable to complete the discussion of the matter now under consideration, I should like to move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson):

That today's sitting shall be continued beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of considering Government Order No. 32 until 12 o'clock midnight or until the said order be disposed of, whichever be the earlier, and that S.O. 40 shall be suspended for today's sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members know that under Standing Order 6(5), if more than ten members object, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn. Accordingly, I must ask those members who object to please rise in their places.

And more than ten members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As more than ten members have risen, the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the last act was rather difficult to follow. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has made the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) look like someone a little left of Karl Marx. My following the hon. member for Crowfoot will, I hope, put him back in some kind of perspective, perhaps not so far as the twentieth century but possibly so far as the late nineteenth century is concerned.

The white paper has been proclaimed by many members on the government side, including the Minister of Finance, as a great, progressive document. However, if our standard of comparison is taxation policies in advanced industrial nations, including those in western Europe, the document is in fact a conservative one. Considered in the light of progress, the document is very long on suggestion and very short on substance. One of the best signs that this document is a conservative proposal in Canada is the fact that most newspapers in the country have accepted the general principles outlined in it. When editorial writers in Canada's newspapers accept something, it is a pretty good indication that we are not in for a radical change.

The government members have made a lot of the fact that 750,000 people are going to be taken off the tax list. I for one am not at all impressed by this fact, if one looks at what will be the average tax saving. A man who saves $20, $30, $100 or even $200 in taxes, according to the proposal which, if we are lucky, will be implemented two years hence, will have that very quickly written off, given the trend of inflation in this country. So the gains are really insubstantial, I suggest.

What are the principles of good government spending and of a just taxation system? I suggest they are four: first, taxes should be based on ability to pay; second, tax proposals should be comprehensive, that is to say, all income should be included—a buck is a buck, as many have said; third, the tax system in an advanced country should have, as one of its principal objectives, the goal of achieving a redistribution of incomes; fourth, the tax system, in the judgment of this party, should be one means of offsetting the influence of a consumer goods industry by providing needed public goods and services such as hospitals, parks, athletic facilities, theatres, streets, schools and universities.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) last Friday in this debate tried to deal in a general way with each of these objectives. I would like to take the time available to me to deal with one in particular, that is, the argument that has been advanced by the New Democratic Party that even if implemented—and we have no guarantee of this—the proposals for tax reform in the white paper would still leave Canada with a taxation system which grossly favours the rich as opposed to the average and the poor income people.

I want to try to document this argument very briefly. First of all, nothing would be done about the serious plight of the poor in this country. The Economic Council of Canada showed that the percentage of income of low-income people in this country, of people at the poverty level in fact, has not changed in a significant way in the last couple of decades. It has also been shown by the Economic Council of Canada that the percentage of income of the bottom 20 per cent of families in the income schedule of this country between 1951 and 1965 did not change. In 1951, 20 per cent of families on the income scale received only 6.1 per cent of income. In 1965, some 14 years later, this increased to 6.7 per cent, or almost no change. The second 20 per cent rose only from 12.9 per cent to 13.4 per cent in the same period. In 1965, just four years ago, the bottom 40 per cent of Canadian families received only 20 per cent of the income.

What is the conclusion? The conclusion, also very ably documented in a whole series of studies that have appeared in recent years, is that 20 per cent of Canadians live in poverty—serious, unhealthy, unpleasant poverty. They consist of the elderly, the people in our rural areas, probably half the population of the Atlantic provinces, a large number in Quebec, a very high percentage of our Indian and Métis population, and many thousands in the cores of our large cities. Another 20 per cent of the population are barely above the level of poverty. What does this mean? It means that 40 per cent of Canadians, almost half the population, live on very low incomes.

What does the white paper really propose to do about this situation? One suggestion has been to raise the exemption to $1,400 and to $2,800 for married couples. Will this lift the burden of taxes completely from the poor? No, it will not. According to the Economic Council of Canada, even in 1967 a family with two children needed a minimum income of $4,200 to get by. In his speech last Friday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) indicated he knew very well that many of Canada's poor would still be paying taxes if this white paper is accepted.

He accepted the fact then—and I think it bears repetition—that this great document proposing a taxation reform will still leave thousands of Canadian families living in a state of poverty and paying taxes. He indicated in the debate on Friday that to change this we would have to increase taxes on the rich to levels beyond the one which he is proposing. I say: Why not increase the level of taxation well beyond what is proposed here for those who can afford to pay? Why not remove completely the special tax exemptions which still remain for the petroleum industry and others? If we take seriously the goal of eradicating poverty, as have countries with a per capita income much lower than our own, we can do it; but it means those who are in a position to do so will have to pay more taxes.

A few years ago I spent a month in Scandinavia, a good part of that time in Norway. When I was there in 1963 the per capita income was approximately the same as that in Great Britain, but the distribution of income was very different. I was given to understand at the time that only some 1,100 people in that country had incomes which exceeded $10,000 a year. But the social effects were amazing. Nowhere in that country did I see concentrations of poverty. Nowhere did I see grotesquely run-down cities or undernourished and badly-clothed children. The reason is simple. Given the same per capita income as Great Britain, which is much lower than that in our country, their government was seriously concerned with the problem of poverty and applied taxation as a means of social reform. In order to look after those who needed it, they taxed those who could afford to pay.

It is a shame to suggest that this document before us moves in any significant degree in that direction, and I am astounded by my friends on the political right, and also those on my physical right in this House, who rise and suggest we have here a radical document of some sort. That is absurd. Not only is there no significant increase in the tax levels for the higher income groups, but the whole means of taxing and the degree to which the rate is raised seem to me to be basically erroneous. Raising the exemption level, as has been pointed out, is in fact benefiting those at the higher levels in terms of dollars. It benefits them more than the poor. What should have been used in much greater degree is a whole series of tax credits, and these could have been applied to the lower levels only.

The answer is a complete system of tax credits instead of exemptions. As calculated by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) in his speech on Friday last, such a system would raise two-thirds of the money which the minister's proposals are designed to raise. The second and related point to be made is that the wealthy in Canada are quite happy. In the Minister of Finance we do not have a Robin Hood, a man who takes from the very rich and gives to the very poor.

What are the real facts about the increases in taxation? A married couple, with two children, who have an income of $20,000 will pay only $60 more. If such a married man earns $25,000 he will pay only $47 more, and if he should be a poor man with an income of $30,000 he will pay only $35 more. On the very highest level of income, Mr. Speaker, the government, this supposedly progressive government, has the audacity to put a 51 per cent ceiling on income tax. What view of justice, I ask, can lead the government to tax men living in the state of poverty in Canada, but allow millionaires to have a 51 per cent tax ceiling? Anyone who would suggest that this is at all just needs to undergo very serious self-analysis.

The principle is clear. With this proposal, the richer you are in Canada the smaller is your tax increase. It is no excuse to say, "Oh yes, but we are also going to tax those people on capital gains. They have not been taxed that way before." That is a curious kind of fallacious argument. Because we perpetrated an injustice for many years by not taxing capital gains, the government now says we should modify the blow by taxing them at a very modest rate. This is an argument of the most expedient political kind. It says to the higher income group who vote for the Liberal Party, "Don't switch back to the Conservatives now. We are not going to be too tough on you. We are not going to introduce a really just system of taxation."

Generally speaking, as has been pointed out the real burden of increases in taxation is to be felt by those with incomes between $9,000 and $15,000. Why not on the rich? Why the special exemptions for certain kinds of industries? Why not a higher increase in corporation taxes? If we want to remove poverty and lift the burden of taxes that will still be paid by people living in poverty, why do we not do those things?

I would now like to turn to another example of inequity in the proposed system. It concerns the supposed benefit that an employed person can obtain by deducting certain expenses for his work. A $150 ceiling has been placed on the amount a worker can claim. Why this ceiling? Why impose such a limit on what a working man can claim when no equivalent limit is placed on employers or professional people? Again, it appears a clear case of discrimination which favours the rich over the poor. It is very hard for me to escape the conclusion that there is a very high degree of cynicism involved. To me it is an unscrupulous trick, the main purpose of which is to get the working people to accept the higher rates of deductions allowed for other people.

The fourth point I want to make on this general question of benefits which favour the rich over the poor and the average Canadian, concerns the failure of the government to embark upon a serious program of public investment and public expansion. If we build public swimming pools, parks and universities, the average income and poor Canadian benefits as much as the rich. If we remove pollution from our waters and air, if we preserve and build attractive cities, if we expand our hospitals and increase our medical research, the ordinary Canadian gains as much as his wealthy neighbour.

All of these are public goods; all require public investment. They all tend to favour the ordinary or the average man with benefits he could not purchase on the open market. Through this kind of use of our economic resources we can really equalize conditions to a very significant degree for all Canadians. However, if we look at the white paper we again see the kind of discrimination which tends to perpetuate the status quo as against expansion in this public domain.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify the business for tomorrow. The plan to have the motion presently under debate disposed of after a two-day debate has been aborted, and it looks like two weeks from today, December 15, before it could be dealt with again. The business for tomorrow will be as announced, starting with item No. 10 in regard to the CNR—

Mr. McGrath: Don't count on that one either.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —and we will be seeking co-operation with respect to a special order for four finance bills, items Nos. 42, 43, 44 and 45. I hope to be able to announce that to the House tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—CANADIAN PRICE OF FORD "MAVERICK"

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on November 20 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), as recorded at page 1031 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether his department is investigating the charge made by the Canadian director of the United Auto Workers that the Ford Maverick car produced at St. Thomas and exported to the United States is sold there for $380 less than in Canada?

The minister was not very impressed with my question or with the importance of the problem, because his answer consisted of simply saying:

> These things happen. It is quite possible that a company's general marketing policies give rise to this situation.

In other words, the minister saw nothing wrong with the policy and proposed to do nothing about it. It is interesting that the minister thought there was nothing wrong and proposed to do nothing about a policy under which Canadians will pay more for a product produced in Canada and exported to the United States.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

On the same day the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) was asked whether, in view of the increased prices for natural gas being paid in the United States which would undoubtedly lead to an increased price in Canada for natural gas, he would consider a policy whereby prices in Canada would be less than those in the United States. The minister suggested that it was an inefficient industry which permitted a two-price system, one in Canada and one in the United States. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is inefficient in the opinion of Liberal ministers if the price paid in Canada is less than the price paid in the United States, but it is quite normal if Canadians pay more for something produced in Canada which sells for less in the United States.

What are the facts in this case? There are two Ford plants, one at St. Thomas in Ontario and one at Kansas City, which produce all Ford "Mavericks" being made. Seventy-five per cent of the Ford "Mavericks" produced at the St. Thomas plant are exported to the United States and sold there. What do we find? These cars are shipped across the border every day, duty free. The same type of car off the same assembly line, built by the same workers with the same materials and the same built-in cost factor sells for $380 less in the United States than in Canada. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the minute the car crosses the border the price is reduced by $380. Part of that differential is due to the different tax system, but according to the company the remainder of it is due to the fact that warranty servicing is more expensive in Canada, Canadians roads are more expensive and the policy of bilingualism is adding to the Canadian price.

These are merely excuses. When we dealt with the U.S.-Canada auto pact we were told that a number of things would happen: We would produce more cars in Canada, and this has happened; we would reduce the balance of trade deficit as a result of auto transactions, which was important and has happened. We were also told that part of the cost to the Canadian taxpayer would be that we could no longer collect $50 in duty because that, in effect, now goes to the automobile companies; that the industry would be more efficient; that it would be rationalized for production; that runs would be longer and therefore prices would come down. But that has not happened. As I have pointed out, in the case of the "Maverick", prices are substantially higher in Canada than in the United States. The price of cars produced in Canada is higher in Canada than that of the same cars shipped to the United States.

There are two explanations for this, Mr. Speaker. Either every car shipped to the United States and sold for less than in Canada is sold at a loss—and I do not believe that, nor do I believe that the minister or his parliamentary secretary would argue that—or the price in Canada is such that the companies are making an exorbitant profit on Canadian sales. I suggest that the minister could handle this situation either by renegotiating the U.S.-Canada auto pact or by removing the duty, so that if the individual consumer wants to purchase a car he can bring it in duty free in the same way as Ford, General Motors or Chrysler. The day he can do that, Mr. Speaker, there will be real competition and the price will come down to where it ought to be.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, because of the unavoidable absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and his parliamentary secretary, I shall be pleased to reply to the hon. member's questions.

It was indicated in the House previously that the suggested retail price of the Ford "Maverick" is United States $1995 for sales in the United States, and Canada $2375 for sales in Canada. After making allowances for exchange and the higher federal sales tax in Canada, and allowing for the effect of dealer mark-up, a difference of about $100 in Canadian funds or 5 per cent remains. In looking at this residual difference of about $100 or 5 per cent, I think I can do no better than quote from a paragraph at page 10588 of Hansard for June 25, 1969, where the parliamentary secretary to the minister made an answer to a very similar question concerning the price differential of the "Maverick". I quote it because I think it is a very fair statement of a basic source of this differential. He said:

> For "Maverick" sales to be made in volume in the U.S. market the car must be priced competitively with other cars in the Ford range and competitive cars of other makes. Since the general level of prices is still lower in the U.S. than in Canada this results in a differential pricing situation between the two countries.

It is not the government's policy to intervene in this pricing process unless there is evidence of serious distortion. The pricing of particular models is a matter for company decisions, decisions which are governed by the normal constraints of competition and consumer acceptance. It is expected that the auto agreement will continue to reduce the disparity of car prices in Canada and the United States.

I am not quoting from statistics, Mr. Speaker, but I think I am correct in saying that under the auto agreement the price differential has narrowed from approximately 10 per cent to approximately 5 per cent and that it is expected to narrow even further. The hon. member asked whether the government should be reconsidering its position under the automotive agreement. In answer to that question, I would like to say that in view of the increased production and the new employment which has been generated as a result of the agreement, a price differential which has been rapidly narrowing would not seem to be a justifiable reason why the government should reconsider its position under the automotive agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

INDIAN AFFAIRS—BAND COUNCIL BORROWING REGULATIONS—PROVISION OF FUND

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on November 21 I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) a question about the newly enacted regulations under the Indian Act entitled "Indian Band Council Borrowing Regulations" which appeared in the Canada Gazette, Part II, indicating that this was an entirely new set of regulations. Mr. Speaker suggested that it was a question that might be put on the order paper, but I felt that there are, or can be, important questions of public policy involved in these regulations; therefore, I thought it would be a suitable subject to raise at this time.

I notice that these regulations are made under section 72(1)(m) of the act. On checking the act I find that subsection (1)(m) was added to the act in 1956. I might draw to the attention of the House what seems to me to be a rather interesting parallel. The regulations read:

> 1. These Regulations may be cited as the Indian Band Council Borrowing Regulations.
> 2. The council of a band may borrow money for band projects or housing purposes and may make loans out of moneys so borrowed to members of the band for housing purposes, on such terms and conditions as may be determined by the council.

• (10:10 p.m.)

On checking the legislative authority for these regulations I found that section 72 of the act authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations. Under subparagraph (m) the Governor in Council may make regulations for empowering and authorizing the council of a band to borrow money for band projects and housing and providing for the making of loans to members of the bands for housing purposes. It is obvious that the regulations are simply a re-enactment of the terms of the legislation which give this power to the Governor in Council.

The question which I feel should be answered is, naturally: What does the minister intend to accomplish through the passing of this set of regulations late in 1969, when authority was given to the Governor in Council in an amending act as long ago as 1956? It is true the authority has not been exercised either by Liberal or by Conservative governments in the intervening years.

One would have expected the regulations to expand somewhat on the provisions of the act. There are one or two questions which occur to me immediately. First, as I have mentioned, there is the question: What is the purpose of these regulations? We are all familiar with Indian needs and the limitation on their borrowing power because they are unable to make mortgaging arrangements in the ordinary way either as individuals or as a band. Are we to understand that the government is preparing, as suggested in my question, to set up a fund from which Indian bands might borrow at reasonable rates of interest under the terms of the regulations; or does the government have in mind making available some form of insurance guarantee such as is provided under various lending regulations so that, in effect, Indians can go into the public market when they want to borrow, with some kind of government guarantee behind them? I think this is a matter of general concern to members of the House and to all who are concerned with the possibility of the Indian people being able to proceed more directly to the management of their own affairs and the development of housing on the reserves in a self-sufficient way.

I again express the hope that the parliamentary secretary will be able to explain why the government should at this particular time have decided to act upon powers which were granted to it by Parliament as long ago as 1956.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can probably supply the information which the hon. member has requested. He should not be too concerned or even too critical of the fact that some time elapsed since the enabling legislation was passed and the regulations were promulgated. He will realise that in all areas of this government's legislative program, especially in the field of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, many new initiatives have been undertaken and many new programs are being proposed for discussion. This is the sort of thing that the government and the minister are doing to assist the native peoples of Canada.

I should like to put on the record in the very short time available to me a little information about what the government is doing to assist Indians and other native peoples in their economic development and in their housing programs. The hon. member who has placed the question before the House tonight will recall the recent statement of the minister—I am sorry I do not have the date in my notes—that an amount of $50 million would be made available over the next five years for the economic development of Indian communities.

The hon. member will also recall that Orders in Council were passed in September of 1967 pursuant to the Indian on reserve housing regulations. These orders provided that individual Indians may borrow money for the construction of houses on reserves from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These loans are guaranteed by the minister, and a fund has been established to back the minister's guarantee.

In addition to that, pursuant to the Indian off-reserve and Eskimo re-establishment housing regulations, which were published in 1967, Indians and Eskimos who are regularly employed off reserves may be assisted in securing first mortgage loans from CMHC or approved lenders. They may also establish eligibility for second mortgage loans from a departmental loan fund. The second mortgage loans are forgiveable over a period of ten years if certain conditions are met.

Although my time is about to expire, I might just mention that by Treasury Board minute passed in 1966 capital grants may be made to Indian band councils for the construction of houses. This is another part of the program to provide for the economic development of Indian peoples and to assist them to help meet their housing requirements.

HIGHWAYS—ATLANTIC PROVINCES—COST-SHARING FORMULA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the question that brings this vast assembly together at this hour arose from the demise of the Atlantic Development Board and its reincarnation in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. A few days ago I asked the minister of that department what cost-sharing formula the department is now proposing to the four Atlantic provinces.

In the past the Atlantic Development Board had committed itself to the amount of $66⅔ million—I quote that figure from the annual report from the year 1967-68—and this amount was the largest single item in the spending program of the Atlantic Development Board. I think all hon. members from Atlantic Canada would agree that this was one of the most important pieces of work that was carried on by the former agency of the federal Parliament.

In view of this I would be interested to know what programs the new department, having had a few months to shake down and to get itself reformed, is now proposing to carry on in my part of Canada. I think that a declaration of the formula it proposes to use and the amount of money it proposes to spend would be of particular help to that region at this time. The provincial governments are preparing their budgets for next year, and they should know what kind of assistance, if any, will be forthcoming from the federal treasury in the important matter of highway development, if only from the standpoint of proper planning. In the past the formulae varied; it changed from one of 50-50 to one of 75-25, exclusive of the cost of acquiring rights-of-way.

As an aside, it is of interest to note that in dealing with Atlantic problems the transportation committee of this House suggested that the formula be as generous as 90-10; that is to say, the federal government picking up 90 per cent of the cost of certain main trunk projects in the four Atlantic provinces. This suggestion, by the way, happened to be unanimously agreed to by the members of that committee, of which I was joyfully one.

My purpose, then, in rising is to try to find out in some general way exactly what the new Department of Regional Economic Expansion proposes in the form of cost-sharing arrangements for future highway developments in Atlantic Canada. I did not have a chance to raise this question the other day, and I do not expect the hon. member who will reply for the government to respond to it now because it involves a fairly specialized field. Perhaps I may raise it at a future date. I am wondering whether the formula will include such projects as the Shubenacadie River crossing or a second bridge from Halifax across the northwest arm, both being within the riding of Halifax-East Hants.

In raising this question tonight I really want some indication, if it is possible, about the formula to be used and whether it will be 75 per cent and 25 per cent or something else. Perhaps we might also have some indication in that regard.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to provide an answer to the member for Halifax-East Hants although I am afraid it will not be in the specific terms necessary to fully satisfy him. Let me say that the development programs which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is currently discussing with provinces in the Atlantic region are expected to make provision for a certain amount of highway assistance integrated with comprehensive plans for regional development. Let me assure the hon. member that the department is fully aware of the importance of communications, particularly highways and roads, to area development and regional development in the whole Atlantic region. I think that kind of concern is apparent in the FRED programs which have already been established in some Atlantic areas.

I hope the hon. member will appreciate that while these comprehensive regional plans are under current and active consideration, it would be premature to forecast the details of cost-sharing assistance to a particular component of those comprehensive plans, in this case the transportation or highway component. I regret that my reply is so brief, particularly in view of the understandably high interest of members from the Atlantic region and others in this subject of highways. I hope in these particular circumstances he will understand that specific details at this time are just not available.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

NOTRE-DAME-DU-LAC—FIRE IN OLD PEOPLE'S HOME

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I regret that getting away to the Moon is not always possible, and that the terrible realities of every day life bring us back to much gloomier thoughts.

Hon. members undoubtedly recall the great disasters of May 1950 at Rimouski and Cabano. This morning, it is at Notre-Dame-du-Lac, a locality near Cabano, that a tragic fire took the lives of more than 50 aged people and caused injuries to more than 20 others at the rest home "Le Repos du Vieillard", thus bringing consternation to that locality which celebrates this year the centennial of its foundation.

To the stricken families and to all the population as well, I wish to extend the expression of my heartfelt condolences, and I am sure that all hon. members will wish to join in this expression of sympathy.

I ask the government to take all necessary steps to bring those people immediate assistance.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say that, on behalf of the Canadian people and government, I have already sent a message of condolence to the people stricken by this horrible tragedy.

Mr. Speaker: I have no doubt that all hon. members will join in the Prime Minister's expression of sympathy as well as in the grief expressed by the hon. member for Témiscouata.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce a change in the business for today. Regrettably, owing to illness in the family, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) will not be able to be in the House today to take for the Minister of Finance the four measures I announced. Therefore the order of business will be changed from that announced last night.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The first order will be as announced last night, resumption of the debate on second reading of Bill C-7, the CNR financing bill. Upon the conclusion of that debate we will resume the debate on second reading of Bill C-4, an Act to amend the Canada Corporations Act. As the third item we would call the report stage and third reading of Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Judges Act. I have made this statement to confirm to the House the changes which have already been indicated to the representatives of the parties.

MAN ON THE MOON

WELCOME AND TRIBUTE TO APOLLO 11 ASTRONAUTS BY HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of drawing Your Honour's attention and the attention of all hon. members to the presence in your gallery of several distinguished visitors. I refer to the three astronauts who made up the crew of Apollo 11, Messrs. Neil Armstrong Mike Collins and Edwin Aldrin and their wives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The venture of these three brave men into the unknown stirred the imagination and the pride of all Canadians. This country is not so old nor so well explored, that either the experience of the frontier or the taste of adventure is forgotten. We are close in time and in space to wilderness. In our blood—or perhaps just in our secret desires—is found the spirit of such as Hudson and Cartier, Palliser and Steffanson. The exploits of our visitors today proved that the age of exploration is not over and we are glad. They proved too that there is new meaning in the heavens, and we are better for it. Mr. Speaker, we are delighted to have with us these courageous men and their equally brave wives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased on behalf of my colleagues and myself to be associated with the welcome the Prime Minister has extended to Neil Armstrong, Michael Collins and Buzz Aldrin, and their wives. We are particularly honoured that having gone to the moon these men have come to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Whatever our admiration of their courage and our awe at their accomplishments, I think the dominant feeling of all of us besides that of pleasure is one of humility.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Distinguished visitors have, of course, come to this Chamber before, but there have been none before who have symbolized the breaking of old concepts in the way these men do. We must remember that, while they were alone in space, the responsibility for making this space age serve man is one we must all meet together.

I do not wish to be too solemn, but as a practical man who watched these men in space there were some considerations of a practical nature which occurred to me. However, I believe these would be better presented to these gentlemen in private.

It will, of course, be many years before the full significance of this exploit is realized. In 1492 it was difficult for contemporaries to visualize all the consequences of the discovery by Columbus. It is a sobering thought that we today are one of those consequences and that an equally significant development may follow from the exploration of these men.

To be serious, Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to join with the Prime Minister and all members of the House in welcoming these three brave men and their wives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all Canadians will echo the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister in paying tribute to our distinguished guests. They honour us by their presence here today and we honour them for the great contribution they have made to man's enlarging knowledge of the universe in which we live.

We pay tribute also to their courage, skill and the teamwork which made the venture of Apollo 11 such an outstanding success. We also pay tribute to the thousands of men who made their trip possible and to their great country, the United States, which has been in the forefront of the exploration of space.

The names of Neil Armstrong, Mike Collins and Edwin Aldrin will go down in history among the great pathfinders of space.

I am convinced that this is only the beginning of man's exploration of our solar system. The day undoubtedly will come when other earthmen will reach out to other planets and even break through into our sidereal system.

The astronauts whom we honour here today represent a challenge to the governments and legislators of the world to match their achievement in landing on the moon with similar advances here on earth.

Two of the astronauts landed near the Sea of Tranquillity. I think we can assure them that we in this Parliament will do our part in trying to make this earth a place of tranquillity and security for all mankind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, this event would not be complete if a French voice was not heard in Parliament to endorse the eloquent speech made by the Prime Minister to welcome and congratulate the three astronauts who reached the earth's satellite a few weeks ago, an accomplishment which undoubtedly puts them in the category of heroes.

All three know that the Canadian people followed every step of their flight and that Canadians are proud of having contributed to this achievement by manufacturing certain components of the space ship which took them to the moon.

Since a Canadian of the Montreal area worked on the landing gear of the lunar module—and for the information of the Prime Minister—I would point out that the three astronauts successfully completed their venture without any assistance from the Bank of Canada.

This was a most perfect achievement and on behalf of my colleagues. I join with the Prime Minister to greet and welcome the wives of the three astronauts and wish them a happy stay among us.

May those three famous space travellers never forget that Canada is proud of its modest contribution to the conquest of the moon and hopes that their future undertakings will be successful.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES ABM SYSTEM—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN DECISION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of a statement he made on March 19, as recorded on page 6853 of Hansard. At that time he said:

> If, Mr. Speaker, after receiving all the information, we are led to the view that the ABM system constitutes escalation and is conducive to greater peril for mankind, then we shall condemn it. We shall tell the United States that we disapprove. If, on the other hand, we are convinced that the ABM system is necessary though regrettable as a move by the United States, then we shall have to decide whether or not we shall participate in the operation of that system.

What decision has been reached by the Prime Minister and his colleagues with respect to the ABM system, and has that decision been transmitted to the government of the United States?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, this question was only one of the various questions which had to be examined and decided upon by the government in the context of our review of defence policy as regards continental defence. I believe we indicated in the Speech from the Throne that there would be a white paper published on these matters during the current session. Until then we are not prepared to comment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. Have any discussions been held by any representatives or officials of the Canadian government with the government of the United States regarding the construction of an ABM system and particularly with reference to the implications it might have for Canada, especially the two bases which are to be located close to Canada, one in Montana and the other in North Dakota?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, at the time this matter was in the public eye we did have discussions. When I went to Washington I had some discussions with President Nixon and his ministers and officials, and our officials and ministers have had subsequent discussions. I cannot say whether there have been any recent discussions.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer concerning the government's intention to publish a white paper on this subject, but has the government of Canada already informed the government of the United States of its views on whether or not the ABM decision by the Americans constitutes an escalation of the arms race?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat my first answer. Our views will be contained in a white paper; it will be an attempt to express to the country and to other countries an over-all view of our approach to continental defence.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's statement that a white paper is going to be introduced, may I ask him whether or not this important matter will be discussed with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence prior to the publication of the white paper, particularly since under the committee's terms of reference it now has before it the subject of U.S.-Canada relations?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course I would not want to meddle or interfere in the conduct of that committee's work.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you very much. But it would not be our intention to refer this matter piecemeal to the committee. It would be our intention to refer it by way of a white paper, if they want to look at it in that form.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of his earlier statement in the House that it was the intention of the government to study this ABM question and if the government decided that the decision of the United States was unfortunate or bad the government of Canada would then express its views to the United States, does the Prime Minister now expect that the government of Canada will reach a decision in this respect in time for its views to have any effect or any influence on the course to be followed by the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question is clearly hypothetical. With regard to the second part, the timing, I understand that the United States is not actually proceeding with the construction until some time in the seventies. Therefore I am sure that this government's policy, the policies evolved in other countries, and perhaps as well the results of the strategic arms limitation talks being held at Helsinki, will all be factors that the government of the United States will want to take into consideration before proceeding with the finalization of an ABM system.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTION INCLUSION OF MONETARY REFORM ON CONFERENCE AGENDA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Earlier, he informed us of the agenda of the Constitutional Conference to be held on December 8, 9 and 10, where the following matters will be discussed: distribution of power, regional disparities, reports of ministerial committees, programs of next conferences and, finally, other questions. Is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether monetary reform is included in the other questions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any of the governments that will attend the Conference, not even that of British Columbia, will be willing to study the matter.

Mr. Caouette: I want to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

If the provinces fail to propose such a study, could not the Prime Minister himself suggest to them to study the matter of monetary reform?

Mr. Trudeau: I shall be very happy to consider seriously the hon. member's request, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON SUBVERSION

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, so that the conquest of space should not be useless in the future, it is necessary first to put some order on our planet. Therefore, I direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Pursuant to the serious public statements made recently by Mr. Saulnier during press conferences on subversion in Canada, does the Prime Minister intend to follow up Mr. Saulnier's request for a Royal Commission on subversion in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the government will certainly not take any decision until the parliamentary committee's report on the matter is published.

Mr. Valade: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Prime Minister aware that the terms of reference of the committee do not include looking into subversive activities in general, but simply into the activities of the Company of Young Canadians. That is why I am asking this question.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INVESTIGATION OF MARKETING—DISTRIBUTION OF BOXCARS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. By reason of the widespread criticism at the Liberal convention which the hon. member attended in Saskatchewan concerning sales of wheat and also boxcar manipulation as it was described, rather than distribution, is the minister now in a position, having had the benefit of the general viewpoint of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan at that convention, to agree—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that there should be an investigation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to object to the form of the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not know how to bring it to his attention except by telling him what took place. Will he say now whether or not consideration is being given to looking into the whole question of marketing by means of a royal commission to report within a couple of months, and the appointment of a controller so that the past injustices in connection with boxcar distribution will end?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the right hon. member described the convention in some detail because I certainly would not have recognized it from the start of his question. We are very concerned indeed that the transportation system of this country should be adequate to handle not only grain in particular but other commodities. I should like to assure the right hon. member that appropriate steps are being taken to see that everything that can be done is being done, but I certainly have not changed my view about a transport controller.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the challenge of my authority, for the benefit of the minister may I read from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the reading should not be for the benefit of the House at this time.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary and related question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. Can the minister advise the House if the National Harbours terminal elevator No. 2 in Vancouver is at present fully operational—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Mackenzie on a supplementary question.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is raising a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in light of the grain movement and grain handling situation I have reason to believe that the minister would like to answer this question. I believe the terminal is sitting vacant—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized in due course. He took the floor under the guise of a supplementary but it was not supplementary. It might have been related, as he suggested, but he will be given the floor in a moment. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

ISSUING OF REPORTS OF QUOTA OPENINGS BY WHEAT BOARD

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will permit me this question which I should like to direct to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt. May I inquire whether under his direction the Wheat Board will no longer issue reports of their quota openings as they have in the past and whether these reports will have to be sought out by Members of Parliament asking questions in the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this is a related or unrelated question. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed the question. I shall return to other hon. members in a moment and we will try to get all the questions on this subject out of the way. The minister might reply to the question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I know of no change in Wheat Board policy in regard to the announcement of quotas. The unit quota is the one receiving major attention at the moment. I am sure the Wheat Board has in mind the opening of quotas as soon as it is satisfied that enough cars are directed to those points where unit quotas are still to be filled.

Mr. Korchinski: In the past, Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice for members to receive these reports without asking questions in the House of Commons. In order to save time could we have these reports sent to our offices as has been the custom?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, a supplementary question.

OPERATION OF TERMINAL ELEVATOR NO. 2, VANCOUVER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt whether he can advise the House if the National Harbours Board terminal elevator No. 2 in Vancouver is fully operational and whether or not the storage capacity is being fully used at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The terminal elevator to which he referred is not in use. It was in use under lease last year when its drying facilities were in operation. It is not used because it would need very extensive and costly renovations for anything but the cleaning of wheat and then, I think, in rather awkward fashion. At the moment it is not in use although it is being looked at from the point of view of what future needs may be.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister, in view of his reply, whether or not the government is attempting to lease or sell this terminal? If they are not, would the government consider authorizing the Wheat Board or the Board of Grain Commissioners to operate this terminal and use it for specific commodities such as flax or rapeseed?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to consult with my colleague under whose responsibility this particular elevator lies. We certainly will be looking at all facilities on the coast from the point of view of what is adequate for future requirements.

FLAX—PROVISION OF BOXCARS TO PLACE IN MARKET POSITION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt which is related directly to the question asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. In view of the the present special quota for flax and the serious concern of western farmers about reported losses of flax sales through the grain not being in market position, what steps, if any, has the minister taken in collaboration with the Minister of Transport to provide boxcars for these much needed sales of flax?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I have received no reports at all of any problems concerning the supply of cars for the handling of flax. The Wheat Board has given top priority to the provision of cars for shipment of this grain. As far as I know, when the owners and handlers of the grain call it forward the cars are provided.

POSSIBLE ENTRY OF BRITAIN INTO ECM—EFFECT ON CANADIAN SALES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which arises out of the answer given by the minister in reference to the marketing of grain. In view of the fact that Great Britain will likely enter the European Common Market which subsidizes grain, would the minister be prepared to have high level talks with Great Britain, one of our best markets for grain, in reference to this problem because we will be competing against subsidized grain in that market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Well, Mr. Speaker, the government and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have discussed with the United Kingdom various aspects of its relationships with Canada under various hypothetical contingencies. Certainly the one mentioned in regard to grain is considered by us to be very important.

OPERATION OF TERMINAL ELEVATOR NO. 2, VANCOUVER

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not confusing No. 2 elevator with No. 3?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking a statistical question.

Mr. Winch: But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Since the matter seems to be of some importance, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, since there may be some confusion may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio. Is it possible for consideration to be given to using the 1,200,000 bushel capacity No. 2 elevator for storage at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I am confusing No. 2 with No. 3. At any rate, the information I have and which I gave was in connection with No. 2 elevator. The point was that some renovation might be required in order for it to be used, and I would have to look into the actual renovation techniques to ascertain whether it would be worth while to renovate this elevator. It would not ordinarily be wise to use such a space for storage if it is not possible to use it for throughput.

Mr. Speaker: I see that other hon. members wish to ask supplementary questions on this subject. Since I am sure hon. members will recognize that we have had a large number of supplementary questions on the same subject I would think that for the moment we might go on to some other question.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SIDE EFFECTS OF CERTAIN CHEMICAL DEFOLIATORS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources because it is connected with pollution. In view of the very serious information emanating from the National Cancer Institute on the use of 2-4D and 4-5T as defoliators, what steps are being taken to check the potentially dangerous side effects the use of these substances will have on genetics?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question asked by the hon. member is very general and wide in scope, and I would think it should be answered by way of a statement on motions. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the minister whether he proposes to make a statement in due course.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he will make a statement tomorrow on this situation?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, although I cannot undertake to make a statement on motions I will certainly be glad to look into the subject matter and answer my hon. friend's question directly, to him.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF STANBURY-FIELDS REPORT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In these days of space exploration, would he mind conducting an investigation within his department to see whether he can find the Stanbury-Fields report so as to make it available to the Indian people?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have already replied several times to this question. It is not that the report cannot be found, but it is not complete and to publish it would create confusion.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister mind fulfilling the promise he made to the House during the last session to the effect that he would be prepared to make public an abridged version of the report in which the names of individuals would be deleted, thus protecting their privacy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to study the hon. member's suggestion.

OIL

STRAIT OF GEORGIA—ISSUANCE OF DRILLING PERMITS

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the minister changed his mind and is his department about to grant a permit for oil drilling in the Strait of Georgia near Vancouver? I ask this question in the light of a press release recently by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, because there is no way in which my department can or will grant such permits for the drilling of oil there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Resign.

[Mr. Greene.]

Mr. Hogarth: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to consult with other government departments, as opposed to merely giving them notice, before granting permits for oil drilling, particularly in the Strait of Georgia?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, before any permit to drill is granted notice must be given, not by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources but by the applicant to the various departments concerned. A complete plan must be filed, after which the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources conducts meetings with the various departments in order to discuss the proposed plan. No permit is ever granted unless the approval of the various departments is secured. There is no application for any permit to drill in the Strait of Georgia before us at this time.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has already granted to oil companies seismic testing permits, will the minister assure the House that these seismic testing permits were not granted on the understanding that oil drilling permits would automatically follow if the oil companies should find favourable structures?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that no such undertaking has been given and no such understanding is in effect. The permits are not called seismic exploration permits. Actually, a plan was filed and discussions were carried on for two years or more before permission for seismic exploration was granted. The work was carried out in a fashion that was, then, satisfactory to all departments; in fact, the method of doing the work was changed in order to make it safer. No dynamite was used. A new and safer technology was used in the seismic work and that work has been completed.

[Later:]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, Mr. Speaker. Would he advise us whether his department has in fact received notice of any such application with respect to drilling in the Strait of Georgia?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker, there have not been any applications from oil drilling companies to my department with respect to drilling in the Strait of Georgia.

EFFECT OF U.S. TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATION ON CANADIAN EXPORTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I gave him notice of it. As the United States cabinet task force looking into oil imports into the United States has recommended to the President that the present system of import quotas be replaced by tariffs, has the minister's department determined what adverse effects, if any, this would have on Canadian exports of oil to the United States? If it has determined that adverse effects would result, does the government intend to protest very vigorously against the implementation of such new policy?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Schultz committee, which reports to the President with respect to oil policy, has not yet concluded its deliberations. It has studied various matters, including the possibility of substituting the present quota policy with a tariff policy. To the best of my knowledge the committee has reached no conclusion. We are having continuing negotiations with our United States counterparts and with the committee with respect to the Canadian position. Our position continues to be that it is in the interest of both countries to have an open market for Canadian oil in the United States oil market. I, personally, will be attending in Washington to consult with the Secretary of the Interior in this regard on Thursday of this week.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED LOAN TO QUEBEC BY BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the Quebec government failed to obtain a $50 million loan at the rate of 9.65 per cent last Monday, in New York, does the Prime Minister intend to offer the services of the Bank of Canada to insure the loan, as well as the economic development of the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have reasons to believe that the government of the province of Quebec will manage without help in this matter. However, should this expectation prove unfounded, we shall be happy to discuss the matter with them.

TRADE

SUPPORT FOR CANADA MINK BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention of the government to provide the Canada Mink Breeders Association with facilities and support at the International Fur Trade Fair in Frankfurt, Germany?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this is a matter of urgency. Perhaps the hon. member might like to discuss it at the time of adjournment later today.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED SALT FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the information given by the Minister of Fisheries, according to the reports of a speech he made in Toronto on November 28, with respect to the proposed salt fish development corporation, will the minister now take the House into his confidence and introduce the bill dealing with the matter for first reading so that hon. members on both sides of the House may have an opportunity of studying these proposals which will have a far-reaching impact on salt fish processing plants in eastern Canada?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this bill will be forthcoming very soon.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is based on knowledge that the minister gave details of this legislation outside the House in a speech made as late as last Friday as well as in a press release in St. John's. My supplementary question is: Does he not think that the House of Commons has a right to see this legislation, because he seems to have refused to give the House knowledge of it—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is obviously an argument.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to ask a supplementary question of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, if he wishes to ask a question, should ask it and not present argument to the House. I am sure the hon. member realizes this.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, having laid the foundation for my question, I will now ask the minister about something extremely important affecting many thousands of Canadians. Will he now take seriously repeated requests made on this side of the House to have this legislation brought in and read the first time so that we may have a chance to study it and prepare ourselves for debate on it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is not in order as asked. I think I should give the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate an opportunity to ask a supplementary.

