Mr. Nielsen: Well, that is hardly satisfactory. The government considers this a very urgent bill. Surely they should have some order in their planning so that they can tell us now when they intend to proclaim the bill, within a time-frame of, say, a week, two weeks or even a month.

Mr. Whelan: I would say before the House adjourns.

Mr. Nielsen: I take it that the minister implicitly says that the bill will be proclaimed on or before June 30; is that correct?

Mr. Whelan: I would hope so.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question if I may. Two of the members who rose to speak after I did mentioned that one of their reasons for supporting the bill had to do with the impact this bill might have on criminal activity.

Mr. Nielsen: We are on Clause 2.

Mr. Deans: I just want to ask a question with regard to this because before it is proclaimed I would like to know what the minister feels about this. If I interpret correctly the remarks of the hon. members, they are saying that because there is an illegal bookmaking operation, we will solve that problem by legalizing off-track betting. Taken to its logical conclusion, I wonder if the minister would agree with the thought that were we to look at making legal all matters which are presently illegal, that would somehow or other resolve our problems in the minds of the members.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, we heard the figures on how much betting on horse racing is done through bookies; we do not say this bill will eliminate that. I do not think there is anything that anyone can do by passing laws which will eliminate bookies totally or illegal betting, but we do think it will eliminate some. Some of the money will go directly to the racetrack, and in turn to the industry.

There is a great deal of misconception about how much money is bet by the bookies. About 90 per cent of the bookies' operation is other than horse racing. About 10 per cent of the functions of a bookie operation is horse racing. The rest is football, baseball, hockey, soccer, golf—you name it. We do not say we can eliminate it but we think we can lessen illegal betting. The more money that is bet will actually be placed in the horse racing industry through the pari-mutuel betting system. In turn, the horse owner-operators will share in a larger amount of revenue so they will naturally have a bigger share.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Chairman, may I pursue this for a moment? Is it not true that on balance the effect this will have will be only on those municipalities where a track exists to which a person would go to make a telephone call to place a bet? For the majority of municipalities across the country the operation of illegal bookmaking will be continued. I think the minister would be in agreement with that. However, I would ask the minister to elaborate on one of the arguments made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East when he mentioned the assistance in eliminating the sort of criminality within the system which currently exists. Is it the minister's intention then to open bookmaking in a legal sense in all areas of sport and other areas where betting regularly takes place through illegal bookmaking in order to eliminate the criminality involved?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, that is a strong argument which many people put forward that this bill is going to eliminate it. I do not think we can eliminate it in horse racing with what we are proposing. I do not think you can eliminate it in any of the options that bookie operators have. But what the hon. member said is true, that is, where there is no racetrack there are bookies. They are all over the place. It is illegal for them to operate but from time to time some of them are arrested, some of them are fined. In many instances they are not fined in a very severe manner, I must say. But we do not pretend that we are going to eliminate all the bookie operations. There is an arrangement for telephone account betting. You can use a zenith number. Again, as the hon. member said, those who can afford it will be the ones who use it. They will need to have money on deposit. They will not be able to call up and say, "I want to make a bet" as they can with their bookie, but the bookie uses strong-arm tactics to recover any loss if he has one. This system will be only for those who can afford to bet. I do not condone a tax on poor people, as the hon. member said. That is one of the reasons I am very recluctant to go to the off-track betting shops. As I said earlier, there are many people already making applications for off-track betting shops. I have strong feelings about that.

Mention was made earlier about the amount of revenue which the federal government gets. It was suggested that we may be making money. We receive 0.6 of the take, which is for our administration. It is clearly stated that all levies collected are used to cover the cost of supervision by the federal government. The surplus revenue is carried over for use in the next fiscal year, that is retained earnings. You are never allowed to have any more than a surplus $2 million. When there is a surplus of more than $2 million the rate of levy is reduced. Automatically that has to be done.

An hon. member also asked about supervision of the racetrack. We were also asked about regulations. We have a good record as far as supervision is concerned. I think the race tracks in Canada are very well supervised, and we want to maintain that.

As far as changes in regulations are concerned, we have changed the amount of take to 15 per cent for small tracks. If the take is too big or if it is too little, we want to be able to adjust that. The racing industry is agreeable to that. They want that so that we do not have to come back to the House every time there is a need for a change. That is the reason for that being included in the bill so we do not have to wait ten years, as we are at the present time. We are waiting ten years to make that change. I do not know if I will be the minister in ten years or not, some people think I have been here too long now—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —but let me remind hon. members that there was one minister of agriculture in Canada for 22 years.

Mr. Nielsen: Look what happened to him.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain made reference to the importance and the unimportance of this bill. Many others have stated how many thousands of people are involved in the employment in this industry. Inter-track betting will mean more people will be employed. Through the telephone betting system more people will be legitimately employed. The Windsor racetrack, which is not in my constituency but in the constituency next to mine, is already preparing to hire 25 people who will run the system for them. To some people that number may not be significant.

Mr. Nielsen: You are going to talk out your own bill.

Mr. Whelan: I think this is an important bill. It has a chain effect on the amount of people whose jobs depend on the overall racing industry, which is a huge industry.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Chairman, is the minister proposing to respond to my question on the protection of the market area of the track? How does he propose to administer that? What about protection of horsemen? Will the minister be introducing any regulations to restrict tracks from reducing the amount of live racing as they increase the amount of inter-track racing?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, first it has to be agreed that you will have inter-track racing. This can mean the greater use of a facility, for instance, if one track has racing and the other does not. If there is a club room and a dining room a track can use large TV screens in them. It will be the same as watching the races without having to travel 100 miles or 150 miles to a race. People will be able to watch races enjoy a meal at the same time with their family. We say this will have to be worked out with the tracks. Our people will be working very closely to protect the interests of the tracks. Many small tracks have expressed a concern that this may put them out of business. We do not want that. We will be supervising the situation very closely. The racetrack in Sudbury has no problem because it does not have a track within its boundary. It could join with any other track in southern Ontario and run inter-track betting there all winter long or whenever its racing dates were not on. Tracks are quite eager to participate in that kind of a program.

I cannot take the time to outline all of the ways and means by which we intend to make this as fair as possible and make sure that the racing industry is economically viable. We want it to be successful.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Chairman, I asked two specific questions. I do not know whether or not the minister does not want to answer them. What about a track that is located in city A that is close to city B, and one has live racing, can the other one have inter-track betting even if it impinges on the market of the track with live racing? Second, will the regulations prohibit a track from reducing the amount of live racing as it increases the amount of inter-track betting?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member knows that at the present time we set by negotiation the dates of racing for each track across Canada. Those dates cannot be changed that easily. In fact, they are not changed very much at all. It is only by mutual consent if some track does not want so many days, etc. that those dates are available to another track and transferred. There will not be inter-track betting unless there is agreement between the two tracks.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain referred to my remarks, I think I should clarify the point. I told the House that the statement I made was based upon information which I obtained when I was solicitor general. At that time a good number of chiefs of police in the country argued in favour of off-track betting, not as a means of eliminating illegal betting but as another means of reducing it.

When the minister announced his measures last year, he mentioned the capability of betting by telephone from various areas of the country. For example, under the measures the minister announced, a person could telephone from Hamilton to the track in Fort Erie or to the track in Toronto to place bets. Consequently this would help reduce illegal betting in Hamilton. Of course this could be done in Peterborough or other places as well, not through the bill particularly, but through the other measures announced by the minister.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the Conservative House leader wanted a date for the proclamation of the bill. I am told by my officials that it may not be possible before approximately six weeks for it to go through all the rigamarole it goes through and for it to be proclaimed.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Bill reported.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I indicated earlier to hon. members that if Bill C-117 were completed before four o'clock, it might be the wish of hon. members to call it four o'clock and to proceed to private members' hour. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is the idea then that private members' hour would terminate at approximately seven minutes to five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member is correct.

It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

RESOURCES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RENEWABLE ENERGY STATISTICS AND SURVEYS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved that Bill C-261, to amend the Resources and Technical Surveys Act (renewable energy), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the session started some time ago and having had a long-term interest in the renewable energy field, I placed before the House some ten private members' bills which would foster the whole field of renewable energy. Many of these bills are very simple in their content and would not cost the government any money. They would encourage the various departments and officials within those departments to pay more particular attention to the potential of renewable energy in Canada.

The Resources and Technical Surveys Act was passed in the House in 1966-67. At that time not many people in the country were concerned about the price of energy. Under the legislation the minister was made responsible for co-ordinating, promoting and recommending national policies and programs with respect to energy, mines, minerals, water and other resources, and for carrying out surveys on Canada lands in conjunction with the provinces, those surveys to determine the potential for minerals, oil, natural gas, electric generation and so forth.

At that time renewable energies were not included in the act. As a result, information and technical data, which are essential if we are to know what we have in the nation as far as potential is concerned, were not in effect surveyed. Of course, some of the figures are useful for those who wish to go through the charts to determine whether in fact there is potential in their area for an aquafer of water, geothermal energy or a biomass potential of some sort. But that information has not been gathered in the same way as information concerning mining or other potentials.

The major thrust of this bill is very simple. It is to change the perspective on the part of the department and its officials, so that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will come to see the renewable potential in the country as a realistic and viable source of energy. As I said, the amendments are simple. All they really do is to insert into a number of sections of the Resource and Technical Surveys Act the term "renewable energy". If we look at the definitions contained in the original bill, the term "minerals" does not include the renewable resources sector. This is the difficulty to which I am referring.

At the present time there is still a tremendous emphasis upon oil and natural gas. Given the difficulties inherent in the development of that potential due to the fact that much of it is offshore and very expensive, we are importing over 300,000 barrels of imported oil per day. There is now much more emphasis being placed upon renewable energies by ordinary citizens of the nation. The government has responded in some ways. For example, last year approximately $150 million was spent on renewable and off-oil technology and programs by the federal government. A similar amount was spent by the provinces. We have programs such as FIRE, the Forest Industry Renewable Energy project, under which it is intended to spend some $288 million on grants for projects over the next number of years. We have the biomass loan guarantee program and the ENFOR program, or the energy from forests program. Under that program some $30 million is to be spent over five years to help heat industries and homes with wood furnaces. Also we have the PUSH program wherein governments are putting renewable sources of energy in their buildings and projects. Then there is the PASEM program which provides grants to various industries across the nation to help in the product development for projects such as solar or wind installations and the like.

Last year the House asked a number of its members to form a task force to bring forward a report on energy alternatives. It has been referred to as the Lefebvre report, but it is actually entitled, "Energy Alternatives". The report was made. It contained some 65 recommendations to assist Canada in attaining energy self-sufficiency through the help of renewable energy.

• (1600)

Perhaps I might read a paragraph from that report made by the chairman, the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre). He said:

Canada has the resources to be a leader in global energy transition. In this century we have the opportunity not only to secure our own energy future, but also to export new energy technologies we develop along the way. We appreciate that this transformation of our energy system will not be easily achieved, and our recommendations reflect the magnitude of the effort required. We are, however, optimistic that with a concerted effort, and enthusiastic and sustained commitment, the task can be accomplished.

I agree entirely with that statement. Canada has the potential to attract many interested citizens to use those renewable energies which exist under our lands, on our lands and in the sky. The 65 recommendations should be acted upon by the government as quickly as possible. It is my hope that some of the private member's bills which I have introduced will assist to that end. I have reviewed the update to the National Energy Program which was tabled in the House by the minister last week. He has said that many of the committee's recommendations are already being implemented. For example, he said that:

—the Government of Canada has greatly increased funding for research and development in the areas of conservation, renewables and synthetic fuels.

I hope that this is true. However, I am not as optimistic as is the minister that all these recommendations are being put into place in rapid succession. I feel that much more could be done. It is my hope that the department will move quickly to implement those recommendations.

As one reads through the recommendations it can be seen that Canadians have much to be optimistic about. It is evident that the committee and the task force have done an excellent job. It is desirable that these studies be conducted in order to show the potential of renewables. We must persuade the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to assist in implementing and selling these ideas.

This bill will not require any extra effort by the officials or even additional manpower in any department. All that is suggested by the bill is to have the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of the Environment and the Department of Agriculture insist that while their officials plan and implement their surveys, they look for the potential of renewable energy in Canada at the same time. I believe it is a relatively simple request.

When I phoned officials at the geological survey branch of Energy, Mines and Resources, I discovered that they have been conducting many of these surveys for some time. They have indicated the potential of hydroelectricity—which is a renewable energy—within their surveys. The Department of Agriculture has been conducting surveys on biomass. The Department of Environment has conducted surveys on wind conditions around airports due to their effect on airplanes. There are surveys from the Department of Forestry with respect to the potential in that area. I am uncertain as to whether the committee mentioned surveys conducted on available heat units from the sun.

People who would like access to that information might have difficulty finding out which department to get that information from in the first place, and it is not in any usable form, in any event. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources makes the information which it has from its surveys on oil and gas potential available to the private industry as well as to Petro-Canada. That information is analysed and conveyed to the industry. No such analysis is conducted on potential renewable energies such as wind or biomass, which can be made available to Canadians so they may realize the potential of these resources. This information is unavailable for many towns as well. There are many towns on the prairies which have difficulty finding water if they are not close to a river.

We know that in the early 1960s the minister, who was at that time the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), commenced an extensive survey of the prairies under the ARDA program to determine what the ground water sources were in that region for use in the agricultural and other industries. As a result of those surveys, many towns which are now looking for water sources use that information because it is available in the department. I believe that some towns in Saskatchewan have used that information and have found fresh water sources from aquafers below.

New heat pumps are being developed. One has been developed by the National Research Council and is now going to the testing stage so it can be approved by the Canadian standards agency and made available to Canadians. That heat pump will have the capacity to take the heat from water and turn it into air heat to heat our homes. This would present a great advantage to many rural communities in Canada. In order to make use of this development we would need to know, for example, the sources of ground water below our surface as well as its temperature in order to determine whether it would be viable to drill a well. It would also be important to determine if we can return the cooled water so it can again be reheated underground. That is an example of the kind of survey which can be conducted and made available to Canadians through these proposed changes to this bill.

I am sure that the same kind of aquafers exist all across Canada. Perhaps many wells have already been drilled in Ontario, the maritimes and British Columbia for which that information is already available. This information would be very valuable if our officials were to collect the data and condense it into usable form.

In the United States a number of years ago the renewable energy proposals that were introduced by the administration at that time were taken very seriously. Officials there came up against the same problems which we are facing now, that is how to convey the information to citizens, towns and municipalities so it can be used. In order to solve that problem they decided to gather all the available information and then provide knowledgeable people in the industry at various centres in the United States which could be reached by dialing a zenith phone number. Therefore, if someone wanted to phone to inquire about installing a solar unit in their house they could obtain the necessary information. A town or municipality could use this service to find out if it is possible to use ground heat to heat its buildings. Some units of the Armed Forces are presently using that technology. This information is made available to citizens of the United States through the use of the zenith phone number. It is one possible example which we could follow. It would be easy to implement because there are subdepartments of Energy, Mines and Resources across Canada which could make that information available by providing a telephone number.

As an example of consolidation of information, the present federal government has in place what is called the Canada lands inventory. It takes inventory of the potential wealth of minerals in our nation now, consolidates it and makes it available to the private sector if it wishes to use that information. That is the kind of example we should follow to consolidate all the potential renewable energy sources in this country and make them available to our citizens.

We must work closely with the provinces when doing this because, of course, many of these surveys are done by the provincial governments. The natural resources, of course, are under provincial jurisdiction. However, it will be useful for the federal government to have some of that information in its data bank as well. I would think that it would be important for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of the Environment and others to work very closely with the provinces to put this type of system in place.

As we know, the original power and authority of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was in fact to collect information. Things have changed a lot since that time. Like other departments, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is no longer simply a data collecting agency but is also involved in the whole gamut of energy projects, dealing with the daily production and importing of energy, and in assisting Canadians to give up their dependency on oil and look to other energy sources. So we found that until the advent of renewable resources, any section of the act dealing with minerals, such as Section 3 of the Resources and Technical Surveys Act, automatically covered most energy sources. For instance, oil and gas are considered as minerals for the purposes of the Mineral Year Book of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. However, some sections of the act, such as Sections 6 and 7, can be construed to include renewable energy sources in their bounds, while others do not include that possibility. Again, I say that the purpose of this bill is to remove this anomaly by making specific reference to renewable energy in those sections where reference to energy is only implicit in the word "mineral".

We know that many of our officials in departments go by the letter of the law, and as a result they do not collect the data because "mineral" does not refer to a renewable energy source. These amendments would allow the department to collect and publish that data which is either not available now or is being collected by other departments. As an example, a person who wanted data on passive solar installations, would perhaps first have to contact the National Research Council and then Environment Canada. Someone who would like information on biomass would have to contact Agriculture Canada and someone who wanted to know the velocity of wind would have to contact the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) because, as I said before, that information is only collected at airports. That is how the bill would work.

We have found there are many readjustments which are necessary in order to get to the viable sources of energy. Once this information is found, it must be made available to the public. More and more people are asking questions with regard to the potentials. Right across the country, many groups have been formed which are interested in forms of solar energy, biomass energy, and so forth, and these people should have that data. Therefore, I commend the bill to the House. I have a number of other bills which I hope I can debate in the forthcoming weeks if the session continues. I know that the work in this field is work that must go on. Hopefully, this bill will ensure that that type of work will continue.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief in my remarks on this bill. One cannot help but wonder why we are going through the exercise today, not because it is unimportant but, rather, because it is always very difficult to speak to oneself. However, I want to congratulate the hon. member for bringing the bill forward. I want to offer our support in trying to promote both the concepts as contained in the bill, limited though they are, and, of course, the over-all concept of dependence on renewable resources as opposed to our existing dependence on non-renewable resources. We expended about two months this year dealing with energy legislation. In all fairness, it was really a debate about the past. It was a debate about an energy resource which, important though it is right at this precise moment, has a limited future. It has a limited future because it will inevitably become depleted, or else the cost of getting it from the source will be so high that it will be virtually impossible for us to take advantage of it. Therefore it depressed me, I must say to Your Honour, that we were devoting so much of our time and that we continue to devote so much of our capital to looking for and getting the elusive last drop of oil. As I look ahead, I just cannot imagine how much that last drop of oil will be worth when we finally get it out of the ground. How many billions of dollars will it cost us to get it, and what use will it be to us in any event?

I am heartened by the fact that there are more people today who are concerned about renewable resources, and renewable energy resources in particular. I become a bit disappointed, however, to find that we do not seem to place the kind of emphasis on it that I would like to see. I am absolutely sure that the future of this country and of the world will be dependent on the renewable resources which we know are there but for which we have not yet developed either the technology or the will to use them. As I look at the matter, I am persuaded that it is common sense that we cannot continue to rely on a depletable resource for the fuelling needs of all the world. We will have to find and develop substitutes and we will find and develop them. The sooner we do it, the better will be the planning undertaken for the future which so many of us try to put forward for Canadians. We will develop new substances for lubrication. We are in the process of doing it right now. It is therefore important that we spend more of our time, more of our energy and more of our available dollars in that development. We will develop new ways of fuelling our transportation systems and we will develop new transportation systems to accommodate the new fuelling methods. But, again, we are being held up by the sense that somehow or other we should use up all of the existing petroleum-based products before we really turn our minds and our attention to the alternatives which are not necessary if we are to be able to meet future demand. We will find ways to build homes and places of business with the proper kind of conservation in mind and with the new fuelling methods which will both run industry as it emerges and develops and heat and cool the places in which we will work and live.

I am not sure what it is about the psyche of those in charge which allows them to play fast and loose with energy itself. It is quite clear to me that the emphasis which is being placed by the government on the dollar, as measured by the dollars it allocates for petroleum-based fuels, is the result of advice being given to it. In my judgment it has been misguided by the advice. I would have thought that having gone through a minicrisis not many months ago with regard to energy available from traditional sources, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources would have placed greater emphasis on larger amounts of capital reserves for the use of renewable resources. I hope I am not doing them a disservice but it seems to me that the reason for this is the size and the importance of the lobby. I do not want to detract from the place that petroleum-based products have had in the growth of our society, nor do I want to downplay its continuing importance but I despair to think that we constantly inflate the price of the resource and use it up at the present rate without putting equivalent amounts into the development of a replacement resource. Recently some $6.5 billion was earmarked for PIP grants to the oil industry at the same time as funding for forestry research was cut back. We have not been able to keep pace with need. We cannot rely on the chance that somewhere along the way we will be able to find a sufficient quantity of petroleum-based products to meet the ever growing need. I am worried that we are not putting the money into renewable resources that we are prepared to put into depletable resources.

In the energy crisis of the 1970s the State of Vermont quickly shifted back to the use of wood, a renewable energy resource. It would not be entirely true to say that it has maintained the level of use at that time but, in the main, it was a permanent transition because people realized that they cannot rely on a resource from outside the country over which they have no control when it comes to price or delivery. With each passing day that resource is becoming more elusive and less available. We could have made the transition as well, had we foreseen the crisis. If we had planned well we could have taken advantage of our ability to grow similar kinds of wood supplies. I do not doubt for a moment that in Canada we have the necessary technology to do this.

In the long run the cost will be considerably lower if we invest in the development of renewable resources now than if we wait until another crisis occurs. If we wait until some oil company announces that we do not have thirty years' supply left but only five to seven years' supply, the cost of making the transition could be ten times as high as it would be today.

I think it is fair to say that we should offer the same grants for renewable energy as have been offered for depletable energy resources. We must increase, rather than cut back, funding for research and development in such areas as the forest industry. We just cannot allow it to find its own level and fund its own research because these days it does not generate sufficient funds to enable it to undertake the necessary work. Before the next crisis hits we must undertake the public education that will encourage people to make the transition. This cannot be done by scare tactics. People are becoming almost immune to the scare tactics that were used some years ago. There must be another way to convince people that it is in their long-term interest to switch from what they presently use to something that will last forever.

One reason we have difficulty with this is that when the off-oil program, for example, was introduced, people were encouraged to switch to natural gas or electricity. At the time natural gas cost considerably less than oil, but it did not take long for that industry to realize it had a captive market and that once people had invested in the necessary retrofitting they were not in a position to switch back again. In that instance the natural gas industry took unfair advantage of the public's desire to be helpful in the battle against ever-increasing fuel costs and the unwise use of existing resources. It is not fair to get people to switch from one resource to another and then allow them to be ripped off. I think that is what happened over the last couple of years.

I want to say to the hon. member that, as he admitted, this is a small step but I think it is a worthwhile one. It will constantly keep in front of the people who plan these things the fact that we in this House who represent Canadians are no longer satisfied with the approach taken in the last few years. It is their responsibility for the future to place emphasis upon utilization and development, upon reforestation and what can be maintained as a renewable resource and to see that it is not used without proper management. Nothing is renewable if it is not well managed. We have to be sure that the people who give advice to government, this one or any other, are not wedded to the existing reliance on non-renewable resources. They must recognize that wherever it is practicable or wherever it is feasible, we have to insist that the transfer be made. If that is done, the future is very bright for us.

This is an industry, Mr. Speaker, that gives us a tremendous opportunity in the world, if we were to get into it in a reasonably efficient and substantial way. There is no question in my mind that we could provide leadership to many parts of the world. We would have a technology available to us that would be marketable in world terms. We could utilize that to improve Canada's role in world events. There are many parts of the world where they do not have any non-renewable resources of any kind.

We do have the capacity to be self-sufficient in the use of renewable resources. If we were to develop the technology, if we were to show, by example, a willingness to utilize those properly, we could provide a great initiative for many parts of the world and do them a great service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have the opportunity to speak on this particular bill. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) was quite correct in his early statement that his interest in this subject of renewable energy is well known in the House. It is not only through the fact, as he has indicated himself, that he has placed many bills in the private members' area but from the study that he himself has conducted and the speeches that he has made. In the course of the energy programs that have been brought forward, he always seems to find a way to work into the debate something about renewable resources. The fact that his bill, although it is No. 261, has come forward today is a tribute to the hon. member, and an acknowledgement of the fact that he is able to bring a subject that is certainly interesting to the floor of the House for debate.

As someone who has participated in these private members' hours for close to 14 years, I can assure him that many of the ideas that started here as motions or as private members' bills quite often find themselves incorporated in government legislation either of this party or, in a short time possibly, his particular party. It does find its way quite often into legislation. The reason that it may not at first blush be endorsed or incorporated into legislation or accepted in toto is that there may be some technical problem or something of that nature that would give the departmental officials cause to wonder whether, if they incorporated this, it would have a particular impact.

It is important also that people who are pioneers in this particular field recognize that there are members who are prepared to bring bills of this nature to the floor of the House. Quite often, particularly when we have what we thought were adequate supplies of oil in the world, there were many people working at that time on renewable resources and wondering if anyone was listening, particularly if anyone in Parliament was listening or in the provincial legislatures, for that matter. When we had the jolt that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) talked about, in the early 1970s, about security of supply and then the second rap in the quadrupling of the oil price by OPEC, suddenly these people who were pioneers were front and centre and had already done a good deal of research in this particular area and at long last felt, I think, that someone was recognizing the fantastic effort that they had made in their pioneer effort in this particular field of renewable energy resources.

It is no accident that I would rise, Mr. Speaker, to speak today on this subject because some years ago it was my privilege to serve as parliamentary secretary to the minister of energy, mines and resources. I know from that experience that the departmental officials, very early in the game, prior to the quadrupling of the oil price—I think it is fair to say more accurately probably through the jolt that we received from the National Energy Board or from the multinational oil companies—found that the prediction that they had made almost a year before was no longer true and that we were in fact facing a shortage of this particular commodity. On that basis the department moved, and I think moved very quickly and very effectively, into a field where they recognized at long last that something would have to be done, or at least something more would have to be done about renewable energy resources.

I compliment the member. I think the bill contains a good idea, the kind of thing he is talking about incorporating into legislation. I do not think, as he says, that it would prove expensive. As a matter of fact, it might prove a good investment if it were incorporated even in its present form. The hon. member was kind enough to comment on the excellent surveys conducted today by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, particularly by the geological surveys branch. They, like anyone else, endeavour through their own initiative, their own talents and skills, to embark upon the kinds of surveys that they think will be beneficial to an industry or a group or to the country as a whole. It is only through the kind of representation that we make, or that the hon. member has already made, that they will know how their surveys, if conducted, could be more productive for Canadians.

In my constituency, in the area of petrochemicals we think of ourselves as the petrochemical centre of Canada. The kind of work, the kind of assistance received and the kinds of surveys done by energy, mines and resources is absolutely crucial if this information is to be made known in a form that will be beneficial to a petrochemical industry.

Second, with the impact of that jolt about the possibility of not having a security of supply, many corporations decided that they had to get together to work out a system whereby the best possible use would be made of this depleting natural resource, namely, oil. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), who was here today, and was at that time the minister of industry, trade and commerce, encouraged several corporations to get together and not compete with one another building six world-scale plants for petrochemicals but to build three, and to build them one after the other, so in that way we would not bankrupt six operations but get two or three going in Canada. One at that time was in my own area of Sarnia-Lambton, the second one was anticipated at that time would take place in Alberta, and the third one in the city of Montreal.

That was a great example of government and industry getting together to meet a particular situation, realizing that while people are out working, pioneering in this field of renewable resources, we had to make the best and most effective use of the natural resources that we already have in place. World scale plants of the kind like Petrosar is a good case in point.

The hon. member also made the point that we should be looking beyond our own doors. We are not the only country that is faced with this phenomenon. We are a country that is blessed with natural resources, a country that probably does not face the same predicament or difficulty as others. Because others feel more of a panic situation, they are moving ahead and doing work and spending more money and focusing more attention on the renewable resource factor. Because they are doing that, we should take advantage of going to seminars, international conferences, we should be encouraging Canadian engineers and Canadian people to travel abroad, to go to these seminars to find out what is being done in this particular area by other countries, whose problem at the present time is obviously greater than Canada's but one that we cannot ignore.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain was correct when he said that the impetus for a lot of the government action, government money and government moves, was the sudden realization that we were faced with the two problems of a possible lack in security of supply and then we were apprehensive of what might happen to the world price, given the strength of the cartel represented by OPEC. On that basis, more focus, more money and more emphasis has certainly come by way of government, whether it be provincial or federal government.

The Canadian government's interest in the renewable energy field was demonstrated in 1974 with the establishment of a program of renewable energy research and development. A further major initiative in 1978 launched several new programs oriented toward industrial development in this particular area. More recently, I am advised, the 1980 National Energy Program emphasized the future role of renewable energy resources in providing for a stable and independent future. Criticism and hyperbole are often directed at the National Energy Program. The press and other media have a tendency to emphasize the negative, and it is easy to make a flamboyant and hyperbolic speech about the negative, but we tend to fail to glean many of the good things about the National Energy Program. At long last emphasis has been placed on one of them, when for too long it has been in the shadows.

One part of the National Energy Program says:

> Canada is well endowed with non-renewable resources that can provide a bridge into a future where Canadians use less energy in their daily lives, and renewable energy plays a much larger role. Renewable energy in the form of hydroelectricity already contributes 24 per cent of Canada's energy. Other renewables contribute a share approximately equal to that of nuclear power . . . The realities of the energy future indicate the wisdom of accelerated efforts to develop new and renewable energy forms, to stand beside hydroelectricity as the basis for a sustained, clean, and economically viable energy structure.
> The National Energy Program envisages a much greater role for renewable energy. The Government of Canada believes that economic realities now favour a range of renewable energy options. The National Energy Program will provide further incentives to the commercial use of these resources, both within the comprehensive off-oil effort already described, and in the form of special new or enriched programs. It will also provide increased funds for research development and demonstration of renewable energy.

I say to the pioneers who were in the field before we heard about shortages and before we heard about increases in oil prices that here again is an indication to them that the government is aware and is prepared to act and make money available.

I understand others wish to follow in this debate. I know my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), has been interested in this subject for a long time. I know he will want to expand on it to some extent. I wanted to put forward more ideas, but I am sure the hon. member can aid and abet my efforts.

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, indeed, I do wish to add to the comments made by my friend, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), with regard to renewable energy. I have been very interested in this matter for a substantial period of time. I was part of the group which had something to do with the beginnings of Canertech, which will be acting as a catalytic agent for renewable energy in the future. Quite frankly, I think it is underfunded, and we should be putting more money into it to develop renewable energy sources in the future because, as the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) indicated, we will not be able to depend on fossil fuels as our only source of energy in the twenty-first century. We will have to develop new forms of energy.

In the broad sense of the word, government—this government and the provincial governments—and, indeed, the private sector have narrowed the focus far too much in relation to renewable energy forms. According to some of the information available to us, I see that we are talking about renewable energy sources such as biomass, solar, wind, hydraulic, geothermal and others. However, one of the things that bothers me greatly is that a task force of this House of Commons worked for nearly a year on the question of alternative energies—not necessarily renewable, perhaps, but alternative energies—which might have great potential as replacements for fossil fuels and the existing fuels we have now including natural gas, petroleum products, hydroelectricity and other forms of energy which we all know so well. Yet when I hear what is coming from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources by way of alternatives, there is never one mention made of the task force report on alternative energy. Quite frankly, I find that unacceptable. I find it to be a slap in the face to Parliament and a slap in the face to the members of that committee. I was not a member of that committee but I know that the members of that committee worked diligently and hard to prepare a report which was, in my view and in the view of a great many others, an outstanding piece of work. However, we hear nothing of it, not a word. I find that totally unacceptable. The chairman of that committee was my good friend, the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre), from across the river. He is one of the national capital region members. My good friend, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain), was an active member. I am not sure who the opposition members were. I think the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) possibly—

Mr. Schellenberger: No.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin) was a member. There were hard working members from the New Democratic Party, and together the members of that task force produced a good piece of work which should be recognized by the officialdom of government—in the generic sense of the word.

Every time I hear about alternative energy and renewable energy sources, there is never a word about the task force report. That has to be corrected because the task force looked far beyond the shortsighted view of some in the energy field and looked to what the future has in store and the need there will be in the future for large sources of energy, not only in Canada but also in the western world, the eastern world and the developing world. Low cost sources of fuel will be needed. The conclusion of the task force was that we should be developing those sources now. We have the skills, the researchers and the ability to be in the forefront of this new technology.

The task force referred to the new hydrogen technology. Ultimately that is the perpetual source of power. Water can be broken down into hydrogen and oxygen. When hydrogen is burned, it recombines with oxygen and forms water. It is a perfect non-polluting cycle. That form of gaseous energy can be used to power cars, to fly planes, to heat homes and to run factories. Hydrogen can be used to break down heavy oils into more usable fuels for transportation. Hydrogen can be used to help convert peat into oil. I never hear about peat as an alternative source of energy, although peat is an alternative source of energy in other parts of the world. Ontario probably has more peat than any other place in the world. My good friend, Ian Connerty in Toronto, has a company which has been put together to explore and mine the peat resources of this province and to convert that peat into oil as an alternative to conventional oil, heavy oil or tar sands oil. We do not hear about that.

I think we have to look at that and at the whole fusion cycle. If we think nuclear fission is the wrong way to generate electricity in the future—and we have to have electricity under current technology to get hydrogen—we should try to work together with other nations to develop the fusion cycle because I understand that is a non-polluting source as well. It would produce cheap electricity which could then be used to convert water into hydrogen and into the gases necessary for portable fuels. It would create the electricity we could use as we use electricity now, and it would create gaseous fuels for portable fuels.

These are the kinds of visionary energy alternatives which must be put before the people of this country. Quite frankly, I do not see them coming from the officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I think it is about time Parliament put before those officials the report of the task force on alternative energy and demanded that we get some answers. Why is it that hydrogen cannot be the base of twenty-first century fuel, and what are we doing to move there?

We have at the University of Toronto one of the outstanding researchers in hydrogen technology, and we should be putting more money into that university and others dealing with hydrogen. There are others. My friend from Niagara Falls tells me that when they went to California to look at alternate energy sources, they saw something called the aluminum air battery. It can be a very effective collecting and storage unit which can provide electricity from lightweight and highly efficient fuel cells. I never hear about that, but it is in the alternative energy report.

Parliament has a role to play in the future of this country, Mr. Speaker, much greater than we have been playing in the past. The task forces set up by this government and, I have to admit, the previous government as well, represent the kind of foresight needed to make Parliament work. But Parliament is not going to work if these task forces, which do an excellent job, are ignored by those outside of this chamber. That cannot be allowed to go on any longer. We have the task forces on regulatory reform, alternative energy and labour markets. Task force report after report has been put out by hardworking members on both sides and they have to be given serious consideration by those who might perhaps not wish to look at what is done by hon. members on both sides of this House. There are alternative energy sources, there are answers to our energy problems, some of which have been put forward by hardworking Members of Parliament. They have to be given careful consideration. When we allocate our energy research funds in the future, they have to be very largely represented in there. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hour provided for the consideration of private member's business has now expired.

It being 4.53 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.53 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSING

CANADA RENTAL SUPPLY PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, actual housing starts in urban areas for the month of May were down by a startling 51 per cent from this time last year. The MURB provisions were responsible last year for over 54,000 apartment starts. Under the Canadian Rental Supply Plan there has not been one single start up until last week. Even if we were to increase the ceiling from $7,500 to $20,000 per unit, they would still be $150 to $200 above the market rate that people pay today. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House directs the Minister of Finance to reinstitute the MURB provision and to designate those funds allocated for the Canada Rental Supply Plan to non-profit and co-operative housing as part of his financial and economic statement to this House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF NEW BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I urge the government to act quickly to stimulate the economy and cushion the adverse effects on the average Canadian. Canadian manufacturing is operating at 60 per cent capacity, unemployment and inflation are spiralling in double digits, the Canadian dollar is at an all-time low of 78.9 cents. No matter what the Minister of Finance says, the confidence in a nation is measured by the value of its dollar. Our dollar is being threatened because of the Keystone Cops economic and energy policies of this administration. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Finance immediately roll back all provisions of his November, 1981, budget and the national energy policy, and table in the House a statement of economic principles which will stimulate the economy, restore investor confidence in Canada and put Canadians back to work. Either do that or resign.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

CALLING OF GENERAL ELECTION URGED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister set out on the road to Versailles with a farewell promise that he would return with solutions to the economic mess created in this country by his government. In the ten days he was out of the country 30,000 Canadians had to renew their mortgages at sky-rocketing interest rates, 978 businesses went broke, and 7,100 Canadians lost their jobs at a time of year when the unemployment level normally drops. In light of the fact that the Prime Minister, who left for Europe empty-minded, returned from his voyage emptyhanded, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister now admit to the House and to the people of Canada that whether he searches in or out of the country he can find no answers to the economic morass his government has created and, with such admission, then take the only honourable avenue open to him and call a general election so Canadians can select a government capable of halting this devastating downward slide and get the country going again.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FUNDING FOR CONSTRUCTION OF CO-OPERATIVE UNITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, since the Co-operative Future Directions Congress which is in progress in Ottawa this week is meeting to develop strategies for co-operative growth in the coming decades, and in view of the need to expand sources of affordable housing and to stabilize the supply of housing for Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Government of Canada immediately double the allocation of co-op housing units available in this fiscal year, and in consultation with the co-operative movement set realistic targets for succeeding years to meet the real and documented need of the co-op housing sector.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POLAND—DEMAND THAT MARTIAL LAW BE LIFTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise seeking the attention of all hon. members on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that it is now six months since martial law was imposed in Poland, and in light of the fact that the president of the Canadian Polish Congress is delivering to Ottawa today a petition signed by over 40,000 Canadians requesting the Polish government to lift martial law, release the internees in Poland, and restore human rights to its citizens, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House demand that the Polish government remove martial law immediately, release the Solidarity members who were interned since the imposition of martial law, and urge the Polish government to resume negotiations with the Church and Solidarity representatives, to solve the economic and political problems plaguing Poland today.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEMAND FOR STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency which will require the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). At a time when the internal pressures on NATO are pressing and difficult, when work on the real problems of the Alliance needs urgent attention, the Prime Minister should not be surprised if Canadians more than raise their eyebrows at his obvious and repeated distortion of the position of the United States on IRN systems and START. Questions of stress within the Alliance on East-West matters, of our own contribution to NATO and, indeed, of our own conventional defence capability, are questions which have generally been avoided by the government in recent years. The urgency and seriousness of these and related matters will require of us similar urgent and serious discussion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the House call on the Prime Minister to make an early statement to this House and cause the subject matter of that statement to be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence with instructions to review and report back to the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HUMAN RIGHTS

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF DEPORTATIONS FROM BALTIC STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, today marks the forty-first anniversary of the deportations of thousands of Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians to Siberia by occupying Soviet forces in 1941. In memory of this day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House reaffirm its dedication to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and expresses its concern over the continuing Soviet aggression in the world today.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

LEBANON—SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, because of the critical situation in Lebanon, particularly in Beirut, and because of the decision announced last week to leave Canadian embassy staff in Beirut, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be called on by this House to make an early statement on motions outlining the steps which have been taken by the government to ensure the safety of Canadians in Lebanon, both those attached to the embassy and those living in a private capacity in Lebanon.

EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT FOR WORLD-WIDE MOVEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, whereas many thousands of Americans and Canadians, through peaceful demonstrations this weekend, joined in the world-wide demand for disarmament, and since a similar demonstration in the U.S.S.R. was prevented by harassment and police actions, including arrests, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House express its support for world-wide disarmament, starting with the super powers, and call upon all nations to allow the people of this planet to demonstrate their belief that potential mass murder is not a deterrent but does represent a threat to all of humanity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

STATEMENT MADE BY PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, "weasel words", cried the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), after the communique was released to the press following the NATO meeting in Bonn last week. What did the communique say? It urged the Kremlin "to join us now in search for constructive relations, arms reductions and world peace"; it pledged "to improve NATO armed forces", and it emphasized its eagerness to negotiate "substantial reductions in arms with the Soviet Union". Why did the Prime Minister not object during the meeting, and what is it that he does not like about the communique? I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House wants to know which side the Prime Minister is on. Canadians want no stock or trade with the communists, and the Prime Minister, when out of Canada, should be telling the world what Canadians think and want. It is certainly not a socialist republic, toward which he is working.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN ECONOMIC POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will know that today the dollar has fallen to another record low. He may well know that, in the time that he has been out of the country, nearly 1,000 Canadian businesses went bankrupt and 12,000 Canadians per day lost their jobs, for a total of 12,000 Canadians put out of work during the Prime Minister's absence from Canada. Will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons, now that he knows some of the disastrous results of his economic policy, whether his government will be announcing a major change in economic policy before this House rises?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —the Leader of the Opposition refers to the fall of the Canadian dollar. I would point out to him, as has been pointed out to him and other members of his party several times over the past week, it is true that the Canadian dollar has fallen against the American dollar, but so has just about every other major currency fallen against the American dollar in that period. If you look at the Canadian dollar relative to those other currencies, you will find that the Canadian dollar has strengthened.

For example, in the past week the Canadian dollar has fallen by 1.4 against the American dollar, the Japanese yen by 2.2, the deutschmark by 1.7, the Swiss franc by 2.0, the French franc by 7.3, the Italian lira by three points, all compared to 1.4 for the Canadian dollar, and so it goes. The only major currency which has not fallen as much as the Canadian currency is the Dutch gilder which fell by 1.3 as opposed to 1.4 for the Canadian dollar. Therefore the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition should keep that in mind when he looks at the performance of the Canadian dollar compared to the American dollar.

Once again, it is true that our dollar has fallen compared to the American dollar, but I repeat, so has every other currency. The conclusion in the mind of the Leader of the Opposition should be that actions taken in Canada alone will not correct economic circumstances in Japan, Germany, Switzerland,

France, Italy, and so on. Therefore I say this in answer to the preamble to the question by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. In answer to his question about a statement, it has been made clear by the Minister of Finance that he would be making a statement to this House on the economy before the House adjourns.

NATURE OF PROPOSED CHANGE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, while 978 Canadian businesses went into bankruptcy and 12,000 Canadians lost their jobs, the Prime Minister was travelling around the world lecturing other people about what they should be doing in their countries. We want to know what the Prime Minister of Canada is going to do about the disastrous economic situation in this country, caused in large measure by his government.

On Friday the Minister of Finance deliberately indicated that he would not describe the changes which he is considering in economic policy as being major. He is considering some tinkering around the edges. My question was very clear. Will there be a major change in economic policy announced by the Government of Canada before the House of Commons rises? Will there be a major economic change?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, once again on the preamble to the question by the Leader of the Opposition who suggests that I was travelling around the world lecturing to other countries, I would point out to him that what was said in response to the situation as it concerns every other country vis-à-vis the United States is not something that was said in a lecture by me. It was said by the six other industrial countries meeting in Versailles, and by the representative of the European Economic Community. If there is any lecturing, it would seem to be in the highly industrialized nations of the world, including Japan, pleading with the United States to get its economic and financial house in order so that these devaluations of all our currencies, including Canada's, will not happen. Therefore the lecture, once again, is not mine, Madam Speaker. I heard the message repeatedly being conveyed by all those other leaders attending the Versailles Summit.

As to the question itself, whether the statement by the Minister of Finance will contain major or minor aspects, Madam Speaker, I think I can say truly from experience that no matter what the Minister of Finance says—

Mr. Nielsen: It is disastrous!

Mr. Trudeau: —the Leader of the Opposition will say, as his House leader says now, it is disastrous. In advance of knowing what the minister will say, the hon. member for Yukon says it will be a disaster; therefore, what is the point in trying to qualify it as major or minor?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ADMIT POLICIES WRONG

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister can play his little games, while thousands of Canadians go out of work and while thousands of Canadians see their businesses fail. Someone across the way shouts, "Be serious." We are being serious here. If the Prime Minister were staying in this country and were listening to the messages of Canadians, instead of trying to deliver messages to other countries elsewhere in the world, he would know that the message from Canadians is that they have had enough of a government in Canada that will not act to solve their problems, and that they have had enough of a government in this country that blames everything on somebody else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: They want action from their government here. The reason I asked the question in the way I did is that we have had too much experience in this Parliament with this government trying to deceive Parliament, and trying to deceive the people, by promising something that is less than what is delivered. I want to know whether the Government of Canada is going to have the courage to come before this House of Commons and admit that many of its policies are wrong and change those policies, before they throw thousands more Canadians out of work, before they drive thousands more Canadians into bankruptcy, before they cause thousands more Canadians to lose their homes because they cannot afford to renew their mortgages at the current rates of interest.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I honestly do not know why the right hon. member is accusing me of playing games in the answers I have given to his questions. I have suggested some of the statistics were perhaps not founded, but as to playing games, Madam Speaker, it would seem to me that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is playing games, when he stands up, shouts questions, and voices his indignation. We are all very disturbed at the economic situation in this country. The meeting in Versailles was convened precisely in order to help the highly industrialized countries of the world to try to seek a collective answer to that. Playing games, to attend such a meeting!

I wonder why the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, when he was prime minister, attended the meeting in Tokyo of the same Summit. Was he playing games? And why did he attend the Commonwealth meeting in Lusaka? Was he playing games? Or was he not, as we were seriously led to believe at the time, attempting to deal with some of the North-South problems, some of the questions which are important to all nations but especially to a nation like Canada which is so highly involved in international trade?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER TAKE ACTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, what is the Prime Minister of Canada going to do in Canada to help Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the finance minister has said he would make an economic statement. I know—because the member for Yukon just shouted it across the way—that it will not be acceptable to the opposition, no matter what it contains. But we are not trying to please the opposition, Madam Speaker, We are trying, in these very difficult economic circumstances, where once again the economies of the world are in difficulty, economies where there are now five million more unemployed today than there were at the Summit meeting in Ottawa a year ago, just amongst the OECD countries—we are trying in Canada to find ways in which Canadians will be able to weather the storm better than other countries. That is the extent to which we will be able to show action in this Parliament, Madam Speaker, not standing up in an histrionic way voicing indignation, not by attacking each other, but by constructively—the provincial and federal governments—trying to find ways in which we can keep the economy on an even keel in spite of the difficulties.

SOCIAL SECURITY

FUNDING FOR SERVICES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

[English]

The Prime Minister will know that bad economic policy creates victims. We have experienced a 2 per cent increase in unemployment in Canada. From that flows the fact that we can expect an 8 per cent increase in suicides, a 10 per cent increase in homicides, an 8 per cent increase in prison admissions, a 7 per cent increase in hospital admissions—

Madam Speaker: Order. Question. No preamble of that nature. That is not a short question.

Mr. Hawkes: Merci, Madame le Président. I would like to ask the Prime Minister specifically if in the so-called economic statement there will be a significant increase in funding to help the victims of bad economic policy. Will there be more money for hospitals and social services?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has been very patient thus far. I suggest he wait until the minister makes his statement, and he will be able to judge its content. I hope he will have a more open mind as to that content than his colleague, the hon. member for Yukon.

CANADIAN MENTAL HEALTH ASSOCIATION MEETING

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have denied in this House that those social consequences flow from unemployment. There is to be a special seminar on June 24 in Toronto, held by the Canadian Mental Health Association, at which preventive strategies to reduce mental health service demands consequent to employment loss in Canada communities will be discussed. Will the Prime Minister make sure that either of those two cabinet ministers—or at least one cabinet minister—attends that conference and learns about the problem before it is too late?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not catch the date of the conference, but I will read the "blues" and find out if it is possible for any member of this party to attend that conference.

JOB CREATION POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It was the Prime Minister at Versailles who said that current economic policies of the government were creating unacceptable levels of unemployment. Meanwhile in the House during the past week it was the Minister of Finance who was saying, in complete contradiction, that no basic change in policy could be expected and that the most Canadians could expect would be marginal changes. Surely if we are going to deal with the unacceptable level of unemployment, a major shift in policy is required, including the scrapping of the old budget.

Will the Prime Minister at least assure the House that the government will bring in a major shift in policy which will see as its principal objective the creation of more jobs for the millions of Canadians who need them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must take exception to the way the question was phrased. If the hon. member was purporting to quote me when he said I had said that the Canadian government's policy was causing major unemployment or unreasonable unemployment, I assure him that is not the message I was trying to convey. I will have occasion, perhaps at another time, to explain what I was saying. I was saying, on the contrary, that I hope that industrialized democracies would find other ways of solving the problem of inflation than by causing high unemployment. I was saying exactly the contrary to what the hon. member was implying I was saying.

As to what the statement of the minister will contain, I have to give the hon. member the same answer I gave to members of the official opposition: it will be up to the New Democratic Party to make up its mind as to what qualities it will attribute or not attribute to the statement made by the minister. I think the minister is correct when he says that, by and large, our macro-economic policy is one we do not intend to change. That has been the position taken by all the nations at Versailles, and I point out to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that France, which tried for a while—perhaps because of its socialist government—to cure unemployment by stimulation, has now reversed its course and is bringing down policies which are much more in line with those the Canadian government has been following.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT CUT INCOME TAX

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, to deal with the policy options or alternatives in the way the Prime Minister has posed the issue in his reply, I should like to ask him, considering that on the weekend we learned that the Canadian economy is operating at only 69 per cent capacity, which is the lowest since records were kept, thus providing lots of room for stimulation without causing inflation, is the government contemplating a tax cut for low and middle-income Canadians? These people would spend the money to create jobs, and this would be a key means of creating more employment without adding inflation to the economy.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, once again, on the premise of the question, I would point out to the hon. member that it is because the Canadian economy is underemployed that I voiced the concern that I did at Versailles. I expressed the hope that we would find other ways of curing inflation than by pursuing this route of underemployment of the economic factors of the nation.

As to the suggestions of the hon. member about stimulation, let me point out to him once again that he should look at the experience of the French government. The news may be too recent for the hon. member to have seen it, but yesterday the French government, which had been following expansionary policies which, as the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party will recall, he enjoined us to copy and follow, discovered they led to such sad results that now France has had to devalue the franc voluntarily and adopt austerity measures, not the stimulative or expansionary measures that the hon. member is recommending, but austerity measures.

Whether the Minister of Finance in the government of Liberal Party of Canada will be as austere as President Mitterrand's government I cannot say, but the hon. member will judge.

REQUEST FOR STIMULATIVE MEASURES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, instead of the Prime Minster carefully reading his briefing notes, maybe he would listen to the question. I will repeat it. It concerns what is happening in the Canadian economy, not the French economy.

