The account says the appearance of the Cathedral was exceedingly sombre, with its mourning em. blems in every part, reminding one of the awful reign of death. The massive columns were completely draped, the windows covered with thick folds of crape, the pilasters covered with black cloth, and the arches and mouldings richly festooned. The altar, the throne, the pulpit, and the organ wore their appropriate mournings; numerous black pennants waved from the clerestory, and immediately under the organ were the arms of the late Prelate. artistically emblazoned in deep mourning. An immense black flag was shown from the campanile. All was done under the directions of the ladies of the town, and no expense was spared to make the Church suitable to the sad occasion. The College and Convent were also conspicuous for their

which we willingly add to the above. LITTLE JIMMIE. DROWNED SEPTEMBER 27th, 1878. Tired little hands now folded,

The river's damp upon them still, At rest the brave heart, e'er upholded By the braver boyish will. Little feet, alsa! grown weary,
Tho so young, with life's hard fight;
Little face that erst so cheery,
Now so solemn, still and white.

Little life, so quickly ended, Ere the promise of the morn Could, with manhood's vigor blended, Of the future years be born.

Little hopes, so early blighted, All their longings who may know; Or what goal the vision sighted. (Youthful dreams are never slow.) Little joys, in one forever, Little heart-throbs, stilled for aye;

Little cares, alas! now over. Little crosses laid away. Ah, "God guard thee little Jimmie,"
Might have been thy mother's prayer

Left her loving, anxious care. In thy boyhood's brave young daring, For the work which men must do; Never daunted, never caring, So thy labor brought its due.

Alone, beside the dark'ning river! With none to help thee, none to save Thy voice hush'd in the great forever, Whose sombre portals are the grave.

Heaven's ways are surely hidden, And its blessings oft seem far: And its blessings oft seem far; But we have His promise given Whose care these little children are.

Close the eye-lids-Ah! no weeping-Fold the little hands to rest;
The bright new day wee Jim keeping, In that world where all is blest.

BOUND THE MOON. CHAPTER V.

THE CLOD OF SPACE. This revelation came like a thunderbolt. Who could have expected such error in calculation? Barbicane would not believe it! Nicholl revised his figures; they were exact. As the formula which had determined them, they could not suspect its truth; it was evident that an initiatory velocity of 17,000 yards in the first second was mary to enable them to reach the eutral point.

The three friends looked at each other silently. There was no thought of breakfast. Barbicane, with clench- it?" ed teeth, knitted brow, and hands clasped convulsively, was watching through the window. Nicholl had d his arms, and was examining his calculations. Michell Ardan was Barbicane did not answer, but, after a rapid glance at the Captain, took a powder." pair of compasses wherewith to measure took an exact observation, and noticed nary. Then rising and wiping Satelite." his forehead on which large drops of prespiration were standing, he put given to the dog, which devoured it for our satellite lies in a vacuum." some figures on paper. Nicholl understood that the president was deducting from the terrestial diameter the proatched him anxiously.

"No," exclaimed Barbicane, after of domestic animal." nome moments, "no, we are not falling! no, we are already more than 50,000 failed us." langues from the earth. "And this explanation is the more obable," added Barbicane, "because, in throwing off the water enclosed between its partition-breaks, the projectale found itself lightened of a considerable weight."

"Just so, said Nicholl. "Ah, my brave Nicholl, we are "Very well, then," said Michel Ardan, quietly; "as we are safe, let us

Nicholl was not mistaken. The initial speed had been, very fortunately, much above that estimated by the ige Observatory : but the Cambridge Observatory had nevertheless made a mistake.

The travelers, recovered from this false alarm, breakfasted merrily. If they ate a great deal, they talked more. Their confidence was greater after than before "the incident of the algebra."

"Why should we not succeed?" said Michel Ardan; "why should we not arrive safely? We are launched; we have no obstacle before us, no stones in our way; the road is open, more so than that of a ship battling with the ses: more open than that of a balloon battling with the wind; and if a ship can reach its destination, a balloon go where it pleases, why can not our projectile attain its end and aim?"

"It will attain it," said Barbicane. "If only to do honor to the Americans," added Michel Ardan, "the only people who could bring such an enterprise to a happy termination, and the only which could produce a President Barbicane. Ah, now we are no longer uneasy, I begin to think. What will become of us? We shall get right royally weary."

Barbicane and Nicholl made a gesture of denial

"But I have provided for the contingency my friends," replied Michel : chess, draughts, cards, and dominoes at your disposal; nothing is wanting but a billiard-table." What!" exclaimed Barbicane;

" you brought away such trifles?" "Certainly," replied Michel, "and that azote will escape rapidly through the open scuttles." not only to distract ourselves, but also the open scuttles."

"Oh! the time for throwing out our scholars and Mighal ing the Selenite smoking divans with poor Satelite?" said Michel.