ASSISTANCE TO THOSE ENGAGED IN LABRADOR FISHERY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour might rule that this is a related question. Can the Minister of Fisheries say whether his department has concluded its inquiry into certain aspects of the Newfoundland fishery, especially the Labrador fishery, and can he tell us whether the government has reached a final decision with regard to the possibility of making some form of assistance available? If so, can he inform the House as to the nature of the decision?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Several measures are being examined with a view to helping the fishermen in the Labrador fishery which, as the hon. member knows, was a complete failure this year.

Mr. Lundrigan: Bearing in mind the fact that all hon. members are getting an enormous amount of mail—I have had 80 letters myself in the last week—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask a question; he should not convey information to the House, although I recognize it may be very important and relevant information. We should go on to another subject.

Mr. Lundrigan: But, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a representation; he has to assume it has been noted. If he will look around he will see there are many of his colleagues who wish to ask questions, and there are only a few minutes of the question period left. If, however, he wishes to take that time, I will recognize him.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you. I do not want to hold up the proceedings but this is an urgent matter. Would the minister make a statement on motions tomorrow—I do not expect him to have the information before him today—so as to clarify the position of the government with respect to the assistance it might wish to offer the fishermen of Atlantic Canada who, as he has indicated, have experienced a disastrous year?

Mr. Davis: I will give the hon. member's representation every consideration, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA—REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE BY JOINT CHURCH AID AND CANAIRELIEF

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Having in mind reports which appeared following the Prime Minister's meeting last Thursday with representatives of Canairelief and Joint Church Aid, can he say whether he will be making an announcement this week in response to the requests which were made to him in the course of that meeting with respect to relief for the people of Biafra?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot say for sure, Mr. Speaker. I hope to be able to give some kind of indication to the representatives of Canairelief with regard to the timing as we see it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When the Prime Minister is in a position to give an answer to these people will he make the same statement here in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker; provided, however, that both Canairelief and ourselves agree that an announcement made publicly at that time would be to the general profit of the cause we are trying to help.

SHIPPING

SINKING OF FISHING VESSEL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In his absence may I direct it to the Parliamentary Secretary or to the Acting Minister. We are aware of the tragic incident which occurred in the Atlantic off Sydney a few days ago when lives were lost. May I ask the Parliamentary Secretary or the Acting Minister whether the minister will make a statement as soon as possible, first, in regard to whether those responsible for search and rescue operations under the Department of Transport did everything possible to assist in the shortest time possible and, second, whether a private aircraft operator in the city of Sydney was refused information by the Department of Transport which would have enabled him to assist in the rescue operation much more quickly than the government aircraft?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following this tragic accident, the Department of Transport started an investigation, and I am sure that, as soon as the information reaches his office, the minister will be pleased to pass it on to the hon. member and to answer his questions.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): In the absence of the Minister of Finance may I put a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker? Is there any cost to the Canadian taxpayers involved in the operation of the Liberal political cabinet?

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO BARBER COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the final report of the Barber Commission on farm machinery prices yet available and, if not, are any further interim reports of that commission ready for Members of Parliament?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, the final report of the Barber Commission has not been presented and I have had no indication from Dr. Barber when he expects to present it. He has presented a subject matter report on the pricing patterns of tractors and combines and he has also presented one of the study papers, the one on the cost of producing tractors, the economics of scale and that sort of thing, which I believe could be made available to hon. members and to the public within a few days.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

NICKEL PRICE INCREASE—EFFECT ON CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the studies he indicated his department is conducting into the effects of the increase in the price of nickel upon Canadian customers. In view of the indication the minister gave the other day that the increase seemed to be in the public interest, may I ask whether he has concluded his study of the effect of this increase upon Canadian consumers?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Some of the results of this study have already been indicated by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The effect is to add $1.30 to the price of an automobile, seven cents to the price of a kitchen sink, and so on. Two things, among others are to be borne in mind when assessing the consequences of this particular price increase. One is that 96 per cent of the nickel produced is exported, and the other is that nickel is sold internationally by the Soviet Union, for example, at a price higher than $2. During the strike it went up to $5, $7 and even $10. These factors and others, must be borne in mind. We have conducted a study, and my report is that the effects will be minimal unless nickel users decide to maximize them, and I hope they will not do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand that the position taken by the minister is that an increase of 25 per cent in the price of this basic metal is not inflationary?

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED BOOTLEGGING OF WESTERN FEED GRAIN

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement by Lionel Sorel, past president of the Quebec Union Catholique des Cultivateurs, that western feed grain is being bootlegged into eastern Canada in violation of Wheat Board regulations, will the Department of Agriculture through the Board of Grain Commissioners or the Eastern Feed Grain Agency investigate the situation to determine whether Canadian Wheat Board regulations are being violated in the movement of feed grain to eastern Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): This allegation or charge has been made a number of times and I believe the Wheat Board has in fact looked into it. Perhaps the hon. member would like to direct his question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

Mr. Gleave: I would direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt. Will he investigate or cause to be investigated the allegation made by Lionel Sorel of the Quebec Union Catholique des Cultivateurs?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): As the Minister of Agriculture has just said, similar allegations have been made before. I will certainly look into the question whether there have been any recent indications of the improper movement of grain and see that appropriate steps are taken accordingly.

TRADE

USE OF FOREIGN CARRIER TO TRANSPORT NICKEL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport. Would the minister after consultation make a statement in the House as to why a major Canadian nickel producer had to resort to a foreign carrier in order to transport nickel ore to Norway in an operation to salvage Canadian international trade in nickel?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have looked into the matter, Mr. Speaker. Canadian carriers were contacted first and at least one was used.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ACCEPTANCE OF POSSIBLE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION FOR ROYAL COMMISSION ON SUBVERSION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of his earlier reply to the hon. member for St. Mary, will the government be willing to receive a recommendation from the broadcasting committee on Mr. Saulnier's request for a royal commission on subversion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the proper thing to do would be to wait for the committee to report, and I always like to do the proper thing.

FORESTRY

VOLUNTARY BAN ON EXPORT OF LOGS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry which is related to a question I directed to the Prime Minister, in the minister's absence, a week ago last Friday concerning whether or not the ban on the export of logs from British Columbia is still in effect and, if so, for how long it will remain in effect.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the ban is not in effect. It has not been in effect since midsummer. There is now a large surplus of logs on the west coast, and a large number are currently being exported.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister undertook in this House to retain the export ban until September 1 and to review the matter at that time, may I ask him whether the government has reviewed the matter and is it now the opinion of the minister that no such ban is required?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, it is our opinion that no such ban is required now. The export permits are in fact administered by a joint committee comprised of people from our department, from the provincial government and from industry. All of these people are convinced that there is a large surplus of logs on the west coast.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY ORDER RESPECTING FROST DAMAGE TO FLOWERS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. I should like to refer him to the answer given to the right hon. member for Prince Albert by the Minister of Transport on Friday last in regard to the hardship caused the florist industry. The minister stated that he would be holding meetings with the people concerned and also the carriers. Would the Parliamentary Secretary disclose to the House what the result of the meeting was, because time is pressing?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in his reply to the right hon. member for Prince Albert the minister made a slight error. Instead of the meeting being held yesterday, the meeting will be held tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INVESTIGATION OF ACCIDENT ON "KOOTENAY"

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question would have been directed to the Minister of National Defence had he been present in the House today in accordance with the roster. In his absence may I direct it to the Acting Minister or to the Minister of Supply and Services. Has the investigation into the accident on H.M.C.S. Kootenay now got under way, and when may we expect its completion? If I might ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Supply and Services, could the minister indicate whether or not the department has been asked to call for tenders to repair the vessel?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I will convey the first question to the Minister of National Defence. With regard to the second question, I will look into the matter and reply as soon as I can.

RESEARCH

DISCONTINUANCE BY NASA OF PROGRAM AT FORT CHURCHILL

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Has the minister anything further to report to the House in relation to the utilization of the rocket research facilities at Fort Churchill by NASA, or does the minister intend to make a further statement within the next few days?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that if a statement is to be made it must be made on motions.

HOUSING

INTRODUCTION OF REVISED RENT-TO-INCOME SCALE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of housing. Can the minister say when the revised rent-to-income scale will go into effect in public housing projects?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, guidelines relating to public housing policy, including the rent-to-income scale, are being discussed with my provincial counterparts. As I recently informed the hon. member for Broadview, I hope to be able to make a statement on the matter before Christmas provided we are able to get the information required from the provinces in time to digest it and find answers to the problems.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for St. John's East rising on a point of order?

Mr. McGrath: No, Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege. I had hoped to have this matter clarified during the question period, but since I was not given that opportunity I am rising on a question of privilege. My question of privilege arises from the fact that in a speech in Toronto on Friday the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry released details of proposed legislation to set up a salt fish development corporation, information that has been denied the members of this House.

My question of privilege is based on the fact that the minister has gone against the well accepted and well established practice of the House. Under the circumstances, I submit that the minister has no alternative but to bring in the legislation for first reading.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that he cannot raise a question of privilege at this time. The rules clearly state that this type of question of privilege can be raised only on notice given in writing. Normally the hon. member should give notice to the Chair that he proposes to raise the matter as a question of privilege, and I would have to rule upon it.

I was going to make a theoretical ruling but I think this would be very unwise. I would rather say that in the circumstances I do not think a ruling should be made at this time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

The House resumed from Friday, November 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-7, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was last before the House I outlined some of the reasons the people of the Atlantic provinces have lost all faith and hope that the government will give them the opportunity to receive equal treatment with other Canadians. I tried to place on the record some of the ways in which this government has endeavoured to ignore the justifiable arguments presented by the business communities why a transportation policy should have been introduced in this region a long time ago.

As a result of the government's failure, the people in the Atlantic provinces are faced with almost impossible burdens industrially and are unable to attract new industry. In 1967 the government allowed the railways to impose new l.c.l. charges on the shippers in the region. After about a year and a half the government gave the trucking industry certain incentives the railways already had, making it possible for them to compete with the railways. This resulted in the shippers in the Atlantic region being placed on a somewhat better footing.

Since then, the government has allowed the railways to increase their rates on carload lot shipments. The rates freeze has been lifted before the promised transportation policy for the region has been introduced. Although the government has talked so much about elimination of regional economic disparity, there is no way in which it can justify its actions in the field of transportation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

At the present time the florist industry in the area is being placed under new burdensome express charges as a result of the action of the railways. Every time we turn around something new is happening; either more layoffs under the guise of increased efficiency or closures of one type of operation or another. Only recently my colleague the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacEwan) appeared before an inquiry relating to the elimination of air services in the Pictou County area. Every step this government agrees to is a backwards step, and every step it takes represents damage to the economy of the Atlantic region.

We watch the spiralling unemployment rates in the area every winter. This is the same story every winter. Sometimes during the summer we look at our unemployment rate and feel that maybe things are getting better, but when the fall comes it is the same old story of an unemployment rate that is two or three times the national average. We then read in the newspapers about this or that industry having to close down because it is impossible to compete with industry in the rest of Canada.

One of the basic reasons for this problem is the fact that we have been the captive of the railways. Our industries have not been able to compete with similar industries in the central part of Canada. Surely, by now this government should have conceived a policy that would place industry in the Atlantic part of Canada on an equal footing with industry in the remainder of the nation. Industry in our area of Canada could then produce the same product and move it anywhere in this nation in competition with industry in Ontario rather than being forced to pay more for the movement of these goods than if that industry were located in central Canada. Surely, this is the only way that we can exist as a viable entity in Canada.

This certainly is not the case today. It will not be the case tomorrow, and it may well never be the case if this government does not soon move in this direction. There are few indications that it intends to move in this direction. One makes representations to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) who comes from the area, and he indicates justifiable concern. It is quite apparent that when he tells his story to his cabinet colleagues they become completely mute as far as transportation in the Atlantic provinces is concerned. We hear fanciful stories at election time. We have heard about all kinds of wonderful and fancy things that are to be made available to the Atlantic area if only the people will vote for the Liberal party. When the votes are counted and the Liberal party becomes the government of Canada that pie in the sky disappears completely. The bright-eyed gentlemen who come down our way and tell us their fine stories forget about them. We are the forgotten region of Canada and we will continue to be so as long as this government holds office.

Only recently the great Liberals met at Harrison Hot Springs. Great ideas poured forth. We discovered that there was one main transportation policy the Liberal government never forgets. I refer to the transportation policy conceived by Walter Gordon in the famous Gordon report which suggested that the people, of the region be given one way tickets out of there and then the problem would be eliminated.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): That is always the Grit policy.

Mr. Coates: That has always been the Grit policy and it always will be, because even with these great thinkers of the 1970's the one way ticket policy of Walter Gordon is still prominent in the thinking of the members of the Liberal party. That is the sad fact of the matter. There has never been any other philosophy in the Liberal party. Apparently the best way to eliminate the problems of Atlantic Canada is to eliminate Atlantic Canada. The government is going about this with the effectiveness of a bulldozer as it moves everything out of its way. Apparently the concept of this bulldozer policy is that it starts in Newfoundland, hits Cape Breton island, the mainland of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and pushes everything over the borders of Quebec. In that way, we will have no problem in Atlantic Canada.

This is not what the people of Atlantic Canada discovered to be the hallmark of the Diefenbaker administration when it held office in this country. That administration made its moves, did what it could, established boards to provide new incentives and did everything anyone could imagine any government doing in a given period of time. When the Diefenbaker administration was in office it produced concrete evidence that it was concerned about the people. It wanted those people to remain in that part of Canada if that was where they wished to remain and gave them equality of opportunity, about which this government does not think, care or do anything.

The one way ticket philosophy of Walter Gordon and the Liberal party is not good enough for the people of Atlantic Canada in the 1970's. It is not good enough for me or any member from the Atlantic provinces of Canada, regardless of what party he might be associated with, because we want action and we have asked for action over and over again. We have received little or nothing in the way of action from this government. We have heard all kinds of fine and fanciful words but have seen absolutely nothing in the way of action.

I might say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé), who is a member from the Atlantic region, that he would do much better for his region and his people if he spent more time assisting the Minister of Transport in getting action for us and less time worrying about Nouveau Acadia and fanciful terms which will produce nothing in the way of benefit for the people of the area. This will not eliminate in any way, shape or form the problems that face industry in our region.

We must have action quickly from this government. Unfortunately, we are saddled with this government until 1971, 1972, or 1973, depending on when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) decides to call another general election. Between now and then we cannot live on words alone. Our stomachs are empty and our opportunities for employment are few. We need policies for the 1970's which do not involve the purchase of a one-way ticket out of the region. We need policies that will keep our people in the region and entice other people to come in to develop a degree of employment that will reduce this unemployment rate which is now two or three times the national average. We want action. We want the type of action that will allow our people to remain where they are, that will allow our industries to become viable entities in the Dominion of Canada, and that will give us a place in the future of this country, something we have failed to receive from this government today.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, every year parliament goes through this same process and deals with this same kind of measure. About the only difference in the script is the amount of money involved. Every year we put up with the spectacle of the parliament of Canada bailing out the CNR from under debt charges that it should not be expected to carry. When the Canadian National Railways system was formed in 1923, and ever since, the deck has been stacked against it in favour of the economic pirates who promoted and invested in several railways that subsequently went belly up. The deck has been stacked to make sure that those people are paid off. They have been but the people of Canada have been paying ever since, and are still paying.

Some sizeable part of the money provided by this bill is for the payment of a deficit resulting from the interest that has been charged the CNR on this debt in the past year. Much of that debt is a result of the financing and refinancing of the Canadian National Railways system since 1923. When the Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern, probably the three main railways, were going bankrupt they were formed into the CNR system. Their indebtedness was taken over by the Canadian National Railways system, and in the years since the Canadian National Railways and the Parliament of Canada have been paying, paying and paying. This suits very well the people who do not like publicly owned enterprises of any kind and in particular do not like a publicly owned railway system. Since 1923 it has suited their purpose to hold up the Canadian National Railways system as a terrible example of how public ownership does not work and how private ownership is holy, pure, successful, efficient and so on. The myth has been perpetrated and perpetuated by these free enterprise opponents of publicly owned enterprise that the CNR somehow is bad because it always loses money and is publicly owned.

The facts are otherwise. The Canadian National Railways system in most years has shown operating profits. In 17 of the last 24 years it has shown a railway operating profit. In 21 of the last 24 years, after considering income from other operations such as hotels and telegraph services, it has shown an operating profit. Of the last 24 years only in the years 1958, 1960 and 1962 was there a loss on the Canadian National Railways system. One could become involved in unkind partisan arguments by trying to make a case that this might have had a relationship to the government of the day, but I shall not do that. I think it had to do mostly with the type of debt load with which the CNR has had to contend since 1923. I should like to quote from the Winnipeg Tribune of April 25 last. This article points out the following:

> The CNR made an operating profit of about $41,000,000, in 1968, its annual report disclosed Thursday, but its accountants had to use red ink once more because of the debt burden that goes back to the founding of the nationally-owned railway in 1923.

This report points out that the net income, before interest on the debt, was $41,274,438 but that the interest on the debt was $70,450,968. This means that parliament must vote another $29,176,530 to wipe out that interest debt. The article continued:

> The CNR carries a burden of fixed-charge debt inherited from the several bankrupt railways whose operations it took over when it was formed. As of last Dec. 31, its total long-term debt was $1,919,560,709, including bonds amounting to $1,132,903,264.

So long as the Canadian National Railways system is required by this Parliament to operate under such conditions it can never operate efficiently and can never provide an effective transportation service for the Canadian people. So long as this system of ours is expected to operate under these conditions, it must continue to fight a losing battle in attempting to remain a healthy and viable operation. As it loses its viability, it automatically decreases the service it can provide to the Canadian people.

The operating statements of the Canadian National Railways over the past 24 years I believe indicate that there has been efficient management in the face of these debts, that there have been competent employees and that a massive effort has been made to succeed in operating the Canadian National Railways system in the face of the horrendous obstacles this parliament has continually placed before it. I mentioned earlier that in only three of the last 24 years has the system shown an operating loss. In all the other 21 years there has been an operating profit. It is very interesting to note that the peak period in respect of number of employees was in the year 1952 when there were 131,297 employees. Today, there are 85,240 employees, some 46,000 fewer. I submit that this says something pretty good about their productivity and competence in operating our nationally owned railway system.

In spite of having 46,000 fewer employees, the railway has a larger amount of freight ton mile revenue and other kinds of revenue than it ever had before. The issue of passenger business is confronting members of this House and the people of Canada as a result of applications by both railways to further decrease their passenger services. Even in this area, however, the Canadian National Railways system, I submit, has made a very good effort in the face again of great obstacles at a time when all other private railway carriers in North America have thrown up their hands in despair. Back in the period 1944-45, the Canadian National Railways system was operating some 3,338,000 revenue passenger miles. By 1962 this figure had dropped to a low point of 1,044,000 revenue passenger miles. In the face of that, the CNR did not give up. It began a program of modernization and expansion of passenger operations by means of publicizing and persuading the public to use railway transportation.

Since that low point in 1962, the number of revenue passenger miles has climbed to 2,046,000, equivalent to the kind of passenger business the company was doing in 1947. Admittedly, costs are a great deal higher now than they were then, but the evidence is conclusive that the company has made a conscientious and consistent effort to regain and restore passenger service to something near former levels in this country. I submit that the management and the employees of that nationally-owned transportation company deserve the thanks and the compliments of the House and of the people of Canada.

They have a long road before them yet. Many more improvements and developments are needed in the passenger service as well as in all other aspects of railroading, but at least they have been trying, which is much more than can be said for their main competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway. Our publicly owned national railway system has never had a fair chance to operate successfully. It has been and still is burdened with a debt load that prevents it from paying an investment return to the people of Canada and, even more important, that prevents it from doing an even better job in providing service. We have been lucky that this company has done as well as it has. The previous and present management and employees are to be congratulated. No privately owned system could operate under the same debt burden as has the CNR. If a privately owned system tried, it would have been bankrupt a long time ago.

While the CNR and the people of Canada continue to pay and pay dearly, its competitor, the CPR thrives on gifts from the people of Canada which, since 1881, have returned dividends to this corporation and its shareholders amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. I think one could safely say they have been in excess of $3 billion. Surely, this kind of situation in our rail transportation is grossly unfair to the management and the employees of the CNR and to all the people of Canada.

Governments of Canada since 1923, when the CNR was set up, have been refinancing the national railway in various ways such as buying up bonds and advancing funds. They have always done it in such a way as to completely safeguard the interests of the original investors of the bankrupt railways. Those who had investments in the old Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern Railways have all received the full return on their moneys. None of them is still alive but the railways are still paying. I suspect that the original investments have been repaid two or three times over and we are still paying.

Contrast that with the attitude of this and of previous Canadian governments to their own employees. The government and the CNR management—and here I must be somewhat critical of the CNR management—have always been able to find ways of persuading this Parliament to provide moneys for such things as equipment and for buying up old bonds. However, they have not been able to devise a way whereby some money could be included in Bill C-7 or in previous bills of this kind to do something about the pensions of retired CNR employees. Whether there is only one of them or one million, the fact that we would require formal loyal employees of ours to exist on the kind of pensions that some are now receiving is something of which all in this chamber should be ashamed.

As of October 7 last year, in a return filed in answer to a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), there were, believe it or not, 388 retired CNR employees receiving less than $25 a month. There were another 639 receiving between $25 and $29 a month. There were another 1,301 receiving between $30 and $39 a month. There were another 1,062 receiving between $40 and $49 a month, and until one arrives at the figure of $99.99 a month there is a total of 7,715 retired CNR employees receiving less than $100 a month as pension. I know of the case of a man who served the CNR for over 30 years who is receiving a pension of less than $35 because his service was interrupted as a result of illness. His pension benefits did not accrue until after he started working for the CNR the second time.

Every time this situation is mentioned, government members, both in the Transport Committee and in the House, agree that it is terrible. They express all kinds of sympathy and support for the idea of doing something to increase the pensions of retired CNR employees. Every minister who has ever piloted this kind of bill through the House has, at some time or other, expressed sympathy and deplored the situation, but none of them has yet brought anything to this House to deal with the matter. The CNR officials are equally vociferous in expressing their sympathy and in saying how badly they feel about it. They even promised to seriously consider ways of dealing with this matter by raising the pensions of retired CNR employees. In the Transport Committee last spring the President of the CNR, in answer to my question, promised to give serious thought to this matter. On July 29 I wrote him, and two days later I received an acknowledgment from his executive assistant. I have not heard a word from him since. It does not matter if he does not write to me, but it does matter that he should do something about the over 7,000 retired CNR employees.

Surely this is a problem that should be solved, and provision should be made in this bill for solving it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would then not have to hound the government on this subject. He would have more time to hound them on other subjects on which action has been equally long delayed.

May I say something more about CNR financing and ask hon. members to look at the pension trust funds held by the CNR. According to the company's annual report there is supposed to be $1,414,744,000 in that fund, but there is only $743 million in it. Where is the rest of the employees' pension money? The difference of $671,423,250 is owing by the CNR to the employees pension trust fund. I do not really blame the CNR for being in that situation. I suspect that in past years they have been desperate for operating funds and that when the railway system was putting up the majority of the money for pension funds they had no other choice but to use the money for railway operations.

In 1967, provision was made for the CNR to commence repaying the $671 million to the pension trust fund. So, during 1967 and 1968 they repaid with interest, slightly over $3 million. Mr. Speaker, the Company have allowed themselves 60 years to repay this $675 million. They are fairly safe in doing that, since it is hardly likely that all the employees of the railway would retire at once.

• (3:40 p.m.)

But surely this is a misuse of trust funds. That misuse has been caused by successive governments of Canada and successive Parliaments keeping the Canadian National Railways system continually burdened with a load of debt they cannot possibly get out from under, a burden of debt that originated with bankrupt corporate pirates who put on Canada's back railway systems that were not paying. Mr. Speaker, in the financial statement of the Canadian National Railways system this Pension liability is listed as an unfunded liability. All that really means is that the money is not in the pension trust fund. It is accountants' gobbledy-gook, and in fact what it means is that in the past this publicly owned railway system had to use their employees' pension money for other purposes.

The time has long past for members in all parties in this House to resist the passage of this bill until the government finally—after 100 years of governments that refused to come up with a national transportation policy—comes up with a transportation policy that is meaningful and purposeful in the interests of the Canadian people rather than in the interests of the bond holders and the shareholders, many of whom do not live here.

> We must resist this business of being asked year after year to vote money when we have no clear picture as to where we are going in this country in terms of transportation policy.

Those words are a direct quote from a speech made by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). To some degree I must disagree with him because I think we have had a clear picture, as clear as mud. We have had transportation policies the first purpose of which was to give great profits to a few while the public paid and paid, and rail services went through a pattern of deterioration that no self-respecting country would tolerate.

We have had policies that allowed the privately owned CPR system to be almost a law unto itself. We have had policies that have continually hamstrung and stopped our own national railway system from operating efficiently in the best interests of the people of this country. This Parliament must come to grips with the whole matter of public rather than private ownership of our railway systems. Surely, there is sufficient evidence now to convince even the most ardent opponent of public ownership that the private sector, in this particular industry at least, has failed Canada, has not acted in the best interests of the Canadian people, and has lost any right or privilege it had to operate a railway system in this nation.

The time has long past for this Parliament to enact legislation nationalizing the CPR system and merging it with our publicly owned national railway system to operate a national, efficient, effective rail transportation network throughout the entire nation. We could do it on a scale of efficiency and service which would be the envy of any other nation in the world. I, for one, Mr. Speaker, am in no hurry to see this bill pass. I hope that members on both sides of the House will agree that the bill should be held up until such time as we get at least two commitments from the government and the management of the Canadian National Railways system.

The first commitment should be that the government and the CNR management will bring in a measure in the next session of this parliament to provide for an increase in the pensions of retired CNR employees. The second commitment should be that the government will bring in measures in the next session of this Parliament that will relieve the Canadian National system of at least the long-term debt which amounts to $1.9 billion; in other words, that this be written off the books. We do not want any more of those half-made commitments, "Yes, we are going to consider it seriously," and "Yes, we will announce it in due time as government policy," for that will take too many years.

Most of this debt consists of money now owing by the CNR to the people of Canada as a result of advances and loans. In fact, there were a couple of hundred million dollar interest free loans. Further, Mr. Speaker, I think that the measure should include a grant totalling $675 million to allow for the full refunding of the CNR employees' pension fund. The $1.9 billion plus the $675 million would, for the first time, give the CNR a chance to operate efficiently and effectively, and would lift from its back this burden of debt which was none of its fault. This course would allow the publicly owned system to show the privately owned operators how to run a railway, once it was free of this debt that the management could never repay even if they lived 1000 years.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I hope members in all parties will take part in this debate. My goodness, it is 46 years since this annual bill first appeared. I hope members will ask that the government of Canada bring in measures that will put an end to this spectacle that we go through every year. If that is done it will give the people of Canada—I believe it is efficient now—a more efficient and effective publicly owned railway transportation system that can do a much better job than it has been doing in the past.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of criticism of the CNR and of our railroads in general across the country. Indeed, I do not recall hearing very many words of praise for the CNR. In my maiden speech a year ago last September I stated that the railway in my part of the country was better 50 years ago than it is today, and that is a fact.

There is something wrong somewhere. Perhaps there is room for criticism, but perhaps there is also room for alternative suggestions. Certainly, the holding up of this bill in this House is hardly a way to change a system, because it is the whole system that is at fault. It does not matter what government is in power, the independence of an organization like the CNR is such that the government actually does not have the control it needs over that organization, and certainly the elected representatives of the people who are paying the bills do not have enough control over that body or over any other Crown body.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): The railroad complains about losing money on its passenger services so it wants to cut out several of them. It separates the revenue obtained from passenger service from that obtained from the freight service. For its own purposes this may be very good but as far as the people are concerned it is the same railroad. In an area such as mine, Northern Ontario, where the railroad is making a great deal of profit from freight, the people do not see why some of that profit cannot be applied to the deficit on passenger service. How do we explain that to the people? How do we explain it to anyone who goes into a store and knows that a certain part of that store is not making money but the over-all operation is. They know that the owner would not think of closing down the part that is not making money because he needs the total operation to make it a going concern. They feel that if the railroad company is losing money on the passenger service—and I will not agree that it should—but is making a profit on freight in the same area, there is no reason why both services should not be kept in operation in such circumstances.

It is amazing, Mr. Speaker, what one learns from talking to those who work for the railroad. I have recently discovered the means used by the management of the CNR to exaggerate losses in the passenger service and I call it nothing less than "cooking the books". I will give certain examples.

There is one train in my riding which could be pulled by one unit but four are used in order to increase the cost and show a deficit on that service. When the service between Kapuskasing and Hearst was taken off two years ago, the reason given was that it was losing money. Certainly, not too many people were using the train because of the expense. They had to go from Hearst to Kapuskasing by car in order to take a sleeper as it was not economical to do so in Hearst. This is not mentioned and it is only people at the source who can tell about it. Certainly, the CNR officials would not disclose that. In Hearst there used to be a shop for engines. The cost of this shop was shown as part of the deficit on the passenger service when that service was removed. But, Mr. Speaker, that shop happens to be a plywood plant and has been for many years. This is a subtle example of one of the methods used to increase deficits and is the kind of thing they have used in the past. I suggest they are not going to get away with it in the future.

I have seen cases where the rates were raised in order to discourage people from using the train. I accuse the railways of scheduling trains to discourage people from using them. When I travel to my riding by train I return on the overnight train from Kapuskasing or Cochrane and I must change trains at North Bay in the middle of the night. One hour before that train arrives at North Bay, the through train to Montreal has gone so one has to sit there for eight hours waiting for the next train. One would think that they leave North Bay as soon as they hear the whistle of the train from the North. I see the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has just come in and he can verify that statement.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

Mr. Peters: That's right.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): This is the type of train scheduling which discourages people from using them. Now if I want to take a train, I go to Toronto and fly from there.

This is not the type of organization that is conducive to encouraging people to use trains and thereby overcome the so-called deficit. This poor service seems to permeate the CNR, and other railroads as well, but we are speaking specifically about the CNR today and I shall confine my remarks to that company. The poor service also extends to the dining car and everything else which generally discourages people from using trains. Most people would rather fly or drive but some parts of the country are not easily accessible by plane or car and it would be a great advantage in such areas to have a decent train service. My area is in that situation.

I believe that a great deal of the losses claimed by the CNR are due to mismanagement and mishandling and I should like to give some specific examples. There is a train from Quebec City which comes via the Montreal area through the Abitibi region to Cochrane. In a specific case that I know of 15 colour televisions worth $1,000 each were sitting in the express car, to be delivered to Amos, Quebec, in the Abitibi area. These were handled in such a way that only five of the 15 were serviceable. There were damage claims for the other ten and that meant $10,000 worth of claims against the railroad. Now, that amount is charged against the passenger service budget.

A train which carries express has to stop at several stations for which it has goods and sit there for 20, 30 or 40 minutes while the express is unloaded. For a passenger, this is a very discouraging factor. The train from Quebec City through the Abitibi region averages 22 miles an hour from Quebec City to Fitzpatrick. In this day and age, Mr. Speaker, I think most people would prefer to walk rather than use a train which averages 22 miles an hour.

I know it is easy to criticize, but perhaps there are other things that we can do. We can make suggestions on how the poor service can be overcome. Several groups in my part of the country and I personally, have suggested re-routing one of the transcontinental trains. Instead of bringing it through the bush country where next to nobody is served, it should come through the tritown area, that is the Abitibi area, the Cochrane area and the Hearst area, and join up with the main line at Nakina.

There has been no formal reply to this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, just the usual acknowledgement of my letter. A brief was sent in as a result of a conference which took place in Cochrane subsequent to my own suggestion, but there has been absolutely no argument forthcoming from the CNR as a result. I suggest the reason is that they cannot offer good grounds to rebutt these suggestions.

Privately, the company has breathed certain thoughts about the roadbed not being up to par and that the CTC, (which is an automatic signalling device) is not available on the northern line of the CNR. Surely, with one passenger train in that area such a system is hardly required; it could easily be fitted in with the freight train schedule. If the line is to be kept open a certain amount of upgrading of the roadbed must take place in any case and in the meantime the trains could take it a little more slowly. We have shown by the proposed schedules that the train could go through that area and still save time, even with poor roadbeds in certain parts of the north country.

For some time now, Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing a great deal about the development of Northern Ontario and how to encourage people to live there. This year the government passed a bill to encourage new industries to open in the area and have given incentive grants. But how can we expect people to come if we offer poor transportation services? Just about a month after a program was started to encourage people to move north, the railroad stated that it wished to cancel the existing inadequate service.

I believe that a transportation system properly run and managed should not lose money. This is borne out by the action of the courageous gentleman in Barrie who ran a special train to Toronto and made money. It seems to me that these losses indicate poor management and we, who represent the people of Canada, should examine that aspect a little more closely. I believe that the board of the CNR should include members who are elected by the people. What is wrong with putting a member of Parliament on the board of a Crown corporation? It has been done elsewhere; but we, in Ottawa, always seem to shy away from the idea. Yet, when we ask a minister in the House a question about a Crown corporation, the first thing we hear is that Crown corporations are independent, that they must run their own affairs and that we cannot interfere. It is the system that is wrong and that is why I take to task the previous hon. member who spoke about this government not taking its responsibilities seriously. I do not care whether a Liberal, Tory or NDP government is in power, so long as the present system exists we shall not be able to control the CNR or any other Crown corporation. We should decide, therefor, that there must be more representatives of the people on the boards of those corporations. That is why I advocate a member of Parliament being a representative on Crown Boards and agencies. Are we that stupid that we are not capable of serving on such boards? Of course, many public servants think we are stupid; we are treated with contempt by many of them.

But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that on some boards the government has formed, and the National Arts Centre is a case in point, there is not one member who is as highly qualified to serve as several hon. members in this House. So far as the CNR is concerned, the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) who sits behind me in the House and who has had several years service with the CNR probably knows more about the CNR and matters of transportation than any member of the present board of directors of the CNR. Certainly, there is no reason in the world why members of this House should not serve on the boards of Crown corporations. That is why I feel that until this House decides that we must have greater control over the way people's money is spent, we shall continue to be confronted with the same difficulty.

The hon. member who preceded me spoke of holding up this bill because year after year we must approve the allocation of a certain amount of money. It is true that we go through this every year and that is futile, but we shall not get anywhere by refusing to pass the bill because the railway must continue to operate. It is the system that must be changed, and there is only one way to change it. We ought to change it right here in this House so that hon. members of this House may serve on the boards of directors of Crown corporations.

Mr. Charles A. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, when he introduced this bill on November 13, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) told us that a similar bill to appropriate funds for the CNR and Air Canada has come before Parliament year after year, the exception being those two years that were combined. I believe an hon. member who preceded me said that this has been going on for 45 years. I do not know whether that is quite accurate, but the mere fact that we have been doing something for 45 years does not mean that we are going about it the right way. I join with many spokesmen on this side of the House who have complained about this being a useless exercise. Here we are being asked to approve the granting of some $200 million already spent. What is the good of this? What if we say that we will not grant the money? It has been spent. We are also asked to approve another $82 million, I believe, to be spent between January and July 1, 1970 for obligations incurred prior to January, 1967. In other words, that $82 million is also committed. This, I feel, is the most unbusinesslike way of handling finances that I have ever run across. Although we cannot do anything about the money that has been spent, I feel that we should demand some accounting so that if these moneys are requested, in future years at least we will have some idea what these corporations are doing with the money. But here we are presented with a fait accompli; the money is spent and we cannot do anything about it now. I think each and every one of us should examine these items closely in committee to make sure the money has been spent properly, so that in future years we may have some basis for a decision.

In this modern day and age nothing is more important to a country like ours than transportation, and it certainly behooves us to know what the government plans to do. Does it have a comprehensive transportation scheme? Does it have a plan to hook up outlying parts of Canada with the centre, provide passenger service and provide for the movement of freight? I say this afternoon that despite all the committees the government appointed, despite all the reports that have been brought in about the Atlantic area and other areas, the entire subject of transportation today lies in greater confusion than ever before.

Although I was not a member of this House in 1967 when the National Transportation Act was introduced, I read many of the pertinent debates and speeches of opposition spokesmen. Many of those spokesmen are in the House today. I agree with many of the objections raised at that time by the opposition.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

Government supporters contended the act would be the be-all and end-all for transportation. There we were, setting up the board under this czar, this renowned expert on transport who would immediately solve all our difficulties. I say that if the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) is complaining about members of Parliament not having anything to do with the operation of the CNR he ought to point his finger at the government which brought in the National Transportation Act, because the Act makes it impossible for the ordinary member of Parliament or any other person to question the activities of the CNR. That is where the blame lies.

Some of the confusion the National Transportation Act created has been much in evidence recently, as shown by the recent unprecedented action by the Air Traffic Association of Canada. That body, in a unanimous vote, condemned the Air Traffic Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission for its absolute failure to come up with any workable and enforceable air traffic regulations. Here is a body set up to devise a system of control now telling us, in effect, "The regulations are not workable or enforceable, and therefore are not being enforced". In other words, carriers are running rampant and not paying attention to schedules or regulations. In this area the CTC has fallen down completely.

Again, let me cite as evidence what happened at the recent meeting in Toronto of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario. Here we have a body composed of the operators of probably one of the fastest growing segments of our transport system. Here again, we find a body harshly condemning the Canadian Transport Commission for failure to act in their area. These people say in effect that because the government has failed to announce its intentions with regard to implementing Part III of the Transport Act, a rash of provincial regulations has sprung up which is crippling the work of the association. I am pleased to hear that these people are meeting in Ottawa today and I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) will be able to make an announcement to the House soon with regard to Part III of the act.

The failure of the Canadian Transport Commission to operate effectively is underlined by the recent action on the part of the railway companies in applying for the abandonment of some 31 passenger trains. I shall not discuss the details of these applications—that is the job of the Transport Commission—but I do wish to point out that these applications for permission to abandon passenger service have caused a great deal of worry and concern in many areas of Canada.

By way of illustration I should like to read into the record a letter from the President of the Moncton Board of Trade addressed to Mr. D. H. Jones, Chairman of the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. It states:

> Dear Mr. Jones:
>
> The Moncton Board of Trade were shocked to read news reports last week that The Canadian National Railway has filed application to discontinue passenger rail service between Saint John and Moncton. We feel that this service is a most important link between two of Atlantic Canada's major cities and in some weather conditions the only reasonable means of travel. We are also concerned that discontinuance of this service will seriously inconvenience many Canadians living between Moncton and Saint John who use this means of transportation to travel to our City and to Saint John to do their shopping.

The letter goes on to say:

> We feel this idea is particular folly at a time when the federal and provincial governments are taking action and spending a great deal of funds to develop Canada's Atlantic region.

Because I was concerned about this facet of the procedure I asked the Minister of Transport in the House one day last week what he intended to do in response to this proposal by the railways which would effectively destroy any attempt by his colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to build up industry and improve employment prospects in that region. The minister replied that he would do what he could to prevent any such action taking place. I hope the Minister of Transport was sincere and that he will exert every effort to ensure that employment prospects are not cut down because of unilateral proposals on the part of the railways.

The letter continues:

> Although we as businessmen understand the CNR's concern about continuing a service that is losing money, we also realise that all businesses, particularly in the service and transportation industries, have to provide some services which may not be as profitable as others. We feel this route is one such service that our national railway must be prepared to provide in the public interest along with its other routes that are profitable.