On the weekend we learned, to put it differently, that 30 per cent of our factories and offices are underutilized. This means that we can take stimulation in the economy without adding to the inflation. Given this situation in the Canadian economy, will the government actively and seriously consider providing stimulation by means of a tax cut or other means that would produce jobs without adding to the inflationary pressure?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is advocating an expansionary course. I am telling him that expansionary courses have been tried in other countries at this time—a time of stagflation—and they have not worked. He will be able to judge and look at the statement made by the minister and will then see whether it is expansionary or not. I am telling him that the course we are following is to hope we will be able to create jobs and reduce inflation without causing more unemployment to start with. That is the dilemma with which the western industrialized nations are faced. Even though they have excess capacity, as the hon. member says, we still have very high inflation.

The question I was asking at Versailles is whether the only way to bring down inflation is to create more excess capacity, and the answer I gave was that I hoped not. I have not heard from the hon. member or his party about any way that this could be done. He has not suggested any way in which Canadians could somehow bring inflation under control without causing higher unemployment. If he has an answer I should like to hear it.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN MANDATORY SUPERVISION PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Since convicted sexual offender Paul Kocurek was free on mandatory supervision at the time he sexually attacked and killed fifteen year old Lise Clausen in Duncan, British Columbia, last August, and since the parole board had repeatedly denied him temporary absence and full parole because of psychiatric reports which indicated he liked to choke females during sex acts, will the Solicitor General admit that the eleven year experiment with mandatory supervision has failed? Also, will he introduce legislation that will return the decision for the release of dangerous criminals to the parole board?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am certainly prepared to admit, as I have indicated before, that serious problems have been demonstrated with the mandatory supervision provisions enacted by this Parliament, in the last 12 years, and that I am dissatisfied with them. I have taken proposals to cabinet to change them, and I hope shortly to be able to do as the hon. member has requested and bring forward some changes that will toughen up the mandatory supervision rules and give more authority to the parole board.

TREATMENT OF RELEASED VANCOUVER INMATE

Hon. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, until the rule change comes about, could the minister explain in this particular case the difference between parole and mandatory supervision? Why was Kocurek allowed to be lawfully at large, carrying a pistol and handcuffs, after failing to show up for his first scheduled visit to the mental health unit?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, mandatory supervision operates under a formula provided in the statutes. Whether or not the parole board considers inmates a threat, they are entitled to be on the street for the last one-third of their sentence, provided only that they have behaved during the time they have been incarcerated. I recognize, and I have indicated, that there are shortcomings with that system. Mandatory supervision has certain advantages. It provides an incentive to inmates to behave well while in prison, but the price for that advantage has been high. I very much favour changing it.

ROLE OF PAROLE BOARD OFFICER

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. According to press reports it is quite clear that federal officials warned that Kocurek was dangerous. Was there in fact a parole board officer to whom Kocurek was supposed to report? If there was, why was that parole board officer not keeping track of what Kocurek was supposed to be doing? I refer especially to his refusal to turn up at the mental health clinic? Why did no one know about this?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I would like to have the opportunity to look into that further before answering the question. Basically mandatory supervision is a right that an inmate earns by good behaviour and not a right that officials can take away from him without a proper hearing.

NATURE OF SUPERVISION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, the Solicitor General seems to be indicating that, once someone is out on mandatory supervision, it does not matter what he does with respect to the federal authority to bring that person back into custody or check on him. Is that what the Solicitor General is telling the Canadian people? In this case it seems to me that if Kocurek was supposed to be reporting to somebody in the parole board, that parole board officer had an obligation to find out what he was doing and whether he was reporting to places like the mental health clinic. Is the Solicitor General telling me that absolutely nothing can be done, that there is no supervision at all when someone is out on mandatory supervision?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): No, Madam Speaker. In fact over half the cases of mandatory supervision are unsatisfactory and are revoked or circumscribed in some way. These are the statistics that concerned me so much when I began my job that I asked for an investigation into mandatory supervision and discovered all the shortcomings of it. Indeed, mandatory supervision can be terminated. I have indicated that I favour changes to make mandatory supervision even tighter than it is.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LOSS OF EMPLOYMENT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Currently there are 11,000 workers drawing unemployment insurance benefits in my riding of Nanaimo-Alberni. In Port Alberni alone there are 1,200 workers facing the prospect of going on welfare by the end of August, to join 1,300 families already in that unenviable position.

Will the Prime Minister explain to the people of Nanaimo-Alberni, and those in the rest of Canada who are unemployed, how their belt tightening has helped improve the Canadian economy and what the government proposes to do to help those workers who have sacrificed so much already?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had notice of the question so I am not sure if I can identify the kind of jobs that have been lost in that area. I imagine that they would be in the forest industries, and that the hon. member would know that our main clients for the products of those industries are in other countries. For instance, when the United States economy is undergoing negative growth—in other words when it is in a recession—the markets for the products of the workers in the hon. member's riding are shrinking.

The answer which I could give his workers would not be satisfying, unless I could guarantee to them that there would be an upsurge in demand in the United States. Of course this is something for which we are hoping, particularly in Canada, because such a large part of our trade is with the United States. But it is certain that the question asked by the hon. member illustrates well that nothing which this government could do, no matter how perfect it would be—and God knows it is not perfect; not all that perfect, anyhow—could guarantee that these workers would suddenly find a surge in the markets of the countries which buy products from Canada.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT STIMULATE ECONOMY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister as well. The public mood in Port Alberni—and I imagine in other communities across Canada—has been one initially of attempting to do something within their own economic community to stimulate jobs. That has failed, and now we are in a situation where the public in these cities are contemplating soup kitchens and welfare benefits of some sort. Is the Prime Minister aware of the kind of despair which is prevalent in Canada and, if so, will he not consider the desperation which the people of Canada are feeling, and encourage in the planned economic statement, some stimulation to the Canadian economy so that our communities and our workers can get back to work?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I fear that the hon. member was preparing his supplementary question rather than listening to my answer. He may not agree with my answer, but I think I made it quite clear to him that the particular workers about whom he is talking depend upon stronger markets in other countries, not in Canada. They depend particularly upon the hopes and maybe expectations that the recession in the United States will be turned around and that we will see growth in the next two quarters. The hon. member asks the same question again—what do we intend to do in Canada about it? I can tell him that there is very little we can do to force the United States into policies which would create growth.

PIPELINES

DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It concerns the extension of the natural gas pipeline to the Maritimes. The prime Minister will recall that in 1980 he promised a gas pipeline extension so that natural gas would be available in the maritimes by 1983 and that promise was repeated in the National Energy Program. Now we see delays in the construction of the natural gas pipeline so that natural gas will not be available until 1987 or later. How will the Prime Minister compensate the people in the maritimes, who will now be forced to pay much higher prices for fuel oil and energy until natural gas is available in Nova Scotia? How will he fulfil the promise which he made to the people of the maritimes in 1980?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is attending an international conference on gas exploration, has answered this question before. He has explained the reasons for the delay, and the circumstances under which the delay took place. He has expressed the view that the situation is now somewhat changed, that it is possible that gas will be found in commercial quantities off Sable Island, that the type of pipeline which we had contemplated before the delays were imposed upon us may have to be changed, and that gas may flow in the other direction. The hon. member has heard the answers, and I am satisfied that he knows them.

Mr. Crosby: Perhaps I did not make my point sufficiently clear to the Prime Minister. Part of the promise of natural gas supplies in the maritimes was that that natural gas would be available at the Toronto city gate price, which is approximately 65 per cent of the price of fuel oils and other energy sources. The fact of the matter is that the people in the maritime provinces will have to pay much more for energy supplies in this three or four-year period until natural gas is available; they will be spending more money. The Prime Minister and the government have taken responsibility for delivering energy at cheaper costs than will be experienced over this period.

FULFILLMENT OF ELECTION PROMISE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, does the Prime Minister not feel some obligation to the individuals in the maritime provinces who now pay the highest energy costs in Canada to help them with this problem? Will he have them carry on over this three or four-year period and continue to pay the highest energy costs until he fulfils the promise which he made in the election campaign of 1980 and gained the support of a great many people in the maritimes by virtue of that promise?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked if the government feels any obligation. The answer is that in a general sense of course it does, and that is why the government has adopted various measures, apart from the pipeline about which the hon. member is talking. It has adopted various forms of subsidies through the medium of prices, through the establishment of Candu reactors to produce electricity from atomic energy sources, or through the establishment of communications between the various maritime provinces. The government has felt such obligations to help the high cost area of the maritimes, including special subsidies for those who want to go off oil and on to other forms of energy such as wood.

Mr. Crosby: Another broken promise.

Mr. Trudeau: This is the reason the population of the maritimes supported our party. They saw that in fact in the past and in the future we are helping them with their energy costs.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ANNOUNCE RE-EVALUATION OF GLOBAL QUOTA

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Three months ago, the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada asked for a review of the global quota with respect to leather footwear. The minister was expected to reply, and he knows perfectly well, Madam Speaker, that every day since then, the industry has been losing jobs. Considering the fact that tomorrow, hundreds of workers employed in this Canadian industry will march on the Hill to demand a definitive reply from the minister, could the minister today, as a matter of respect towards this industry, inform us whether tomorrow he will be able to give a definitive reply to this major industrial sector?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, my colleagues and I have the greatest respect for this industry and its workers, but a few days ago, my colleague, the Minister of State for International Trade already told the House that the government will not give a reply until the information on which our policy was based has been revised, so not before the end of June or perhaps the beginning of July. Therefore, there will be no policy announcement either today or tomorrow, and in any case not before the last week of June.

INQUIRY CONCERNING RECOMMENDATIONS MINISTER WILL MAKE TO CABINET

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I think the ministers know perfectly well that the recommendations made by the Association are supported not only by members on this side of the House but also by members on the government side. The Right Hon. Prime Minister has just mentioned additional efforts to create new jobs. Does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce realize how urgent it is to save existing jobs first, and how can we trust a government that is letting a major industrial sector—and there are others—deteriorate, and talks about creating new jobs but is doing nothing to save jobs that still exist at the present time? Could the minister inform the House what kind of recommendations he made or is about to make to cabinet, in view of the needs of this industry, which can no longer afford prolonged delay?

[English]

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as we have stated several times in the House, we are very conscious of the jobs in the shoe industry. Many colleagues on both sides of the House have brought this matter to our attention. We are having a federal-provincial trade ministers' meeting on June 21. The hon. member is hopefully very conscious of the fact that, when we invoke global quotas, there is a possibility that we could be asked to compensate in some other sectors under GATT. We want to have this discussion with our provincial counterparts on June 21. As previously stated, we will be making an announcement in the last week of June or first week of July.

AIRPORTS

MINISTER'S DECISION ON FUTURE OF MIRABEL

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Last week, the minister said that he had made a decision with respect to Mirabel. Would the minister please elaborate on this decision?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I myself have made a decision. However, I am going to submit my views to my cabinet colleagues, since it is up to the entire cabinet to decide in such matters.

[English]

ALTERNATIVES FACING MINISTER

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, was the minister reported correctly that the decision narrowed down to two alternatives—either to maintain the status quo, or to transfer all Dorval flights to Mirabel except for flights within Québec and flights to Toronto, which, in the minister's own words, means that you would more or less "dig a hole at Mirabel."? Is the minister's decision and his recommendation to cabinet one of those two alternatives? If that is the case, with no in-betweens, which he has also said in his statement, and admitting full well that the economy is difficult to keep under control, can the minister explain why, if that is the nature of his decision after all this time, he is even thinking of making that recommendation for any shift which recalls all the economic problems that hon. members have brought to his attention?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is normal to look at all the options when you make a decision. This is the normal decision-making practice.

I am reported to have said that there were only two possibilities. One was the status quo, and one was option six in the first report, with which my hon. friend is familiar. That latter option is to transfer all except short-haul routes around Dorval. The reason for that is simply that the in-betweens present technical difficulties. There are six or seven or eight of them. For example, all charters in Mirabel, and anything within three hours, and beyond three hours. All these variations and in-betweens have been studied. All of them present technical difficulties which are too great to consider. With respect to the three-hour option, for example, all routes less than three hours long would remain at Dorval and all routes longer than three hours would go to Mirabel. It would be difficult to present a carrier from establishing a stop from Dorval while travelling whatever distance he would be going. We have looked at all these in-between possibilities and have found them wanting.

DISARMAMENT

STATEMENT MADE BY PRIME MINISTER

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since both the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have come out, not once but several times, against a nuclear freeze—mutual and verifiable—was the Prime Minister speaking only for himself as a private citizen when he advocated this most important step last week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I was stating a policy which I believe to be that of the Government of Canada. I am not clear as to where my policy differed in any way from that expressed by any of my ministers.

Miss Jewett: The Prime Minister has not then read the speeches of his colleagues. They have both been opposed to a nuclear freeze.

QUERY RESPECTING DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY PROGRAM

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, may I ask my supplementary of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to see whether he is in line with the Prime Minister's thinking. If it is the government's policy to oppose further development of nuclear weapons, I would ask him why officials from the Defence Industry Productivity Program were meeting in Ottawa late last week with officials from Boeing? Why were officials from a program in his department, the Defence Industry Productivity Program, meeting with officials from the Boeing Winnipeg branch late last week to discuss federal assistance to Boeing on a potential contract for the creation of components of the MX missile? Why is the government furthering the production of new nuclear weapons like the MX missile?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member, but it is apparent from her question that she must have misinterpreted my position and therefore, if she will allow me, I will supplement my former answer before she asks her supplementary question.

I may be disappointing the hon. member, but I did not advocate a freeze in the sense which I believe it is understood by the hon. member. I did advocate the policy of suffocation, which is a freeze, but that policy was always advocated in a bilateral context so that both sides should be proceeding along those lines. I would point out to the hon. member that that policy was, unfortunately, not accepted by either side. That is why this government is now on the two-track policy which we reaffirmed in NATO just a few days ago.

FINANCE

POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows that the Minister of Finance has brought down two budgets during his tenure. The first one literally drove billions of dollars out of the country by the establishment of the National Energy Program, and the second one was the worst anti-investment budget in this country's history.

In light of the crisis of confidence, not only in the policy of the minister but in the minister himself, and in light of his dismal track record, does the Prime Minister still have confidence in the economic ability of the Minister of Finance to bring down an economic statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not believe that that question is any more in order than if I were to ask the hon. member if he had confidence in his leader. In this case I can give the hon. member a clear assurance that I do have confidence in the economic abilities of the Minister of Finance.

Miss MacDonald: You are the only one.

Mr. Speyer: The Prime Minister may have that confidence but no other Canadian has it.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. There are 250 small businesses going broke every day. More than 1,000 Canadians each day are going out of work as a direct result of the economic policies of this government. Will the minister give us an assurance, without stating exactly what the policy is, that something will be done for the small business community when he brings down his economic statement later this month?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I find the comments of the hon. member really quite unjustified and almost nonsensical when he attributes the current economic situation in Canada to—

Miss MacDonald: To you.

Mr. Clark: To the Government of Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: —to the policies of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Clark: It is all the fault of Zaire.

Mr. MacEachen: That is just an over simplistic approach that has been perpetuated by his leader and other members of the opposition. Until they get that out of their heads they will not be able to make any contribution to the resolution of our difficulties.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN APPLICATION TO LIVESTOCK AUCTIONS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact that on June 3, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and I tabled a petition in the House which contained more than 1,000 names asking for a delay in the use of metric in the specific instance as it would apply to auction markets, since livestock sellers believe that there is a uniqueness between fixed price buying and the very rapid and instantaneous judgments of auction-buying, does the minister believe that there is a unique difference between buying over the counter when you have time to make judgments, and the rapid auction-buying?

Mr. Korchinski: Think fast, Eugene.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I was not aware that the hon. member had anything to do with submitting such a petition. All I know is that 87 per cent of agriculture is completed as far as going metric is concerned. The other 13 per cent should be finished by the end of 1982 and early 1983. I do know that we have met with the people representing the red meat industry, both the Canada Pork Council and the Canada Meat Packers Council, and discussed this very issue. I did not find that much objection to it. We met with the people running the auction marts earlier in the year and did not find that much objection to it, either, when it was clearly explained to them.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER CONSIDER UNIQUENESS OF LIVESTOCK AUCTIONS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Quite naturally, the minister would not find any unique difference when he asked the packing plants, which are part of the red meat industry, whether or not they could convert to metric, because it is very simple there. However, when making an instantaneous judgment, a cautious buyer using metric at an auction who bids one cent a pound less could cost a large rancher up to $6,000 worth of loss in his annual sales. I would like to ask the minister again whether he would consider the information.

Would the minister take a look at the uniqueness, as it affects the large sales of all stock from auction markets, and make representations to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to protect that industry until the judgment of the nomenclature, or the use of the new auction langage, is instantaneous with the judgment of value which is necessary in auctioning live cattle?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, there is no doubt about what the hon. member says, that buying or selling cattle at an auction mart does take people of certain expertise who understand the total cattle marketing system. These people do have to make quick decisions; there is no doubt about that. I will consider what the hon. member is talking about but, as I have said, we met with the people who were running the markets earlier this year—

An hon. Member: Not the farmers.

Mr. Whelan: —and, as I say, I did not find great resentment over it, but I will look at it again.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to a matter which I raised in the House on June 2 last, concerning which I only today received further information. It relates to political interference in the hiring of—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member was rising on a question of privilege concerning the deliberations on this day. If the question of privilege concerns prior matters, he will have to send me a notice with a brief statement about the subject of his question of privilege. I am afraid that I cannot hear him today because his question did not arise out of the deliberations of today.

PETITIONS

MR. MILLER—STUDENTS' PETITION FOR PEACE

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, the students of Qualicum Beach Middle School wish the House to be aware of their concern and the concerns of their fellow students in School District No. 69 in the Nanaimo-Alberni constituency.

It is my pleasure and duty to present the 1,577 names of students in grades 2 to 12 contained in a "Students Petition for Peace". The petition calls upon this House and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to end the worldwide build-up of nuclear and chemical weapons and to have the billions of dollars currently spent on war spent on life, not death, on earth.

I pray this House will respond to their worry and the trust they have in their country.

5. How many of the booklets will be allocated to (a) federal cabinet ministers (b) Members of Parliament (c) Fitness Canada (d) other governments (e) public groups (f) private organizations?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Secretary of State and the Department of Supply and Services as follows:

1. (a) 72,500; (b)(i) 78.6 cents per unit; (ii) $56,984; (c) Fitness and Amateur Sport Canada.

2. (a)(i) Condor Litho & Carton Inc., 500 Upton St., LaSalle, Que., (ii) Cap Advertising Ltd, 126 York St., Ottawa, Ont., (iii) SC-Sound Communications, Div. of Medifacts Ltd., 471 Richmond Road, Ottawa, Ont.

(b)(i) $26,622; (ii) $5,000; (iii) $25,362; (iv) Packaging was undertaken by the printing firm above, and costs were included in the printing contract. Distribution was undertaken internally by Fitness and Amateur Sport Canada.

3. No royalties were paid.

4. Supply and Services departmental contracting procedures were followed for the award of all contracts. They submitted the following information on these contracts.

Service	No. of Firms invited to bid from dept'l source list	No. of Firms who bid	Successful Bidder	Remarks
(a) Printing & Packaging	6	2	Condor Litho & Carton Inc.	Lowest Bidder
(b) Graphic Art Work	5	4	Cap Advertising Ltd	Lowest Bidder
(c) Audio Recording	5	1	SC-Sound Communications, Div. of Medifacts Ltd	Only Bidder
(d) See reply 4 (a).

5. The "Take a Break/Pause Action" is a fitness informational item available to the general public upon request at no charge. No specific initial distribution was undertaken, but the availability of the item was promoted and it is made available in reasonable quantities to groups, institutions, fitness instructors and individuals on request.

MR. F. L. C. REED

Question No. 4,278—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Was F. L. C. Reed appointed assistant deputy minister of Forestry Services and, if so (a) on what date (b) is F. L. C. Reed the same person whose name is used in a company called Woodbridge Reed and Associates?

2. Did the government award a research contract for $233,000 to the company?

3. Was the contract for research tendered to other companies in the field so that they could make proposals concerning the research and, if not, for what reason?

4. What is the value of the research, if any, to the government?

5. Was the Forestry Services involved in suggesting the need for the research and did F. L. C. Reed have anything to do with making recommendations concerning the research project?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. F. L. C. Reed was appointed assistant deputy minister of the Canadian Forestry Service, Environment Canada under the Executive Interchange Program; (a) on August 15, 1980, (b) Mr. Reed was formerly a partner in the company now called Woodbridge, Reed and Associates.

2. Yes.

3. This contract was awarded as a result of the company submitting an unsolicited proposal to Supply and Services Canada. The research was therefore not tendered.

4. The value of the research will be reflected in the impact which the findings have on (a) the management of vast areas of hardwood forests, (b) the utilization of a resource, (c) the transfer of pulp and paper making technology to Canadian enterprises, and (d) the generation of employment, economic growth opportunities and foreign exchange earnings.

5. A submission was made to the Supply and Services Unsolicited Proposal Program. The submission was circulated for evaluation to an interdepartmental committee composed of members from Environment Canada, Supply and Services Canada, Industry, Trade and Commerce, National Research Council and Ministry of State for Science and Technology and was supported by Environment Canada through the assistant deputy minister of the Canadian Forestry Service, F. L. C. Reed.

NATIONAL FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL

Question No. 4,322—Mr. Howie:

How many persons are employed on the National Farm Products Marketing Council and what is the salary range allocated to each position?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Nine.

	Salary Range
Chair	$54,900—$64,600
Three members	47,500— 55,900

Five members paid at a rate of $200 per diem for each day they are on council business.

GOLD RESERVES

Question No. 4,338—Mr. Siddon:

1. How many ounces of gold were held in reserve by the government at the end of (a) each quarter for (i) 1980 (ii) 1981 (b) the first quarter of 1982?

2. What was the total value of the government's gold reserves at the end of (a) each quarter for (i) 1980 (ii) 1981 (b) the first quarter of 1982?

National Training Act

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The table below contains the requested figures on Canada's gold reserves, both book and market value figures are reported.

For accounting purposes the valuation of Canada's gold reserves; which are held in the exchange fund account, is based on the former official price of 35 SDRs (special drawing rights) per ounce. On March 31, 1982, one SDR was equivalent to U.S. $1.11309. The International Monetary Fund, and Canada's two main trading partners, the United States and Japan follow the same practice as Canada in valuing gold in reporting official holdings. The market value of our gold reserves is, of course, much higher than the book value.

NATIONAL TRAINING ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed, from June 4, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, Bill C-115, an act to establish a national program for occupational training, is a very critical piece of legislation, as I am sure the minister is aware. I think every hon. member in the House of Commons will regard it as a critical piece of legislation. I use the word "critical" advisedly, because this bill is being introduced at a time when our country faces the worst crisis in unemployment since the days of the deep depression of the 1930s.

We all know the extent of the economic malaise which affects the country today. We know that hundreds of thousands of people are out of work. That is why it is critical at this point in time that this piece of legislation be introduced. The bill is critical in the short term in that it may—and I use the word "may"—provide the means whereby some of those presently unemployed will perhaps be given adequate training so that in the future they can find new employment, so that they can come back to the work force. This piece of legislation is also critical in the long term in that it has the potential either to provide a positive input to the economy by responding to the ongoing needs of the country, or a very negative input in that it could be the tool by which the government seeks it usurp certain legislative measures which are presently controlled, or should be controlled, by the provincial governments.

With regard to that aspect, I would say to the minister that the method of implementation of the measures contained in this bill is indeed critical, because if it is carried out with the co-operation of the provincial governments, then the national training program envisaged in the bill may well achieve the high level of success of earlier federal initiatives in the technical and vocational training and assistance programs. We may well see that duplicated. However, if the measures in the bill are implemented unilaterally, without proper consultation and agreement with the provinces, then it could well prove detrimental to our educational and training system and, indeed, to the employment opportunities for those in the 1980s.

Federal-provincial co-operation in implementing the measures of this bill is indeed vital. The minister has already been cautioned in that respect, and I do hope he is listening. The challenges have drastically altered work patterns and new technologies which will confront us in the 1980s will be difficult enough to cope with, without the additional aggravation of unnecessary federal-provincial conflict. That must be avoided at all costs. I am sure the minister has paid attention to the comments that were provided earlier in this debate by my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), and I hope that he will take every opportunity to ensure that this program is carried out with the fullest co-operation from those members of provincial governments right across the country who will have to respond to the bill in some fashion.

I have mentioned the challenges which face us in the 1980s when it comes to the question of changes in work patterns, changes in unemployment programs and changes in the style which will determine the 1980s, but often when I listen to the minister's responses to questions in the House I get the strong impression that the federal government really has not been seized of the magnitude of the problems confronting us in the 1980s. We are now into the world of chip technology and this means major shifts in the work force. Chip technology, it has been said, could result in a social revolution in our country, and indeed in the world, of the same magnitude as the industrial revolution. However, it will probably be condensed into a much shorter time-frame. That time-frame will certainly encompass the decade of the eighties. We are already two years into that decade without the proper training programs having been put in place.

Even now we see that the gap between skilled workers and the demand for certain skills and unemployment is widening, not contracting. The gap between the jobs that are available and unemployment is becoming greater. The immediate problem facing Canada is to match the skills of Canadians with available jobs.

I am sure the minister knows that thousands of jobs are vacant, because we do not have adequately skilled workers to fill them. Even though there are skilled jobs going for the asking, there are still one and a quarter million Canadians unemployed. When we take into consideration the hidden unemployed, there are probably closer to two million people.

There are still job openings not being filled because of this mismatch of supply and demand. The difference between supply and demand in the labour force has to be addressed and eliminated. The highly skilled blue collar worker is in demand. At the same time, the clerks, labourers and assembly line workers are finding that their jobs are becoming redundant. These people are joining the unemployment rolls.

The problem that faces us is here and now. The need to address it is immediate. I look at the province of Ontario as an example. The Ontario manpower commission reported that 108,000 new highly skilled positions will be created by 1986. That is the estimate of the number of new jobs to be created in the province of Ontario within the next four years. However, if current trends continue through our training programs and educational systems, the system in Ontario will produce only 62,000 skilled workers to meet that demand of 108,000 vacancies which will occur. Obviously the present system is not working. The assessment system of our needs and the training programs to meet those needs are not working at the present time.

In my comments today I want to bring to the minister's attention one concern in particular that I have. That is the impact that this chip revolution, this move into the new computer technology, is going to have on women, both those in the work force and those planning to enter the work force in the eighties.

High technology has the potential to create a very severe set of structural unemployment problems for women. Various studies I have looked at show that perhaps up to one million women who are presently working may find that their jobs will become redundant. At present, there are four million women in the work force employed in the sales, service and clerical sectors. These are the very sectors where the numbers of jobs will be reduced in the next ten years because of moving into microchip technology. These are the areas which will be most affected. Of course, those are the areas where women are primarily employed at the present time.

Indeed, if we look at areas such as clerical and service occupations, we find that the number of job openings is levelling off today and has been doing so for the past number of months. That levelling off will increase. There will be a decrease in opportunities in these sectors in the years immediately ahead. There are not the same number of new jobs being created for sales clerks, office clerks, bank clerks or telephone operators as there were five years ago. Those are the jobs which are predominantly held by women.

Computers displace clerical jobs. Clerical jobs is certainly one area. However, computers are also moving into other areas. They are bringing about significant employment changes in work places such as libraries, hospitals, retail outlets and factories. It is estimated, for example, that 30 per cent of present bank positions, that is tellers and clerks, those jobs primarily held by women, will disappear with the full advent of micro processing and electronic funds transfers.

Heather Menzies in her book "Women and the Chip" estimates that by 1990 one million women could find themselves without work unless they become computerized. Can we reasonably expect those one million women to revert to their traditional role and stay at home? Of course not. They will not do so intellectually and they cannot do so economically. If working wives were not in the labour force today, the number of Canadian families living below the poverty line would increase by something like 50 per cent.

We cannot afford the price tag either in welfare or unemployment, and the lost consumer market than women constitute. We cannot afford it in the human potential that they represent. We cannot afford a ghetto philosophy toward women in our society. They must have the opportunity to enter new jobs and professions on an equal footing with their male counterparts.

I ask myself whether this is going to happen. By itself, it is unlikely. I again refer to the work done by Heather Menzies in her studies in this field. She followed the process of automation through one Canadian corporation that was operating in the transportation and communications field. She found that expansion occurred in the professional and managerial levels of that firm, but there was a reduction in the clerical as automation took place. The number of clerical jobs phased out amounted to some 130 placements, all held by women. The only persons to move into the managerial ranks from that group of 130 women were two who were able to be trained and carry out the up mobility that brought them new positions. The other 128 were literally dropped from the work force.

I do not think it will automatically happen throughout our work force that women will be moved into the higher jobs. Opportunities have to be provided for them. Indeed, it is critical that these women who are going to be displaced have the opportunities to train for the new jobs which the new technologies will create.

Certain skills will be required more than others, skills such as engineering, technical work and computer program analysis. These are the areas where there will be new openings. Job opportunities in the eighties will be in these sectors. I am sure the minister is aware of the statistics which show an insignificant movement of women into these areas. Current training programs still concentrate on channelling women in the very fields where the jobs ar now being phased out. Indeed, 75 per cent of women in Canada manpower retraining programs today are still being trained as stenographers, bank tellers, typists and clerks, that kind of traditional female ghetto. Only 12 per cent of the women presently in Canada manpower industrial training programs are registered in non-traditional job training.

I asked the minister earlier for these figures. The latest reports I had from his department were that 2,000 women in all of Canada were now in retraining programs in non-traditional roles. When we consider that one million women are in jeopardy of losing their jobs, that 2,000 who are being retrained is a pitifully small number. The most recent statistics I have from Canada Employment and Immigration for apprenticeship programs, another area where we have to expand, show that 3 per cent of the total enrolment of Canadians in the apprenticeship program are women—3 per cent only. In Ontario, the statistics I have show that only four out of a total of 1,500 people enrolled in apprenticeship programs were women.

I notice that the number of young women who are enrolled in Ottawa technical high schools number only 40 out of 850 pupils. So even at the educational level we can see that there is not a very bright future for women if these present trends continue. In other words, our educational system, our training and retraining programs are not at present geared to relocate women in the work force, to adapt them to the new technology to provide them with opportunities which they are going to have to have as we move further into the decade of the 1980s. Yet as we consider that decade of the 1980s, two-thirds of all the new entrants coming into the work force will be women. It is not just those who are presently in the work force that we have to be concerned about, the one million women who might be displaced or could be displaced; it is the additional one million women who will be coming into the work force in the 1980s and who will certainly make up the highest number of entrants to the work force.

Obviously, therefore, the needs of women in employment, placement, and in training programs, must be given the highest priority, the highest consideration, in the government's training program. Yet the present programs are really of little benefit to women. That is a major concern and it is one that has to be addressed.

There is another concern that I have, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to point out to the minister. Women must be prepared to make the changes that will take them into the new technology and into the non-traditional roles. A great many Canadian women are not yet prepared to do so. That is a concern that I have had, in talking to many women across the country. It is the fear that they have about making a move from the positions they now hold, from the roles that they now know, from the areas where they feel secure, into a field of new technology for which they do not feel adequately equipped. I had an opportunity to look at data from a recent national survey. It shows a high degree of hostility among certain groups of women, women who are at the lower end of the salary scale, women who have a lesser amount of education. They have a great degree of hostility towards the new technology. Unfortunately, this hostility finds its concentration among the very people whose jobs are the most vulnerable. It is among the sales clerks, the bank tellers, the telephone operators and the typists that there is a great degree of reluctance to come to grips with this new technology.

There is no doubt that the greatest challenge facing women in the 1980s is the challenge of the chip. Not only will training and retraining programs have to be directed towards opening up new opportunities for women, but there must as well be public educational and information programs which show in a positive way the advantages that this new technology will have for women and thus encourage them to enter into the training programs that will be made available to them, I would trust, as we approach this new technology.

I would point out to the minister that such public information programs particularly geared towards women in the work force are already being carried out in France and Japan and have had a very significant impact on the attitudes of women towards these programs. Women in particular must accept the inevitability of the microchip revolution. They must see it as an opportunity to improve their economic position in the work force.

Last week a Statistics Canada report revealed that on average women earn about half the income that men earn. On average women earn about $8,200 a year, while men on average earn about $16,700 a year. That is the difference at the present time. Every piece of legislation that we deal with in the economic sense must be geared to overcoming that difference, to redressing that inequity. If this situation is to change, and change it must, then the bill we have before us must address itself particularly to the needs of women. It must address the problems that women face today in the labour force. It must also address the potential contribution that women can make to the economic development of Canada.

I would urge the minister to use this piece of legislation to take into consideration the very problems that are now confronting women as we go further into the decade of the 1980s, with the microchip revolution upon us. I would urge him also to make sure that the potential of women in the work place is realized by putting into place with his provincial counterparts public information programs which will encourage women to overcome the reluctance that they now evidence towards some of the changes that are taking place as a result of the new technology.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate on this legislation concerning job training. I recognize this issue to be of national importance as well as of local concern to residents in my constituency of Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington.

When I read this Bill, C-115, I read it with the same degree of skepticism as Canadians view the actions of this government. We have the appointment of Jack Horner as chairman of the CNR and Arthur Erickson as the architect for the New Canadian embassy in Washington. As we all know, the list is continuous. That is why, when I examine Bill C-115, I pose the same question that many Canadians are asking about government: Just what is the intention of this bill?

I would like to suggest that it is fairly ludicrous to establish a national training program for jobs that do not exist. The minister has stated that "major shortages averaging 9,000 skilled workers each year are predicted over the next five years unless the pace of expansion increases dramatically." If this prediction is made in the same manner as that in which the finance minister predicted good things from his November 12 budget, or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) predicted good things from his National Energy Program, I cannot believe the figure quoted for skilled worker shortages.

I believe this is a Utopian bill. How does one determine shortages? Changes in the work place are occurring very rapidly today. By the time a response has been developed to suit the market by establishing a training program and then placing workers on the market, the situation will have changed and the market will have shifted to meet the new conditions. It makes much more sense to have industry train its work force and retrain on the job in the ever-changing marketplace.

Another point which concerns me about this bill involves the idea of a national training program. Other than the logistical problems and the corresponding increase in the size of the bureaucracy, how does one determine a national skill? Obviously the manpower training requirements will differ from region to region. I can see an individual moving from Nova Scotia to Manitoba for a job or job training in that province. However, I do not believe many individuals will undertake job training in Nova Scotia and start looking for work in Manitoba. What should really be addressed is the problem of job creation in the private sector for the 1.2 million unemployed in this country.

We are going from crisis to crisis and treating symptoms rather than the disease, which is a lack of confidence for private enterprise to invest in Canada with Canadian money.

The changes we are witnessing in industry will continue for some time. This process of change is exposing new problems daily. Shutdowns create problems which will be more difficult to address if we do not meet the challenge.

In my riding the spectre of the shutdown of a uranium mine looms. What good is this bill to the some 400 mine employees in Bancroft or other Canadians finding themselves out of work because of a lack of sales, bankruptcy or receivership? This mine, which employs over 380 people, is situated in a community of less than 1,400. The impact of this shutdown will be horrendous. The suggestion of retraining these people is unrealistic. Most people choose to remain in their locations, even if transfer opportunities exist. People who live in the rural areas of my riding do so because of the lifestyle, which is something upon which we do not put a price tag. People want to stay there and live in those communities. Of the few who do move, frequently they return to their previous locations. The end result is individuals on unemployment insurance and, ultimately, social assistance. This bill is like talking about shutting the barn door after the horse has escaped.

Let me expand on the effect the closing of this mine will have on 380 workers in a rural community who will be put out of work. First, there is the loss to governments of taxes which are collected. That loss would be in excess of $500,000 per year. Then there is money lost to local communities for supplies amounting to approximately $2 million. Then with respect to supplies bought from other Canadian businesses the loss would be approximately $10 million. The annual payroll is about $12 million. We see a budget forecast of approximately $24 million lost to the community and to Canada. Of approximately 400 employees, let us say 300 decide to relocate with their families. If the 300 workers who relocate request and obtain relocation assistance from the Canada Employment Centre and the amount requested is the maximum per family, that will cost the Canada Employment Centre something in the neighbourhood of $1 million. That leaves approximately 100 employees who will be qualified to apply for unemployment insurance benefits. Unemployment insurance benefits for the first 12-month period would amount to in excess of $1 million. We cannot measure the human costs this would involve. When the decision to allow the Madawaska mine to close is made, the cost to government could easily exceed $5 million in the first year, including costs associated with the mining sector employment bridging program.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) should address the seriousness of plant closings, bankruptcies and the social implications involved before establishing a national training program which, if the current trend continues, will train workers for non-existent jobs. I do not see a national labour market; I see a regional labour market. The people in my riding wish to stay there and be employed, a request I believe to be not too unreasonable.

Job-training programs may be a popular quick-fix remedial notion, but they do not address the problem of job creation today. We must move to protect existing jobs.

I would like to quote from the general development agreement of 1974, in which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was a partner with the province of Ontario, as follows:

—to improve the opportunity for productive employment and access to those opportunities and to sustain existing productive employment opportunity . . . in need of special measures.

The mechanisms we have in this country for moving workers in declining industries from one area to another are extremely poor at the best of times. The workers who are currently being hurt by this recession are those with less formal education and older persons who have the type of family responsibilities that inhibit movement. With interest rates the way they are, anyone with a house is neither able to sell his house in a declining area nor able to afford to buy a new one in a growing area. We do not have the structures to assist the mobility en masse of those who are unlikely or unable to move on their own to areas where there are jobs or national training programs such as this bill envisions.

I would like now to address the purpose of Bill C-115 as I see it. I see it as another power grab by the current federal government, this time trying to carve out a piece of the education market. Education is clearly within the responsibilities of the provincial governments. On the one hand the federal government is withdrawing transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education and, on the other hand, through legislation like Bill C-115 the bureaucrats are building a larger empire for the Minister of Employment and Immigration—or will it be the minister of employment, immigration and education?

I acknowledge that there are good intentions involved in job training programs, but it appears that the minister seeks to exploit the situation to expand his department. The provinces have a real worry that the funds for this program will be diverted from funds allocated to universities and community colleges. I am skeptical about moving people from region to region, first for training and then for jobs. It is impractical, and it is not feasible.

The Madawaska mine, which is in real danger of closing, is a uranium mine. The present government's involvement in the marketing of uranium is an issue which, along with concerns respecting cartels and price fixing, lingers on in our minds. The people of Bancroft do not want to see the Uranium City solution applied to their community. The government is and should be responsible for its actions; I am sure foam insulation sufferers would agree with that.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated that co-operative federalism will no longer be practised. The federal government wants more recognition for federal funding and new areas for further patronage. How will it be decided which regions receive funding for job-training facilities? Will a committee be established and then its advice be ignored, as was done when choosing the architect for the new embassy in Washington? If the minister is truly prepared to listen to provincial proposals and allow a really effective training program to emerge through co-operative federalism, I support his efforts.

The task force on work for tomorrow indicates that there could be employment opportunities for machinists, tool and dye makers, welders, electronic technicians, computer specialists and a host of other occupations which could assume a role of national importance if there are shortages in these fields, but business activity is necessary before these jobs can be created.

The federal government has recently set two records: the dollar has reached an all-time low, and unemployment has reached an all-time high. I suggest that the federal government test the intent of Bill C-115 with specialized training development in the armed forces. This could be accomplished without disrupting any of the excellent training programs which currently exist in some provinces.

The minister speaks about a national training program to place a national focus on a national problem. The Department of Regional and Economic Expansion was intended to have the same purpose. It was created, and I quote, "to assist and encourage each region of Canada in realizing its economic and social potential".

The figures indicate that over the life of DREE, since it was first formed in 1969, one particular region, which has a tendency to support the Liberal Party, has benefited to the tune of $1.524 billion compared to Ontario's $277 million. Ontario has always been regarded as a "have" province. However, regional disparities exist in Ontario which should have been addressed by DREE. DREE is riddled with patronage to the point of being a national disgrace. It was a good idea; but it has been politically sabotaged to the point of ineffectiveness in certain partisan areas.

The $350 million industry and labour adjustment program, ILAP, announced in 1981 also is a program that on paper sounds good. The reason it was established was, in part, as follows:

A program to promote industrial restructuring and labour adjustment . . . available to communities facing major lay-offs resulting from large-scale industrial dislocation.

At this point it is being used to funnel millions of dollars into western Ontario ridings whose members currently sit on the government side of the House. They are in trouble politically. Voters in Kitchener will recognize pork barrelling for what it is and it will not help the member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) in the next election. Are we now to assume that the Kitchener riding has national importance?

The Minister of Employment and Immigration informs me that his ministry will be monitoring the Bancroft situation. The word monitoring is a catchword which says that if the people who are affected live in a Conservative riding, we will watch them being thrown out of work. Does the minister not realize that he is playing games with people's lives and their livelihood? In the Sudbury area approximately 26 per cent of the labour force work directly in the mining industry compared to 83 per cent in the Bancroft area. There will be a tremendous upheaval if this uranium mine shuts down in this community.

The type of job skills required to live in the North Hastings area around Bancroft are skills for which no "national occupational training program" will ever provide training. These people are independent and have learned to be versatile, regardless of government interference. It is a life to be envied and one I do not wish to see disturbed.

What is an occupation of national importance? I see the situation where a regional shortage may be deemed not to be of national importance, a region where there exists a shortage in all occupations, but which in the eyes of the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission is not sufficiently serious to justify special action.

The tendency in the past has been to attract skilled workers from other countries to fill jobs in Canada. The minister wishes to reverse this trend. Canada will now have skilled workers to export to other countries where the jobs will exist.

Can this government not see the real problem? Is it so bankrupt of ideas, so old and tired that it does not see a frustrated populace? Canadians are tired of the federal government fighting with the provinces, and tired of the relentless empire building of Ottawa.

Occupational training for the work place in a changing work environment is a worthwhile goal. I would like to see a system implemented that encourages our provincial educational systems to assess students at an early age for occupational aptitude and direct students into training programs at an early age to remedy current and future skilled-trade shortages that Bill C-115 is attempting to redress.

I am in favour of the intent of Bill C-115, regardless of my pessimistic comments concerning federal government participation in educational matters. However, I do believe employment is the key solution to restoring confidence in the Canadian economy to promote private sector growth. There are some well-meaning programs that currently exist that can be used effectively to encourage this confidence. Instead of speculating about possible future shortages, let us protect existing jobs and work for their preservation and expansion. Business and labour need a sensible, stable, long-term industrial strategy if they are to be able to plan their future requirements. We have in Canada an abundant supply of resources in raw material and human resources.

During this worldwide recession, Canadians should be on top, not thirteenth on the list of nations behind such countries as Switzerland and Luxembourg. Canadians ask why countries like Germany and Japan, which import large amounts of raw materials and petroleum, have such vibrant economies while Canada's economy is suffering.

People respect hard-earned success and action in the face of challenge. In my riding I have constituents who are surviving only by being jacks-of-all-trades. They repair their own vehicles and cut their own wood for heating. They grow as much of their own food as possible just to make ends meet. Still this federal government demands more.

The Canadian government should make the creation of jobs, with a comprehensive industrial policy, its highest priority. When our people are working and our plants are at capacity, then perhaps the government can direct its talents to training manpower needs for the jobs of the future. The government must start within Canada to solve the real problems affecting Canadians before its goes off searching for other problems. We need to ensure that industry and business in Canada survive the current economic recession and grow to compete and serve markets both in Canada and abroad. This goal is vital, basic, and requires immediate government attention.

This nation has more than 700,000 small businesses. The wave of bankruptcy among these businesses, up 22 per cent from 1980 and up 37 per cent in the first quarter of 1982 over the same period last year, threatens the lifeblood of this country. The government has refused to address the problems being faced by so many. Small business needs help now as it is a vital contributor to employment in the Canadian economy.

One example of an area in which the federal government could direct some creative energy is the textile, clothing and shoe manufacturing industries. A comprehensive industrial strategy that looks hard at the needs and concerns of these industries would protect jobs for which the federal government wants to establish training programs. Between August of 1981 and May of this year there has been a net loss of 320,000 jobs, 157,000 of them in the manufacturing sector alone.

We have not moved forcefully enough in limiting the number of Japanese autos being imported into Canada or in working out some arrangement whereby Canadian jobs are created by the Japanese auto makers in Canada. Workers in the auto industry clearly are in an occupation of national importance. The preservation of those jobs is of national significance. A training program for non-existent jobs in the auto industry is of no significance.

Let us have an economic program that will give encouragement to labour and industry and the incentive for all Canadians to work and rebuild this great country to a place of prominence among industrial nations of the world.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, we continue to debate this legislation at a time of economic crisis. We were led to expect that the Versailles summit marked some new beginnings for Canadian economic policy. We do not need another new beginning like the last one, which ended in the crash of the megaproject strategy.

Today we are considering an employment training measure at a time when Canada suffers from post-depression high unemployment. I see nothing in this bill which will address the problem of the 1.2 million people who are unemployed by the count of Statistics Canada or the real unemployed who push the figure to 1.9 million and are victims of the government's fiscal and monetary strangulation of the economy.

I have looked in vain, Mr. Speaker, for an optimistic note about Canada's economic performance in recent months. Instead, I have found this kind of unrelenting pessimism as voiced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on May 10, when he said:

> We are not in a position to offer an optimistic picture of the immediate future. The resumption of growth in the OECD area in the months ahead will be moderate at best, and total unemployment is likely to rise even further. While better inflation performance is under way in many countries, including Canada, it has been much slower than we would have liked.

He went on to utter the obligatory excuses about U.S. economic performance and U.S. interest rates, followed by criticism of Canadian workers for not taking part in "moderation of income demands". This, Mr. Speaker, can only be described as a threadbare excuse for threadbare policies. Surely the lack of confidence now being shown in the economy must suggest to the minister that there is a grievous lack of confidence in him.

In the same address on May 10 the minister said:

> Measures are being taken to reduce the immediate hardships of high unemployment, as dictated by particular national circumstances—but we all realize the route to genuine recovery must lead through lower inflation.

I suppose the bill we have before us today is one of those measures, a government band-aid to minister to the army of unemployed. Those of us who looked at this exercise in skills matching would much rather be looking at a job-creation policy. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) appears to have been far too occupied with a bail-out policy of work sharing to be bothered with addressing the national unemployment crisis which faces us now. There was a time, not long ago, when the Liberal leader of the day, Lester Pearson, talked optimistically of an unemployment rate of 2 per cent, the so-called natural rate of unemployment of people in transition between jobs.

Since that time we have been treated to a lot of buzz words or fuzz words, such as "participation rate, baby boom generation, structural unemployment" and all the rest. What it means purely and simply is a significant retreat from the goal of full employment.

The government acknowledged that in the 1980 departmental study led by David Dodge, which was made public by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). That study said that full employment was not really an official goal of the federal government, and unemployment had to be traded off against price stability. Even though at that time we had a higher profile parliamentary task force study before us, which would define full employment at 4 per cent unemployed, most of us know well enough that it is the department's brief which catches the ministerial ears. As for Lester Pearson and his 2 per cent, that seems a part of Liberal history which is gone and has been forgotten.

The goal of the post-war generation of full employment, remembering only too well the misery and failure of the great depression, finds no place in this government at all. Yet providing jobs for every Canadian willing and able to work is the only worthy goal for any national government. Any retreat from that goal deserves to be broadcast not only to the unemployed but to every thinking and caring Canadian who realizes that employment goes a long way toward defining the dignity and self-worth of every person in our society.

The parliamentary task force made some other worthwhile observations. They singled out the "make work" nature of many employment and immigration programs when long-term job creation should have been the goal. It found that only 20 per cent of employers did on-the-job training, and that skilled labour shortages would require a commitment by industry to do much more. Unfortunately, the national training program as outlined by the minister will largely address the concerns of the Dodge study and largely ignore the concerns put before us by the parliamentary task force. We will plunge into another brave new world of skills-matching via Bill C-115, but does this bill really do the limited amount expected from it? We should take a good look at it and find out.

Earlier in this House the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) told us about the history of vocational training in Canada. He did it very well but he should have added that many of our problems today are the result of that vocational training act. I believe the mistakes in that act will be repeated. For example, for years government employment forecasts have depended on voluntary disclosure from employers. The results have not provided the accurate information needed to plan a training policy. That process has not been changed in this act.

Second, the Dodge report suggested that the western energy megaprojects should be the basis of new training requirements, yet these projects are in collapse. Should the federal government, therefore, unilaterally define the national training priority on the basis of a tenuous economic strategy? Past experience suggests that is a very doubtful process.

Third, we seem to be unduly occupied with industry's requirements. Where is the commitment to what people want to do? Why are so many community colleges, which most clearly aim their graduates toward available jobs, having to turn back thousands of applicants because of restraint policies? If we are not short of medical personnel and a lack of commitment to medicare which would employ them, why is the Canadian Medical Association talking about rationing medical services?

There is more than a government pleading poverty here, Mr. Speaker. Here we have a government with a poverty of imagination. Surely this is unforgiveable when the lives of so many of our youngest and brightest hopes for the future are at stake. All of us are aware that the post-war generation of skilled trades people who came to Canada from outside North America are now nearing retirement age. The bill refuses to come to grips with this most important issue.

The federal government is quite content to provide direct grants to industry in the hope that it will stimulate training. Yet there is no enthusiasm for employers who see such training only as a cost to them, not a real investment in their labour force. In the past they have found that they can spend time and money training a person, only to have him take a job with their competitors. The only fair way of dealing with this fear is to equalize the costs for all employers who use skilled labour. If skilled workers are trained, and if those who do the training are reimbursed by those who hire the labour, we will quickly have a policy which is both fair and which accurately reflects the demand for such labour. This is known as the grant-levy system. It has been endorsed by the Canadian Labour Congress and it is endorsed by the New Democratic Party. It is unfortunate that the government cannot bring itself to implement this system.

In short, I wonder whether this brand new bill will give us the same old results. Having been active in the educational field for most of my life, I know well the results of such training bills. Some of the results are as follows: institutional training which comes ten years after the need has passed; a lack of confidence in the ability of local and regional authorities to anticipate and deal with current employment demands; a continuance of "beggar the neighbour" employment practices among companies rather then a continuance of a system which gives assurance to companies that training is for their own good and for the common good of the country.

