The war of the Centennials rages still, householders, business partnerships, and editorial corps being divided on the great question. There was a lively time in last evening's train. Chief Justice Ritchie maintaining with his usual vigor that Mr. 1890, was in the 19th century.

Yesterday was the first legal day for shooting partridges. As usual the Portland Police Magistrate took advantage of the earliest opportunity to enjoy his favorite sport. He returned home last evening quite satisfied with the day's shooting, having killed one bird.

The Sunday School Convention.
A despatch from Yarmouth to the Chronicle, dated Sept. 1st, says:

Shipping Notes.
Liverpool, Aug. 17.—The Adèle, from Lunenburg for Wick, has been in contact with the Winona, from Richmond, at anchor off Canada Dock; the former had starboard bulwarks and masts and rigging, but the latter was not damaged.

The Daulines, from Lunenburg, reports that on Aug. 12, in lat. 50 N., long. 26 W., blowing strong from the westward, ship broached to and carried away mainmast ten feet from the cap.

Quiet Passage.—The bark James Pease, of and from P. E. Island, arrived at Liverpool, 28th ult., in 17 days.

Madrasah Club.
The Madrasah concert, last evening, was better even than that given the evening previous, the pieces having been selected with more regard for the effect of the whole. Mr. Heald gave the first solo he was unable to give on Monday, and blushed like a girl (in her teens) at the applause that followed.

Shipping Notes.
The police made only one arrest for drunkenness last night. The arrested was John Henderson, and he was so drunk that he had to be carried to the station from Union street.

The next person called up was Mrs. Ellen Finnegan, wife of Matthew Finnegan, Reed's Point. She was given in charge by her husband for beating his windows in his shop at Reed's Point.

Both husband and wife were in court. Each accused the other of ill-treatment extending over a period of years. The husband accused the wife of robbing him, the wife retorted by saying that he would give her no money to purchase the necessities of life.

She said she wanted to visit Boston; and he told her he would give her a hundred dollars if she never came back. The Magistrate declined to interfere, and sent them home, informing the woman that she must obey him who was her lord and master; and the man that he had taken her for better or for worse, and must put up with her.

Ann's Ross was charged with stealing a dress, a hat, a wig, and some other trifles, as the Chief put it, from Mrs. William Ross, King street. The evening before she had gone to Mrs. Ross and hired with her. Yesterday morning Mrs. Ross was absent, or engaged, and her new servant dressed her, and she in a black dress, donned a new hat, adorned her hair with a wig, around her waist carried a pair of kid gloves, and added cuffs and a collar to complete her toilet.

She then went out for a promenade. Detective Rider took the case in hand, and the girl was recognized on the North Wharf and arrested. After being fully cautioned, the girl elected to be tried by the Magistrate, and then pleaded guilty to the charge of stealing.

"Who is this girl?" asked the Magistrate, as she stood before him. "The Chief was before him and opened his 'book of mysteries' containing the history of many dark doings, unknown to the public, and there her story was written in that careful and methodical manner for which the Chief is famed. Five years since she came from Portland, Me., with her father, lived awhile in Halifax, then came to St. John, and afterwards went to Lunenburg. Her father died, and she was left to herself. She lived in a number of places in the city, finally commencing to lead an abandoned life, and at length secured a room at Lopez's, in Shefferson's street, where she went to service again, and finally went to Mrs. Ross's, and was tempted to steal.

She said that her real name is Mary Baker; that she has lived in a number of places in the city, and that when she left her boarding house, she stole her landlady's silk dress; and was missing when required as a witness in a police case a few weeks ago. Nor did she tell that while the police were searching for her with a summons she was on board a schooner. These little episodes in her life were left out, and consequently, the Magistrate took a very lenient view of the case. He put a few questions to her, all of which she answered frankly, and expressed a desire to lead a better life and promised to do so. Nor did he see the graces she made, and the trouble she had to keep a sober face. He sentenced her to three months' imprisonment on account of her youth he did not wish to send her to the penitentiary—and requested the Chief to keep the run of her and see what could be done towards reforming her when she comes out.

Mrs. Short was charged with using abusive language to Mrs. Kimball. When both sides of the affair were heard it appeared as if you was as bad as the other, and the case was withdrawn, on recommendation of the Magistrate.

If you want a fine lavender, prime Havana cigar, give Lavon Bros. a call, King Square.

The Portland Trunk Mystery.
This is solved. The trunk belongs to Miss Zoophy, a person well remembered by some former policemen, and who spent some months in the penitentiary for keeping a disorderly house. She called on Chief Jones, described the articles in the trunk, and accounted for leaving it in such a strange place by saying that the hour was so late that she could not get in anywhere. He story is rather queer, but as she has described a portion of the contents, and no one else has happened to claim the property, though every publicity has been given, it will be delivered to her. She declined to say anything on the elopement question.