This letter expresses the concern felt among the business community. The labour community shares this anxiety. Railway workers, in particular, are upset; they do not know when their jobs will end; they do not know which lines will be discontinued. I received a telegram from one of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen locals expressing concern about the probable loss of jobs following the abandonment or curtailment of passenger services. I was in touch with the sender of this telegram recently, and after talking the situation over I believe I can assure him that the loss of jobs will not be as severe as he fears. Here, I give full marks to the CNR; they are doing everything they can to cushion the impact of the action which the company has proposed.

I cannot go along with those who are always ready and willing to take a swipe at the CNR. In this connection I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). In my opinion, he stated the position very well and very clearly. I feel that in the past few years the CNR has made every effort to modernize its system, and done everything it could to introduce businesslike methods. It has computerized a large part of its operations, introduced new types of services, and so on. I honestly believe the CNR is making a real, one hundred per cent effort to keep going. I say again that the blame for the present unsettled situation rests clearly with the Canadian Transport Commission.

Here before me is an act drawn up in 1967 which states that all transportation services in the country should be compensatory; that if it can be shown that the railways are losing money, and if it is proved that these services are essential, the companies can be subsidized up to 80 per cent. To my mind this is nothing but a licence to steal. Can you blame the railways if they juggle their figures a bit when they have been told that if they can show a loss they will get subsidies up to 80 per cent? Would it not have been much better and more sensible to have written a provision into the act to the effect that the railways must produce their costs for inspection by the railway transport committee of the CTC? Then, if subsidies are in order, let them be granted. Why throw the people of Canada into a state of anxiety because the railways are encouraged to follow the stupid method of making a blanket application to abandon every passenger line in the country? No wonder business is upset. No wonder people are worried.

The fact that the applications have been made cannot be changed now. This is the procedure which has been provided in the act. I for one do not believe for a moment that the CNR has any hope or any intention of abandoning all its passenger services. I am thoroughly convinced this action was taken in the hope that these services would be declared essential and would therefore be subsidized. But the applications have been made; the damage has been done. Now, it is up to the CTC to act, and to act quickly. If, as an hon. member has suggested, there has been any monkeying with the books, if some of the costing procedures of the CNR are not satisfactory, let the CTC examine this aspect of the applications and make its findings known. If the figures are not satisfactory, let the committee tell the railway it must continue to operate these services. If, on the other hand, the CTC is satisfied that the figures are correct, that the lines are losing money and that the services are essential, let the government provide a subsidy to the CNR. But by all means keep the services going and let us get this whole situation resolved.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I was pleased to pick up a copy of the speech which Mr. Pickersgill delivered this morning to the Canadian Association of Movers. The Movers Association is mainly interested in Part III of the National Transportation Act, but fortunately Mr. Pickersgill recognizes the seriousness of these rail passenger applications and he took the time to talk to the Association about the various applications. In the course of his speech he pointed out that a section of the National Transportation Act provided that the railways should not be obliged to carry the burden of operating uneconomic services, but that this did not mean, as some people have construed, that all of the trains involved would automatically be discontinued. Then, Mr. Pickersgill went on to say:

> The act places on the Canadian Transport Commission the responsibility of deciding whether a particular service is not required in the public interest and therefore should be discontinued or whether the public need requires that it be kept in operation—with compensation.

In other words, at public expense. Then, he went on to say something that I think should be on the record:

> In essence, what the Commission must do in each case is to weigh the public need against the amount that the public treasury would be required to pay in order to continue the service. There are some obvious cases where passenger train service is going to have to be continued because no other alternative mode of transportation is available in the area. On the other hand, there are some services where train patronage has all but disappeared and there is no apparent justification for the use of public funds to support something the public clearly does not want.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

I think this emphasizes something that some people are not too willing to recognize. I do not think it fair to ask any carrier to continue a service which people are not using if an alternative mode of transportation is available. We must be reasonable about these things. We should not damage our case by demanding that all routes be subsidized holus bolus.

Mr. Pickersgill then went on to clarify the position regarding appeals, something that the hon. member for St. John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) dealt with when he spoke a couple of weeks ago. While he did not say in so many words that an appeal rests in every case, Mr. Pickersgill pointed out that although the Act does not provide that hearings take place in public, his own layman's interpretation of the Act—and knowing Mr. Pickersgill, I would say his interpretation is the law—is that its provisions are very close to being mandatory on this point.

People, particularly in my area, are demanding these hearings be held. Naturally, they do not want to lose passenger services, though they recognize that some may have to go. But what they do want is some statement of policy by the government or the Canadian Transport Commission, or by somebody in authority, regarding these applications for abandonment.

Although these applications were filed almost two months ago, the railways are still waiting for an indication from the CTC when these applications will be heard. In the meantime, people are wondering what is going to happen. Just like a snowball rolling downhill, rumours are starting to fly. First of all 50 people are going to be laid off; this figure grows to 100 and then to 200. Then, it is rumoured that all these services will be discontinued. The Minister of Transport should take the lead in getting the Canadian Transport Commission to take action on these applications without further delay.

The people in the Atlantic provinces are still waiting for some clear statement of policy from the government. The Minister of Transport tells the House one thing; then he goes to a public meeting and makes a different statement. For example, he told this House that the freeze on freight rates would remain until such time as a complete overhaul of transportation policy for the maritimes had been made. Then, we hardly have time to get home and read the newspapers before the minister has announced that the freeze has been lifted. How can we in the Atlantic provinces have any faith in the statements of this government?

An editorial in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal in October, 1969, dealt with the effect of this action on the region in an article headed "Erratic rates harm region". The article commences:

> No businessman in the Atlantic provinces has the least idea from one day to the next how much it is going to cost to bring raw materials in or ship products out.

The editorial points out that freight rates which had been frozen for two and a half years to allow this government to develop a transportation policy for the maritimes had suddenly been lifted. As a result, railway freight rates shot up 9 to 18 per cent at once, and they are expected to go higher in the immediate future.

There has also been confusion over the railway's announcement that it would cancel rates on less than carload lots and bring in higher express rates for the area. I must give the Minister of Transport credit: On this occasion he acted promptly and the railways deferred action. The minister then went on to refer to the federal-provincial committee and intimated the committee might recommend removal of some of the subsidies in the area, though did not say whether the subsidies were on lumber, fish or potato shipments. As a result, no shipper in the area knows whether to expect 20 per cent higher freight costs or 40 per cent. In fact, they have no idea what is coming next.

The editorial to which I have referred concludes with this paragraph:

> We need a new transportation policy, without a doubt. The rest of Canada got a new deal in March, 1967, and this region was promised one at that time.

The latest blow to this region, though all parts of Canada will feel the impact, is the announcement made by the express carriers, including not only rail but air carriers, that as of December 1 shipments of flowers and horticultural products will be accepted only if the consignors assume all risk of loss or damage from frost. This may seem a minor item, but to the florists, of whom there are a great many in this country, it is a very serious blow. In most regions in the Atlantic provinces the only way to ship such products is by express freight. In effect, the express carriers are telling these producers that all shipments will be made at their own risk.

I am sure the House can see the possibilities that can arise here. According to an editorial I have here, if the railway is entirely freed from responsibility for frost damage to these shipments, any concern to prevent such loss will largely evaporate. Wide open exemption invites careless handling. In other words, why worry too much about these products if you are not responsible for their loss anyway?

I lay the blame for this situation on the railways, and I suggest the Minister of Transport take immediate action to correct it. When he was replying to a question in the House on Friday, I was pleased to hear the minister say that a meeting was being held on Monday in Ottawa with the parties concerned and that he was hopeful the matter would be resolved. No announcement has been made in the House so far, but perhaps we will hear either today or tomorrow that the Minister of Transport has taken action to correct the situation. Although this problem is faced by the whole of Canada, I speak for the Atlantic region since I am naturally more familiar with that area than the rest of the country.

The blame for not introducing a transportation policy in the maritimes rests squarely on the government, and on the Canadian Transport Commission, which is a creature of the government. I submit action must be taken immediately to develop once and for all a clear and comprehensive transportation policy for the Atlantic region.

In so far as Air Canada is concerned, I have no great complaint, although again I complain about this method of financing. I think we have a government service which is one of the best in the world. It has been recognized as such and we rightly should be proud of it. In some areas the service could be improved. I feel that interregional traffic, for example, could be better handled than it is at the present time. The whole system of scheduling should be revised.

Perhaps I am bearing a personal cross here because I am thinking particularly of my own experience. The flight leaves Moncton for Montreal and lands at Montreal airport half an hour after the Ottawa flight has left. This means that a traveller has to stay at the Montreal airport for two hours waiting for the next flight. It seems ridiculous that this jet flight from Toronto to Montreal to Moncton, which arrives at 11 o'clock in the morning at Moncton, should sit for an hour and thirty-five minutes, to my knowledge not being serviced other than refuelled, then head back to Saint John and Montreal, arriving after the Ottawa flight has left. Why could the flight not be scheduled to connect with the plane coming in from Sept-Iles? It could be set back half an hour and connect with the scheduled flight from Moncton. You would then have a connection.

These are some of the things people are complaining about in respect of Air Canada. They have in mind the intercity service between Halifax and Moncton, two of the largest centres in this area. There are only two flights from Halifax. You leave there at 8:30 or 9 and there is no other flight until eleven o'clock. All that is involved is a revision of the schedule to fit what people want and will use.

Before we give this bill second reading, I invite other members of the House to state their views. I feel it should be examined very closely and carefully by the committee. There are many things that should be corrected in the future, and until such time as the committee is able to give these things careful consideration we will never have a proper and comprehensive transportation policy in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the matter presently being studied reads in part as follows:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill C-7, An Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada—

In fact, what the Canadian National Railways want the House to do this afternoon, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), is to vote the amounts they need to provide Canadians with certain services and to continue their operations.

The CNR management is asking me, as the representative of some 60,000 citizens in the riding of Madawaska-Victoria, to approve these credits, but I am not willing to do so until I have succeeded in clarifying certain things. What I am asking the CNR management is to tell me clearly what I will get in return.

Moreover, somewhere in this House, perhaps hiding behind the curtains, there are some CNR representatives. In fact, there are always some of them when we debate this measure here.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

[English]

The Canadian National Railways has a certain way of putting things to our Canadian citizens. For one thing, it is constantly putting out fancy press releases which accomplish absolutely nothing in the way of explaining why it does certain things such as cutting down services and abandoning passenger service. They do not explain why it downgrades train passenger service. I have one here dated November 5, 1969 in which the CNR is acting as they say, under the Canadian Transport Commission procedures for the rationalization of Canadian passenger services. The CNR announces several adjustments in train services. This adjustment and rationalization procedure is well known to all members of this House, and indeed to all Canadians.

This press release reads:

Canadian National Railways, acting under Canadian Transport Commission procedures for rationalization of passenger service, today announced several adjustments in train services.

It goes on to state that all this is "part of a continuing program under which, in accordance with the National Transportation Act and recent orders issued by the CTC" it is intended to tailor passenger services to current market demands. I do not know what that means. The press report continues to explain what the CNR intends to do without giving any explanation as to what this intention means. We have to run around like crazy rats to find out what is going on in CN administration. Still, we do not get any answers from anyone.

The press release continues:

Mr. Roberts said that CN's passenger policy remains unchanged—"to eliminate the passenger deficit, not the passenger business."

Mr. Roberts is general manager of passenger sales and services. I cannot explain this statement and I am sure the CN cannot explain it either. The press release goes on to speak of adjustments and more tailoring. What the CN is doing is not tailoring or adjusting, it is terminating services to Canadian people. I could not agree more with members who spoke previously this afternoon. In fact, I tend to agree with them entirely on a non-partisan basis.

Mr. N. J. MacMillan, Q.C., chairman and president of the CNR, in a letter of November 13, 1969 to the President of the Edmundston Chamber of Commerce had this to say about the change in the type of passenger train service on the CN's Halifax-Edmundston-Montreal run. What they are actually doing there is taking off the full passenger train from what we call the transcontinental run, which cuts across New Brunswick and into Montreal, and putting it on the intercolonial run which goes up the north shore into Montreal. They are replacing the Ocean Limited, which was a full service with sleeping and dining facilities and which operated at night. The CN proposes a rail-liner type of service, which is most inefficient as I will show a little later.

Mr. MacMillan, in giving reasons for taking away the Ocean Limited from the transcontinental line and putting the service on the Intercolonial line, said that the Ocean Limited via Edmundston was a test conducted to determine the volume of passenger traffic that could be generated by providing full sleeping and dining car service. It might have been a test, and I will come back to that a little later.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Again the vice-president Atlantic region of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. J. W. C. MacDougall, is quoted as saying in a press release that the operation of the Ocean Limited via Edmundston was part of a test conducted by CN to determine the volume of passenger traffic through central New Brunswick. I shall come back to that again. Finally, there is a letter from Mr. D. Lacombe, public relations manager of the Canadian National Railways Atlantic region, dated November 13, in which he states that the changes affecting Edmundston were solely the subsitution of another type of service and did not involve abandonment. Consequently, this change did not involve the Canadian Transport Commission. That is quite evident. Then, at page 2 of his long letter to me he said that he had hoped the service would prove to be a commercial success but, like the people of Edmundston, he was disappointed.

I say to Mr. Lacombe, to the Atlantic vice-president and to the chairman of the board, that the Ocean Limited was not a success because the CNR did not try to make it a success. It is as plain as that, and I shall quote facts later to prove it. To the people in my area and in the general area of central New Brunswick, which includes the capital city of Fredericton, Edmundston and into Quebec, this train service is essential. If the CPR should be authorized to abandon its train service through Maine there will be nothing left for the good people of Fredericton to travel on when they wish to go into central Canada except the air service. This is insufficient, especially in view of the very bad roads one must travel on when entering the province of Quebec at the New Brunswick border about 20 miles from Edmundston. This really is a bloody shame.

Mr. Winch: It is a joke.

Mr. Corbin: Sure, it is a joke. The whole CNR operation is a joke. We in this House are being made to look like fools. They want a "yes" from us but they will not guarantee anything to members of this House, nothing whatsoever. I brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) certain facts regarding the Ocean Limited. I shall deal with those right now. I have received mountains of letters and telegrams from people in my area protesting this change of service. I have answered every one of them by saying it is just impossible for me to do anything directly and that it is impossible for the Minister of Transport to intervene directly. The only door open to us now is that of the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, Mr. Pickersgill. We do not know what he will do about this.

Mr. Macquarrie: I could tell you.

Mr. Corbin: I will give him one chance. I will await one reply, and if it is not the type of reply I want I will return to this subject on another occasion in this House. When the CNR officials informed me of a rail-liner service originating from Edmundston to Moncton and Montreal, with Edmundston to be the central departing point, I immediately protested to the government and the Minister of Transport. I was informed that there was not much they could do in the circumstances. It is quite clear in everyone's mind that the CNR has taken the first and necessary step to eliminate completely all types of passenger service from the transcontinental line. It is evident it can reduce, on its own initiative, or change completely the present type of service on that line from dining and sleeping facilities to a simple rail-liner without reference to the Canadian Transport Commission. That is evident. If it had announced full abandonment of passenger service, with the elimination of the Ocean Limited, the public reaction would have been too strong and the Canadian Transport Commission would have ordered the CN to maintain that service because it is an essential service.

The CNR officials, particularly the schemers, will not be surpassed in brains. They are pretty smart people. Therefore, both from a public relations point of view and with regard to overcoming the CTC obligation to safeguard the public interest, it will be definitely very much easier for the CNR at a later date, in the not too distant future, after the proposed introduction of the rail-liner service, to seek complete abandonment of all types of passenger service on the transcontinental line through New Brunswick. The CNR will win its point simply because introduction of the rail-liner will not meet the requirements of our travelling public and consequently it will not be patronized, with the exception possibly of the Edmundston to Moncton run which I agree may not be too bad with a rail-liner.

Our problem is in getting to Montreal and central Canada. A rail-liner just will not do. I will not attempt to present arguments to show that the people in the areas along the transcontinental line are not to blame for lack of support of the Ocean Limited. However, if the CNR would only be fair with us I feel sure, as do a lot of people in Madawaska, Victoria and Fredericton, that it could not prove its point. If the CNR wishes to clear the transcontinental line for the exclusive use of freight trains and unit trains why does it not say so publicly; why is it playing games with people, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Corbin: I for one will not hesitate to affirm, as I did last year in the House of Commons, that the CNR has definitely not shown sufficient co-operation and public relations in promoting its passenger service in our area, and indeed in many areas of Canada as we have heard this afternoon. Yet, in spite of that crying lack of public relations and promotion, our people consistently have patronized the Ocean Limited when going to Montreal and back because this is the only means of travel to Montreal and back, especially in the winter months. That is particularly true in respect of business and industrial representatives.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Corbin: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: I share the views the hon. member is expressing so eloquently, but I should like to ask him why he did not speak up when the CNR was pulling its passenger service out of Newfoundland because the effect of that in my province is the same as the effect of the railway's plans in his constituency.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is very eloquent in respect of his own riding and, in my opinion, last year defended very well the point he just raised. I speak for my region, and I trust he speaks very well for his own region.

It is not just a matter of choosing our mode of transportation. We do not have that luxury. It is purely and simply a matter of survival. A look at a map of New Brunswick—and I wish I had a large map here to hold up—will demonstrate what I mean. Edmundston is located 200 miles from Quebec city and Route 20 to Montreal which is an excellent route. It is 200 miles from the Fredericton airport. We have no other means of access to central Canada except by road and one travels this road at his own risk and peril during the winter months. The province of Quebec has not to this date, since the introduction of the Trans-Canada highway road-building program—indeed it has only this summer begun preliminary work—constructed its Trans-Canada segment from Quebec city to the New Brunswick border, a distance of 200 miles.

The anticipated date of completion is perhaps 1972, but one never knows with the province of Quebec. We are at the full mercy of Quebec with regard to access roads to central Canada. The average snowfall in the fair city of Edmundston, and the general area I represent, is 120 inches per winter in a period of four months. Last year we recorded well over 160 inches, and that is a lot of snow. Travel by road to Quebec city during the four winter months is, even today, undertaken on the old route No. 2 at one's own risk and peril. We have a bus service, but people use it mainly for short trips. We do not have a regularly scheduled air service to Montreal because we do not have a paved or safe airstrip at the present and because, in my opinion, EPA seems to be hogging the air service in the Maritimes and it gives service only to whom it pleases.

We are thankful for the service on the Ocean Limited. It is not the best of trains; it could be a little cleaner and it could be run a little better. The reservation system on the train could be much better, but we have it and we use it. We are not by any means in love with the Ocean Limited but we use it because it is the only reliable service at our disposal. During the summer our roads and those in the province of Quebec are overcrowded with tourists. This is another handicap when we have to travel to Montreal, Toronto or Ottawa.

I would like to remind hon. members, as I did last year, that CNR opposed Quebecair's application to serve our area in 1968. Perhaps the application was rejected for other reasons as well. On that occasion CNR argued that they had just introduced a passenger service in our area—that was in 1967—and a scheduled air service in and out of our area would only hurt their chances of making money. CNR tells us, on one hand, that the whole thing was just a test and, on the other hand, they want to sound serious and give the impression that they were really serving us all that time. Who in the heck are they bluffing? CNR may not be making money by running the Ocean Limited through Madawaska-Victoria or central New Brunswick but it has yet to show that it is in fact losing money.

We could not care less about the names the CNR gives its trains, such as Ocean Limited, Chaleur, Cabot, or Scotian. What is in a train name anyhow? We also have trains 122 and 123 in and out of Campbellton. We want a train with sleeping and dining cars if it is to travel part of the night in and out of our area. That is the whole issue in a nutshell—the rail-liner will not provide us with that service. Furthermore, on a return trip to Montreal the proposed rail-liner, which is scheduled to go into service on January 7, would necessitate overnight accommodation in Montreal because it does not make a return trip on the same day as does the Ocean Limited now. People coming from Montreal into Edmundston could not make connections with other cities such as Grand Falls, St. Leonard, Plaster Rock and indeed Fredericton.

Again, I should like to refer to my short speech last year in the House in which I suggested to the CNR a slight modification in its return schedule to Edmundston to make the trip more bearable. Everyone would have been happy and passenger sales would have gone up in our area if the CNR had taken action on my suggestion. But I did not hear one word from them. What is a commercial success in the opinion of CNR anyhow? Is this measured in terms of the amount of money you can milk from the public, or should it not be the actual and real service which a Crown corporation renders to a group of people who do not have the luxury of choosing their mode of transport?

Again, I insist on the fact that the CNR has not shown that it is losing money on the Ocean Limited through Edmundston. It has only stated so. I suggest that it has no valid reason to take the Ocean Limited from the transcontinental line and place it on the intercolonial line where there are already three passenger train services. When the Cabot train, the forerunner of the present Ocean Limited, was introduced in 1967 on the transcontinental line, as editor of the local paper, and as a private citizen I tried to find out from CNR officials if their train was making or losing money on the transcontinental line. I received no answer whatsoever. Again, as a member of Parliament, I put the same question on the order paper, to which there was a polite refusal to give information because to do so would hurt the CNR in their competition with other transporters, or something to that effect. Yet, the CNR expects us to swallow its fancy press releases stating that the Ocean Limited is not a commercial success. I, for one, will not stand for that kind of nonsense, nor will the people I represent. I will spare the House the details of the hardships which the rail-liner would impose on me as a member of parliament travelling to the national capital and back to my riding. I will only say that with the introduction of the rail-liner, if I had to travel home on every weekend as I did last year—but this year my family is with me in Ottawa, therefore there is no necessity for me to travel back every weekend—I would lose two full days a week when the House is sitting. How am I expected to carry on my responsibilities as a member of parliament? Am I to travel on Saturdays and Sundays? I certainly will not.

An hon. Member: That will teach you to be a Liberal.

Mr. Corbin: If train travel to and from our area is to be practical, there must be night service. The travelling public will simply do what CNR has wanted all along if we do not get that, that is cease patronizing their passenger service.

I made a proposition—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being five o'clock I must interrupt the hon. member.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES ACT

AMENDMENT CONCERNING AGE DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved that Bill C-15, to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act (Age Discrimination), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-15 which is being presented this afternoon is an act to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act regarding age discrimination. The chief purpose of the bill is to add age discrimination to the list of prohibited employment practices unless age is a bona fide occupational qualification. A secondary purpose is to prohibit the employer from including in an employment application form, advertisement or written or oral inquiry, a question or request for particulars as to the applicant's race, national origin, colour, religion or age unless by reason of a bona fide occupational qualification.

Under clause 1, the present section 4 is amended by adding, where necessary, the words "or age unless age is a bona fide occupational qualification." I would ask hon. members to support this measure, and I would ask members of the government party to permit the measure to go to committee. It is of particular importance at this time. It has always been of importance, but the need for such an amendment is becoming more and more obvious.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard).]

Of course, one of the reasons is the government's policy of creating unemployment in an effort to control inflation, in my opinion a rather shortsighted approach which will not solve inflation problems but will create great hardship for many of our people. In a situation of this type, it is frequently the older worker who suffers the most. It is frequently the worker who needs employment the most who is placed at a disadvantage.

To my way of thinking another important reason is regional mobility. It is becoming obvious that some sections of the country are not able to sustain their present populations. Government policies of regional development have proven inadequate to the task, and many workers have to move from their areas of birth to new areas. This kind of regional mobility is most difficult for the older worker. Perhaps I should define what I mean by an older worker. We are not talking about somebody who is 70 years of age. Today, it seems that if one is over the age of 45 years one is subject to discrimination, except of course if one is trying to become the Prime Minister of Canada.

One of the great difficulties encountered by older workers moving from one area to another, aside from employment, is the problem of obtaining housing. Frequently their age works against the possibility of their obtaining mortgages. In every way, faced with this problem of mobility, the older worker finds himself in great difficulty.

Because of the rapid increase in technology people over the age of 45 years find that the skills they laboriously acquired through their apprenticeship, through their earlier years of training and practice, are becoming obsolete. Unfortunately, some of our manpower retraining programs do not adequately provide training opportunities and encouragement for the older worker.

One of the major problems is psychological. From my experience, and from the experience of many other people, it has been found that the older worker is a very desirable worker. Many employers have found that older workers have a great deal to offer. They have experience. They have reduced family commitments. They have reliability. They have a greater accuracy. In many cases they have greater stamina. Their continuity on the job is better than that of younger workers. They are more willing to accept shift work, and to accept training. Why then is it so difficult for some of our older workers to find employment? As I stated earlier, the problem is largely psychological.

This country and many others seem to be on a youth kick. In other words, whatever is young seems good, and if it is a little old it is not so good. It is one of the great fallacies of our time that youth, efficiency and knowledge are equated. Obviously this is not always the case. There are many desirable aspects to youth, and also many desirable aspects to those no longer young. Therefore, it is a psychological barrier that we must overcome.. I think that an amendment to the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act would go a long way toward overcoming the psychological barrier.

It may be that even this attempt through Bill C-15 to have that act amended in order to overcome the psychological barrier, and to bring in legal sanctions against those who practise discrimination because of age, may not be sufficient. In the past the government has tried to bring in programs to encourage the hiring of older workers. Unfortunately, those programs did not work. They were not effective. For a number of reasons which have never been carefully explained they fell far short of their objective.

A considerable sum of money was made available to employers if they would hire older workers. That sum of money was never used up, and many older workers were not hired. Fortunately for many of our people, particularly those who are in trade unions, there is protection under seniority rights. But for those who are not in unions, age can be a severe problem. As things stand now they do not have this protection under the law, except in some provinces. There are some provinces that offer this protection, but older workers do not have this protection in federal law, and as a result older workers are sometimes left at the mercy of their employers.

Even in the case of trade unions where there are seniority rights, problems occur over which the unions have no control. For instance, when a plant closes down and a man who has been working in it for 20 or 30 years is released his seniority is gone. He has to start all over again at the bottom and sometimes it is difficult for him to make that kind of adjustment.

Even in union shops work practices change. Because of changing technology in a plant, people are shifted and the older worker is placed at a disadvantage. What we are seeing is what some employers consider a private benefit to themselves. They seem to feel, despite evidence to the contrary, that older workers are not desirable. As a result, society generally has to pick up the cost through unemployment insurance or welfare programs of some kind or another. I think this is one of the things which must change. It is one of the areas where the government will have to bring in measures, and go beyond what I am suggesting in my bill, to see that every factory in this country is required to have a certain percentage of its employees over a certain age. It might not be enough to accept the provisions of this bill, although I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is a necessary start. The provisions of the bill would at least assist in this direction and would certainly enable us to look forward to the day when everyone accepts the necessity of ensuring equal opportunity to people beyond the age of youth.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the members of this House to accept the principle of this bill and I would ask that the government provide an opportunity for it to become law.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member from Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), who is sponsoring this bill, for deciding on Friday last to let it stand until today so that we would have a full hour for discussion. This gives me time to get my remarks on the record. I have some very definite points which I want to place on the record with regard to this act and other matters directly related to it. Many people in their forties and early fifties visit me from time to time and tell me how difficult it is to get employment today, even in private enterprise.

Before I get into the meat of my topic, there are a few remarks I should like to make in connection with the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act and possible amendments being considered to it. The experience of the federal government with the administration of this Act has been most satisfactory. During the past fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, some 73 complaints were received by the Fair Employment Practices branch. Of these, 47 relate to discrimination in employment and all were satisfactorily processed and settled. The Department of Labour has expended a great deal of effort in the educational field in encouraging fair employment practices.

The successful experience with the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act has not made the government self-satisfied, or insensitive to the possibilities of improvement in the legislation, in its administration, in the associated work of education and persuasion. Indeed, at the request of the Department of Labour, a group of officers of the Department of Labour have in recent months been examining ways and means of enhancing the value of the Act by broadening its coverage and increasing its effectiveness. Among other things, they are considering the possibility of extending the current prohibitions to discrimination based on age. Unless the age is specified in the legislation, that provision could prove to be difficult or impossible to administer.

There has also been a serious obstacle to the hiring of older workers in the form of some superannuation schemes. This will diminish through application of the Canada Pension Plan and the move toward portability of pensions. Nonetheless, at the present time, any law dealing with age discrimination should be based on careful consideration of a number of pension questions. Certainly, the same incentive program on the portability of pension plans is most desirable in many fields at this time.

In Canada, three provinces, British Columbia, Ontario and Newfoundland have fair employment practices legislation that prohibits discrimination based on age. In 1967, the United States government passed legislation of the same type. Several of the States of the United States have similar legislation. In general, these laws prohibiting age discrimination permit employers to reject older workers when the rejection is based upon bona fide occupational qualifications. Sixty-five is normally set as the maximum protected age. I should like to say to the House at this time that experience under these laws is among the factors being considered by the Department of Labour in its current re-examination of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in getting to the matters related to this Act I should like to mention some other measures which I consider discriminatory. One of these is the systems of pay zones across Canada for the public service. Today, we have 36 pay zones and this brings about many discrepancies unfair to people doing the same job in different parts of Canada.

The pay zones originated at the bargaining table with the Treasury Board acting as bargaining agent for the government and the Public Service Alliance representing the public servants. In my area, public employees are in zone 22; Ottawa is in zone 20; North Bay is in zone 18. Here we are halfway between Ottawa and North Bay and in practically every classification of job performed at Base Petawawa, Chalk River forestry station or Foymount, employees are receiving a much lower rate of pay than those doing the same work in Ottawa or North Bay.

It is not very long since we heard many speeches in this House about equal pay for equal work in the case of men and women; where women were doing the same work as men they should get equal pay. In the present case, all I am asking is that the Public Service Alliance and the Treasury Board go to the bargaining table and set the same wages for public service employees in the upper Ottawa valley who are doing the same work as those in North Bay or Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: I should like to state clearly, Mr. Speaker, that in relation to our geographical position I think it is only fair that we should be in the same classification as North Bay.

Now, I am going to give you some of these discriminatory rates, Mr. Speaker, to back up my statements with facts. These examples are taken from the general labour and trades group, non-supervisory. First, take the machine driving operating subgroup. In North Bay, an employee in classification 8 earns $2.82 an hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am just wondering how the hon. member can relate his remarks to the principle of the bill now before the House which, as I understand it, is on age discrimination and practices.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say I had very much this same misgiving. I was giving the hon. member the benefit of the doubt, but the point of order having been raised I would have to caution the hon. member that the bill before the House deals with the matter of age discrimination and invite him to restrict his remarks as closely as possible to this point.

Mr. Hopkins: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate the indulgence of other members of the House in letting me get this complaint on the record, however, because I am sure all members are interested in the prevailing labour practices. I am certainly interested in any unfair labour practices pertaining to age or otherwise as they may relate to employees in my area. That is why we are here in the House of Commons.

• (5:20 p.m.)

May I now carry on with the discussion pertaining to age. In some parts of this country, especially in areas where employment is at a low ebb, these people are usually the first to be let go. Add to this their possible low pay, and one can see in what plight these people can be. Many companies feel that it is not in their best interest to keep people over a certain age. We may live in an age of technology, but if we want a society that gives fair play to all individuals we shall certainly have to look after those people who have reached slightly more advanced ages. It is depressing for the man with a family to look after to be laid off, through no fault of his own and not find a highly paying job in private enterprise. As companies enter increasingly into the machine age, they lay off people. These people who have reached the middle or later stages of their lives must learn to re-adjust. This imposes heavy burdens on them and those at home. We have seen examples of people over 65 being quite capable of continuing work. Retiring these people early creates problems because if they have no hobby or something interesting to pass the time, time passes slowly. This upsets them, affects their health and makes it difficult for them to adjust.

Disregarding age for the moment, we ought to bring in uniform hiring practices across the country, particularly as they relate to public servants. We ought to avoid discriminatory factors which lead to our not hiring people in the mid 40's or late 50's or, when they turn to other types of employment, to paying them less than they deserve. I think it is time we had uniform pay scales throughout Canada for the Public Service. People employed by the CNR, CPR or Air Canada are paid according to uniform scales across Canada, regardless of age. The same applies to the Post Office Department where negotiations have been going on in recent years. At the bargaining table we must protect the interests of our people, regardless of age, and protect their families by making sure that no matter where they live in Canada, they are entitled to a guaranteed wage scale.

From time to time people come to my home and say, "I am 45; I have been to several places trying to find work, but no one will employ me." Where the demand for labour is strong such people are fortunate. But in slower growing areas of the country a man's age is taken into account and he may be discriminated against, where he would not be in areas of faster growth. I understand that the percentage of those unemployed in places like Kitchener is small. I imagine that in those areas people in their mid 40's are in great demand. However, in the lower paying zones of Canada, a man's advancing age creates difficulties for him. Also, if 45 or 50 year old people are forced to take lower paying jobs, it means that on retirement their pensions will be lower than those of their counterparts in the more fortunate, rapid growth regions of Canada.

In closing, may I make one plea in particular. I hope that the Public Service Alliance, representing the Public Service of Canada, and Treasury Board officials, representing the federal government, will take the question of age into consideration at the bargaining table and, in addition, take into serious consideration the discrepancy existing between wage levels in various parts of the country. At the risk of annoying you, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government to give serious consideration to putting employees in the Upper Ottawa Valley into the pay category enjoyed by employees of the North Bay zone.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I rise briefly to support the principle of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). It is evident, I think, that all hon. members of this House support the principle of this legislation. I listened with interest to the hon. member who has just spoken, the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins). While he may have indulged in some technical hairsplitting, once he returned to the main body of his remarks it became obvious that he supported the principle of the bill which, as I say, commends itself to the House.

In addition to approving of the bill in principle, all we are doing this afternoon is attempting to refer it to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, where the whole matter may be studied in detail and where witnesses testifying about unfair labour practices may be heard. We know that those unfair practices exist. During the course of his introductory remarks the hon. member for Waterloo told the House about them.

I do not wish to be accused of talking the bill out. Since I think we are all agreed about approving the bill in principle, all we are really doing is taking part in an exercise to refer the bill to a standing committee where, as I say, it will receive the detailed study and examination that is so necessary for a measure of this type which deals with discrimination against certain Canadians.

I could give the House examples of discrimination against people in the later stage of middle age, of unfair labour practices directed against the hiring of people who could, I suppose, be classed as middle aged but who are nevertheless mentally alert, physically capable and experienced by virtue of their years. As I say, I support the principle of the bill.

I note that the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration does not have an order of reference before it at the present time and I believe this bill would make an excellent order of reference; it would provide the committee with an excellent opportunity to consider the whole area of discriminatory and unfair labour practices. I hope hon. members will allow this motion to come to a vote, so that the bill may be referred to the standing committee for examination.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Come, come.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act which came into effect on July 1, 1953, is designed to prevent and eliminate practices of discrimination against persons in regard to employment and in regard to membership in a trade union because of race, national origin, colour or religion. The Liberal government of the day under the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent in proposing the Act was translating into law a basic principle of human rights. As a member of various international organizations, Canada in recent years has subscribed to general declarations of the basic rights and liberties of the individual. For instance, Canada accepted the United Nations Charter and Declaration of Human Rights, and the Declaration of Aims of the International Labour Organizations. Among the declarations of rights was one that the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act is designed to protect—the right of equality of opportunity in employment.

It is recognized that legislation alone does not entirely change the attitudes of mind which are at the root of discrimination, and the need for continued public and private educational efforts to do away with prejudice and ignorance is unfortunately very apparent. Like other federal legislation in the labour field, the act applies only to works and businesses within federal jurisdiction. These, of course, include navigation, shipping, railways, canals, telegraphs, aerodromes, airlines, radio and television broadcasting, banks and federal Crown corporations. However, like most federal labour legislation, it has had a far-reaching influence on the labour legislation of all the provinces in our country and now all ten provinces have passed similar legislation covering works and businesses within their jurisdictions.

The act states that no employer shall refuse to employ, or continue to employ, or otherwise discriminate against any person in regard to employment, or any term or condition of employment, because of his race, national origin, colour or religion. Further, an employer is not to use any employment agency which practices discrimination against persons seeking employment. Employers are not to make written or oral inquiries or use application forms relating to employment which express directly or indirectly any limitation, specification or preference based on race, national origin, colour or religion except where based on a bona fide occupational qualification. There are similar provisions against discriminatory advertising.

The act also forbids discriminatory actions by labour unions. No labour union may exclude anyone from full membership, or expel, suspend or otherwise discriminate against anyone in regard to his employment because of race, colour, national origin or religion. The act does not apply to employers of fewer than five employees, and it excludes non-profit, educational, charitable, fraternal, religious and social organizations.

While the legislation lays down penalties for positive acts of discrimination, it is expected that most of the cases which arise will be settled by conciliation without any need for recourse to the courts. Experience with similar legislation in other places shows that the existence of the legislation alone is sufficient, in many cases, to prevent discrimination. Then, too, it is likely that many cases of discrimination will be found to have been caused by misunderstanding or thoughtlessness on the part of one or both of the parties, and that in such cases complaints can be ironed out without difficulty.

However, under the act a person who feels he has been discriminated against may make a complaint in writing to the director, Fair Employment Practices Branch, Canada Department of Labour, Ottawa. An officer of that branch will be directed to inquire immediately into the complaint and try to bring about a satisfactory settlement. Most complaints are settled at that stage. However, if a complaint is not satisfactorily settled, the Minister of Labour is empowered to set up an industrial inquiry commission to investigate the circumstances and to make recommendations to the minister as to how it can best be settled. The minister can then issue any order he considers necessary to carry out the recommendations of the commission, and such orders are final and binding on the parties. The act also provides for prosecution by way of summary proceedings in the courts, with the consent in writing of the minister, against anyone who does anything prohibited by the act or refuses or neglects to do anything required by it.

The experience of the federal government in the administration of this act has been, in general, most satisfactory. During the past fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, some 73 complaints were received by the Fair Employment Practices Branch. Of these, 47 related to discrimination in employment. All were processed satisfactorily and settled.

Our Department of Labour has received the fullest co-operation from the various trade union and human rights committees including the National Committee on Human Rights of the Canadian Labour Congress, from employer groups and from the voluntary agencies in the human rights field, as well as from the press, radio and television. The Department of Labour has expended a great deal of effort in the educational field in encouraging fair employment practices. In this connection, members of the House may recall the department's recent newspaper advertising which apparently made a few people uncomfortable but was generally well received across the country.

In addition to investigating complaints, the Fair Employment Practices Branch of the department is actively promoting the principle of affirmative action, not just the elimination of discriminatory practices per se but positive steps to encourage members of badly disadvantaged minority groups to take training and come forward for employment. This promotion is being directed at management, union and government agencies at all levels.

The branch publishes and distributes pamphlets and posters on the subject, produces items for television spots, posters and exhibits, and encourages or participates in radio and television discussions. Several hundred thousand pieces of literature on the laws and the roots of prejudice have been distributed during the past year. The Department of Labour also advertises the provisions of the act in the foreign language press of Canada, and prepares articles for other papers and journals. Officers of the department attend regional, national and international conferences on discrimination in employment. During the past year they made more than 60 addresses to labour conventions and to meetings where management was broadly represented. Over the years the federal Department of Labour has been widely commended for its work in this field, and rightly so.

However—and this point was mentioned by the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins)—successful experience with the administration of this act has not made the department self-satisfied or insensitive to the possibilities of improving the legislation, its administration, or the associated work of education and persuasion. Indeed, at the request of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) a group of officers in his department have in recent months been examining ways and means of enhancing the value of the act by broadening its coverage and increasing its effectiveness. Among other things, they are considering the possibility of extending the current prohibitions to discrimination based on age.

The December, 1968, issue of the magazine "Monetary Times" has an interesting article at page 23 headed "Prejudice and Discrimination". The article comments on a recent study by Dr. Edro Signori, a psychology professor at the University of British Columbia, on discriminatory beliefs and attitudes toward employment by socially disadvantaged groups. Dr. Signori and his assistants have studied 400 books, reports and other published material, surveyed a small number of university students, and gathered 881 statements, 39 pages in all, of beliefs and attitudes held about the appearance, mental and physical traits, performance, etc., of groups classified as "socially disadvantaged" in terms of employment. This well documented and well supported study showed older workers as ranking No. 11 in order of discrimination in employment in Canada.