The government could move beyond the less than inspired ad hockery of Bill C-115, beyond work sharing, beyond winter employment projects and the rest of it, and into a planned economy with a full employment goal. However, the job of planning the economy for full employment awaits different ministers with different goals from those of the ones opposite. I will most readily and willingly support such a government.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today is intended to ensure the existence of an adequate number of highly skilled workers to meet the needs of the Canadian economy. The basic need of the Canadian economy is to provide over one million jobs for Canadians who are unemployed and to provide thousands more for young Canadians entering the labour market.

The greatest single need in Canada today is a blueprint for the economic recovery of the nation. We need a national development plan of which the measure before us would be an important component. Standing alone, this bill is just one more good dynamic in a field of unrelated dynamics which have seen our nation plunge into the deepest recession in modern history.

The government's plan for economic development set out in the document entitled "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s" raises serious concerns about the real commitment to stated policy objectives because of the vague statement of good intentions and promises compared with the absence of hard priorities and current contradictory federal actions. The non-identification of specific problems and opportunities and the apparent lack of appreciation of how relatively little regions have gained from assistance programs are discouraging notes struck in the document. Despite stated commitments, federal regional policy remains unclear and non-specific. The stated federal commitment to co-operation and consultation with the provinces is not reflected in announced policies to deliver programs unilaterally and the announced phase-out of general development agreements.

The ill-conceived consideration of moving the provincial office of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion out of the provincial capital of New Brunswick is one backward step illustrating the point I have just made and emphasizing once again the bull-headed, do-it-yourself attitude of a government on a mad march to nowhere.

Despite the expenditure of very substantial amounts of money over the past 20 years, the have-not provinces of Canada simply have not caught up. The disparity gaps have widened. In 1971, unemployment rates for Canada were 6.2 per cent and in the Atlantic provinces they were 7 per cent. In 1981, unemployment rates in Canada were 7.6 per cent and in the Atlantic provinces they were 11.7 per cent. The gap has widened.

When we compare the personal incomes per capita for Canada and for the Atlantic provinces for 1971 and 1980, we find that Atlantic Canadians earned 71.7 per cent of the national average in 1971 and 72.5 per cent in 1980. The range and value of federal instruments used to promote an economic catch-up by regions of Canada suffering from regional disparities have obviously not been equal to the task, but without them the gap would be widened even more than it is now.

It is very important to have effective job-training programs such as those being announced by the minister, but it is equally important to have jobs for the trainees to go to. With over one million Canadians unemployed and no jobs on the horizon, we must ask ourselves what we are to train Canadians to do. This government has no blueprint for action. It has no industrial recovery program. It has no national development goals or programs. It has no regional goals or objectives. It is a government which is not giving leadership to Canadian people at a time when it is desperately needed.

Indeed, in view of the frequent changes in federal policy, a sustained development effort is difficult and the private sector of the economy finds itself completely frustrated and bewildered. Canada is a country of great riches in terms of our natural resources and our highly educated, hard-working people. We need a national development blueprint to bring together all the resources of the nation and to get our economy moving forward again. Whether it is a family farm or a major mining or manufacturing firm, business needs to know that there is a national policy framework, that the government is serious about the policies which will guide economic development, and that these policies will be fair and consistent and enable individuals and companies to plan and invest with confidence in the future of Canada.

Our educational systems need to know what is the economic strategy so that schools, community colleges, universities and businesses which conduct industrial training programs can take account in their own planning of future economic developments. Our municipalities, our regional economic development councils and organizations representing our primary producers have important parts to play in economic development. The federal government should recognize that it is the responsibility of provincial governments to provide much of the leadership, the impetus and the reliable information to allow them to participate fully.

In the Atlantic provinces we have some of the greatest universities in Canada and they perform their function well. We have not given appropriate attention to the need to relate certain kinds of training to the actual requirements of the work place. The acquisition of skills must be tied to the economy and the encouragement of economic growth.

We need both institutional training and industrial training. They are both integral parts of an effective and efficient training system. These training modes do not necessarily represent alternative approaches to training, nor are they expressions of divergent training philosophies. They are, in reality, no more than different training environments, each with different inherent advantages and disadvantages with respect to the training being conducted.

I have some suggestions for the minister to consider in respect to this limited but very important measure before us. We need a very substantial emphasis on on-the-job training, not only in the conventional trades where this is already happening, but also in almost every other fact of enterprise. We need an altered view of the role of educational institutions to increase their relevance to the community and economic development requirements. For example, an increased emphasis on continued adult education and a design of business administration programs which have a greater small business orientation are possible directions.

We must bear in mind that small production units are characteristics of Atlantic Canada and there are limitations on the ability of small firms to conduct effective training programs. Good export performance, effective research and development are often absent also and require some economies of scale. They are important to the creation of jobs.

The problem is how to achieve such economies without at the same time destroying the distinctive positive qualities of smaller enterprises. I would recommend that the minister consider a program to encourage consortia with regard to raw materials purchasing, production, warehousing, marketing and the operations of research facilities.

He might also consider a privately sponsored export development corporation to promote export documentation, insurance and financial services to Atlantic firms as well as initial market identification. At the same time we should also consider the use of incubator centres to provide a full range of services like bookkeeping, copying, and secretarial services to help new businesses get through the crucial start-up phase.

Another initiative that should be studied is a program to facilitate and encourage joint ventures of Atlantic enterprises with foreign firms. Often a joint venture in which the foreign firm provides the knowledge and expertise is the only way for local enterprise to enter new highly specialized fields.

High technology firms are at the cutting edge of the wave of the future. Canada is a world leader in electronics and communications. We have to build on our successes, go with the winners and pursue vigorously as part of a program dedicated to the economic recovery of this nation.

If this, indeed, is to be the policy of the government, then clearly there is an important need to structure our training programs to meet this challenge. We can act upon our opportunities, but first our heavy emphasis on natural resource upgrading, investment in large capital works and subsidization of existing enterprise will have to be supplemented by an emphasis on people's skills and productivity and on the attraction of new activities based on modern technology.

The government has brought forward piecemeal a reasonably good piece of legislation, the principle of which I shall have no difficulty in supporting.

I have proposed that this be placed in perspective as part of a national development plan for the economic recovery of our nation. It is great to have trained people—indeed it is essential—but it is better to have trained people with jobs to go to.

In Atlantic Canada, rural Quebec, parts of northern Ontario and in pockets all across our country, there are widespread regional disparities crying to be addressed. The solution to these problems is central to the economic recovery of our nation, requires the urgent attention of our government and requires it now.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C-115. I believe it is a bill which focuses on many of the concerns of Canadians today, particularly in these times we are living in. We have a difficult economic environment today where not only are people facing high levels of unemployment and many Canadians are desperately looking for jobs, but they are desperately looking for training opportunities as well.

I would like to begin by pointing out the more positive aspects of this bill as I see them. The first significant proposal concerns the extension of the training period for people undertaking a training program. This is an important measure at a time when we are faced with a very complex work environment. As a result of our increasingly complex industries there is greater demand for people with higher levels of skills. Hopefully an extension of the training period will remove some of the obstacles to vocational choice. The implementation of this measure may provide greater flexibility to people who are seeking training.

The second positive measure in the bill deals with the removal of the one-year waiting period for training. This applies to recent school graduates and drop-outs and is significant since that waiting period resulted in a wasted year for those people. Hopefully this will also allow some flexibility for those students and others who desire training.

Another aspect of the bill which I think is significant is the relaxation of rules for reporting for sponsor employees. I envisage this measure attracting more sponsors. This is an important aspect because on-the-job training is a very important element of any training which can be offered to Canadians, as my colleague has just emphasized. The reduction of paperwork will be of great assistance to the small business sector in becoming involved in this type of program, since paperwork is one of the most difficult functions that small businesses in our country face. It is an expense which they can ill afford. Anything which can be done to ease that burden will make it easier for sponsors to become involved. Hopefully, this measure will attract more of them.

The third measure which I find positive is the authorization of third party training for employers who are unable to provide training. This will allow improved co-ordination with licensed organizations in fulfilling the specific needs of particular employers. Training programs can be provided to small businesses which could not provide a proper training environment themselves.

Another significant and important measure concerns training Canadians where training is available. An example of this might be our requirements for offshore technologies. This is one area, which requires either foreign training, or the immigration of foreign technicians. Therefore this is an important step, a side benefit of which is the avoidance of institutional costs, for mere trainee support. As a result, the specific training objective is not obstructed or delayed by the costs of creating or supporting institutions.

Lastly, the increased benefits to apprentices while in training are significant. This can be applied while they are laid off or out of a job. As I understand it, there will be an increase in unemployment insurance benefits paid over that period. From people in my riding to whom I have spoken, I know this will be of significance, as many wanted training but simply could not afford it because they have dependants. As a result, they were not able to go out and expand their opportunities, to increase their abilities and thus qualify for more and better jobs. I hope that as a result of this bill we will see people retraining themselves, achieving higher levels, thus bringing home better pay because of their better skills and the wider range of opportunities available to them. The bill is not perfect, and I am sure that that comes as no surprise to the minister.

For a few moments I want to touch on some of my concerns. The first one is that the whole bill applies to occupations of national importance. The good things throughout this bill are designated for occupations of national importance. The government is implying a priority. If it is good for the country, it will do its best to fill that need. It will increase funding in those areas and provide time extensions for filling those priorities. The question is, just what are those occupations of national importance? Does that mean that we will once again be involved in the whole issue of regional disparities? Does that mean that one sector will be specialized and favoured while another is left to wilt? The whole matter invites a number of questions.

The impact of the bill will be to improve high-skilled training. Of course, all of us are convinced that that is good. We are concerned about some of the implications, but we feel, on par, that what we really want to see is an improvement in high school training in the country. The bill does, however, allow the training of adults immediately upon leaving school, which is logical and of importance and it does not apply to that target group.

The other emphasis of the bill is to encourage specialization. We need specialists but—and I emphasize "but"—the skills which will be developed as a result of this bill will be based on statistical methods or economic models of projections. However, we must remember that they are only predictions, and could therefore, present some real difficulties.

I would like to illustrate that by what could have happened concerning the late tar sands projects. Three years ago in the province of Alberta, anyone would have said that we needed a number of skilled employees or trainees, specialists in the field of tar sands technology. Had this bill been in place at that time, I assume that that would have become a national priority. We would have focused much attention on training many people in those skills. Where would we be today? We would have a bunch of people on the market with skills but with no jobs because, as we all know, those tar sands are not in operation and do not look like they will be in the foreseeable future.

My other concern about encouraging specialization is that we might tend to limit ourselves to developing only specialists and give little consideration to developing multi-skilled work forces which, of course, would give a much wider range of opportunity. We should be developing multi-talented work forces, a labour pool capable of filling a number of roles in a particular, singular setting. We do need some generalists to give our industry greater flexibility and to give the working man or woman the opportunity to move from job to job, if he or she wishes.

That becomes especially applicable in times like today. The German government supports a three-year program for individuals who are called skilled workers when their course is finished. They do not necessarily fill jobs of national importance. These graduates are generalists who can fill a number of roles in virtually all industrial settings. Of course, this allows greater flexibility for the employers, greater leeway in planning and reacting to changing economic conditions, but it also allows greater flexibility to the individuals holding those jobs. I believe this sort of extended and detailed training could attract a growing number of young people as they begin to realize the skills to be gathered would be very comprehensive. Their vocational training would, and I believe should, regain respectability.

In looking at Bill C-115, we find that the emphasis is to upgrade special technological trainees. One of my questions in terms of context is still outstanding. The bill does not state where or how it will fit into the government's economic policies, only that it will "provide occupational training for the labour force and thereby to better meet the need for skills created by a changing economy and to increase the earning and employment potential of individual workers".

Essentially, as I see it, when we are dealing with this type of bill we must be able to relate it to a particular recovery plan. That is particularly true when we are dealing with the current situation in Canada where we have a national recession and record unemployment. Among those unemployed people are many with high levels of skill. What types of occupations of national importance are likely to be defined as such in a period like this? This bill must be attached to a plan or a strategy for the rejuvenation of the economy. Failing that, if there is not a general plan, then let us at least have some sort of sectoral stimulus. Something should be done to relate this bill to the jobs and the situation we now face.

My concern is that graduates of any vocational plan will find it difficult to find work. For us, that presents a whole new danger, because young people are investing much time and effort to improve their skills and gain these new opportunities, and then suddenly finding themselves dumped on the world market with no jobs or opportunity. What will happen to them? They will become angry or frustrated because their hopes, dreams and years of hard work will be destroyed before they even have a chance to start. We could end up spending much money on training centres and equipment which will be soon outdated unless, of course, we use it for teaching theory. We need a strong industry committed to supporting this kind of training, one that will teach and provide us with the practical expression and practical application of those skills.

The province of Alberta is probably a special case. It is not very long ago that this type of bill could have helped that province a great deal because unemployment was low and we needed a number of skilled workers. Unfortunately, if one looks at what has happened to the unemployment figures in our province today, one finds that we have a surplus of skilled workers. In Canada there are 1,241,000 recorded unemployed, or 10.2 per cent of the work force. In Alberta, it is about 7.2 per cent, which is up considerably from just last month. In Edmonton it is up again, at 8.2 per cent, and in Calgary it is 7.2 per cent. If one looks at the region I represent, one will find that unemployment has tripled in less than one year. Who is hurting? Who is losing these jobs? It is our young men who are facing 20 per cent unemployment and our young women who make up 14.7 per cent of those unemployed. We are at an all-time post-depression high for unemployment.

Even our so-called whiz kids, those who are especially bright and talented, are having a hard time, like my colleague from the maritimes. Two cases were recently reported in one of our local papers of young people who had received the gold medal of excellence. One was in the field of chemistry. Today those two gold medal winners cannot find jobs. It is not just the person with low skills or at the lower end of the employment opportunities who suffers from unemployment. It is coming through the whole gamut of those who are seeking employment.

As I mentioned, in our area we are facing increased unemployment. The Peace River tar sands project which we talked about in this House, and which the chambers and municipalities in that area have been desperately trying to get reactivated and are speaking to the federal government about, would allow the young people in that region a much greater opportunity as well as all young people in Canada. The economic spin-off of a $5 billion tar sands plant would be felt here in Ontario. Without that tar sands project there will be an even greater problem to be faced in that area. We need assurance from this government that that project, which would provide us with so many opportunities, will not be allowed to die.

I want to close by saying that this bill should and must be tied to an economic recovery program. The minister told us that the old program trains people for jobs that do not exist. Unless this bill is attached to an economic recovery program, we will be faced with precisely the same situation. Unless we can tie it all together and provide people with training that will allow them to take jobs that are available when they complete their training, we are defeating the whole purpose and we will be back to where we started.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, in May, 1980, this House appointed a parliamentary task force to deal with the entire subject matter of this bill. I, along with six others, had the pleasure of being on that task force for employment opportunities for the eighties. The task force included four government members, two from the Official Opposition and one from the New Democratic Party.

For over a year and a half we studied this entire problem. During that time we heard from 342 groups and associations throughout this country. They had important input into this matter. They appeared before the committee. We questioned them to get their views. We received 92 other briefs dealing with the subject matter.

Our mandate was to find out why in this country we had serious unemployment side by side with important skill shortages. This was not only taking place in the country as a whole but in individual communities. In communities where there was high unemployment, there were very serious shortages of skilled workers and professionals.

Our work confirmed that these mismatches or imbalances were in fact present in the marketplace. We made some serious recommendations to deal with this. The imbalances were due to either lack of or inadequacy in training programs in this country. We found that only 20 per cent of major industrial firms did any serious on-the-job training. It was a bit of a scandal. The large companies recognized and admitted that they had not done enough in the past and were now changing their ways.

The reason many of them had not done any serious on-the-job skilled training was that since the Second World War it had been easier to go to Europe and other countries, and through immigration find the skilled workers needed rather than train Canadians. None of us is against immigration, but we feel that much more should have been done and still can be done to train Canadians to fill those high-skilled jobs and professions rather than having to go abroad to get workers.

I might say the major companies today are not having success in finding the skilled workers they want from Europe. In the first place, there has been a decline in the birth rate in those countries such as we have had here. Also, the standard of living has increased considerably. Therefore, it is more difficult to attract workers in Holland, Germany, Scandinavia, France and so on to come here. Many witnesses told us that their recruiting teams going to Europe are becoming non-cost effective. Whereas they used to attract 15 or 20 recruits, but now come back with only three, four or five.

It is imperative that we improve our job training and on-the-job training program. As chairman of the task force, I want to say that, in my opinion, this bill moves very considerably in that direction. It will do a lot to deal with that serious problem.

The task force came to the conclusion that not only must we considerably improve the training programs for our young people through apprenticeship programs, co-operative education programs, technical colleges and institutions, but that training must become a lifelong process. We were told over and over again that no matter what you are trained for at 20 or 25, because of rapidly advancing technology it is very likely that in the future, and possibly even today, you will have to be retrained at least two or three times during your lifetime. Serious retraining will be required to keep up with the technology.

What we are aiming for is sound, basic technical and professional training in the first place, and a system of education and training where a person can retrain and upgrade throughout his entire life. We want a system which will facilitate easy entry at all stages of one's life, one with support systems, training allowances and bursaries to allow a person to go back and to keep up with new technology and new systems. If we do not do that, we will rapidly fall behind our chief competitors in the United States, the Common Market and Japan where they are doing these things.

We are saying that our training, retraining and upgrading programs must be improved. Also something must be done about this very shocking figure of 28.4 per cent of functional illiterate people in this country who at the present time are not ready for any training program. The only training program they can take advantage of is a very basic education program.

To a great extent these people are being wasted. It is a waste for them, for society and this country. If these 28.4 per cent functionally illiterate people, who cannot properly read, write, compute or express themselves, are going to be used in this rapidly developing society, they must have the basic tools so that they can train for the technologies that are coming on line.

Over and over again we have been told that the jobs in short supply—this has been put on the record before, but it is worthwhile doing it again—are welding, tool and die making, machinists, engineers of all kinds—

Miss MacDonald: All jobs that can be held by women.

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member says all jobs that can be held by women. We pointed that out in the report and we deplored the fact that more women had not been permitted or attracted into these particular fields. Our supervisors told us over and over again that where women had entered the fields of welding, machinists, tool and die making, the high-skilled trades, women had done as well as or better than men. They welcomed the policies and programs to encourage women to go into those particular high-skilled trades. There are shortages also in such fields as electronics financial analysis, administration, accounting, the health field professions, nursing, physiotherapy, psychotherapy and so on.

I think one of the major accomplishments of this bill is that it provides much greater flexibility, first of all in enrolment in training and retraining programs, entry into training and retraining programs, greater flexibility in the provision of allowances and support systems for those who are on training. It provides that the training programs can be carried on not only by provinces and by provincial training systems, but also to a greater extent by employers and by others. By "others", I presume it means private schools and private training institutions, of which we have some very good ones in the country.

The bill also provides for greater funding for equipment and machinery for training. Some pretty shocking situations were brought to the attention of the task force, cases where they were training electronic technicians on equipment that was out of date by ten years. That was a bit of a scandal, Mr. Speaker. This bill provides for more funding and more co-operation in the provision of equipment, machinery and buildings for training. All that goes along with the recommendations of the task force report.

Because this bill is going to committee and we will have a chance to study it at greater length, I will not spend much time on it here. I merely want to say, as chairman of the task force, that the bill does not provide the total solution to our training, needs, but it certainly goes in the direction of the main recommendations of the task force. Of course, there is still more to be done in other areas, areas of mobility, areas of literacy training, areas of federal-provincial co-operation, areas of forecasting and information, all of which are important to the whole field of training and specialized education.

This bill is an important step and should be supported by the House. I will be looking forward to the sessions in committee. Perhaps some improvements can be made there. Nevertheless, I want to go on record today as pointing out that this bill is a very important step in line with the recommendations of the task force report.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to place a few brief remarks on the record with respect to Bill C-115, to establish a national training program for occupational training. Undoubtedly, in the 1980s occupational training will be of vital importance to the work force, both present and future. Young people leaving secondary school will need skilled training to equip them to play a part in the work force of the 1980s and the 1990s. The not-so-young people who find themselves unemployed for reasons beyond their control will want retraining so that they can continue to participate in the work force.

The situation is aggravated by the current depression, caused by the Liberal Party's high interest rate policy. Unemployment has reached 10.2 per cent. It will probably go higher, as the November budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the National Energy Program continue to cripple the Canadian economy.

The subject of occupational training is a national one. It is so vast that one cannot deal with it extensively in the short time allotted to it. I would like to deal with areas, some touched by the bill and some not touched by it, which are important to my riding of Simcoe North and which interest me as a Member of Parliament.

I was quite interested in the all-party task force report on labour market development in the 1980s. Some of the findings of that task force report are of particular interest to me and I would like to read a few of them into the record.

That report signals some important shifts in the demand for labour. It suggests that more jobs will be created in the resource industries, in non-residential construction, capital goods manufacturing, and high technology areas including communications, information and business services.

Fewer production jobs will exist in manufacturing based on standard technology, especially for relatively unskilled workers. There will be a marked, slowdown in the growth of jobs for clerical and office workers and for personnel in health, education, public administration and other service industries.

In the 1980s a larger share of employment growth is likely to occur in the goods-producing industries, in contrast to the 1960s, and early 1970s when the service industries provided relatively more of the new jobs, jobs of a kind which could be more easily filled by young new entrants and by women re-entering the labour market.

More attention will have to be paid to ways and means of integrating women into jobs in the goods producing industries, which they do not now enter in large numbers. We will have to pay more attention to the training of workers for the high-skill trades, particularly those skills used in the goods producing industries. More attention will have to be paid to measures designed to facilitate the adaptation of workers already in the labour force to changing industrial occupational and geographic structures of demand.

I am convinced that we can meet that demand in Canada with a co-ordinated effort. While it is true that under our federal system the provinces are responsible for education, we cannot hide behind that division of powers if Canadians are not given enough opportunities to equip themselves with skills which will enable them to earn a living. Unemployment is a national problem and we have to take action on a national basis. Mr. Speaker, that does not mean that we want Ottawa bureaucrats in the position of sole responsibility to decide on what should be done, because that would be a disaster. Ottawa is the ultimate company town, insulated from the reality of the marketplace, from the reality of where the jobs are. I suggest that to solve this problem we will need co-operation between the federal government, the provincial governments, the community college personnel and industry. All of these have a piece of the ideas on what is going on in the real world. These other parts must be actively consulted.

We are fortunate in Ontario in that we have developed a network of strong community colleges. Working within that provincial framework they have continued to offer courses which equip young people to earn a living. The House will be interested to know that my information is that the community college system works differently in different provinces. I understand, for example, that in Quebec there is very little communication between the community college system and the Canada Manpower offices, whereas in Ontario there is a great deal of communication between those two bodies.

It is also my understanding that the representatives of the community college system in the maritimes are amazed at the autonomy which the community colleges are given in Ontario to operate courses which apply to the marketplace. I am led to understand that in the maritimes they operate as an integral part of the provincial educational system. I think the federal government would do well to assist community colleges in various parts of Canada to develop systems of co-operation and systems of delivery which will give the best possible skill training to young people.

It is my understanding that the community college system desperately wants a better system to determine what the manpower needs will be in the future, and that system has to be developed on a national basis. Officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration admit their inability to project manpower needs. One official of the department is quoted as saying: "We have an expensive system, computers, etc., but nobody can say how many people of any particular training we need." That is a tragic commentary on something which could very well be co-ordinated on a national basis. The Canadian occupational projection system is being put forward as the answer to that current lack of understanding and information.

Do hon. members know where COPS is going for its first information? Do hon. members know what will be the basis of where we head in the 1980s? It is the 1971 census. The first thing COPS is going to do is put the 1971 census on the record. I suggest that COPS start with the 1981 census and get going with respect to where we require skill training in Canada, and forget about 1971 because that is past history. That census is outdated in this day of rapidly changing demands for skilled individuals. We should be dealing with the 1981 census and not the 1971 census.

Under Clause 8 of the bill the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is authorized to enter into contracts for the provision of occupational training courses with persons or groups other than employers or groups of employers where the latter are unable to operate a course or arrange for training. The organization in question must be registered, licensed or otherwise authorized by the government of the province where the course is given.

It has been suggested to me that that is exactly where the breakdown occurs, because there seemed to be agreement among all of the community college representatives who were at the meeting at which the minister spoke last week or the week before that in most provinces it is very, very easy to get a licence to operate a course, and if that is the safeguard, I suggest to the minister that there must be better safeguards than just the holding up of a licence to allow the federal government to enter into these arrangements.

I am also concerned about exactly what occupations will be considered national occupations. For example, it was reported earlier this year that chefs and cooks will be considered surplus occupations. That prompted a letter to me from one of my constituents, and in that letter he said:

> Since I have been in the country I have been employed by five different establishments as a chef. All of the positions could and should have been filled by a Canadian providing they were trained and qualified to meet the requirements. They obviously are not.

This does not lend credence to the statement that chefs and cooks are involved in a surplus occupation.

In fact, in the establishment where this gentleman works the sous-chef and he are the only chefs with papers.

> —in Europe the training involves a period of two years full-time before entering the industry at the bottom. At this time the trainee has his or her required qualifications.

This is an individual in my riding who read an article in the newspaper which declared chefs and cooks surplus occupations. Fortunately, this gentleman had the presence of mind and the concern as a new immigant to this country to write me, a Member of Parliament, and point out this discrepancy. When we looked into it, we found out this gentleman has a very good point. The Canadian Restaurant and Food Services Association estimates that 8,000 skilled food preparation personnel are needed each year, yet there are only 3,300 graduates per year. I suggest that an over 50 per cent difference certainly does not warrant the profession of chef being declared a surplus occupation. We must look into these matters before we decide holus-bolus what is a national occupation what is not.

One other thing which concerns me is the fact that the bill does not address the problem of mobility. I am particularly disappointed, in light of the comments made by the minister that improved mobility could contribute to the elimination of skilled labour bottlenecks. Mobility is a crucial factor in addressing the needs of employers, employees and prospective employees in Canada. It is of particular significance in these hard economic times when the economic burdens of moving to a job could far outweigh the benefits of having that job.

The Canada Act guarantees Canadians the right to move, to take up residence in any province and to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province except where any laws and practices of general application are in force in that province. Now that we have guaranteed the right to go anywhere to work, we must guarantee Canadians the right to go anywhere to obtain training and encourage them to take that training anywhere in Canada. I do not mean that necessarily means that the federal government should finance programs across the country so that every area has a program. There have to be some economies of scale that we can put into force in order to train Canadians. However, we have to address the problem of mobility because in a large and diverse country such as Canada we cannot always take the jobs to the people. Sometimes it is better that we take the people to the jobs. I think the same goes for training for those jobs.

The task force on labour market development in the 1980s said that a number of groups will need special assistance to find productive employment or to move up through a career hierarchy, and chief among those groups are adult women who will make up two-thirds of the labour force growth in the 1980s. The minister has mentioned this fact in his speeches and in press releases. What puzzles me is that I can find no evidence of that special assistance anywhere in this bill. It may come out of regulations; we do not know, but what we want to know is whether the government will implement affirmative action programs. Will the government pay additional training allowances to employers who train women? What about the mobility problems of adult women? How are these to be overcome in relation to national occupations? The attempt to help women train themselves for the jobs of the future is very important. The minister referred to this, but what I would like to see is just exactly how we are going to do it.

I would like to close my remarks by making direct reference to what, in my opinion, the community college system can do if it is properly backed up by this legislation and by a federal government which tries to bring co-operation and planning to the subject of national training. In the county of Simcoe in my riding of Simcoe North is Georgian College, which has 4,000 full-time day students. Three thousand of these are post-secondary students. One thousand of them are in business programs, 500 in technology programs, 800 in nursing and health programs and 800 in design arts. Of the remaining 1,000, 700 are in skill programs and 300 are in academic upgrading. With the minimal amount of knowledge with which Georgian College and all the community colleges across Canada operate as to what the demands will be for the skills with which young people graduate, Georgian College has a placement rate of approximately 100 per cent. I think that speaks to the attitude of the community college system in Ontario.

I would like just briefly to mention what this attitude is built on. It is built on people in the community. It is built on a board of directors from the community. It is built on people who have proved themselves in industry and education and who spend their time, their free time—perhaps their not-so-free time—trying to set up training programs for young people so that they will have jobs. This is not an academic approach. It is a practical approach by people who have "been there" and who want to see the people of the county of Simcoe and others who come in succeed. It speaks to what we need in Canada.

I went to a convocation at Georgian College on the Orillia campus on the weekend. Any member on either side of this House who spends long hard weeks in this place should go to a community college convocation if he or she gets the opportunity. Nothing can give more of a lift than seeing the young people who have achieved something come out with a diploma which shows that they have the skills required to earn a living. It is great for parents to see their children achieve something that they can put to use in this country. I would encourage all members to attend the convocation of a community college if they can. It gives one an incentive to come back here and fight the good fight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That only comes about because we are undertaking training on a practical basis. Georgian College is training nursing assistants, mental retardation counsellors, bookkeeper-typists and machinists. Indeed, the only graduate in the welding course was a woman. These are the kinds of things we can do in community colleges and, backed by this bill, they will take a national approach to training for jobs in this great country of ours.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on, Bill C-115, the National Training Act. If this piece of legislation is properly enacted and guided, it can truly change the direction of retraining in Canada. It certainly will affect many thousands of Canadians male and female, young and old, able and less able, alike. The main principles behind this bill and others that it has superseded are honourable.

I do not intend to go through the whole history of training in Canada, as my colleague the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) has already done that quite adequately in his opening remarks regarding this bill ten days ago. He pointed out that in 1910, the Government of Canada established a royal commission on industrial training and vocational education. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister of the day, in his wisdom actually acted upon the recommendations of that commission. His government enacted two pieces of legislation, the agricultural assistance act and the agricultural instructions act. In 1916 a further recommendation was fulfilled with the establishment of the National Research Council by Sir Robert Borden.

This bit of history is mentioned only to show that these early administrations understood that Canadians needed assistance in the retraining field. It is of particular pride to me to point out that these administrations understood the importance of the business of agriculture in 1910. I wonder if the minister and the government of today understand the importance of the business of farming in 1982.

I understand the minister when he says in his press release of May 21, 1982, that economic growth and change in the 1980s will require major increases in the resources devoted to the production of high level skills. I also believe him when he says in the same release that major shortages averaging 9,000 skilled workers each year are predicted over the next five years unless the pace of expansion increases dramatically. This is pure economics, and no one can question that more skilled workers must be provided for the rapidly growing technology industries. However, I urge the government to look back at the roots of training I have mentioned and remember the business of agriculture in Canada. Remember the importance of agribusiness and small farms when decisions are made to redirect national training funding. Remember the shortage of field workers experienced by produce crop farmers. Remember the skills it takes today to set up and operate a farm or an agribusiness. Do not dismiss agriculture when designating occupations of national priority. Remember, these are all individual small businesses, which must not suffer from any redirection of funds or designation of jobs of national importance.

Last Thursday, June 10, I attended the 125th anniversary of the town of Lindsay in my riding. They called it Charter Day. Our hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sent congratulations in the form of a scroll, which was sealed in a time capsule and buried for posterity.

As Lindsay has a twin town in Japan called Nayoro, I thought it fitting to invite Japan's ambassador to Canada to the celebrations. I had the pleasure of introducing him to the community at the civic luncheon. After the luncheon I talked with people familiar with Japanese industry. Our discussions brought up many details of the Japanese business and life that I had only read about.

Japanese industry and government operate under the guidance of the so-called theory "Z". One of its features is a remarkably high degree of employee-employer loyalty. It is not uncommon for whole families to work for one employer from generation to generation. This obviously means a very low employee turnover rate. It allows for much more internal mobility and flexibility of firm internal labour markets. I understand that under this situation the Japanese government sees little need to control or regulate the kind or the method of industrial training. The on-the-job training is designed exactly for the needs of the job the company or organization wants the individual to do.

How does this compare with Canada? In the late 1970s the Japanese had almost doubled the number of firms providing in-house training. This is due in part to the fact that our labour force is much more mobile and our employee-employer relationships are adversarial in nature. We have very low levels of employee training in the private sector, with no incentives for improvement. We are not training our workers adequately for the jobs that exist today, let alone for the multiplicity of jobs that are being created in the technology based industries.

Coupled with this is the report by a Department of Employment and Immigration study group stating that skilled Europeans no longer want to work in Canada. It stated:

> Canadian wages and working conditions are relatively less attractive now than in the past, in comparison with those prevailing in western European countries, which have traditionally supplied this country with higher level skills.

So what do we have here? We have had a private sector which has had no incentive to train employees, and a government which, by the minister's own admission, has failed to provide for the training of at least 45,000 skilled workers required over the next five years.

On top of this, we have a government which allows foreign producers to eliminate jobs of skilled Canadians at home. Does the minister recall my question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) last week? If not, I will refresh his memory. I asked when the Lindsay rubber plant can expect the results of the investigation requested of the anti-dumping tribunal. A South Korean company's dumping of rubber products in Canada resulted in the loss of 30 full-time jobs at the Lindsay rubber plant. I have seen no response from the minister. Obviously the government is not too worried about the loss of 30 skilled labour jobs in Lindsay. It is interesting to note that South Korea's record of on-the-job training is much closer to that of Japan than to our poor record. It is about time we were thinking seriously about our retraining.

I read the minister's presentation to the federal-provincial conference of January 11, 1982, on skill training for the 1980s. I understand the proposals for the National Training Act were the result of the task force on labour market development in the 1980s, the report of the task force on employment opportunities for the 1980s, and extensive consultation with provinces and non-government organizations. This sounds like a great deal of consultation and co-operation, and it would seem everyone should be happy. It must therefore have puzzled provincial officials and non-governmental organization officials at that conference when the minister said:

> The main federal role is to determine the nature and scale of adult training needs, and to provide the leadership and financial assistance required by individuals, firms, groups and provinces to enable them to undertake or provide the required training. Provincial governments and their institutions are the main providers of training courses in an institutional setting and are responsible for their development, management and articulation. Although both orders of government have their main responsibilities, they must function in close collaboration to achieve common goals.

They were told the federal government will decide what the training needs are in the provinces, where the people should be trained, and what the priority jobs are in the country. It is then up to the provinces and non-governmental organizations to provide the programs. No wonder the provinces express deep concern. They worry about a program which allows the federal government to decide what is a priority job and shift funds from an existing program with or without their consultation. It is a program which allows the federal government to designate institutions, outside a particular province and possibly outside the country, to provide instruction in federally-designated skilled areas. The tabling of this bill has not lessened their fears. Clause 12 states:

> The Commission may establish with the government of a province a joint committee to assess the requirements of the labour market for skilled workers and the means necessary to meet such requirements.

The word "may" is what causes the worry. The existing legislation requires the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission to establish such a joint committee at the request of any province, and the bill says they may establish such a committee on their own initiative. There is no requirement that they do so, and absolutely no requirement for them to act upon the request for one by any province. Surely, if the government is committed to this badly needed bill, it will consider amending this clause. It was not part of Bill C-8, which we proposed in 1979 and which the Liberal Party forced to die on the Order Paper. It should not be in this bill. If anything is needed to make this program work, it is intergovernmental co-operation.

Now that I have pointed out objections to certain parts of this legislation, I would like to commend the minister on others. The extension of the allowable time for training beyond 52 weeks in higher level skills should be of assistance to those truly interested in learning a skill. Increased income support rate, should, as well, entice laid-off apprentices and workers to train for those jobs in which there is a shortage of people. Careful screening must be done, of course, to ensure those taking training are interested in getting a job, not just in retraining funds.

In closing, I want to reiterate my concerns about this bill. The National Training Act must above all be enacted in total co-operation and consultation with the provinces. In designating priority occupations, the provinces must be consulted. Occupations in agriculture, small businesses and other skill-related fields must be protected from unjust loss of funds. In short, the total needs of the economy, employers and employees must be reflected in Bill C-115.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are are follows: The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Labour Conditions—Increase in youth unemployment. (b) Role of government; the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes)—Energy—Service station cost of gasoline. (b) Request that price be reduced; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—The Judiciary—Canadian Judicial Council report on actions of British Columbia judge—government position. (b) Request for referral of subject to parliamentary committee.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL TRAINING ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, this legislation is extremely important, and although many members have criticized its shortcomings, the feeling exists that this kind of direction is necessary. Certainly there are concerns, and we have heard the case made time and again this afternoon that this bill is only as good as the industrial strategy which underpins the Canadian economy. The point has been made time and time again that if you do not have jobs, there is little point in retraining people.

It has also been said that the data to be used in making decisions are based on material from an outdated 1971 census. The dislocation and other problems which could result I think are fairly well known.

Another of the bill's shortcomings is that it does not provide enough detail. There is certainly concern about how to encourage employers—insist, if necessary—to take some of the responsibility for training. We have seen situations where a great many industries will pirate from other regions of the country, or push for immigration, rather than offer retraining. Basically there are no provisions in here which outline how employers will exercise their responsibility to make the retraining program a success.

This House has sat for many months. I guess this is the longest session in history. If you were to ask anyone his impression of the Thirty-second Parliament, I suspect it would only be described as a rudderless ship in which a majority Liberal government has run the Canadian economy on to the rocks. Then, once on the rocks, it generally lets many sectors of the economy literally bash themselves to pieces. There is an absolute lack of sound economic policy which causes enormous problems in the area of training programs. Basically there are no jobs for young people.

I had a rather sobering experience with a number of my colleagues in a local Ottawa high school. The graduating students of that school asked what we thought were their opportunities for employment. Quite frankly, I was somewhat embarrassed to be faced with such a forthright question. Actually we reflected it back to them by asking what they thought were their opportunities for employment given the present economic climate. Basically the students said nothing, because they knew their chances were slim if not non-existent. Even with training their chances for employment are slim or non-existent.

In the present economic climate we find that unemployment is the real problem, not job training. The bill before the House today should be one dealing with the area of job creation. The House should be given an opportunity to consider mechanisms by which interest rates would be reduced, at least for specific sectors of the economy, to get employment rolling and for training to become meaningful. Certainly the inflation rate is an acknowledged problem. Those are the priorities, not job training.

The job-training problem could be dealt with by existing legislation, but if we could create employment, without a doubt efficient management of the employment and immigration operation could provide the trained people. We require full co-operation by employers in a functioning economy to provide trained people, but this is not what we have before us today. We do not find mechanisms to create meaningful jobs.

The rudderless ship which produced the bill before us today is faced with many problems. For example, the small business bankruptcy rate is enormous. I think the figures which came out last week are worth repeating. Bankruptcies were up roughly 49 per cent. In May there were 751 bankruptcies with total assets lost of $162 million. For approximately five months there were 4,429 bankruptcies for a total increase this year of 36 per cent, or a total loss of $817 million. Of course, the bankruptcies are only the tip of the iceberg. Many more businesses are closing their doors, are disappearing, and are being taken over by receivers. If we multiply the number of bankruptcies by two or three jobs, we realize that there are shrinking opportunities for trained people to find employment.

What is the point of training people if there is no meaningful employment? We should not repeat the former situation under the old legislation where training programs became an alternative to employment. It took people off the unemployment rolls. Approximately $800 million per year was spent to take several tens of thousands of people off the rolls for several months. In many cases people completed one training program and did not obtain employment, so they attended another program. It was an alternative mechanism for collecting unemployment insurance.

The present situation, with unemployment, small business bankruptcies and shrinking opportunity for trained people to obtain employment, is a tragedy. The bill before us today indicates that the government's priorities are in the wrong place. I assume the bill will be improved in committee and that it will be satisfactory, but we should be looking at ways to create employment.

Tens of thousands of farmers are going bankrupt. I am sure hon. members have had farm representatives in their offices pleading with them to do something to stop farm bankruptcies. There is an enormous amount of employment associated with the farming community. One of the biggest examples of bankruptcy has been in the area of farm implement dealers. Certainly farming creates an enormous amount of employment. The opportunity for people interested in becoming trained in the agricultural field is shrinking. It is drifting away rapidly because the government is not finding ways to protect farmers from bankruptcies, to ensure that those assets and producing units remain intact, to ensure that opportunities for young people exist, and to ensure that the training is in place.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) has often mentioned fishermen and the tremendous problem of bankruptcies in the fisheries. There are industries associated with fishing such as shipbuilding, processing and handling the product. Essentially many firms are closing down. There have been bankruptcies and other difficulties. Banks and financial institutions have been seizing the mechanisms by which these people earn their livelihoods, many of whom have worked all their lives in that area. This is another source of employment for young people and others which is drying up. Ultimately training programs in this area will disappear.

I have referred to bankruptcies in the fishing industry and the other tremendous problems with which it is faced because the bill before us today and the national training program of the minister referred a great deal to native Canadians and their access to the economy. This disadvantaged group does not have access to the economy. On the coast of British Columbia an important economic opportunity for native people is the fishing industry. A large number of them are involved in the salmon enhancement program which is being rapidly destroyed by high interest and inflation rates, as well as by the failure and mismanagement of government.

I should like to deal for a moment with home owners. Individuals are losing their homes, the most important possession of their lives. Again this is because of government policies. There are many low-income and medium-income individuals out there who cannot acquire homes and need decent accommodation. Because of the shortfall in housing units, this is perhaps one sector of the economy in which employment could be created by developing a rational housing program aimed at meeting the needs of Canadians who are desperately trying to hold on to their homes or to acquire affordable housing. It would provide tremendous opportunity for employment. Many programs today have been training plumbers, framers, carpenters, pipefitters and surveyors for the housing industry. There could be a tremendous opportunity in this area, but those programs will be for nought if the government does not straighten out its priorities.

Over the last year we have seen the pain and agony of individuals who are facing the block. Many small businesses, home owners, farmers and individuals have gone bankrupt. Also there has been a serious problem with the number of unemployed people in the country. We have watched major corporations such as the automobile industry go through tremendous changes and shifts in employment. The availability of that sector for trained people is disappearing, but there are still more to go. For example, it looks like Dome is hanging on by its fingernails. It was the great hope of the Canadian Government. The Liberal majority was looking seriously at the energy sector as a place in which to create opportunity. We see that sector in difficult straits. It is either backing away from major projects or facing difficulty, with bankruptcy looming around the corner. With examples like the Admiral Appliance Company, the auto industry, Dome Petroleum and Massey Ferguson, we might find in a short period of time that it is not individuals, small businessmen, fishermen and farmers who with go bankrupt, but that in fact the major corporations of this country may go down the chute because of mismanagement, high interest rates and the collapse of markets. These are the major employers who provide opportunity for training and the ones on whom we will count to pull the economy out of the ditch.

The previous speaker, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), mentioned that the training program which is before us today was largely based on a report from an employee of Employment and Immigration entitled "Challenge for An Uncertain Decade". That particular report, on which the national training program was based, had the underlying assumption that Canadians would find job expansion in western Canada and in the resource industries. These opportunities presumably would come from resource extraction and the sale of raw materials. This is not a new industry to those areas even though expansion occurs.

Much has been made of energy. I would like to deal with the forest industry for a moment. I believe that this industry provides an example of the dilemma faced by training and employment and of how faulty is the approach to extracting resources and selling them in an unprocessed state. There are about a dozen major pulp and paper mills on the coast of British Columbia. There are a number of saw mills and some plywood mills as well. There is also a large number of people who earn their living in the forests of British Columbia. The climate of the logging industry at the present time is flat. There are very few people employed in that industry, and some mills have closed because of the stagnant housing industry.

The pulp and paper industry, which was one of the strongest sectors in this country, is hovering on the edge of bankruptcy in many cases or is at least in a very restrained situation where there are no employment opportunities.

What has brought this about is the fact that we have been relying on foreign ownership in many cases or on foreign corporations to do the marketing for our companies and those markets have now disappeared. In many cases our forest resources have been abused to such an extent that the industry will not be able to provide for jobs in the future. One of the aspects of the megaprojects was the suggestion that major forest projects would provide an opportunity for employment. That opportunity will not exist unless the government moves very quickly to enhance those forests, to develop a forest products marketing board, and to move into the international field for the sale of forest products. If this is not done and we do not reconsider foreign control of our resource, we will be in very serious difficulty.

Another unique aspect of the forest industry was that a great deal of training was not required in order to gain employment. At the same time, however, pulp mills and saw mills hired enormous numbers of trained people. Instead of training them, these companies would go somewhere else in Canada to steal them from other regions. If you were to visit a plywood mill or a pulp mill on the coast of British Columbia, you would find a sign on the front gate saying, "Do not bother to apply for employment. If you are looking for employment, go down to the local Canada immigration office and get in." Tradesmen, however, could apply directly to the personnel office. The result was that these basic institutions in British Columbia, which were the mainstay of the B.C. economy, were not training a sufficient number of people or providing for the skill base upon which those highly technical operations are run. There was a tremendous shortage which was causing a problem. It is not a problem today since there are probably as many unemployed tradesmen in the forest industry in British Columbia as there are production workers. Tradesmen would have as difficult a time obtaining employment in any sector of the forest industry today as an unskilled production worker would.

One of the most tragic incidents involves those apprentices who have almost finished their program but have been laid off. As a result, their apprenticeships are in jeopardy of being lost.

If Mr. Dodge and the Liberal government are seriously considering continuing this approach to resource exploitation and the sale of raw resources, I suggest that it will not work. That area of the country faces a very serious situation. The employment opportunities within energy and the fishing industry are also in serious jeopardy. This is largely due to government mismanagement.

Another concern I have is native communities. It is interesting to note that this legislation identifies native people as a disadvantaged group. Certainly that is obvious to anyone who knows that native communities experience unemployment at a rate anywhere from 75 per cent to 90 per cent. Native communities do not need training; they need job opportunities.

A number of native communities along the coast of British Columbia have applied for forestry licences in order to establish an economic base from which to work. They have been told by the government, "No thanks. There is no forestry licence for you." What is the point of training these native people as forestry workers when Crown Zellerbach and Rayonier are laying people off and there are no employment opportunities? If natives in their own communities had licences they would have an opportunity to work.

Native communities have applied for roe on kelp licences and the government has told them, "No, thank you." Natives have asked for special consideration regarding fishing licences in order to have an opportunity to enter into the fishing industry, and they have been refused.

An interesting example involves one native community which exists side by side with a white community. An airport is being developed in that area. The native community is 10 to 20 times larger and is more permanent since the other one fluctuates in size. However, does the airport go to the native community which has been trying to get it for years? No, it goes to the other community which may go bankrupt and disappear. The airport is on an island about half a mile away. The cost of marine transportation and food makes the opportunity to create businesses in many of those native communities tremendously expensive.

A final interesting example concerns the fact that many native communities in British Columbia were not allowed any input into the budgeting process this year. They were given a period of two weeks in which to make any input into the budget-making process which directly affected their communities with respect to economic development and job creation. This created an absolutely hopeless situation when you consider the number of native people in British Columbia.

The point I am making is that there is no sense in training native people if the government continues to destroy an economic base which results in 75 per cent to 90 per cent of native people remaining unemployed. What is the point of having unemployed trained people?

There is a desperate need for a strategy to create economic development for native people so that young native Canadians will have the same opportunities as Canadians in other parts of the country.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the most alarming aspect of this act is the name with which it will end, namely, the national training program. This immediately puts one in mind of a number of other nationally oriented programs brought in by this government, particularly the National Energy Program. It is to be hoped that this new national training program does not cause such severe negative effects as its predecessor in the energy field.

I must admit that I can see many undesirable elements within the legislation before us. From a broad political point of view, I am disturbed that this act exemplifies once again the government's desire to intrude upon areas which are not traditionally within federal authority or competence. I am alarmed, too, that these new laws which will emanate from this act will allow the federal government to apply its criteria and decision-making to what should truly be national priorities and objectives in the educational job-training fields. It will allow the federal government to designate critical national occupations and channel special funding and accelerated training schemes into these areas. It will allow the federal government to pursue social policies and programs through what should be a purely pragmatic industrial and institutionally based series of measures to better prepare working Canadians for the future.

What this measure proposes to establish is yet another Ottawa-based self-contained bureaucratic empire which will pump out unmanageable, unworkable and completely unrealistic studies, programs, plans, rules and regulations—especially rules and regulations—which will all ultimately lead to the old Ottawa law of diminishing returns. The good effects of the billion dollars or so which it is contemplated will be pumped into the national training program will be finally dissipated and diminished simply because an Ottawa-devised and administered program cannot possibly satisfy the local and regional needs of the Canadian economy. It cannot possibly interlock smoothly with existing provincial, institutional and industrial programs.

The whole philosophy behind this initiative depends on the Liberal government's view that it should no longer be merely a clearing house for tax money on its way to the regions. This national training program is simply the latest in a series of initiatives, all designed to increase the power and influence of the central government throughout the length and breadth of the country, in all economic sectors and at all levels of regional governments. As usual, this government is putting its own priorities of political survival before the country's priorities of national economic and social survival. It feels that its own influence and its own profite can be increased measurably by wresting the control and development of our labour force from the educational institutions and from the provinces. It is doing this, or attempting to do it, by changing parts of the basic funding and administrative arrangements now in place, which traditionally have adapted to our changing labour force requirements.

I am not saying that Canada in the future will not face serious problems with respect to her labour force requirements. It is obvious to everyone, especially to our technology and engineering-based industries, that we face extremely serious shortages in the skilled trades categories and that these shortages must be filled if our economy is ever going to approach its full potential.

I can certainly agree with the minister, for example, when he states in his paper that there have been "structural changes in the economy" which are having a profound impact on Canadian labour markets, and that these changes have resulted in "serious and chronic shortages in many highly qualified and higher level industrial skill occupations".

Certainly no one has to be told that in my own riding of Peterborough where fully one third of our labour force is employed by 70 manufacturing-industrial plants. Indeed, they are the very sort of operations which the minister says will benefit most from this new program. I can tell him that the 10 per cent of our 30,000 person total labour force who are unemployed fervently hope that the bill will do exactly that. And yet, how much confidence can Canadians put in their federal government at this time? Why should they take heart from these proposals and suddenly become convinced that the federal government is finally trying to do something that will work and which will put them back to work? Look at what the minister says to justify his program, which contemplates the redistribution of nearly $1 billion dollars a year. We will touch on the subject of redistribution of $1 billion a little later. He says, for example, that the federal government must respond to emerging labour needs because, "Major resource development projects are contemplated in all regions of the country." Are they indeed? I need not remind anyone in the House of the fiasco that has already occurred as a result of the National Energy Program, especially with regard to three of our largest resource development projects in the west. Would the minister care to ask the residents of Fort MacMurray, for example, what labour shortages they contemplate as a result of the National Energy Program? And, of course, Ontario, including my own riding, has suffered very much as well as a result of lost business which should have flowed from megaprojects in the west. Now the minister's colleagues are trying to scupper similar energy development in the maritimes.