The following is a complete list of the 18 groups in question in the order of those most discriminated against in employment to those who are subject to lesser discrimination: (1) mental retardants; (2) hippies; (3) ex-mental patients; (4) ex-criminals; (5) North American Indians; (6) beatniks; (7) physically handicapped; (8) Negroes; (9) East European communists; (10) East Indians; (11) older workers; (12) school drop-outs; (13) Orientals; (14) southern Europeans; (15) Jews; (16) women; (17) north Europeans; (18) British immigrants. The study, however, points out that ranking would assume a somewhat different order in different geographic areas. For example, Negroes might well be ranked higher in certain areas of the United States.

In principle, I would favour such an extension and I am sure the government will in due course endeavour to determine whether it can be achieved in a practical way. In the meantime, although in sympathy with its purpose, I am unable to support this bill which would add discrimination based on age, except where based on bona fide occupational considerations, to the list of employment practices prohibited by the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. I cannot do so because I am not satisfied that the bill would meet the tests of practical application.

I think all members of the House will understand that there is a significant difference between race, colour, religion and national origin on the one hand, and age on the other. The first group of factors should never be involved in determining qualifications for employment, and for this reason it is relatively simple to deal with them by way of legal prohibitions, as the present act does.

Age is different, however. In some cases, as the bill now before us recognizes, age may be a legitimate basis for distinctions in employment. Such distinctions can derive from a desire to provide training opportunities to the young or special protection to the old. They are very much a part of bona fide apprenticeship plans and pension plans, and they have a legitimate relationship to seniority provisions and other conditions of employment. For these reasons, it would clearly be unwise to force rigid and universal equality of treatment, regardless of age, by means of hasty or inadequate legislation.

Age discrimination is in many cases a question of practical distinction or economic consideration and does not always have the same form or substance as discrimination based on race, colour or national origin. Unless it provided for some flexibility through appropriate regulation-making power, age legislation could prove to be difficult or impossible to administer. Poorer employment prospects for certain age groups sometimes result from a desire on the part of an employer to maintain some balance in the age structure of his work force in order to provide for an orderly process of training, promotion and retirement, and in order to avoid the problems that can be created for both managers and employees by the lack of such a process.

Some superannuation schemes have also been a serious obstacle to the hiring of older workers. This barrier will gradually be removed through application of the Canada Pension Plan and the move toward portability of pensions. None the less, at the present time any law dealing with age discrimination should be based on careful consideration of a number of pension questions.

There is legislation in Canada and in many other countries of the world which not only permits but insists upon distinctions in work on the basis of age, particularly in connection with night work and underground work. It seems clear that since some distinctions on the basis of age are necessary, and since age is such a general and universal type of factor, a good deal of care must be taken in developing a legislative approach to the problem of discrimination in employment.

It is difficult to isolate the age factor as the full cause of any apparent discrimination in relation to employment. While chronological age is not considered a true measure of employability, no acceptable measurements of psychological and physiological age are yet available to employers to replace the date of birth method for deciding the age of a man for legitimate reasons such as pension plan rates and retirement dates. Thus questions and records which would be considered discriminatory if asked or kept in connection with race or religion, would be considered non-discriminatory in relation to age.

In Canada three provinces, British Columbia, Ontario and Newfoundland, have fair employment practices legislation which prohibits discrimination based on age. In 1967 the United States government passed legislation of the same type. Several of the American states have similar legislation. In general, these laws prohibiting age discrimination permit employers to reject older workers when the rejection is based on bona fide occupational qualifications. Sixty-five is normally set as the maximum protected age.

I understand that experience under these laws is among the factors being considered by the Department of Labour in its current re-examination of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. For my part, I would hope this examination could be completed in the fairly near future, and that definite suggestions would be put forward by the government with respect to the act.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we have heard of black power, red power, youth power and woman power, and if action is not taken soon to deal with some of the problems facing our older people we will shortly be hearing about senior power. With advances in medicine, more and more people are living for longer periods. In this day and age when there is great accent on youth we are tending to ignore this factor. Not only are the problems outlined in the bill before us of concern to older people, but also of concern to them are problems in respect of pensions, income tax, medical requirements, and so forth. This bill deals with just one important aspect of the whole question.

This matter is further complicated by the fact that because of technological change we find men dismissed from jobs at which they first started work, being retrained for other jobs in their mid-thirties, finding that work phased out again because of more technological change, and having to be retrained again. It is all very well to have a manpower retraining program for men in their forties and fifties who are put out of work because of technological change, but if we have no method of guaranteeing them work, or helping them find work once they have been retrained, we have not followed through with our remedy.

The bill put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) embodies the right type of principle. He is taking the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, which has been quite successful, and suggesting we amend it to include people who are discriminated against because of age.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. McGrath: If the hon. member agrees with the principle of the bill, as he has just stated, why does he not agree with the motion to have it referred to the committee after second reading, where it can be studied and examined in detail? He knows he can do that by resuming his seat now and allowing the question to be put.

Mr. Allmand: I agree that it should be sent to a committee, but the hon. member must realize it cannot be sent to the committee unless it is given second reading. I should not want this bill to go to a vote on second reading until all the arguments are on record.

Mr. McGrath: You agree with the principle.

Mr. Allmand: It would be a sad situation if it went to a vote now and we did not have enough members here to carry the measure. The hon. member spoke on the bill, and I feel I should make sure that this House is convinced that it is a proper bill. I saw the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. McNulty) here a moment ago and I appeal to him to convey to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey)—

Mr. McGrath: He is behind you.

Mr. Allmand: I appeal to the hon. member to convey to the minister the feelings of those who have spoken during this debate, including the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I hope the government will adopt the suggestions in this bill and incorporate them in a government bill which will perhaps include other types of discrimination which should be covered by the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act.

The other two types of individuals often discriminated against in employment are those who have been in a mental hospital and those who have been in prison. I have recently seen examples of people in all three categories being put out of work in their middle forties. They all experience extreme difficulty in obtaining employment. If the government does amend this act I hope it will consider these types of individuals who have difficulty finding work.

There are objections which will be raised against this bill and we must deal with them. There are cases in which an employer has justifiable reason for requiring a younger worker. One might say that the wording of bill C-15 does not provide for those cases where an employer may have just cause for refusing an older applicant because the type of employment requires a person of younger years. However, I do not think this is a serious objection or one that could not be overcome. The committee might suggest wording which will deal with that particular problem.

Mr. McGrath: You have two minutes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are getting older.

Mr. Allmand: One of the reasons many of us in the House are concerned about this bill is that we are all getting older. In the profession in which we are engaged we never know when we will be put out of work. We may all find ourselves in the situation where in our forties, fifties or sixties we are looking for work and are being discriminated against because we are that age. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested I was getting older. He is right. After the next election I will be in the over 40 age group, and I have a personal interest in seeing a bill like this pass.

Mr. McGrath: Thirty seconds.

Mr. Allmand: I do not believe that those on this side of the House are anything but safe, but we have at this time of year great compassion for our colleagues in the opposition.

Mr. McGrath: Fifteen seconds.

Mr. Allmand: There is one other very important point in respect of this bill. In recent weeks we have been discussing the Company of Young Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-7, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to conclude the remarks I started to make before the supper hour.

In closing, I should like to say that if the officials of the CNR want to discontinue the passenger train Ocean Limited in order to put it in operation on another line in New Brunswick, they should first take into account the suggestion I wish to make.

[English]

I submitted to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and through him to the officials of Canadian National Railways the suggestion that officials of the CNR be impressed with the need, and indeed the necessity, to maintain the Ocean Limited service through Edmundston until there is a regularly scheduled air service to Montreal approved for our area and until the Quebec City to the New Brunswick portion of the Trans-Canada highway is completed. This is simply a proposition. I and the people whom I represent in this House are ready to negotiate with the officials of Canadian National Railways. So far we have not made much progress in this regard, I am sorry to say, with the officials of the CNR.

As a Member of Parliament for Madawaska-Victoria I should like to state emphatically that my vote is not for sale. I do not suggest that someone is trying to buy my vote, Mr. Speaker; but we are considering Bill C-7 to authorize the provision of moneys for the CNR and to guarantee certain securities to be issued by that company. I am not trying to bribe Canadian National Railways into maintaining a service; I am simply saying that before voting for such a measure I want to make darned sure that the CN will give something in return to my part of the country.

[Translation]

And in order to put an end to this part of the debate, I would like to read a letter sent to me on November 18 by the president of the Northwest Area Development Board of the province of New Brunswick—which was established by the citizens of my region—in order to study the problems and get the people to contribute to their solution.

This is what was said by the president of the Northwest Area Development Board Ltd., and I quote:

> The idea of removing the service of the Ocean Limited in northwestern New Brunswick, more precisely Edmundston, St. Leonard, Grand-Sault and Plaster Rock, might discourage the people of the region, and especially the outside manufacturers because of the social and economic development of the counties of Madawaska, Victoria and Carleton on the one hand, and might prejudice greatly the economic interrelations in the north of Maine, in the U.S.A., on the other hand.

—In fact, my riding and all this region of New Brunswick run along the United States. Therefore, there is a lot of rather important commercial exchanges.

I probably left the impression that this letter was addressed to me. In fact, it was addressed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and I got a copy of it.

The president continues in these words, and I quote:

> The Northwest Area Development Board (N.B.) can hardly understand how this decision fits in with the development program the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has just undertaken in the Maritimes, as far as we are concerned;

Obviously, I wish to point out that the present government is not to blame, but simply a Crown corporation that will not budge.

They even quote a speech given by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to the Institute of Memramcook in New Brunswick on October 25 last:

> The two key elements of that (development) strategy are the capital grants made to industries to attract them to the area, and public service improvement projects.

Mr. Speaker, a passenger train is a public service, and an essential one at that, as I said before consideration of the motion was interrupted.

> The Development Board trusts that before reaching a decision that would neutralize the efforts towards social and economic development made by the people and supported by the Department of Regional Economical Expansion, the authorities concerned will be consulted, and this includes our representatives in Ottawa—

Mr. Speaker, as an elected representative of that area, I hate to say so, but the authorities of the CNR in no way consulted me. I was merely advised of what they intended to do. They did the same with the people I represent, and I regret their attitude very deeply.

[English]

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, a great many members of this House welcome the opportunity that this CNR financing bill, Bill C-7 to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada, gives to discuss one of the important economic factors in our nation. I do not think that any other single factor plays a greater part in respect of the way we live, what we eat, the clothes we wear and the newspapers we read. I refer to transportation, which has a tremendous impact on our lives.

Those of us who over a period of years have had the benefit of a fairly good transportation system probably take for granted many of the services that are provided. However, during a trip as a member of the transport committee to the north shore of Quebec—that part of the country which people have referred to as the land of Cain; an area in which travel is very difficult—I became very concerned that the people there felt like the biblical individual who was cast out into the wilderness.

However, we did find tremendous development going on in that area, in spite of the fact that the people had a feeling of being enclosed and separated from the rest of the world. I believe that before very long adequate transportation facilities will be provided for the area. The question of transportation seems to be on the minds of most of the people there. In fact, on the evening we flew into Labrador city one might have thought we were being mobbed and that a great meeting was being held at the airport. People were carrying placards which demanded to know why, in view of the $50 million in taxes that had been collected in the area, they did not have better transportation facilities. After we had been there a short while we found that the transportation facilities were far from adequate. It was interesting to see the extent to which company towns are being developed, how well laid out they are and how good are the good facilities provided by the companies, which are doing their utmost to keep the people happy and in good spirits.

However, I come back to the matter we are discussing tonight. Many of the complaints that have been made this year have been caused because both our main railways have indicated that they are going to cut passenger service. I have always felt a great deal of sympathy for the CNR and the CPR in this day and age when so much travelling is done by private motor car and only 15 per cent of the total miles travelled is left to be divided among the air lines, the rail services and the buses in our public transportation system. Not much of the pie is left to the railroads when the private individual does so much travelling in his car.

Nevertheless, there are problems which result from the continued cutting of services by the railroads. This fact was brought to my mind by an article in the Ottawa Citizen of November 12, 1969, entitled "Shades of Sir John". The article did not refer in particular to the CNR or the CPR but concentrated on the Algoma Central Railway. The article referred to the fact that when this railroad was being developed, it received certain grants, timber rights and tremendous financial assistance.

This has been the pattern in the development of our railroads in past years. My understanding is that when the railroads were being constructed in Ontario and Quebec and the branch lines about which we are speaking were being developed, railroad officials went from town to town with hat in hand. They were very gentle and kind; they did not make great demands but only indicated that if the community would sign up with them they would be of great assistance to the community.

Communities did sign up with the railroads and made special concessions in the way of property, lands, property tax concessions, assessment concessions, and in some cases outright grants to assist them in the early years of their development. Therefore, I feel that the railroads have obligations in a great many areas of Canada because of the assistance they were given during the years of their development. As I said, this article refers to the "shades of Sir John."

When I visited the western regions of Canada with the transport committee we discussed whether the CPR rail service that has been in operation for many years, the transcontinental train called the "Dominion", should be taken off. In practically every area to which we went the briefs were very emphatic in listing the number of concessions that had been given to the railroads and the lands and property which had since become so valuable. This is the reason the railroads have an obligation to continue service in these areas, according to the briefs.

The railroads feel it is probably time to re-assess the situation. I believe there are some areas, however, wherein it is necessary for the railroads to continue service. When they finally cut off the passenger service on some of the lines, I wonder how long it will be before the entire railway service will be dispensed with and nothing will be left but railway rights-of-way throughout the country, which are of no great use for anything else because of the gravel and the embankment with which they are built. Not too much can be done with old railway rights-of-way unless the provincial governments decided to make roads out of them.

So the question of rail line abandonment raises many problems that are typical of certain areas. There was a time when the railroads had a monopoly. In those years it was thought that the trucking and bus services would never amount to anything and that people would have to use rail services or else, because there was no other way to travel. However, we found after a few years that the "or else" services became the ones that the people used. I have often felt that in those days the railroads should have become the great transportation media in our nation; they should have taken over the bus and trucking services rather than leaving it until now to do so. We know that practically all the l.c.l. freight throughout Ontario is today being carried by trucks.

This brings me to another question. I have sometimes wondered why it would not be possible for the railways to operate small mobile units such as buses and trucks on their branch lines. In the area in which I live, for instance, both the CNR and the CPR may have one train going up and one train going down each day, and the rails are not being used for almost 22 or 23 hours a day. I maintain that this is a waste of money and I wonder why the railroads could not take the trucks and buses off the highways, put them on flanged wheels and use them on those rights-of-way to provide trucking and bus services in the area. To my knowledge this has never been tried in Canada. I know it has been tried in some European countries.

In the area in which I live we have a rail-liner service. I believe the rail-liner service should be maintained, because if it is taken off there will be no passenger service of any kind into that part of western Ontario going to the towns of Kincardine, Southampton and Owen Sound. Granted, there are times when those services may not pay, but I do not quite understand how the railways arrive at the figure of $300,000 a year which they say they can save by cutting out the passenger service. This is indicated in some of the articles that I have before me.

Figures in this respect were given to the people a few years ago. I emphasize that there are in this area 250,000 people who need service. The rail-liner has been used for probably 15 years and it is not the most economic means of transportation. Rail-liners need three people to operate them, whereas a bus requires only one person, which would be a great saving in wages for the railroads. We believe the railroad has a lot to answer for in that area because bit by bit it has nibbled away at the service provided. I have yet to be convinced that the railways did not give up the postal service, which was very remunerative to them in years gone by. The mail service was given away by the railroads in that particular area because they did not get revenue from it any more and consequently could not show a profit.

As is indicated in some of the articles that I have here, we feel that this service is most necessary. It should be continued in the area, because it has not developed as quickly as some of the areas just a few miles to the south. A reduction of service in a slow-growth area will not help change its status. As these articles indicate, the railroad should take a second look at this matter before deciding to make any change. In this connection I wish to quote from a letter which appeared in the Palmerston Observer, as follows:

The second subject I would like to touch on is the withdrawal of CNR jobs and runs from Palmerston. I understand that the two chain freight gangs from Palmerston to Toronto are now no longer operating, and as a result, eight or ten families are bound to be affected, or displaced. Also, that the IBM car-control system which the CNR spent thousands of dollars recently to instal, is now strongly rumoured to be on the way out.

This is another indication that there will probably be cuts in the CNR service, and yet the CNR spent thousands of dollars installing an IBM car-control system which it will now have to take away. The other matter I would like to mention is the possibility of the establishment of an airport in the vicinity of Malton as an adjunct to Malton Airport. There are areas close to my riding, in the county of Dufferin, which the Department of Transport should examine to see if they might be good areas for a new airport. It would help the development of that region. That area is some distance from the congested region around Malton and Toronto and from the proposed location around the lakeshore. I feel such an examination would be worth while and I hope the Department of Transport will undertake it.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that Bill C-7 has become the vehicle whereby members can discuss the most serious matter of a national transportation policy in general and railway transportation policies in particular. I shall confine myself to speaking of railways. Coming as I do from the city of Vancouver, where four railways have their termini, it will be easily understood that I have a keen interest in the question of railways. We have Canadian National Railway, Canadian Pacific Railway, the Pacific Great Eastern Railway and the Great Northern Railway. Being the termini of four great railroad systems, not only in this country but on this continent, and being a major port of Canada, we are vitally affected not only by the general national transportation policy of Canada but in particular by railway policy, not only as it affects the movement of freight and freight rates but as it affects passenger transportation.

In the main we have to deal with the CNR and the CPR. In considering those two great railroads I know that I express the opinion of hon. members from Vancouver and British Columbia in saying we take it not only for granted but as a commitment by this and previous governments of Canada, and by the CNR and the CPR, to continue a transcontinental system of railroads in respect of both passengers and freight, and that any diminution of that commitment constitutes a betrayal of Canada in general and of British Columbia in particular.

I would like to deal first with Canadian National Railways. A study of the CNR is most interesting and is well worth the attention of all hon. members. Without going too far back and into all the background, it is interesting to note that until the Capital Revision Act of 1952, 78 individual companies made up the Canadian National system. It was the intention of the royal commission that was appointed some four years before that to try to consolidate these 78 individual companies. As a result of the 1952 act they consolidated them into only 32 companies as at the end of last year.

The Canadian National system is still composed of 32 individual companies, and perhaps this set-up might be a partial cause of the trouble we have in operating a unified system of transportation. I believe the important fact which we should be considering at this time is one to which attention has already been drawn this afternoon by one of my colleagues—that is, that every year without exception we are faced with a bill similar to Bill C-7 which is now before us. Every year we have to pass a bill to meet the deficit of or the interest which is owed by the CNR and we have to pass a bill to guarantee payments on all its debenture issues. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is good enough that every year we should have to face this problem. We face it now, and unless real thought is given to the matter I would say that in perpetuity we will be facing the financial problems of the CNR and will have to advance more and more millions of dollars.

Since 1948 a royal commission has not studied Canadian National Railways. The 1948 commission obviously came up with only partial answers, as was shown in the Revision Act of 1952. I believe it is time that another and more detailed look was taken at the financial structure of Canadian National Railways. Consider, in a very brief way, the financial situation. Let us look at the year 1952, because that was the year of the Capital Revision Act. We find that the equity capital of the federal government in the Canadian National Railways was $857,573,774. That was in 1952. Just what it is at the moment, I do not know. I wanted to mention that figure, and that is all I am going to say about the equity capital of the government of Canada in the CNR.

However, I want to mention in more detail what is owed by the CNR to the taxpayers through the medium of the federal government. In 1937 there was a royal commission and its purport was to try to resolve how to wipe out the CNR debt of over $1,500,000. Today, according to the balance sheet as of December 31, 1968, there is a debt maturing on January 1, 1972, of $100,000,000. Then we see advances for government railways and working capital in 1923, $16,983,762; financing and guarantee act, that is temporary loans, $218,573,683; refunding act, 1955, which was called loans for debt redemption, $451,100,000. So as of December 31, after all the royal commissions and after all the capital revision plans, the CNR still owes, outside of the capital equity, $786,657,445.

Mr. Speaker, it is my contention that to have to pass a bill every year covering more and more millions of dollars as loans, to pay interest and guaranteed debentures, is sheer stupidity. It is time we called a halt. We cannot call a halt to the administration of Canadian National Railways, but surely we can have the common sense to realize that this money will never be repaid. In the past the money was never repaid and hundreds of millions of dollars had to be wiped out. We know this money will not be repaid; it is proven by the bills we have to pass every year. Then why keep it on the balance sheet? Why have it on the books simply for bookkeeping purposes?

Why do we not face up to the issue in the way this House did last week when we recognized that we could not collect $122 million from Expo. There was no use keeping that deficit on the books and we wiped it off and forgot it. I think the time has come to do the same with the finances of the CNR. The money has been spent and we will not get it back. Get it off the books, forget it, and say to the CNR, "Boys, now you have had it. Produce, run an efficient operation, borrow the money under your own authority and capitalization, show a profit and return it to the federal government and, therefore, the taxpayers of Canada".

Mr. Speaker, I feel that unless we get down to this approach we are not only fooling the people but we are fooling ourselves. I think one of the biggest mistakes members of parliament can make is not only to kid the people but to kid themselves. I should like to suggest most strongly that a second, new look be taken at this entire matter to see if we cannot put the CNR on a proper financial basis and get away from dealing with this bill year after year after year, plowing in money that we know we shall not get back.

I should like to proceed from the CNR to the CPR. Here, too, is a most interesting fact, a fascinating study; here is a real study that will show what can be done under private enterprise if it is gone about in the right way with the right friends. The CPR, too, is made up of many companies. May I point out that it was recognized by the pioneers of Canada, before the development of our economy for the population of our country, that we needed a transcontinental railway. Because of that recognition the government, acting under free enterprise, passed legislation which culminated in the first transcontinental railway. But not all of it was the investment of free enterprise; the people of Canada invested millions and millions of dollars. Not only that, but they gave in one grant alone 25 million acres of the finest land in Canada, with all its resources.

I do not have the complete CPR figures at hand, but I have at hand the details of what is now the section of the CPR on Vancouver Island, known as the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. In order to get that railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, the government of British Columbia and the government of Canada turned over for nothing, not only hundreds of thousands of dollars—$750,000 to be exact—but also 1,600,000 acres of the finest land of Vancouver Island; and not only the land. Let me read from the contract what the railway was given when it was granted those 1,600,000 acres. It was granted, with the land, "all resources on, thereon and thereunder." These were to include "all coal, coal oil, ores, stones, clay, marble, slate, mine, minerals and substances whatsoever on, thereon and thereunder." The railway was also given, subject to the federal government, the far shore rights; and not only the far shore rights but listen to this—it was given all those things "on, thereon and thereunder on the far shore or under the sea." That is, under the sea adjoining Vancouver Island. Why, sir, were those things given? For what purpose were they given? They were given so that in return we might have a transcontinental railway to carry freight and passengers in perpetuity.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Forever.

Mr. Winch: I said, in perpetuity. I say that any move by the CNR or the CPR to renege on the promise of maintaining a national transportation system means they are breaking their contract with the subsequent governments of Canada and the people of Canada. The people, therefore, should foreclose on and take possession of these resources, because the railways are breaking the contract.

Those who operate the CPR are mighty clever, Machiavellian fellows. Under the original terms of these construction grants there was a definite understanding that not only would that railway provide in perpetuity freight and passenger service on a transcontinental basis, but that one set of books was to be kept and that revenues accruing to the railway from the development, utilization and sale of lands and resources would be applied, on the balance sheets, toward the maintenance of the railway. We see this in the speeches of those days, and it is written into the act. But in recent years the CPR has changed all that.

The company wishes to present a different picture to our government; to show only the transportation side of the picture and not the revenue it obtains from resources. That is why, aided and abetted by governments, it has formed a new company, Canadian Pacific Investments Limited, and transferred resources to this new company.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member whose speech is so eloquent and interesting. The hon. member prefaced his remarks with the suggestion that the debate now going on relates to general transportation policy. It is possible that some of the speeches which have been delivered since we began considering the bill would give this impression. Nevertheless, I hope that hon. members will try to relate their speeches in some way to the bill now before the House. I would not think that we should allow the debate to drift in such a way as to give one the impression that there is no relation whatever between speeches of hon. members and the bill now before the House. As I said, the hon. member's comments are most interesting. I hope in due course he will relate them to the legislation now being considered by the House.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I understand what Your Honour has just said. May I point out that almost every speaker in this debate has been permitted to speak on broad transportation policy. Some hon. members have even spoken about airports, which I have not touched upon; I have spoken only about railroads. May I also, out of courtesy, suggest that one can hardly discuss a bill relating to the advancing of millions of dollars to one of the railroads without in some way discussing Canadian transportation policy. When speaking about railway policy, I do not see how one can separate Canadian National from Canadian Pacific; nor, when considering a bill for the advancing of money, avoid touching on the entire financial structure as it relates to Canadian National Railways, the railway I have spoken most about. However, sir, since I have always had such great respect for Your Honour, even if I may feel I am being restricted where others have not been, I shall always abide by Your Honour's decision.

Having said in the main what I intended to say, I wish to conclude by repeating my view and my position on this matter. Canadian National and Canadian Pacific were given rights and privileges, in return for which they were to maintain transcontinental railroads for the convenience of freight and passengers. These railways have been most generously assisted by the people and various governments of Canada and we expect them to abide their side of the contract, just as we have lived up to our side of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-7 which we are now studying is entitled "An Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System and Air Canada from the period from the 1st day of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada."

In the Governor General's recommendation, various sums of money are specified: investment, $201 million; expenditures of $82 million for discharging certain obligations and the signature of contracts not exceeding $113 million. There is also a matter of borrowing $19 million for constructing branch lines. With respect to Air Canada, mention is made of a deal involving $165 million.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I do not wish to juggle with figures any longer than is necessary. Apart from dealing with a dry subject, one runs the risk of making miscalculations which could lead to various interpretations in connection with the matter that I want to discuss concerning the use of the money asked for by transportation companies to be handled according to their capital costs, redemption of stocks and capital revision.

The recommendation seems to cover everything, even the potential inadequacy of reserves and the use of further appropriations of parliament to eventually cover the deficit.

I have nothing against the carriers' action when they want to carry out financial transactions. It is even normal for the management of such vital services to gear their operations according to requirements.

However, I feel it is also normal for representatives of the people, who are called upon to decide whether these recommendations are justified should apprize parliament of the manner in which they want appropriations to be used by authorized carriers.

Before coming to the heart of the matter, I wish to point out that the management of major companies such as the CN and Air Canada calls for a great deal of competence and a deep sense of responsibilities to make the passenger service a profitable undertaking. Air Canada management is in a better position to do that than the CN. As a result of the increasing use of other means of transportation, passenger trains are operating steadily at a loss. The 1961-62 report of the MacPherson Royal Commission on Transportation showed unequivocally how high were the losses sustained. It is however in order that a passenger service be maintained and it is probably one of the reasons which justify grants from the government when it sees fits.

For doubtful reasons or because of the intricacies of administrative problems in an undertaking showing a deficit, the president's salary has been set at $75,000 per annum. I point this out without malice aforethought simply to prove that officialdom takes good care of its own.

• (8:50 p.m.)

I shall indicate later that the distribution of jobs and wages of employees is dependent upon the principle of protecting the strong against the weak.

Considering it is recommended to invest in affiliated companies, this gives me the opportunity to tell the house that a rather big percentage of employees directly interested in investments have helped to create and increase a pension fund in order to ensure their security and that of their family when they retire.

As a result of the establishment of the Canada Pension Plan and of the Quebec Pension Plan, there were problems about portability which greatly worried Canadian Railways employees. Workers have always required, and rightly so, that the Canada Pension Plan be added to the pension plans of railway workers. Those plans, in operation for more than 35 years, have become a sine qua non condition for those who apply for jobs in a railway company. It should be noted that the pension plan is never a part of the contractual agreement between the employee and the employer. I believe the government should guarantee the rights of employees who were contributing to those pension plans when the government alone became effective.

I would like to discuss another important problem, that of railway crossings. The increasing number of accidents at railway crossings has become a matter of concern.

I know that it has been pointed out many times to government authorities, but unfortunately, they dilly-dally when decisions must be taken. The administrative machinery of bureaucracy gets into action only when an inquiry into serious accidents is called for.

For the past 50 years or so, a federal organization has a fund at its disposal, in order to build viaducts and eliminate railway crossings.

Statistics show that for the last 15 years accidents at railway crossings have caused 2,694 fatalities, 617 of them in Quebec. While accidents increase sharply, bureaucrats try to explain that they cannot do more under section 5 and section 265(2) of the Railway Act, as funds for construction or repairs were set in 1958. It is obvious that construction costs have increased since then, as the 11 per cent tax on building materials was not in force at that time.

The act should take into account priorities relating to the elimination of railway crossings. In the Saint-Éleuthère (Kamouraska) region that I represent, there are two very dangerous railway crossings.

In addition to the travelling public, two school-buses are daily exposed to serious accidents. Automatic signals have never been installed.

The government has already made, through the Transport Commission, a survey of the physical particularities of all the grade crossings in Canada. Since this information has been available for some time, what are we waiting for to install protective devices, manual or automatic, at all grade crossings which, in the opinion of the Commission, are dangerous?

It is time for the government to think of increasing the statutory grant under the grade crossing vote. Then we would be giving work to the unemployed while contributing to the protection and safety of the railroad employees and of the travelling public.

At the beginning of my speech I referred to the allocation of work and to salaries. Now I shall give some examples of what is, in my view, an irregular situation.

During the negotiations it seems impossible to agree on how to change the practice of percentage salary adjustments from which it follows that those who earn less than $5,000 or $6,000 a year get small salary increases compared to those who earn $6,000 or more. All groups of wage earners deserve increases when the collective agreements are renewed, but the distribution of the benefits should be better balanced. The steady increase in the cost of living affects the worker who earns $5,000 as much if not more than the worker who earns $8,000 or $10,000 a year. I think it is not necessary to be a graduate in industrial relations to understand that.

Even if the CNR management decides to hire highly-paid personnel to carry out all sorts of investigations in order to determine where and in what crews lay-offs can be made, this does not improve the situation of the employees, but it does reduce the efficiency of the maintenance department and, in conquence, derailments become more frequent and often, administrative expenses increase.

• (9:00 p.m.)

We notice that the number of employees affected to the maintenance of one section of 40 or 75 miles is reduced to two or three with one superintendant and his assistant, the roadmaster, therefore two men work and two write reports. In addition, the management of the Canadian National Railways uses a fleet of trucks for track maintenance. How can workers in charge of detecting defects in the railroad tracks do while riding a truck? I do not want to delay the passage of this bill but

I think that it is in order to indicate the bad effects of the bureaucracy entrenched in the CNR management.

And I might go on quoting examples of blunders made by some bureaucrats who know nothing about railroad track maintenance, who are comfortably settled and well paid, occupying offices in a company showing a deficit and giving orders often contrary to common sense.

Here is a typical example of existing abnormalities. In the Central Station building in Montreal, there are two CNR offices known as the Rideau Area and the Champlain Area. In one of them maintenance and construction employees earn $2.34 per hour and in the other only $1.97 per hour. Furthermore, in the latter case, employees are paid at a lower rate for a trial period of 78 days, whereas for the former, the initial wages are $2.15 an hour. They all accomplish the same work, but some come from Ontario and the others are Quebec residents.

The foremen work 40 hours a week and they are paid time and a half for overtime. The ordinary workers work 60 hours a week at the regular rate. This shows the inconceivable injustice to be laid at the door of well paid administration officers and which is a cause of friction among employees.

We must not forget that we have supported in the House a regulation asking the railway employees to return to work after a strike. We must admit that it is in order for us to look as closely as possible into the working conditions of those who have been compelled by law to return to work.

Before closing my remarks, I should like to point out to the House the housing and security conditions of these employees. They travel from their living quarters to their working stations in trucks where are assembled all kinds of tools, and they are always exposed to accidents. Those who work as mechanical shovel operators are often without the services of a helper. Employees have to sleep in double deckers and suffer all the inconveniences that these involve.

We are advised that the company has launched a vast program to improve employees' living quarters. Cars now used for this purpose will be replaced by trailers, which proves that we are right in deploring the existing conditions.

But in the meantime the company continues to use these 1910 model sleeping cars for its employees. And the administration does not see too much inconvenience in it since such accommodations have been approved by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This shows again the preference given to the big to the detriment of the small.

I would like to have more time at my disposal to indicate a number of facts that prove the good will of some regional directors. There are, unfortunately, too many things to deal with, such as passenger service improvements, job security, automation implications, the clarification of many problems resulting from salary adjustments, special compensations—they sometimes happen—freight, and the competition between the various means of transport. Nevertheless, I would like to make what is, in my opinion, a practical suggestion.

Since CNR employees are, on the whole, very able and experienced, I venture to make a suggestion to the people in charge. Why, when changes are needed in the railway timetable, should we not seek the advice of a certain number of train conductors from various areas instead of taking only into account the reports made by the bureaucrats who more often than not prefer to use their car when the railway timetable does not suit them.

I am sure that the changes suggested by the personnel responsible for conducting the trains would be in the best interest of the passengers. This in turn would result in making the services more profitable.

In 1967, the year of Expo in Montreal, we had to abide by an irrelevant decision. During a full year, the passengers from Campbellton to Montreal had to cope with a transfer at Chambly.

I brought to the attention of the C.N.R. officials more than 25 requests for some change to be made. It took over a year of urging before they were finally granted. I am sure that those who made those decisions today acknowledge their mistake. If the employees had been consulted, I am convinced that could have been avoided.

I believe I have dealt with some vital points which show that a full investigation should be conducted in the various administrative services of the CNR. Apart from showing that the workers' complaints are justified, it would help to clarify a situation that is confused at times, and give the whole team of workers, who have heavy responsibilities sometimes, the encouragement they are entitled to from a company such as the Canadian National Railways.

As regards Air Canada's management, even if I do not travel very often by plane, I should like to point out that this corporation will have to be on the alert as far as the security of passengers is concerned, so as to prevent those who would be too anxious to go to Cuba from forcing pilots to change their flight plan. As a matter of fact, there are in Canada a few members of the Company of Young Canadians who have kept in touch with people in that country. Some means will have to be devised to identify them when they make their reservations.

[English]

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I have a few grievances that I should like to put before the House, and they concern branch line abandonment and railway gaps. I have raised this matter several times previously and placed it on Hansard. I should like to refer in particular to a 38 mile gap in the branch line from Frenchmans Butte to Heinsburg, Alberta.

I have raised the matter so often that I am sure most of the older members could retell the story from memory. However, while everyone appears to agree that this is one railway gap that should have been filled-in many years ago, I have been unable to get any co-operation from either the Department of Transport or Canadian National. The area in question is great mixed-farming country, and there are also mineral resources. There is a natural barrier to the south in the North Saskatchewan River.

Last spring I thought I was away to a fresh start with a new minister. I immediately got in touch with the minister's office and tried to arrange an appointment with the minister, but I am still waiting. I think this delay is unjustified because a vast area of my constituency is adversely affected by the gap in this line.

The CNR was granted a charter many years ago and should have been compelled to fulfil its obligations under the charter. Farmers moved into this area and developed some fine farms and homesteads. A great many of these farmers have now almost given up hope. However, I have not. I can see no reason for not completing this branch line. There is talk of removing some of this line that has been constructed, and if that is true the hopes of the people in the area will be destroyed. I cannot for the life of me understand how Canadian National can expect the line to pay if it is not completed. Many of Canadian National's undertakings have been run at a loss in the past. Had this gap been filled it would have meant a great deal to these people in northwestern Saskatchewan and northeastern Alberta. This would have given us a direct line to Fort McMurray in the great Athabasca region. It would have provided a direct line all the way from Winnipeg, without the necessity of this long detour. It would also have served all the points along the line through the use of branch lines, right through Saskatoon to North Battleford and Frenchmans Butte. It could also have served Prince Albert, Spiritwood, Medstead and St. Wallburg. Had this 38 mile gap been completed it would have made a tremendous difference.

The other point I wish to make relates to duplication of services. I cannot understand why the management of the CN and CP could not have put their heads together and done something about these duplications. I do not understand why, when the CNR pioneered that part of the country, the CPR had to come in and obtain running rights on Canadian National—over 65 miles in one place—and spoil things. Apparently they did so in order to reap the benefits from the Meadow Lake area. The CPR should have been compelled to continue through to Goodsoil and Pierceland. I cannot understand why two companies such as these could not lay their cards on the table and avoid duplication. Surely these two companies could have got down to business and given these people the service they deserve, and at the same time put their own businesses on a better basis. Before putting forward my second grievance let me say that I hope something will be done about these gaps in service, because people in the area have grown old waiting for action.

My second point relates to the unjust treatment shown to Great Slave Lake contractors. This treatment is the worst I have seen from any group of people in what is supposed to be a democratic country. Having been a contractor, I know something about the grievances of these people. They have faced financial difficulties and in some cases have been completely put out of business. Many of them have lost their livelihoods, yet they have not been given a proper hearing. That is all they wanted. They have been coming to Ottawa for four or five years asking for a hearing.

I was a member of the transport committee last spring and recall that one of the last things done by that committee was the holding of hearings in respect of the problems of some of these people. One might have expected that something would be done for them rather than allowing the matter to drop at the end of last session. There is no indication whether they will be heard again. To my knowledge not one single thing has been done for them. Let me read from page 2399 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Committee on Transport and Communications, volume 28. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) asked:

> I want to make my question clear to Mr. Allen. Are you only asking that this committee recommend to the Governor in Council that an inquiry should be set up? Maybe to Mr. Mahoney's surprise, the Railway Act sets out clearly that an inquiry can be held.

In fairness to these people, I know they wanted a hearing. A great deal of controversial evidence was presented. Let me quote again from the minutes of that meeting, page 2398. Mr. Horner said in part:

> It appears pretty obvious to me that the CNR abused and put you under extra duress for no real reason, because they finished out $11 million ahead of their original estimate and 18 months on time.

Surely when people are treated in that fashion they are entitled to a public hearing. Many of them have been put out of business. As a result of being a contractor I noticed particularly some of the controversial evidence given to the committee. Let me refer to another situation. This is covered in a letter from the lawyer representing certain contractors. One paragraph of the letter reads:

> Another point with respect to which some comment should be made is the comment by Mr. Cox that Lucus was not instructed to place his camp at Mile 83 as Lucus states and was not refused the privilege of working from Mile 110 to Mile 120 as Lucus states.

Mr. Lucus on a number of occasions drew my attention to the fact that under the engineer's instruction he was forced to start on the contract at the specified point, but could not do so because of wet weather; the weather made it absolutely impossible for him to do anything with the high-priced equipment he had at the site. He was refused permission to move 10 miles to different terrain where there was heavy yardage and where his equipment could have been moved along with its high-priced men. The contractor could then have got on with the job.

I realize there is a conflict as a result of this controversial evidence, but Mr. Lucus said he was forced by the engineer to stay at the original camp. The engineer claims he did not refuse permission to move. I should like to know who issued these orders. I am familiar with the Lucus construction company and I know it would have moved its equipment and men to the spot where they could have moved earth. This is one of the most unjust things I have ever heard, particularly when the companies are not given a proper public hearing.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to this financing bill. Let me say a few words about what we should reasonably expect from the CNR if we are to continue to support it with public funds. One thing that concerns the people in my constituency as well as those to the east and west of it is the proposal to remove entirely or cut down on passenger train service.

I have received letters and representations from people who work on the railroad and live in areas which are served by the main line of the CNR. They are very much concerned about the service and the fact that service to their communities will be cut down. Many of these letters were written by people who make their living working for the CNR. They have informed me that there has been a lay-off of about 20 per cent in some communities as a result of poor grain sales and the slow movement of grain.

I suppose the movement of potash might be another factor. I believe there are two things which should be considered in this regard. The first is the welfare of those people who are employed by the CNR. The other of course is the welfare of those who use the facilities of the CNR. If a privately-owned and operated company in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario proposed to lay off a similar number of employees, questions would be asked in this House. Not too long ago questions were asked in this House concerning companies which proposed to close down or restrict their operations and lay off men. I believe a publicly-owned concern should be just as responsible in respect of the men it employs as a privately-owned concern.

One person who wrote me advised there have been times very recently when the passenger train service which is to be discontinued was unable to handle the number of people who desired to use it. I have been informed there have been many occasions when passengers who sought accommodation in terms of sleeping berths, and so on, were unable to obtain it.

I think we should be concerned about the type of service that is available, because if passengers are turned away or are unable to obtain the service they need, I suppose the traffic on these passenger trains will decline. I think we should also consider the type of people who use these trains. Many of them are old age pensioners, people who travel with children and people who do not wish to incur the expense of air travel. Travel by train gives them a more comfortable and a more economic service. I think we might very well consider further use of both train travel and air travel as Canada expands. This would probably be more economical than the expansion of airports and increasing other air facilities.

We must also face the situation in respect of rail line abandonment on the prairies. I am not one of those who say that every branch line in the prairies should remain in service. People who live there know that there can be some modification. They plead, however, for a rational approach to this problem so that large and significant areas are not denuded of branch lines while other areas, due to competitive factors, have more lines than are needed.

When we discuss the financing of the railroad I think it is proper to take into consideration the type of service the railroad should give, because we own the railway the purpose of which is to not only make a profit but to provide the type of service needed in the area served. Within the past year I have been concerned about the abandonment of railway stations and the removal of agents from those stations, as well as the effect this has on the community. I have been interested in this matter especially because in some instances the people living in the areas have written to me as a Member of Parliament pointing out that they no longer have the services they need, or stating that the services have declined.

I should like to mention the situation in the village of Ruddell. Under the rules and regulations of the Canadian Transport Commission, the CNR was permitted to remove the agent. Then the CNR did not take the action necessary to look after the handling of the freight that was arriving at the village on their own trucks. I received a letter from the clerk of the village in which he pointed out that freight was being dumped on the streets. I read the letter:

Dear Sir:

The village council saw a notice on the station door regarding application to remove the station building without replacement.

The council held their regular meeting on March 4. A motion was passed that they object to the station being removed.

At the present time the railway trucks dump all the express and freight on the street in front of the post office.

The council is of the opinion that if the station is removed there should be a replacement. It is not fair to the public to have their express and freight put on the street when there is a place to have this put under cover.

Mr. Speaker, I contacted the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill and officials of the Canadian Transport Commission. I believe it was four or five months before the CNR was convinced it was essential to have a proper service with which to take care of the express items coming into that village. At one point they said some of the express goods arriving at the village were being looked after by the postmaster and that the heavy express office was in a town 10 or 15 miles away. I wonder what the citizens of Ottawa would say if they were told their light express could be picked up at a certain point in Ottawa but that the heavier freight would be over in Hull, and some time when they had nothing better to do they could go over to Hull and pick it up.

I am quite prepared to admit that this town did not have as many people in it as does Ottawa or, for example, as does Pembroke, Ontario. But the people in that small town, like the people in Pembroke, Ontario, or in Ottawa, must have essential services. You cannot turn all western Canada into a desert where no transportation service is provided. Fortunately, the Canadian Transport Commission followed up this matter and eventually said to the railroad, "You have to provide a facility in the town that will be adequate to take care of the express and the freight which you haul in." A small building is now provided for that purpose. But I wonder how many towns there are in which people do not get their rights because they do not know what they are. I can only say to the House that in these changing times we know that everything will not remain the same.

Every little station in these small towns will not continue to serve them, nor will it have a stationmaster to look after it. One would think that the prime objective of the two railroads would be to see that when changes are made, an adequate service is provided for the people in the area. They should not be asked to drive ten miles down the road to pick up their incoming freight or express which is lying in the street in front of the post office. The case was thoroughly investigated, and this was the report that was made.

Apart from being concerned with financing the CNR, this House should also be concerned about the service which the CNR provides for people in all parts of the country. If a particular service is to be discontinued, we should consider whether the alternative that presents itself in terms of road traffic or road transport is in a real sense more economical and more efficient. This is the real question that needs to be asked.

I am also concerned about the fact that you cannot simply apply a cost yardstick on the "X" number of miles of railroad in deciding whether a service is to be discontinued. This will not give you the complete answer for the area until you consider the alternatives. When one thinks of the town which I described, the total cost which had to be figured out was based on whether it would be cheaper to leave the railroad station there and keep an agent in it, whether it would be cheaper to close the station, dismiss the agent and provide the necessary facility in the town for the local freight or express that came in and pay someone in the town the necessary number of dollars to look after it.

If the second alternative was the better and cheaper of the two, it would be difficult to quarrel with it and it would be the logical thing to do. But it is not logical to discontinue a service which a community needs and then say to the community, "That is your tough luck. Perhaps the next generation will not be here, anyway, and you can slug it out as you like."

These are the main things I wanted to say this evening on the bill. I hope that we will approach railway transportation in a rational fashion, in terms of a service to the total community, which is Canada, and to the many smaller communities that make up our country. If we do that, I think we can have a service that will give us what we need.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, it is not my wish nor my intention to unduly delay this very important bill that is before the House of Commons, but my constituents would not forgive me if I failed to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House a problem which is pressing and urgent to those who are directly involved and who will be affected by the recent proposal made by the CNR in northern Ontario.

I wish to comment briefly on the question and the problem of run-throughs by the CNR, more properly called extended crew-runs. Some hon. members will recall that this question was a national issue in 1964 at which time it caused almost 3,000 operating employees of the CNR to book off sick, having fallen victim to some unknown malady. In other words, the company at that time was faced with a wildcat strike. This strike led to the Freedman industrial inquiry into the question of run-throughs. Today Canadian National Railways are once again proposing to run through the home terminal of Nakina, which was one of the main communities in this controversy five years ago. At the present time, the company is attempting to get agreement from the brotherhoods for this run-through.

This will be the first time that the company has in fact run through a home terminal, as opposed to a turn-around point. There is a very significant difference between those two types of communities, because in a home terminal people have put down roots and established themselves. They look to a future in which they will bring up their children; they build schools and hospital services are prouded. Transportation and other facilities are provided for them at great expense by the federal and provincial governments. There is the threat of all this being wiped out by the announcement of the CNR that crews will no longer be located there; that they will have extended crew-runs. The very existence of this community is threatened.

The House should be reminded that the community of Nakina is in fact a child of the CNR; the railway created the town 45 years ago. Now they wish to desert this child and divest themselves of the responsibility for what will happen not only to the employees of the railroad but to the inhabitants of the community in which the railway has become an important industry. How is this major decision announced to the people? An ominous red and white announcement is posted at a central place in the town. We are told:

The company has moved to begin discussions with its operating union on the effect of extending train crew-runs at Nakina—

On September 15 the company met in Toronto with representatives of its running trades. A major purpose of the meeting was to discuss the need for improved resthouse facilities between Hornepayne and Sioux Lookout. The company noted it could hardly decide on a new location for new resthouse facilities while the problem of extending crew-runs remained unresolved.

The company indicated that as it wished to locate the new resthouse facilities at Armstrong it would like to commence negotiations for extended runs between Hornepayne and Armstrong at Nakina with Hornepayne as home terminal.

With that little announcement, the people are told that their community will be destroyed. So they turn to their Member of Parliament and they plead that he do something to help save their town. As their Member of Parliament, I visited the community and saw almost all the people in the town, which comprises some 600 people. Every man, woman and child expressed the same opinion, that they do not want to move out of Nakina under any circumstances, regardless of the compensation they may receive for their houses.

They say, "Do something to help save our town." So one turns to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and he says, "Nothing can be done. It is a matter for the Canadian Transport Commission." The Canadian Transport Commission says, "Don't turn to us. Look to the brotherhoods; they are the ones negotiating with the company for this extended crew-run." Then the brotherhoods say, "There is nothing we can do because it is in our contract that we must negotiate with the company for material changes. You had better turn to the management of the company." The management then says, "We have to be efficient. We have to save money in order to have a better operation." The management provides a few figures and it is difficult for us to test their validity. Management claims it will save approximately $100,000 a year and about ten minutes in time. In order to save $100,000 a year and save ten minutes in time they want to destroy a town in which millions of dollars have been invested. That seems to be inefficient, a poor example of economy.

The community have looked very carefully at the problem and they have made it abundantly clear to me that they are not a reactionary group of people who want to stand in the way of technological progress. They have said so in letter after letter. They have said, "We are not against technological change. We are just against the manner in which it is being introduced. We want the CNR to make their technological changes in a way that will least affect people in the place in which they live and work."

As I have said, they looked carefully at the problem themselves and they have an alternate proposal which I will pass along to the House. But how seriously has their proposal been considered by the CNR? The company has been asked to come to the town to meet with the citizens' committee to explain very carefully what is involved and why they have taken this stand. We are unable to get these people to come and explain clearly and unequivocally how they will benefit northern Ontario by saving a few hundred thousand dollars and destroying a community.

Let us take just a moment and consider the cost to the community. With the extended run-through, $560,000 in wages will be lost; some 48 homes will be vacated; some 25 per cent of the tax revenue will be gone; the nearby Geraldton District High School will stand to lose about $28,000 a year in provincial grants when the 26 pupils from Nakina transfer out of it. In 1960 the provincial government authorized the Improvement District of Nakina to build a new three-roomed addition to the public school worth $70,000. Fully modern educational facilities for children from kindergarten to grade 8 are provided by annual provincial grants totalling $47,700. A run-through will reduce the school to two rooms leaving the remaining facilities standing empty and useless. The Nakina separate school, which now employs two teachers, will drop 40 per cent of its enrolment and only one teacher would be needed.

There are many CNR pensioners and widows living in the community, most of whom own homes. The increase in taxes will be far beyond their means. Some will be unable to sell, because who wants to invest in a community that is on the decline? Businessmen in the area will be affected by a 45 per cent drop in volume, which will result in staff reductions and the closing of small businesses. Until 1964 Nakina was a going concern. The province had invested huge sums of money with which to open up the town. Highway 584 was constructed to connect with highway 11, 42 miles away—a very expensive undertaking for the province. Ontario Hydro constructed a pole line into the town in 1958. Through federal and provincial assistance the new Geraldton District Hospital was built to serve the area. The population of Nakina, which in 1964 was 763, is now 600.

Then in 1964 the CNR made its drastic announcement of a run-through. From that point the trend has been downhill for Nakina. In 1966 the Indian Affairs offices were moved out, reducing the work force by five. In 1968, the Department of Transport weather station was moved out, taking another five employees. Now, once again, the dark shadow of the CNR looms over the community. The company has decided that new rest-house facilities at Armstrong are more important than the town of Nakina, and they claim that this run-through will save an annual sum of about $100,000.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the people of Nakina have looked at the problem very carefully and they feel that there is another possibility which can save their town and at the same time allow the railway to save the money to which it refers. They propose that a run-through at Armstrong would provide the same saving. Armstrong has a population of 400. Instead of being a home terminal, it is a turnaround point. In Armstrong only 11 employees would be affected. None of these are running crew but rather ticket, express, fuelling and bunkhouse staff. Only four of them own homes in the town. Moreover, it is highly unlikely that any of these people would have to move. As can be easily seen, a run-through of Armstrong would have a minimal effect on the town and could be effected at a fraction of the cost that would be suffered by the community of Nakina.

If the run-through of Nakina becomes an actuality, all the revenue that the province has invested in the town becomes wasted expenditure. Moreover, the province will probably be faced with even larger expenditures in the form of welfare payments for those citizens who are left without any visible means of support. The future of Nakina must also be considered. It has great iron ore potential nearby, and in a very few short years when these deposits are developed it will once again become a major community and the railway will once again seek to serve the town and will have to re-establish facilities there. We are really asking the railway management to be a little futuristic, to look at the potential of the area and not to think about saving a few dollars just at this moment.

I mentioned the alternative proposal of running through Armstrong instead of Nakina, because at Armstrong there would be minimal disruption of business. This proposal was made by the CNR in 1963. On February 5 of that year at the call of Mr. Gonder, then vice-president of the prairie region of the CNR, a meeting was held in Winnipeg. It was attended by officers of the company as well as by representatives of three Brotherhoods. The purpose of the meeting was to give the brotherhoods notice of the company's intention to institute a series of run-throughs, commencing with the spring change of timetable. These run-throughs were to be—I mention only one—from Nakina to Sioux Lookout through Armstrong.

Repeatedly we have asked the management to come to Nakina and to explain why they cannot accept this very realistic alternate proposal made to them by the citizens' committee of the town. All we can learn is that a feasibility study has been made which shows it is better to run-through Nakina than Armstrong. We would like to see this feasibility study and examine it on our own to see whether in fact we can agree with its conclusions. We are asking that the company seriously consider this community; we ask that they have good public relations. Mr. Justice Freedman, in his report, with much wisdom made this statement:

• (9:50 p.m.)

> The nation's resources at both the federal and provincial level must be wisely used in measures to reduce to a minimum the disruptive effect on men and communities of the technological change.

I suggest to this House, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian National Railways has not acted in the best interests of the town of Nakina. I suggest that their public relations have not been such as to assure the people that their interests are being seriously considered.

Looking for a life-line, desperate to find someone to assist in preventing this run-through until possible alternative means of development or employment can be found for the town, I turned to the Minister of Municipal Affairs for the Province of Ontario. I asked if he would have his department undertake a study, which would not take very long but which would reveal how much money would be lost and how much the taxpayers of Ontario would have to bear for this so-called efficiency move, this so-called economy measure by Canadian National Railways. If the minister will co-operate in this regard, I believe that the figures will be revealing and shocking, showing that in order for the CNR to save a small amount of money, millions of dollars will have to be spent by the taxpayers of the province; an entire community will be disrupted, people dislocated, and the appeals of men, women and children who live there will not be taken into account to any extent whatsoever.

I bring this matter to the attention of the House because when Parliament did not take it seriously five years ago a serious national situation developed. The people of Nakina are now so desperate to save their town that I know they want to take strong measures, but I have pleaded with them not to do anything rash. I have said to them, "We must use all the channels of communication available to us in the hope that someone will listen and reconsider this move that is neither efficient nor economic.

Mr. Speaker, this has been the time for me to bring this serious matter to the attention of the House. I thank you for your patience. I do not intend to delay this bill to any extent, but I think you will sense the urgency felt by this community of people in my constituency. Like a great many small communities, they feel they have no voice. A Member of Parliament sometimes wonders what he does, living and working in this great, gothic structure; but he is more than someone who just fills up a space—he has to be a voice for those people who have no voice, and he has to represent the people who put him here.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the many problems that have been related to the House by members from across Canada. When listening to the presentations, and the last one was so well stated by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), we realize just what the problems are and how little attention the Department of Transport and the powers-that-be sometimes give to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rynard: The lack of attention paid to the problems across this land has been referred to over and over again today. I realize that there are many important implications in Bill C-7, but I intend to confine myself to the province of Ontario which I probably know best. The province contains approximately one-third of the people in the Dominion of Canada, and the particular area that I come from, Thunder Bay to Lake Ontario, within a 100-mile area of the city of Toronto, contains roughly half the population of the whole province, 3½ million people. This is the most densely populated area of the province and from it comes one-third of the income tax collected by the federal government. This emphasizes the importance of the area and the density of the population.

Networks of railroads and highways proceed from it and fan out in various directions. In my area are railway lines and Highway 400 and Highway 27 which all go to the north from Toronto. In that area, Mr. Speaker, well over one million people travel to work every morning and night, most of them by motor car, some carrying one or two people and some four but all spewing out their poisonous gases as they travel along the highway.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there is only a limited number of speakers left on the list, I wonder if we might not not see the clock and continue debate to dispose of second reading this evening. I wonder if the House would make an order to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FUTURE STRUCTURE OF MILITIA FORCES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, on November 21, I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) if he could assure the House and the country that the proposed reductions in the reserve military forces of Canada would not be as severe as was first contemplated. While the minister's answer was reassuring, it nevertheless remains evident that up to that time at least strength of the reserve forces of Canada, presumably as an economy measure.
there was contemplated a reduction in the

I would hope and expect that the Department of National Defence and the minister would listen very carefully to men who have made a lifetime study of this problem and are conversant with it. In light of the fact that man for man reserve forces cost approximately only one-sixteenth as much as the equivalent strength of permanent military forces, I would hope that consideration to reduce the reserve forces might be abandoned even at this time of strict economy.

When the regular forces are being reduced as an economy measure is the time, I believe, that the reserve forces should be maintained if not increased in strength. It is true that over the last number of years the "forces in being" concept has been very popular. I think it is recognized generally by all military experts that in this day and age of sophisticated military weapons, communications systems, and so on, it is necessary to have highly trained, professional, military people. Nevertheless, we should not go from that fact to the conclusion that reserve forces are now obsolete. There is still a very important place for the reserves.

I believe the present strength of our military reserves is at an absolute minimum. The reserve forces are capable of providing trained personnel for the reinforcement of our regular forces and serve as a channel through which young men may, if they so decide, become professional soldiers and join our permanent forces. The reserve forces may also be instrumental in providing trained subunits to support our armed forces in times of emergency. Most important, our reserve forces are most important as instruments of aid to civilian authorities and may be used in times of national disaster or to maintain law and order when police forces alone cannot do so, especially when violence breaks out in our major cities. I think it is appropriate for us to consider the necessity of carrying out domestic peacekeeping when necessary and not to consider our peacekeeping role as being confined to places like the Middle East and Cyprus.

It is very important for us to remember that the reserve forces provide a much needed opportunity for our young men to serve our country. The man who gives of his time in this way is twice as good a citizen because of it. The reserve forces provide an outlet for the loyalties and energies of those who wish to be ready to serve their country in times of national emergency. Also, the reserve forces bridge the gap, now dangerously wide, between the professional soldier and the civilian. This gap has grown wider in the last few years.

Our reserve forces symbolize our history and the unselfish service that has been given to our country. They are the symbols of the determination of our fathers and grandfathers to preserve our way of life. I think it would be especially sad if units like the 48th Highlanders and the Toronto Scottish, those militia units of excellence, were to be phased out.

Considering the current social pressures and widespread acts of violence on this continent which were touched on by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a vigorous program to revitalize and restore local militia units across Canada should be embarked upon. This new militia program should seek to rehabilitate and strengthen our traditional local units which have historic claims on public support and respect. The program should include imaginative training which would have a special appeal to young men between the ages of 18 and 30, and should be similar to that now being undertaken in Australia. Reserve training for our young men would develop discipline and the concept of service to one's country, and would altogether help to develop in our young men the ability and desire to be better citizens.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the views of the hon. member for Malpeque on the importance and value of the reserve forces and I, personally, respect his judgment. I am also fully appreciative of the contribution which the reserve forces have made in the past and continue to make today in the development of Canada.

As part of the over-all examination of Canada's defence forces which we have been conducting in the Department of National Defence, it is natural that the future role and composition of the reserve forces would be studied. In doing this, many factors are being considered, including the role assigned by the government to the regular forces and the types of emergencies which these forces may be called upon to meet; the extent to which reliance must be placed upon the reserves in achieving this role; the time required to bring the reserves to a state of training proficiency necessary to meet the emergency; the ability and capability of the regular force to train the reserves; and last but by no means least, the strength, training proficiency and cost effectiveness of present units of the reserves. Our aim—and I am sure this will reassure the hon. member—is an effective reserve force, trained and capable of assuming its assigned tasks.

Our plans, which are being formulated in full co-operation with the Conference of Defence Associations as representatives of the reserves, are well advanced and I hope the minister will be in a position to announce details in December.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.08 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NOWLAN—STATEMENTS TO NEWSPAPER COLUMNIST BY MARC LALONDE RESPECTING CYC

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding a newspaper report yesterday in the Toronto Telegram based on an interview between Mr. Douglas Fisher, a part-time columnist, and Marc Lalonde, a full-time public servant. The subject matter of the interview was the operation of the Company of Young Canadians.

I believe this point involves the privileges of members of this House and, more specifically, the workings of the committee of the House which is studying this very subject matter. At one time it was requested that the list of witnesses include the said Marc Lalonde and that he appear before the committee in his capacity at that time as Vice-Chairman of the Provisional Council of the Company of Young Canadians. He happened also to be in the Prime Minister's office then. Some members thought his evidence would not be too relevant, and as the result of a motion that was passed, with some division of opinion, his name was struck off the list of witnesses and the said Marc Lalonde did not appear before the committee.

After a quick perusal of the article of which I gave you notice, Mr. Speaker, I find it sets out in very clear detail, in the question and answer form followed by Mr. Fisher and Mr. Lalonde, a number of comments on specific points which relate directly to the subject matter the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts has been studying. These comments also relate to the report of that committee which is at present being drafted and has been leaked to the press piecemeal yesterday and today, and perhaps again tomorrow.

It is very clear in the latter part of the article that Mr. Lalonde made certain statements which are in conflict with a good deal of the evidence presented to the committee. In view of the fact that this committee of the House is supposed to bring forward a report on Friday based on the facts, it is only proper and reasonable that the said Marc Lalonde, having conversed with this newspaper columnist, should appear before the committee in order that it may clarify the implications in his remarks. The committee is supposed to make judgments and decisions based on the facts.

Perhaps questions of privilege are abused. I do not point to any particular rule that justifies my remarks today, but I think it is passing strange that a part-time journalist should get together with a full-time public servant to discuss a subject matter which a committee is currently considering. For that reason and that reason alone I feel there is an elementary question of privilege.

Because of our rules and because the committee is now sitting in camera writing its report, perhaps Your Honour, as the number one Commoner and the man to whom I appeal, has very little discretion in this matter unless I propose a motion to refer it to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. This whole affair seems to me to be a travesty on our committee system. Surely this is true when a man of the public eminence and authority that some people ascribe to Mr. Lalonde makes comments of this nature. I am not saying he had anything to do with the committee's decision not to call him. He may well have wanted to appear before the committee, and it may well be that he might have added relevant facts. But surely he should not discuss this matter for the purpose of a newspaper article at the very time the committee is writing its report.

Quite frankly, I am not sure whether I should move a motion to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am not sure when the committee's report is likely to be tabled in the House, but I understand it may be tabled on Friday. In any event, we find ourselves in an impossible position.

Company of Young Canadians

I wanted to bring this matter to Your Honour's attention. I know you cannot request Mr. Lalonde to attend the committee, but that is what should be done because this public servant is closely associated with Privy Council matters and is also very actively involved in other matters. For this reason I suggest he should not converse with columnists about subject matters being considered by committees of the House. Had this happened a week ago I am sure the committee might have reversed itself and asked him to appear and give evidence about the financial control he alleges was exerted.

I have almost concluded my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I fail to understand how progress can be made by exercising leadership, if the leadership is removed as suggested by the article. Such public discussion of a subject matter being considered by a committee of the House is almost tantamount to a travesty of the workings of that committee.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether it is advisable for the Prime Minister or any member of the House to discuss the question further. I should point out right away that I do not wish to be unfair to any member and certainly not to the Prime Minister if it is felt that the matter should be discussed further. In my view, however, the matter submitted to the House by the hon. member of Annapolis Valley is more in the form of a grievance than in the form of a formal question of privilege, particularly due to the fact that there is no motion before the House. The hon. member has sensed the procedural difficulty and because of this has judged it perhaps better not to pursue the matter further. I would have to agree with the action he has taken, and if hon. members feel with me that this is the right thing to do the matter will not be pursued further.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MEMBER FOR SPADINA OF DECISION TO SIT AS INDEPENDENT

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I have come to the conclusion that I cannot continue my support of the government and, having resigned from this group, would ask that I be seated across the floor with the opposition as an independent member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Speaker: An appropriate seat will be found for the hon. member who has joined the ranks of the independent.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Third report of Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, in both official languages—Mr. Leblanc (Laurier).

[English]

Second report of Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—Mr. Tolmie.

[Editor's Note: Text of foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be helpful to hon. members if I made a statement concerning the business of the House for the period between now and the Christmas adjournment.

We have proposed that the House should rise for the Christmas adjournment on Friday, December 19. On this basis there would remain 13 sitting days for public business, including today. Two of these days are opposition days. Since they must be dealt with before December 10 it is our intention to call the opposition days on Monday and Tuesday of next week, December 8 and 9.

It is important that the following bills be finally disposed of before the adjournment because of the urgency of time in each particular case: Bill C-2 with regard to the Judges Act, which is urgent because of the necessity to add to the bench as soon as possible; Bill C-7 with regard to the Canadian National Railways, which is the annual financing bill of Canadian National Railways; Bill C-8, in respect of the Children of War dead (Education Assistance) Act; Bill C-139 in respect of the Income Tax Act; Bill C-155 in respect of the Excise Tax Act; Bill C-157 with regard to provisional payments for unthreshed grain; Bill S-8 in respect of loan companies and Bill S-9 in respect of trust companies. By way of explanation I should indicate that since the latter two bills expand the power of financial institutions to lend money for housing purposes it would be desirable to have them passed as soon as possible so that the institutions in question may expand their loans for housing.

In addition to these urgent matters it would be desirable that the following second reading debates or motions to refer should be completed so that the committees may plan their work for January: the tax white paper reference, second reading of Bill C-144, the Canada water act, second reading of Bill C-4 with regard to the Canada Corporations Act, and second reading of Bill C-12 with regard to the international development research centre.

If the urgent bills are not dealt with by December 19, then of course we will have to take another look at the timing of the House sittings and the House may have to continue sitting beyond that date.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Blackmail again.

Another hon. Member: Here we go again.

Mr. Crouse: Mac the knife.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With regard to our work in the immediate future, this afternoon we would like to complete second reading of the CNR bill, which has now been under debate for three days, so that it may go to the committee as soon as possible. We then propose to follow it with the two tax bills later today and tomorrow.

On Friday, as was previously announced, we intend to call first the bill amending the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, to be followed by the bill to provide for provisional payments for unthreshed grain. As I indicated already, next Monday and Tuesday will be opposition days, but since it has not been possible to work out an effective timetable for all the remaining business it will not be possible to state a timetable beyond Tuesday of next week.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to bring up a matter of national urgency at this time. If there are 25 members on the other side of the House who wish to join us, we have a lot of room for them.

An hon. Member: They are mostly Tories over there anyway.

SYNTHETIC DETERGENTS

MEASURE REGULATING PHOSPHATE CONTENT

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-165, respecting the contents of synthetic detergents.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, some 30 per cent of water pollution in Canada is caused by the phosphate content of detergents. The pollution of Lake Erie is a classic case of what happens if we let this detergent pollution continue. The purpose of the bill is to insist that all detergents marketed in Canada will have less than 2 per cent of phosphates. I might add that this can be done without loss of the cleaning power of the detergents or extra expense to the housewife.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WELLAND CANAL BYPASS—
TENDERS SUBMITTED

Question No. 14—Mr. Skoberg:

1. Did the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority have a competitive tender regarding the eight-mile Welland Canal bypass?

2. If so, who were the holders and what were their respective bids?

3. Was Simard Beaudry Inc. of Montreal awarded the contract as the lowest bidder?

4. Did Simard Beaudry Inc. of Montreal refuse to undertake the contract after its low tender bid was accepted?

5. Is the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority contemplating legal action against Simard Beaudry Inc.?

6. If not, for what reasons?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority invited competitive tenders for a number of projects for the realignment of the Welland Canal between Port Robinson and Ramey's Bend. Amongst these was an invitation to tender for the construction of a road/rail tunnel at Townline Road, Welland, Ontario.

2. The following bids were received for this tunnel:

	Using BBR System of Pre-Stressing	Using Alternative System of Pre-Stressing
Simard-Beaudry Inc.	$26,607,941	$26,339,621
The Foundation Co. of Canada	35,222,501	34,897,440
Peter Kiewit Sons Co. of Canada Ltd.	35,150,597	34,929,597
C. A. Pitts Const. (Ont.) Ltd., McNamara Corp. Ltd. and Atlas Construction Co. Ltd. (joint venture)	36,292,466	36,142,466

3. No.

4. No. In the customary pre-award examination of tenders, it was established that Simard-Beaudry had made an error in their bid price for common excavation. The engineers of the Authority and of the consultants were satisfied that the Company had made a legitimate error in the calculation of the excavation price and therefore they did not deem it advisable to accept the tender which was obviously inadequate and which would not permit completion of the work as required. None of the other tenders was accepted. A case for the forfeiture of the bid bonds did not arise since the tenders were refused.

5. No.

6. Since the Authority did not accept the tender, there are no grounds for legal action.

FOREIGN AID COMMITMENT

Question No. 45—Mr. Lewis:

1. When does the Government of Canada expect to reach the commitment to increase Canada's foreign aid to the dollar equivalent of one percent of the Gross National Product?

2. Does the Government of Canada have a specific time table to reach this foreign aid commitment and, if so, will this plan be tabled in Parliament?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Government is reviewing Canadian policy in the field of development assistance. The review covers the level of development assistance.

2. Parliament will be informed of the results of this review.

DR. JOHN ROBBINS—PUBLIC SERVICE POSITIONS

Question No. 61—Mr. Diefenbaker:

What position and in what departments in the Civil Service or the Public Service did Dr. John Robbins, the Ambassador Designate to the Vatican, hold or occupy during the period from the beginning of 1945 and up to and including the year 1960?

[Mr. Loiselle.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Dr. Robbins was on the staff of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics from 1930 to 1952 when he left the Public Service to join the Grolier Society. At the time of his resignation he was Director of the Education and Information Divisions of DBS.

STUDY OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF BROKERAGE AND INVESTMENT FIRMS

Question No. 66—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Does the Department of Finance know who is to head the study into the effects of foreign ownership of brokerage and investment houses sponsored by the Investment Dealers Association of Canada and the Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal and Canadian stock exchanges?

2. If so, what is the name of the individual?

3. Is this individual a senior vice-president and director of Imperial Oil Co. Ltd.?

4. Is Imperial Oil Co. Ltd. of Canada owned by Standard Oil Co. of the United States?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1, 2, 3 and 4. This is not a matter within the administrative responsibility of the Government of Canada.

PRESCRIPTION INDEX OF CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 71—Mr. Saltsman:

1. At the time Royal Assent was given to Bill C-102, what was the prescription index of the consumer price index for Canada and the major cities of Canada according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

2. For each of the next three months, what was the prescription index of the consumer price index for Canada and the major cities of Canada, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

3. What was the percentage change of the prescription index from the time of Royal Assent to Bill C-102 and the last of the third month, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1, 2 and 3. The following table shows the components which reflect the retail price movement of prescriptions in the Consumer Price Index for Canada and for specific cities. Prescription prices used in the context of the Consumer Price Index are normally collected by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on a quarterly basis, in February, May, August and November, with the index for this item remaining unchanged in the intervening months. The percentage changes in the prescription indexes from May 1969 to August 1969, which are identical to the changes in these indexes from the time of Royal Assent to Bill C-102 (June 27, 1969) to September 1969, is shown in the right-hand column of the table.

1. Is there a special branch of the government printing bureau for printing task force studies, white papers and Royal Commission Reports?

2. If so, what is its manpower and is it fully staffed?

3. Can any approximate measure be given of the capabilities of this group in terms of output?

Questions

ELECTRIFICATION OF RIDEAU CANAL LOCKS

Question No. 100—Mr. Mather:

1. Does the Department of Transport intend to proceed with the electrification of the locks along the Rideau Canal System?

2. If so, has any study been undertaken with regard to the above subject, and if so, who were the people involved in the preparation of this study?

3. Is there an official plan regarding the lock electrification program, and if so, what are main details?

4. What is the expected total cost of the lock electrification for the Rideau Canal System?

5. What are the planned expenditures for each of the coming fiscal years regarding this program?

6. What are the main reasons for proceeding with the electrification of these locks?

7. Is the Department giving favourable consideration to a re-evaluation of this program in view of the important historical and scenic factors?

8. Has a cost-benefit analysis been undertaken of the above program under the Treasury Board's Planning Programming Budgeting System, and if not, why not?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. In the course of reconstructing lock number 36 at Newboro and lock number 13 at Black Rapids, the Department of Transport has installed electrically-activated hydraulic lock machinery. The Department proposes to take no further initiatives of this sort until such time as these improvements have been thoroughly evaluated.

2. Departmental officials have been making a continuing study of lock rehabilitation, reconstruction and operating procedures with assistance from the National Capital Commission and the National and Historic Parks Branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and in consultation with the Government of Ontario and other interested parties.

3. The Department's plan contemplates that a particular lock should be reconstructed at such time as the lock is deemed to have reached imminent failure. The two locks referred to hereover were reconstructed on this basis. If experience warrants and if such a course of action seems justified, electrically-activated hydraulic lock machinery will be installed in other locks when reconstruction becomes necessary.

4. It is postulated that 30 locks will require reconstruction at some time in the next 30 years. Estimated cost is $500,000 per lock, of which $25,000 would be earmarked for electrically-activated hydraulic lock machinery (were same to be installed).

5. No expenditures in this category are planned for the fiscal years 1969-70 and 1970-71.

6. Existing "man-powered" lock machinery does not meet federal and provincial safety standards. Modifications to correct deficiencies would alter the general appearance and the essential character of much of this machinery. In the light of safety requirements, experience to date (at Black Rapids, in particular) suggests that the historical and scenic values inherent in the Rideau Canal System will be protected and enhanced if electrically-activated hydraulic lock machinery is properly designed and put in place and operated with due regard for aesthetic considerations.

7. The Department is most intent upon protecting and enhancing what the Department recognizes as being a unique national asset and will continue to consult and to receive representations from all those who have an interest in the Rideau Canal System: meanwhile, Departmental studies continue.

8. All canal structures have been rebuilt once or twice. The rehabilitation and reconstruction program is a part of the Department's normal operating and maintenance program. No cost-benefit analysis of the Rideau Canal System has been undertaken.

POLICY RESPECTING SUPERSONIC AIRCRAFT

Question No. 132—Mr. Skoberg:

Will the Government of Canada consider issuing a policy statement now that no supersonic transport aircraftaircraft (SST) will be permitted to fly overland in Canada?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No. The conditions under which a supersonic transport aircraft would be permitted to operate over Canada would depend entirely upon whether the aircraft in service conditions could comply with Section 515 (2) of the Air Regulations which provides as follows:

No aircraft shall be flown in such a manner as to create a shock wave the effect of which is to create or likely to create a hazard to other aircraft or to persons or property on the ground.

CONDITIONS ON SMALL COASTAL TUGS

Question No. 337—Mr. Maiher:

Have representations been received from the Western Branch, Canadian Merchant Service Guild, protesting alleged primitive living conditions on small coastal tugs and citing the fact that 21 lives have been lost in the past five years due to operating conditions?

EXPULSION OF FRANK SHEER FROM CAMEROON

Question No. 401—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. Was a Canadian citizen, Frank Sheer, resident of Ottawa, recently expelled from Cameroon by the authorities of that country and under what circumstances?

2. What assistance, leading to release from arrest and confinement, was provided by the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires, Marc Perron, at Yaounde?

3. What protests were made to the Cameroonian Government by Canadian authorities concerning the abusive police treatment received by Mr. Sheer and what was the answer?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. Canadian citizen, Frank Sheer, a resident of Ottawa, on an assignment for International Color Film in Cologne, was expelled from Cameroon by the authorities of that country on November 1, 1969 following the expiry of his visa. Mr. Sheer was detained on October 27 near Bamenda, West Cameroon, taken to Buea on October 28 and transferred by Federal Security Forces to Yaoundé on October 31. Cameroonian authorities held him for interrogation on grounds of engaging in suspicious activities.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Although the region where Mr. Sheer was detained was a long way from the border between Cameroon and Nigeria, the Cameroonian Security Forces' suspicions appear to have been aroused as a result of Mr. Sheer travelling in that region carrying photographic equipment and wearing a bush jacket and haversack similar to those used by Cameroonian soldiers.

2. Mr. Sheer's detention was brought to the attention of the Canadian Embassy by the British Vice-Consul at Buea as soon as he was aware of the situation. The Canadian Chargé d'Affaires, succeeded in obtaining Mr. Sheer's release from detention and in arranging for him to stay in a hotel overnight in Yaoundé prior to his departure from the country on November 1.

3. In his conversation with the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Sheer made no reference to physical abuse at the hands of Cameroonian police authorities.

The Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Yaoundé has, however made representations to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs regarding their security forces' refusal to permit Mr. Sheer to contact a Canadian representative and their failure to inform the Canadian Embassy of the detention of Mr. Sheer.

3. Of these amounts how much was or will be paid to (a) private firms (b) the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): 1. The Department of National Revenue, Taxation, did not have an advertising program designed to encourage Canadians to file tax returns on time during 1967 or 1968. Whatever advertising was done was directed to filing correct returns through the use of the guide provided and available information through the district taxation offices.

JAIL FACILITIES, P.E.I.

Question No. 523—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Since January 1, 1968, was there a request from the Government of Prince Edward Island of the Government of Canada for financial assistance in the improvement of jail facilities in that Province and, if so, what was the nature of the reply?

2. Would the Government of Canada favourably consider a proposal to establish, at its own expense, a jail farm in this Province or would it be prepared to give substantial financial assistance tc the establishment of such a farm?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. No request has been received by the Solicitor General since January 1, 1968 for direct financial assistance in the improvement of jail facilities in the Province of Prince Edward Island, however, a request has been received by the Solicitor General from the Attorney General of that Province to finance a study of the Province's correctional programs. In response, the Province was asked to define in specific terms the breadth of the study proposed so that the methods and personnel needed for such a study might be determined and the financial implications assessed. Finance

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, the government has announced three weeks ago its policy concerning question No. 306. I have asked earlier the Parliamentary Secretary if the question could be allowed to stand, because an answer has already been provided through the press. I am wondering why it is impossible to get an answer in the House.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): An answer has already been requested, Mr. Speaker, and as far as I know it will be given shortly.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK PROFITS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the tremendous increase in profits reported yesterday by all of Canada's chartered banks, and the need to consider imposing regulations to limit interest rates and other service charges.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Waterloo has proposed to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 in the circumstances to which he has just referred. The purpose of the proposed motion is to give this House an opportunity to debate the need to consider imposing regulations to limit interest rates and other service charges.

I must bring to the attention of hon. members that the House itself, by an order adopted October 30, empowered the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to consider the present level of interest rates. Thus the very problem raised by the hon. member is specifically before a standing committee by order of the House. This would seem to indicate that this is the type of situation that, in spite of the circumstances explained by the hon. member, ought not to be the subject of an emergency debate under Standing Order 26. In the circumstances I have to rule that the motion cannot be put to the House at this time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RELATIONS BETWEEN STAFF UNIONS AND TREASURY BOARD—PACE OF BARGAINING

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the statement by the President of the Public Service Alliance of Canada on behalf of 140,000 public employees citing deteriorating relations between the staff unions and Treasury Board on a number of important issues, but most especially the absence of meaningful bargaining on the government's part and the "incredibly slow pace" of current negotiations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River sent me notice of his proposed motion in accordance with Standing Order 26, section (2). Since receiving the hon. member's notice I have had an opportunity to consider the subject matter of the topic which he proposes to raise on a motion to adjourn the House. As has often been said by the Chair in this session and as is repeated in the Standing Order, the question to be determined by the Chair is not the importance of the subject matter but rather the urgency of debate. Perhaps it might be helpful once again to quote the Standing Order and particularly subsection (16)(a) which reads as follows:

> The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration.