It saddens me to say so, but the point is that the minister's plans for his national training program were made when there was still a reasonable chance that these western projects would come on line. The government's interventionist policies have effectively put an end to these for the foreseeable future and have actually aggravated the total unemployment situation in Canada. The minister now finds himself in the ironic situation of putting forward this grandiose plan to train people for highly skilled jobs which do not now exist and which will probably not appear as long as his government puts its own interests ahead of the wellbeing of the country.

Many might say to me, "Yes, but we must do something in the present climate to respond to the requirements of new industries and technologies which may eventually help us out of this mess." That is true. But first I would say in reply; be very sure you realize what got us into this mess in the first place. It was not "the world" or "the recession" or "the energy crisis" or any single excuse which we hear from the other side. Indeed, it was no single reason, but a combination of them, all significant, which have caused Canada to fall from the second highest standard of living in the world to the fourteenth in the short space of 14 years—a spot for every year the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been in power. But people must also be aware that, along with all the other radical changes which have affected our society in the past 20 years, this federal government is right up there as one of the most counter-productive elements in the total equation.

The minister has correctly identified chronic shortages in many highly skilled industrial occupations and has put his plan forward as his government's single most important attempt to alleviate them. Do keep in mind that the whole positive effect of his plan is dependent on the revitalization of the economy through a dramatic drop in interest rates, inflation and so on. It will not, in itself, contribute to reactivated industrial activity, but will only come into play after the economy has enjoyed a major period of recovery. It would be useful, however, for parliamentarians for once to learn from the past and not be tempted to approve programs which have the gloss of currency but which will be redundant within a few years.

In Canada, procurement of skilled labour has come primarily through immigration, training within industry such as apprenticeship programs, government manpower training programs involving the private sector, or graduates of community colleges and post-secondary institutions. Before 1960 especially, the declining agricultural sector along with heavy immigration patterns provided adequate labour for a resource-based pattern of economic growth, as Canada had then. As a result, there was little pressure for our educational institutions to provide vocational training and we paid the price for this when, in the late fifties and early sixties, highly-skilled workers were in short supply.

In the mid-sixties, despite government immigration policies to the contrary, there was a measurable decline in the proportion of skilled workers coming into the country, and Canada's potential economic-industrial growth and development was again arrested. Certain things were realized in the sixties, however, and a major expansion of university and college enrolment occurred, student populations rising two and a half times between 1961 and 1971. A similar though slightly lesser expansion occurred in non-university enrolment during the same period.

Since the great numbers of allegedly unemployable university graduates started to flood the labour market in the early seventies, both provincial and federal governments have launched a number of institutionally-based programs designed to bridge the gaps between basic secondary school training, post-secondary training, and productive roles in the job market, productive for individuals and productive for the country.

Indeed, the precursor of this bill, the Adult Occupational Training Act, was an example of this, and it worked reasonably well within the limits of its design. However, as experts in the industrial-employment sector have pointed out, instead of providing truly relevant and useful educational alternatives to institutionalized forms of training at the college and university level, these programs merely constituted "short-term manpower policy instruments to alleviate temporary skill imbalances", provided retraining opportunities for marginal workers, and offered alternatives to the UIC rolls. These hardly addressed the major long-term staffing needs of Canadian industry and indeed, as we see now, these programs just could not hold up in the face of a rapidly-changing industrial world. This is not to say that colleges alone can provide the full range of skilled workers that we need today if we are to have any hope of benefiting from the recovery if and when it comes. Colleges can take up a good deal of the slack in areas such as service occupations and production crafts such as tool and dye making. The major input of federal funds must be put where it will do the most good but at the same time without causing detrimental effects to our post-secondary education sector which is absolutely crucial to the national good.

In the sixties and seventies, only 5 to 15 per cent of government manpower programs were conducted in concert with the private sector. Between 1966 and 1970, industrial firms reporting some form of in-house training actually declined from 26 per cent to 23 per cent. In the manufacturing sector, only one firm in five provided some source of training. In all of this, only 16 per cent of those being trained by industry itself were female. I must say that I am glad some sort of assertive action element is to be included in this act, not only on behalf of Canadian women but also on behalf of our native populations and disabled workers.

It is clear that skilled-labour training needs are not being fulfilled either by institutionalized training or by traditional immigrant sources of skilled workers. Canadian wages are now too low. It is clear too that the lack of commitment to industry-based training schemes has resulted in skilled worker shortages in a number of occupations.

The principal point of attack to alleviate this situation is at the industry level and guided by a philosophy of co-operative training between the private sector and our educational institutions. This does not mean that the government should reallocate resources from universities to other institutions or to private sector training schemes in light of labour changing conditions. We have seen that such a policy is shortsighted in the extreme. What it means is that the errors and imbalances of the past should be neither repeated nor sustained, and that the federal strategy should promote a stable multi-level education level where short-term labour demands can be absorbed without the huge lurches which have characterized federal government policy in recent years as it responds to current, high profile, but not necessarily crucial pressures.

As the OECD recently observed about Canada's training policies, the general tone of policy-making is adaptation to short-term pressures, doing a little more of what already has been done and, above all, response to pressures or economies and reductions of expenditures.

The point is that nothing should be done to endanger the integrity of our institutions of higher learning for the sake of what may be very short-term labour market pressures. At the same time, the private sector should be encouraged and made aware of the very great potential benefits to be had from an internally-trained, highly-skilled and fully adaptable labour force. The bill before us does neither of these things, either philosophically or pragmatically.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will speak for only five minutes. I do not want to take a lot of time. I know that people are eager to have the bill go to committee. With that in mind, I will keep my remarks shorter than I intended.

I am a little puzzled and somewhat perplexed by the expression "occupational training". I have wondered about it since I was 15 years old. I went to a technical high school and was trained to do certain technical things. Although they served me well in terms of being able to analyse problems of a mechanical nature, what served me better was that in the process I received an education.

I am not sure that the norms and practices of years gone by of training people for specific jobs is a very satisfactory way of proceeding today. There are far too many changes in the workplace for anyone to be able to make an accurate analysis of what might be considered adequate training for any young or not so young person in an effort to provide them with the skills necessary to enable them to lead a reasonable life through their working years. I do not know what you would offer a young person in terms of advice, even if you can provide them with training. I have two sons. One is now almost 21 and the other is coming on 20. For the past six years I have been thinking about what kind of advice to give them in terms of where they should go for their future, what kind of training and education they should take, what are the job possibilities and how long they would last. If they were to start a training program today, would they still have that same job opportunity after having completed three or four years of occupational or other kinds of training?

I have come to the conclusion that, with few exceptions, the answer to the question is no. There likely would be no jobs for them, even if you were to make some kind of analysis today as to what kind of job availability and job market there was. At the moment I do not know what we would urge young people to train for. I do not know what kind of training we would give them, what kind of suggestion we would make with regard to it. The question is, training to do what?

There is a tremendous problem in Canada. To a great extent it rests with companies not recognizing and planning for the future. Too many companies found it far too easy to reach offshore to find individuals who had the necessary basic skills and could make the transition to employment in Canada. As a result, far too many major and not so many major corporations had no training or on the job program that would raise the skill levels of people in their operation.

If you were trying to run a manpower centre, for example, the kind of co-operation you would need from a broad cross-section of the manufacturers in this country would not be forthcoming. There is no willingness on the part of the vast majority of manufacturers to offer to those people who must co-ordinate the educational process what the future holds in their particular field of endeavour. They are afraid to sit down and openly discuss their plans for the future for fear they might give their competition some kind of insight into where they are going and how they propose to get there. Therefore, it is awfully difficult to imagine how we will ever get these training programs in place and get them to work satisfactorily.

I realize it is almost six o'clock. There is much more I would like to say, but I will not. I do want to say that I have come to the realization that the best possible thing we can do for our young people is to give them the maximum—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief, as I have to go to a finance committee to discuss matters of interest rates. I do want, first of all, to go back to my last sentence when I ended at six o'clock. I ended on a word that would make no sense to anyone if they were to read what I was saying. I am not sure that many people in the country would read it anyway, but that is not important.

An hon. Member: You never know.

Mr. Deans: I have come to the realization that the best possible thing that we can do for young people in particular is to give them the broadest, most comprehensive amount of general education. I want to see a system that opens up their minds to the widest possible scope of occupations, that provides them with the opportunities to learn about and to use the latest and the most innovative equipment. In that way, as time passes their aptitude to use that equipment and their interest in pursuing a line of endeavour that would either fit into or not fit into the areas of education provided to them would become clear.

I believe we must do more to encourage the major employers to become part of that integrated program I am speaking of, to give them that sense of national purpose. When speaking about education in the broadest possible sense, or training in the more narrow sense, one realizes that there is an obligation on employers at every level to be co-operative. They should make available the opportunities for not so young people who may be going through the retraining process, or young people going through a training process, to go into the work place and actually see in operation the equipment they are being educated to use or training to use, depending on your use of the words.

We must make sure that on the job training is not simply a training in in-house skills that might just fit one employer but that rather it is a more universally portable training. In that manner, it would allow more insight to persons who may be in a general way defined as pipefitters—for want of a better term or better occupation—but who find that what they were taught to deal with in one particular company by one set of employers really does not fit them for employment with anyone else, because the practices used by one employer are so vastly different from the practices used by another employer.

We must try to instil across the land the sense that there is by far a greater range of occupational opportunity that will come the way of the vast majority of people and that they ought not to be narrow in their focus. The example I would give is that, prior to coming to Ottawa, it would not have occurred to me to suggest to any one of my three children that they should consider language training in order that they could become Hansard reporters or in order that they could become interpreters or perhaps so that they could travel to the United Nations and become interpreters there. It is a skill that would not have occurred to me and I am sure would not have occurred to the majority of parents. In fact, it brings to mind that today I noted with some interest that in the Conservative Party, during the question period today, a number of their members rose in their places and in addressing the Chair they did so in French. In fact, one of their members—from Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), I believe—offered his first question in French.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: That was commendable in the first instance and was a little surprising, quite frankly, because it does not happen every day. I wondered why, and then I realized all of a sudden what the reason was: this is the first step into bed with the PQ. That is what it was. This is their initial foray into the unholy alliance of separatism.

The Conservatives have recognized that language training is a skill, an occupational skill which is required in this line of work. There they were, they were prepared to a person—I would have said "to a man" but I guess I had better not use that any more—they were prepared to a person, even in the crudest of terms—and in fact, frankly, their use of the language was almost as bad as my own—they were prepared to follow the lead of René Lévesque, who on the weekend invited them to join him in the cause of separation for the province of Quebec. I can see it emerging now. To be honest, I thought to myself it was strange it had not dawned on me before that this was happening. Then I remembered the battle at the end of the constitutional debate when they were in bed with Mr. Lévesque, and I thought, no, I should have twigged to it then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member, I call to his attention the subject of the bill before us.

Mr. Skelly: We are talking about training.

Mr. Deans: What I am speaking about is the training process that is made available in order, presumably, that one can widen one's opportunities. Just as my family might be encouraged to undertake language training, it is clear to me that the Conservatives have twigged to this early and decided that kind of training would be very useful to them and that over the course of the next two years we will see more and more of this as they pursue that unholy alliance, that attempt to divide this country and that power-at-any-cost thrust, and as they attempt to find common ground with the PQ in this effort to destroy the country.

In any event, I use that as an example of how anyone could take advantage of this kind of thing. I go back to my initial comments. There does not seem to me to be much doubt that training in the traditional sense no longer fits the needs and that for some that fond dream of becoming a skilled journeyman which will guarantee a man or a woman the opportunity to provide for himself or herself is not nearly as valid as it was some years ago. It is therefore important, if this program is to work at all, that it be a joint effort. There must be a significant contribution by employers. They have to be more open in their approach. They have to be prepared to offer the people who are doing the educational planning the widest possible scope in terms of information and access to the machinery of the day. They have to work out with the government an alliance not unlike the alliance the Tories and the PQ are working out together in an effort to undermine the country.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, we in the New Democratic Party are very concerned about this bill. It was developed without any real consultation with provincial governments. Most of us in the House recognize—it appears there are a few members in the government party who do not recognize it—that this matter is a concern which should be approached with the participation of the provincial governments. Most of us recognize that there is a real need for the federal government and the provincial governments to make sure our community colleges and other training institutions provide the type of training we need to meet the job opportunities that will be available to Canadians in the future. When the minister announced this program, the provincial ministers responsible were surprised at what the minister had in store. They were surprised for a very simple reason. They were surprised because the minister did not consult them.

Mr. Bujold: That is not true.

Mr. Murphy: If that is not true, one of the members of the government can tell us about that afterwards. The minister announced this program just prior to meeting with the provincial ministers. The point is that if we are to develop the types of programs we need so that we no longer will have to import 30,000 or 40,000 people from offshore, the only way we can do that is with co-operation between the provincial governments and the federal government.

Every year we hear about the number of trained people we need for jobs that are available. Last year the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) told us we needed approximately 30,000 people to fill the skilled job requirements of the western provinces. We recognize that with the downturn of the economy of western Canada we may not need 30,000 people at the present time. We may need only 20,000 or 25,000 people. But skilled Canadians to do those jobs are not available. The number may be fewer than the 30,000 the minister said were needed, but 20,000 jobs could nevertheless be filled by Canadians. It is not as if this were something new. It is not as if all of a sudden we discovered we needed skilled engineers, skilled mechanics, industrial mechanics and people in a number of other professions and trades. We have known that for years. If we do not have co-operation between the provincial governments and the federal government, we will never train the people we need. As the spokesman in my party for federal-provincial relations I feel it is unfortunate that I must point out that this is another example of the federal government's having made no serious attempt to talk with the provincial governments in an effort to come up with a training scheme which would meet the needs of each and every one of our provinces and the needs of the nation as a whole and make sure our young people are trained for the jobs we need.

You know, Mr. Speaker, as do most Canadians, that a large number of young people are unemployed in this country. The latest statistics indicate that over 20 per cent of the young people in Canada do not have jobs. Those same statistics indicate that a majority of young people are not getting the kind of training they need to do the jobs which are available.

The minister's statement of last year is just an indication of the problem. Why in the name of this country should we have to import 20,000, 25,000 or 30,000 people for western Canada alone? After all the dollars the Canadian government and the provincial governments have put into occupational training, why should we have to import that number of people to meet the demand for trained, skilled people? Our unemployment rate grows every day; we all know that. The unemployment rates among the young, women, natives and the handicapped are so high that it is obvious the Canadian government should be acting. What we need is a bill to meet that need, a bill that is shared by and agreed upon by the provincial governments and the federal government. But the bill before us tonight represents just another step taken by this Liberal government. It ignores the real need of Canadians.

Let me give an example of this, Mr. Speaker. Two years ago in its budget the government set up a Western Development Fund. That fund was supposed to provide jobs for western Canada and to provide development for western Canada. But nothing happened, Mr. Speaker. One year later the same government and the same Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) announced in the budget of November 12 that the Western Development Fund would receive only half the money that had been allotted to it in the previous budget. I should remind hon. members that not one cent of that money was spent between the fall of 1980 and the fall of 1981. It was a big budget item of $4 billion but not one cent of the money was spent. In the budget in the fall of 1981 there was a rehash of the announcement but with only half as much money. The money was supposed to create development in western Canada and, presumably, to provide the jobs that people would need.

We were told that a certain amount of the money would be allocated to the province of jobs for native people. But now, some seven months later, there are no funds, there is no agreement and there are no programs. In one year the amount was reduced from $4 billion to $2 billion, and in the seven months following that nothing happened.

Tonight we have before us a training bill which deals with native unemployment and the problems that affect Canada as a whole. All I can say is that if there was a budgetary item over a year and a half ago providing for $4 billion and then the same budgetary item was reduced to $2 billion in the budget of last November 12, the fact that the bill before us today supports to do certain things in the area of training does not impress me. Let us see the specific programs for once. Let the parliamentary secretary explain that when he gets up to speak. We want to see the specific programs that prove the government is committed to providing jobs for native people.

I had the opportunity to study political science under the Minister of Employment and Immigration when he was a professor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LeBlanc: Even teachers make mistakes!

Mr. Murphy: I agree with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc)—even the minister makes mistakes! His mistake was not in picking his students but in saying that the government is responsible for providing leadership. Leadership is not speeches, it is not press releases, it is not announcing a program that is not fulfilled. Leadership is providing the economic direction, the regulations, the programs to fulfil what a government promises. We have not had that, Mr. Speaker. Thirty per cent of the population of my riding of Churchill are native people, Mr. Speaker. Amongst the native population the unemployment rate is probably over 80 per cent. This bill and last year's budget and the budget before that were full of promises, but what does all that mean? Is the government really offering a new program or is this just another program in which it promises so much and delivers so little?

The native people in my riding, the young people in my riding whether white or native, want a training program that will provide them with jobs and with some hope in the future. I do not want to make a long speech, Mr. Speaker, but if this program had any substance at all, then the minister would speak about it. If this program offered something worthwhile to the nation as a whole the minister would have negotiated with his provincial counterparts to make sure that everyone works for the same objective. If this program were worthwhile, the minister would get up in the House and explain what the future holds for Canadians.

I believe, as I am sure many people do, especially the unemployed, that the government is bankrupt of plans. There are all these programs the government talks about, such as the Western Development Fund and a new program announced today, but again there are no specific plans for fulfilling them. We recognize that there are problems all over the world and that we are tied into the United States' market, but if the government had some concrete plans perhaps we could solve the problems that the country faces.

I will give a specific example of the problems we face when dealing with the government, Mr. Speaker. Last April the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky) and I met with the provincial minister of northern affairs to discuss the Northlands agreement. It is just a small part of the economic strategy of the government but in the last five years it provided $155 million for the northern part of the Province of Manitoba, most of which I represent. That is not a large part of the Canadian budget, Mr. Speaker. There is a shared agreement, 60 per cent to come from the federal government and 40 per cent to come from the province. The agreement is significant to the people of northern Manitoba however, particularly the native people. We were told there would be a follow-up meeting with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the provincial minister of northern affairs and that an attempt would be made to solve the Northlands agreement. We were told by the federal minister that that meeting would occur in the last week of April or the first week in May. Here we are at the end of the second week in June and the meeting has not taken place yet, we have been told by the provincial minister that he is available at all times. As I said earlier, $155 million may not be a large amount in the Canadian budget, but if we really believed we are going to help develop those parts of Canada which are underprivileged and provide training for those who need it, then the Canadian government would have that meeting. The minister was at the previous meeting where the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce promised this meeting. If this government were serious, that meeting would have taken place and this training program would provide the specifics to ensure that we do not have to import another 30,000 people three or four years down the road.

Two years ago I spoke with a master mechanic in the Manitoba forest industry in The Pas. He had been trained in Sweden, came over to Canada as a foreman, and he looked around and said there is not one person in this province that is trained to work on these machines. He talked about the intricacies of his own training in a program within what we would call a community college, and a training program in the industry he went to. He talked about all of that and said there are just no Canadians available. So part of the 30,000 people who must be brought to Canada are filling the need that this man was speaking about. I do not believe this program will meet that need, a very small one but very representative of the problems that we as Canadians face. I spent many years as a teacher and guidance counsellor for high school students. It was very upsetting to me to say that there are no programs in Canada. Certainly you can go to Red River Community College in Manitoba, or Keewatin or Assiniboine and take a program, but it is a very limited program and you will have trouble getting in because there are not enough places available to meet the needs of students in Manitoba.

Yet when I go to Winnipeg and talk with the professors, lecturers and instructors they say all of their graduates can get work. So what we are saying is, let's work together to develop these programs. Let us not have the minister make an announcement and then go to a meeting with the responsible provincial ministers. Let us have programs where the provinces and the federal government work together to meet the needs of Canadians. Let us have programs which will give our young people some hope for their future and one which will give Canadians hopes for our collective future.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me begin my remarks by indicating that I am in basic agreement with the intent of Bill C-115 as expressed in clause 3 which is:

—to establish a national program to provide occupational training for the labour force—

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, few could argue with that kind of purpose, and I know previous speakers for the Progressive Conservative Party have indicated their concurrence with that basic purpose of the bill. But at the same time we would be remiss in our duties to the Canadian public and our constituents and the people who must be served by this kind of legislation if we did not point out, in very dramatic and graphic terms, the drawbacks contained in this legislation which will cause problems perhaps for generations in the future. We know that once legislation of this kind is enacted it has a tendency to stay on the statute books for decade after decade without substantial change. We fear that possibility. So I rise to bring home again the features of this bill which ought to be underlined because they will create difficulties in the future.

The basic mistake in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that it neglects the principle of co-operative federalism on which this country was built and on which most of our institutions rely. We have in Canada an educational system which has been developed as a mosaic over a long period of time. It consists of grade schools operated by municipalities, high schools operated by school boards across the country, and post-secondary education supported by private institutions, in many cases with the assistance of government. What the Government of Canada proposes to do in this legislation is to embark on its own course of action; one which is not based on the mosaic of our educational system and which is not the product of consultation with the provincial authorities who are charged with the management of that system in their provinces. This is not the first time the government has backed away from the principle of co-operative federalism; it culminated in a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not too long ago that co-operative federalism was dead. By bringing forward a bill purporting to establish a national program to provide for occupational training, the government has again confirmed that statement by the Prime Minister.

What price will we pay for killing co-operative federalism? We will destroy many of the educational institutions we have built up over a long period of time. The promoters of this bill, including the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr.

Axworthy), have to take responsibility for that. They have to take responsibility for the fact they did not call together those interested persons in the provinces for consultations, and ask them: What kind of occupational training program should we have in this country? What should be the thrust of federal assistance in this field? Through our work in the provinces we know it was provinces like Nova Scotia who pioneered in the field of adult training at a time when it was simply not available to those who had left the school system. The knowledge which they have built up over a long period of time could greatly benefit the constitution and construction of a national training program, but the minister chose not to take that course of action. He chose to go it alone, so to speak, to impart and place the federal will on all provinces, and to say, "Here is the program. Here is what we think it should be. You will have to live with it".

If they continue to take that kind of attitude at the federal level to the involvement of the provinces in matters of common interest, they will destroy the whole basis of federalism in Canada. Surely the constitutional process taught us that. Surely the constitutional process, through which we have just gone has shown the error of unilateral action on the part of the federal authority. Surely the federal authority realizes that the road to successful programs is co-operation and consultation with the provinces, leading to a program which is acceptable to all involved. It was amazing to realize, having gone through the constitutional process and having seen the havoc which it would have wreaked across Canada and the potential harm it would have done, had we not at the last moment sought the concordance of the provinces to the constitutional changes. What irreparable harm could have been done to Canada and the people of Canada.

I want to leave that point by underlining once again that co-operative federalism must be brought back to life in the country, and it must be brought back to life by the persons who form the government. They must abandon the position taken by the Prime Minister that co-operative federalism is dead. They must take every action possible to bring it back to life, and they will not do it by bringing forward legislation like Bill C-115 which does not have the support and the agreement of the provinces across Canada.

We in the PC party are often accused of carrying the case for the provinces, of wanting a Canada which does not have a strong federal authority. I do not believe in that kind of Canada. I do not believe in a kind of Canada which has a federal authority that simply imposes its will from coast to coast without consultation with the legitimate, democratically-elected governments of the provinces, whether it be the New Democratic government which was recently elected in the Province of Manitoba or the government which was re-elected in the Province of Newfoundland. They are all democratically-elected governments, the same as this government represented in the House of Commons was democratically elected. They must share in the Government of Canada. They must co-operate and bring things to a rational conclusion. Otherwise, there will be turmoil and upset in the country. We only have to look to the Province of Quebec to see what happens when the federal authority and the provincial authority lock horns. Who could possibly gain from that kind of confrontation? We have yet to live through that chapter of our history where we see all those Liberals gathered in the Province of Quebec and gathered in the House of Commons ending in complete disagreement on the course of action which ought to be followed in the country. The government is starting down a road which does not involve co-operative federalism. In the words of the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, it has gone down a road which has no ashcans. They will have to bear the responsibility for that course of action.

The reason for bringing forward the measures contained in Bill C-115 surely is the drastic unemployment situation which exists in Canada today. It is trite to say that we have an unemployment rate in excess of 10 per cent. It is trite to say that we have a million and a quarter persons unemployed in Canada. Believe it or not, the situation is even worse than that.

In addition to the one and a quarter million officially unemployed in Canada, there are at least another 250,000 persons who are no longer looking for work. They live in areas like Nova Scotia and Newfoundland where they know there are no jobs available, so they simply stop looking for work; they stay home and find other means of occupying themselves. There is a quarter of a million people like that in Canada who have lost the hope of obtaining employment. Across the country there are an additional 300,000 persons who are working at jobs much below their qualifications, such as school teachers who work in restaurants and engineers who seek minor roles in engineering offices. They are depressed by the situation in which they find themselves. They have all the qualifications. They have worked hard to obtain those qualifications, but they cannot have the kind of work and employment which those qualifications ought to allow them to have. We have to add them on to the list of unemployed.. In addition, there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are employed part-time. They cannot find full-time jobs, so they work at jobs which only provide payment for a portion of their available time. We must include those in the rolls of the unemployed. When we add them up, there are probably as many as 800,000 people in that position. When we are talking about the unemployed in Canada, we are not only talking about the million and a quarter who are officially unemployed. We are talking about the quarter of a million who have given up looking for work, over a quarter of a million who are working at less than their qualifications, another 800,000 or so persons across Canada who are working part-time and cannot find work to fill their available time. When we add up all these numbers, we do not come to a million and a quarter; we come to a figure well over two million Canadians. We must bear in mind that the work force in Canada numbers only about 11 million Canadians, so almost 25 per cent of the work force in Canada have unemployment problems. This is why the minister must rush into the House of Commons and claim to be doing something about unemployment in Canada.

What should he have been doing? His own parliamentary committee, which was constituted as a task force a year or so ago, produced a report entitled, "Work for Tomorrow—Employment Opportunities for the Eighties". It gave us a damning indictment of what has transpired in government circles over the last decade in creating training to allow Canadians to meet the changes in the economy. The document faults the government for not having started proper programs years ago, in fact decades ago. Anyone who lives in Canada could see technological changes occurring, and anybody in Canada knows that ten years ago people could not work at the jobs with which they have traditionally found employment in the past.

What was it doing to change it? The parliamentary task force dealing with employment opportunities for the 1980s came up with many recommendations, but only one of its minor recommendations was included in the bill. One fault which we must demonstrate and underline with respect to Bill C-115 is that it goes only a little way toward resolving the problems in Canada.

There are other faults which could be found in the bill. As I indicated, it violates the educational system in Canada. It destroys the mosaic of educational services which have built up over a period of years. It puts many people in the educational system in jeopardy and it gives them concern. This bill does not specifically deal with university training programs, but if we talk to any university president in Canada, he or she will tell you—and in the case of the university in my constituency, Mount Saint Vincent is, of course, a women's college with a woman president; we are very proud of that—that the universities across Canada fear the Government of Canada. They fear its thrust into the field of education because it is not prepared to consult with the educational authorities, it is not prepared to deal with the realities, and it is not prepared to sit down to talk about the experiences of students over the last decade. It simply comes in with an ad hoc program which is designed to cure some evil, to allow them to issue a press release and to say that they are working to stop the problem. It does not appreciate the development of the educational system over the years. It does not appreciate the roles of universities and university administrators who have toiled at their task, in some cases for decades.

What sort of thing do they fear? They fear that the Government of Canada will step in and provide funds for very narrow programs, programs which its departmental advisers claim are needed but are not necessarily desired by those who have completed their secondary education. If we asked the president of Saint Mary's University in Halifax, Dr. Ozmon, he would tell us that the record and ability of university students to choose courses and to seek training which will qualify them for employment has been demonstrated time and time again over the years, that is to say, young Canadian people have the ability to educate themselves in such a way as to provide job training for the future. If we look at the records of universities across Canada—but I will use Saint Mary's in Halifax as an example—we will see the shift in student population from liberal arts courses and similar courses, which did not train persons directly for employment, to business courses such as commerce and economics. That shift has been demonstrated and is part of the records of universities across Canada. They know what to do. Canadian students and their advisers, the faculties of the universities and the secondary schools know how to direct the funds to provide training for the jobs which are available. The only time they need the advice of the government is when it is offered in a friendly, constructive and co-operative way. They do not need government direction; they need assistance. That is the warning which we want to give Canadians through the medium of the House of Commons in the debate of this bill. We want a government in Canada which co-operates. We want a government in Canada that helps the existing institutions. We do not need a government which simply introduces another program to deal with an existing problem on an ad hoc basis and without regard to what has taken place in the past or to what will happen in the future.

I would like to discuss for a moment the student aid program in Canada. If one has ever seen the provisions embodied in that program one would find a high level of bureaucratic action that worked. It is not hard to identify a student who needs aid. That student is simply someone who indicates that he wants to go to university or some other post-secondary institution and submits his financial situation to show that there is a deficit and that he needs some money. You do not need many definitions of what students are eligible. You do not need many definitions of what courses are included or what kind of institutions they can attend. This bill has simply turned what is a sensible program, backed by a desire to assist students in need, into a bureaucratic maze.

I can give an example of this from an actual case which I encountered. This person had worked for a number of years at what turned out to be a well-paying job in the sales field after completing high school. Now his employment has terminated. The current recession—some would say depression—has created a situation where jobs that were always thought to be secure are being lost. People who are losing their employment realize that there is no hope in the near future of returning to their jobs because their friends and neighbours are also experiencing it. They know that there are simply no jobs available as sales representatives or in similar occupations. Such a person, recognizing the difficulty and seeing that it is semi-permanent at best, takes the opportunity to seek further education. This gives him and people in similar situations the opportunity to qualify in another field. They take this opportunity to acquire the post-secondary education that they did not get after finishing high school. However, what do they find? They find a set of rules applying to students who are 18, 19 or 20 years of age. These rules simply do not apply to a married man who, after working a number of years, has acquired basic assets such as a car and furniture. They discover a rule which says that they must include their wife's income in order to determine their capacity to pay for their education. Although I do not know what the proponents of women's rights feel about this point, I never thought, as a husband, that my wife had any obligation to pay for my education. I do not know what other hon. members feel about their wife's obligation to assist in their education, but it is a fact that the rules applying to student aid programs presume that a Canadian wife has an obligation to pay for the education of her husband. Who created that rule? Is that based on any Christian ethic or any other religious ethic? I suggest that it is an idea simply conjured up by a bureaucrat who then wrote it on a piece of paper. As a result, this individual who is trying to solve his employment problem by using his lost time to develop his own employment capacity in the face of a deepening recession is confronted with a rule that stops him in his tracks. He might as well continue on unemployment insurance and seek whatever work he can find. His ability to resolve his problem on a more permanent basis is stopped by a bureaucratic regulation that no one ever thought of applying to this situation.

That is the danger of legislation which is so general. We do not know how it will apply to different situations. That is the danger of legislation which defines "occupational" in such general terms that it can only be imagined how it will be applied to particular situations.

When we see bills such as this which simply define occupational training in such general terms and state the purpose of the legislation in such general terms and then apply regulations to put the real meat on this legislative frame, we need to have a lot of faith in the government. You have to trust the government when it presents legislation such as that. I have to ask hon. members how they can trust this government's legislative proposals at this point in our history? How can we trust a government which had come forward with a constitutional proposal which was rejected by the provinces and subsequently took unilateral action to force that proposal on the people of Canada without the consent and concurrence of the duly elected provincial governments? How can a government such as that be trusted? How can it be trusted when it indicated it will keep energy prices at low levels but then turns around to increase prices dramatically beyond levels which anyone ever considered fair and proper.

When we are being asked to consider legislation which does not specify its contents and remains so general in form, we are being asked to trust the government. I do not believe that anyone on this side of the House or, in fact, anyone in Canada has any reason to trust the government with this or any other bill. That is why we rise in the House to convey that message to the people of Canada. That is why we rise to say that while we embrace the principle of a national training program for occupational training, at the same time we want to warn Canadians that this may not be the answer. It may only be another government hoax. There may be no funds available to set up proper programs which will resolve the problems.

What is needed in Canada is a great effort to create jobs. The only way to accomplish that in areas such as Atlantic Canada is through the implementation of projects and the restoration of the faith and confidence of the private sector in the economy of the region so as to allow them to do the job which they are capable of doing.

I would like to turn to other problems which exist in Atlantic Canada that necessitate such programs as the program for occupational training and other job-creation and training programs. It is evident in the very constitutional document which I spoke of that the government is prepared to declare war on regional disparity. The government said in its constitutional document that the Government of Canada as a matter of law was going to direct its energies toward an equalization program which will remove regional disparities.

I defy any member of the government to stand in the House and tell Canadians what the government has done since the enactment of the constitutional measure which was approved by the House in December of 1981 and officially enacted on April 17, 1982. What has the government done to remove regional disparity? I ask those hon. members to cite one piece of legislation it has introduced to implement the constitutional challenge to remove regional disparity.

Inaction is reflected again in this Bill C-115. There is no indication that funds will be directed to those areas which have the greatest need, particularly areas in Atlantic Canada where unemployment is the highest. It is an area where students graduating from high school, universities and other trade and educational institutions can find no employment. Student unemployment there is at the highest level in history. Students who rely on summer employment to provide themselves with the necessary funds to continue their education are unable to find any work. What will the government do about those situations? I believe this is the question which must be asked at any time when we consider legislation that purports to resolve any part of the unemployment or educational problem.

I repeat that we are asked to trust the government at the very time when the Minister of Employment and Immigration is coming before the House to ask it to approve a measure which will help people who are unemployed and seeking employment through the provision of educational programs. We must think of the actions taken by the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) cutting back vast amounts of money from the funds available to the provinces for post-secondary education. These were vast amounts of money which provinces like Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island cannot provide and simply must receive from the federal authority. The only alternative is to cut programs or raise taxes. That is exactly what the government is doing. That adds to the difficulties faced by people in the maritimes and other parts of Atlantic Canada. They have a federal government which is continually cutting back on the funds available to assist them in the educational field. They are actually worse off in 1982, this very month of June, than they were a year or two years ago. At the same time, the Government of Canada, through the constitutional document, has declared war on regional disparity. So, Mr. Speaker, what can you say about a government that says, on the one hand, "We are moving toward equalization and we are declaring war on regional disparity," while, on the other hand, it cuts off the very funds necessary to fight regional disparity and to create equality among the people of Canada?

Let me simply end by saying that the government is not kidding anyone any more. The Minister of Employment and Immigration is not kidding anyone any more. We see all the measures brought before this House of Commons in a suspicious light, that is to say, we must examine all these measures with great attention to their veracity. We must ask the question every time, does the government really mean this or is it just another hollow promise to rectify a deteriorating situation?

Let me say to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who sat in the House through some of this discussion, that I for one wish him well in his endeavours. I hope he succeeds in solving the tremendous problem of unemployment that we have across Canada. I hope he can come up with job-creation and educational programs which will help to relieve the situation. However, I also warn him not to look for any help from his colleagues in cabinet, from the Prime Minister, from the Minister of Finance or from the Secretary of State because the government is taking away from the ministers who might provide help and assistance the very funds which they must have to provide that assistance.

I say to the minister that it is good that the government allowed him to introduce this bill which purports to help people who need occupational training, but I hope that it will give the funds to back it up and I hope it really means to help. Even if the minister does, we still suspect his colleagues, so I hope the minister will watch them very carefully and report to this House if they give him the kind of difficulty in implementing this program that I am almost certain, as I stand here, they will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kempling: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, all countries with access to navigable waters have a ports policy which strives to meet their local, regional and national requirements and by which their ports are integrated within a broader and preferably multimodal transportation system, at both domestic and international levels. Although these policies may vary from country to country, they have in common a desire to reconcile local autonomy with the interests of the country in general. In fact, all countries with a ports policy try to reconcile these two spheres and interests. Bill C-92 cannot escape this imperative.

Canada is actually one of the world's major trading countries. Our external trade accounts for nearly 30 per cent of our gross national product, and nearly 80 per cent, I am told, of all our imports and exports are shipped by water. As a result, the quality of our ports and the efficiency of their operations have a considerable impact on the cost of our products on our competitive position on world markets and finally, on our balance of trade and our balance of payments. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that we must have the best ports policy we can muster.

An hon. Member: Amen.

Mr. Pepin: Amen. What is the administrative situation of Canada's ports today? At the present time, we have in Canada three types of commercial ports: the ports of the National Harbours Board, the ports of the Harbours Commission and the government harbours and piers for which the Department of Transport is directly responsible. Each type of port is governed by a distinct body of legislation.

The ports of the National Harbours Board are governed by an Act of Parliament passed in 1936. The legislation reflects the conditions of that period, namely the depression and the need for centralization. The Act has been amended only twice since 1936, and one of these amendments consisted in substituting for the name of the port of Three Rivers the name of Trois-Rivières. This change was undoubtedly necessary but had a negligible impact on the port as such.

Some comments on the first type of port. The Board of Directors of the National Harbours Board, which governs this type of port, has four full-time members. The Board does not claim to reflect the national dimension of this country, although one of the members is from Saint John, New Brunswick, and another is from Vancouver. On the other hand, the legislation does not provide for local autonomy with respect to the management and operation of the fifteen ports under the National Harbours Board, nor does it provide for regional input in the process of planning and establishing a national ports policy. As a result, the administration of these ports is highly centralized. So much for the first kind of port.

The Government Harbours and piers Act, the second body of legislation covering the administration of ports in Canada, governs more than 500 public facilities. This Act also goes back to 1936 and is just as outdated as the National Harbours Board Act. The facilities in question are also subject to the Canada Shipping Act and the Public Works Act, and this checkerboard of legislation constitutes a hindrance to sound planning and is not conducive to the investments that could be made in these port facilities. The ports usually come second to the National Harbours Board ports, but also include some that are fairly large.

The Harbour Commission Act, which governs the third kind of port we have in Canada, provides the most up-to-date legislation and as such is more compatible with present port administration practices. Under this Act, which goes back to 1964, ports may be operated and administered at the local level, which is more in line with the intent of Bill C-92, which I shall be discussing presently. However, the Harbour Commissions Act does not define a common objective for all ports where a national ports policy is concerned. Nor does it stipulate that the development of harbour commissions is an integral part of regional and national ports planning. In addition, the Act does not provide for the transfer from one type of port to another.

So that, Mr. Speaker, is the fairly complex situation in the administration of Canada's ports today.

[English]

Efforts have been made to improve the situation affecting ports in Canada within the existing structure. I would not want to leave the impression that our ports are in a generally backward state; far from it.

I must admit, however, that the public port facilities under Transport Canada have not seen a great deal of development in recent years. That is changing now. Planning for the future is improving considerably. For example, we currently have a series of master plans in progress with the objective of providing a coherent basis for future development of public port facilities in different areas of the Country.

Commission ports are doing much better. They are performing well. Thunder Bay, to mention one, maintained its position as the world's largest and most successful grain port. In terms of capacity to undertake new projects, I would point to the new forest products terminal at Duke Point at Nanaimo, British Columbia, which is the result of co-operation between the federal government, the provincial government and the local harbour commission.

Most interesting, however, is the progress made at the 15 National Harbours Board ports which, by the way, handle 50 per cent of Canada's waterborne commerce. The other two types of ports each handle about 20 per cent.

In recent days I have been making an extra effort to focus attention on these ports. I believe their significant achievements are largely unrecognized, and that is regrettable. One need only look at the National Harbours Board latest annual report to see how well they are doing. For the first time in history, all 15 ports have a positive net income. Total tonnage, while down slightly from the record set in 1980, is still the second highest ever handled by the National Harbours Board.

The number of tonnes handled per employee, which is a good indication of productivity, increased from 58,000 in 1976 to 91,000 in 1981. Capital investment is up substantially, from $38 million in 1980 to $65 million in 1981.

The reorganization of the National Harbours Board debt—$350 million of principal and $150 million of interest, which was erased in 1981—contributed quite considerably to this positive picture I am painting tonight. It is equally true to say that the National Harbours Board, in spite of the drawbacks of its statutory environment, has developed into a sound organization which is now operated on a largely commercial basis by experienced professional employees.

If everything is so good, the obvious question is why the need for a new bill? I have already touched on a few of the reasons. I might emphasize the severe limitation on local autonomy which is symbolized by the famous statutory ceiling on contracts. Anything over $50,000 requires governor in council approval. That is a symbol of the lack of autonomy given to these major port organizations. Others ports in Canada, the harbour commissions for example, and other ports in the world of the same size as Vancouver, Halifax, or Montreal have a lot more autonomy in their administration than those ports under the National Harbours Board. This is an anomaly the bill will correct.

Another reason for new legislation is the inability of the National Harbours Board to set its rates quickly and on a commercial basis to respond to local needs and to particular circumstances. It is a problem in that a port the size of Halifax or Vancouver, cannot act rapidly to set rates in relation to the competition.

The inability to transfer from one type of port to another is also a difficulty. The fragmentation of the legislative basis is also a problem as well as the lack of a common stated objective. These are difficulties the bill will attempt to cure.

This is not the first time such a ports bill has come before the House of Commons. Between 1977 and 1979, hon. members, in my absence, dealt with three bills, Bill C-61, Bill C-6 and Bill C-50. All died on the Order Paper without even getting to second reading. Therefore, we are making great progress tonight. With the assistance of all friends of Bill C-92 on all sides of the House, maybe it will be passed by the House this time.

In order to appreciate the present legislative proposal, it is useful to note the different approach that was taken in previous attempts. That is very important. Previous bills all tried to consolidate fully the different pieces of legislation which I already mentioned. I have extensive notes on the subject. I will not go into them except to mention that contrary to the other bills which attempted the monumental task of bringing the whole legislative apparatus under a single bill, this bill is much less pretentious. The bill leaves aside the grander scheme of reshaping the entire port system and takes a more evolutionary approach. It recognizes that the existing system has strengths that can be built on without the need for a total overhaul. I would not like to leave the impression that the bill does not change much. Thirty of the 40 sections in the National Harbours Board Act are being amended, and 16 of 19 sections of the Government Harbours and Piers Act are being amended.

The bill is not as all encompassing as the previous bills. The reason is simply that different parts of the country have different types of ports. There is some validity in that. We try to accommodate local circumstances, historical precedents, fashions and the like. I do not think the country will be handicapped because of that.

It is clear that the National Harbours Board ports have reached a level of financial and administrative maturity such that they are now being held back by the 1936 legislation which governs them. Having demonstrated their ability—this is a key sentence for those who will comment later—to operate soundly and efficiently, Parliament owes the ports a new framework which will give them the opportunity to respond the new challenges in a modern environment. In other words, these ports have done well with the support of the National Harbours Board. They are now fully grown and developed. They are adult. The time has come to give them more freedom of operation than in the past.

I now want to say a few words about Bill C-92. In my view, it is an excellent example of what I like to call the balancing act, which is the only act that Parliament has never passed, because it tries to combine a number of forces.

As I said earlier, it does not attempt to reshape the entire system. The three types of ports are maintained. The statutes governing them are amended to remove the shortcomings. For example, rather than having one central piece of legislation, a common statement of objectives is included in each of the separate statutes. A balance is thereby achieved between a single, unwieldy act and three unrelated ones. They are tied by a single objective, a single statement of principle.

Another example of balancing is between the national interests and the local autonomy. The first objective in the common statement of objectives is to ensure that the port system is an effective instrument of support for international trade objectives and also for national, regional and local social and economic objectives.

The fourth objective is more specific. It calls on the port system to provide ports with a high degree of autonomy consistent with the responsibility to ensure the integrity and efficiency of the system as a whole. We see the obvious preoccupation of the national interest and the local interest which is balanced by a degree of centralization and a higher degree of decentralization. Therefore, the bill is a masterpiece of balance!

Mr. Nowlan: I wish you were selling Mississippi oil.

Mr. Pepin: Give me a barrel and I will try.

• (2120)

Let us look at some of the most important amendments. Taking first the amendments to the National Harbours Board Act, the principal amendment creates a part-time board of directors, up to 17 of them, representative of broad regional interests in important matters. The new board will have the power to recommend the establishment of local port corporations with a high degree of delegated authority to manage and operate. Ports that do not acquire local port corporation status will be operated as divisions of the new parent corporation. That, by the way, will be named the Canada ports corporation.

To repeat, within what is now called now the National Harbours Board system there will be two types of ports. There will be some fully grown, with full local autonomy, the "mini" corporations under the "maxi" or parent corporation. There will be others which will remain divisions of the National Harbours Board, which is to become the Canada ports corporation.

The corporation will have new powers to set contractual limits by bylaws. Rates for commercial services will be set by the corporation itself for its own divisions. The local port corporations will set rates themselves for their own requirements. Harbour dues, however, will continue to be set by bylaws and will therefore be subject to governor in council approval.

The Canada ports corporation, and the local port corporations, will remain category "C" Crown corporations under the Financial Administration Act. Members will realize what that means. It has some advantages, obviously; for example, not to pay taxes, not to pay dividends, and the possibility of getting Canadian government contributions to investment. There are some advantages also to becoming a category "D" corporation. The law as it is now will make that possible without having to pass a new law to move corporations, the "maxi" and the "mini", from category "C" to "D". Also to be stated is that it will be the possible to transfer from one category of port to another category without having to introduce new legislation to do so.

I should say a few words, Mr. Speaker, about local port corporations. As I indicated, this is the major factor and the major motivation for the new policy. It is the decentralization of authority and decision making to the local level of port corporations, and a move away from the centralized administration of National Harbours Board ports.

It is rather important, I think, that I should put on record the powers of the local port corporations. Here is a list. First, there is the authority and responsibility for the day to day operation of the port. This is a local corporation responsibility. Second, there is the setting of commercial rates. Third, there is the responsibility for all personnel matters. Fourth, there is the tendering and contracting within new designated limits. Fifth, there is the management of port property. And the sixth one, which I should have first, is the appointment of the chief executive officer of the port. The appointment of the manager of the port is obviously symbolic of the transfer of power from the National Harbours Board Act to the local port corporation.

I was in Montreal during the weekend. The chairman of the National Harbours Board referred to Mr. Beshwaty as "my general manager". The president of the Montreal authority referred to the same gentleman as "my general manager". In this case one person was speaking for the present and the other person was speaking for the future. So it is a very important change.

In general terms, the local port corporation will be responsible and accountable to the Canada ports, corporation for maintaining the port in a financially viable position. To ensure that the decision and management initiatives of the local port corporations are consistent with national policy objectives, that they make the best use of their resources and serve the best interests of the users, the Canada ports corporation will approve the annual capital and operating budgets of the local port corporations. It will also monitor their actual performance. This will be done in much the same way as a large private corporation would oversee its subsidiaries.

Financial viability is an important aspect of the new policy. The capability of an individual port to sustain its operation is one of the main criteria for the very establishment of the local port corporation. Other criteria, by the way, include the national and regional significance of a port and the degree of local interest in the affairs of the port.

On the other hand, financial viability is not the only criterion on governing port development. It is recognized that ports form an important element of broader regional economic development schemes and that large port investment requirements cannot always be met from port revenues at the outset. In other words, the port may not have the means to achieve its full development. Consequently, the legislation contains a provision whereby the government may give directives to the Canada ports corporation, to undertake ports development in the national and regional interest.

An hon. Member: I have a question.

Mr. Pepin: I will entertain questions afterwards.

Having given such a directive, the government, in the circumstances, when the capacity of the local corporation is not great enough, will be expected to provide assistance by way of a grant or otherwise.

Again there is a balance—the theme of balance being my main theme tonight—between the commercial objectives of individual ports which help ensure their efficient operation with a high degree of autonomy, and the broader government objectives relating to regional and national economic development.

How will this be set up, Mr. Speaker? It is hoped that within 18 months of proclamation of this bill, the new board of the Canada ports corporation will have examined all the former National Harbours Board ports and will have recommended to the Minister of Transport which ones meet the criteria of local port corporation status. An order in council will be needed to create such a local port corporation.

How many National Harbours Board ports are likely to become local port corporations? That is a question that the board of the new corporation will address and on which it will make a recommendation to the minister. At this time I expect that most National Harbours Board ports will seek and should be able to attain this status, so it will be very much open to them to make their case.

I should say a few words, Mr. Speaker, on the amendments to the Government Harbours and Piers Act. The amendments to that act propose to redress the situation of divided responsibilities, by consolidating into a revised act, to be called the public harbours and ports facilities act, all of the responsibilities necessary to plan and fund maintenance and capital works for these public facilities. Again, that type of port will be asked to apply a common statement of objectives.

I have a few words to say, Mr. Speaker, on amendments to the Harbour Commissions Act of 1964. As all members know, there are seven ports now—four in British Columbia and three in Ontario—administered under this newest of port acts. This act already recognizes the objectives of local autonomy, as we all know. In fact, these ports provide an excellent example of how well the concept of autonomy can work. This act is therefore subject only to minor amendments, it being the most modern and most recently passed. The statement of objectives mentioned previously, is added. The section on the establishment or dissolution of a harbour commission is amended to permit the transfer of any one of the present National Harbours Board ports to commission status without need to amend the law.

There are a few words to be said also, Mr. Speaker, about the process of consultation and about the regional and local participation in the administration of this new bill.

• (2130)

First, the new Canada ports corporation provides for full regional participation on its board of directors—and I mention en passant that there will be a maximum of 17 members on that board—and local participation also at the port corporation level, so there will be plenty of participation both in the maxi and in the mini corporations. Harbours commissions already have local participation in their administrations, as we well know. Public harbours and port facilities will benefit from greater delegation of authority to the regional port administrations of the Department of Transport as well as the establishment of public harbour advisory committees.

However, one of the major weaknesses of the present port system lies in the absence of an identified body responsible for advising the Minister of Transport on regional port planning and development as they affect all types of ports. In order to bridge that gap, the bill provides for the establishment of regional advisory councils to include the chairman of each local port corporation, harbour commission and port advisory committee; that is the advisory committee of a division of the new Canada port corporation. All this will be brought together with representation from other public interests in a regional advisory council.

Mr. Nowlan: Sounds good.

Mr. Pepin: I hope it sounds good, and I am sure it will be. Each province in a region will have the right to appoint at least one member to these regional councils.

This bill deliberately maintains flexibility in defining the size and range of activities of these regional councils. We are letting it be flexible so that different regions of Canada may have slightly different regional councils, depending on the mood of the area. It is my intention, however, that these councils form an essential part of the regional and national port planning process.

Reaction to this bill is my last point. What has it been? The bill itself is the result of extensive consultation—"extensive consultation" underlined three times—for a good period of time.

Mr. Nowlan: You are impossible.

Mr. Pepin: It has been good for a good period of time, I must say. Briefs, representations and telegrams have been received from a great number of interested parties. I have a list of some of them, but I will not mention them all.

It is obvious that the bill will not satisfy everybody. Some are looking for a greater degree of autonomy; others, presumably, are looking for a lesser degree of autonomy. However, generally speaking, I think hon. members are aware that it is the general belief that reasonable compromises were struck. That is a very important sentence.

Mr. Crosby: How about labour representation?

Mr. Pepin: The provinces are not all happy with this bill, but, generally speaking, I think there is support, if not for all the clauses, at least for the intent and purpose of the bill. I was talking to Mr. Lévesque the other day after his speech in Quebec City which was partly on ports policy. Somewhat to his amazement and to the amazement of many others I said I agreed with 95 per cent of what he said. The reason was that what he had said was all in Bill C-92.

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Pepin: Oh yes. The main difficulty he has with it has to do with the selection of the people who will constitute the local port corporations. For example, he alluded to his admiration for municipal representation on these port corporations. Everybody knows this is debatable. There are cases in which there is a conflict between the objective of the municipality and the objective of the port. I will not give cases, but some of them are pretty well known. It may be that a municipal council would like to see a park where port authorities would like to see a port facility grow, so there is quite a difference there. In any event, we can have a good discussion of the subject.

The legislation has the support of the port authority chairmen, of the National Harbours Board ports, the chairmen of the commission harbours, the Canadian Port and Harbour Association and a whole list of other institutions. One of the reason is that most of them have worked well on the bill and have made contributions to it.

By the way, I would like to thank all those who have made a contribution, some of them members on all sides of the House. Bill C-92 goes a long way towards addressing the major weaknesses of the present system while respecting historic preferences for the existing organization and building on the strengths and the good works of the past. I am quite sure all members would be honoured to have voted in favour of this bill.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate at the second reading stage of Bill C-92. At the outset I cannot help but wonder why the minister started off on what was a very critical passage for him, such an Alice in Wonderland stage setting for this bill. It is a piece of legislation which makes legal that which has been illegal for five years. It is time to get on with the damned thing, I agree, but let the minister not stand up and tell us about the great and wonderous autonomy the bill will extend to local ports. Let him be simple and honest and say it is a first step. It should have been taken seven, eight or ten years ago. This is not the solution to the problems of the ports in this country, and the minister knows it.

He spoke about the historical record. I suppose once every 40 or 50 years the government is entitled to speak about the record with respect to ports legislation. As the minister indicated, the National Harbours Board Act was passed in 1936 as a result of the Gibbs commission report.

We have difficulties with this bill. The minister had better be aware of that, and so had the government House leader.

On June 4 in this chamber the minister casually said we were holding the bill up. We are not holding the bill up. We want this kind of legislation. It is constructive legislation, but it is what the government should have been doing over the last two years. The government has been so preoccupied with esoteric matters that it could not find time to get on with this. That is the truth of the matter. What is more important to the minister, off-track betting or ports legislation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: This is not a good bill in its present form. It was not a good bill seven years ago when it was first introduced, but this is a first step. The minister knows I personally want to see this bill through second reading, into committee and back into this chamber before we adjourn for the summer, and I will do what I can to facilitate that. However, the minister had better go with open eyes to the committee because many of my colleagues are very disturbed about this bill, so am I, and for the next few minutes I will put forward a few reasons why I am disturbed.

This is not the first time we have seen this bill. I hope it is the last, but it is not the first. We saw it in 1977 as Bill C-61, again in 1977 as Bill C-6 and in March of 1979 as Bill C-50. All those bills died on the Order Paper.

We have serious reservations in probably 13 areas of this bill. Many of these reservations are well known to the minister and well known to his officials. They are well known to the members of the Standing Committee on Transport. I am hopeful that in committee many of these minor difficulties can be dealt with, and dealt with efficiently, by way of amendment. One or two of them may be viewed as substantive, but they are not substantive in intent.

Our first serious reservation about this bill stems from the fact that it is predicated in part upon Crown corporations legislation which we have not seen. When the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), introduced this matter, it was done in a manner consistent with proposals in a Crown corporations bill. We do not have that bill in front of us, Mr. Speaker. We have not seen the government's white paper or its green paper on the Crown Corporations Act. That is what we are setting up—Crown corporations with 20 subsidiaries. At this time we do not know the government's intention with respect to Crown corporations. It is absurd of the government House leader to ask us to give this matter second reading, put it through committee stage, report stage and third reading between noon and four o'clock on a Friday afternoon! I know he has problems, but that is not our fault. We tried to help the minister, but it is an affront to us that he did not deal with the Crown Corporations Act. He did not give us any indication how the bill will affect the government's intentions in that regard.

We support the principles of the bill that there is a need for efficiency, that there must be co-ordination with other transport modes, that there must be accessibility to users in order to develop an import-export trade.

The minister says that autonomy will be expanded. I believe that it may be enhanced slightly. When you have to refer to five different authorities in order to get something done, how does that expand autonomy? The matter has to be referred to the minister, to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to the governor in council, to the bylaws of the local port corporation and to the parent corporation, that means from five to six different levels of approval before something can be done that is regarded as necessary by those charged with the responsibility of administering an efficient and well organized port.

The minister will be hearing from my colleagues representing the Vancouver area who will speak about the long sticky fingers of Treasury Board. There is reference to "excess moneys". What does that mean? We have been told that there will be different limits, and of course we realize that the limits of 1936 are not applicable to 1982. We have not been told what the limits will be, however. During this debate we will ask the minister for an undertaking that at committee stage, if not before, he will reveal the four or five parts of the authority that deal with matters such as financial limits so that we can see all the bylaws. The minister is very good to the House in that respect as a rule. Transport officials, not only under this minister but under ministers before him are open and allow members on all sides access to schedules and rules and regulations that flow from these things at committee stage so that we can understand what is going on. The sooner we have those, the better we will understand how serious the minister and the government is about autonomy.

The matter of equity between ports also concerns us. Of course the borrowing authority for the Port of Vancouver must be different from that for the port of Chicoutimi. They are two different worlds. But we do not know what the formula will be. It will have to treat Halifax, St. John's, Prince Rupert, Montreal and Quebec City equitably, yet it will have to be different. I hope the minister will let us in on his secret so that we can help him.

I want the minister to understand clearly what our concerns are. On a number of occasions in committee he indicated to us that he considered the tax levied on the marine transportation industry with respect to fuel for vessels leaving Canada, to be somewhat inequitable. But he did not do anything about it, apparently, although I am sure he tried. It is not good enough for the minister to say that such and such is autonomy; we want to see it in writing. We do not trust the President of the Treasury Board and I do not want to rely on the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Look at the mess he has got this country into! Does the minister expect members of the opposition to take his word for it? He should not stretch our credulity too far. Were he the only one standing between the governor in council and port corporations, then that might be an interesting proposition for the entire port community to consider. It would have been interesting for us and it would have made a basis for autonomy much faster than the four or five levels that the bill provides for, but the minister should not stretch our imagination too far. He should not make us reach too far beyond our capability to help him.

The minister knows that the majority of any entity, business or corporate, public or private, are governed to a large degree by the form and type of their incorporation, their powers and sources of finance. How autonomous can a local port be when its entire existence is to be determined by a Crown corporation whose entire existence, in turn, depends on the whim of the government? That is not a rhetorical question, Mr. Speaker. There is mention of the LPC, the CPC, the LAC—we have lance corporals in the air force and we have Canadian Pacific. Could we not call these the Halifax port corporation, the Vancouver port corporation, the Montreal port corporation? Can we get away from that and get into some useful and appropriate designations? This sounds as if we have given them all a social insurance number or something. How can you be autonomous when everything you do is in the minister's back pocket or, worse than that, in the back pocket or the back of the mind of the local Liberal chairman? How autonomous can a port be when it is the minister who makes all of the decisions?

There are a number of small amendments we are going to move, Mr. Speaker. For example, we will move to change the wording "in the opinion of the minister" everywhere it appears. You have to have a reason, then make a judgment, and we will accept that. But it will not be in your opinion; it will be the opinion of the local Liberal hatchetman or appointer of great people. I accept the minister's argument about the difficulties of including the municipalities in the local port corporation because conflicts of interest will develop. But I will not support the minister's argument, for example, when it comes to whether or not he will extend to labour the right to recommend someone to the authorities. I can see the possibility of conflict when dealing with municipalities, but I cannot see it when you are dealing with the makeup of the local port corporation. How autonomous can the LPC be if the Canada ports corporation can determine which statutory powers it can give to the LPC as listed in the act? No rationale has to be given under the act. Worse, there is no legislative appeal built into the act. If an LPC wishes to contest a decision, how does it appeal and to whom? How autonomous will it be if it is unable to borrow or invest in the private marketplace? It would only be able to do so if the CPC, on its own presumably, changed its status from a schedule C to a schedule D Crown corporation under the Financial Administration Act. I do not know whether or not any of the ports would want to start that process. We have heard from some officials of government, not within the Department of Transport, that they are not all that enamoured of schedule D under this legislation until they themselves have had an opportunity to take a look at the provision of the Liberal government's down corporations proposals.

On February 28, 1982, during a CBC radio interview the Auditor General was asked why the government was proceeding so slowly on the Crown corporations bill, and this is what he said:

> Well, it's a source of frustration for me because I think it's very important that we have Crown corporation legislation. I'm not exactly sure when the Crown corporation legislation started, but I know that when the new Auditor General Act came out in 1977, the parts of our legislation regarding Crown corporations was left a little loose because the Crown corporation legislation was expected shortly. Well, that was 1977. When the PC's were in power, they brought forth a paper that died when their government died. Subsequently to that, the present government has had a study paper on the topic of Crown corporations—I'm not exactly sure why that's not proceeding rapidly.

The Auditor General was then asked if he had seen this Liberal government paper on Crown corporations, and he replied:

> No. I've been denied access to that paper. I think that's part of the—what I find rather strange political science notions in Ottawa. I don't know that it's necessarily a high level political decision. I suspect it's some bureaucrat who's accustomed to defending his rear.

Thus it seems the Auditor General is in somewhat the same predicament as members in this House. He has not seen it, nor have we, and it does not look as if we are going to see it. Not only is there lack of accountability in terms of the missing Crown corporations act, there is no mention at all of how we are going to audit. We asked for joint audit by the Auditor General of Canada and we did not get it. We are going to ask for it again, and I do so right now. I serve notice that we will move an amendment the effect of which will be to join the Auditor General either in joint audit or to extend to him the responsibility and right to audit these many Crown corporations. In the absence of a Crown corporations bill or any indication of what the government wants to do, what other choice do we have? Very little, I am afraid.

Furthermore, there is no legislative provision for the annual report of the CPC or those of the LPCs to be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport. We would ask for that. I have touched on the financial aspects of this legislation. We want the Treasury Board to release through the minister the financial limits to be set in the LPCs bylaws. We hope and trust, and knowing the minister we are certain, that once we see them they will be realistic and meet the requirements of 1982. We would like to see it before it reaches the committee stage, but at least let us see it at the committee stage. We want a good explanation of what excess moneys are and under what conditions the long arm will reach out and take moneys from Vancouver, Halifax, Montreal or Toronto. We want to know what will happen to that money. We want to know about the transfer of funds from LPCs to the parent corporation. We have been through the banking concept proposed by the minister in Bill C-92. When we look at Bill C-92, we realize that there is not a trace of the banking concept of transferring money back and forth between local port corporations and the central corporation. There is not one word indicating in fact how it will happen or under what guidelines. Why was it not spelled out? It was certainly in the notes of the minister and in everything he had to say about it. It was in the discussion paper, but it is not in the bill. We have asked for it to be placed in the bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

LABOUR CONDITIONS—INCREASE IN YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT. (B) ROLE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight on the adjournment debate following the questions I asked of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) on June 4, as reported at page 18109 of Hansard.

On June 4 the May unemployment results were published. The national unemployment average in Canada stood at 10.2 per cent; double digit unemployment. What was not added to the roughly 1.2 million Canadians were those Canadians who have simply left the labour force and have stopped looking for work or employment. That day I asked what plans the federal government had to address one specific aspect of the national unemployment picture, namely, unemployment for young Canadians between the ages of 20 and 24 years. If one looks at that age group, one finds a startling figure of 20.2 per cent of Canadians listed as a statistic; the statistic that they are unemployed. One out of five people who are entering what we could call adult life, who might just be out of university or technical school with some kind of training and looking for their first job, do not have work this summer. I do not think anyone in the House can accept that kind of statistic. It is easy to say that it is one out of five, but everyone in the House knows young people in that age group who have come and asked how he or she could find work.

There used to be a time when people would say that these young people were not obtaining work because they were being too particular about the type of work they would do. They might be university graduates, for example, who did not want to drive trucks. That is not the case today. When I speak to them, I find that they are primarily concerned about finding some work.

The government and the Minister of Employment and Immigration have said that there are Summer Canada make work projects. That afternoon the minister said that if members of the opposition co-operated we could pass the national training act and we could get people working. That act is being discussed and debated right now. I would suggest that it is going forward fairly well. The minister also said that work-sharing is in place. Yes, for roughly 69,000 Canadians that is so, but that does not add up to 1.2 million Canadians.

I am concerned about that group of young Canadians. That does not mean I am not concerned about other Canadians who are unemployed, but that group of young Canadians has to be drawn into the labour force and has to become part of the market economy. If this is their first experience, one can imagine what attitudes they might have both toward the work ethic and toward Canada generally. It is a concern and a fall-out about which hon. members of the House should be very conscious.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said that as we drop inflation, employment will increase. I have news stories here. Although I do not have time to read them all, in an article dated May 11, 1982, in The Globe and Mail the heading reads, "Must shift focus to unemployment, MacEachen tells industrial nation." He said in his meeting with the OECD in Paris that, "Unemployment is likely to rise even further." Those are very difficult signals.

What I am pointing out to the government today is that while we know about the national training act, Summer Canada and the make-work programs, at the time these programs are all in place the fact remains that unemployment among young Canadians is still going up. That is the fact. Nobody can escape that fact. What plans does the government have in mind to get young Canadians back to work or to work, because it is their first job in many cases? What I am asking, as well, is why the government does not go back to the marketplace to give incentives—not grants—but tax relief for businessmen and businesswomen so they will hire Canadians and create employment?

Forget about the grants system. People come here with cap-in-hand for grants. Those grants come from taxpayers' money and it is an inefficient way of operating. Why not use the approach of having average Canadians investing $2,000, for example, in Canadian industry to create jobs so they would then get the same tax break as any corporation? Those are some suggestions. We often accused of not making any suggestions. I have just given some.

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) for his comments and suggestions tonight on the serious problem of youth unemployment. I think that we have to correct some of the figures he has mentioned tonight.

First, according to the latest statistics compiled by Statistics Canada, the actual unemployment rate for the youth group between the ages of 20 and 24 during the month of May was 16.4 per cent. The seasonally adjusted rate, however, was somewhat lower, at 14.8 per cent. The 15 or 20 age group is the one experiencing the highest unemployment rate at the present time, as the hon. member mentioned.

As was indicated earlier, all industrial countries of the world have been experiencing a general economic slowdown during recent years which has resulted in a above average level of unemployment. The Canadian employment situation is merely a reflection of the state of the world economy.

[Translation]

The slow rate of economic growth is responsible for the present relatively high rate of unemployment in Canada. In addition, in May a wave of about 100,000 young people, from 20 to 24, surged on to the labour market. As we all know, this is the yearly crop of post-secondary students who are seeking employment, but despite this fact, between April and May 1982, unemployment among young people between 20 or 24 years of age did not increase. We certainly do not wish to minimize the seriousness of the situation, but I merely wish to point out that it is no use blaming government programs for youth employment, although the member for Provencher (Mr.

Epp) did make a few suggestions that would bear closer scrutiny to see if they would not be acceptable to the government.

In Canada today, jobs remain unfilled because many job seekers do not have the required qualifications. The hon. member very correctly pointed out that the bill now before the House which, I believe, will be quickly passed by both opposition parties and the government side, may provide some solutions to the problem.

Every year, we are spending about $700 million to help young Canadians. Without government programs, youth unemployment would be even worse, but there are still limits to the amount of money that federal and provincial governments can spend. This week, the minister wrote to 1,400 employers across Canada, asking them to co-operate with the federal government and the provinces in finding job opportunities for students. He also wrote to all his cabinet colleagues and to all the members of this House, asking them to do what they can be hire young people. Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to add that unlike what is being done by some provincial governments, the federal government has this year increased funds earmarked for summer employment to $120 million, which will, of course, provide jobs for many young people across this country.

ENERGY—SERVICE STATION COST OF GASOLINE. (B) REQUEST THAT PRICE BE REDUCED

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, just listening to the parliamentary secretary, I am reminded of the fact that some seven hon. members of this House of Commons spent 14 months of their lives on a special committee on Employment Opportunities for the 80s. Much of that report was dedicated to young people, but not one single recommendation from that all-party committee was adopted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his last budget, and the tragedy of unemployment in this country continues.

The question which I asked of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the month of March, which was not answered satisfactorily, relates to that issue of unemployment. In Canada in the last two years we have had in place a system whereby all oil and gas which comes through the refinery gate is taxed. The money is collected and it is spent in subsidizing foreign oil. Late last winter and this spring, those subsidies have been such that oil from Mexico, which really costs $9 a barrel more than equivalent Canadian oil for the same level of crude, ends up to be $9 a barrel cheaper than equivalent Canadian because Canadian taxpayers are taxed and importers are given a subsidy of $18 a barrel. In percentage terms, we have subsidized that oil to the point at which it is 40 per cent cheaper than the equivalent Canadian crude.

We should not be surprised as a nation to find that refiners choose to purchase the imported oil. When that happens, Canadian oil stays in the ground, jobs are lost, money goes out of the country, consumers end up paying more, there are fewer people employed and more people are on unemployment insurance. Surely that is a policy which defies common sense and logic. If people have trouble understanding that, let me refer to the fact that a number of people from the shoe industry will be in Ottawa tomorrow. If the federal government, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance proposed to those people from the shoe industry that there should be a tax on all shoes sold in Canada, that moneys should go into a pot and we should then take that money and subsidize those who import shoes from other nations, I think we would have a riot. I think people would be petitioning on the front steps. The Members of Parliament who represent areas where there are shoe factories would be besieged with calls, letters and angry phone calls; yet in this chamber, time after time, the Liberal government asks opposition members to support policies which continue that situation affecting oil. We use the dollars of the Canadian taxpayers to subsidize imported oil, and in some cases we make it cheaper than comparable Canadian oil. Therefore, Canadian jobs are lost, Canadian dollars are lost and the price goes up.

In March I stood in this House and said, "If the oil is 40 per cent cheaper because you subsidize it and because you pay refiners to import it, then I would hope that if I drove my car to Montreal, where that oil comes in, I would be able to buy gasoline cheaper than I might buy it in other parts of the country, for instance, in western Canada." But I think we all understand in this House that when we do drive our cars to Montreal, we do not find that gasoline is cheaper; we find that it is more expensive.

I asked the Prime Minister, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will tell me today, where the money goes. If taxpayers' dollars make that oil 40 per cent cheaper, but it is the same price or higher at the pump when I buy it, then where does the money go? Does it go into the pockets of the oil companies and is it being paid by retired people, people on fixed incomes, people who have to get to work each day? Where does the money go was the essence of the question. Certainly I received an unsatisfactory answer. I hope this evening with a little more time and preparation the parliamentary secretary will explain to the nation, and to our satisfaction, where the money goes.

If taxpayers' dollars are used to make it cheaper than when it is sold to the consumer, it should be cheaper. That is not the case. What it exemplifies for all of us is that when we put a dollar's worth of gasoline in our gas tanks, some 65 cents on average is for taxes and 35 cents is for the gasoline.

We have created a situation in this country where we must import more. Therefore, we drive down the value of our dollar, increase the cost of the goods we buy and at the same time throw Canadians out of work. That is the logic of the National Energy Program and the logic of the situation I bring to the attention of the House.

I remind hon. members that the Mexican oil I have been talking about is the only oil purchased by direct order by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is a curious coincidence that the oil which he chose to purchase, which was a bad deal in the beginning, receives so much taxpayers' subsidy that it is all of a sudden cheaper to refineries than Canadian crude.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): First, Mr. Speaker, I take very serious objection to the hon. member's comments when he refers to the fact that the Conservative Party of Canada has great concern and compassion for the consumer in this country. I find that to be somewhat misleading.

I would like to immediately clear up one misconception contained in my hon. friend's question. The cost to Canada of the Mexican crude imported into Canada is $3.50 less than domestic crude delivered into Montreal, not $9. Some people believe incorrectly that the oil import compensation program provides an incentive to refiners to buy low-cost, offshore crude oil at the expense of both domestic producers and the consumers. This misconception results from a misunderstanding of the functioning of the program.

There is, without a doubt, an incentive to individual importers to minimize offshore crude costs. This is one of the basic objectives of the flat rate compensation system. However, any low-priced cargo brings down the average industry import cost and reduces, correspondingly, compensation to all importers. Therefore, on average, there is never any incentive to use imported rather than domestic oil.

The fact that crude oil is being brought in from Mexico at a considerably lower price in relation to other crude imports is a measure of the effectiveness of the state-to-state negotiations initiated in 1979 by the Government of Canada with the Mexican government at a time of great international uncertainty about foreign crude supplies.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that the winter of 1979 was an unsettling time for those involved in energy planning. It was the time of the Iranian revolution and oil exports from that country virtually had ceased. You may also recall the incident of a multinational oil company diverting Venezuelan crude destined for eastern Canada to another offshore market that was heavily reliant on Iranian exports.

These circumstances led the energy minister of the day to start negotiations with Mexico for crude oil, negotiations which culminated in the energy co-operation agreement. This was an important agreement for Canadians in that eastern Canada has a new, secure oil supplier on the same continent, and one which, moreover, is not a member of OPEC.

In August 1980 an agreement was signed between Canada and PEMEX for the purchase of 50,000 barrels per day. When the purchase contract was completed, the government came under considerable attack from opposition members for not signing a contract for 100,000 barrels a day.

Finally, I might point out that Mexican crude imports have not been increasing and taking over a market previously held by western Canada crude. They have been maintained at or below the 50,000 barrel level.

THE JUDICIARY—CANADIAN JUDICIAL COUNCIL REPORT ON ACTIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA JUDGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION. (B) REQUEST FOR REFERRAL OF SUBJECT TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pursue a question which I asked of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) on June 8 last concerning the Canadian Judicial Council's investigation into a complaint about the activity of Judge Berger in connection with the constitutional resolution and certain remarks he made on that resolution, and subsequently on the accord which was signed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his ministers.

• (2220)

As a very brief background, Mr. Speaker, I would note that Mr. Justice Thomas Berger spoke out following the signing of the Constitutional Accord in November of 1981. What he indicated was that in his view there had been a very significant betrayal of the very important aboriginal rights in a section of the Constitution, as well as a removal of the veto powers of the Province of Quebec.

I would note as well that Judge Berger had spoken out in support of the constitutional resolution on a number of occasions, including the report of the Canadian Bar Association in September of 1981. There was no complaint, I might note, at any point about his speaking out in support of the constitutional resolution.

Judge Berger stated, and I quote now from Judge Berger's letter of April 1982:

> I believe that a judge has the right—a duty, in fact, to speak out on an appropriate occasion, on questions of human rights and fundamental freedoms, particularly minority rights. Parliament and the legislatures represent majorities; they are not always mindful of the interests of minorities.

And how true that has proven to be, historically, Mr. Speaker. Judge Berger has noted, as have others, that we are in a situation in which perhaps a judge would have been criticized in the late 1940s had he spoken out against the internment of Canadians of Japanese origin, even though it is certainly recognized today that that constitutes a black mark on Canadian history. Would that there had been a few judges with the courage to speak out at that time on that important question.

In response to Judge Berger's remarks and his criticism, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Justice George Addy of the federal court of Canada filed a complaint in which he indicated that he believed that Judge Berger's remarks were worse than a judge sleeping with prostitutes or drunk drivers. Mr. Speaker, that absurd statement speaks for itself, surely? What is far more serious is that shortly after that statement the Prime Minister urged the judicial council to get involved in this matter. He stated, and I quote:

I just regard this as the judiciary getting mixed into politics and I hope the judges will do something about it.

And the Prime Minister said:

I wonder why he didn't support the bill when it was there and when it gave Quebec the vote and gave the Indians aboriginal rights. He didn't support us then.

That is transparently false, of course, because Mr. Justice Berger did support the resolution when it contained those elements.

Following the urgings of the Prime Minister, and following Judge Addy's complaints, the Canadian Judicial Council embarked upon what I have described as a judicial witch hunt, a witch hunt which unfortunately was supported, at least by their silence, by the Conservative Party.

I would note that recently, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Party, through their critic, the member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has fully supported the actions of the judicial council and indeed the remarks of the Minister of Justice I have noted in the past the irony of a situation in which the judicial council criticizes Judge Berger on the one hand, but on the other hand some of those same members of the bench were actively lobbying, albeit quietly and behind the scenes, their friends in the Senate and elsewhere, during the time that the Judges Act was before Parliament. They were seeking to ensure that their lucrative pension plan would be made even more lucrative.

When the Minister of Justice received the report of the Canadian Judicial Council, he made the report public, which certainly I welcome and in fact had urged upon him. But then the Minister of Justice completely misrepresented the position of the Canadian Judicial Council. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice stated and I quote:

The Canadian Judicial Council has accepted the report.

That is certainly not the case. Far from accepting the report of their investigating committee, the Canadian Judicial Council in a three paragraph resolution explicity rejected the fundamental conclusion of that report. For, Mr. Speaker, the investigation committee found that the complaint filed by Mr. Justice Addy—the complaint of non se bene gesserit, a latin expression meaning, in other words, the complaint that Judge Berger had failed to uphold the good name and the condition of good behaviour—was well founded. They did say he should not be removed from the bench, but they certainly stated that his actions constituted grounds for removal. The Canadian Judicial Council entirely ignored the report of its investigative committee and found only that Judge Berger's remarks were indiscreet. The council went on to say that they constitute no basis for a recommendation that he be removed from the bench.

We see therefore that the Minister of Justice, in suggesting that the Canadian Judicial Council had accepted the report of its investigative committee, was competely misrepresenting the truth. In fact, that report—that appalling document—of the investigative committee was rejected, as it should have been, by the Canadian Judicial Council.

Mr. Justice Berger, in his reply to the report of the investigative committee, indicated that in his view if the judicial council was relying upon conventional wisdom, conventional wisdom had not always proved to be accurate in the past. He said:

The council should remember what Hamlet said: "Our indiscretion sometimes serves us well, when our deep plots do pall".

He went on to say of the council:

Theirs is, I suppose, the conventional wisdom, but how often has conventional wisdom been right about anything that truly matters?

The Minister of Justice has deliberately misrepresented the position of the judicial council, and I call upon him to set the record straight.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I will not dignify with a response some of the aspersions cast on Canada's judges or Canada's judicial system. Rather, I would like to respond to the particular issue at hand.

On March 8, 1982, the Canadian Judicial Council, acting pursuant to the Judges Act, appointed from among its members an inquiry committee for the purpose of conducting an investigation into a complaint made in respect of Mr. Justice Thomas Berger of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. The council designated as the inquiry committee the Hon. B. J. Mackinnon, the Associate Chief Justice of Ontario; the Hon. W. R. Sinclair, the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta; and the hon. James Hugessen, the Associate Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec. That committee conducted an investigation into the complaint made in respect of Mr. Justice Berger and duly presented a report of its investigation to the judicial council. The council deliberated upon this report on May 31, 1982 and presented its conclusions to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) on June 1, 1982.

In studying both the council and committee reports it is fair to conclude that neither report recommended the dismissal of Mr. Justice Berger. Regardless of the controversy as to whether or not the actions criticized by both the council and committee constitute grounds for dismissal, the Minister of Justice feels it is important to ensure that the legislative and judicial branches in Canada remain separate and independent of one another. In addition, he is concerned that a most important issue not be sloughed aside, namely, the rights of Canada's native peoples, an issue which is important to Mr. Justice Berger.

This issue is most important to the Minister of Justice, who, for more than six years, served as the minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. During that period he worked closely with Canada's native peoples in all parts of Canada. That is why he fought before the constitutional committee, before this dispute arose, for inclusion of their rights in our new Constitution. That is why the minister does not welcome any controversy such as the present one which detracts from the important job that must be done at Canada's next constitutional conference, namely, the enshrining of the specific rights of Canada's native peoples in the new charter of fundamental rights and freedoms.

The minister accepts the report of the judicial council. Its conclusions have been made apparent. Enough has been said in this House and in the public media. A much more important issue lies ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 10:30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

JOB SECURITY OPTIONS FOR CNCP MARITIME EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, effective June 19 the CNCP telegram offices will be closing in Saint John, Moncton, Fredericton, Sydney and Charlottetown, displacing some nine people. A direct conflict has arisen between CNCP and the employees concerning the employment options provided by CNCP, as CNCP wishes to amend a portion of the agreement before taking further action. In view of the fact that the persons involved have between 29 and 40 years of service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the House urge CNCP to deal fairly with these workers and provide the job security agreement options they have enjoyed since 1962 and funded by the very employees now being denied these benefits.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—CONGRATULATIONS TO GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House congratulates Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the role of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas the value of the Canadian dollar reflects international confidence in the Canadian economy and in the government's ability to manage national affairs, and whereas the dollar is now as depressed as the Liberals' credibility, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House deplores the policies of the Liberal government which have resulted in a 78-cent dollar, thereby causing a de facto 22 per cent reduction in all wages and pensions right across this country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DESIGNATION OF NURSES AS ESSENTIAL EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, the government has increased the designations in the nursing group of the professional institute from 800 to 1,600. In view of the fact that the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) told this House on Tuesday that such designations were only made when "these employees are carrying out their duties necessary in the interests of the safety and security of the public", and in view of the fact that the 1,600 designated nursing positions come to 110 per cent of the nursing group, since there are actually only about 1,450 nurses working for the government in that group, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

S.O. 43

That the government either admit that it is using designations to remove the right to strike, or that it hire the extra 150 nurses which the government claims through its designations are necessary in "the interests of the safety and security of the public".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

TAX POSITION OF DOMESTIC CAR LEASING COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, under heavy pressure the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has agreed to revise the capital cost allowance rate to assist about six multinational car rental companies while continuing to penalize and discriminate against some 2,200 Canadian auto dealers in the car leasing business. Whereas these Canadian auto dealers employ over 75,000 Canadians, which dealers are already hard hit by slumping sales and mounting overhead costs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the minister practise the equity he preaches by extending the capital cost allowance rate increase recently given the six multinationals to the 2,200 Canadian-owned dealerships which lease their cars on a monthly and yearly basis, not by the day.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

AGRICULTURE

APPLICATION OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX TO EXPROPRIATED LAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, whereas the federal and provincial governments acquire agricultural land for public agricultural purposes and secure such lands from unwilling sellers, that is, from farmers who are, many times, unable to replace the land and thus are penalized through capital gains taxes; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House recommends that where agricultural land is acquired or expropriated by a provincial or federal government for another agricultural project, no capital gains taxes be levied by the federal government on the amount the farmer receives for said land.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—REQUEST THAT DECISION TO PROTECT JOBS BE MADE BEFORE JUNE 30—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of increasing problems in the footwear industry as a result of the government's refusal to meet the demands made by the industry, in view of the fact that the minister responsible stated yesterday that he would be in a position to make a decision after meeting with his provincial counterparts on June 21, and with a view to safeguarding existing jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House unanimously urge the minister in question to make his decision not later than June 30.

Madam Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the unanimous consent of the House is required to present this kind of motion. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

FISHERIES

CHINOOK SALMON FISHERY ON FRASER RIVER, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I too have a motion under Standing Order 43. Because of the steady decline in the stock of Chinook salmon the Department of Fisheries is contemplating a complete closure of the Fraser River gillnet fishery this season, meaning a tremendous loss of income for all fishermen, especially for the Katzie Indian band which depends on fishing for 90 per cent of its income. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That to ensure that Chinook conservation is shared by all other user groups, a 24 hours per week fishery be permitted from April until November, and failing this demand, that gill-netters be given full compensation for lost fishing time and redundant gear of $10,000 per licensed boat.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ESTIMATES

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE POSSIBLE REDUCTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, on Thursday, June 10, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated that he would expect Members of Parliament, in examining the estimates, to reduce those estimates. In view of the fact that, by virtue of the rules, committees have ceased meeting on estimates, if the Minister of Finance is serious about the reduction in the cost of government I think the following motion would be found practical by the government. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the government set up a special committee of this House to examine such matters in the estimates that might in these difficult times be reduced or eliminated and that that special committee be entitled to call witnesses to examine expenditures with a view to reducing government expenses by 10 per cent.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

EMPLOYMENT

STAFFING OF SASKATOON OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In Saskatoon, the local employment centre is overworked and understaffed as the number of those seeking employment has increased from about 5,000 requests at this time last year to around 12,000 now. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration assign extra staff to the Saskatoon office to help handle the long lines of unemployed seeking jobs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

PROPOSED CLOSING OF CHILDREN'S LISTENING CENTRE IN TORONTO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the decision by the Ontario Minister of Community and Social Services to allow the Children's Listening Centre in Toronto to be closed at the end of this month because it is not on his list of spending priorities, and in view of that minister's further decision not to apply to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for financial assistance to maintain this invaluable centre for disturbed children, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House request the Minister of National Health and Welfare to investigate the possibility of providing the necessary funds to keep this children's centre open and to initiate negotiations with the province of Ontario to provide ongoing funding for the centre in view of that province's reluctance to do so.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HIRING OF PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that an independent House of Commons selection committee rejected on the merits the application of the daughter of a member of the executive of the Prime Minister's riding association, and in view of the fact that the young woman was hired as a guide by the Executive Committee because a letter was written indicating that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) supported her application, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House condemn this blatant political interference in the House of Commons hiring process—

Madam Speaker: Order. This is a matter dealing with the internal administration. The hon. member has, I think, been told once before that matters of this nature should be discussed either privately with the Speaker or with the Members' Services Committee. Therefore, I cannot accept a motion on that particular subject.

RAILWAYS

CALL FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the plight of many railway pensioners in Canada grows worse with every increase in the cost of living, yet the CPR and the CNR continue to deny them the increases in their pensions which justice clearly demands. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

● (1415)

That the federal government instruct the CPR and the CNR to finally do something substantial finally about railway pensions, implement the recommendations of the Hall Report on Pensions, and give these deserving pensioners their due, i.e., a retired life free from the threat of poverty.

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the government giving any consideration, now or at all, to the imposition in any form or to any extent of wage or price controls?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is asking me to tell this House what discussions are going on in cabinet, he would be asking me to break my oath of office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am not asking the Prime Minister such a question at all. I would simply like an answer to the questions that I am putting to him. Is the government giving any consideration, now or at all, to the pegging of interest rates in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is the same question in another form. He is asking me to comment on discussions in cabinet. If he wants to know whether outside of cabinet such things are being discussed, Madam Speaker, the answer is that I do not know.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am simply trying to establish government policy. Is the government giving any consideration, now or at all, to the devaluation of the Canadian dollar?

An hon. Member: The further devaluation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The same answer, Madam Speaker.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it would appear that this government is vacuous on the question of policy. I make one final attempt. Is the government giving any consideration, now or at all, to the imposition in any form or to any extent of foreign exchange controls in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the same answer, to the same type of question.

ECONOMIC POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to those of my colleague, to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister went to Versailles vowing to force the United States to change its interest rate policy. Since he failed to achieve this, how can the Prime Minister justify to Canadians who are losing their jobs, or to home owners who are being forced to rollover their mortgages at increasing interest rates, or to his own caucus members, making the statement that he is not considering any fundamental changes in economic policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I indicated to the House yesterday that any announcement on the government's economic policy would be made by the Minister of Finance in this House before the session adjourns.

GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is very forthcoming today. There are many Canadians looking for the answers to the questions that we are putting to the Prime Minister. Let me put a supplementary question to him.

The Minister of Finance has for several months been blaming our high interest rates on the federal government deficit position in the United States. Since the Government of Canada budgetary deficit is proportionately almost twice the level of that which it is in the United States, is the Prime Minister asking Canadians to believe that his runaway deficit, the runaway deficit of his government, has nothing to do with the high interest rates in this country, and the weak Canadian dollar, and the bankruptcies and the lay-offs that have been caused by it?

cessor, the hon. member for Yukon, are asking what the government's thoughts are on these various aspects of policy. I have just been handed a quote from their leader, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, who in an interview given to La Presse on May 4 said, "We did look for a solution other than that of the government but we do not have an alternative. Today I do not have a better solution." So I can understand the member for Yukon.

Mr. Clark: Read the whole article, read on. Have the guts to read the whole article.

Mr. Nielsen: Have the honesty; read on.

HOUSING

REQUEST THAT NEW PROGRAM BE INTRODUCED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, we have been saying for some time that neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives have alternative solutions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: My question for the Prime Minister concerns both the shortage of housing in Canada and the need for jobs. In each of the past three years we have built many fewer houses than we have actually needed in our country. Today we learned from the housing industry that in 1982 once again there will be 100,000 fewer houses built than we need as a nation. At the same time today we learned that there are 31,000 unemployed in the logging industry and that 143,000 construction workers are out of work.

Given the basic needs of Canadians for both shelter and jobs, will the Prime Minister assure us that the measures the government will be bringing in soon will include among them a serious housing program to get under way this summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I can only tell the hon. member that I will give serious consideration to his suggestion.

REQUEST FOR REALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer the Prime Minister has given, but I would like to get a little more specific clarification from him on this matter.

In its budget the government allocated billions of dollars for megaprojects in the resource sector. As we all know, many of them have now collapsed. One of these was the Alsands project which included, in terms of dollar allocation this year, $1 billion. This $1 billion would have created only 5,000 construction jobs. There is a means, without increasing the deficit at all in terms of what the government was planning to spend, to use this in housing. If we used half of this in housing, for example, we would stimulate the production of an additional 50,000 housing units and, in addition, create more than 60,000 jobs. Will the Prime Minister give us more assurances that the government will simply reallocate these funds, which it already had planned to use, to produce the jobs and homes Canadians need?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the suggestion might be worthy of consideration if there had been some funds allocated for the purpose the hon. member suggests in the case of Alsands, but if he recalls the agreement which had been reached between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Alberta government, it was in the form of a guarantee of loans, a guarantee against tax liabilities. In that sense the hon. member is asking that we take half of the cash amount when there was no cash amount at all.

Mr. Broadbent: My information on the financing of that for this year is different from the Prime Minister's interpretation, but I will set that aside for a minute and go back to the general housing situation and the capital expenditure program of the government.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering that the thousands of construction workers I have just talked about, and those in the lumber business who are out of work, are collecting unemployment insurance or collecting welfare, which are drains from the Treasury, instead of paying the taxes they would be paying if they were employed, and considering that we have a genuine and serious need for housing, does it not make immense social and economic sense to stimulate economic activity in this sector of the economy, which would not be inflationary?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as I just said, I understand the hon. member is making a representation on what the government should consider for inclusion in its economic statement. I take the representation as such, and I will consider it.

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION FROM THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of a delegation of parliamentarians from the Republic of Germany which is headed by Mr. Peter Schmidhuber, the State Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs of Bavaria.

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister indicated that he did not foresee any change in government policy. He implied the same today in responding to the Leader of the Opposition. I want to say to him, and I do not say this to him—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McGrath: —as a representation. I want to ask him, as the leader of this nation, what he proposes to do about the 1.5 million unemployed, about the 4,400 business bankruptcies in this country so far this year, and about the 11,000 personal bankruptcies. I ask the Prime Minister as leader of this nation, is he trying to shirk total responsibility for the hardship he is imposing on these average Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, that reply may be smart, but under the circumstances it is contemptible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The Prime Minister told us that we had to wait for Versailles. Now that Versailles is over, we have to wait another six weeks.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE ACTION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, as of noon today the Bank of Canada tells us that the dollar was trading at $78.39. It is on the way down, Madam Speaker. I want to ask the Prime Minister if he intends to do anything about the severe economic crisis in this country which is dramatically touching the lives of average Canadians day after day, through unemployment, through rising interest rates, through personal bankruptcies, through business bankruptcies.

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. McGrath: Is he trying to tell us—

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. McGrath: —he bears responsibility for that—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. McGrath: He is disgraceful—

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

An hon. Member: No answer.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Cambridge.

An hon. Member: Smile, you are on candid camera, you clown.

Mr. McGrath: My friend, you are the clown.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: On a point of order—

Madam Speaker: Will the hon. member please resume his seat? I am sorry, but the Chair does not entertain points of order during question period.

Mr. Clark: Nor questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Cambridge.

An hon. Member: No respect.

LEVEL OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Punishing interest rates are the single most important factor in driving businesses into bankruptcy and ordinary citizens on to the dole.

What commitment did the Prime Minister get from the President of the United States at Versailles with respect to U.S. interest rates coming down in the immediate future? If he did not get any commitment, is the government prepared to act unilaterally so that Canadians do not have to absorb the punishing interest rates that are sending so many of them into a state of destitution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, at Versailles the President of the United States made it quite clear that he believed that high interest rates were causing a lot of the economic difficulties in his country and in other countries, and that he would undertake to do his best in negotiations with Congress.

An hon. Member: He said that a year ago.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that I have been asked about Versailles, not about Ottawa. He undertook to do his best to achieve an agreement with Congress which would have the effect of reducing the deficit and therefore bringing inflation, meaning the rate of interest, down.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE ACTION

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. What is his judgment and that of his government on the success of the United States in bringing interest rates down? Will that affect Canadian policy and will the government act unilaterally to peg interest rates?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows, as I do, what has happened between the administration and the Congress of the United States. They have apparently reached some compromise which might be agreed to by Congress, but it is too early to say whether the House of Representatives will be followed by agreement in the Senate. We should know that in a few days.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—REQUEST THAT IMPORT QUOTA DECISION BE REVERSED

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister, who knows there are one and a quarter million people out of work in Canada at the present time. Would he inform the House whether he is willing to use his good offices with the appropriate ministers to reverse their decision with respect to footwear quotas, and thereby give work to at least 7,000 people who have been needlessly thrown out of work as a result of his government's action?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understood the hon. member's colleague, the hon. member from Edmonton, to advocate exactly the contrary, that we should have no quotas or any form of restriction on imports. So perhaps this is an area again where the Conservative Party—

Mr. Clark: What is your policy, Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am trying to answer a question from the opposition. The Leader of the Opposition asks me what my policy is. I say we have two different policies from his own members.

Mr. Clark: What is your policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, our policy has been announced in this House. Representations have been made to the government, the Minister of State for International Trade has met with representatives of that industry, and we are considering the representations.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, those people out of work have been hearing that answer for more than nine or ten weeks because of the government's inactivity.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister undoubtedly knows, the dollar has now fallen to 78.29 cents in relation to the American dollar, approximately six cents below where it was when the government indicated it would not like to see it fall any further. Would the Prime Minister inform the House why the Canadian dollar is so much less desirable than the American dollar at the present time in the eyes of foreign investors, and is it true that the six cents decline is also going to contribute to more inflation in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not recall if the hon. member was in the House yesterday, but I gave quite detailed figures indicating that in the eyes of investors all over the world—

Mr. Stevens: In relation to the American dollar?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, in relation to the American dollar, all currencies of major countries—

Mr. Stevens: Ours has fallen. Why?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member needs a lesson in economics, this is not the place for me to give it to him.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO TAKE TO HELP LEBANON

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and it concerns the situation in Lebanon. As a result of the war in Lebanon and the battles being fought by Israel and Syria within the territory of a neutral country, there are many Lebanese who have lost everything they own and are now wandering the streets of Lebanon. Could the minister inform the House what the Canadian government intends to do to help the Lebanese people, who are caught in a war that is being waged at their expense?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member will recognize, the situation in Lebanon is still very confused as a result of the tragic events of the past two weeks. Therefore, no decision has been made by the U.N. or other agencies concerning refugees. However, in the meantime the government has taken a decision to allow the approximately 1,000 visitors of Lebanese origin presently in Canada to apply to stay here for a full year, with the minister's permit to work during that period of time. After the year obviously we will review their situation. This is comparable to what we did for the Polish refugees.

Similarly we will allow Canadians of Lebanese origin to sponsor family members in Lebanon, who can come here at the same time under relaxed criteria, and we will not require anyone whose visa has expired during that period of time to return to Lebanon during the serious period of crisis. Those are the measures we have taken during this period, Madam Speaker, and when other decisions are made by the international community relating to a larger refugee movement, I will announce them in the House.

TRADE

FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY—PROTECTION OF JOBS IN QUEBEC AND ONTARIO—INQUIRY WHETHER MEASURES WILL BE TAKEN TO CORRECT SITUATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for International Trade. Whereas government import policies are hurting the footwear industry and workers in Quebec and Ontario are unemployed because there are no reasonable quotas on leather footwear, I want to ask the minister whether he intends to take prompt action to protect these Canadian workers.

[English]

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, as I have said three or four times, because of representations made by members on both sides of the House, as well as by all segments of the industry, the government is reconsidering its position of last November, and we will announce our decision in the last week of June or the first week of July.

TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, given that it was March 4 when it was first promised there would be an answer probably within a month, and that the minister announced on May 20 that he hoped to have an answer within a week, can the minister undertake to give an answer within this month as to whether he will restore the quotas and give the industry a chance to regain the 7,000 jobs lost and protect the other 13,000 jobs? Will he answer that this month considering that there have now been six months of delay since the original wrong decision?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I hope the hon. member recognizes that exports as a percentage of Canada's gross national product are one of the highest of any country in the world. Therefore, any protectionist action we take could have some adverse effects on our future trade and job creation. Thus, it is a very complex decision and not one that should be made overnight. I have already indicated, four or five times, that we will make a decision in the last week of June or first week of July.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAY-OFFS

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. CNCP Telecommunications have just announced they are pulling out of New Brunswick and Price Edward Island; the result is canned jobs. The Water Quality Control Branch in Moncton has announced its relocation; more canned jobs in New Brunswick. Mitel has been delayed for months; the result is canned aspirations. The strangulation by the minister of VIA Rail and of the Atlantic Limited has resulted in dozens of canned jobs. Now CN says it will lay off thousands of workers across the nation, including hundreds in Moncton. Will the minister assure those very concerned workers that indeed they will be rehired, that the lay-offs are only temporary, and will he advise them when they will be rehired?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I understand the lay-offs are until October 15, if my memory serves me well. That is what CN is saying, so obviously that is what will happen. On the question as a whole, I think my hon. friend would not like to accept the principle that CN should isolate itself from the rest of the economy. There is a reduction in traffic, so CN feels it has to adjust to that. If it did not, the future of CN might be compromised, and obviously the government would be asked to pay for the cost of maintaining these people in the CN labour force.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, we have seen all kinds of situations where this government has made different work projects available to different parts of the country where it might be more favourable to the government. It is hard to get at these fellows all at once because they are all in it together.

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. members would help the Chair if they refrained from commenting on the answers, and instead just proceeded to their questions.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE REPRESENTATIONS TO CABINET

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, Atlantic Canada is folding up. Its very economic foundations are being undermined, and the Minister of Transport and his cronies are the moles responsible for it. Will the minister at least speak sympathetically to some of his colleagues on our behalf in order to salvage some of those doomed jobs, aspirations and broken dreams in Atlantic Canada—just to save some of them or must we be satisfied with just a hint of a tear?

• (1440)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was merely asking the hon. member a very pertinent question. Does he believe that CN should insulate itself and keep all of its labour force even if there is no work to be done? That is a question.

Mr. Jelinek: Why are you asking the question?

Mr. Pepin: Do you believe that?

Mr. Corbett: Yes.

Mr. Pepin: It's good to know that you do. With respect to the sympathy that I have for the workers, particularly in the maritime area, I think I demonstrated that fairly clearly in recent days with respect to SYSCO.

CASE OF DONALD MARSHALL

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice concerning the case of Donald Marshall. The minister will know Mr. Marshall is a Micmac Indian who was convicted of the murder of Sandy Seale in Nova Scotia in 1971 when he was 17 years old, and that he has spent 11 years in federal prisons. There is public speculation now that he is innocent, and there have been published reports that another person has admitted to the crime. Will the minister tell the House now what has transpired and whether action can be taken to allow all the facts to be made public? If an injustice has occurred, can he take steps to have it remedied?

Miss MacDonald: Somebody answer the question.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, with respect to the Marshall case, I am reviewing it and I am having discussions with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, but we have not as yet resolved the problem. However, I hope to be able to do so by the end of this week.

ACTION TAKEN BY MINISTER

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, the Marshall family and other people devoted to this case have been waiting months for some kind of an indication from the Minister of Justice about what course of action he will follow. He has the power to grant a pardon; he has the power to order a judicial inquiry; and he simply tells us that he is taking time to decide. Can the minister not tell us a little more about what is going on? This case has been the subject of national magazine articles. It has had headlines in newspapers. Why is the minister so unwilling to disclose the facts in this case? What considerations are being applied to Mr. Marshall who may have been wronged by our justice system in Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, if this case was such a problem in the mind of the hon. member, he might have asked the question long before. Some members on this side of the House have talked to me about this problem for many weeks—

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. member has asked you.