There is no doubt in my mind that the relationship between the government and its employees is a matter of particular importance, but I cannot bring myself to feel that the continuing process of bargaining and negotiating is of such immediate urgency as to require the setting aside of the ordinary public business which the House will consider today. In the circumstances the motion proposed by the hon. member should not be put to the House.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY

Motion No. 9—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report by C. B. Haver of Montreal for Northumberland Consultants Limited regarding a review of the cost-benefit evaluation by Stanford Research Institute for a Prince Edward Island causeway as mentioned in answer to question number 1,832 reported in Hansard July 21, 1969 on page 11374.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this motion refers to a review and cost-benefit study undertaken in respect of the studies on the Northumberland Passage. Being a review it was strictly an internal document, privileged, and therefore I would ask if the hon. member would please withdraw his motion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the premise put forward by the minister. In the light of that I suggest we take a vote.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

WOODS TASK FORCE REPORT PROPOSALS

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Governments of each of the provinces regarding the implementation of the proposals in the Report of the Woods Task Force on Labour Relations.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have explained to the hon. member that any correspondence covered by his motion related only to the arrangements for a meeting. Since it would hardly seem worth while to correspond again with the provinces for their permission to table this correspondence, perhaps the hon. member would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this assurance has already been given to me and in light thereof I am happy to withdraw this motion. It is too bad there was not something there to get.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTING AGENCY

Motion No. 44—Mr. Rose:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the task force report regarding the Canadian Educational Broadcasting Agency, referred to by the Secretary of State on October 24, 1968, as reported in Hansard on page 1968.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the motion relates to the production of the final report of the task force on educational broadcasting. This paper does not exist.

As mentioned in my statement of October 24, 1968, on educational television made in the House, the mandate of the task force was to advise the government on educational television and more particularly, on the details of the proposed legislation and on the methods of financing the agency that was then suggested, to ascertain provincial requirements and priorities for the provision of facilities and to advise on the most practical means of satisfying provincial requirements.

The task force has fulfilled its mandate; no final report was expected of the task force. Most of the aspects of the work described above, particularly in relation to the proposed legislation, the methods of financing the agency and the means of satisfying the most urgent provincial requirements—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take the liberty of reminding the minister that he is not allowed to make a statement which should normally be made on motions. The minister should indicate to the House as briefly as possible why the motion is accepted or turned down.

Mr. Pelletier: In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the task force had not been asked to report, but to carry out a certain program.

I would therefore ask the hon. member if he would be good enough to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, since the document apparently does not exist I agree not to request it.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PETITION BY CERTAIN MEMBERS RESPECTING ARCTIC SEAS

Motion No. 93—Mr. Orlikow:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the petition given to the Prime Minister by twenty-five members of the House of Commons asking that Canada declare the Arctic seas as Canadian territorial waters.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no petition as described in the motion has been received by the Prime Minister. Perhaps, therefore, the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I will agree.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

POTASH SHIPMENTS, SASKATCHEWAN TO UNITED STATES

Motion No. 131—Mr. Burton:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan concerning trade and prices of potash shipped from Saskatchewan to the United States.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that while there have been considerable consultations between the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the government of Saskatchewan on this issue, there is no written correspondence on file. In view of this, the minister would ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be dropped?

Mr. Burton: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

SALE OF POTASH TO UNITED STATES

Motion No. 138—Mr. Burton:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence for the period January 1, 1968 to September 30, 1969, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States regarding the sale of potash to the United States.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the only correspondence that the government of Canada has had with the United States government refers to the procedures followed by the United States authorities in their anti-dumping investigation of Canadian potash exports. This exchange is continuing and in these circumstances the production of papers for the period in question would not be in the public interest. In view of this, I hope that the hon. member will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree to this request. I ask that a vote be taken on this motion.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Consequently, I invite the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a vote be taken.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

U.S. POLICY ON VIET NAM—CANADIAN MEMORANDUM INDICATING DISAPPROVAL

Motion No. 206—Mr. Broadbent:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the memorandum submitted by the Government of Canada to the Government of the United States indicating disapproval of President Nixon's recent statement of United States policy on Viet Nam as being unlikely to lead to peace in Viet Nam, as mentioned by the Prime Minister and reported in Hansard November 6, 1969, pages 591 to 592.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister never indicated that a memorandum had been submitted to the American authorities and, as a matter of fact, such a memorandum does not exist.

The Prime Minister discussed the question of Viet Nam with President Nixon, when he visited Washington last April. Furthermore, the Secretary of State for External Affairs also discussed the matter with the American Secretary of State, Mr. Rogers, on that same occasion, and on various other occasions.

Considering that such a memorandum does not exist, I suggest to the hon. member that he withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: That is a reasonable request to which I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—NATIVE PEOPLE EMPLOYED IN MINING

Motion No. 207—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the survey undertaken by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development showing the number of native people employed in mining in the Northwest Territories as referred to by the Minister of Indian Affairs in his address in Yellowknife on November 10, 1969.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, when the mining firms provided the information requested by the hon. member in this motion, they did so on the understanding that the department would not make it public. It would be a breach of faith on the part of the government to release this information and I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order about this matter. The Parliamentary Secretary was kind enough to send me a copy of his proposed remarks. The statement says that when the mining firms provided this information they did so on a confidential basis and therefore it would be a breach of faith to disclose how many native Indian people are working in the mining industry in the territories. The fact of the matter is that the minister on November 10 was able to take what is obviously confidential information and exploit it publicly and politically. Such being the case, I think the information must be provided.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order. The hon. member does not agree with the reasons given by the Parliamentary Secretary. His recourse is either to ask for a vote or suggest that the matter be transferred for debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to transfer the matter and hide it that way, that is its business.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since reference has previously been made to this matter, I wonder if I may ask the President of the Privy Council whether I may soon expect a decision on notice of motion for the production of papers No. 30, having to do with a report on the subject of conflict of interest legislation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT BY CLAUDE EDWARDS RESPECTING BARGAINING RELATIONS WITH GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. After what happened last night I wonder whether he forgot to introduce himself to the House this afternoon. Perhaps there is an Acting Minister to represent the President of the Treasury Board today. Is there an Acting Minister to represent the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: Please stand up.

Another hon. Member: Put the question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask someone on the other side of the House whether, in view of the serious allegation by Mr. Claude Edwards that some members of the government have made thinly veiled threats of economic blackmail, with hints that any increases in salary negotiated at the bargaining table will have to be paid for in lay-offs and redundancies, an appropriate spokesman for the government is prepared to repudiate this statement and deny that such a situation exists or whether, on the other hand, this is the inevitable consequence of the payroll freeze that has been adopted by the government with respect to most departments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition knows that a question normally should be asked in another form. It should be asked directly instead of taking the form of seeking a confirmation or denial of a statement. Subject to this condition and reservation, the question is acceptable to the Chair.

An hon. Member: Who is answering?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the subject dealt with in the question of the Leader of the Opposition is so manifestly exclusively the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board that I am quite certain he and members of the House would want the President of the Treasury Board to make the reply. I shall draw this question to his attention on his return.

An hon. Member: Pretty smooth!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the Minister of Public Works is directing this matter to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board, will he also call to the attention of the minister the charge that the whole pay system in the Public Service is in a state of chaos and ask the minister to make a full statement to the House and give assurances of what measures, if any, are being taken to correct this situation?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I shall draw the attention of the minister to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In these negotiations have the secretary to the President of the Privy Council, the secretary to the President of the Treasury Board and his other representatives been instructed as to the maximum percentage of increase which will be granted? If so, what is that percentage?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know of no such instructions given by either the secretary or by the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Are we to understand from the Prime Minister that the guideline of a 6 per cent or 7 per cent increase in wages for government employees is not now in effect?

Mr. Trudeau: Nor has it ever been, Mr. Speaker.

DELAY IN ISSUING RETROACTIVE PAY CHEQUES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister say whether the lengthy delay in honouring the retroactive pay commitments to civil servants is because the minister is holding the funds in order to keep the cash position of the treasury solvent?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would like to say that such is not the case. With the tremendous success of the Canada Savings Bonds campaign, our cash balances are good.

Mr. Baldwin: Why don't you pay your bills then?

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the scathing indictment of Mr. Edwards regarding the government's attitude toward its own pensioners, can the Prime Minister give the House a date when the decision will be made with regard to this matter? I ask this in view of the evasive answers and the procrastination we have received from the President of the Treasury Board.

FINANCE

BANK PROFITS—ALLEGED FAILURE TO EXERCISE RESTRAINT

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In view of the excessive profits now reported by all banks, will the minister inform the House whether it is his intention to make a statement indicating this country's disapproval of the failure of the banks to practice restraint in this inflationary period?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all I have seen, like my hon. friend, is the report in this morning's Globe and Mail. I am studying it. I will comment on it after I have had a chance to compare the preliminary figures with the actual figures that are available to the Inspector General of Banks.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to understand from the minister's reply that after studying the report in the paper he will make a statement on the banks' position?

Mr. Benson: I will certainly consider the matter, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Minister of Finance tell us whether the profits of the Bank of Canada, our most eminent financial institution, are presently comparable to those of the chartered banks?

[English]

Mr. Benson: It is a pretty good operation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the banks have shown large profits, is the minister prepared to discuss with the presidents of the various chartered banks the lowering of interest rates in regard to those programs basically guaranteed by the government, such as farm improvement loans, house improvement loans and various other loans?

Mr. Benson: I suggest that the hon. member should attend the standing committee that is studying interest rates so that he may put his great knowledge before that committee and enable them to come back to the House with reports and suggestions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Before I ask my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I might just make this reply—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wants to make a reply, he will have to do so on another occasion. He may ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will reshape my thoughts and rephrase my question. I ask the Minister of Finance, through Your Honour, if he thinks that the present rates of interest of 8½ per cent to 10 per cent being charged on certain loans are fair in light of the profits of the banks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think interest rates are too damn high.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question and answer are out of order.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PREVENT EXTRAVAGANT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to the Secretary of State.

Since it is generally admitted that the Company of Young Canadians is infested with separatists and people in revolt, does the minister intend to take action in order to prevent the wasting of public funds by putting an end to this extravagance throughout Canada?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, to answer that part of the intervention which is a question, I must say that the parliamentary committee studying the problem to which, I think, the hon. member is referring, is to submit its report Friday.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Is the secretary of State aware that the Company of Young Canadians is doing television programs in Rouyn-Noranda—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member's question is not in order.

ABANDONMENT OF PROJECT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the announcement made this morning by the director of the Company of Young Canadians, Mr. Vidal, to the effect that he might have to decide whether he should withdraw his financial support and the cooperation of his members to St. Henri's workers' committee, does the Secretary of State know about this decision? Has he been consulted and can he tell us whether other projects will also be discontinued soon?

Mr. Pelletier: No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

EASTERN QUEBEC—NEGOTIATION OF NEW FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Could he tell the House whether or not he has received an invitation from Mr. Marcel Masse, of the province of Quebec, to take part in a summit meeting with all the members of parliament from the Lower Saint Lawrence area, the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of negotiating a new federal-provincial agreement on the economic development of Eastern Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the interesting suggestion he is now bringing forth could fortunately be considered at the time of adjournment.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

EFFECT ON CONFERENCE OF SPEECH BY HEALTH AND WELFARE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker? Did the government give approval to the remarks prepared for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and delivered last night by his Parliamentary Secretary at Sault Ste. Marie? If so, does the Prime Minister consider that this sort of partisan speech will assist progress at the constitutional conference next week?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me the question as asked is argumentative. I do not think it is acceptable.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ACCIDENT ON AIRCRAFT CARRIER "BONAVENTURE"

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. Has he any report to make to the House regarding the unfortunate tragic incident on board the aircraft carrier Bonaventure? I might take this opportunity to express the sympathy of all members to the next of kin of the victims.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much having to inform the House that four members of the crew of the aircraft carrier Bonaventure died early this morning after they were overcome by aviation gas fumes on board the ship. The four men were carrying out fuel tank venting operations when they were overcome about 4.40 a.m. this morning, Atlantic standard time. The names of those killed will be announced after their next of kin have been informed. The removal of aviation gas fumes from these tanks is standard operating procedure. A board of inquiry has been ordered. I join the hon. member in his expression of sympathy to the next of kin.

TRADE

POSSIBLE BRITISH ENTRY INTO ECM—SAFEGUARDING OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. On Monday I asked the Prime Minister what attitude the Canadian government was adopting with regard to Britain's potential entry into the European Common Market. The Prime Minister indicated that he was making this his responsibility. I wonder if he is in a position to tell the House whether he will be making a statement on motions and, if so, when?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am afraid the hon. member misunderstood my answer, Mr. Speaker. When this question was asked on Monday I remarked that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce would be answering questions the next day, which was yesterday. I do not know if the hon. member was here yesterday or if he forgot his question, but if he will look at Hansard I believe this is what he will see. My answer is the same. The department will be answering questions tomorrow.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest respect, the Prime Minister said that he was making this matter his responsibility; at least, I interpreted him in that way. I apologize if I am wrong; I will question the appropriate minister.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

CHARGES RESPECTING OPERATIONS OF COUNCIL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[Mr. Groos.]

In view of the serious charges by members of the Canadian Consumers Council that the council has spent a year in almost total idleness, is torn by bitter internal dissension and is gagged by the chairman, will the minister investigate these charges and inform the House of his findings?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I wrote to the members of the council and asked each of them individually for his views on the role and structure of the council. I now have those views. I also informed the council some time ago that I would be meeting with them to discuss whether there should be any change in the role or structure of the council.

I have read the report to which the hon. member refers and from reading the report all I can say is that one can only have some sympathy for the chairman in view of the divergent views which were expressed.

Mrs. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the particular charge that nothing meaningful has been done to look into ways to help low income consumers, will the minister now consider appointing representatives from the low income consumers to the council?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I asked the council more than a year ago in my first speech to the council to examine questions and problems relating to the low income consumer. They have not yet reported to me on that subject. As I said a moment ago, I have asked the members of the council to give me their views whether there should be a change in the role or structure of the council, and I will be weighing those views to determine whether some changes should be made.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—STUDY OF U.S. METHODS OF CONTROL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made last night by the man who has been appointed by the government to control the increase in the cost of living, the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, that Canada has done worse than the United States in controlling inflation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of the hon. member that it is irregular and contrary to long established practice during the question period to ask questions in the form now used by the hon. member. A question has to be asked directly. It should not include statements or declarations made outside the House.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with Your Honour. We would prefer to proceed immediately to our questions, but the members of this government have to be filled in before we can ask them. My question is: Is it now the intention of the government to study very carefully the methods being employed by the United States to control inflation so that the methods being used by Canada can be improved as much as possible?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the part of the question which was bootlegged in, I can see the context. It is obvious that Mr. Young was talking about Canada and the United States but not about the Canadian government. The Canadian government, I submit, has done considerably better than the United States government in controlling inflation. However, in Canada there are also provincial governments and the private sector of the economy, as well as the international flow of economics, which also cause inflation. But as far as the federal government is concerned we have done beautifully.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's answer I would simply ask him this: Does he ever get a stiff neck from keeping his head in the sand for so much of the time?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—PROTEST RESPECTING TORTURE OF PRISONERS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Following the recent report of the European Human Rights Commission, which stated that the government of Greece is currently practising, as a normal administrative procedure, the torture of prisoners in their jails, has the Canadian government issued any kind of protest to this fellow member of NATO?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this report of the commission but I will consult the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the matter.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the obligations of NATO countries, and in light of this report, will the government consider taking action within NATO to ensure that these practices cease or, in the alternative, that Greece no longer remains a member of NATO?

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to clarify a question I put to the Prime Minister. Once he checks into the report of torture in Greek prisons, is it the intention of the Prime Minister, if the report is confirmed, to file a protest with the Greek government?

Mr. Trudeau: The intention I expressed was to discuss the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

NATO—EMPHASIS ON NUCLEAR RETALIATORY ROLE—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister regarding NATO and reports that NATO intends to emphasize its nuclear retaliatory role. Does this indication of intention affect the decision of the government of Canada to drop its nuclear role?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. We announced that our nuclear role would be phased out and that remains our decision.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government of Canada involved in the current discussion within NATO which evidently has as its goal the upgrading of the nuclear capability of the alliance in Europe?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would have to check whether we are currently involved in this discussion. I do know that there is a committee of NATO, composed of a group of NATO countries, some of which have nuclear capability and others not, which has discussed the strategy of NATO in the nuclear area, but I do not think that Canada is at present a member of that committee.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question. Is the government of Canada prepared to participate in discussions relating to NATO's nuclear role?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are not a member of that committee, but if we were admitted to membership on the committee we would naturally put forward our point of view. Our point of view is the one stated in the House, namely, that as far as Canada is concerned we have decided that we should phase out our nuclear role in NATO.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

BRIEFING OF MEMBERS PRECEDING CONFERENCE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the federal-provincial conference commences next Monday, would the Prime Minister consider holding a briefing session for all Members of Parliament on the position of the federal government, similar to the one held in regard to the white paper on taxation?

Some hon. Members: Ho, ho, ho!

Mr. Brewin: Don't worry; we already know it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I informed the House that I would table the government position tomorrow. We would be prepared to have this position explained to any Members of Parliament who are interested, though I observe that the NDP does not appear to be interested. We would be prepared to have officials brief any member of any party who wants to understand the government position before starting to cry "ho, ho, ho".

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS ON LEGISLATION TO CONTROL PRICE INCREASES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I might point out that the "ho, ho, ho" came about because a meeting has already been arranged and announced. That was the reason for the exclamation.

May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, one of which he took notice a week ago today. I asked the minister whether he had made representations to the premiers of the various provinces in regard to whether they would be willing to introduce enabling legislation to give the Prices and Incomes Commission concurrent power to deal with unjustified price increases?

An hon. Member: Here comes Santa Claus.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I promised the hon. member, I did look into this question. I have had no direct correspondence requesting this kind of permission. As the Prime Minister has indicated, there is to be a further federal-provincial meeting early next year at which this general question will be discussed. I should also like to inform the hon. member that the ministers of finance and provincial treasurers are intending to meet following the constitutional conference next week, and this question will undoubtedly come up in our discussions.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister's answer was about what was going to happen in the future and inasmuch as he has been complaining for a year that he does not have the necessary power, may I ask the minister why no appeals have been made to the provinces to introduce concurrent legislation granting power to deal with rising living costs?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate how high, in his opinion, the cost of living will be permitted to go before it becomes so unacceptable as to warrant some action being taken by the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BROADCASTING

EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION—INQUIRY AS TO AGREED DEFINITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask a supplementary question but it was not really a supplementary question and would have been ruled out. Therefore, I ask it directly of the Secretary of State. Will he indicate whether in fact there was an agreed definition of educational television, as reported in the press today, between the government and the various provinces? Is it the minister's intention to make a statement in the House or in a press release outside the House, and was this definition unanimous?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the definition has been unanimously approved by the provinces and the federal government. I have not yet considered whether this question would be of sufficient interest to the House to justify a statement on motions, but I am quite willing to consider this possibility.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on whether it is important enough for the House, but educational television is important for the country. Does the definition now open the way for various provincial bodies to use the CBC as an agent for educational television?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: The possibility already existed, but an agreement would greatly facilitate the arrangements the provinces themselves have asked us to make to ensure educational television broadcasting.

[English]

TRANSPORT

IMPLEMENTATION OF PART III OF NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Transport has had the benefit of two days of what I have been informed were very fruitful discussions with his provincial counterparts, will he tell the House when we may expect the implementation of Part III of the National Transportation Act?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have just concluded very fruitful discussions with the provinces during which it was noted that the federal intention was to declare Part III when negotiations are completed, perhaps within a matter of a few weeks. Perhaps this will take place in January or February.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING GOVERNMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, now that the Right Hon. Prime Minister has had an opportunity to meet personally with the members of the Yukon council, can he inform the House whether the government has been persuaded to accept some of the reasonable recommendations in respect of greater self-government for this body?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the meetings which took place yesterday were the occasion of a good exchange by members of the Council and the government members present. I think I can say there was general agreement by the council in respect of the position taken by the minister, except on two points. We have already agreed to accept the Council's recommendations for change on one of the two points, and we have said we will consider the other point.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister indicate at this stage whether there will be a similar change in plans for the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Trudeau: There have been no representations by the Northwest Territories on this particular statement by the minister, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, I do not know what particular things they would want us to change.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am speaking of representations by members of the Northwest Territories Council.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INTERIM INCREASE PENDING WHITE PAPER ON SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that having to wait for the government to produce the white paper on social security is resulting in considerable delay in increasing the amount of the old age security pension, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the government will consider granting an interim increase in those pensions as a way of saying Merry Christmas to our retired people?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, there is acceleration in benefits in accordance with the cost of living index for old age pensioners.

Some hon. Members: Ho, ho, ho!

Mr. Munro: The hon. member is further aware that under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government shares equally with the provinces any increased benefits payable to people in need.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will not comment on the $1.58 increase, Mr. Speaker. Is the government going to do anything at all at this session for our retired people—anything at all?

Inquiries of the Ministry

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RIGHT OF ACCESS

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the federal government's right of access to the superport at Roberts Bank expires at the end of this month, and in view of the fact that several millions of dollars have been spent on the project, will the Minister of Transport advise the House whether permanent access to the port has been acquired by the federal government?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the first two premises are not entirely correct. In respect of the third, the main part of the question, negotiations are still proceeding with the Government of British Columbia.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—LABOUR UNREST—CONTINUITY OF OPERATIONS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has evolved a system satisfactory to the government of Prince Edward Island which will guarantee continuous operation of ferry service to that province at times when it might otherwise be interrupted by labour difficulties?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, while I am not at all certain at the moment whether negotiations proceeding today have reached an amicable solution, the indication is that they are headed in that direction and when a solution is found it will be one meeting the requirements set out by the hon. member.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could specifically assure us that the removal of the MV Confederation from the home port of Borden will not take place or be disadvantageous to the number of employees presently engaged on that ship?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): At the moment, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter entirely for the negotiations to which I referred. I repeat that I believe these negotiations are going satisfactorily and that the result will be somewhat close to what the hon. member has requested. I would prefer not to say anything specific because I will not really know the answer until the negotiations are completed, I hope some time today.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Is he in a position today to announce the name of the Commissioner of Languages?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

SHIPPING

SINKING OF FISHING VESSEL—REQUEST FOR STATIONING OF RESCUE SHIP AT SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. This is his busy day, I guess. In view of the fact that another five lives were lost in the most recent marine disaster a few miles off the coast of Sydney, will the minister now give consideration to the stationing of a permanent search and rescue vessel in Sydney harbour?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Considerably before this unfortunate accident occurred I had asked for, and indeed it is under way, a study of how we might improve search and rescue facilities. There was a new ship launched a few days ago which is to be employed in this service. No ultimate decision has been reached as to where she will be stationed. If Sydney turns out to be the spot where she can do the most good that certainly will be it, but we do not know yet which is the best way of dealing with the matter.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ESTABLISHMENT OF CO-ORDINATING COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Devco has been given further burdens in respect of financing, will the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion now take immediate action to set up the co-ordinating committee agreed to over two years ago?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the setting up of these co-ordinating committees had been anticipated even prior to the creation of Devco. Neither the province nor ourselves have felt the need so far of establishing that advisory committee. We will do so as soon as we deem it necessary.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to ask a supplementary question without making an observation. The minister suggests there is no need for a committee, yet outsiders are being hired by Devco replacing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: —those who the minister indicated the other day were laid off. Will the minister now indicate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Speak up.

Mr. Speaker: I am very grateful to hon. members for their assistance, but I suggest we might give the hon. member an opportunity to ask his question.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the minister now take steps to discourage the hiring of these outsiders brought in to replace displaced Devco workers?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that Devco is an independent crown corporation whose management therefore must be carried out independently of the government. My only responsibility is to report to the House on steps taken by this company as I am not empowered to do the hiring for Devco.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister why, when speaking the other day of the freeze, he tied in the Crown companies with the Public Service and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We will shortly be running out of time. However, the hon. member might put his supplementary.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, could the minister advise whether he has yet found a chairman for the board who would be qualified to straighten out some of the problems which are arising?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We are making progress.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON PRICE STABILITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he intends to proceed with the establishment of a parliamentary committee to consider the question of price stability, which I understood was to be part of the program followed by the government? I ask this question particularly in view of the apparent failure of his other anti-inflationary measures. Does the minister propose to have this committee established and, if so, at an early date?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not of course accept the premise of the hon. member's question. It is rather disappointing that he tries from time to time to pour scorn on the Prices and Incomes Commission.

Mr. Stanfield: I have not tried to yet.

Mr. Basford: In so far as the question is concerned, I thought I would be able to count on a more co-operative and more helpful attitude from the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Hees: Just answer the question.

Mr. Basford: The answer is yes.

PATENTS

ALLEGED COLLUSION BY PHARMACEUTICAL MANUFACTURERS IN NOT APPLYING FOR LICENCES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I should like to ask the minister whether he can indicate to the House if he is investigating the very serious and important matter of the apparent collusion of members of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association in not applying for drug licences under the revised Patent Act passed last session, and could he make a report to the House later this week?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the report that obviously prompted the question. If the hon. member has information which he thinks I should have, I wish he would give it to me immediately. Pursuant to the amendments to the Patent Act made last session, we have received some 50 applications for compulsory licences. Those 50 applications are being processed by the Commissioner of Patents. If the hon. member has some information in respect of collusion, I would certainly like to have it.

TRANSPORT

COAL—APPLICATION BY GREAT NORTHERN AND KOOTENAY ELK RAILWAYS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the Canadian Transport Commission received an application from the Great Northern Railway Company and the Kootenay Elk Railway Company for permission to build lines into the United States and back into Canada at the Pacific coast for the purpose of carrying coal to the Pacific coast via the United States?

Mr. Speaker: The question should be placed on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—DIVERSION OF MONEY TO HEALTH RESOURCES PROJECTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As a result of a number of statements which have been made I should like to ask him whether there was at any time any suggestion on his part or on the part of the government that some of the money paid to the premier of the province of Ontario for medicare be diverted to make up for the withdrawal of federal funds from the health resources fund.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATION AT CONFERENCES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the province of Ontario will be having municipal representation at the coming federal-provincial conference, can the Prime Minister now state that it is government policy to have at future federal-provincial conferences municipal representation as requested by the provinces?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member's question refers to the immediately forthcoming conference. If not, I would think the question should be placed on the Order Paper or a statement made in due course.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might rephrase the question. In view of the fact it has been stated that the province of Ontario will have municipal representation at the coming federal-provincial conference, can the Prime Minister now state whether it is the policy of the federal government to welcome and accept municipal representation at federal-provincial conferences.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member he is asking for a policy statement which is not immediately urgent.

SCIENCE SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I have a question for the Prime Minister. In the light of the report to be released by the United Nations Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development are the minister and the government actively considering the establishment of the position of minister of science?

Mr. Speaker: This is the type of question which could well be placed on the Order Paper.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROFITS OF FARM EQUIPMENT MANUFACTURERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can the minister say whether the government will instruct the Prices and Incomes Commission to examine, as requested by the Saskatchewan Farmers Union, the inflationary profits made by the farm equipment manufacturers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): There is a report which my colleague the Minister of Agriculture will be dealing with very shortly on the question of prices of farm machinery. I think it would be premature to decide to do anything until we see that report and analyse it.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has he considered the anti-inflationary policy of the Minister of Finance in order to determine whether this includes the approval of unsolicited offers of personal loans by finance companies which urge people across the country to borrow money at high interest rates at this time of the year when there is a high degree of spending?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion just made a distinction between Crown corporations and the public service. I should like to refer to the minister's reply to me on November 26, 1969 when he had this to say as recorded at page 1273 of Hansard in the first column:

> Mr. Speaker, there has been a freeze on hirings at Devco as well as in most government departments and Crown Corporations for over a year.

Today, the minister has tried to separate Crown corporations from the public service when last week he linked them together. I think the least we can expect is an honest answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that there is some measure of disorder in the House during statements made by hon. members. I would invite them not to forget what the rules and practice of the House are regarding exchanges across the floor.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

The House resumed from Tuesday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-7, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, last night when the House rose I was discussing the problem of transportation and the thousands of cars that were travelling from the Georgian Bay area—I notice in Hansard it is shown as "Thunder Bay" when it should be "Georgian Bay"—to Toronto and the general Lake Ontario area to the west and the east. I pointed out that there would be roughly well over one million people going to work morning and night using motor cars which carry from one to four or five people, each of these cars spewing out poisonous gas from their exhausts.

When one considers, as I stated last night, that this is the industrial heartland of Canada and that almost one third of the federal income tax comes from that area, one realizes that not only is it a very important area but also becoming a congested one. With the density of the population increasing, by the year 2,000, according to the statisticians and the information that we have received, the area will be almost solidly built-up from Lake Ontario to Georgian Bay.

I do not believe that we are looking at this matter in proper realistic fashion. As I said before, there are numerous railway lines and roads going out of Toronto. Paralleling one another there is highway 400, highway 27 and highway 11 going north, and going west there is highway 401 and several other highways. Again, paralleling those are the railway lines. All we have to do is to think for a minute of the problem which, according to some people, is the greatest problem confronting us today, namely the problem of pollution, particularly air pollution.

You will see hanging over our cities great clouds of air pollution—Toronto is a good example. Every one of the cars that travel along the roads contributes to the pollution. A great many of these cars are used by people who go to work in Metropolitan Toronto. Anyone who has had the experience of travelling in the rush hour in Toronto will know that it takes just about as long to get out to the city limits as it does to travel over the next 60 miles. There is a congestion of cars travelling at a snails pace, pouring out poisonous gases which form a cloud over our city.

I say that the government today is very lax in bringing out a Canada water act and not bringing forth a Canada air pollution act. All you have to do is to drive into those cities and look them over. You will find a great cloud handing over them because all the poisonous gases rise up and form an umbrella. Then, condensation takes place, a fog forms over the area and finally comes down. I say to the government that the railway companies are derelict when they allow the abandonment of railway service, thus forcing people to use their cars to a greater extent to go to and from work, causing more congestion on the roads. This is the age of automation and of motor car travel. Very shortly this area will become so polluted we will have to devise ways and means to get all these people to work so that not only the whole city but surrounding area will not be poisoned as it is now to the point where many respiratory diseases such as emphysema are on the increase. Air pollution also contributes to many other respiratory diseases and may play a significant role in others.

The hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu) made a very moving speech on behalf of his constituents. As he pointed out, the railway officials have been derelict in not listening to the people who live in that area. The same thing is occurring in the area to which I have drawn the attention of the House. Not only does it include Toronto but also the Hamilton area, and I am surprised that some hon. members on the other side of the House have not spoken on this subject because it certainly concerns them also.

Members of the provincial legislature are concerned about the matter, such as the member for Simcoe Centre and the member for Simcoe East. I believe also that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts) was one of those who took a train ride on the Go-Go Special which proved very conclusively that this train can be run at a profit. I am saying that railroad specialists have been hypocritical and the government has been derelict in allowing the railways to abandon railway lines, thus allowing the atmosphere to be polluted because more people are forced to use their cars to get to work. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) indicated, this area may very well be the site of a new airport which will add to the pollution of the area and to traffic congestion. In addition, in the four summer months many tourists come to the area, bringing with them thousands and thousands of dollars to spend in Canada. They come in in their motor cars, further polluting the air and adding to traffic congestion and traffic accidents.

Surely, something can be done to provide better service for people in that area. For example, the Northland Railroad could be utilized for this purpose. I have here in my hand a document entitled "The Ride of the Go-Go Special; a Test Run for Commuter Service". The railways are saying that this service is not economical and they are dissuading people from using it. They do not provide good service on it and they do not invite us to use it, nor are they trying to make things comfortable for passengers. In fact, it is just the opposite. I want to say to the House that this particular service pays its way. A test run was made at the expense of private individuals to prove that it could be run efficiently and economically, that in this way air pollution could be cut down, and that in the long run it would save the government millions of dollars in expense besides giving a worthwhile service. I warn the government that sooner or later they will have to take steps to combat air pollution in this area. They already have to do it in London and in other congested areas.

The results of the test run are very interesting. The total gross profit from the run amounted to $892. At one time transportation was the right of the people. Here is a service that pays for itself. I say that if the federal government and the provincial government, if necessary, do not co-operate to control air pollution, and traffic congestion they will be derelict in their duty and the people should force them to take action.

I should like to conclude by saying that since this service has been tested at the expense of private individuals and not with government funds, it is a proven method of transportation which people will use—if given the opportunity and proper service—and will be meeting and dealing effectively with the problems of tomorrow. You, Mr. Speaker, know that to drive a motor car costs about 15 cents a mile. These people can ride to work on the railroad for approximately three cents a mile. They will use such a service, and it will cut down on the pollution on which, sooner or later, the government must take action. It has already taken action by means of the Canada Water Act; the next thing will be a Canada air pollution act.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the powers that be in transportation had better take a long look at their methods of discontinuing passenger lines, and giving poorer and poorer service so that the public will not use the remaining lines. The people have a right to expect better than this. The government should immediately get busy before we have a huge problem that will cost us millions of dollars to solve.

Look at the water pollution that we have now. We are suffering millions of dollars of loss because of it. We do not know yet what our losses will be because of air pollution. I conclude by saying that the Department of Transport and the government had better get busy and examine their policy with respect to the closing of railway lines and the calling of services and the cutting of services.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to belabour this debate on Bill C-7, but since the bill was first presented I have received a large number of letters and telegrams from people, particularly in Edmonton and the surrounding areas, who are going to be affected by the elimination of passenger service in Canada. At this time I would like to read into Hansard two press releases. The first is a press release from a meeting of the members of railway unions on the elimination of CNR trains Nos. 5 and 6, the "Panorama", held in Edmonton on November 14, 1969. I quote:

The elimination of Canadian National Railways trains No. 6 and No. 5, the "Panorama" has been the subject of a meeting held in Edmonton today attended by representatives and members of Railway Labour Unions and others concerned with a loss of important railway transportation service to communities, towns and cities across the country.

At a time when the matter of public transportation is being given intense scrutiny in order to determine the requirements of the travelling public an important service is to be dropped increasing the burden on remaining available transportation facilities which are in turn in the process of being considered for abandonment.

A large number of railway employees with up to ten or more years of service will be laid off increasing the number of unemployed in our city. As an example: the number of employees in Edmonton actually operating the trains to be eliminated numbers 40. Add to this all of those involved in other departments and the numbers are substantial.

All of the railway employees involved are members of a community who works to provide service to their community making them more than just employees and it is because of this fact that we met today to ask other members of the community to question the whole matter of transportation in order to determine what direction it is headed.

We urge our fellow citizens to write to their members of parliament, to ask questions of those whose responsibility it is to provide them with a decent way to go from one place to another and to request that investigation be continued by appropriate committees as to just what is happening to the public transportation dollar.

Subsidization of public services is an accepted fact. They must be maintained in the interest of the public good and well-being. Railway service is the only available means of transportation which a great number of Canadians can afford to use and it is incumbent upon the country to provide it.

We request those who use our railways to join us in protesting elimination of services in a haphazard manner. It is a loss to their way of life; it is a loss of our livelihood.

The second press release is titled, "Incredible Canadian." It is an article by an outstanding columnist on the Edmonton Journal, Art Evans. I quote:

—another "Incredible Canadian" is in the news.

I refer to the CPR's transcontinental "name train" which the company claims lost $19.6 million in 1968.

The figure may be accurate but it seems incredible in view of the tales one has heard about requests for space being turned down because none was available. These gave me the impression that The Canadian was doing a brisk business.

This impression was supported on several occasions last summer when I had an opportunity to watch The Canadian pass through Calgary. There were faces looking out from every window but perhaps they were only painted on to conceal the sad truth that, inside, the train was practically empty except for crew members. In fairness to the company I must admit that I was only a trackside watcher and did not actually walk through the coaches counting "real" passengers. And so it is entirely possible that my impression of The Canadian as a busy carrier was quite mistaken.

Still, if all those faces at the window were real and represented flesh-and-blood passengers, an operating loss of close to $20 million does seem somewhat on the high side. One is curious to know every detail of the costing formula applied.

For example it would not be fair to charge against The Canadian the cigars smoked by William Van Horne during the building of the railway, or the refreshments (if any) served at the last spike ceremony in 1885. It is not suggested such charges are included in The Canadian's operating costs but official assurance on this point would be welcomed by the public.

Presumably, Canada's Transportation Commission will closely examine passenger loss figures submitted by the railways in applications to abandon certain services. What follows next should be determined by the commission's findings.

I have many other letters of protest here. One is from John L. Pickett, Secretary-Treasurer local 861 of the United Transportation Union. There is one from Mr. Ralph Dent, President, Brotherhood Railway Carmen of the United States and Canada. There is another from Mr. English, Executive Secretary of the Edmonton and District Labour Council I could read quite a few of these letters into the record, Mr. Speaker.

Obviously what is happening is that the government is hiding behind the CNR. The government should simply tell the CNR that it will not allow essential rail services to be cut. Instead, the government is washing its hands, taking the attitude that it is none of its business. What of the people of this country? What of the many hundreds, even thousands in western Canada, deprived of rail service because of the government's failure? We have had the same story from the government for too long. To hear this government, it has no control over anything.

A few days ago the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) appeared before a committee and said the government had no control over the Company of Young Canadians. The government has no control over the CBC. The only thing the government makes any effort to control is the press. It set up a committee to do that. As we heard today, the government has no control over Devco. The government has cut itself off from reality. Recently, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went out to the mountains and delivered himself of some observations on genetics of the future. He said humans would be produced in the same way as chickens are produced. I feel my hon. friend from Huron would be a greater expert than the Prime Minister in that respect.

This statement is not surprising since the Prime Minister views the taxpayers as so many chickens. His government has been plucking them like chickens for some time.

[Mr. Paproski.]

He said his party was a supermarket of ideas. At times it sounded more like a bargain basement.

These projected rail cuts have aroused a great deal of resentment in western Canada. I want to call the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to a statement made by D. N. Secord, Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. He is a union official and represents a great many of the people who will suffer if the CNR goes ahead with these cuts. He said, and I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of November 11:

It is folly even to consider such drastic cuts in train passenger runs at a time when our highways and airways are becoming dangerously overcrowded.

Surely, the government must be aware of this. I am one of those who, on occasion, has seen fit to register complaints about air service both east and west to and from Edmonton. Now, the CNR is going to make the situation worse by reducing rail service.

At times it is almost impossible to get accommodation either by rail or by air. Certainly, this is no time to be cutting out essential passenger service. As Mr. Secord pointed out, the CNR logged over 2,000,000 passenger miles last year. Surely, the Minister of Transport is aware that even a small part of this load would bog down the airlines completely. After all, he has his Newfoundland Bullet, why should he deprive western Canada of service?

For far too long the CNR and the CPR both have made these decisions in their own interests, rather than in the interests of the affected taxpayers. It is time the government stepped in and asserted its authority. The answer is, of course, that the CNR wants to reserve the railways for more profitable freight traffic because they feel passengers can be transported more cheaply by bus. Since the railways generally have a piece of the bus lines, they cannot lose.

As far as the public is concerned, the railways are still echoing Commodore Vanderbilt's remark: "The public be damned." He was a railway magnate, also. But times have changed, and the people in this country have some rights. They are not going to be deprived of essential services by high-handed railway decisions. Transportation and communication are two of the most essential services in a modern state. I point out to the minister that this steady cannibalization of rail services is going to end in disaster.

The elimination of essential lines serving a major metropolitan area like Edmonton is a slap in the face to one of Canada's major cities and a blow to development. When British Columbia came into the Dominion in 1871, one of the conditions was the establishment of essential rail services within ten years. Now, the CNR is attempting to whittle away at services at a time when growing population and shipping demands must be met.

The railways remain Canada's principal means of transportation and retain a crucial role in opening up new areas. An example was the 400-mile Pine Point Railway opened in 1964, opening up a rich new copper and zinc find for processing and distribution. The 230-mile Alberta Resources Railway is another example where public confidence in the country's future spurred the building of new facilities.

In 1966, the railways moved 41 per cent of Canada's freight, compared to 9.4 per cent moved by trucks. Surely, they are getting their share of freight haulage. The less lucrative passenger lines have been steadily removed. In 1966, for example, the railways moved only 3.9 per cent of passenger traffic, compared to 84 per cent moved by automobile, 5.3 per cent moved by bus and 6.5 per cent moved by air. When you look at the human factor, and this is something the railways seem to forget, you find that the railways employ 150,000 Canadians; they have a $1 billion payroll; they have revenues of $1½ billion and they have expenses of $1.4 billion.