Mr. Chrétien: —and some people from the Cape Breton area also. I am working on that at this time. I am in communication with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. I have said that I hope to make a report to this House before the end of this week.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PRESENTATION OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns Crown corporation legislation. This legislation was recommended by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in its report to the House over a year ago. This recommendation was repeated recently in the fifteenth report. I know the minister himself recognized the need for such legislation, as was stated last year. Could he tell the House when Crown corporation legislation will be presented?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I expect that legislation dealing with the control, direction and accountability of Crown corporations—and very responsive, I might say to the concerns of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra—will be presented in the very near term.

QUERY RESPECTING CONTENT OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, could the minister state whether consideration is being given to including comprehensive audit provisions in the Crown corporation legislation?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the legislation, I believe, will be very responsive to the concerns of the government and of the hon. member with respect to better control, direction and accountability. He will have to await the tabling of the legislation, and at that time he will then be able to examine the specific details of the government's policy.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DECISION TO ABANDON SERVICE BETWEEN LIVERPOOL AND YARMOUTH, N.S.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. The Canadian Transport Commission has decided to abandon the service provided by Canadian National Railways from Liverpool to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, a distance of some 135 miles, on August 1, 1982. This is a retrograde, reprehensible, repugnant step which is not and cannot be condoned by any Nova Scotian, especially those citizens whose industry and livelihood in Lockeport, Shelburne, and all along the South Shore will suffer as a result of the government's actions. Will the minister halt this madness since the action can only be implemented provided a new loading ramp at Yarmouth belonging to the Dominion Atlantic Railway has been upgraded or rebuilt, which according to the commission must be done on or before August 1? Will the minister please call a halt to what is going on?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as all hon. members know, decisions of the CTC are appealable to the minister. If my hon. friend feels as strongly as he does, and I am quite sure other people feel similarly, they can appeal the decision. I will then be seized with it and will have to render a decision.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer. I would point out that I wrote a letter to him on May 21, 1982, which I hope he will consider an appeal. What a farce this government is making of the Prime Minister's promise made during the last election campaign that his government would improve the services of the CNR to all Canadians.

Mr. Crosby: That is another broken promise.

Mr. Epp: The Liberals have broken every other one, why should they worry about this one?

Mr. Crouse: Yes, another broken promise.

REQUEST THAT DECISION BE REVIEWED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, since the removal of service means the relocation of an explosives storage area from a remote spot in Queens County, which can no longer be serviced by the CNR, to a more settled area in Lunenburg County, the re-establishment of which is a very great concern to my constituents, will the minister, in the interests of maintaining employment on the South Shore, review this entire matter? If not, will the minister please tell my constituents through this House how in the name of all that is reasonable will the heavy industry in the area between Liverpool and Yarmouth hope to be serviced?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is a procedure for appeal to the CTC. I would doubt whether a letter to the minister is sufficient to bring about a review. However, I will send the hon. member notes indicating the procedure to be followed. If the hon. member wants the minister to review the matter, that is the best way to do it.

CRIMINAL CODE

ALLEGED DIFFICULTY IN APPLYING CERTAIN PROVISIONS CONCERNING PROSTITUTION IN OTTAWA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development. During the past few weeks, I have received a number of complaints from people in my riding regarding the problems caused by prostitution in the western part of Lower Town here in Ottawa. The area has seen a considerable increase in prostitution among young people who are probably being exploited by pimps. Since the police admit they are unable to control the problem effectively because according to them, the sections of the Criminal Code that deal with this matter are ambiguous, can the minister inform the House whether the government intends to take any action to facilitate the work of the police, and finally, would he undertake to meet again with his provincial counterparts to discuss such action and how the law is to be enforced?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the problem was referred to committee with the unanimous consent of the House a few weeks ago, and is being discussed within the context of the debate on Bill C-53 which is before the committee at the present time. The members of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs have received presentations on the subject, and they are now considering the various options open to the government for changing the legislation or taking other kinds of action if necessary. If the hon. member wishes to make representations, he could do so before the committee.

THE JUDICIARY

CANADIAN JUDICIAL COUNCIL REPORT ON CONDUCT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA JUDGE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. A week ago I called upon the minister to correct his statement made outside the House that the Canadian Judicial Council had accepted the shocking report of its three-man investigation committee into the actions of Justice Thomas Berger. The minister refused then, but since that time he has had an opportunity to consult with Ontario Chief Justice Evans and British Columbia Supreme Court Chief Justice Allan MacEachern, among others.

Will the minister now finally agree that while the conclusion of the two reports, that is, that Judge Berger should not actually be removed from the bench, was the same, the Judicial Council rejected the major and important conclusion of its committee that there existed grounds for removal and that the fundamental condition of good behaviour had been breached by Judge Berger by his action in speaking out on behalf of Canada's aboriginal peoples?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think my parliamentary secretary dealt with the matter last night. Of course, the Judicial Council received the report from the committee. I do not think the resolution is a repudiation of the report. Both the report and the resolution called for the same thing, that it was an indiscretion or something reprehensible on the part of Mr. Justice Berger, but because of the circumstances he should not be removed from the bench. I have accepted the conclusion, as I am obliged to do, of the resolution. That is the only legal body that can make recommendations to me.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on a supplementary. Of course there is a fundamental difference between an indiscretion and a breach of the condition of good behaviour. I have before me a transcript of an interview with Chief Justice Evans, acting chairman of the council. My supplementary question is this. In view of the fact that Judge Evans states in this interview, in response to a question, that it would not be correct to say that the council accepted their committee report, and in view of the fact that the minister stated on the same date, June 6, and I quote, "The council have accepted their report—

Madam Speaker: Order. How long is the hon. member going to quote? This is the second time he has quoted. Would he go directly to his question.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): In view of the above, will the minister now stop deliberately misleading the Canadian public on the position of the Canadian Judicial Council, particularly when Judge Berger is unable to reply to this attack, from the bench?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, again, I think that the hon. member did not read all the quotations from what I said in Sudbury. I would like to point out to him that I said that they have accepted the result of the report. I think that he should read the two questions before, and he will see that.

I just say, as I have stated so many times, that we have to ensure that there is a clear distinction between the legislative and executive power and the judiciary. That is a cornerstone of our system. In that case, both the resolution and the report say that the conduct of Mr. Berger was reprehensible but he should not be removed from the bench. I have accepted the resolution of the council. I do think that in the best interests of the justice, that the matter is settled. I have received their resolution and I have accepted it.

I do not intend to proceed with removal, but I think that I must state again that it is extremely important in our system that there is a clear distinction between the judiciary and the House of Commons and the executive, and it is in the best interests that we follow that very closely on both sides, not only when Members of Parliament have to deal with that system but when the system must deal with public issues.

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER WORK PROGRAM

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Danke schön, Frau Präsidentin. My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Could he make a brief statement on the success or failure of his program to engage in a sectorial way, namely in fisheries and forestry, a number of Canadians who are out of work, in a summer work program involving Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member danke schön aussi. In answer to his question I would like to point out that it is a fairly extensive program. We have now signed agreements with the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia and we have negotiated agreements which will be brought to culmination with the province of New Brunswick and Quebec, as well as all the other provinces which are in various stages of discussion.

The programs in both Ontario and British Columbia are now in operation. In recent discussions which I have had with the province of Ontario, they have submitted proposals to extend Section 38 to include areas of renovation of housing, agricultural reform, and areas dealing with tourism. We are looking at all of these proposals, as well as the mining area where we are doing a number of environmental clean-up projects in company with the mining associations and organizations.

The program is being undertaken with co-operation. The fisheries part of the program is one that is being delivered directly by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Again, that program has been signed and delivered in several of the ocean provinces and will also be available to provinces in the interior of the country.

Therefore, it is one means that we are providing, not the only means, but one that we are providing to help alleviate the unemployment problem—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Axworthy: —and I think other hon. members should be interested in it.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER REVIEW PROGRAM

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question will not elicit such an extensive answer. At the end of this month 200,000 young Canadians will leave our school system, a great majority of whom will enter the job market. Since the program has not produced the results that the minister had earlier indicated—very few people are involved in it now and very few dollars have been spent—would he make another review of the program, particularly with the view to involve industry in the program, especially in those provinces where the provincial governments are not as receptive to his ideas as we would like them to be?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in many cases we have been involved in discussions with industrial business organizations concerning those programs. I would point out to the hon. member that in the circumstances of young people coming on to the job market, particularly students, it is very important, as I pointed out in the House before, that we try to recruit the maximum effort by the business community to offer places and opportunities for summer students to gain employment during this very difficult period. Again, I would repeat my appeal to hon. members of the House to use their own communications and efforts in their constituencies to involve business people. I have written to many business leaders and associations, but that effort would be substantially enhanced if I could recruit the assistance of Members of this Parliament for this very noteworthy effort.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMPOSITION OF DELEGATION TO VERSAILLES SUMMIT

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Why was Canada the only country attending at Versailles that did not have a significant component of its delegation containing special expertise in science and technology and research and development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I try to keep the number of members of my delegation lower than those of the other delegations.

COMPARATIVE LEVEL OF FUNDING

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology. Did the minister make recommendations to the Prime Minister that our delegation be composed of people including those experts in science and technology? As well, what are his views on the present trend in France where they are putting a much greater emphasis on science and technology and research and development?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, while it is certainly true that the effort of the French government to increase the proportion of the GNP in France devoted to research and development are impressive, it is even more true that the rate of expansion of research and development in Canada is outpacing the projected growth in France.

URANIUM PRICE FIXING TRIAL—EFFECT OF CROWN CORPORATION APPEAL DECISION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Last Friday the Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed the Minister of Justice's appeal in the case with respect to Uranium Canada and Eldorado Nuclear Limited in the uranium cartel question on the basis that these two Crown corporations were immune from prosecution in the criminal courts. What method does he now propose to make public provisions of the Bertrand report with respect to the activities of these two Crown corporations in order that there will be a fair trial of the private sector corporations still under indictment in this particular matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not think the two questions are necessarily related. We followed the recommendations made in the Bertrand report that we should take legal action against the private companies and Crown corporations. There have been two decisions, one by the Supreme Court of Ontario and the other by the Court of Appeal. As regards the possibility of taking legal action against Crown corporations, we are reviewing that judgment and will subsequently decide whether we should launch a second appeal. I have no further comment at the present time.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Question period is coming to an end. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is rising to ask a question. I would ask the hon. member for Saskatoon West to defer to his Leader.

Mr. Clark: Go ahead, Ray.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the gesture by the Leader of the Opposition. I always defer to the greatest parliamentarian in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister of Justice rose and bowed, but I was talking about a truthful parliamentarian.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BY PRIVATE COMPANIES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): The result of this policy decision by the government has been that there is one rule for the governors and one rule for the governed in our country with respect to criminal prosecutions under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act. In view of the fact that the court decision is to prevent the participation of the Crown corporations, how does the Minister of Justice propose to allow the other remaining defendants access to the information which is essential to their defence, or is he trying to cover something up with respect to the government's involvement in this whole issue?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): I think the statement by the hon. member is a bit funny because he says we have two standards. We do not have two standards. We have decided to prosecute both the private sector and the public sector. It has been ruled by two courts that we might not be entitled to prosecute the public sector, but it is not the policy of the government. The policy of the government is to prosecute it, just like the private sector. If it is not legal, it is another problem. We have said many times that we want everyone in this case to have a fair trial. I do not think that the ruling of the court will in any way impede the chance of the defence to have a full defence.

Madam Speaker: I must deal with another matter before calling Routine Proceedings. Someone has signalled to me, and it has been confirmed to me, that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has clearly said that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) had deliberately misled the House.

Some hon. Members: Right.

Madam Speaker: I personally did not hear it.

Mr. Crosbie: I heard it.

Madam Speaker: I would ask the hon. member himself to tell me whether he did use that expression; otherwise I will check tomorrow in the "blues". I am afraid that if it is confirmed that the hon. member did use that expression, I will have to ask him to withdraw; but since I personally did not hear him, I will ask him today whether he did use that expression.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I did not use those particular words, no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PETITIONS

MR. MILLER—STUDENTS' PETITION FOR PEACE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the two hundred and sixty-ninth Report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) on Monday, June 14, 1982, and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KING—REMARKS OF MR. PINARD ALLEGING ABSENCE WHEN VOTE CALLED

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to present for your judgment my case for an opportunity to defend myself and my integrity as an aftermath to the statements made in this House by the government House leader on June 9. Today is the first day on which I have had the opportunity to present this question of privilege following my awareness of the content of those statements.

The offending and untrue statements by the government House leader are contained in Hansard on page 18296 as follows:

MR. PINARD: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member misunderstood the point of order raised. He was certainly not on the floor of the House when the division was called. He should be asked about this.

Further, it states:

MR. PINARD: Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat what I just said, namely that the hon. member may have misunderstood the point of order raised. There is no doubt that we all saw him, and he knows he was not on the floor of the House when the division was called.

Madam Speaker: Order. I see what the hon. member is raising as a question of privilege. I must tell the hon. member that he does not have a question of privilege, because obviously, the statement that he made in the House—

Mr. Andre: How do you know? You have not heard it yet.

Madam Speaker: —was taken as being his statement, just as a statement made by another hon. member belongs to that hon. member. I think the way in which the Deputy Speaker dealt with the question closes the matter.

I do not have in my hand the quotation of the Deputy Speaker, but I read it before coming into the House, and the Deputy Speaker said quite clearly that if the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King) said that he was here at the time the division was taken, then he was here. That statement is taken at its face value. We are all hon. members, and if the hon. member said that he was here, then he was here and the matter is closed. The last item which appears in the record involving this particular exchange in the House is this:

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has made a statement and it is the practice of the House to accept the word of the hon. member.

Therefore, the hon. member has nothing to correct.

Mr. McDermid: It is one word against another.

Madam Speaker: The statement in Hansard is quite clear.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King) is rising on a question of personal privilege. His conduct has been the subject of comments by the government House leader which have been allowed to stay on the record. A similar matter was raised by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) the other night, something unprecedented in our procedures. They were allowed to rise on questions involving them personally in order to put their explanations on the record.

All that the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen has on the record is a statement which is at odds with the statement made by the government House leader. All that the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen wishes to do is to provide the explanation that he was, in fact, in the House and had slipped over to speak with the hon. member from Chilcotin—

Mr. Clark: Prince George-Peace River.

Mr. Nielsen: —the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). He was in the House when the question was put. After the question was put and while the vote was being recorded, he slipped over to speak to the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River and then resumed his seat. That is what he wanted to explain to the House and, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order!

Mr. Nielsen: —he should be given the opportunity to make that explanation quite clear!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has had the occasion to make that statement quite clear, and I quote from Hansard where the Deputy Speaker stated:

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The orders of the House provide that a member should be in his chair to hear the question put. Was the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King) in the chair to hear the question put?

MR. KING: Yes.

So I think that is quite clear. The record of the hon. member is straight and I think we all accept the word of the hon. member that he was in his seat at that time.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member for Yukon is rising again on this particular question, I do have to remind him that I cannot accept constant exchanges once I have ruled on the question. There is no question of privilege in this particular instance and the hon. member has made his case. I pointed out to him what is on the record. I think it is quite clear that his statement has been made for the record and I cannot accept further comments on this particular question. If the hon. member for Yukon has another question to raise, that is fine, I will hear him.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO BE HEARD

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): By George, Madam Speaker, I do have another question to raise. It is the right of hon. members in this chamber to be heard and the obligation of the Chair to hear them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I have sat here for too long observing double standards being applied.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Nielsen: I have heard short, sharp questions coming from this side this afternoon and answers a yard long coming from members opposite, with all sorts of observations about the questions but none whatsoever about the length of the answers.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: These remarks about the way in which the question period is being directed—

Mr. Andre: Not just that!

Madam Speaker: —of course, are directed at myself, I presume. I think hon. members sometimes feel that the answers from the other side are too long—and ask me to cut them short. Some of them were short today. I fully recognize that. I do try to cut them short when they are too long. However, when they are too short, I am afraid I cannot ask ministers to make them longer, because that is not, of course, within the purview of my responsibilities. I try to keep everyone brief.

Today was a particularly difficult day when some questions, not all of them, were quite short. As a matter of fact, we heard from many questioners on the opposition side, which pleases me because I have many customers on my list waiting to be recognized in the question period. I feel very bad when I walk out of the question period after having allowed questions from only eight or nine hon. members in the opposition. I like to satisfy as many members as possible. I want to remind hon. members that it is in their interest to make their questions short so that everybody will have a chance.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question. It is also in the interest of ministers to keep their answer short in order to allow those customers, as you call them, to put their questions. The specific instance to which I want to draw the attention of the Chair this afternoon is that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was cut off in the middle of asking his question and he did not get the answer from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Surely he should have been allowed to complete that question. Members should not be cut off halfway through their question and be asked to put a question which they are in the middle of putting.

Madam Speaker: I stand to be corrected, but I think the commotion took place when the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) failed to get an answer to one of his questions. I, of course, cannot force another member to answer a question. He failed to receive an answer to his first question and then went on to his second question. I think the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) will recognize that I did give the hon. member for St. John's East some leeway in asking his second question. Obviously he was going beyond what is usually accepted in the course of asking questions.

It is only to maintain decorum and good order in the House that I intervene in these circumstances. I am not trying to restrict the freedom of members to express themselves. On the contrary, all members want to express themselves. The more I try to keep some members' questions short during question period, the more members will be able to exercise that freedom to express themselves.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I would point out to him that his example was particularly unfelicitous. He is complaining about long answers from this side. The hon. member for Yukon will recall that the question asked of me by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was preceded by a very long string of statistics. The question was, and I believe I can quote it almost verbatim, "and is the Prime Minister attempting to shirk his responsibilities?" That was the question. My answer was no. No, I am not attempting to shirk my responsibilities.

Madam Speaker: All right, I am sorry.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for St. John's East then rose and said—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I understand the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) desire to put the record straight, but I am afraid that we should not enter into debate on the question and answer period. Of course, this is not the time to do it. There is ample time to do that on other occasions.

MR. CLARK—REMARKS OF MR. PINARD RESPECTING MR. KING

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I also rise in the interests of setting the record straight of contributing to what I think Your Honour has called decorum and order in the House. We have a situation in relation to the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King) in which there stands on the record of the House, in the words of the government House leader's statements about the Member of Parliament for Okanagan-Similkameen that are not true. The Speaker has ruled and has read from the ruling of the Deputy Speaker that the House must accept the word of the Member of Parliament for Okanagan-Similkameen, who was indeed in the House when the question was put. By accepting that word—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clark: If I may come to my point of order—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Hear him out.

Mr. Clark: May I be heard?

Madam Speaker: No. I remind the right hon. member that I did ask the hon. member for Yukon not to comment further on this particular question which was raised by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King). The record, I believe, is straight. Divergence of views about statements which are contradictory in this House are quite frequent. That is what debate is all about. Often we have on the record contradictory statements made by one member or another, and it is quite normal. There is a government party and an opposition party. Often their views are completely opposed. Therefore, it is not abnormal to have contradictory statements. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has made a statement. I suppose he stands by that statement. If he does not want to correct it, that is up to him, not to anyone else, to decide.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to come to my point of order, which is precisely that there is a disorder in the proceedings of the House in that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has made a statement that is untrue and that stands on the record. He has not until this point risen to remove that inaccuracy, that untrue statement. I would ask him on a point of order, in the interest of maintaining order in the House of Commons, to stand in his place now and indicate that the accusation which he made against the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen is untrue.

Madam Speaker: Just before the minister rises, I want to repeat that I accept statements of all hon. members and that the House accepts statements of all hon. members. One member says that this is his perception of the fact and another member says that he has a different perception of the fact. This is perfectly legitimate in debate. I would ask the minister not to debate this, but only to reply to the question asked in the way he now sees fit.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in law, as people who have had a chance to finish law school will know, there is an old principle which says that in case of any divergence between the French and English version of a text, the version in the language used by the speaker should prevail. Thus, when I spoke in the House that evening, I said on page 18296, according to the French version of Hansard—since I spoke in French—I said, and I quote:

Monsieur le président, je pense que le député a mal saisi le sens de la question. Il n'était certainement pas à son fauteuil lorsque le vote a été tenu. Il faudrait le lui demander.

The English version quoted by the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) reads as follows, and I quote:

[English)

Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member misunderstood the point of order raised. He was certainly not on the floor of the House when the division was called.

There is a difference between "fauteuil" and "floor". When I said the member was not in his seat when the question was put—which is exactly what the member for Yukon said earlier—it was because the member was talking to another member at that member's seat. So he is corroborating exactly what I said on the evening of June 9, and since my statement has been corroborated by the member for Yukon, it is up to the member who raised a point of order to withdraw his statement.

Madam Speaker: If I understand correctly, the French text already reads like the corrected version the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen is demanding, if he is, in fact, in a position to do so.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I am trying to give the President of the Privy Council a chance to correct the record, because, in quoting his own words, he accused the member for Okanagan-Similkameen of not being in his seat when the question was put, although the member was in his seat.

Some hon. Members: Certainly not!

[English]

Mr. Clark: There may well be, Madam Speaker—if I may have some quiet from the Member of Parliament who embraces communist principles when speaking for the Liberal Party in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: He wasn't the only one.

Mr. Clark: Perhaps he was not the only one. The Prime Minister points to himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There may well be a problem of translation. In English it does say that the member was not on the floor. In French it says the member was not in his seat. That, as I recall, was the language that was used by the President of the Privy Council. In fact, the Member of Parliament for Okanagan-Similkameen was in his seat when the question was put.

• (1520)

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Clark: He then moved, he then moved.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Clark: He then moved, during the voting, to speak with one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish). He was in his seat.

Some hon. Members: He was not in his seat and you know it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: The facts are quite simple, Madam Speaker. In English, the member for Okanagan-Similkameen stands accused of not being on the floor. In French, the member for Okanagan-Similkameen stands accused of not being in his seat. In fact, he was on the floor and he was in his seat at the time the question was put. He then moved and was back into his seat again when the opportunity came for him to vote.

It would clarify all of these matters if the President of the Privy Council would accept the word—I see that the Prime Minister is walking out on a parliamentary question—of the member for Okanagan-Similkameen and correct the record in French and correct the record in English.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker—

[English]

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member wants to speak on this point of order. He does want to speak on something else later, I know that, but I will hear him now on this point of order.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I have just decided that the matter that I was going to raise later will not be raised. We have spent 22 minutes on this point of order. At the very time when we are having this debate about whether someone was in his seat or on the floor, I say to you, Madam Speaker, there are thousands who are dying in the Middle East, there are hundreds who are dying in the Falklands, there are millions of Canadians out of work, and that this is a ridiculous use of the time of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have a question of privilege in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). He is not in the House?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I saw, I believe, the President of the Privy Council rising and in fact I believe he was recognized, so I assumed he was going to remove the false statements from the record of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I was going to speak in more or less the same vein as the leader of the New Democratic Party did just now. I think it is absolutely ridiculous—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If that is the case, I declare that the debate on this question is over. I believe Hansard will be abundantly clear to everyone, and I hope that all hon. members are satisfied with the statements they have been able to make this afternoon in the House.

[English]

Some hon. Members: No, not at all.

Madam Speaker: I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby).

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBY—REMARKS OF MR. CHRÉTIEN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question of privilege arising from the remarks made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) during the question period when he responded to my inquiries concerning the Marshall case. I do not have before me the transcript of those remarks but I do believe I heard him say that I had not raised this case on a previous occasion.

Such an allegation goes to my honour as a member of this House and affects my privileges, because if such an allegation were made it would mislead this House and constitute a falsehood. I had clearly raised this case on two occasions in the House once by way of an Order Paper question on April 1, which was answered, according to Handard, on May 11, 1982, and appears at page 17285; and again by way of Standing Order 43 on April 19, 1982.

Now, Madam Speaker, too often ministers of the Crown in responding to private members in this House lay them open to charges of abusing the privileges of this House by making answers without giving an opportunity to respond. I want to make it very clear that when the Minister of Justice stands up and treats a serious matter as summarily as he does and he adds gratuitously the suggestion that I am only raising this at a late date possibly to gain publicity, possibly because the case has been the subject of a feature article in a national magazine, possibly because it appeared in a national newspaper over the weekend on the front page, then I should certainly point out that I was on record on April 1, I was on record before that, and I was on record in this House on April 19. It is the Minister of Justice who will not deal with the case, not members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I know the hon. member realizes he does not have a question of privilege, but he probably has a grievance and has made his point. A grievance can be debated on other occasions in the House of Commons and I invite the hon. member to use the procedure as it stands in order to air his grievances.

PETITIONS

MR. FLIS—POLAND—IMPOSITION OF MARTIAL LAW

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to table on behalf of over 40,000 Canadians the following petition:

That: martial law in Poland be lifted, the rights of trade unions which were achieved by the Polish people on August 1980 be reinstated, that the human rights mandated by the Helsinki Accord be reinstated;

That until these demands are met by the Polish government a trade embargo on Poland and the Soviet Union be imposed.

The petitioners hope, Madam Speaker, that you will find the petition in order and that the appropriate ministers of the Crown will consider the request of the over 40,000 Canadians signing this petition.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have something today which is non-controversial and should be music to the ears of all hon. members.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,151, 4,036, 4,308 and 4,355.

[Text]

DESK FOR PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 3,151—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 2,599 which stated in part that a province wide search was made for suitable limestone for the $2,500 worth of limestone purchased for the Prime Minister's new desk, before the actual purchase was made in the area of Cambridge, Ontario, did the search include an examination of limestone in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville and, if so (a) on what date did such an examination take place (b) what were the names and job designations of those who completed the examination?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): As stated in answer No. 2,599, a province-wide search was undertaken for suitable limestone samples through stone suppliers in Toronto. The limestone qualities in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville were not inspected, as it—along with other quarries, produces rubble stone, rather than dimensional stone, and were not represented with samples for the purpose which had been identified. (a) Not applicable, (b) Not applicable.

GRANT TO NOVA SCOTIA VOLUNTEER WEEK COMMITTEE

Question No. 4,036—Mr. Crosby:

1. Did the Nova Scotia Volunteer Week Committee receive a payment of $7,800 from the Secretary of State and, if so, under which program?

2. Are funds available to other organizations or groups under the program and, if so, what circumstances entitle a group or organization to the funds?

3. Was any part of the $7,800 granted to the committee paid to the wife of Mr. Michael J.L. Kirby, former Deputy Clerk of the Privy Council, for any services provided or any expenses incurred by her?

4. Was Mr. Kirby in any way involved in the obtaining of the grant and, if so, what was the nature of his involvement?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): 1. Provincial Volunteer Week Committee (Nova Scotia Volunteer Week Committee) received a grant of $7,800 to assist with its project "Community Volunteer Recognition Kit". Two of the project objectives—among others—are as follows: (i) "to increase dialogue between ethnic communities and the majority community on volunteerism, (ii) to increase opportunity for ethnic groups and the Provincial Volunteer Week Committee to recognize outstanding volunteers." The grant was made under group development section of the multicultural program.

2. Yes, 51 grants were issued within Nova Scotia in the 1981-82 fiscal year. Conditions for granting: (i) group must qualify as voluntary organization under the criteria established for the Secretary of State Department programs; (ii) the project must meet the objectives and priorities of the program and the goal priorities of the Halifax Regional Office of the Secretary of State Department—in this case "the encouraging and supporting of activities to improve relations between majority and minority groups in Nova Scotia by reducing perceptual barriers"—.

3. Ms. Bonnie Kirby is co-ordinator of the Provincial Volunteer Committee, and $3,000 of the grant is budgeted for salary at $500 per month for six months (Dec. 1, 1981—May 31, 1982).

4. No.

COMMISSIONER OF RCMP

Question No. 4,308—Mr. Robinson (Burnaby):

1. Does the Commissioner of the RCMP report directly to the Solicitor General or through the deputy solicitor general to the minister?

2. Does the Commissioner have the status of a deputy minister?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The Commissioner of the RCMP reports directly to the Solicitor General of Canada.

2. The Commissioner of the RCMP, for the purposes of the Public Service Employment Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, equates to a deputy minister in terms of status, however his title is that of a deputy head rather than deputy minister.

REFURBISHED SEATS FROM AIR CANADA

Question No. 4,355—Mr. McKinnon:

With reference to the answer to part 3 of question No. 4,096 which stated that 215 used refurbished seats were being purchased from Air Canada for $276,860, does this mean that each seat will cost $1,287.72 and, if so, for what reason are the seats so expensive, considering they are "used"?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Refurbished seats from Air Canada will cost a total price of $276,860 or $1,287.72 each. This price compares favourably with the following alternatives: (a) New seats of similar design to refurbished seats total cost $678,700 or $3,156 each, (b) Refurbishment of existing seats by competitive bid ranged from $472,122.58 ($2,195.92 each) to $655,742.79 ($3,048.71 each).

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, if question No. 4,048 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the other questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 4048 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Text]

GOVERNMENT HIRING POLICIES

Question No. 4,048—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the government place advertisements in newspapers calling for applications for jobs in which applicants are restricted to those of certain racial or ethnic backgrounds and, if so, what are all the details of the advertising and is the government following a policy of racism?

2. Does the government realize that (a) the majority of Canadian people support giving all possible advantages to Canada's native peoples (b) by restricting certain jobs to specific groups only, it is excluding other nationalities and Canadian citizens who might wish to apply?

3. Is it the government's intention to adopt a policy to exclude blacks, whites or any other sections of the population in the future and, if so, what is the justification for such a practice?

Return tabled.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1982-83

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-111, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bussières moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is the third time I shall have an opportunity to speak to this bill, since we had to divide the original bill, which dealt with the borrowing authority and certain amendments to the Excise Tax Act. Considering the fact that debate has been limited to a single day, today I shall be very brief in my comments and shall only raise some of the more important aspects of this legislation.

[English]

As hon. members are aware, Bill C-111 seeks parliamentary approval of borrowing authority for 1982-83 in the amount of $6.6 billion. The bill has been debated in the House and hon. members have been able to put questions about the bill to both myself and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) during our appearances before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Consequently, hon. members are quite familiar with the reason for and the contents of the bill, and I will not elaborate further on these matters.

At this time I would like to discuss the basis for the amount of borrowing authority being requested and to point out to hon. members that it will not be adequate for the whole fiscal year. Much of what I am going to say has already been said by the Minister of Finance when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, but I would like to repeat the essence of his comments to the House today.

Hon. members will recall that the request for $6.6 billion borrowing authority for 1982-83 is based on the estimated budgetary and non-budgetary financial requirements as set out in the budget which was presented to Parliament last November 12. These requirements were based on a forecast of Canadian economic growth that was current at that time. Since the calculations were made for that budget there has been a major slowing down of worldwide economic growth. In fact, most of the industrialized world is now suffering from an economic recession. It is important to note that the economic problems facing Canada are similar to the economic problems facing all major industrialized countries. All these countries, including Canada, to a greater or lesser degree are facing problems of persistent inflation, rising unemployment and slow growth.

In Canada, although budgetary projections did forecast some weakness, the depth of this recessionary period was not anticipated when the budget forecast was being prepared. Today the Canadian economy is in a much weaker position than it was last November, and this has had and will continue to have an obvious impact on government revenues and expenditures and, consequently, on the fiscal position and financial requirements.

Mr. Epp: In other words, you are broke.

Mr. Bussières: As a result of these developments we expect the financial requirements will be larger, and we expect we will have to ask the House for additional borrowing authority for 1982-83 some time before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Wilson: When?

Mr. Bussières: We would not expect the House to act on a request for additional borrowing authority without providing it with an update on the economic situation and the implications of these new developments for the government's financial requirements. The Minister of Finance has said he will issue a statement on the economy before the House recesses for the summer.

[Translation]

He also indicated, Mr. Speaker, when he appeared before the standing committee, that if a request for supplementary borrowing authority were tabled in the House, he would at that time explain why the government felt it was justified in requesting the borrowing authority. The statement to be made by the Minister of Finance before the House adjourns for the summer will also give hon. members a chance to reassess the minister's position on the economic situation in Canada. I am convinced that both hon. members and other Canadians realize that the government alone cannot be held responsible for the recession resulting from the present economic situation.

Canadians as well as the members of this House are well aware of the fact that our economy is linked to the world economic situation and to the U.S. economy. It is often said, and I feel it cannot be said often enough, that Canada has an open economy. We are dependent on foreign markets, and when there is a serious recession on those markets, we suffer the constraints of this situation. The fact that our economy is an open one and that it depends on the world economic situation and the situation in the United States, makes us even more vulnerable. Recently, Canadians and the members of this House were witness to world-level attempts at collaboration with a view to improving the international situation. I feel that inside our own country as well, we should stress concerted efforts by all economic agents to put our economy back on its feet and thus also create a favourable climate for economic recovery elsewhere.

There are a few points I would like to recall this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, which are important to this economic recovery. First of all, we should get rid of the habit we have acquired of living with high inflation rates, because that is where the root of the problem lies. Inflation creates a climate of uncertainty for investors and consumers, leading us to develop expectations and wage demands that create a climate that is very unfavourable to investment. If we want to create a favourable climate for economic recovery, we must drive out the cause of uncertainty which is inflation, and to do so, we must get rid of this habit we have acquired of living with inflation. We must also restrain our wage demands and this will happen as soon as we have rid ourselves of our inflationary expectations. All economic agents, including the federal government, provincial governments, municipalities, corporations, businessmen and private citizens we must all pool our efforts and develop attitudes that will rid us of the disease that is undermining our society and our economy, and that disease is inflation. Once we have broken out of the vicious circle of inflationary expectations, we shall be on our way towards creating a climate that is more favourable to investment than the uncertainty which is now holding back investment that would otherwise help to create jobs, reduce unemployment and bring down interest rates.

Another aspect I should like to discuss before concluding, Mr. Speaker, is the government's extremely limited room for manoeuvring in the present recession. The government cannot afford to spend irresponsibly, and the resources at its disposal are committed to programs that would be very difficult to cut back. I am thinking here of the funds—one of our colleagues will be discussing this aspect in detail later on—which are transferred to the provinces in the form of equalization payments, financing of health care and social security, and financing of post-secondary education. Substantial amounts are also earmarked for programs such as family allowances, old age security, guaranteed income supplement and the child tax credit, all programs that are aimed especially at those people in our society who are most in need of help and who are also most vulnerable in times of high inflation. I think Canadians agree with the government's philosophy that in difficult times, when the economy is in a recession, our resources should be used to bring relief to those in our society who need it most.

The government's room for manoeuvring is extremely limited, and that is why, Mr. Speaker, I called on our economic agents to pool their efforts in order to bring down inflationary pressures. I feel that this is a key factor in helping us put the economy back on its feet. Mr. Speaker, this is the only day hon. members will have to express their views on this bill, with which the government is seeking borrowing authority for $6.6 billion. As I said earlier, I have twice had an opportunity to speak to this bill. I appeared before the committee during one of its meetings to answer questions by committee members. I want to thank the members of this House for having granted me a few moments today to say my last words in this debate.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I get into my remarks on this bill I want to make one observation that I think is very important to all of us in this House today. The minister observed that this bill has been split. I want to comment that it was split after the ruling of the Speaker, on the request of the government. It is also consistent with the action agreed upon between the government and opposition parties that the omnibus bill on energy security would also be split. These are two occasions where the government has tried to use the rules of the House to introduce omnibus legislation which is totally reprehensible and has been turned down. It has been ruled on by the Speaker but the end result is that it was turned down by the House. I believe that the House acknowledges that this form of legislation is totally wrong.

I hope the government has learned that it should never again try to use this type of legislation where two or more bills are combined and put in one package. The government should not try to slide this kind of legislation by the House, using its majority to force it through. That is not acceptable to the House of Commons and such legislation should never be used again.

Let me say at the outset that after the comments made in committee the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), for this minister to come to the House and ask for permission to borrow $6.6 billion is totally in contempt of Parliament and in contempt of the Canadian people. We are being asked to vote on something when we have no idea what the end result will be. The minister himself said that he wants us to approve $6.6 billion borrowing authority, but he cannot tell us what the balance will be. He is saying to us, in effect, "Buy this used car from me. It does not work, but I am not going to tell you how much it will cost to fix it. I will come back and charge you more money to fix the car." That is what he is saying to the Canadian people today and it is totally wrong.

The minister has admitted that the estimates made in November were wrong. In committee the Minister of Finance said that he was wrong. In the November budget the estimate was $10.5 billion but I maintain that today this figure would be around $17 billion or $18 billion. Other economists in the country would say that the estimate is probably closer to $20 billion.

Why does the minister come back to the House and ask us for borrowing authority? Surely the Minister of Finance has gone through the numbers and knows the total amount he will have to borrow this year because of the change in his deficit requirements. That $18 billion means about $1,900 per taxpayer. That is a lot of money to ask from Canadian taxpayers.

Let me point out that at current rates of interest the effect of continually borrowing, deficit after deficit, is that every five years the amount doubles. If we have an $18 billion deficit today, in five years' time that will be $36 billion. The call on the Canadian taxpayer ten years from now will be $72 billion. For the government to ask for a blank cheque now is totally wrong.

We know that the economy is weak but we knew that in November. We knew we were in a recession then and we were telling the minister that we were in a recession, but he ignored us and said: "We will do business as usual. We do not believe we are in a recession." All around him people were saying the economy was in a recession but he ignored reality. He ignored the impact of the size of the deficit on the economy.

Today small-business men who are trying to keep a business going are struggling against the competition of the Government of Canada in the marketplace. They are struggling to get money at high interest rates. It is that competition from the Government of Canada that is forcing interest rates up in this country. The farmer, the home owner and the businessman are caught in the same spiral.

The minister spoke about restraint and said that we have to get used to restraint. Who is he trying to kid, Mr. Speaker? Last year the minister proposed an increase of 22 per cent in government spending. If that is restraint, when will the government get going and spend some real money?

I do not know whether the minister has been told by the Minister of Finance to come into the House and do this, but to have the audacity to request authority for $6.6 billion when he knows there will be a request for another $6.5 billion or $7 billion or $8 billion of borrowing authority in three or four weeks time is totally irresponsible and totally in contempt of this Parliament.

This is a large amount of money, Mr. Speaker. It is very hard for Canadians to understand amounts of that size. I said that it represents about $1,900 per taxpayer. That is not just a figure that floats around Ottawa, it is a figure that is of concern to all Canadians. The size of the deficit and speculation about its ultimate size is causing great uncertainty in the financial markets of the country and in foreign exchange markets. It is one of the reasons the Canadian dollar is trading below 78.39 cents U.S. today.

One of the things that we have to recognize, Mr. Speaker, is that as pressure on the Canadian dollar continues, the response of the Bank of Canada, as always, is to increase interest rates. Those increased interest rates are felt by all Canadians, those running small businesses, the home owner, the farmer, the fisherman. All Canadians suffer from high interest rates. They are at the heart of the weakness in the economy today. We have to understand that it is not just a problem that is felt in Ottawa; it is a problem for all Canadians.

On a number of occasions recently the Minister of Finance has used the flim-flam of trying to confuse Canadians by saying that the Canadian dollar is weak because the U.S. dollar is strong. Now, isn't that a great statement? There have been many times in the past when the Canadian dollar and the U.S. dollar are strong against other currencies, but why is the Canadian dollar weak and the U.S. dollar strong today? It is because the Canadian government is not following sound policies. Inflation is 5 per cent or 6 per cent higher here than in the U.S.; the U.S. economy is starting to turn around but we are still going straight down. That is why the Canadian dollar is weak. The marketplace has no confidence in Canadian government policies. The level of the dollar at 78.39 is the verdict of the marketplace. It is the barometer of the success or, as in this case, the failure of government policies. It is not just the budget but a series of policies which have led to the weakness in the dollar. It is the problems arising from the NEP, last year's budget and the federal-provincial squabbles which go on and on, provoked by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance.

The Canadian dollar today is viewed as a basket case. Some people in the marketplace call it the banana because they see Canada approaching the status of a banana republic. It is a joke to those people but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is not a joke to me because I have some pride in this country. I want to see the economy run better than in most other countries. It could be but it is not, and the reason is the failure of this government to address the problems which are within our control. If we were having problems but had some economic growth and lower levels of unemployment and inflation, I could accept that. However, I think the minister probably saw in this morning's paper that the Bank of International Settlements said Canada is dead last in productivity growth. You do not have to be a good economist to understand what is going wrong. You do not have to understand the intricacies of the economy. The fact that the Canadian dollar has gone from 1.02 six years ago to the current level of 78.39 says it all. And the bad management starts right here with this deficit we are talking about today.

We have in our country today, Mr. Speaker, and indeed around the world, a crisis of confidence in this country. I would like to read what Mr. W. A. Wilson said about this in a recent article:

> It seems beyond dispute that a restoration of confidence is this country's greatest single need at the present time since little economic improvement is likely to start within Canada while confidence is as low as it is now.

Don McGillivray, also a respected columnist, said:

> The government's most critical shortage today is credibility.

We have to rebuild that credibility and confidence in the country. But the government comes to the House of Commons and says: "We want to borrow $6.5 billion. Give us the authority, but we cannot tell you how much more there is to come. There will be more but we cannot tell you now." What does that say to people who are looking for some indication that this government knows what it is doing? It says nothing. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are doing nothing to restore that confidence.

The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) said in his opening remarks that Canada's economy is particularly vulnerable today to international economic forces. So why is not the government and the Prime Minister trying to restore that confidence? All the Prime Minister has been doing these past few weeks is to flail away at the U.S.; it is all the fault of the Federal Reserve Bank. On the weekend he said NATO was the problem. At the same time he and the Minister of Finance ignore the problems here in Canada. The Prime Minister's stated efforts at Versailles clearly failed. He went to Versailles to get a change in the monetary policies of the U.S. government and he failed. At the same time he comes back and tells those Canadians who are losing their jobs on a daily basis and struggling with high interest rates that there will be no major change in policy. If he felt so strongly that Versailles was the answer, how can he come back to Canada and sit on his hands and say business as usual, there will be no significant change in the policies of this country?

Let us look at the Canadian dollar as the focal point of so many of these problems. It in itself is the major problem facing Canada today, because the decline in the dollar leads to higher interest rates which affect all Canadians. The decline also reflects a tremendous outflow of capital to create jobs in other countries at a time when we have 1.5 million unemployed. Why is this happening? People in Canada feel very strongly about some things, one of which is their retirement income. People set aside money each year for their retirement, and when they see that little nest egg threatened by policies which lead to inflation and a decline in our standard of living, they take refuge in stronger currencies. Businesses small and large see their future threatened by this government's policies and they move their money out in order to spread the risk around. Sometimes they move their entire investment out of the country.

Just to demonstrate that I am speaking in real terms I want to put some numbers on the record. Last year direct investment in Canada by non-residents showed a net loss of $5.3 billion. At the same time Canadians made direct investments in other countries totalling $4.9 billion, for a $10.2 billion outflow. That compares with the previous two years of around $2 billion a year. Then there are the small amounts of money which are too small to be picked up by the statistics-gathering people. Last year that amounted to about an $8.4 billion outflow, compared again to a level of about $2 billion a year in the previous two years. So the total amount of money which left Canada in 1981 was $18.6 billion as against an average of about $4 billion, or 4.5 times the previous level. Just to put that figure in context, it represents about 1.5 times the total amount of money we spent in Canada on housing. That amount of money could create a tremendous amount of employment in this country. That is the sort of thing that has been going on in response to the policies of this government.

Why is there no confidence in the Canadian dollar? I have said this before and I will say it again, again and again. Why is the Canadian dollar weak? First, there is the National Energy Program; second, the attitude toward foreign investment; third, the budgetary proposals of last year; fourth, the high federal government deficit; and fifth, the federal-provincial squabbles. All of those things are causing pressure and are at the heart of the record outflow of capital to which I have just referred.

If those policies are turned around, the outflow of capital would be turned around and we would see that money surging back into the country. This would alleviate pressure on the dollar and it would alleviate pressure on interest rates. It would create employment in the country where we need it the most. I see the parliamentary secretary is shaking his head.

Mr. Fisher: I will not agree with that.

Mr. Wilson: The parliamentary secretary does not know what has happened. He does not understand what is going on in the country today. I suggest the parliamentary secretary talk to people, people in the real world, not those who are in the ivory towers of Ottawa but people who are dealing with problems that have been caused by the policies I have outlined.

Mr. Fisher: Getting rid of FIRA would not change a thing.

Mr. Wilson: The parliamentary secretary says, getting rid of FIRA would not change a thing, but I say to him try it for six months and see what changes there will be.

The Canadian dollar should and could be higher in terms of the U.S. dollar. The parliamentary secretary should ask international investors who are shaking their heads why the Canadian dollar is weak. The Canadian dollar should be strong. A strong Canadian dollar would lead to lower interest rates in Canada.

Let me put on the record part of an article that appeared in The Financial Times about a week ago. It reads:

> This is an embarrassing tragedy for Canadians. The dollar could be—should be—one of the world's stronger currencies. But years of economic mismanagement and strident nationalism have driven investors out of Canada, stripping the country of much of its potential.

These are made-in-Canada problems. We have the solutions totally within our control. The parliamentary secretary has proved once again that his head is buried six feet deep in the ground, because he totally ignores what is going on in the real world. The minister himself is frozen in inaction. He is frightened to move. He is frightened to make another mistake. He is betting zero for two in the budget and he does not want to make it zero for three by coming up with another mistake. The dithering which the minister is displaying and has displayed for the past six months is compounding the problem we are facing today and is one of the reasons for the high interest rates in Canada.

A number of people have said: "Let the dollar go, let interest rates go and all our problems will be solved." Let me put a few figures on the record. Let us look at facts and not at rhetoric. In October, 1976, the Canadian dollar was worth $1.028 in terms of the U.S. dollar. Since then the value of the Canadian dollar has declined by 24 per cent. In February, 1980, when this government came into power, the Canadian dollar was worth 86.5 cents. Since that time the Canadian dollar has declined 8 per cent against the U.S. dollar to its current level of 78.39 cents today.

What has happened to interest rates? When the dollar goes down, interest rates are supposed to go down also. Is that not what the government has been telling us, Mr. Speaker? But during this period of time, the chartered banks prime rate has risen from 10.25 per cent in 1976 to 15 per cent in 1980. The prime rate at the chartered banks is now 17.5 per cent.

Let us take a look at what has happened to inflation. Inflation has risen from 6.2 per cent in October, 1976, to 9.4 per cent in February, 1980. The current level is now 11.25 per cent to 11.50 per cent.

Let me turn now to the unemployment rate. I will not talk about the rate but rather about the number of people who are unemployed. These figures are shocking. In October, 1976, 770,000 people were unemployed. That figure has risen to the current level of 1.2 million. In 1980, 856,000 people were unemployed. Compare that to the current number of 1.2 million people who are unemployed. Those figures say it all. The human suffering and tragedy that is represented by those figures has not been cured by letting interest rates go and letting the dollar go. The decline in the value of the dollar has not solved the problem; it has just made those problems even worse.

Mr. Thacker: Liberal times are lousy times.

Mr. Wilson: I have talked about some of the problems we can deal with immediately. As I told the parliamentary secretary, in six months' time the government could take action in the five different areas that I referred to earlier.

Let us look beyond that a little. Let us look at the problem of productivity in our country. I said a moment ago that the Bank of International Settlements has put us dead last in productivity among the industrialized countries. Action has to be taken in this area. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) has talked a lot about the problems of research and development and the need for more product development in this country. But what we are looking for here is action and not rhetoric. Rhetoric comes very cheap and the government opposite knows that. Instead let us again talk about facts.

We have to change the tax regime on research and development. More than that, we have to remove some of the regulatory problems that are inhibiting the increase in research and development. I will cite one example: it concerns the pharmaceutical industry. The law was changed about 12 or 13 years ago to call for compulsory licensing of pharmaceutical inventions. What has happened since, now that pharmaceutical inventions are no longer protected by the laws of this country? It is all very simple. At that time the pharmaceutical industry was spending about 8 per cent of its sales in research and development. Currently that industry is spending 1.7 per cent. The percentage has dropped from 8 per cent all the way down to 1.7 per cent. That is the sort of regulation which can be changed and must be changed if we are going to meet the objective of increased productivity in this country.

Canadians today have a great fear of the future. They know that there are great changes coming in the high technology industry. Canadians know, if we spend this money on research and development, that it will bring some dramatic changes in many industries in the country. In order to meet people's concern and anxiety as to whether or not they will be able to hold a job in that environment, we have to increase significantly the amount of on-the-job training so that people can adjust to the future. It will be a very exciting future, but if people do not feel they are a part of it, it is of great concern to them. That is why training programs have to be changed. If we can increase that level of training, people would be looking forward to what those new jobs can do for them. People will start spending their money. They will begin to think about buying a new car or a new house. That is the sort of thing that will get the economy going again instead of having people totally mesmerized by the problems that face us all today.

I repeat what I said a minute ago about the need for restraint on the part of this government. The minister says that we must limit our demands, but to keep saying that again and again in face of the huge increases in government spending is throwing untruths at the people of Canada. They understand. It is hurting the government and it is hurting the credibility of the government when people continually hear there must be restraint. The government has to act. Its members cannot sit and talk. Rhetoric is cheap. The government must act and it must act soon.

During 1979, when we were in power, we showed that government spending can be cut below the rate of growth in the national income. My recollection is that it was down about 2.5 per cent below the rate of growth in the national income. Last year government spending was 50 per cent higher than the rate of growth in the national income. That cannot continue. There is good reason why that cannot continue.

A moment ago I discussed the compounding factor of deficits that increase with the high rates of interest which we have today. Right now we have a dead weight deficit because the deficit itself represents approximately the same amount that the government is spending on interest on the funded debt. We are spending one dollar in five in interest on the funded debt of the Government of Canada. That is dead weight because the money cannot be spent on any social program, on stimulating industry or on stimulating the economy. It is dead weight deficits which are causing the problems in the country today. We have been saying for almost five years that we must free ourselves of this dead weight. However, the government keeps coming back with the same statements. It does not understand the impact of what is happening.

Another policy which could be adopted involves the area of savings and investment. People must be encouraged to save their money in order to provide the funds that businesses and individuals can borrow to enable Canada to grow, allow businesses to expand and enable people to buy homes. If people cannot save their money, the pool of available funds to finance the economic recovery in Canada will not be there. This is one of the key elements for reducing the strain on the Canadian dollar as well as on interest rates.