When you look at passenger and freight service in terms of volume, you find that in 1960 the railways carried 158 million tons; in 1968, they carried 224 million tons; in 1960, they carried 19 million passengers, and in 1968, they carried 22.5 million passengers. The picture, then, is a constant expansion on the freight hauling side and a moderate expansion in passengers. But even so, surely with 22.5 million passengers, that traffic cannot be a total loss. As far as can be seen from the figures, the railways are taking more and more out of the country and putting less and less back in.

One hundred years ago, they promised they would take Canadians for a ride—they are still taking Canadians for a ride! It is time the government stepped in and laid down the law to these autocratic power barons with single-track minds. We have a railway Tsar in this country and the Minister of Transport is the Tsarovich, that is the son of a Tsar. The Tsar is a former government minister, the former member for Bonavista-Twillingate, whose memory has been overshadowed by the achievements of the present member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

Why does not the government call on the chairman of the Transport Commission to exercise the enormous and autocratic powers they gave him? The time has come to enforce a square deal for Canadians—not a square wheel, such as we have been getting. I say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, act now!

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I had really no intention of taking part in this debate until I heard the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). I want to say to you and the members of the House that I agree almost completely with what he said.

I would just remind members of this House, in talking about the railway situation in Canada, that a hundred years ago there was a fellow by the name of Sir John A. Macdonald who united this Canada of ours by building not one, but two, railways from Halifax to Vancouver. He did not have the money to do this nor did he have the machinery, but he went ahead and did it just the same. Today, in my opinion, the leaders of our railways are tearing up those lines. Mr. Speaker, that is not the way I would develop Canada. I agree whole-heartedly that there are two sides to the question. I agree we cannot continually carry lines that lose money on a day to day basis. On the other hand, I think there is a half way measure that railway leaders should accept.

One of the things the leaders should accept is a deal made 100 years ago which has been renewed many times. This deal was a two way street with the government giving so much and the railways agreeing to give so much. I think the government—otherwise the people of Canada—have held up their end of the bargain but I am not at all sure that the Presidents of the Canadian National Railways and the Presidents of the Canadian Pacific Railway kept their end.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I know as an absolute fact that in many small areas in the province of Ontario certain documents were signed many years ago. When I say "many", I mean 40 or 50. In these documents the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways guaranteed service to particular towns or villages as long as the waters went down the creek, as long as the moon shone, or whatever it may be. In return the railways received several thousands of dollars from the municipalities concerned in order to have the railway lines go through. Now I say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway is going to stop this service they had better think about repaying some of that money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Whicher: We have their signatures right on the line. Governments can change, and policies can change but as far as the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways are concerned, documents signed 50 years ago should be good today. I do not think they are doing a very good job.

• (3:50 p.m.)

A moment ago I said that some railway lines in Canada must be abandoned. Operations over them must cease, as we all agree. Many such lines have already been abandoned. Nevertheless, as representatives of the people of Canada we have the obligation of telling the government that the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific should abide by their obligations. The railways were a party to the contracts and we, members of Parliament who represent various constituencies in this country, are under the obligation of telling the government that our two major railways have not done at all badly. One, in particular, which is privately owned and works on a free enterprise basis, has not done at all badly. I say this in a kindly way because I appreciated the speech the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) made yesterday. I think he made an outstanding oration and put before us many outstanding facts which those of us who have not been here as long as others were glad to hear. I think the government and the heads of the railway companies would do well to heed his observations.

May I say this in conclusion, Mr. Speaker. Our railways, the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National, are under an obligation to carry out their side of the bargain and we, as members of the House of Commons, must insist that if we are to keep to our side of the bargain the railways must fulfil theirs.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, this bill has now been the subject of extensive debate. I gather there has been some disposition on the part of certain members of the government, and in particular the government house leader, to question the necessity and propriety of debating this matter to the extent that it has been debated. But, I think, to fail to recognize the need for this debate is to fail to recognize its significance.

I think that there are some significant aspects and implications which arise out of the debate that has taken place. I think, in the first place, that it of course demonstrated the very obvious factor of the importance of the transportation industry to Canada and the importance of the railway industry in particular. I think the second point of significance to be noted is that the contributions that have been made from all corners of this House indicate that in fact there is some considerable degree of discontent with the service that has been provided by the railways of this country, including the CNR company with which we are dealing today. I think the third point of significance that should be noted is, in fact, that there is an anomaly in our transportation structure and in the workings of the railway industry in Canada today which is borne out by the fact that we have two major railway companies supposedly competing with each other in some areas of operation, but each in fact is in the other's way thus making it every difficult to provide the type of efficient, economical service which is so necessary if we are to operate the Canadian economy on the best possible basis. Of course, I think this leads to the logical conclusion and to the point that has been made by this party in this House on more than one occasion, namely, the necessity to nationalize and bring into public ownership the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we are of course dealing with the operations and capital budget of Canadian National Railways. There is no need to go into the history of the Canadian National Railways at this time. The fact is that the railway was born when a reluctant government took over a number of bankrupt railway operations, bankruptcies which were the result of mistakes of government policy, in large measure, in the years prior to the 1920's. The government and Canadian National Railways have had to bear ever since the burden imposed as a result of errors of Canadian governments and Canadian public policy.

For many years when Canadian National Railways operated as a publicly owned enterprise there was something of an attitude of disconsolate toleration towards it as a public enterprise. The railway was really something you could not do much about; you had to put up with it and operate it as best you could, while at the same time allowing ample scope for its competitor, the CPR, to have its own way in policy and operations. However, throughout the years it became apparent that as a result of the dedication of certain leaders in the Canadian National and the faithful service of many of its employees, the railway company was able to counteract some of the handicaps it worked under and some of the attitudes which were evident in government throughout the years. The result has been that over a period of years we have witnessed the development of a first-rate railway system in Canada.

I think the CNR rightly deserves the tribute of operating a first-rate railway system. It has proved beyond doubt that a publicly owned enterprise can be operated efficiently, in the public interest and to the benefit of the entire Canadian economy. This railway system was developed out of the salvage of the bankrupt systems to which I referred, in spite of the reluctance of governments throughout the years, in spite of debt loads which were foisted on the railway system and in spite of the political influence of the CPR. The CNR today is a first-rate railway system of which all Canadians can be proud. It has deficiencies, some of which I will deal with in a few minutes. But it is the leader in the transportation industry and transportation systems of this country and is in the forefront in technological developments involved in many areas of its operations. Its service has been generally good, although some questions could be asked about its rates, rate policy and freight rates in particular. Despite its freight rate policies throughout the years, its attitude has been one of providing service to people. For that it deserves tribute, and in that it stands sharply contrasted with its competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway.

This contrast has been demonstrated most clearly in the CNR attitude towards passenger business. While there are some specific points of criticism that I could make regarding Canadian National Railway passenger operations, at the same time I think it can be said that the CNR has recognized that it is a publicly-owned railway system which has a responsibility to carry people as well as goods. In this, as I mentioned, it is sharply contrasted with the attitude of the CPR which now states that it wants to get out of the passenger business. We note, of course, the applications which have been made to the Canadian Transport Commission to discontinue most of the remaining few passenger operations in which the CPR is engaged. Of course, there are some members in this House who are quite suspicious of what the government is doing in this regard.

I might just mention here, Mr. Speaker, that I received, and I presume some hon. members received as well, a letter from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company recently. The letter in my hand was addressed to me at the House of Commons and in part reads as follows:

> Considerable public attention has been focused on the move by Canada's major railways in seeking to be relieved of the burden of uneconomic passenger-train services.
> To explain this move, we have prepared the enclosed booklet which outlines in layman's terms the statutory process for examining the railway applications.

The letter tries to justify the application made by the CPR under the terms of the new Transportation Act. Mr. S. M. Gossage, Vice-President and Senior Executive Officer of the CPR at Montreal, was kind enough to enclose with the letter a little booklet which had been prepared by his company outlining why the CPR was making application to discontinue its passenger operations.

It seems quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian Pacific Railway Company let the cat out of the bag when it sent this letter because, while it has some appearances of being a rather generous offer of doing whatever could be done to help those people who may be protesting the move made by that railway, it is pretty clear evidence that what the CPR is looking for is to get its fingers into the till of the Canadian public treasury. It wants to get the benefit of subsidies provided under the National Transportation Act for so-called uneconomic operations. A good many of us will be having quite a bit to say about that during the coming weeks as we examine the costing methods of the CPR and examine the discrepancies between the accounting methods of the CPR and those which have been established by the Canadian Transport Commission.

It is also rather ironic, Mr. Speaker, that we are now dealing with this application by the CPR to abandon virtually all of its passenger services when one considers some of the advertising by that railway. In particular, I draw Your Honour's attention to one CPR advertisement which I am sure every hon. member in this House has seen. I refer to the advertisement in which they feature, as the main part of their theme, the phrase, "Serving you in so many ways".

If the CPR gets its way, and if in fact these applications are granted, I think that theme will no longer be valid, if it ever did have validity. Certainly, the CPR will have to change a good deal of its advertising program if in fact these applications are granted by the Canadian Transport Commission.

We might also note the record of the CPR with regard to providing boxcars for grain. This is of particular interest to my constituents and, indeed, the whole province of Saskatchewan. Generally, the services provided by the CPR have been of a much poorer standard and quality than those provided by the CNR. Here again, I think the CNR is to be commended on at least some aspects of its attempts at programs to provide boxcars for the movement of grain to the elevators in western Canada. They have at least made an attempt to be of service to the people.

There is also a contrast between the approach of the CNR and CPR in dealing with the matter of branch line abandonment. If one goes back over the history of this particular matter, it can be seen from the time of the early 1960's that the CNR did take a responsible attitude in dealing with this question. One might disagree with some of their points, but nevertheless their attitude and approach had some degree of responsibility. They attempted to inform governments and people of what they were going to do and of their long range plans. This was in sharp contrast to the CPR which attempted to play all of its cards close to its chest and start the ball rolling to carry out a massive program of branch line abandonment in order to increase the profits that the CPR would receive.

I have already made reference to the recent applications by both the CNR and the other railway company to abandon passenger services. This, of course, comes within the scope of our consideration of this bill because it does, after all, deal with investments to be made by the railway companies in facilities and equipment.

I have noted the recent applications with respect to Regina in particular. At present the city of Regina is served by the main line of the CPR. There is one remaining passenger service to that city, namely The Canadian. On the other hand, the CNR passenger operation to Regina consists of a rail-liner connection with the CNR main line at Saskatoon. This is of considerable value for westbound passengers and passengers coming from the west who are able to travel on the CNR main line as far as Saskatoon. The schedules are then set up so that passengers may transfer to the rail-liner going to Regina. However, in a few minutes I intend to say something about the inadequacy of service for eastbound passengers who wish to use the CNR.

In looking at the various applications which were filed, particularly by the CNR, one notes that in fact the railways have not made an attempt to keep up with the needs of the times by introducing new modes and variations of service, for passengers when it became apparent that the old modes, which performed a very useful function at one time, were no longer adequate for the needs of people. One obvious example which comes to my mind is the Winnipeg-Churchill run of the CNR. According to schedules of the CNR, that railway still operates basically the same type of passenger train from Winnipeg to The Pas, and from there on to northern Manitoba points, as it has operated for years. The service has not varied very much. The service which is overnight, goes from Winnipeg through Dauphin, Kamsack, or Swan River, up to Hudson Bay and on to The Pas, and has been virtually the same for years. Of course, it is obvious that the CNR is losing money on this service. They claim that in 1968 their loss for this particular service, extending right up to Churchill, amounted to approximately $3.3 million. I am not in a position to quarrel with those figures. I believe they have some validity and they have to be taken into account by the railway in making its decisions regarding future operations.

Have the railways given adequate and serious consideration to alternatives in terms of services that might be provided? For instance, have they considered the possibility of making a main line connection from Melville north to Yorkton, Canora, Hudson Bay, then on to The Pas and thus having the connection to the north made with its main line train at Melville, Saskatchewan, a city in which I used to live. This city certainly has very adequate railway facilities and could act as a terminal point for this particular train service.

I am not suggesting that points such as Dauphin, Kamsack and Swan River should be left without train service. If my suggestion were accepted, it would certainly be much easier to have a train operating out of Melville to northern points on the one hand and a rail-liner service provided to people living in the Dauphin, Swan River and Kamsack areas of Manitoba and Saskatchewan on the other hand. I have not heard whether the railways have given serious consideration to such a possibility.

I have certainly found in my own contacts with the railways that the CNR in particular has been quite prepared to innovate and develop new services when they have been shown that they have a good chance of success and that they are needed by the public. At the same time there has also been a reluctance, and a rather queer sort of reasoning on occasion, when turning down proposals for new services. I will give an example of that in a few minutes when dealing with passenger train service by the CNR to the city of Regina.

I have already made reference to the attitude of the CNR with respect to its branch line operations and its main line operations. In considering the question of passenger service, I find it rather difficult to understand why the CNR withdrew so many of its passenger train services on branch lines just prior to the introduction of its new fare plans and of its new passenger programs.

In particular I should like to cite one example with which I am quite familiar. This is the CN line which runs from Winnipeg, through Dauphin, Kamsack, Humboldt, on to Saskatoon; and from there it would either take the route to Calgary or to North Battleford and Edmonton. The line running through Dauphin, Kamsack and Humboldt is the old main line of the Canadian Northern Railway. For years passenger trains Nos. 9 and 10 operated on those lines. I have had many occasions to make use of this service, as have other members of my family. It was a very popular service. However, as time passed the extent to which it was used diminished as a result of the schedules that were in use, as well as for a number of other reasons including continually rising fares.

Then in 1962 or 1963 this service, which had been in operation for many years, finally came to an end and was withdrawn by the railway. Shortly after this operation was closed out, the company introduced its new fare plan, the red, white and blue plan. It seems to me that if this new plan had been put into operation at a time when services such as the one to which I have just referred were still in operation, one would have found that the movement away from the use of passenger train services on lines such as this would have been stemmed, and this would have contributed to the maintenance of the passenger train operations carried on by the railway.

I should like to deal very briefly with the specific situation faced by my own city of Regina. I have the honour of representing part of the city as well as some of the rural area surrounding it. As I have said previously, the city of Regina is served by the CPR main line. As the House knows, the CPR has served notice that it wishes to discontinue its sole remaining passenger train service to that city. I imagine the company will be able to cite figures to show that the service is not being used much by the people of Regina, and this may well be the case.

However, I think the company should also understand why the service is not used very much by the people of Regina. If one looks at the hours when the train arrives at and leaves Regina, one will see why the service is so inadequate. The No. 1 train, the Canadian, coming from the east, leaves Winnipeg at eleven o'clock in the evening and arrives at Regina at six o'clock in the morning. The time of arrival in that case is a reasonable one. But when it comes to the return trip from Regina going east, the Canadian leaves Regina at 2.05 in the morning. The first major city along the line, with apologies to Brandon and some other intermediate centres, is Winnipeg, where it arrives at 9.05 in the morning. I suggest that the hour of 2.05 in the morning is not going to entice people to use this particular service.

In 1965, when the CPR made application to the Board of Transport Commissioners, as it then was, to discontinue the operation of its second trans-continental train which passed through Regina, the Dominion, I had occasion to make a presentation to the board when it held hearings in the city of Regina. I listened to the evidence given at the hearing very closely, and at that time the CPR gave assurances that they planned to continue operating the Canadian for a long, long time. It seems that that long, long time is now coming to an end, if the latest CPR application means what it says.

I think this is a further illustration why this railway system, which operates in competition, at least to some degree, with the publicly owned railway system, cannot be relied on to provide the type of service that is required by the people of Canada. Its latest application is just one more piece of evidence to support the stand that I and my colleagues have taken for many years, namely that the Canadian Pacific and its associated companies should be put under public ownership.

In regard to CNR connections to Saskatoon, the schedules are designed to offer services that connect with the mainline trains. When the schedules for the fall and winter of 1969-70 were recently published, I wrote to the president of the Canadian National Railways to inform him of my views concerning the introduction of these schedules at the end of October. I wrote to Mr. N. J. MacMillan, president of the CNR, under date October 27 in regard to this matter, and in my letter I said:

I must say that I was very disappointed at the inadequacy of service provided to Regina. The only passenger train connection with the CN mainline is through the rail liner service between Regina and Saskatoon. I note that the rail liner schedules have been developed to coincide with transcontinental train arrivals and departures from Saskatoon. The result is an atrocious service so far as Regina is concerned.

I think it is totally unacceptable that the only rail liner service from Regina to Saskatoon and Prince Albert should be a train that leaves Regina at 6.00 o'clock in the morning in order to make a connection with the westbound supercontinental shortly after 9.00 a.m. The second train from Regina to Saskatoon leaves Regina at 7.50 in the evening and arrives in Saskatoon at 10.55 in time to meet the eastbound Panorama shortly after 11.00 o'clock. The rail liner then arrives in Prince Albert at 1.45 a.m.

On the return trip, I note that one rail liner leaves Prince Albert at 6.55 a.m., meets transcontinental trains in Saskatoon shortly after 9.00 a.m., and arrives in Regina at 1.00 p.m. The second train leaves Prince Albert at 8.45 p.m., meets transcontinental trains in Saskatoon near 11.00 p.m., and arrives in Regina at 2.30 a.m.

I recognize that some of these schedules have to be developed in conjunction with transcontinental train time tables, and thus there are some limitations. However, it seems to me that one solution to the problem of making adequate connections with Regina has not been fully explored. This would involve a train connection between Regina and Melville with a possibility of tie-ins with other points. Would it not be possible to have trains that would carry a sleeper for transfer at Melville which could provide much better service that would be well patronized and which would be much easier than trying to make every rail liner schedule between Regina and Saskatoon fit the transcontinental time tables?

Then, I suggested to the president of the CNR that I would be interested in having his views on this subject, and that I would be quite prepared to explore the possibilities of this type of service with his officials.

Subsequently, I received a reply from the president of the CNR. After thanking me for my letter, he wrote:

Concerning the through sleeping car operation via Melville, please be assured that this has been studied thoroughly but would not be viable due to insufficient traffic. During August 1969 an average of less than five passengers daily were ticketed from Regina to eastern Canada. The cost to CN of operating a 2 or 3-car train between Melville-Regina would be very high compared to the revenue gained, even with a substantial increase in traffic. A less expensive Railiner operation on this route would not be practical because of the night operation necessary to connect with Trains 1-2, Super Continental, at Melville.

He then went on to indicate there would be some operating problems, and finally he gave me some information about the number of passengers that originated at Regina, classified on the basis of destination area. He indicated that 44 per cent of the passengers from Regina had as their destination local stations between Regina and Saskatoon, Prince Albert and Saskatoon, or Prince Albert and connections beyond.

At the same time 42 per cent of the passengers originating at Regina had as their destination connections with western Canada; that is, points on the CNR main line or adjacent to it from Saskatoon on west. However, passengers to eastern Canada, including Winnipeg, amounted to only 14 per cent of the passengers originating at Regina. This figure applied to the month of August, 1969. There are just a couple of comments I would like to make in that respect.

First of all, it seems to me that the President of the CNR has proven by the statistics he presented to me the need for improved service from Regina to eastern Canadian points. I suggest to him and those responsible that the reason there is such a small proportion of people who commence their travels to eastern Canada by rail at Regina is the poor service provided by the CNR to the east. I suggest that if in fact there were a better type of service to the east we would find a very substantial increase in the volume of that classification of traffic.

On the other hand, the President of the CNR also pointed out problems involved in operating a train between Regina and Melville, a run of some 90 miles or more by rail. He suggested a two or three car train would be quite expensive and that a rail-liner operation would not work very well because it would make connections at Melville during the night time hours, which would pose some rather obvious difficulties, as I understood his letter. It seems to me this is an example of the type of lack of imagination one sees on the part of the railways from time to time, to which I made reference earlier.

It seems to me it should be quite within the scope of the imagination of CNR officials to devise a plan whereby, if in fact it is not economic to operate a two or three car train between Regina and Melville as the president points out, it would be possible to operate a rail-liner service from Regina to Melville and perhaps points beyond, then provide for sleeping car service originating at Melville. The passengers could transfer at Melville at some reasonable hour in the evening to the sleeper that would be stationed there.

I suggest this service would be quite heavily patronized by people not only from Regina but also people living along the line at intermediate points and customers from Melville, Yorkton and portions of eastern Saskatchewan. It seems to me this is a rather obvious step that should be taken by the railway if in fact it is going to follow through with its policy of attempting to exploit all worthwhile possibilities of improving passenger traffic in various parts of Canada.

Thus, we see many examples of lousy timetables, which are responsible for the small amount of passenger patronage of the railway lines. I think the example I have cited in respect of the service between Regina and Saskatoon should be quite adequate to illustrate this. Certainly, the hours that these trains operate will not attract as many people as might possibly want to travel by rail. I have also cited the situation in respect of those people who wish to use CN services for travel to eastern Canada.

I also noted in the list of applications submitted by the CNR and CPR a number of other passenger runs they are proposing to abandon. I do not intend to discuss each one of them because I am not personally familiar with many. I did note one particular example which I think should be drawn to the attention of this House. Both the CNR and the CPR applied for abandonment of their Calgary-Edmonton runs. It seems to me that this is complete nonsense. Both railways claim a substantial loss on their operations between Calgary and Edmonton. I fail to understand why this need be the case. Possibly one alternative which should be examined is the provision of a joint service between Calgary and Edmonton. This might possibly deal with the deficit problems which both railways allege they face.

Still more attention needs to be paid, in terms of passenger train service, to the provision of adequate service to a number of small points along the main line of the CNR. I could cite a number of examples in my own constituency. The Canadian National Railways main line crosses my constituency in the northern part, and there are a number of communities located along that main line within the boundaries of my constituency. There are also a number of urban areas there, each one with approximately 500 people. I refer specifically to the communities of Kelliher, Lestock and Punnichy. There are a number of other nearby communities. In addition, there is the rural population which makes use of these communities.

For some time now there has been no provision in the Canadian National Railways schedules for passenger stops along these lines. It seems to me this is one matter which should be looked into. I recognize some of the problems in making frequent stops along any particular line, but when revenue business is available, certainly in the long run it would be to the benefit of the railways to ensure the provision of an adequate level of service to these communities as well as to the larger centres across Canada. Thus, I think it is important that we consider the future of passenger train business. I certainly urge the Canadian National Railways to continue its operations on the basis which it has in terms of following the principle of providing service for travelling people as well as for the transportation of goods. The CNR is in a very good position to show up the CPR and its complete lack of regard for the needs of people.

At the time the Canadian Transport Commission hears the applications of the Canadian Railway companies, I hope and trust it will pay adequate attention to the applications made by the railways, the CPR in particular, and the accounting and costing procedures used in reporting some of the deficits cited in their applications and public reports. It is important that we do not just assume the attitude of one who picks up the tab whenever the railways report they are not making a profit on some of their passenger operations. It is important that we look at their accounting methods and the figures they submit to the Transport Commission very closely in order to make certain we are in fact not simply picking up that tab when there is no justification for doing so.

Another matter of interest and concern to the city of Regina is air service. This of course also comes within the scope of this bill. Regina is served by Air Canada operations, and a good many of their services are excellent and commendable. There have been complaints from time to time about the inadequacy of services to eastern Canada. Over the past year and a half I have had the opportunity, as a result of facilities made available to members of Parliament, to make use of Air Canada services in travelling between Ottawa and my constituency. I have done so in looking after the needs of my constituents and carrying out my duties as a member of Parliament.

Very often I have found that Air Canada service is quite good. I have one complaint, and that is that there is no direct service between Regina and eastern Canadian points. I made representations about this matter when I made my first speech in the House of Commons on September 23, 1968.

Subsequently I wrote to the former Minister of Transport and Air Canada, drawing to their attention the representations I had made in respect of direct air connections between Regina and eastern Canada. I received a very nice reply from the Acting President of Air Canada in which he informed me that it was the intention of Air Canada to introduce a new direct air connection between Regina and Eastern Canada in the spring of 1969. He hoped that I would have the patience to wait until this new service could be inaugurated.

Well, I did have the patience to wait and the new service was introduced. It was used by many people. The occupancy rate was very high during the summer season of 1969. But to the surprise of everyone in the city of Regina who was interested in the matter, and to my surprise, when the fall schedule of Air Canada was published it was found they had eliminated this direct connection between Regina and Toronto. A great deal of protest was made about the matter. Then Air Canada, for the first time, informed the people who made inquiries that their plan was to introduce this new service initially for the summer season only and that it would be introduced again in the spring of 1970. They said that it would continue from then on a year around basis. Certainly, I believe it would have been rather more satisfactory had Air Canada taken the people who made inquiries into their confidence earlier and told them of the plan of operation they had in mind.

There is another matter to which I should like to make brief reference. Although it is related to the provision of adequate air services in Regina I recognize that it does not come directly within the scope of this bill. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will be indulgent with me in this regard. Currently, there are negotiations under way between the city of Regina and the federal Department of Transport for the purchase of some property at the Regina airport which is still owned by the city of Regina and in which the Department of Transport has expressed an interest. I understand that negotiations are under way and I hope an agreement may be reached which will be satisfactory to the city of Regina, the people of Regina and the federal government in this regard.

I could go on to mention the many aspects of freight rates which are of interest to the people of western Canada. I could also mention some other aspects of the provision of freight services by our railway companies. However, there is only one particular point I should like to make at this time. It has to do with railways and the potash business. When the potash industry first developed in Saskatchewan it seemed logical and obvious to most people that the way to move the potash to markets would be by the railways. As a consequence, the railways extended their facilities. There was co-operation and there were negotiations between the railway companies—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Burton: I could finish in just a couple more minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take too long, but I felt I should say something about this bill. I was impressed by the comments made by several members, particularly the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) who last evening made a plea on behalf of his constituency and talked about the people who want to protect their towns.

As we all know, Bill C-7 is supposed to provide funds for the financing of the CNR and Air Canada. Possibly it is because of my inexperience, but as a new member I wonder why such a bill is necessary. I am doubtful that it should be necessary for the CNR and Air Canada to come to the House of Commons with a bill requesting money that has already been spent. The reason for this is beyond me, but I will tag along with this procedure for another couple of years.

As members of parliament representing Canadians I think we must clamp down very seriously on the activities of the various modes of transportation. It certainly is high time we took a close look at the policies in respect of railways and transportation in general. There is no doubt that in certain parts of Canada, particularly in the east and in the west, transportation is vital and must be improved. It is difficult for me to believe that the only solution the railway companies can come up with is abandonment of service or restriction of service. The other day in a French newspaper I read how Japan had introduced rapid transportation services. I read also that France was introducing a new service to provide fast and efficient transportation for the public. In a growing country like Canada, apparently the only solution we have is abandonment of the whole passenger service because it does not pay. This is the reason I am very reluctant to give approval to this bill, although I imagine I will have to do so.

Every day we read in the press that more and more people are becoming afraid to drive on the highways. The number of fatalities on the highway is increasing. The figures are even greater than the casualty figures of the armed forces. I am convinced that if a proper service were provided the people definitely would use it. The trend today is for people to commute from the city to the fringe areas. They travel back and forth every day, some for short distances and some for longer distances. Some people travel on the week-ends while others do so on a day to day basis. In many instances, the railways do not provide any adequate service for the people. The trend today for people to work in the cities is fine, because this is the only place they can find work; but they live outside the cities. These people do not wish to spend an hour travelling back and forth a couple of miles a day in their cars. Surely, we should be able to devise a much better and modern way of transportation. Of course, it is necessary that the schedules be such that they are suitable for the commuters. It is not good enough to have a train which departs at two o'clock in the afternoon and expect that train to accommodate the working class. This is what is happening in some areas.

In Nova Scotia, for example, a train which travels from Halifax to Yarmouth leaves some time around noon. How can it be expected that the people will use this type of service? I am convinced that the Canadian people would patronize a good system. I believe the railways must come up with something new and that the Canadian Transport Commission must exercise its responsibilities in this regard. The Minister of Transport and members of this House, I suggest, also have a responsibility to see that a good, modern, efficient service is provided. We live in the year 1969. Men are going to the moon. Certainly modern technology could provide the means for a fast efficient service.

I might mention the ferry system operated by the Canadian National Railways and by the Canadian Pacific Railway between provinces like Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and even between Nova Scotia and the state of Maine. Will these be cancelled also? This question is of concern to the people in my area. As we move into the 70's it is not good enough to accept the present railway system of transportation or the standards under which it is being operated. I am convinced that a proper handling of the railway company's finances and of the service would eradicate the deficits and make a system much more attractive to the public.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I read with interest the speech of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) concerning the Ocean Limited. Several members, not only members of the opposition but members on both sides of the House, made such pleas on behalf of their constituents. They spoke about saving their little towns which depend on railway service the railway companies propose to abandon. We hear talk about saving little towns in Canada, a country full of opportunities and of potential, whereas in the cities where people concentrate there are so many problems that in a few years' time people will want to go back to living in these little towns.

I will repeat what I have said before on several occasions, that some of these policies, including the transportation policy, are forcing people to move into cities and to group together because these policies affect mainly the rural parts of Canada, and here I do not refer only to the Atlantic area.

The bill also deals with Air Canada. Recently, the minister spoke about replacing this service by regional carriers. The people of my constituency have protested against this, and rightly so. The service provided by Air Canada from Yarmouth, for example, connects the United States with other parts of Canada, and it is absolutely essential that it be continued. Similarly, there is a proposal to remove the passenger service between Yarmouth and Halifax, a distance of some 225 miles. Yet, on the other hand, we will be putting into service next year two new ferries joining New Brunswick to Nova Scotia and another one travelling between Portland, Maine and Yarmouth, making a total of three ferries joining that part of Nova Scotia with the rest of Canada and with the United States. So, on the one hand we are proposing to remove rail service and on the other we provide ferry service.

As has been mentioned before, transportation will certainly not guarantee economic expansion in certain parts of the country, but the lack of transportation will certainly retard economic expansion. Certain people say that transportation will not bring us salvation, but the lack of it will certainly retard it. Let the minister draw up a policy and let him take action. For years we have been hearing about a transportation policy for the Atlantic area, but it has never been drawn up. Many things have changed since then. We were told that the freight rates would not be changed until a policy was devised. Rates have been changed and all kinds of other action has been taken, but a policy has not yet been devised.

I do not want to take any more of the time of the House, but I do want to draw the attention of hon. members to certain matters with regard to my constituency. The bill before us is to be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I do not see the purpose of doing this.

What else can the committee do with this bill but accept or reject it? It certainly cannot formulate policies in so far as transportation is concerned because the government does not usually accept the reports of standing committees, particularly of the Committee on Transport and Communications.

I should like to say in conclusion that we have to come up with a better solution than the abandonment of rail service. I wish to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) in particular to take a look at this matter. He has control over all departments in so far as regional disparities are concerned. I ask him to convince the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) that action must be taken now and that it is essential that the government come up with something better than the abandonment of railway service, of postal services as well as of various other services.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I want to take a few moments this afternoon to join my colleagues in this House in discussing Bill C-7, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada. I have been very interested in the remarks of many speakers who have taken part in the debate. They impressed on me the importance of the whole subject matter dealt with in the bill. Several days ago, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) opened up in a non partisan manner a broad spectrum of problems facing transportation in Canada at present. These problems are likely to continue to face us in the future. A number of years ago I had the privilege of being a member of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. During that time we brought forth the bill setting up the Canadian Transport Commission. It was interesting at that time to listen to the discussions that took place with respect to the costing formula.

Although this matter has not been referred to recently, it continues to be one of the basic issues facing the commission in arriving at a decision with respect to applications for rail line abandonment. All this goes back to the MacPherson Royal Commission in the latter part of the 1950's when the Hon. M. N. MacPherson of Regina, who was recognized as one of the foremost authorities on transportation in Canada, brought in a very forthright report. During the discussions of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications we discovered a thread of discontent running through all the evidence with respect to the transportation costing formula. The committee found that they could not accept the costing formula of the railway companies, and consequently an independent costing committee was set up made up of a group of experts on railway costing. It was a committee similar in type to the one working for the inter-state commerce commission in the United States. Nevertheless they brought in an independent report on the cost of railroading in Canada, and it so greatly differed from the costing formula used by the railroads that we were led to believe we would have to take another look at this, which we did. As a result the figures submitted by the railroads at that time were thrown out, and a compromise was adopted by your committee in arriving at certain costs.

It was also laid down in the new act setting up the Canadian Transport Commission that there should be a group of experts within the commission whose job would be to decide on a costing formula that would be satisfactory both to the people of Canada and the railroads. It worries me to some extent to find that presently the CPR has decided to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada against the costing formula that has been adopted and is presently under consideration for use by the Canadian Transport Commission.

Here again we find another confrontation between the people of Canada, represented by the Canadian Transport Commission, and the railroads. They are disagreeing on what should be a proper costing formula. Therefore, we cannot arrive at any proper decision regarding the present host of applications for railway line abandonment. We cannot reach such a decision until we get agreement on the costing formula. This was the reason that last week I felt it necessary to suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) that the government of Canada be represented by the best legal talent available before the Supreme Court of Canada in its hearings on the CPR appeal.

I am naturally concerned, like other hon. members, about the host of applications presently being made for rail line abandonment. As mentioned by many hon. members, transportation is the sinew of our economy, and the various modes of transportation, air, rail, automotive and bus are all interlocked. Relatively speaking we have a good system, but we have problems where there is overlapping of the various services.

During the Transport Committee hearings several years ago when it reviewed the MacPherson Royal Commission report, great emphasis was placed on rail line rationalization. In areas where two competing lines, the CNR and the CPR, were running in close proximity to each other, it was said that efforts should be made to get them together to eliminate some of the duplication, with the result that everybody would benefit, the taxpayers as well as the railroads, and yet satisfactory service would be maintained. Here is an area in which we as a Parliament must support the Canadian Transport Commission.

The CPR presently has applications before the Commission to abandon a number of lines which they claim involve a loss of $30 million. Going back to my remarks of a few moments ago, we cannot accept this figure of $30 million until we first arrive at a costing formula acceptable to all parties concerned. I would be inclined to take with a grain of salt the CPR statement that it has lost $30 million on passenger service.

It is a well known fact that the CPR has already eliminated many passenger trains over great areas of our country. I just cannot countenance its now making an application to abandon The Canadian, the main passenger train running across the populated areas of southern Canada. It is preposterous even to consider it. The original act of Parliament passed in the latter part of the nineteenth century gave the CPR a franchise to build a railroad, and in return it agreed to provide transportation for people and goods in perpetuity. There was no question then that at some future date it could abandon rail passenger service on its main line.

For this it received $25 million from the government of Canada. At that time that was a major fortune. It was also allocated thousands upon thousands of acres of land lying adjacent to its track running across Canada. Now, we realize that this land, with its mineral resources, has been so profitable to the railway that it has set up a subsidiary company known as Canadian Pacific Investments to handle its profits from the land and to manage its other activities and industrial developments.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, The Canadian played a major part in centennial year in transporting thousands of people to Expo in Montreal. Many of them were visitors from the United States who travelled across Canada by train. In fact at that time the railroad agreed to bring back the old Dominion and place it in service once more. I believe it was called The Expo Special, and was necessary to meet the demand of the public for transportation. On looking at railway passenger statistics since 1967, I do not see that there has been much of a deterioration in the number of passengers carried by the main line trains.

We must look ahead to the day when our expanding population will make it mandatory for us to provide good transportation in areas that are presently not too well developed, so that instead of abandoning lines we should be doing our best to retain them. We must also take into consideration the new concept of a central Canada corridor, which is designed to stimulate industrial development all across the country.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) mentioned the problem of air pollution. So far as the movement of passengers is concerned, motor cars now represent about 83 per cent of the total traffic in this country. As the hon. member stated, the motor car is creating a major problem in large urban centres and, as a consequence, we must look to other means of transportation, including electric railways, to move people from one point to another in urban areas.

I was very interested in the address given last night by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), and particularly in the plea that he made for the community of Nakina. It reminded me of the rail line abandonment in my own area of Saskatchewan back about 1958 or 1959, when an application was made to abandon what was known as the Reston-Wolseley branch line. It was one of the first branch lines in western Canada to be abandoned. The concern that was expressed by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) last night was concern that could be expressed by dozens of members in this House if all those applications for abandonment now under consideration should be accepted by the Canadian Board of Transport Commissioners. All along these lines are communities almost wholly dependent on rail transportation. If the line is taken out it will be only a matter of a year or two before the residents have to pull up stakes, dispose of businesses at great cost to themselves and the communities, and move further afield to try again to make a livelihood. There have been examples already of communities almost drying up entirely.

This raises a twofold problem, Mr. Speaker, for the community and the people affected. The people have to leave the area and invariably they try to go to some of the larger and more populated areas, thus emphasizing and accentuating the problem of urbanization. In Toronto we have our urban problems and are wracking our brains to try to solve them. I do not think that moving from the rural areas to the urban areas is the answer. We must look also at the sociological problem that becomes apparent when we speak of abandoning railway lines in rural areas.

I could go on at length but I felt I had to make these few remarks and add my voice of protest against this present rash of applications for rail line abandonment. We should take the advice of other members who have spoken and look at this whole serious situation before it gets out of hand.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-7 now before us proves that the CNR is running true to form and that experts in deficits are still on its payroll.

Whether services are discontinued, stations closed, employees laid off, trains cancelled or the turbo-train moves forward or backward, there is always a deficit.

In my opinion, this is a ridiculous situation, a colossal joke, since a bill like this one is introduced each year. Before giving a blank cheque to the Canadian National Railways by passing this bill, I would like, as suggested by previous speakers, to see a little analysis of that Crown Corporation made.

Let us recall first the economic recession of the years 1929 to 1939, a quiet period when economic stagnation brought about limited railway traffic. And yet, at that time, the CNR, administered by wise and able men, managed to buy deficit-making railway companies facing bankruptcy.

During the war that followed, this company rendered tremendous services. An unexpected growth in traffic led to the construction of railway cars and other equipment. In order to meet the demand from government and industry, all available trains were operating around the clock.

The hiring of staff rose with the demand for services and, when demand was at its peak, the number of CNR employees went up to 140,000, with a corresponding increase in the number of supervisors. Senior officials and assistants galore were hired and that was the war effort.

At war's end, the situation returned to normal. Automation and the use of computers and similar equipment then gained popularity. There was therefore a surplus staff and necessarily lay-offs.

And strange as it may seem, as this has become a habit with the CNR, it is the laborers who paid the bill. Indeed they were the only ones affected by the lay-offs.

However, those who remained at their jobs were exploited by the unions which took advantage of the Rand principle of compulsory check-off to raise union dues. This principle unfortunately produced nothing worth while but was an instrument by which the workers lost control over their unions.

To impose a new tax, the Canadian parliament must decide through his 264 members. But as regards the collecting of union dues by and for the benefit of, international unions, it is sufficient for a few union leaders to decide and advise the railways.

Here I should like to read part of a letter dated July 11, 1969, sent by the Transportation-Communication Employees Union, Systems Division No. 1, 156 St. Denis Street, St. Lambert. I quote:

> Considering the financial commitments of your Systems Division, the central committee had to increase the members' dues as of July 1, 1969. The increase amounts to $1.00 per month ... Therefore, the next pay deduction in July 1969 will be $7.00.

This letter bears the signatures of the Systems' general chairman, Mr. F. M. Sheahan, the union's general chairman, Mr. Soucy, and the general secretary-treasury, Mr. Hlady.

In the circumstances, the employee has nothing to say when money is taken from him; moreover, for some time, he has been in the dark as to why he pays, even though his dues are deducted from his wages.

Regarding the bill and the moneys requested for the operation of the CNR, I pointed out that one reason for its deficits was patronage within its administration.

Despite the reduction in the number of workers and the amounts shown in the company's annual report at the salary item, nothing ever changes. Those who stay vote themselves salary increases year after year.