Finally, incentives must be introduced in Canada. The budget of November, 1981, did as much to undermine and kill productive investment in Canada as any single act by the government in the past ten or 15 years. Small business people, who are at the heart of the economy in Canada and who provide 65 per cent or 70 per cent of employment in Canada, have been kicked in the stomach by that budget. Small business people have lost their confidence in the economy.

During the month of January the budget committee of the Progressive Conservative caucus travelled across Canada to hold meetings. I will never forget the discussions I had with a group of small-business men, and one from Dupont in particular. He said that he had left Dupont ten years earlier to start a new business. After we talked about some of the problems that this budget presented to him, I said, "If you were in Dupont today and you saw the provision in this budget and the attitudes behind it toward you as a potential entrepreneur and small-business man, would you leave Dupont?" He said: "No, I would not leave Dupont today. The risk is too great and the government has removed too many of the rewards."

Just yesterday I spoke to another small-business man. He told me that one of the great benefits of owning a small business is that you can build a nest egg in order to have something upon which to retire. It is something you can work at and create yourself because it involves your future. However, he said that the budget of 1981 has largely taken away the ability of individual businessmen and small entrepreneurs to build that nest egg for their future. This is happening to a sector which is at the heart of our society as well as our economy. That is why the budget is such a damaging document.

Today we are discussing the size of the budget deficit and how we can get it under a greater degree of control. This control can be achieved in three ways. One is to reduce spending, another is to increase revenues, and a third—one that very few people talk about—is to reduce interest rates. Last year 22 per cent of government spending was on interest rates, which is an important factor to our budget deficit problem. This government has failed in all three of those methods of controlling the budget deficit.

Last year, government spending was up 22 per cent, as was set out in the last budget. Government spending is out of control.

With respect to the second method, raising revenues, the government has sought to increase revenues by increasing tax rates instead of increasing the incentives for Canadians to go out and work hard to build a business, increasing government revenues through an increase of the size of the Canadian economy. The government has gone about it in the wrong way. I believe that the minister's rating on that question is about three out of ten. He said that he would drop the marginal tax rate but only for very high income people. He has ignored the low-income earners who play a very important role in increased economic activity. He has also increased other tax rates and put a greater load on the economy which is showing up in the poor economic growth figures today.

Let me use the United Kingdom as an illustration. It is said that the experiments in the United Kingdom are failing, and I would like to expand on that for the record since the results are fascinating. In 1979 the government in the United Kingdom dropped the marginal tax rate for upper-income people believing that it would result in a significant drop in tax revenues. The government therefore increased the value-added tax by approximately 70 per cent or 80 per cent. As I indicated, the results of that experiment are fascinating. Revenues from income tax increased on a real basis for the first time in six years and the value-added tax that was increased by 70 per cent or 80 per cent only increased by approximately 45 per cent in real terms. This represents a very clear illustration of the impact of incentive and how people can be encouraged to build and create businesses. This also inspires greater effort to purchase in the productive economy instead of making purchases of such things as Rolls-Royces, expensive pictures and gold in a non-productive economy.

Mr. Evans: So we cut marginal taxes.

Mr. Wilson: That is why you cut marginal tax rates, as the former parliamentary secretary says. But why did hon. members not cut it right across the board? That was the government's mistake.

Mr. Evans: We did.

Mr. Wilson: No, you did not. You cut the tax rates only in the upper incomes and you know it.

The third method of deficit control concerns interest rates. I do not have to tell anyone that the government has failed totally in this area. We have interest rates which are hovering very close to the high levels of last year. As well, we have the weak Canadian dollar which spells increasing interest rates and probably a continuation of the high level of interest rates which exist today. Clearly, the lack of control of spending and the uncontrollable size of this budget deficit which we are discussing today will continue to present problems in trying to reduce interest rates.

The government must change its course and take action to offer some new policies. It must try to reverse its record and its policies in order to restore some confidence in the country and in individuals who have been building this country for 100 years but who can no longer look beyond the valley we are in today. They are only looking on the down side of that valley. The most punishing course for Canada to take today would be to cling to the blunders of the past.

It is for that reason that I urge the government to withdraw this borrowing bill and introduce a new financial and economic statement which would disclose the economic and financial outlook for today. I urge the government to come clean with Canadians and tell us what the problems are so we may then set out some alternative policies. I ask it to make some fundamental changes to the direction in which it is heading. Do not take the line that the Prime Minister was trying to give us today, that there will be no changes. I urge the Liberal caucus to take that message to the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance tomorrow and to tell them that this country needs new policies and a change in the direction in which we are headed. If we do not have that change, how can Canadians see any hope? How will Canadians be able to feel any sense of confidence in responding to change if there is nothing to respond to? How will they act positively to get the country going again and back to the level of hope and confidence which existed 15 years ago? I say give Canadians a chance to prove that they can do it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I must say that this is not a particularly cheerful debate today in the House; this is not a happy day. Listening to the—

Mr. Thomson: When was the last time you had a happy day in this house?

Mr. Riis: The question was, when was the last time we had a happy day in the House? I cannot recall. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussieres) has asked us today to approve Bill C-111 which would give the government authority to borrow $6.6 billion.

This should be a very straightforward debate. It should also be a very straightforward bill, an opportunity to comment on the state of affairs in the country and perhaps to compliment the government on a variety of initiatives and so on. Well, of course, today's debate is anything but that. It is like being hit in the solar plexus by Sylvester Stallone. It is like being hit over the head with a two by four. It is like being tossed a lead weight when one is drowning.

This request for $6.6 billion comes at a very peculiar time in Canada's history. I suspect that the people of Canada who are listening to this debate and watching the government's actions these days are absolutely shell-shocked. They cannot believe the announcements that they read in the newspapers day by day and that they hear via the media. What will it take to surprise any Canadian today in terms of gloomy economic news? I cannot imagine what it would take—yet the most positive thing that the Minister of State for Finance has said to us today is that in the next few days the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will stand up in the House and give us an economic statement. That will be hollow news to people who are losing their homes, their farms and ranches, seeing their businesses go down the tube, seeing their friends and neighbours laid off from jobs and losing any hope of employment in the near future.

A statement by the minister—how nice! Will that not be welcome news? What the people of Canada are asking from the government is action; they are asking for legislation, for a removal of that hideous November 12, 1981, budget which sent shock waves around the country, sending a clear message to every Canadian that this government does not recognize that there is a serious economic problem. For many Canadians, that comes as a surprise. How on earth could anyone not perceive the economic problems this country is facing?

In an effort to seek the response to that question, one looks around at the power brokers within government circles. We recognize that not all 142 hon. members across the aisle are of equal weight in government decision making. Perhaps even the 30-odd cabinet ministers are not of equal weight. But when one looks at where those movers and shakers exist, where the power brokers within the Liberal cabinet originate, it is not surprising that a good proportion originate in the downtown towers of Toronto and right here in Ottawa. When one considers the economic milieu of head office Toronto or head office

Montreal, or the nation's capital here in Ottawa, and one's travel and interrelations are restricted to those particular areas, it is no wonder that people are a little misinformed as to the reality in this country, what is going on in Halifax, what is going on in Chicoutimi, what is going on in Regina and in Prince Rupert. Quite different things are going on around the country where lay-offs are occurring, where mines are closing and major businesses are closing their doors, either temporarily or permanently. Again, it is quite a different picture from the one we find in the head office areas of Toronto and Montreal. It has been very clear that the government has misread the economic situation in this country and perhaps in the western world. It has totally misread it, as clearly exemplified by the request today for $6.6 billion.

A few days ago in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, the Minister of Finance admitted that the government has misread the economic situation and underestimated its needs. A few months ago, the Minister of Finance predicted that the deficit for this year would be $10.5 billion. Many of us on this side of the House laughed at that point, knowing and sensing at that time what was happening to the Canadian economy. Seeing the Canadian economy deteriorating in a number of sectors, we felt at that point it was naive to think that the budget deficit would be only $10.5 billion this year. Now the Minister of Finance suggests that it will probably be closer to $13 billion. The finance critic for the Progressive Conservative Party suggests it will probably be closer to $18 billion. Other financiers are predicting $19 billion and some are now venturing deficits of $20 billion for this year.

The situation is much worse than most of us in this House are prepared to admit or most business people are prepared to discuss openly. The situation is very grave indeed. How serious is it? What are some of the indicators? What are some of the clues as to the seriousness of today's economic malaise? We see the dollar plummeting, hourly now, as a true barometer of both the confidence of Canadians in our dollar and especially the confidence of those beyond our borders in the value of Canadian currency. At two o'clock today, June 15, the value of the Canadian dollar was 78.29 cents U.S. and falling. This is the barometer of confidence, then, that we use to measure how people are viewing the leadership provided by the Canadian government and how they really perceive the state of the economy.

What is particularly frustrating is the con job of the government in the sense that it attempts on a weekly basis, when it often goes out to borrow hundreds of millions of dollars in an effort artificially to shore up the value of the Canadian dollar, somehow to create the impression that it is worth more than it really is on those free-flowing international money markets. It is akin to holding a match under the thermometer in one's house in order to prove that the house is in fact a lot warmer than it actually is. It is not a true indication of the value of the Canadian dollar or the state of the Canadian economy. Nevertheless, we try to create this illusion, this artificial sense of confidence which, of course, fools no one in Canada and certainly no one beyond.

Another indicator of the seriousness of the situation is today's unemployment situation in the country, a country which all of us in this chamber would recognize as being one of the most wealthy in the entire world, perhaps having more opportunities and potential than any other nation on the face of the earth. Yet today, in real terms, the numbers of unemployed in Canada is nearly reaching the figure of 1.8 million people. I know things are very bad, but it amounts to nearly 1.8 million people, about 16 per cent of the total work force in this country, up more than 45 per cent over last year and, of course, the statistics themselves mask what is really going on with those figures.

The fact is that nearly 1.8 million people are unemployed. What does that mean? It means a great deal of human tragedy and human suffering in this country, a level of human suffering which has not occurred since the depths of the depression in the 1930s. There is no hope. There are serious social costs which will amount to many billions of dollars in this country as a result of these high unemployment figures. The economic problems we face today will be overcome in one form or another in the years ahead. But the tearing of our social fabric, the social decay resulting from these figures, will not be mended in a year or two, or in a decade or two. As a matter of fact, it might take a generation or two to erase the social scars resulting from these serious unemployment figures.

As well as the emotional and human scars resulting from these high unemployment statistics, the collapse of hope in the future is perhaps the most disappointing aspect of these figures. The fact is that nearly two million Canadians are now out of work or daily haunted by the spectre of being out of work in the next little while. They see their friends and colleagues around them losing their jobs. The threat of unemployment is growing on a daily basis. Canadians who have been securely employed in factories for 20 or 25 years are now finding themselves on the unemployment rolls. What does that do? What kind of shock waves does that send through the system? The harsh policies that the government has had in place over the last number of years were presumably introduced to fight inflation. We are experiencing a hideous situation in this country. Unemployment is now running at 11.3 per cent. That means that for the last number of years, the purchasing power of the average Canadian has deteriorated. Their disposable income today buys less than it did last year and it bought less last year than the year previous A typical basket of goods which cost $231 in 1981 today, in 1982, costs $257. Wage settlements are not keeping up with the rate of inflation. Most people in this country are becoming relatively poorer each year as a result of inflation.

The government set out on a course to combat inflation. In 1975 it decided the way to fight inflation was to increase interest rates. I want to read a quote from Governor Bouey in 1975. He said:

—through a sharp and immediate reduction of the growth rate of the money supply ... inflation would readily come to an end. The trouble with this prescription is not with the medicine but with the dosage, which would be so great that the patient would suffer excessively while it was working. It would sharply curtail the growth of spending on goods and services . . .result in extremely weak markets, widespread bankruptcies and soaring unemployment.

That is exactly what the program did. The problems that we face in this country today to a certain extent are a result of planned government policy. It is no accident. That is what the Governor of the Bank of Canada said in 1975 would happen with this policy. He said that bankruptcies would skyrocket, unemployment would skyrocket, markets would weaken and there would be a great deal of suffering among the Canadian people.

The government has been remarkably successful in its efforts at strangling the life of the economy as a result of its monetarist policies. This was planned and it has been successful. There is very little life in the Canadian economy, thanks to the policies of this government and the direction as of late of Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada. The prime rate is 17½ per cent. This Thursday we will again go into the interest roulette game and the rate will go up again. Those required to refinance their mortgages will probably be doing so at a rate close to 20 per cent, if not higher.

The devastation that is occurring across the country as a result of these rates is nothing short of a disaster. Two and a half years ago we in the New Democratic Party predicted this exact situation. We said this policy would result in despair in this country, that it would hammer the economy to death. Today we are haunted by the realism of those projections.

I want to quote the comments of a couple of business and financial leaders in this country on the high interest rate policy. Mr. William Mulholland, the chief executive officer of the Bank of Montreal, said:

Industry is very vulnerable to high interest rates and an extended period of high interest rates should therefore be a matter of considerable concern. I believe that the cumulative effect is more serious than is generally realized.

William Mackness of Pitfield, MacKay, Ross said:

—the situation is continuing to deteriorate. There is a desperate need for lower interest rates, renewed economic growth and a major increase in the supply of common equity financing.

Calvert Knudsen, the chief executive officer of the giant MacMillan Bloedel corporation, was more emphatic when he said that some direct intervention by the federal government is necessary now in order to avert some economic collapse in every sector of the Canadian economy.

The other day representatives of the trust companies of Canada appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. They suggested that if major policy changes, both monetary and fiscal, were not made by this government immediately, we would be looking at a total economic collapse within six months in this, the richest country in the world.

The high interest rate policy that continues to be pursued by this government, I suspect with the support of my colleagues to my right, will be the death knell of the Canadian economy unless that policy is changed very quickly. Canada and the United States stand out as leaders in a certain category of western industrialized nations. They are now the only two nations that are experiencing negative growth in their GNP and will likely experience that for the next number of months. Other western industrialized nations have taken action independent of the United States because they cannot afford to have deterioration in their GNP. As a result, there has been renewed growth in those economies, but not in the United States and Canada.

With regard to housing starts, on a seasonally adjusted annual basis there were 116,000 housing starts in this country. If this continues, and it likely will, this will be the worst year for housing since 1966. We will be 100,000 units short in 1982 in terms of meeting the housing demand in this country.

What is going on in the business community? It looks at the government assembled across the aisle and shakes its head in disbelief at the fiscal policies that the government keeps in place as well as the budget and monetary policies. It is perfectly clear even to a blind man that the business climate in this country is at an all-time low.

Let me quote a few statistics. The Dun & Bradstreet report two weeks ago indicated that in 1981, 151 out of 10,000 businesses failed in Canada. In 1932 at the beginning of the depression, the ratio was 161 per 10,000 businesses failed. In other words, we are nearly there now in terms of business failures in Canada. We all recognize that the United States is also experiencing severe economic difficulties. Their rate of failures at the present time is not 151 per 10,000 but 62 per 10,000. Substantially less pain is being experienced by the American business community than by the Canadian business community.

To date in 1982, business bankruptcies number 4,429, up 36 percent over last year. Personal bankruptcies in the first five months of this year number 11,426, up 18 per cent over last year. Farm bankruptcies are even worse, up 60 per cent over the same period last year.

When we talk about business failures or business difficulties, bankruptcies are just the tip of the iceberg. We talk only of the number of businesses in the receivership process. There are countless more which simply closed their doors and their owners walked away in disgust, having had their hopes and dreams dashed as a result of the difficult economic times.

Earlier today we had a discussion about Canada's export performance. This is an area where the government must pay more attention. In the last ten years, from 1973 to 1982—and I use the 1982 figures, Mr. Speaker, based on information from the IMF—after deducting the inflation rate, exports grew in Canada at an average of 3.4 per cent annually.

Canada is one of the world's major trading nations. We depend on exports. As a matter of fact, 25 per cent of what we produce is used for export. That compares to the United States with 8 per cent, and to Japan with about 12.5 per cent. But while we grew over the decade an average of 3.4 per cent annually, the total average for the western industrialized nations was significantly greater; it was 5.3 per cent. For the United Kingdom it was 4.5 per cent; for the United States it was 5.3 per cent; for Germany it was 5.8 per cent; for France 5.9 per cent; and Japan 8.5 per cent. In other words, we are a major trading nation in terms of our growth of exports, but we are growing at a significantly lower rate than all the western industrialized nations.

We have to start opening up new markets. We have to start producing goods and providing services that are marketable internationally. As the member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) indicated, we have to start spending more money on research and development to develop these new product lines that will be available for export.

If I may use the example of France—much to the chagrin of my colleagues to the right, I am sure—the government of France has in recent months placed a great deal of money into research and development in those critical areas in which they deemed they may have a significant advantage in terms of international trade, and in the new technology firms. Of course, one of the vehicles they used was the nationalized banking system.

There is a process occurring today, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the difficult economic times in which we find ourselves, with government policies, fiscal policies, monetary policies. It is a process that we must remind ourselves is occurring. That is to say, to put it simply, the rich are getting very rich and the poor are getting relatively poorer.

We are seeing the middle class, so called, in Canada slowly evaporating; the middle class in our society is disappearing. These particular policies are not harmful for everyone. There are sectors of Canadian society that are doing extremely well today. Most people, of course, are being devastated, are being driven to the wall. The big are getting bigger and the small are getting smaller or are disappearing.

Think of any business, Mr. Speaker—carpets, draperies or small manufacturing firms which supply the housing market and so on. As they come under more and more pressure as a result of these economic times, we see small businesses falling by the wayside. The cost of their money is greater, the cost of their services is greater and they fall by the wayside. Who is left? The national chains and the multinationals that are operating within our country. We see the removal of Canadian content within Canadian business. That is why I and my colleagues react with some anxiety when we hear our colleagues to the right seeking to dismantle FIRA, to open the floodgates for more foreign intervention, for more foreign investment, for more foreign capital decision-making within our country. It is that kind of blind answer to these problems that causes me a great deal of concern. My colleagues are equally anxious that the government should not take this particular step in terms of their recovery program.

I would like to comment, Mr. Speaker, on the particular situation in my own riding. I do not want to focus on my own riding for personal reasons but I use it as an example because it is one of the more prosperous parts of Canada generally. Incomes are relatively high. It seldom experiences economic downturns even when other parts of the country are experiencing difficult times. But today the official unemployment rate in Kamloops-Shuswap is nearly 14 per cent. In real terms it is closer to 25 per cent, Mr. Speaker, because of the vast numbers of people who have long since given up hoping for any meaningful employment opportunities. This figure would be much larger if the actual number were documented. For example, the known unemployment in the forest and logging industry is 600 people; 1,200 in clerical and related activities; 600 in sales occupations; 1,000 in service occupations; 750 in processing; over 200 in the machinery sector; almost 1,700 in the construction sector; more than 600 in the transportation and equipment sectors. That is a total of nearly 10,000 unemployed. That is just one part of British Columbia. There is another 1,200 to come in the next couple of days because of massive mine closures and a major pulp mill closure.

We have a crisis of confidence, Mr. Speaker. Canadians are giving up hope in the government, obviously, in the future and then predict a more dismal future than they would ever have imagined a couple of months ago. A day does not go past, Mr. Speaker, in my riding offices that home owners are not coming in, virtually in tears, because they are going to lose their homes; or then have lost their homes and they come to their Member of Parliament to report what they have experienced. They ask what I can do. When I say there is a government program to assist people having housing difficulties, they stop. The program? If they qualify? I suspect that 99.99 per cent of Canadians do not qualify for the housing support program. And if they do, what it would essentially do would be to put them into greater debt. That is the answer of the government. The governments' solution is to create more debt than we presently have.

Quite frankly, we in the New Democratic Party do not subscribe to that solution at all. Ranchers and small-businessmen are coming into my office about to lose the property that they have worked hard for, many perhaps for two or three generations. It is almost unbelievable when you think of the minimal cash flow that these folks require but are unable to manage during these difficult economic times.

The worst is yet to come, Mr. Speaker. Even with the most optimistic hopes that people have in terms of what the government is about to announce, it will be many months before real recovery can occur; and that is if they come up with an outstanding program, which no one is holding his breath waiting for.

People are losing faith in the future, in the government, in their own abilities, because they see so many of the problems that we face today being the result, not of any fault of their own, not of any error in their judgment, but because the government, for example, follows this extremely high interest rate policy. That is what is causing the devastation. They are failing through no fault of their own.

I could go on today, Mr. Speaker, with a vast array of suggestions that have been put forward by the New Democratic Party in terms of our party's economic recovery program. The Minister of State for Finance knows what they are. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Fisher) knows what they are. We have laid them out time and time again over the last couple of weeks, so that no one today can stand up and say that the New Democratic Party does not have an economic recovery program.

The economic programs that we have suggested that would result in a move to recovery would not cause a significantly increased deficit. We feel that the scope exists for the reallocation of funds, that present expenditures are no longer appropriate. Those existing expenditures must be reallocated into more productive capacity development, into areas that will result in return. In other words, this will move some of the present government spending, which obviously is in the budget, into some investment areas. That would invest in the future, so that even in terms of the recovery program that we propose we are not talking of additional government expenditures to any significant degree. It would include an immediate stimulus to our economic situation. It would put many of the tradesmen in the housing sector back to work immediately. It would provide an incentive to manufacturing firms right across the country that serve that particular industry. It would also provide a market for our timber products and put a large number of our forest workers back to work as well.

That is the kind of immediate program we advocate. Of course, the longer-term program would be to negotiate with multinational companies operating in this country. Multinational companies are a reality and will be for many years to come, but we should negotiate production agreements with those companies. If they are to have a market in this country, they should provide jobs in this country.

The Japanese auto industry is a case in point. If we are to be driving 200,000 additional Japanese vehicles each year, let us negotiate with the Japanese auto industry so that the Japanese source their parts and components in Canada and assemble vehicles in Canada as well. If this is not done at the rate of 100 per cent, then perhaps 85 per cent or 75 per cent would be acceptable; but for goodness sake let us negotiate jobs for profits with multinational companies. It would not be asking for anything particularly different. Most of the countries of the world already do that. We are simply asking that we behave as most progressive nations in the world behave today.

With respect to government procurement, I know the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) occasionally outlines the government's policies. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) says the government is encouraging small business. That is rhetoric. It sounds great in speeches, but when it comes down to the actual fact, the procurement policies of the federal government are abysmal. They simply do not provide the support and encouragement they could provide.

In closing, I would simply like to say that the people of Canada no longer want statements from the Minister of Finance. We are being asked to support $6.6 billion in additional government expenditures. The people of Canada want to see how it will be invested and how it will be used. They want a realistic statement from the Minister of Finance. They want action. No longer can we afford statements.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) has time left, would he permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) accept a question?

Mr. Riis: Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker. I think perhaps I have a moment or two left.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the people the hon. member quoted as saying there is an economic crisis. I believe he referred to William Mackness and to Calvert Knudsen of McMillan Bloedel. Focusing on the president of MacMillan Bloedel, does the hon. member endorse the solutions the president of MacMillan Bloedel put forward, and does he have the same concern that company has about its becoming too weak to withstand the pressures of labour unions? Does he also want the federal government to impose wage and price controls so that corporations will be able to keep wages down?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to that question. I was anticipating the question, but I was actually expecting it from someone on this side.

The point I made in my presentation this afternoon was that wages and wage settlements have fallen behind the rate of inflation for five consecutive years. In other words, they are not fueling inflation in this country. The purchasing power of Canadians has deteriorated for five consecutive years, and anyone who would suggest that the solution to our economic problems is to impose wage controls is either simple or naive or both. The point of quoting Calvert Knudsen was that he is a man who represents one of the most significant industries in the country. He is a knowledgeable individual in the woods industry. He predicted an economic collapse if the fiscal and monetary policies of this government are not changed. I think this person is worthy of being listened to.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation for the opportunity to take part in today's debate on Bill C-111, to provide supplementary borrowing authority. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport I am privileged to comment on the bill as it affects transportation, and I am very pleased that the official critic for the New Democratic Party understands the importance of investment. I do not think there is any more important sector of the economy than transportation, and it is important that we invest in that sector for the future growth of Canada.

We heard from the official opposition about the importance of stimulating the economy to create jobs. I am taking part in this debate because I think vast investments in transportation would have a stimulative effect on the economy and would create jobs without fueling inflation as such investments in other sectors of the economy would.

From the perspective of transportation as a whole, the importance of this bill cannot be overstated. As members of this chamber are very well aware, transportation has played a significant role in the development of this vast country and in keeping it together. The excellent movement of passengers has helped to bring Canadians closer together and has contributed to their high standard of living. An effective system for the transportation of goods has permitted, and contributed to, the development of the Canadian economy.

Responsibility for management of the national transportation system from the federal perspective falls under the jurisdiction of Transport Canada, the Canadian Transport Commission and a handful of Crown corporations such as Air Canada, CN, the National Harbours Board, the Northern Transportation Company Limited, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and four pilotage authorities.

Transport Canada is a very complex operating department, as I am beginning to find out in my new role as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. Because it is responsible for air, marine and portions of the surface modes of transport, its activities affect the daily lives of most Canadians in some way. In addition to employing some 22,000 persons Transport Canada and the Canadian Transport Commission expend large sums on the nation's transportation system. Expenditures for 1980-81 by Transport Canada and the CTC totalled $1.8 billion.

I mentioned the number of people Transport Canada employs, and I am very pleased to say that Transport Canada is an equal opportunities employer. It employs many women, many men and many handicapped persons. I want to emphasize that Transport Canada, as well as other departments, is an equal opportunities employer.

The role of Transport Canada is to attend to the development and operation of a safe and efficient national transportation system which contributes to the achievement of government objectives, and to operate specific elements of the system. That is a tall order and it costs a lot of money. Increasing demands are being placed on the federal government in relation to transportation needs. We are all concerned that transportation is developed, as far as is reasonably possible, to meet the needs of Canadians and to improve the economy. At the same time the government must always be prudent in managing its expenditures. It is of paramount importance, therefore, that funds for transportation are invested wisely, to use the words of the official critic of the New Democratic Party. The theme of my remarks today will be investing wisely the funds we are going to get through this borrowing bill.

The significance of transportation in terms of bringing this country together and forming a link between the remote areas of Canada and the more established centres was recognized at a very early stage in this country's history. To illustrate, in 1881 the federal government struck an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a transcontinental rail link. The agreement provided for $25 million in subsidies and 33 million acres in land grants. In contrast to the dollars set aside today even for modest projects the figures are not substantial, but in terms of what that investment accomplished they are indeed significant.

Later on, in 1897, to complete the link—both psychologically and physically, if I can say so—another agreement was signed with CPR to build the Crowsnest Pass line, a topic about which we have heard much in the last few months. This line, approximately 300 miles long, was constructed to keep American railroads out of that part of southern British Columbia. Again, it was an investment for the future in more ways than simply an investment of dollars. It was the staking of a physical claim on the future wealth and prosperity of British Columbia for the benefit of all Canadians both east and west of the Rockies.

The need to invest dollars in transportation was recognized then and is still considered an absolute necessity in order to stimulate economic growth. Unless major investments by the railways proceed, capacity restraint in the western transportation system will soon be evident. By now all hon. members should be aware of the government's commitment of $3.2 billion over the next four years toward the movement of grain. This money will help overcome the critical shortfall in railway revenues and assist the railways in making the much needed investments.

Out of these funds an order was placed by the federal government in May of this year for the construction of 1,280 hopper cars for grain service in western Canada. This order, worth approximately $80 million, will help alleviate the serious unemployment situation by creating 1,500 jobs in the builders' plants in Trenton, Nova Scotia, Sorel, Quebec, and Hamilton, Ontario, for a period of two or three months and 750 jobs will also be created with suppliers for the same period of time.

In November, 1981, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) signed an agreement with representatives of Canada's two major railways involving expenditures of $255 million for continued branch lines to 1984. The agreement further strengthens the goal of a modernized branch line network. Total expenditures on the rehabilitation program will reach $495 million by 1984, a considerable investment in western Canada which will benefit all Canadians.

Complementary investment is required, of course, to accommodate the anticipated growth in the movement of bulk products, especially in the west. I should like to give a few examples of port projects, sponsored in part or in whole with federal funds.

In August, 1980, an agreement was signed with the government of British Columbia and the Nanaimo Harbour Commission for the development of a two-berth forest products shipping terminal at Duke Point, Nanaimo. The total cost was $20.9 million, including a $6.3 million federal government contribution. The initial phase, including the construction of the two wharves, was completed in September, 1981.

In September, 1980, agreement was reached with the Prince Rupert grain consortium for the development of a three million tonne annual throughput grain terminal at Ridley Island. The federal contribution is more than $30 million.

In November, 1981, agreement was entered into with coal companies and the Government of British Columbia for the development of a 12 million tonne throughput capacity coal terminal at Ridly Island. The project, to be undertaken by the National Harbours Board, will cost approximately $280 million.

In February of this year we reached agreement with the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta for the development of a two million tonne annual throughput liquid petrochemical shipping facility. The National Harbours Board will build the wharf at an estimated cost to the federal government of approximately $70 million. The facility will be ready to receive petrochemicals in early 1985. This is an investment today for the future good of our country.

So that members of the House will not feel that taxpayers' money is just being invested in the west, let me give some examples of the federal government's investment in the east. Investment in port development—investment for the future—is also taking place. In the port of St. John's construction is underway on a potash terminal. The total estimated cost is $22,400,000. Expansion of Long wharf and Rodney terminal and the construction of Lower Core terminal are other projects which were recently completed in 1981. Total cost of these projects was $24.8 million.

Construction and operation of Fairview Cove container terminal in Halifax, Nova Scotia, is due to be completed this month. The cost of the project was shared between the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia, with the federal government assuming responsibility for $29.095 million of the $35.595 million price tag.

I emphasize the concept of investment here, not just spending. Canada's economy will realize a hundredfold or a thousandfold return on this investment.

Turning to passenger transportation, the federal government, in the interests of promoting rail passenger services, has agreed to allocate $1.1 billion in operating subsidies to VIA Rail for 1981-82 to 1983-84. VIA's capital budget was doubled over this period allowing ten more LRC—light, rapid and comfortable—train sets to be ordered, in addition to the ten sets ordered earlier, to enable the LRC service to be extended to western Canada and the maritimes. This latest order, announced by the Minister of Transport in April, will cost over $140 million and represents more than 2,000 person-years of work for the Canadian railway manufacturing industry and its suppliers. I emphasize the job-creation feature of this investment. The first order of ten sets, placed in 1977, was for over $90 million.

From the perspective of air transportation, the growth in demand is expected to continue, although at levels lower than those of the past two decades. New or expanded airport facilities will be required. In 1981, cabinet approved substantial increases in the amount of money allocated for airport capital investment. An additional $20 million has been allotted for 1981-82, $40 million for 1982-83 and $60 million for 1983-84.

Air terminal projects are planned or in progress at airports all across Canada at the following locations: Gander, St. John's, St. Anthony, Charlottetown, Saint John, Fredericton, Quebec City, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Fort Nelson, Fort St. John, Kamloops, Victoria, Vancouver, and Whitehorse. I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker.

In Labrador and in northern Quebec, funds have been allocated for air transportation infrastructure. A community airports assistance program has been established to financially assist municipalities and local airport associations to improve facilities at small airports.

One of the recurring themes in transportation today is safety. The House has seen reports from two commissions of inquiry on this subject, the Grange commission on the Mississauga derailment and the Dubin commission on aviation safety. The tragic loss of the Ocean Ranger has reminded us of the dangers at sea. And we sometimes forget that every year over 5,000 people are killed on our roads and highways.

What does this have to do with the borrowing authority bill before us today? Again, money is involved. It costs money to promote safety, to enforce safety standards, to maintain a safe transportation environment, and most of all to compensate for a disregard of safe practices. Let me take these areas one by one and illustrate with examples in different modes of transport.

It costs money to promote safety. This statement is true, but it has a very positive side to it. The cost of promotion is negligible compared to the results that can be achieved. Recently, Transport Canada launched a safety campaign aimed at weather-related aviation accidents. I understand it cost in the vicinity of $100,000. There were complaints from taxpayers that the advertisements were morbid and costly and I suspect that some people would complain of the government's excessive advertising budget.

Mr. Blenkarn: I guess.

Mr. Flis: The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) says "I guess." I suggest that he listen to what comes next. The results of the campaign have been outstanding. In 1981, there was a 27 per cent drop in weather-related accidents. Ten fewer lives were lost than in 1980. Maybe the hon. member for Mississauga South is not interested in saving lives, but we are. It has been estimated that savings in damages, medical costs and the like were in the order of $7 million. Not bad for a $100,000 investment.

• (1710)

In addition, Transport Canada undertakes seat belt promotion campaigns in conjunction with the provinces, and certainly they cost money. But if the rate of use of seat belts had been 80 per cent last year instead of about 40 per cent, at least 1,500 lives could have been saved. That is between one quarter and one-third of last year's road casualties.

That brings me to the topic of enforcement. Four provinces now have seat belt legislation and even with limited enforcement seat belt usage is above that of the other six provinces. With additional enforcement and promotion a tremendous improvement could be achieved, not to mention a reduction in the $3.5 billion lost to the Canadian economy as a result of road accidents.

One of today's most urgent needs is the strengthening of research and development in transportation. Improving productivity, holding the line on energy consumption, and supporting such related energy areas as Arctic transportation of oil and liquefied natural gas are key areas in which R and D should be accelerated. Transportation currently consumes close to 50 per cent of the oil used in Canada. To increase energy efficiency and reduce operating costs, the investment must be made in R and D activities. In June, 1981, the cabinet approved additional funding in the amount of $19 million for a three-year plan of programs for rail freight and Arctic marine transportation. The investment is being made with the intent of future savings. This type of investment is recognized by all, I am sure, as being essential to the future of transportation.

Enforcement is an issue which received considerable attention in the Dubin inquiry. Judge Dubin concluded that enforcement of air safety had not been sufficiently vigorous and he recommended stricter enforcement practices. The recommendation was accepted by the minister and new enforcement procedures are now going into effect. There is no question this requires additional resources but if the result is fewer accidents, surely the cost is worth it.

Moving to the problem of maintaining a safe transportation environment, we find the expenditure requirement can be considerable. The radar modernization program which will contribute to safe air traffic services will cost hundreds of millions of dollars. There is an ongoing and costly requirement for improved navigational aids, beacons, landing systems and so on across Canada. The magnitude of these expenditures is such that not all demands can be fulfilled. Priorities must be established and decisions made on where to allocate scarce resources. Part of maintaining a safe environment is the promulgation of safe standards, whether it be for automobile design, operating practices of a railway, or for the packaging and marketing of dangerous commodities. Here again administrative costs are not very great in relation to the returns obtained from reducing the number and severity of accidents.

The final area I mentioned was the cost of compensation for disregard of safe practices. Enforcement and development of safe standards and practices, and their promotion, have one thing in common: prevention of accidents. But what happens after an accident occurs? The responsibility of the government in this area covers search and rescue activities and the investigation of accidents.

Search and rescue is extremely costly and some of the most difficult decisions have to be made in this area. It would, of course, be nice to plan for search and rescue coverage which could reach the scene of an accident in minutes no matter where and when. We could if we had unlimited funds, but we do not. The bill being debated here demonstrates that convincingly, so again priorities must be established, decisions made and expenditures made prudently.

Just last Friday I had the opportunity to have a look at our search and rescue practices on the west coast. I was very impressed with the three hovercraft we have, which cost between $1 million and $3 million each. I was told that they can reach almost any accident within three minutes. Now, wouldn't it be great if we could have 50 such hovercraft covering our coastlines? But can we afford it? At this point I guess not.

It is perhaps a bit difficult, Mr. Speaker, to tie this into my theme of transportation investment for the future. Spending on transportation safety does not build an infrastructure which contributes to economic development, such as port facilities, railways or airports. It is, nonetheless, essential and demands for increased spending on transportation safety are at least as strong as demands on spending for economic purposes.

I have only touched on the major investments in transportation. We are all cognizant of the fact that the transportation industry is a major contributor to the economic wellbeing of Canada at all levels. An efficient and effective transportation system makes an even greater contribution to the wellbeing of all Canadians. We have accomplished much but we also recognize that much more has yet to be achieved in order to develop our national transportation system into one of the best in the world. Investment in transportation is an investment in the future of Canadians. In an era of world recession and tough times I think those investments will stimulate the economy and create jobs without overfuelling inflation. We must continue to develop the national transportation system in order to maintain a very crucial link to our economic well-being.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the last speaker would entertain a question?

Mr. Flis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, by all means.

Mrs. Mitchell: At the beginning of the hon. member's remarks he referred to Transport Canada as an equal opportunity employer. Would he tell the House what proportion of women there are employed in that department, particularly in non-clerical jobs; and would he also tell us whether he feels that a compulsory affirmative action program is needed in that department in order for women to have equal opportunities and equal pay for work of equal value?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has some concern about the relevance, but the parliamentary secretary wishes to answer the question.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, the official opposition is saying: "Don't waste the time of the House". I think a discussion on equal opportunity employment is time well spent in this House. I do not have the exact percentage breakdown of the 22,000 people employed by Transport Canada, but I will get it for the hon. member. I will also send to her the figures on the number of handicapped our department hires. I think it was a very good question and I welcome it.

• (1720)

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) spoke at length about transportation. It would be fine if the money we were borrowing today was not money to pay the grocery bill, but it is. It would be fine if it were not money to pay interest for debts previously borrowed, but it is. It would be fine if the money we were borrowing today was not money to pay for the VIA Rail deficits or money to pay for the Mirabel deficits. But it is.

The hon. member talked about money for advertising. Imagine borrowing money for advertising. If we were borrowing money to turn the economy around then maybe there would be something in favour of it. If this bill were tagged for the purpose of borrowing money for worthwhile capital improvements for the productivity of Canada, then probably all of us could get together and praise the government for doing that type of thing. But that is not the case.

Mr. Riis: Unfortunately.

Mr. Blenkarn: It is very unfortunate. This bill is only the first of its kind this year but the third in this session of Parliament. When this House was called together after the February, 1980, election, we were presented with a borrowing authority bill for $12 billion. Within less than a year we were presented with another bill for $14 billion. We have before us this bill for $6.6 billion. We now have over $32.6 billion in borrowing authority for this session. Yet we are told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that this will only be a downpayment on what he needs, that he will have to come again before this House with another borrowing authority bill before this calendar year is over and ask for more. We have asked him how much more. He does not know.

Mr. Wilson: Or he will not tell.

Mr. Blenkarn: What are the Minister of Finance's income anticipations now that his budget is over six months old? He does not know. Where is the Minister of Finance going on corporate tax collection? He does not know. Where is he going on personal income tax collection? He does not know. Where is the Minister of Finance going on sales tax collection? He does not know or he will not disclose it. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, as a former leader of this party, the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker often said in this House of Commons when he challenged the other side, where are we going?

Before we ask that question, we must determine where we are and how we got here. We are now in the worst depression this country has had since the 1930s. Indeed, if you were to do a comparative history performance of the financial concerns of this country, you might compare the period we are in right now with late 1931 or perhaps January, 1932. We have had a bank inquiry. Members of the committee asked senior banking officials and senior economists whether Canada has yet reached the bottom and whether Canada has gone down as far as it can go. The answer given to both questions is no. The officials were asked when we will have a turnaround. They told us that they do not know.

We have a government that blames the world for our troubles. It blames the Americans. The Americans are terrible people, we are told. They lower their income tax. The Americans are terrible people. That is what we hear. On a per capita basis the Americans borrow half as much money as we do. Therefore, the Americans are at fault for our high interest rates.

Maybe it is the Japanese who are at fault. They do not trade fairly with us. The Japanese sell us products and do nothing about keeping our jobs and keeping our people employed in Canada. The blame for our troubles is always placed on someone else. Until this year the provinces were the ones at fault. It was the terrible people from Alberta. Now it is the terrible fellow who runs the province of Newfoundland. It is always someone else. What we have is confrontation. Someone else is responsible for Canada, not the government in this House. That is the answer we are given. It is not an answer.

This government fails to recognize the potential of this country. It fails to recognize that we have more people who are literate on a per capita basis than any other country in the world. We have more mineral resources, more oil and gas resources, more fresh water resources. We have more of almost everything than any country in the world.

Canada is closest to the largest market in the world. Give any other country in the world the opportunity to be where Canada sits, with the resources Canada has, with the potential Canada has, and would it have a government that begs and cries for $6.6 billion and at the same time says it is not enough? Of course not. We have a government that is so worried about foreigners and foreign investment that it does everything in its power to throw out investors.

Mr. Riis: Not FIRA again!

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says "Not FIRA again". I want to say to the hon. member that we are a capital-short country. We need all the capital we can get. We need savings.

Mr. Riis: We have savings.

Mr. Blenkarn: The hon. member says we have savings. Well, I want to tell the hon. member right now that while Canadians save more per capita than Americans, Canadians save only half as much per capita as the British and only one third as much per capita as the Japanese.

Mr. Evans: That is not true.

Mr. Blenkarn: We do not save nearly enough. We need as much capital in our country as we can get. If we have to get it from the far corners of the world, so be it. But let us have it so that we can develop our nation and put our people to work. Any policy and any government that deliberately discourages investment and opportunity for Canadians cannot be a government that is honest with its people and it cannot be a government that is fair with its people. When they see people lined up in unemployment offices—

Mr. Riis: In soup kitchens.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says soup kitchens. And he says keep out foreign investment.

Mr. Riis: Right.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is how the hon. member wants to put people to work. We have a National Energy Program designed to discourage people from exploring and developing the country, that deliberately treats one investor and one explorer different from another with PIP grants and all sorts of other gimmicks that try to direct where a driller should drill, where an explorer should explore or where a producer should create, all of which will come from an ivory tower over at Dow's Lake.

We have a budget before us for which not one single amendment to the Income Tax Act has been presented, yet that budget was produced back in November. Even according to the Minister of Finance in the committee hearings on this bill the budget has been declared inappropriate, yet we proceed with the borrowing requirement set out in that budget. We wonder why people are discouraged when they do not know where they stand with their deferred profit-sharing plans, with their life insurance, with capital cost allowances, in terms of corporate tax, with respect to mergers, with respect to expanding their business and with respect to putting money into subsidiaries in foreign countries. People do not know where they stand. They ask their accountants. They do not know. This government does not know. Yet this government has the insufferable gall to come before this House of Commons and say: "In our budget we need $6.6 billion; therefore, give it to us." That is insufferable.

The government wonders why people are unemployed. It wonders why businesses go broke. Yesterday I was not here because I was in my constituency office. Three people came to my office who were involved in businesses in Mississauga. They were telling me of the problems their companies were facing.

In my city there is a company which manufactures grinding machinery for the mining industry. Where is that company headed? I can tell the House that it is the only totally Canadian-owned company involved in the manufacture of heavy mining and grinding machinery for the mining industry. It conducts business all over the world, but it will probably be bankrupt by the end of August.

How did we get into this situation? It is due to a credit society which had been established when the government took power in 1968. At that time it changed tax laws which allowed for the expansion of credit to the point where business and industries today are in a terrible credit position. A wide variety of businesses have outstanding floating demand loans which they cannot pay off at the current interest costs, which have been brought about by the mismanagement of this country. Since the government took power it became fashionable to borrow rather than to float stock equity issues because the government inflated the money supply so that lenders did not get quite the inflation rate. Consequently, it became profitable to borrow. Many corporate entities are up to their ears in debt. Indeed, Premier Lougheed, when speaking in Toronto, said that approximately 38 per cent of the cash flow of businesses in his province went to pay interest. Mr. Mulholland said at the bank committee hearing that in the last quarter of 1981, 65.7 per cent of before-tax profit income of companies went to pay interest. This applies to companies which have over $10 million in assets.

What will we do about this situation? The answer clearly is that there must be a change made to our tax system to encourage equity investment, risk investment and entrepreneurship. However, that is exactly what the November, 1981, budget and the October, 1980, budget discouraged.

I have already talked about government deficits, but as these deficits grow it can be seen where we will head. My colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) suggested where we are heading. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) indicated where he could see us heading.

It does not take much imagination to realize what is happening when we see manufacturing industries in this country operating at 75 per cent of their capacity in the last quarter of 1981. It becomes evident when you go back to your riding that the statistics of the last quarter of 1981 are ancient history because these industries are probably operating at an average of 62 per cent of capacity at the most. As a Member of Parliament you must realize that the corporate taxes being paid will not be $15 billion as shown in the budget but probably around $9 billion. You must know that on corporate tax alone, the government will come up short by at least $6 billion. If hon. members have studied the unemployment statistics they must realize where we are headed with the Unemployment Insurance Act when payments are paid to 1.250 million Canadians certified as unemployed or 1.8 million in real unemployment, as indicated by my hon. friend. Where are we headed with the welfare or social assistance payments which have been necessitated by the current depression in our economy?

The government has promised to give a statement by the end of the month. Why would they not produce a statement before the introduction of this bill? The government introduces the bill and then tells us it will produce a statement after the House gives it the authority to borrow money. Are we to carry on with the current philosophies which have led us into this dilemma?

Bruce Hutchison, who is certainly not a Conservative, said something in an editorial in the Vancouver Sun on May 22 about the philosophies of the political parties. In that article he said that, "In the popular cliché there is no real difference between the government and the opposition. That is untrue. A profound difference exists, and you can take your choice of alternatives. As oversimplified in this brief space, the Liberal party stands for bold governmental intervention throughout the economy. The Conservatives stand for less intervention. Liberals rely on the wisdom and benevolence of the State, Conservatives on the justice of the market." That is the case.

The Liberal-NDP party, or the Liberal Party and the Liberal party west believe in massive state intervention. They advocate spending more taxes, borrowing more money, spending more money and wasting more money while they refuse to deal with the hard realities that if you are going to spend the money you must first earn it. If you are going to build the country you have to put the money into the ground. The equity investment must exist and entrepreneurship must be encouraged in order to make it grow.

Mr. Riis: Who says that?

Mr. Blenkarn: All that the hon. member has to do is to read some of the speeches he and his colleagues have made to see where they stand in terms of state intervention.

I have asked where this country is headed. I would like to suggest where we should head. First, we will never progress if we keep the November 12 budget. Even the Minister of Finance has stated that the budget is inappropriate because of changing conditions. The budget is not working because it did not address the problem. The minister admitted that fact during committee hearings. Indeed, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) admitted that in the House this afternoon. Therefore, why does the minister not withdraw the budget? The government should get rid of the budget and the uncertainty it has caused Canadians and return to the drawing board.

The National Energy Program was introduced in November of 1980. It was said by members on this side to be a disaster from the day it was produced. When we first criticized it the government said that we were out to protect the big multinational oil companies. Those companies are doing quite well. It is the average Canadian oil company which is in difficulty. One can find evidence of this by simply looking at the marketplace to see what companies are in trouble. It is the Canadian oil companies. They are in trouble because the National Energy Program prevented them from raising the necessary equity on the world market to build their companies. It has prevented them from issuing shares in New York, Tokyo and London. You could not find enough investors in the world to risk capital for drilling in the Beaufort Sea or off the coast at Hibernia. In Canada alone, who would risk that money? Although many Canadians may risk their money, others are needed to help them take that risk. These are high risk ventures, and the Canadian oil companies require high risk money. However, what did the National Energy Program do? It made it impossible for those companies to acquire the high risk capital and it got them involved deeply in high interest loans instead. That is why they are in trouble. Indeed, the industry is in trouble when one ends up with a situation as discriminatory as the NEP and when there are back-in provisions and the like which affect Canada lands. No one will invest in a situation where the view from the marketplace is that the government is likely to expropriate one's assets virtually without compensation.

We need a program of tax allowances. We need a program of encouragement. We need a program which will give people who will invest a chance to make a real buck. We must encourage the person who is prepared to gamble on Canada. There are such people out there, but one will not encourage that kind of investment as long as there is a capital gains tax, as long as there is a situation with respect to pension funds or RRSPs where there is no way in which the capital gain made behind those funds can be treated as a capital gain in the hands of the investor when he eventually takes the money out of the fund. The whole pension system we have in our country, with the investments behind pension funds, is designed to promote interest for a debt investment as opposed to equity investment. Until we are prepared to change some of our basic tax laws to make equity investment more profitable, we will not get that kind of investment.

I see that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) agrees with me. I am glad to hear that. I hope that when he is speaking with his colleagues he will be able to do something about changing the priorities here to get some equity investment and provide some opportunity for people to build the country and take the risk.

Mr. Wilson: Where was he last year?

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre asks, where was he last fall? If I recall, he was out defending the budget.

In any event, we need another thing, and that is, a sound money policy. Now, my friends to the left would probably have us print money, or would like to see some control situations; perhaps foreign exchange controls. Their leader spoke about foreign exchange controls. Perhaps they would like to nationalize the banks. What we need is a sound money policy, but one which will ensure that there is enough credit in the system to finance the transactions in the system. I say to Your Honour that it is impossible to control inflation satisfactorily by simply reducing the money supply. One must continue to have enough money in the system; otherwise, the system itself comes to a grinding halt. Over the past year and a half, in order to protect the exchange rates, the operations of a bank have been such as to keep the supply of money unrealistically low. I say that in an effort to protect exchange rates, that was the wrong move. What we need is some sense in our money supply, not to print money crazily but to ensure that there is at least enough money available to satisfy the credit needs of the country.

What we need is a program to assure those who invest in Canada and who consider what is going on in Canada that the federal deficit will be reduced and changed to a surplus position over a five-year period, and that we will not continually borrow against our children's future. We have received no program from this government; indeed, we received no such program last November that would in any way indicate that this government has a method of getting the country out of the hole.

As long as this country continues to portray to the rest of the world that we will forever finance Canada by going to the marketplace and borrowing larger and larger sums of money, our dollar will forever be weak, we will have inflation forever and we will forever have a sense of lack of confidence in the country. What we must do is demonstrate not only to Canadians but also to the entire world that management means paying one's bills with the money on hand, not the money borrowed from one's neighbour.

What has happened since we came back after the election of 1980? We have run our debt, our net debt, from roughly $65 billion to $92 billion or $93 billion, and that in barely two years. We cannot continue in this way, particularly in view of the interest rates we are paying. This year we will pay probably close to $17 billion in interest, far more money than this government ever spent when it was first elected under the current leader. That cannot continue. We must have a program to ensure that the government finances and pays its bills with the money it takes in taxes, and no more. We must get away from this concept that we can continue forever in deficit. We must have some program to limit government expense.