It is evident that they are still there.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The supervisors who have no workers to look after become inspectors. In other words, the boys from well to do families are always protected, and even if the number of employees has fallen from 140,000 to less than 80,000, the bureaucrats are still there, spreading confusion and tapping the company's revenues.

In some areas, inspectors are more numerous than workers and treat them harshly.

Mr. Speaker, the situation is serious, because the Canadian National Railways management is bad. As a matter of fact, management and labour relations have never been as poor as they are now, and the employees that are imposed upon loathe the company. Untold millions of dollars are lost due to scores of accidents that occur every year.

All train conductors, station masters and permanent-way masters got their jobs after 20 or 25 years of service, having proved their competence, while the same cannot be said of the technocrats. Who are they, anyway? Where do they come from? What is their role inside the company? How many are there and above all, how much do they cost us? We are not sure of their number and we are even less sure of what they cost us. And as matter of fact, at page 8329 of the House of Commons' Debates of October 5, 1966, there is the answer to a question that I had put on the order paper, and I quote:

Salaries of CNR Employees

> How many employees of the Canadian National Railways earn an annual salary of (a) $4,000 to $6,000 (b) $6,000 to $8,000 (c) $8,000 to $10,000 (d) $10,000 to $15,000 (e) $15,000 to $25,000 (f) over $25,000?

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Byrne) answered at that time:

> The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: It has not been considered in the best interest of the company to disclose data on employees' earnings in the manner requested.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is not in the interest of the company to publish reports but the figures could be made available for the public which must pay the piper. If it is against the public interest to make them known in the manner requested, could the minister sponsoring the bill find a way to get in touch with this corporation?

Anyway, I repeat my question today, hoping the minister will be able to say how many inspectors receive—I do not say earn —$25,000 or more in a year? If the minister who is presenting the bill cannot answer now, there should be an inquiry and if the results show that 50 per cent of those middle echelon officials are useless, they should be dismissed because we want a healthy administration.

I would like to point out something else concerning the present administration: its deficits. I would like to give you an example to explain the situation and show why the minister before granting loans should ask the management to review its administrative procedures.

If the minister believes that, under a Liberal government during the past seven years, our country has enjoyed prosperity, it is not normal that a company like the CNR operating in a just and thriving society should each year ask the government to make up its deficit.

This is what I am driving at. At the present time, salaries and operating costs are increasing, but lower rates are requested. Preferential prices and special rates are granted big oil and logging firms. Plants belonging to trusts throughout Canada are given preferential treatment in this regard. The most recent illustration of that I witnessed last summer and it struck me in a peculiar way. I refer to rates set by the CNR in 1957 for transportation between two areas in Quebec.

As against a rate set at 20 cents per cwt in 1957, the same company was being offered the same services at 24 cents per cwt during the 1969 summer months.

I have here a letter from a transportation firm in the Portneuf constituency, addressed to Mr. Lord Fortier, of the Canadian Transport Commission in Ottawa, and I quote:

Sir,

Further to our recent meeting at the Trucking Association Convention in Montreal, we dealt with the illegal competition from the CNR that all highway transportation companies have to put up with.

As far as we are concerned, we began moving sulphite from Lac Saint-Jean, to Saint-Raymond, in 1957, at which time the CNR rate was 29 cents per cwt.

Two years later, when we were very well equipped for such an operation, the CNR came up with a proposed rate of 22 cents.

This year again, namely 12 years later, while transportation rates have doubled since then, they still come up with a rate of 24 cents——per cwt.

[Mr. Godin.]

It is precisely because the Canadian National Railways lower their rates when their operating costs increase that they show deficits in their operations.

Then the board says to the government: We are showing a deficit. Help us or guarantee some of our loans.

A few trains will be temporarily taken out of service. In the Saturday, November 29 issue of the paper Le cheminot canadien, one can read the following:

We have learned from reliable sources in Ottawa that the CNR wil soon ask for permission to abandon their transcanadian services as well as the passenger trains on the Montreal-Toronto, and Ottawa-Montreal runs as well as the Ocean Limited between Halifax and Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, in the "Recommendation" of the bill now under study, one can read the following:

—to authorize Her Majesty to make loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and Air Canada to meet deficiencies in operating revenues to June 30th, 1970, any such loans to be repaid from revenues of the railway company and Air Canada or, if revenues prove insufficient, by subsequent deficit appropriation by Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in the House for four years, and I know that the CNR has been showing deficits since then. What you have just heard means that the CNR is being urged once more to show another deficit.

I think that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) asked the management of the Canadian National Railways to change their methods, they would no longer have to borrow money to cover their operating costs.

I would also like to deal, at this stage, with the financing of this Crown corporation. By passing this bill, we authorize the CNR to make expenditures of about $201,700,000. Clause 3(2) authorizes the CNR to borrow money. Clause 5 says that the government undertakes to guarantee the loans.

I think that if this Crown corporation must pay each year $70 million in interests on its debt, it is obvious that the government has already guaranteed too many loans. I wonder what will be the rate next time. Will the next loan be granted at the same conditions than those set by Canada for foreign countries, namely ¾ per cent, or 1 per cent interest? Will Canada be obliged then to guarantee a loan secured from private enterprise at a 9 or 10 per cent interest rate? According to clause 3, these are capital expenditures. In fact, the CNR is authorized, and I quote:

—to make capital expenditures...in the following estimated amounts for the purpose of capital investment:

Railroad property	$107,700,000
Branch lines	17,000,000
Equipment	53,800,000
Telecommunications	18,887,000
Hotels	4,113,000

In my opinion, a Crown corporation would benefit from its being financed by another Crown corporation, and I wonder what reason motivated this bill before us now. Why should the financing of a Crown corporation be provided for by a bill of this kind? Could the Bank of Canada not provided these funds and accept federal government securities in exchange for investments?

Today, when the Bank of Canada buys bonds, it buys them from private enterprise. Why should it not be entitled to do so in the case of Crown corporations? If the Bank of Canada can buy bonds from a public concern, why should it be entitled to make profits at its expense? All I can assume is that the Bank of Canada is financing the CNR in the same way that it finances the railways in underdeveloped countries, at the nominal cost of 1½, ¾ or 1 per cent.

The fact that it is possible abroad leads to believe that it should be even easier in respect of public concerns.

I will conclude by emphasizing three main points, which summarize my remarks. First of all, we should have an inquiry made by fair-minded people, in order to eliminate unnecessary personnel.

I do not think that having an inquiry made into the personnel situation every 35 years would be asking too much. It is high time, I believe, that we should try to see where we stand so that we can dismiss useless employees and keep the others. I would therefore suggest that the MacPherson Commission report be reconsidered and that the CNR be asked to stop harassing the railway workers by laying-off those who are doing a useful job. The many accidents which have occurred in the past few years demonstrate that some of these lay-offs were ill-timed. Indeed, those whose job is unquestionably useful are entitled to security.

Since the CNR has legally plundered the pension fund of its workers, I suggest it would be normal to refund as soon as possible those who having contributed to it and now retired, are entitled to expect some protection. Considering the fact that the military, firemen and policemen are entitled to their pension after 20 or 25 years of service, setting up an optional pension plan to accommodate the CNR employees who wish to retire before they die would be indicated.

The Canadian National Railways should take operating costs into account when setting its rates, they should not be reduced in favour of trusts.

Its financial administration should be revised and this is possible for, if we refer to page 2529 of Hansard for September 26, 1967, we can read what the then Minister of Revenue had to say when he introduced a bill similar to the one we are now studying, and I quote:

> In the case of the C.N.R., the financing can be done in either one of two ways. The government can borrow the money directly from sources including the Bank of Canada, which would take up a big part of the loan, with the chartered banks taking up a substantial part also, and then advance the money to the C.N.R. Alternatively, the C.N.R. may borrow directly with a government guarantee but it would have to pay a higher interest rate if it did. It can be done in either manner.

Mr. Speaker, the financing can be done in either one of two ways, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). So, if it can be done economically, that method should be chosen, and the advice of our friends should be disregarded; in other words, if the Bank of Canada can lend us some money, let us borrow it from it.

If we want an honest administration, if we are not public thieves, let us prove it by avoiding third parties, even though they may be our friends. I say again, let us deal with the Bank of Canada, since the Minister of Finance has stated that we may do so.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-7 because it gives me an opportunity to get a few grievances off my chest regarding the treatment that some parts of Canada, such as the Atlantic provinces and in particular Newfoundland, are receiving from Canadian National and Air Canada for whom this bill authorizes the provision of moneys to meet capital expenditures.

I hesitate raising the matter of rail passenger service in Newfoundland again because I know most hon. members heard enough about it last year. However, I feel it is important to raise a few of the skeletons which resulted from of the discontinuance of this service, and to emphasize the objection of Newfoundland members to the use of our province as a scapegoat in a plan to reduce passenger service all across Canada. I feel that we can now say with authority, we told you so.

Provision of Moneys to CNR and Air Canada

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marshall: I was happy to read in Hansard that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), who represents some 60,000 citizens in his riding, has taken issue with the CNR for requesting large sums of money under this act and yet continuing to downgrade services in his part of the country. If the hon. member is asked to approve the bill, he wants a reasonable service for his district in return. I admire the hon. member taking issue with his own party and assure him of my support. Even though we in Newfoundland are treated like second-class citizens, there is no reason why we should not object to this discriminatory action against the people in parts of New Brunswick and, indeed, in all of Canada.

I will now refer to the new Canadian Transport Commission rules for passenger services as reported by David Crane in the Globe and Mail dated September 23:

—when the Canadian Transport Commission paved the way for rationalization and reduction of passenger rail service in Canada by specifying minimum service frequency and the services that qualify as passenger services—

Under this CTC order passed September 22, just three months after the discontinuance of Newfoundland's passenger service, the regulatory body has the authority to require the continuance of passenger service it deems essential in the public interest. The Canadian Transport Commission may now order the railways to continue uneconomical service, but once it has designated the services that must continue, it will be able to provide a subsidy covering 80 per cent of the loss.

In plain and simple words, Mr. Speaker, if any railway applied to the CTC for discontinuance of service, it could be ordered to maintain the service, but to reduce the frequency of that service. If that railway continued to lose money and applied again for discontinuance, an 80 per cent subsidy could be granted after October 1. What I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, is whether this CTC order was prepared suddenly, desperately and on the spur of the moment. Am I supposed to believe that the President of the CNR was not aware of this order prior to July 1? Can anyone here tell me that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) was not aware of this CTC order prior to July 1? Can anyone tell me that the Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, the Jesse James of the Transport Commission, did not know it when he kept shrugging and bouncing while giving evasive and camouflaged answers during his appearance before the transport committee last year?

We hear quite a bit about pollution these days, Mr. Speaker, but we should also be considering the possibility of collusion. Let us take a look at and analyse for a moment the alternative bus service that the experts put into effect in Newfoundland and which they are proclaiming has increased passenger traffic, along with their new Rapido service. But they have forgotten a few facts along the way which were not taken into consideration.

First, they proclaimed from the housetops that all CNR employees who were involved in the train service would be absorbed in other jobs at no loss of income. Yet I have many examples of railwaymen with 15, 20 and 25 years of service who have been reduced to a lower classification and whose salaries have been drastically reduced. Is this the fair treatment they proclaimed? They shouted about the superservice they would give the people of Newfoundland with this new bus service.

I can quote from many letters which I received, Mr. Speaker. An example of the new bus service involves the case of a man, a woman and a baby who got on the bus. At a station along the way the man got off the bus to get the baby some milk. When he got back on the bus there was no seat for him, so he had to stand for the remainder of the trip, a hundred miles. This is the type of service that is being offered.

Another example involves a group of 15 school girls who were on a bus and had to get off along the way because other people had reservations so there were no seats for them. Another couple who had to get to a particular place because of an emergency had to travel 40 miles by taxi behind the bus before somebody got off and there were seats available for them. What about the stretcher cases that have to travel right across Newfoundland? Where do they go?

There was one other proclamation about the wonderful connecting service we were going to get in Newfoundland after a trial period. I have one petition signed by over 500 residents of six communities in the St. George's part of my riding, with a suggested route schedule attached, because they were left out of the main stream of decent service. This petition was sent to me on September 25. We all know the answer a member of Parliament receives when he gets in touch with the proper department of government. Out come the study gimmicks again. The department stated they were making a review of all our schedules and that my request would be taken into consideration. Two months later, I received an answer stating that they were sorry but it was not their intention to extend the bus service at the present time. This was a month after the decision had been made.

They had two years to study a bus service. It was decided that Newfoundland would lose its rail passenger service in any event, but they did not have the foresight to properly study a bus service to replace it. But how could they be expected to, Mr. Speaker, when they could not operate a train service in Newfoundland? It was the only one. They had a monopoly on passenger service and they could not make it pay. The Railway hierarchy have experts too, Mr. Speaker, and they have all the fancy phrases which are so in vogue these days. The railways have their research and development branches, industrial development and international consulting divisions. They have their land bridge concepts and systems activities. They have systems called "TRACS", their ACI's and CIP's. What I suggest is that their top echelons take advice such as that give by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at Harrison Hot Springs, and do a little genetic engineering.

• (5:30 p.m.)

In a speech reported in today's Globe and Mail to the Canadian Association of Movers, Mr. Pickersgill stated that before the CNR or CPR are allowed to discontinue passenger services there will be full public hearings. He said the public interest aspects of every application for passenger service abandonment would be fully investigated by the commission. I suggest they might as well save their breath, their time and money, because the decisions have already been made.

I warn the members who will be affected by the 31 services that are due for abandonment to get moving right now if they want to resist. If they require any advice about railroading, let them ask some of their Newfoundland colleagues. They at least have the Canadian Transport Commission order on which to base their arguments, something of which we did not have the benefit.

An interested constituent of mine wrote to me as follows:

> I was quite concerned recently to read that the Canadian Pacific Railway have applied to abandon all passenger service except some commuting service at the same time Canadian National are planning to cut back on their passenger service including that in the maritimes. I realize that I may be a voice crying in the wilderness but as you know from our previous correspondence I am convinced that on the basis of social benefit from tax dollars the railway is by far a lower cost method of transportation for both passengers and freight than to continue to increase our highway system. The travelling public have gotten in the habit of preferring the independence of their own cars and small trucking firms or even individuals prefer the independence of being able to operate on the highways.
> The fact, however, remains that both these methods are more costly than the rail transportation if rail transportation is kept modern and efficient. It will just cost the Canadian taxpayers several times more to let traffic of both kinds to drop off on their rail lines and force millions of dollars into new highway programs. Japan has led the way for many years in this regard stimulated by the fact that they did not have enough land to permit highway systems. However, in their case it has turned out to be much better for their economy as well as saving the land. In the United States where land is becoming a premium they are now reverting in the heavily travelled area i.e. Portland, Maine to Richmond, Virginia to belatedly improve their rail service. Just because we have lots of land here in Canada, let's not make the mistake of losing our rail service and then having to go back to rebuilding it 20 years hence.

This is a concern that has been expressed by people across Canada.

May I also ask the Minister of Transport to consider the improvement of regional services both in the province of Newfoundland and in other maritime provinces? I should also like to hear something of the proposed improvement to facilities at the airport at Deer Lake used by Eastern Provincial Airways.

I conclude by reminding the government that it is duty bound, in accordance with its responsibility to the people of Canada, to fulfil their pledge of equal rights for all Canadians regardless in which part of the country they live. These rights include the right to rail passenger services. Even though these services have been denied Newfoundlanders, I suggest this does not give the government or the CTC the right to deny them to the rest of Canada.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, about a year ago the House passed the Canadian Transport Commission Act, and the House was pleased at that time to have a minister who knew as much as he did about the subject to pilot the legislation through the House. I remember the many complaints that were made about the transportation problems in Canada, and I recall his ability to answer each member and to indicate how the problems would be solved by the passage of the legislation.

For several days I have sat here listening to what might be called grievances raised by individual members, all of them interested in railway problems in general, which seem to have increased in severity rather than decreased. The same can be said with regard to Air Canada.

This legislation seeks to refinance the operations both of the CNR and Air Canada. In my opinion, we should vote against the legislation. I do not think we should be involved in the refinancing of the CNR. The government should be forced to do something to improve the financial status of the company. Most people in Canada think of the CNR as a crown corporation. I contend it is more a crown debt, certainly not a corporation of any description. We owe the CNR just as much money as they owe the country. The long term debt of the company in 1967 was $1,840,-712,000; it had grown in 1968 to $1,919 million odd. If this legislation is passed, the long term debt of the CNR will pass the $2 billion mark.

If I had $2 billion, I doubt whether I would buy the CNR. I do not think there is an agency in Canada that would be interested in the CNR at the price of $2 billion, particularly when one considers that its operating expenses for one year amount to approximately $1 billion. Normally I do not agree with Social Credit theory. That party contends that this kind of debt can be wiped out. The premier of British Columbia found that the huge debt of the PGE, like the rolling stone that gathers no moss, was gathering no interest, and so he wiped out the debt. In other words, he took money out of one pocket and put it in another. We will never pay off perpetual bonds. Indeed, some of them are valued in pounds sterling, which goes back to the days when we were a colony.

It seems to me that if the members of this House believe that the Canadian National Railways is a crown corporation, then they should do something to reduce the debt. The debt is actually a paper one, and as such should be written off. Certainly, it will not be paid off. Perhaps we will have to pay something to the owners of the former Grand Trunk Railway, though I would think they have already been paid off.

Just to show how stupid some people are—and only people in the revenue branch could be this stupid—last year the net income before interest on debt of the CNR was $41 million. It made a net profit of $29 million. The interest paid on the debt last year amounted to $70,450,968. I should like to know to whom this money was paid and for what purpose. I assume that these figures are part of the national debt. We have budgeted for about $6 billion and we are carrying $2 billion of debt for one corporation. It is all right to say we have to pay this to run the CNR, as I believe we do, but how stupid can we get as members of Parliament? We continue to approve of this kind of financing. This situation is getting worse every year. The government says it wants to do something about inflation. This is a heck of a good place to start by doing something about this deficit amounting to $70 million last year. This amounts to a transfer from one place to another, but it really serves no purpose.

Perhaps this deficit does serve a purpose by allowing the Canadian Pacific to set its rates. When the CNR is losing money it is allowed by the CPR to set rates. Since the rates are set on the basis of losing money, a greater subsidy is required. This situation reminds me of a time not long ago when I went in to a local, rather high-priced restaurant. I talked to several people I knew who were there having dinner and found I was the only one there paying for his meal. Everybody else was on an expense account. This meant I was paying for my meal and at least half the cost of another meal. We allow certain people to deduct their expenses from income tax. Not only was I paying for an extra half a meal, I was paying more than the meal I had was worth. If everybody had been paying for his own meal I would have paid $3.50 instead of $7.

Before I conclude my remarks I intend to propose an amendment to kill this bill. The House will then have to make some decision about it. Let me make it very clear that I do not oppose the CNR as a Crown corporation. This railway is a necessity in Canada and it will be for a number of years to come. We will have to look at it in realistic terms. We as members of Parliament, should have some say about what the railways carry, where they go and for what purpose. We should make these decisions. I do not suggest we should start running the railroads or that members should say whether filet mignon should be served instead of ham steaks on the dining car, but we should have some say as to whether there should be a dining car and where the train should go. It is all right for officials of the railway to come before the committee and bring reasons for changes, but in the final analysis we should make certain decisions. If Mr. Pickersgill does not sit down and do this work, we should get rid of him and get somebody else.

We, as Canadians, have a need for a railway service and in my opinion we are going to have it, even though we cannot afford the type of operation we now support. This bill is a disgrace to parliamentarians. There is not a half a dozen people in this chamber who understands this refinancing bill. I am sure most hon. members do not understand how this railway is financed. I am sure half the people who drew up this bill do not understand the reason for the debt items.

We are still talking about dropping railways service in some areas. If the CNR wants to drop its service from North Bay to Toronto it should put a price on that line rather than just drop it. There are two lines from North Bay to Toronto. Let the officials put a price on one of them. If that price is the same as it was two years ago, $3 million, I am sure the Ontario Northland Railway would buy it. There is a private individual in the city of Barrie who might buy it at that price. This line should not be dropped but sold to someone who wants to operate it. I personally would like to see the Ontario Northland Railway run into Toronto on its own line rather than buying rights from the CNR. This situation may be true in other areas as well. Perhaps the grain farmers or the pools would decide to run their own trains if they owned trackage. Let somebody else get into this field if the operating railways do not want to provide this service.

I do not have much time but I should like to have a look at certain figures. They are very hard to find in these audited statements, so you may well have to look them up for yourself. In any event, if you check the figures for 1967 and compare them with the figures for 1968 and 1969, you will find that revenues rose extensively in respect of the CNR. You will find that passengers per mile increased rapidly and that service in terms of miles operated per passenger was considerably greater than it has been for a number of years.

Why did this increase happen all of a sudden? I suggest it did not happen all of a sudden. Because of the action of this Parliament in deciding these trains were going to be operated during our Centennial year with more up to date equipment, with sleepers and dining facilities, the number of passengers per train increased. It even reached the point where you had to have a reservation for a seat, let alone sleeping accommodation. When we made that effort, things improved greatly.

Most members of Parliament interested in transportation should take a close look at the refinancing of the Canadian National Railways. They will then find out whether this situation can continue or whether we should get rid of this debt. We are talking about $2 billion, and I think everyone will agree that there must be a program to retire that debt. If it cannot be retired, we should write it off.

How are we going to recover any money from the city of Montreal or the province of Quebec in respect of the cost of Expo? Nobody was interested, and we wrote off this amount. I suggest we are going to be faced with the same situation in respect of the CNR. I am sure there is no one alive with whom we made an original arrangement regarding the CNR to whom we owe this money. We are now being asked to accept this kind of financing in respect of Air Canada. If we accept this bill we will create havoc there as well.

There is a great deal of concern in the country about passenger service on the railways and on our airlines. This, to some extent, is the result of recent policy statements by the Government. We are raising and spending vast amounts of money for new airports. Air Canada will have to purchase new types of aircraft at great expense. Air Canada should be allowed to operate on long term financing in order to purchase new equipment. It should be placed in a position where it can depreciate its equipment and purchase new equipment when required, otherwise Air Canada will soon face a similar debt to that now facing the CNR.

The people in my area are very concerned about the air policy of this Government. We have been told in northern Ontario we are going to have a regional air carrier. It was suggested that Nordair, Montreal, would be that carrier, but Nordair has not got the type of equipment needed to operate in that area. This company cannot replace the Viscounts Air Canada has been supplying or duplicate the service provided by Air Canada. I suggest this is the case for a number of reasons. I really do not care whether or not Air Canada flies into northern Ontario. However, I do believe that whoever operates that service should be connected with Air Canada because when it is necessary to make connections with the national or international carriers, this becomes impossible if the feeder line comes in at a time when accommodation is not available or when there is no interrelated passenger service. In northern Ontario we have been very happy with the service of Air Canada. I am sure, however, that it could extend its services considerably beyond what they are. But I think it is true that Air Canada is strapped in respect of finances. If it becomes involved in jumbo jets it will be hard pressed to operate Viscounts on short runs and to operate smaller than Viscount aircraft into some of the more remote areas of northern Ontario and northern Quebec.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) mentioned the fact that there are problems in Kapuskasing, Hearst, Moosonee and that whole area. Obviously, areas of this type must be served by a feeder company, but that feeder company must come under Air Canada scheduling and accounting practices. They should be interrelated. If we have a feeder type of service and Air Canada says they will leave it up to the feeder airlines, then it seems to me the feeder service will put their aircraft on the lucrative flights. Originally, we established companies such as the Ontario Northland Railway and Air Canada to serve the people. It was not necessary for them to make money. Money could not be made by Air Canada or by our rail carriers. Therefore, the government had to put up money and establish the system as a Crown corporation. Where are all the people who previously believed in the development of Canada? Where are the people who said they would be interested in services?

I have heard members in all parts of the House stand up and say they were concerned about the type of service provided the people in their areas. I have heard the old adage that there are ways to get around this lack of service. One can go by car or bus around Newfoundland, but steering must be quite an experience on some of those roads.

Mr. McIlraith: That is a gentle way to put it.

Mr. Peters: It is almost as bad in northern Ontario. There have been suggestions that we turn from rail transportation to transportation by bus and move from major air line services into feeder services. Such a move means that services become totally unsatisfactory. I think this is becoming apparent to everyone.

Much has been said about the financing of the Canadian National Railways. Perhaps it is unfortunate that we should say we are opposed to this bill, because it is a normal bill. The minister stands up and gives the silly assurance, which I have heard so many times in this House, that the bill is in its normal form and meets all normal criteria. This is all very well, but this has been the situation for many years and it is one that is totally unacceptable. It must be totally unacceptable to most members who have thought about that we are going to pay $70 million on a $2 billion debt of a railway which has a profit of only $41 million. It seems to me that this is bad financing. The farmers in western Canada are complaining that they have large debts, a small amount of money and therefore are not making ends meet. Everybody is sympathetic with them. The president of the Canadian National Railways cannot do anything about this matter. All he can do is ask for more money.

Because of the time I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis):

> That the word "now" be deleted and that the words "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the motion.

I realize that this is a negative amendment, but it is the only type of amendment available to us. We do not have the right to reduce the amount of financing or the $2 billion debt of the Canadian National Railways. If this amendment should be accepted, then I believe the government would spend the Christmas holidays finding a new way to finance the Canadian National Railways and I am sure would come up with a way to get rid of this $2 billion paper debt.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the Chair. This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

POSITION ON ORDER PAPER OF MOTION OF MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S EAST

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to notice of motion No. 46 which appears on today's order paper under Private Members' Notices of Motions. I shall endeavour to be brief, Mr. Speaker.

To propose that a private member's notice of motion on a question of privilege should rank as a private member's notice of motion on the order paper is to accept two propositions which in my view must be repugnant to this House. The first proposition is that privilege can be divided into government questions of privilege and private members' questions of privilege. A member of the government front bench who raises a question of privilege by this method is to have an absolute priority by having his question considered as government business. On the other hand, a private member raising an identical question of privilege is to be given the priority, if it can be called that, of a private member. I find it disturbing that such thinking should exist.

It seems to me the second proposition is founded upon what would appear to be an amazing lack of knowledge and appreciation of the principles of privilege. Any question of privilege concerns the privilege of the members of the House collectively and not that alone of the member raising it. Questions of privilege cannot be divided into questions of privilege that affect members of the government and questions of privilege that affect "the others", and here, Mr. Speaker, I am speaking for the others.

Another principle of privilege is its urgency which compels the raising of it at the first opportunity. If a private member puts his question of privilege by way of notice of motion, knowing that he will be put on a list that precludes his question from coming up for weeks or months ahead, he has in fact denied the urgency of his question and thereby proved that his question is not one of privilege. Again I find it disturbing to private members that such thinking should exist.

I could have raised this question of privilege yesterday, Mr. Speaker. I was aware, however, that another member intended to raise a question of privilege and that leave would be asked to put a motion under Standing Order 26. Rather than intrude further upon the business of the House, and because my question of privilege involved a continuing breach, I quite properly availed myself of the new method of proceeding by way of Standing Order 42. It would appear that because of the treatment my question of privilege has received it is obvious that no private member will so proceed again unless we have a ruling from Your Honour.

May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, as the member of this House for St. John's East, that I consider myself one amongst equals and hence expect to be treated accordingly.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to make a ruling on this matter which I consider to be one of some urgency. I would hope that other hon. members would assist Your Honour in arriving at a ruling, not only the experts in the House but other hon. members as well who have some stake in this matter.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise not as one of the experts to whom the hon. member alluded but as one who has had the experience earlier this year of having his notice of motion put in a place where it should not be. Therefore I approach Your Honour with some experience in that regard.

One of the difficulties about this matter is the fundamental misapprehension about the time of this House. The feeling is held among a considerable number of members, particularly some of those ornaments on the front benches on the other side, that the time of this House belongs to the government. This is not so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: The time of this House belongs to the House. The House, as it sees fit, gives part of that time to the government, as it should and must do, for the proper carrying out of government business. There is more than enough time for a government which is not sloppy and slovenly and which pays some attention to cultivating the good will of the House that is necessary if it is to get its business done in adequate time.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Here we have a situation in which the House has provided time for dealing with those types of problems, such as questions of privilege and points of order, to which reference has been made by my hon. friend. This is time which the House has kept for this purpose. It is a residue of time still retained by the House to enable it to transact such business properly. I think that government members and others are under a misapprehension in this regard. Therefore I wish to call the matter to your attention, Mr. Speaker. Standing Order 17 reads as follows:

> Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

The second part of the Standing Order reads:

> Unless notice of motion has been given—

I call these words to Your Honour's attention.

> —under Standing Order 42, any member proposing to raise a question of privilege other than one arising out of proceedings in the Chamber during the course of a sitting shall give to the Speaker a written statement of the question at least one hour prior to raising the question in the House.

In my submission there are three ways in which a matter of privilege may come on the floor of the House during the time of sitting of the House. One is when it arises directly during the course of proceedings in the House. A member may then rise immediately—in fact, he must rise immediately—and bring it to Your Honour's attention. The second one is when privilege arises out of matters which take place outside the House or there is some specific reason why a member cannot bring it to the attention of the House when the House is transacting its business. An hon. member then has an opportunity to bring it up upon giving one hour's notice pursuant to the Standing Order I read. The third way is by giving a notice of motion under Standing Order 42.

We must assume that words put together mean something as they are contained in the Standing Orders. Otherwise, why would it be said that "unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Order 42" a member may raise it in another way? In other words, there are three ways of doing it: when it comes about during the transaction of business, by giving an hour's notice to Your Honour, and by a notice of motion under Standing Order 42.

If I am correct in that, the matter is then of such signal importance that, as has been pointed out by the hon. member, it should not be relegated to the position of a private member's notice of motion. The two days' notice has been given to permit the House to become adequately acquainted with the matter and to permit Your Honour to examine the precedents and the facts so that you may decide at the proper time, not what disposi ion shall be made of the motion but whether or not a prime facie case has been raised. This is the opportunity that has been given to Your Honour by the two days' notice.

Therefore I suggest that under those conditions any hon. member has the right to make use of Standing Order 42 so that Your Honour may have the opportunity to decide if there is a prima facie case of privilege. If Your Honour gives effect to our proposal we will not have a full day's debate on Friday but only such debate as will or will not convince Your Honour that a prima facie case of privilege has been made.

May I conclude by referring Your Honour to May's Parliamentary Practice, 17th edition, 1964, in which it is written at page 378, when dealing with matters of privilege:

> A matter which is postponed to suit the convenience of the House or to secure the attendance of a Member implicated, or to give the Speaker an opportunity to consider it fully does not forfeit priority when eventually raised;

That precedent would be broken if Your Honour did not give effect to the request made by the hon. member today to ensure that this notice of motion is placed where it should be for consideration tomorrow morning.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no further contributions to the debate on the point raised by the hon. member for St. John's East I think I should assure the hon. member for St. John's East that I will take the first opportunity available today to give very serious thought to the point he has raised and which has been supported by the hon. member for Peace River.

I do not want to minimize in any way the importance of the procedural point he has raised, and since he filed the motion yesterday I have already spent a considerable amount of time looking into precedents and decisions which have been rendered in similar circumstances in the past because there is nothing particularly new about the procedure which is now proposed by the hon. member. I hesitate to use the word "attempted", but this procedure has been proposed previously in similar circumstances and decisions have been rendered by the Chair on such occasions. These are decisions that will have to be studied, particularly in view of the arguments advanced by the hon. member and his colleague, the hon. member for Peace River. I will be looking into the matter intently later today.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MORTALITY RATE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the indulgence of the House to consider a matter I want to raise pursuant to Standing Order 43, which reads as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

If I may have a moment to explain how pressing and urgent this matter is, before I ask for permission I would point out that it is something which should be on the conscience of every member of the House, which demands that we take immediate steps to correct a situation that was given some publicity yesterday by the making public of a communication signed by G. Graham Cummings, Medical Liaison Officer, Medical Services Branch, for Dr. Wiebe, Acting Director General, Medical Services Branch, Department of National Health and Welfare, and dated October 20, 1969.

The communication was addressed to all regional directors, and the subject matter was "Changing Characteristics of Indian Mortality." If I may make two brief quotations from this stunning and shocking document, not to take them out of context but to give substance to what I claim is the pressing nature of this matter, perhaps they may convince the House that unanimous consent needs to be given. The first quotation relating to Indian mortality is:

(c) rising mortality in the third and fourth decades of life;

The second quotation is:

Indian infant mortality remains a matter of concern particularly in the provinces of British Columbia and the Yukon, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The communication goes on to point out that an Indian woman of age 27 has less than one-fifth of the chance of an average Canadian of proceeding any farther through life, and an Indian man of the same age group has half the chance. Based on that brief explanation I would respectfully ask that the House give its consent for the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to pursue this matter which is not contained within its current terms of reference. I therefore ask permission to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North:

That the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be empowered to inquire forthwith into the matter of health facilities available to, and the conditions of health of, the native Indian people of Canada and to report its findings and recommendations with all speed and dispatch.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena. He has addressed himself to the fact that this motion, before it can be put to the House, requires the unanimous consent of the House. I shall inquire now whether there is such unanimous consent on the part of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. The motion will not be put to the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege and ask which unconscionable person objected?

Some hon. Members: All of them.

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister first.

Mr. Trudeau: As always.

Some hon. Members: The just society.

Some hon. Members: Just for Grits.

An hon. Member: An insensitive society.

An hon. Member: Handouts, pay-offs, just for Grits.

CIGARETTE POISON CONTENT CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO CONTROL MAXIMUM TAR AND NICOTINE LEVELS

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-166, to control the tar content and nicotine level of cigarettes.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, in view of the information that comes to hand from time to time that there is a difference in the amount of deleterious material found in cigarettes, the purpose of this bill is to provide for the industry to be brought under the Food and Drug Directorate in order that the safest possible cigarette will be made available to the Canadian public. I would ask that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Services, in view of the fact that this committee at the present time is considering this question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MORTALITY RATE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the catastrophic decline in the health standards of the native people of Canada as revealed yesterday in a letter made public from the Department of National Health and Welfare, revealing that the native people's death rate has increased by 6 per cent for males over the past three years and 8 per cent for females, and the immediate and urgent need for the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to take immediate steps to deal with this crisis.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North has given me the notice required under Standing Order 26 and I have had time to consider the matter very seriously. I can assure the hon. member in all honesty that this is a decision that is not easy to make. I have pondered the aspects of this situation. I have looked into all aspects of Standing Order 26 and have taken into account other considerations, wondering whether the business of the House scheduled for today should be set aside for the purpose of discussing the most important and serious matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and which was referred to earlier today under the provisions of Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Skeena.

After due consideration I think I must rule with extreme reluctance that this is not the type of motion which can be put to the House at the present time. While there is no point in my going into all the subparagraphs of Standing Order 26 which specify under what circumstances a motion can be put to the House, I might refer the hon. member to Standing Order 26, subsection (5), which states:

> In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker shall have regard . . . to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means.

I hope that by an agreement of some nature some way may be found by hon. members to bring this very urgent matter of national importance before the House for discussion.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MORTALITY RATE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development consider making a statement on motions tomorrow with regard to the report on the mortality rate of Indians? The report describes the increasing mortality rate among young adults as disastrous. In the course of making such statement will either the minister or the Prime Minister make particular reference to why this report allegedly was kept under wraps for some months? Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development make such a statement on motions tomorrow?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not looked into the matter so I am not prepared to make a statement, but the minister will be in the House tomorrow and he will be prepared to answer questions then. In the meantime the Leader of the Opposition may wish to ask questions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When was this important report made available to him by the director of health services? Also, was it then immediately brought to the attention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the mortality rates among our Indian population have never been a matter of secrecy within the government or for anybody else who has wished to inquire. We have had analyses of these rates in various reports that have been available for several years to anybody who is interested. There is nothing of a secret nature about it. What is in issue today and what is concerning the Leader of the Opposition is that these statistics were analysed in an interdepartmental memorandum that went from the Acting Director General to his zone officers across the country. The press and the media quoted the memorandum of October 20 correctly. What followed from that was a further memorandum of November 25 from the Acting Director General to the regional directors, correcting a grave error in the earlier memorandum from which I believe the hon. member for Skeena quoted. The later memorandum makes it quite clear that there was an erroneous interpretation of these statistics.

Mr. Lewis: Table it.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to table both memorandums if I may have unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro: Inasmuch as copies of these interdepartmental memorandums were sent to people outside the Public Service, there is no reason why they should not be tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has asked whether certain documents he has referred to can be tabled with the consent of the House. Has the minister this consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I still ask whether the Prime Minister will request the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to make a statement on motions on this subject tomorrow? Also, will the Prime Minister consider a suggestion that was put forward, although in a slightly different form from mine, a few minutes ago and refer this report to the appropriate committee of the House for study and consideration? Will the Prime Minister lend his good offices to this move?

Mr. Trudeau: As I just said, Mr. Speaker, I have not inquired into the matter. I will inquire into the matter and if such appears to be the right course I will do as the Leader of the Opposition suggests. In the meantime the Minister of National Health and Welfare is prepared to answer questions.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the disturbing aspects of this report, will the minister recommend to the cabinet a substantial increase in the budget for Indian health services?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to consider that course. I point out that over the last four or five years there has been approximately a 30 per cent increase in the total expenditures in this particular area. In further answer to the hon. member's question, I would like to point out that the five to one ratio quoted earlier was not correct. What the figures do show is that 3.8 Indian women in 1,000 die annually compared with 0.7 other Canadian women in 1,000.

Mr. Hees: Canadian Women?

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Munro: That is in the age group 25 to 29. The memorandum from which the hon. member for Skeena quoted did not point out that there has been a decrease in mortality among infant and school age Indian children. It is in this particular age group, 25 to 29, that we have experienced the great increase which is so disturbing.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact this report states that the rising mortality rate amongst adults is associated with suicide and violence and indicates serious social dissatisfaction, will the Prime Minister on behalf of the Treasury Board give favourable consideration to an increase in the funds available for working with this group of people?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessarily follows that you prevent the suicide rate from increasing by providing more money from the Treasury Board.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I think it is safe to say that the high mortality rate amongst native people can be directly related to the lack of proper medical facilities, particularly the lack of doctors' services. I have had personal communication with the minister by way of letters. I want to know whether he is still objecting to the idea of a flying doctor to serve the isolated northern communities?

Mr. Munro: If I might reply, Mr. Speaker, the same report, the intradepartmental memorandum, shows that the Indian mortality rate is more favourable than the white mortality rate in some of the Maritime provinces. Maybe the hon. member could draw the same inference from that and say this is a serious reflection on the administrations of certain Maritime provinces, both present and past. All I would argue—

Mr. Hees: Name the provinces.

Mr. Munro: The Maritime provinces generally.

Mr. Hees: Name the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the minister and the hon. member who asked the question should not debate the matter. Some latitude is being exercised and will continue to be exercised in connection with such an important matter, but not in the form of a debate.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. When requesting the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to make a statement tomorrow on the suggestion that a committee should be set up, would he indicate the reasons why the government fears to have this matter investigated by a committee?

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I understand from an answer the minister gave earlier that the first memorandum was dated October 20 and the second memorandum was dated about the end of November—

Mr. Munro: November 25.

Mr. Lewis: November 25. May I ask the minister whether the second memorandum was sent by the director on instructions from those above him, including himself and the deputy of his department?

Mr. Munro: No, Mr. Speaker. Instructions were not given by anyone above him to send either of the memoranda. I talked to the Acting Director General today and he advised me that he noticed the error himself in his earlier memorandum. He sent it out. I learned that today.

Mr. Lewis: The minister referred to an error. As I heard him read the alleged correction in the second memorandum, it still remains true that the ratio was roughly five to one, 2 point something as against .7. The ratio was still five to one except there was a reference to infant mortality. Will the minister tell the House and the people of Canada what the correction is supposed to be and whether the decrease in infant mortality offsets the increase in adult mortality?