The other day in the House, on June 10, I suggested to the Minister of Finance during question period that he should consider some of the suggestions which had come from the banks, from the Royal Bank and from the Bank of Commerce. In reply, the Minister of Finance said that cutting government expense was the problem because everyone wants to do it in general but no one wants to bite the bullet. He said:

> I advise the hon. member to show his hand by going into committee and indicating where he thinks government expenditures ought to be reduced.

I want to point out to the Minister of Finance, through the Minister of State for Finance that the estimate hearings before committees have been terminated, in accordance with the rules, but if he sincerely wanted the help of the Parliament of Canada in reducing government expense, he would form a special parliamentary committee on government expense to open up those estimates again, to go into detail in depth and to take out of the government expense of this country as much as could be taken out. I suggest up to 10 per cent. That might eliminate some services and cut back on some things that we have enjoyed. But when the homes of people in my riding are being foreclosed because they cannot pay their monthly mortgages, I have a hard time saying to them, "Yes, but we increased the budget of the CBC." I have a hard time telling them how important the National Film Board is. And I have a really hard time telling them how important it is that Canada use over $1 billion a year in support of foreign-aid programs.

I think it is about time that Members of Parliament were entrusted by the government to take a look at some of the expenses and go over them with a fine-toothed comb, and then to say, "Yes, we like that program, but in our scale of priorities it does not count as much as something else." We would be responsible, as the House of Commons ought to be, for controlling the expense of government.

About two weeks ago we had a debate concerning some major projects in Canada, the Alsands and the Cold Lake projects. Those were megaprojects and they fell apart. Surely to goodness it is time that the government went back to the drawing board and looked at its tax laws and the sense of trust people have for this government, and said, "What can we do on a matter of confidence to get people to invest in these projects again?" Projects do not make sense if one has to pay 20 per cent interest on money from day one. But they might make sense to the Japanese who may want to secure a source of oil. They might make sense to the Americans who might want to secure a source of oil. They sure as heck would make sense to people who were working in steel mills in Hamilton, now laid off, at least 20 per cent, and they sure would make sense to unemployed people in St. Catharines and Brantford. We can let them take a portion of the product as payment for the money they put in. The prime rate in Japan is 6.4 per cent. If we had put 6.4 per cent in the mathematics for Alsands and Cold Lake, those projects would be going ahead. How do we make them go ahead? We offer to pay for them in the product we take out of our soil. We build our country with our own resources. We must make our country work again and get things going. There is no need to be foolish or to have unemployment when we have the resources that would make prosperity possible.

Getting back to the borrowing authority bill, where are we going? The government comes to the House of Commons for authority to borrow based on a budget which it says is inappropriate. We have an economy where more and more people are out of work every day. Companies are going broke, whether by bankruptcy, receivership or just walking away. There is no direction, no plan. The people of Canada have no confidence.

Members of the Liberal Party will have to accept the responsibility within the next week or so. We know they meet in caucus and are having other discussions about changes regarding the financial concerns in this country. They have a responsibility to the people of Canada because things can only be changed in the parliamentary sense with a vote.

The responsibility of those opposite is not to sit back and say they will support their party right or wrong. The policies proposed by those who control the levers of power and the party of government are not Liberal policies, policies of free trade, expansion and development of the liberty of the individual. They are policies of government control, statism, waste, direction from the ivory tower.

Members of Parliament must address these policies. If they cannot be addressed by those who hold the levers of power, Members of Parliament collectively have a responsibility to face the problems. If they cannot be faced in caucus, they must be faced on the floor of this House.

If we love our country, if we want to know where we are going and want to build this nation instead of letting it go down the drain, in order to pull ourselves out of this depression Members of Parliament must work together. If the government cannot produce answers, we must produce the answers, and there must be a new government.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks this afternoon, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) indicated that the projections of the November, 1981, budget had been undermined by unexpected economic conditions and consequently there is a necessity for additional borrowing to meet the deficiencies.

This is nothing new with this government. Time after time it has made projections and forecasts which have been completely out of whack. This does not seem to affect the government very much as it keeps on going in the same way. Time after time we have seen this happen. The government comes in with no apology. It just announces that it was wrong and states that the demands it will be required to meet will necessitate additional financing.

The purpose of Bill C-111 is to authorize the government to borrow a further $6.6 billion to continue the financing of its spending operations. To underscore the government's dependence upon this type of legislation to finance its operations, I would point out that this is the third time during this session that we have been called upon to agree to or vote on such a borrowing bill.

First there was Bill C-30 to borrow $12 billion, then C-59 to borrow $14 billion and now this bill to borrow an additional $6.6 billion. This is in spite of the fact that in 1980 the growth in the Canadian economy was zero, our worst performance in 36 years. Productivity has fallen, employment has reached a disastrously low level, inflation continues to increase, and housing starts are in serious decline.

When we travel across this country or go to our constituencies, we find that conditions are such that concern has deepened into fear, fear has deepened into frustration and we have reached the point where frustration has deepened into intense anger.

There may be those who say that is a pretty dark prediction and there is no basis in fact for such an allegation. However, the other day I spoke with some people from my constituency who told me that in that area the general feeling is that steps must be taken to bring this government to the point where it recognizes the problems facing the country. They want us to do something that will be fully justified, even if it means ringing the bells again and keeping them ringing. When it reaches that point, it is becoming very serious indeed.

The Minister of State for Finance smiles. He probably has not been to British Columbia recently and therefore does not know what is going on there. Possibly he does not even know what is going on in the rest of Canada. The conditions of the country fail to reflect the bright prospects envisaged by the Liberal Party spokesmen who painted pictures for the future if the Liberals were returned to office. On January 12, 1980, the leader of that party said in Toronto that they have an economic program for the eighties which will enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had just completed referring to a statement that was made by the leader of the Liberal Party in January, 1980. He stated this:

> We have an economic program for the eighties which will enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: I hear the "hear, hear" from the other side, but possibly if we take a look at the record since that time, we will find that it has hardly measured up to the expectations of the speaker at that time, the leader of the Liberal Party.

I notice the words "will enhance dignity". I looked up the word "dignity" in the dictionary and I found it means true worth, self-esteem. I would like to ask the question, does it enhance one's self-esteem when a person's dream of achievement or success in an endeavour—for instance, the ownership of a home or the development of a business or a farm—is crushed and broken by the intolerable burden of taxation, the frightening load of exorbitant interest rates and the nightmare of bankruptcy? I would suggest that this hardly measures up to the expression that was used in the anticipation of the years when the Liberal Party reassumed office.

What were the opportunities? To work for four or five months of the year to finance governments? A government that has absolutely no feeling or sensitivity to the needs and aspirations of those who pay the bills?

As far as security is concerned, I say, Mr. Speaker, that this government is leading the country on a disaster course rather than on one that will enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security.

While one is inclined to sympathize with the government in its dilemma, we sympathize more with the ordinary taxpayers who are being called upon to hand over an ever-increasing share of their income to cover the increasingly voracious demands of this government and its incompetent handling of the resources that are placed at its disposal by the taxpayer.

Perhaps I should offer sympathy as well to the supporters of the government in this House, as they have been valiantly endeavouring to defend a record that is totally indefensible. I think one needs to review the history of this present session, now spanning a period of over two years, during which the policies of the government have proven to be a national disaster. No sector of our society has escaped the government's assault on practically every principle and institution that Canadians have cherished and benefited by for, generations. In fact, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has described publicly the recent budget as a national disaster.

The enterprise system that resulted in one of the highest standards of living in the world has been thwarted, strangled and penalized, by a calculated plan of government intervention and regulation, until today Canadians occupy about the thirteenth or fourteenth spot in the standard of living scale in this world of ours. The Canadian economy is on the skids and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has indicated that there is little that he can do—which is a terrible confession—because of the "bad" Americans.

When the Minister of Finance introduced his infamous budget, it was met with universal anger and rejection. The underlying principles stated by the minister were restraint, equity, and economic renewal. But the contents of that budget constituted a cynical and coldly calculated attack on the very principles they were allegedly designed to advance. The business community was shocked. The agricultural sector was irate. The economically disadvantaged were further dispirited. The home owners were disillusioned. And those proud citizens who were struggling to maintain their independence and also assist in helping those who, for unavoidable reasons, cannot provide for themselves, found that an unconscionable government was about to deprive them of the ability to provide for themselves, let alone contribute to the general good of the country.

Responding to the impassioned appeal on behalf of Canadians made by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) in a recent debate, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) berated him for his evangelical fervour in presenting his case. Mr. Speaker, perhaps more of such fervour might result in a greater sensitivity to the needs of our people. Some of the objectives of evangelism are conviction, repentance, restitution and reformation. If the Minister of Finance would follow this pathway, it would be of incalculable benefit to the people of Canada.

My leader, speaking to the Ontario Real Estate Board in Toronto on March 2, 1982, stated:

> Ottawa today is governing against the traditions of Canada, governing against the nature of Canada, governing against the interests of Canada and governing against the wishes of Canadians.

I believe that is a very stern indictment, but I believe it is very close to the truth. So, perhaps repentance and reformation would be a very appropriate path for the Minister of Finance to follow.

The bill we have before us is a bill to authorize the Minister of Finance to borrow an additional $6.6 billion.

Mr. Paproski: That is only this week.

Mr. Patterson: We remember that not too long ago a bill was before the House authorizing the borrowing of $12 billion. There was another shortly thereafter authorizing the borrowing of $14 billion, and now we have this one to authorize the further borrowing of $6.6 billion. On what basis does the government feel it is warranted in coming and asking the taxpayers of Canada to hand over another $6.6 billion? After all, the taxpayers are paying the shot. The taxpayers elected this government to look after their business and the business of the country, and so if the government comes along and says it wants us to authorize the borrowing of $12 billion, then $14 billion and then $6.6 billion, the taxpayers have a right to say, "What are you doing with it, and how can you justify it?" The government says it does this and that and the other thing, but no matter what it does, the country is worse off at every turn of the road. If there was an improvement in the economic conditions of Canada, if there was a greater prospect for Canadians, and if there was some hope that we will emerge from this chaotic mess we are in now and move ahead on a program of renewal, development and progress, then the people might feel, "Well, perhaps we will let them go ahead with it." However, when we look at the situation, we wonder if there is any logical reason why Canadian taxpayers should respond to this request and authorize the government to borrow this amount of money.

The unemployment situation in the country is deplorable. The economic conditions which surround us are drastic. The performance of the Canadian economy in recent years has been far below potential, and it is likely to remain so over the next few years. In 1980, the Canadian economy experienced zero economic growth and, after some growth in the first half of 1981, the economy fell into a severe recession in the last half of the year.

The short-term outlook for the Canadian economy was best summed up by the April 22 Conference Board forecast. The Conference Board sees a significantly slowed pace of economic activity this year. Real GNP is expected to show negligible growth. The unemployment rate is expected to remain at or near its current high level for the remainder of the year. Consumer expenditures are forecast to show virtually no growth this year. Nineteen eighty-two will be the third consecutive year that automobile purchases will have declined. Business investment is also forecast to perform poorly.

Even though that report is rather gloomy, there are further reports that indicate we are not in the darkness yet; it will get darker as we go along. What right has the government to come and say, "Give us another $6.6 billion"? What is the governent going to do with it? Will it take us farther down the road to ruin? Will it plunge us deeper into recession? I suppose the people have a right to look at the record and to ask the government what it has done. What this government has done has not been too good. There is unemployment in our forest industry. Figures are on the record which show the deplorable condition in which our forest industry is languishing. We see the same thing in the mining industry. I have a copy of an announcement by C. A. Borne to the Vancouver staff of Placer Development Limited talking about the closure of that company's mines, the laying off of its employees and the closing up of operations. That is the situation in the mining industry.

The automobile industry is facing very serious problems. There are lay-offs and shutdowns. The industry finds itself in a critical situation today. In British Columbia the government is trying to teach the Japanese a lesson, so it is delaying the customs clearance of automobiles which have been shipped to Canada. What a miserable little effort the government is making! That effort is an example of the government's ineptitude in dealing with current problems, and when the government uses these amateurish tactics it just raises the hackles of a great many people. And its action certainly will be an insult to the Japanese industry. The auto industry in Canada is facing serious problems, but I do not believe this action is in any way a suitable method of trying to minimize these difficulties. It is in fact exacerbating Canadian problems through its detrimental effects on business enterprises and through the unemployment resulting from this exercise. Automobile companies are in danger of bankruptcy. Employees are being laid off, and communities are suffering from the effects of these conditions. Such a confrontation stance is not in our best interests and just underscores the failure of this government to obtain reasonable results through co-operation and compromise in its dealings with an area of the world which is of incalculable importance to British Columbia.

There is a real need for an over-all Canada-Japan trade agreement which would provide for offsetting industrial opportunities in western Canada in exchange for our coal, minerals, lumber and other commodities. Canadian content agreements would result in small business contracts and, consequently, job opportunities. It is imperative that counter-productive exercises such as the one being carried out in Vancouver are replaced by an invitation to investment and co-operation in developing a manufacturing capacity here in Canada. The fault lies not with the Japanese but with this government's ineptitude in dealing with national and international challenges.

Not only must we look at the unemployment picture but we must also look at the inflation picture. A number of years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he was going to wrestle inflation to the ground. Just the other day I read an article which reported that he had changed that idea somewhat and now says that we have wrestled the economy into the ground. I think that is really true when you consider what the situation is in Canada today.

• (2020)

Who is to blame for this, Mr. Speaker? Apparently everybody but the Canadian government.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Patterson: It is nonsense but that is what the government is doing, blaming everyone, the Americans, the Japanese, other governments and other organizations when all the time its own policies are dragging the economy down. Indeed, if it gets much lower we are going to be in the black hole.

An hon. Member: Balderdash!

Mr. Patterson: The hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) knows something about that, no doubt, but that is the situation. It has been recognized that government spending is one of the major factors contributing to the situation.

What a deficit we are going to hand over to our children, Mr. Speaker. I understand that it takes about $1 out of every $4 or $5 just to pay the interest on the national debt. How can we expect succeeding generations to carry the burden of our indebtedness as well as their own? Yet the government wants to pile on another $6.6 billion. At present we have to work about five months of the year just to pay for governments. It is no wonder that people think they have to get a pretty high remuneration if they have to spend almost half of it in taxes.

Mr. Lapierre: You must be very rich.

Mr. Patterson: I do not think hon. members opposite know what is going on in the world.

An hon. Member: Tell us.

Mr. Patterson: It is no use telling them, because they cannot hear. Even if they listen they do not hear.

I want to put on the record some figures relating to bankruptcies of small businesses, Mr. Speaker. They are going down the drain every day. Employees are being put on the labour market and on the unemployment rolls. Agriculture is facing the same situation. Personal bankruptcies are occurring because of an interest rate that is crushing the life out of our economy and crushing the heart out of our people.

I have heard the minister say that there is no high interest rate in Canada. Who does he expect to believe that? There is a high interest rate policy and it affects every segment of our economy—small business, agriculture, housing and everything.

Mr. Lapierre: Tell us about your program. What would you do? We would like to hear that.

Mr. Patterson: I did not hear that interjection but I do not expect it was very important anyway.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would be very happy to respond to the questions posed by the hon. member. I should like to ask him exactly what he suggests we should do to reduce the number of bankruptcies and reduce interest rates in Canada?

Mr. Paproski: Resign!

Mr. Taylor: Withdraw the budget!

Mr. Paproski: Get rid of MacEachen!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. parliamentary secretary will realize that that is not a point of order.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, that just confirms what I say, that hon. members opposite cannot hear. They cannot hear and they cannot understand. They cannot grasp the significance of this and they cannot understand the feeling of despair that is gripping the country.

Mr. Peterson: We would like to know what your policies are.

Mr. Patterson: Hon. members opposite have heard the policies enunciated by my leader and our economic spokesman.

Mr. Peterson: They said they did not have any alternatives.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite have gone beyond any possibility of redemption.

I was going to speak about the disastrous energy policy which the government introduced. The minister backtracked on that because he knew it was a disaster. It was driving investment out of Canada and undermining confidence in the nation, so he had to backtrack. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will also backtrack, although I do not think he will go very far back. He will try to convince the people of Canada that after all, the Government of Canada is doing something.

I come now to the tax burden, Mr. Speaker and in this regard I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on March 27, 1982. It is headed "'Hidden' taxes take huge bite", and starts out as follows:

> The average Canadian family with a cash income of $22,500 paid income taxes of $3,345 in 1980, but other taxes, ranging from oil and motor vehicle taxes to amusement and property taxes accounted for an astounding 70 per cent of the average family's total tax bill.

The people are asked for more money to help the government finance some more of its disastrous programs when all the time, they are just staggering under the burden of taxation. It promises that we will have equity and programs that will create hope and optimism and job opportunities and that will help the people realize their dreams. With our natural resources, our people, our skills and our technical know-how we are one of the richest nations in the world. We have everything that is required to build a tremendously important and viable and satisfying economy.

The government says we on this side talk about doom and gloom but why should we not, Mr. Speaker? The possibilities for prosperity are there but dreams are being shattered, homes are being lost, businesses are going to the wall, farmers are suffering, and still the government expects people to come along and bail it out, giving it more money to squander.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, as others have said, that there has to be a change in our philosophical approach to the problems we face. The Prime Minister said the market system has failed and co-operative federalism is dead. He predicted a greater involvement of government in the nation's business. The record of the government under this Prime Minister is one of the shattering of enterprise, the penalizing of industry and of the spirit of entrepreneurship, the imposition of regulations and a crushing burden of taxation, and the blatant assumption of more and more control over the lives of business and individuals.

I would like to close by posing this question again: why should the people authorize this government to borrow another $6.5 billion? And there will be more. As long as this government is in office we will be faced with a deteriorating situation until this country has lost its hope and vision of the future. The government is insensitive to the needs and aspirations of the people, and incapable of conducting a program which will help in the economic renewal of this nation of ours. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, members on this side of the House certainly share the hon. member's concern about the present state of our economy. We recognize there are a lot of difficulties facing us and we would appreciate his sharing with us his advice as to what specifically he feels we might be able to do in order to get rid of high interest rates, control inflation and to get the economy rolling?

Mr. Kempling: We have been telling you for years.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Withdraw the budget.

Mr. Peterson: I simply point out that the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) has indicated that he would not deviate from our present high interest rate policies.

Mr. Wilson: Who said that?

Mr. Peterson: I would appreciate any advice and direction he can give us so that we can work constructively to solve these problems.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I was not planning to rise on this point but the hon. member did attribute a comment to me which is totally without foundation, and I want to disassociate myself from it. Never have I said that I supported the interest rate policy of this government. It is totally wrong, it can be changed, we can have lower interest rates, and I pointed out how to do so in my remarks. If the hon. member's ears are not serving him well today, I suggest he read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Peterson: I certainly retract my remarks if they were not true. I did understand last year that, with U.S. interest rates very high, he felt we had very little alternative but to act in accordance with international realities.

Mr. Wilson: I will take you aside and explain it all to you.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to clarify the issue. I believe it was actually the former finance critic, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who indicated his support for the high interest rate policy.

Mr. Taylor: Liberal gossip, NDP gossip.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the indication from the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr.

Patterson) that he would be prepared to respond to my question and share with us the solutions he has in mind so that we can deal with these problems which we are very concerned about as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would like during this debate on the borrowing authority—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I made a mistake, I do not know whether the hon. member is rising on a point of order or wants to take part in the debate.

Mr. Lapierre: I want to take part in the debate, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Then, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) is entitled to reply to the point of order.

[English]

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) certainly did outline some very important proposals. In addition I spoke about the change in attitude and philosophy which is necessary in order that the private sector have an opportunity to function and fulfil its role. It is not the government's business to get into business, it is rather to create a climate in which the private sector can develop and fulfil its role. If we can do that, then we will find that the sector which provides over 60 per cent of the jobs in this country, the small and medium-size business community, will have the opportunity to fulfil its role. That is one of the major ways in which we can get our economy rolling. If we could create an expectation of hope and anticipation, in other words create a feeling of confidence as far as the investment community is concerned, then we will find we are getting somewhere as far as solving our economic problems is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this evening, as part of the debate on borrowing authority, I would like to deal with a subject which is of great interest to all Canadians. It is, in fact, a subject that is seldom discussed in this House by our friends opposite. I can remember only once that they discussed this topic, and that was the day before the vote on their party's leadership. The subject was youth. I find it a fascinating subject, and I am sure some of our distinguished members opposite will remember the show they put on at the time for their delegations of young Conservatives. During question period, one of the younger members would rise, ask questions about subjects of interest to young people, sit down, and so forth, and this went on like a game of musical chairs throughout question period. This was last year, and we have not heard any debate on the subject since. Originally, all this helped to more or less consolidate the position of their leader, but since that time, they have forgotten these young people to whom the Leader of the Opposition owes his leadership.

I think people are beginning to realize that from time to time, a change occurs in society's values with respect to education, work and recreation. Consequently, the government must also adjust its policies and update its activities and programs. In the course of this debate, I should like to review some of the major problems facing young Canadians today.

First of all, I think the subject people are most interested in is employment, because it is truly a key area and a priority for all young Canadians who are expected to leave school and enter the labour market at such a difficult time. Students, parents, educators and governments are all giving very serious thought to the manner in which young people are being prepared for life and the work place. During the last twenty years, the average level of education has increased considerably in Canada. In 1961 for instance, about 75 per cent of young people had completed secondary school, compared to more than 90 per cent in 1981. However, easier access to education does not mean that we have solved all the problems facing young people.

In a recent report, the OECD noted that there was a time when the vast majority of young people left school at about the same age, and that at that time, those who came from disadvantaged groups in society were not socially and economically handicapped to the extent that they are today, when there is so much emphasis on certificates and diplomas. The OECD noted that the less educated still belonged to the disadvantaged groups in society, and it concluded that in some cases, the education system may even be aggravating the handicap these people start out with.

The OECD study covers a number of countries besides Canada, but we must still bear in mind its conclusion. Society in general and governments in particular must be careful that young people are not solely assessed in terms of the number of diplomas they have been awarded or the number of years of education they have received. They must also be evaluated on their contribution to society. In fact, young Canadians are giving society their idealism, their enthusiasm and their spirit of initiative—virtues that are sadly lacking opposite—a blend of characteristics that gave us a Terry Fox, for instance. Do we need a better example? I feel that we were able to produce a hero of this calibre because of the idealism, enthusiasm and spirit of initiative that young people seem to have in greater supply than any other group. Therefore, since youth has enthusiasm and idealism to spare, what can we do and what are we doing to put these characteristics to work and to develop them? Obviously, everything starts with education. More specifically, we must see to it that everyone has access to higher education, and that students are able to transfer from one province to another without too much administrative red tape.

Access to education and mobility are some of the national objectives for education which the government has already mentioned and which should be given special attention. When the time comes to renegotiate its arrangements for established programs financing, I hope the federal government's considerations will go beyond the funds it intends to grant and the use that will be made of such funds, and will seek ways to implement its national objectives on education and above all, to meet the vital needs of Canadian youth. I think young Canadians are sick and tired of hearing about federal-provincial discussions on education, and that they really have the impression they are going to get the short end of the stick, that our overriding concern is not necessarily their future development and that we are far more interested in sparring with statistics. I feel we should never forget the initial objective of these programs, which is to meet the future needs of young Canadians and Canadian society.

It is appropriate to consider education and employment together, because this matter is important to both young people and society in general. The House is well aware of this, having established a committee whose work culminated in a report on employment opportunities for the eighties. The report provides a wealth of information, but unfortunately, some readers have concluded that the authors were in favour of a choice of courses that would be basically determined by labour market requirements. I earnestly hope this was not the intention of the members of the committee, because I feel that the aim of education should be to develop the person and not merely to turn out competent workers.

Several years ago, when France and Sweden started to reform their education system in order to make it better suited to labour market requirements, the students protested, and rightly so. They did not want a curriculum of courses that concentrated on certain specific occupations, because they were afraid they would then be obliged, come what may, to accept a job that would subsequently be very difficult to leave, thus restricting their mobility. They preferred a general education which would develop their minds and skills in various areas and not just turn out workers. I think this is also what young Canadians want, so that they can live their own lives instead of merely earning a living. Today, that is a possibility, because the system has changed and education is now considered to be a process that can and should go on throughout our lives and not only during our youth. Anyone who has seen the ever-expanding number of adult education programs and evening courses in every possible field, will have realized that education has become everyone's concern. That is why I want to make this reservation so that people will not think the Government of Canada is only interested in manpower planning for specific requirements and has forgotten the more general aspects of education. Before going on to another subject, I would like to give a few Canadian statistics on young people and employment, which, unfortunately, may make this group lose some of its motivation, enthusiasm and idealism, because the economic reality is very harsh for this group in society. In 1981, more than two thirds of those in the 15 to 24 years age group were in the labour market, 87 per cent had jobs and 13 per cent were unemployed.

Among those who are employed, who are in fact lucky to be able to get work, about 25 per cent have strictly part-time jobs and 21 per cent are obliged to make do with such jobs because they are unable to find full-time work. This gives some impression of the underemployment problem among young people, who are more severely affected in this respect than their elders, while females are even worse off than males. According to OECD statistics, part-time work is becoming increasingly popular in Finland, Ireland and Italy, and less than 10 per cent of jobs are part-time. In Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the United Kingdom, however, this percentage is over 40 per cent. We know that groups where labour market representation has increased faster than in any other group over the past decades, namely, women and young people, that these are the groups that have been most severely affected by unemployment. It is, however, encouraging to know that here in Canada at least, education still opens many doors. The unemployment rate among university graduates is 7 per cent, which is three times less than among young people with eight years of schooling or less.

In other words, the unemployment rate among young people with eight years of schooling or less is now 21 per cent, which is completely unacceptable for a new entrant on the labour market who must often leave his family and finds himself dependent upon society, because of which he loses all his illusions and all his enthusiasm. In view of all these figures, I believe that the government will use the funds it will borrow under the terms of this legislation to develop programs for young Canadians, and it is in this spirit—I know that the hon. member may not like this subject and that it may not be important to him, but in that case, I want to tell him that I intend to defend these groups in our society and that if he is not interested, he can turn off his earphones.

It is interesting to note what graduates think of the education they have received. A survey conducted in 1978 among 1976 graduates shows that two years after they had completed their post-secondary education, the number of unemployed and underemployed college graduates was not as high as that of university graduates since 42 per cent of the latter compared to 66 per cent of college graduates had a job directly related to their training. A quarter of all graduates admitted that they had chosen the wrong career, which is a very high percentage, and about 45 per cent of them planned on taking other courses.

These statistics may raise as many questions as they provide answers. One wonders, for instance, how important young people consider self-fulfilment, security and rewarding recreational activities. The whole question of the life style and the balance necessary between work and other activities has become more important as more and more women are now working outside the home. Young women in particular need to know that they can now pursue their education or have a career and still look after their family. A woman no longer has to choose between a career and a family, and yet, young women still believe that this is so. It is up to the government to make sure that women are no longer typecast as homemakers or in a secondary role.

However, as important as education and employment are, young Canadians have many other interests. Among the many programs developed by the federal government for young Canadians, there is one which has been so successful that I would like to deal with it at greater length because, unfortunately, not enough young Canadians and perhaps not enough members of the House are aware of it. I am referring to the Katimavik program. As everyone should know, this word means "meeting place". Since it was established in 1977, this program has not only provided jobs for many young people, but it has also promoted community action. It reflects accurately the make-up of our society since the young people involved in it come from every cultural, social and linguistic group in the country. In a word, this program is an asset for the economic and social development of Canada. After a dark period when the Progressive Conservative government wanted to cancel this program, the Liberal government has just announced its extension, and I wanted to mention it because of its success and the enthusiastic response prompted among young people. Such programs give us a better understanding of a country and make it easier to tolerate the differences in other people and to share with them. It is indeed an outstanding success, but it should not be the only one and remain as modest. That is why I hope that in the coming months the government will seek to achieve a greater participation on the part of young people in both community action and decision-making.

Some time ago, my colleague from Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais) spoke in the House about a very challenging project concerning voluntary public services. I suggest that the government and Parliament ought to study the impact that such a measure might have on young Canadians and take it under serious consideration because that component of our society is experiencing a real problem which we cannot dismiss outright and which above all should draw our attention and lead to positive action on our part. My colleague from Manicouagan is fully aware of that reality and that is why, in a nonpartisan spirit, but especially in the interest of young Canadians, I urge all members to become familiar with that project.

The young Liberals of Quebec held a convention last week where they endorsed that program and acknowledged that the Canadian government must meet the needs of that segment of our population which may be dwindling but whose importance is growing because of the challenges the future has in store for us. Unfortunately, societies have a tendency to think that a man ought to accumulate wealth during his early years and spend it away once he has grown old. But we know it is a mistake to bar younger people from our institutions. Hardly 20 years ago the universities began to realize how important it was to have student spokesmen on the board of directors. And we know that young people are both anxious and able to take part in the decision-making process when they are involved. But that requires an extra effort. In fact, the value system has to be changed. Young people need resources and autonomy to fashion their own model inside as well as outside the existing structures. It is imperative that once and for all the government realize that they can play a very useful role in the evolution of our society. The year 1985 will be the International Youth Year. Hopefully, that international year will differ from what we have come to expect from such events when we hear pious wishes, reports are published to gather dust, and finally the year is over. That is the trap we may fall into if we fail to remain vigilant, and that is why between now and the International Youth Year we must give young people more opportunities to express themselves.

I was somewhat upset by the fact that, when we were studying the constitutional resolutions and talking at length about the Canada of tomorrow that we were trying to incorporate in the Constitution, not a single group of young Canadians made representations before the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. It is something to be concerned about, because it may be that the governments now give generous grants to official languages minority groups and to minority groups in every sense of the words, but not to other groups of young people which lack the wherewithal and often the technical resources to present briefs and make representations to committees as imposing as those of the Commons and the Senate. I think that group has been left far behind and we ought to help them. The International Youth Year will have different implications in the various countries.

In Canada, needless to say our young people live in a developed environment. In countries where the death rate is high, for instance, young people very soon are called upon to contribute to almost every aspect of life. In those countries, the gap between the young and their elders is narrower since people grow old prematurely because of adverse conditions. In Canada, things are different of course and there is as much difference between the young people and the mature adults than between summer and winter. It is important in my view to stress at this point that youth is not a group of persons but a stage in life. And the International Youth Year will in many respects be a North-South challenge. In southern countries we know the vast majority of the people are below 25 and that group is increasing in number faster and faster. For that reason, when referring to the young people's involvement in those countries, we mean involvement by the majority of the people. In Canada as in a number of other northern nations, the ratio of young people to the total population is far smaller. In 1981, only 19 per cent of the total population were in the 15-24 age group, and 10 years from now, they will account for only 14 per cent.

Despite wide social differences, both northern and southern countries are experiencing unemployment and underemployment problems, and must meet the challenges of technological changes. We want to ensure that the International Youth Year does not go unnoticed in Canada. I would like to take this opportunity, as we should, to correct false perceptions and give the young an opportunity to do something for their country and the world. I would now like to turn to the matter of young people's involvement. A 1980 survey on volunteer work indicates that from February, 1979, to February 1980, some 218,000 young people aged 15 to 19 and some 210,000 young people aged 20 to 24 were doing volunteer work. Overall, although young people account for 25 per cent of the work force, only 15 per cent do volunteer work. There are some implications in those statistics, more particularly in the area of government relations with the volunteer sector. That sector of course is one of the key components in our democracy. It is through volunteer work that a number of people develop their leadership abilities and value system. The abilities so acquired are highly valuable to the country.

As volunteer work is done at the grass roots, it is a most precious indicator of social conditions and the needs of people. Furthermore, volunteer groups play a major role in policy development and formulation. Often, they are at the source of innovations and point to emerging concerns. In view of the importance of that sector in our nation's life, it is essential that young people play a role that is commensurate with their place in society. This certainly is not now. Both the government and the leaders of the volunteer sector should therefore look for ways to stimulate their involvement in that most formative kind of activity. What is needed is action initiated by the young rather than designed for the young. Although useful, the latter cannot be compared with those where young people have a chance to take initiatives and in so doing to develop their leadership abilities.

Then there is the matter of youth and leisure which should also require our full attention. I am referring especially to the participation of young people in cultural events. In this respect, it will be most interesting to read what the Applebaum-Hébert committee will have to say in its report which, I am told, should be tabled within the next few months. Mention is often made about the culture of young Canadians which, admittedly, is an important component of our cultural life. Young people are more involved in sports and physical education, and their artistic and musical tastes are altogether different. We should help young people develop their creativity, which means assisting young authors and artists financially and devising ways and means of scouting for new and promising talents. An effort should be made to establish the reputation of our promising young authors and artists as well as help them establish closer ties with their elders. As I said, youth is but a period in life, but our young people should not be isolated from the rest of our population. Any youth-oriented policy should take into account their creative impulse and the fact that for a great many young people, the transition between adolescence and adult life is very difficult.

While the death rate for our people as a whole has been decreasing over the past 20 years, it has slightly increased among teenagers and remains somewhat constant among young girls. Accidents and suicides which account for approximately 80 per cent of the deaths among young boys and nearly 60 per cent among young girls are the two main causes of death among young Canadians. Suicide ranks as the third main cause of death and is responsible for 16 per cent of all losses of lives in the 20-24 age group. According to these same statistical data, most losses of lives among young people result from their life style and surrounding related causes, as opposed to natural causes. Which makes us realize the necessity for developing a policy which truly meets the needs of all our young people, whether they are disadvantaged or well-off, disturbed or well-balanced.

There exist now various government programs which meet the needs of young Canadians, including Open House Canada, Katimavik and many others developed by the Fitness and Amateur Sports branch. One way or another, a number of departments are offering programs which are of utmost importance, including the Department of National Defence, the Armed Forces, the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission—with all its initiatives—also the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, together with its programs for young Indians, so young Canadians are receiving indeed a lot of attention. The only problem is that the left hand often does not know what the right hand is doing. And only young people who are well-off are made aware of these programs. The information is not easily available, and no booklets have been distributed by the Government of Canada to inform young Canadians of the programs being offered to them. They simply don't exist, and there is no over-all philosophy. I am thinking for instance of Open House Canada where hundreds of applications from young Canadians anxious to discover their country are turned down each year; and yet, in view of the problems we are now faced with in the areas of national unity and regional inequalities, this program should be generously funded. Expenses on advertising, should be cut and young Canadians should instead be encouraged to discover the reality of their country, Canada.

Mr. Speaker, considering the social and economic changes that this country is now experiencing, I think it is essential to thoroughly examine those various programs and to determine to what extent they encourage young Canadians into sharing our community life and finding the formula which will enable them to fully develop their abilities and potential and serve the country. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take this opportunity to state some of my views. For the last three years, I have noted how the government has been dealing with young people and I am rather shocked to see that it has a policy for senior citizens, a policy for women, a policy for the handicapped, a policy for the Indians or the native people, but unfortunately no policy for our young people. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Canada must now as a result of social pressures and economic problems consider that matter at length and it is a challenge which I hope it will hasten to take up. I hope that in the next throne speech, the government will refer to that segment of our society, look to the future and take advantage of the best of opportunities.

[English]

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, in this bill the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is asking Parliament to approve $6.6 billion in borrowing authority for public works and general purposes. This is the minister's third request for additional borrowing authority in the same parliamentary session over a period of two years. If granted this evening, it would total $32.6 billion over that two-year period.

When or if parliament does approve this request of the minister, he will have a total borrowing capacity of $9.6 billion as he has $3 billion of borrowing authority that did not expire at the end of the last fiscal year. These continuous requests for additional borrowing authority make a mockery of the budget's goals of equity, restraint and renewal, all of which have already been blown very nicely out of the water. We know the government has not done anything toward economic renewal. Their attempts at equity have been disastrous. Now it is indicating it is going to abandon economic restraint.

How is the government going to do that? Restraint entails coping within the financial limitations, not putting Canadians in debt for another $6.6 billion. Restraint generally requires careful management of the economy, not throwing good money after bad to pay for government excesses or mismanagement. Speaking of mismanagement and government excesses, let us look at some of the things this government under this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has done over a number of years. Let us look at what these fiscal giants have done. Some of these things would be rather amusing if they did not tell such a sad tale.

In February, 1981, the Crown corporation CNR spent $64,244 to purchase advertising space in a newspaper to wish Canadian Pacific Railways, its chief competitor, a happy birthday. That is the sort of thing we are faced with. The list goes on and on.

Let us look at some other things these people have done over that period of time. In the 1978-79 annual report, the Auditor General pointed out that since 1974 the Department of the Environment has been paying an annual rent of $241,00 under a long-term lease due to expire in the year 2045 for a British Columbia property it is not even occupying. In addition, the government paid municipal taxes on the property of $56,000 in 1978 and 1979.

Let us look at something a little more current and a little more meaningful to Canadians. This government has spent in excess of $65 million on the metric conversion program. Last year alone the Metric Commission spent $12.4 million on a program that Canadians do not even want. They have been forced to pay the bill for something they do not want. It is rather like swinging your own noose over the limb of a tree and setting yourself up on the horse. In that same vein, they hired two chefs for a total of $110,000 for a six-week television contract to promote metric cooking. Imagine that!

Let us look at the great giant of the oil industry, Petrofina. In 1981 the federal government purchased Petrofina for approximately $1.46 billion, or $120 per share. At the time of the purchase, the shares were trading for $90 a share and were estimated by various brokerage houses to have a true value of about $80. In other words, the federal government paid between $365 million and $486 million more than was necessary in order to obtain a series of gasoline outlets in eastern Canada. This is what we are now being asked to appropriate, or expropriate from the Canadian taxpayers to help pay for it.

Right here in the National Capital Region the four phases of the Place du Portage were estimated in the early seventies to cost $124.5 million. By the time of completion in 1979, costs had risen to $217.5 million, $93 million over the original budget.

In 1973 an untendered contract was awarded to business associates of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) to supply liquor and food for Place du Portage for a period of 20 years. They were evicted by the Department of Public Works in 1980 for failing to make rental payments of $490,000 for their three commercial outlets in the building.

Canadian taxpayers will shell out $4,000 a month over the next five years on rent for a Vancouver apartment of a senior government bureaucrat. The apartment has been rented by the Department of Public Works for his use. The justification for the expense is that the apartment is being used for entertaining. In trying to justify the expenditure of that $4,000 per month, an aide to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) referred to the amount as chicken feed. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that they look at $6.6 billion as mere chicken feed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Turkey feed.

Mr. Corbett: It goes on and on. Advertising is one of the most blatant misuses of taxpayers' dollars that this government can possibly come up with. In 1982-83 the advertising budget of the federal government is $70 million, compared to $63 million in 1981-82 and $54 million in 1980-81.

Have you noticed, Mr. Speaker, the sort of advertising this government has been promoting, what it has been doing? Have you noticed that it actually says very little about the programs that in essence they are supposed to be trying to promote? If you believe that they do say very little, you are absolutely correct; and if you think it is expensive, you are absolutely correct as well.

The number two advertiser in this country is General Foods. The number one advertiser, in terms of dollars spent, is this government, our very own Liberal Government of Canada. Just how much more do they spend than General Foods? They spend about twice as much. General Foods spends about $35 million a year. The Government of Canada, not to come close, wants to make sure it is out there in front, and it is spending $70 million, at least, this year.

The traditional role of government advertising is to provide information on services or to advertise changes to regulations. This government has deviated substantially from this sort of traditional program. Little of this year's $70 million will actually be used to advertise or make the public aware of regulation amendments or to provide service information. The bulk of the advertising will be to relay the general purposes of many departments and flogging the Liberal's own messages, in an attempt to prop up the sinking ship.

In this past year alone the federal government has launched four massive media campaigns directed toward promoting government policy, to making Liberal actions popular with Canadians.

Last summer Ottawa launched a $3.25 million advertising campaign, promoting the National Energy Program. A second campaign launched last summer promoted the Constitution, in an effort to counteract the bad publicity they had been receiving and the bitter sentiments that were arising from the federal-provincial negotiations and to bring Canadians alongside the Liberal stance.

A second constitutional advertising campaign was launched this spring, to herald in the new constitution and charter. It was a two-week campaign and cost Canadian taxpayers $3 million. It was organized by the Canadian Unity Information Office. It was designed to convince Canadians that "the future belongs to us."

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is very sad commentary on the new Constitution. The opponents, rightly so, contended that it was not so much a measure to inform the public about the Constitution as to divert their attention away from the disastrous economic problems that face the nation.

Last fall, Mr. Speaker, the federal government took out some $130,000 worth of full-page advertisements in 100 newspapers on budget day to advise Canadians about its plans for "sound economic development". This is perhaps the boldest and most blatant misuse of public funds spent on promoting government policies. To this date we do not have a budget. Currently the government is spending $5 million on an advertising campaign "Helping Canada Work". Employment and Immigration officials contend that the advertisements promote job creating and skill development and suggest that despite economic problems the Canadian economy is working as a whole. What a laugh! I think that Canada's 1.2 million unemployed and our struggling businessmen could well find a better use for that money.

Let us take another look at the difficulties that this government is encountering and trying to prop up with these slick advertising campaigns. They have taken out a series of full colour newspaper advertisements promoting the federal contribution to agricultural research. It does little except to promote the federal image. It does not help the countless farmers in this nation who faced bankruptcy or who are currently facing bankruptcy. Unfortunately, it is this type of advertisement that is offered by almost every government department. It is doing no good and brings little or no benefit to the general public.

Let us put aside the blatant political aspect of government advertising. Let us take a look at the business side of the problem. Competitive bidding is the hard and fast rule when it comes to awarding contracts for construction or for government purchases. However, political patronage is the golden rule of this government when it comes to advertising. To manage the government's advertising needs, this Liberal government has hired a firm called Canadian Media Corporation. This corporation is a consortium of Liberal advertising agencies, which is assembled for the sole purpose of servicing the government's advertising needs. The patronage system is no longer used in the United States. It is not used in Great Britain or in most other developed countries. In a legitimate government, advertising for good purposes is indeed laudable, but not for this government. The firms involved in looking after this government's needs are receiving patronage dollars.

Another aspect of government advertising to be considered is the federal government's exemption from the advertising code of ethics. This government does not have to adhere to the code of ethics that every other advertiser in the nation must live up to. What is more important is what the government has got out of it and what the Liberal Party has got out of it. It is a device which the Liberal Party is mounting, it is a device by which this party in power is attempting to mould and to manipulate public opinion. We fear that the increasing use of this sort of advertising will lead to government by propaganda, and that is exactly what the government is trying to develop. The government is using our tax dollars, tax dollars which the public would no doubt far rather see being used in other areas. It is highly irregular in a free country, in a democratic country, in a country that has a so-called democratically-elected government, that it would become involved in an advertising campaign and an advertising scheme of this nature. It is particularly appalling when those same advertising dollars, $70 million this year, could address a multitude of genuine fiscal problems. It is, in our opinion, Mr. Speaker, political abuse at its very worst.

Why does the government need additional borrowing authority? The finance minister says he needs it for public works and for general purposes. These vague and unspecified purposes lead one to wonder if it is to enable the government to continue its wasteful and irresponsible spending. Certainly it is not to encourage restraint. This government is infamous, Mr. Speaker, for its wasteful spending and certainly it is infamous for its accounting habits. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation sold off a significant amount of its property at a loss of $100 million to Canadians. Those lost dollars would have gone a long way to aiding industrial development. The CN Tower cost $40.5 million more than was originally estimated. That money could have been better used to help farmers. The government juggled its books to make it appear as though it had reduced spending by $2.7 billion, when actually it definitely had not done so.

The government spent between $365 million and $486 million more than was necessary to purchase, as I mentioned, Petrofina, I think we have to ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, as responsible Members of Parliament, whether the government intends to continue this sort of mismanagement, with an additional $6.6 billion.

Since it is inevitable in our system that the government will receive this borrowing authority, we should at least ensure that the money borrowed will be earmarked for constructive purposes and that it will not again be wasted. I know of several excellent uses to which this money could be put. The government has deemed it necessary, for instance, to close CFB Chatham in New Brunswick. That will deprive the communities of Chatham and Newcastle of approximately $25 million to $30 million annually in lost payroll and spin-off effects. This will cost the area about 3,500 jobs. Chatham will need a new and stable economic base after this happens—the entire Miramichi area will—and I daresay it will happen, despite the hollow assurances of the government. Some of these dollars could well be spent in that area.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) has set up two task forces to study the problems the closure of the Chatham base will create. The first task force was to report last January or February. That seems to have gone by the boards. It would be very interesting to know what that task force recommended. Obviously it was not favourable to the government because we have not heard about it. Neither have we heard from the second task force, and it has been in existence for some time as well.

One does not have to be an economic giant to recognize that Chatham and Newcastle and the Miramichi region need some support. That support should come from responsible Members of Parliament. Where is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), who is supposed to be responsible for New Brunswick? Where has his voice been on this vital, critical and crucial issue to the Miramichi region? It has been strangely silent.

There are billions of barrels of oil trapped in the oil shales in Alberta County, New Brunswick, which is in my constituency. It is conservatively estimated that there are probably 15 billion to 20 billion barrels of oil trapped in those shales. The New Brunswick government has been trying to convince the federal government to join with the provincial government in a program to cost-share an exploration program which would enable New Brunswickers to gain some benefit from that oil. It would enable Canadians to gain some benefit from that oil. This government has been very quick to spend dollars in other areas of the country where there would be little or no return, especially for political uses and purposes. What do we get from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) when this query is put to him? We get nothing but blank stares and meaningless looks. Some of the $6.6 billion we are talking about now could be used in the development of that shale, and it could be used to generate revenue for that region. New Brunswick and eastern Canada would be self-sufficient through the development of the shales along with Hibernia and the reserves off Sable Island. The shales would contribute handsomely toward energy self-sufficiency in the maritimes.

Millions of dollars are now lost annually to the poorer provinces because of federal government modifications to federal-provincial agreements. These cutbacks have already caused tax increases in receiving provinces which are attempting to maintain adequate health care services and post-secondary educational services. These dollars could well be put to supplementing these services and relieving taxpayers and hard-pressed students from having to make the extra payments they will now have to make in order to attain very necessary education. But what is this government's attitude when it comes to students who are hard pressed and when it comes to elderly people who are in need of health care services? The attitude of this government is somewhere up in the sky—pie in the sky.

The splitting of DREE will also have negative consequences for areas dependent on development assistance to promote strong and vibrant economic bases. Some of this money would be well spent in these endeavours. The attitude adopted by the Liberals seems to be that deficit spending is good for economic growth and there is nothing wrong with having a large national debt. However, we are seeing the results. Hon. members opposite are the perpetuators of that particular theory. We owe the money only to ourselves, and there are not enough assets to offset our debts. I suppose hon. members opposite keep their philosophy in order to appease their little red friends to my left, who must take the ultimate responsibility for this whole economic mess because they ensured that the group opposite got back into power when we had a responsible government in place.

Government spending is out of control. The Liberals will spend $26 billion more between 1980 and 1984 than had been planned by the responsible Crosbie budget. That is $1,100 per capita. The Liberal government promised to hold spending below the rate of growth of the gross national product, but we know how much promises mean to this government when we see what has happened with respect to DREE and what has happened in the maritimes. The government promised to extend the natural gas pipeline. The National Energy Program would better have been entitled the "national disaster program" as far as Atlantic Canada is concerned. It just happens that the first letters of those words coincide with the first letters of the name of the party to my left, the NDP. Members of the NDP might very well be called the "national disaster party".

The deficit has to be paid off, and it can be paid off in only two ways. The first way is to print more money, and the other is to borrow more money. If we borrow money to pay off the debt, a second debt is incurred. The debt has to be serviced, and today one of every five tax dollars is used to pay interest on the public debt. Interest on the public debt will cost taxpayers in this nation $16.6 billion in the fiscal year 1982-83. That $16.6 billion amounts to $680 from every Canadian man, woman and child, including babies. That is money lost. It is money which could well be used in other areas. It is money which could be used to shore up the economy and get Canadians back to work.

The Canadian government is in a very serious financial situation. It would not be so bad if it were just the Canadian government. It would not be so bad if hon. members opposite had to atone for their mismanagement of the Canadian economy and if in the end they were held accountable for every penny and had to pay every penny themselves somehow. But no. Alas, every Canadian citizen will be responsible. When meaningful questions are asked in question period by hon. members on this side of the House as to what the government intends to do, we hear guffaws and laughter, and we see incessant smiles.

Mr. Crosby: No answers.

Mr. Corbett: My hon. colleague says we hear no answers, and that is painfully true. Yes, the Canadian government is indeed in a very serious financial situation. Our national debt is triple our national assets. Can hon. members imagine a private business attempting to operate when its debt exceeds its assets by three times? It would not even begin to get that far. It would be forced into receivership and, worse, into bankruptcy. However, according to our government, that is one of the beautiful things about our deal. Hon. members opposite feel governments cannot go bankrupt. Perhaps they cannot, but the party responsible can be turfed out of power. Indeed, had Canadians any indication as to what would happen to them when the NDP allowed and, indeed, ushered in this group of has-beens, the situation in the country would be different today.

• (2140)

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Corbett: It would be a different sort of situation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) on a point of order.

Mr. Corbett: —in this country today—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Comox-Powell River.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, this is the greatest accumulation of mendacities I have heard in a long time. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the people of Canada threw that government out and that the electoral process resulted in the election of the present government.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, it is—

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The Chair has no choice but to recognize any hon. member who seeks the floor on a point of order. I want to make it clear, however, that the hon. member for Comox-Powell River sought the floor on a point of order but there was no appeal to the regulations, "un rappel aux règlements." There was no question of a point of order in that regard. That was debate.

I see that other hon. members are rising and want to seek the floor on points of order. I think it would be my responsibility to judge very quickly that if an hon. member rises on a point of order and cannot make a reference to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons in very short order, I will have to cut that member off. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo).

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River indicated that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal was a "mendicator". In my books, "mendicator" is a liar.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am going to give the hon. member for Prince Albert an opportunity to raise a point of order. The way I will do that is to encourage him to make a reference to the Standing Orders or to the precedents of the House of Commons.

If he is going to enter into debate I will have to cut him off again, and that will be the last time I will do so.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I was just bringing out a point which I think is part of the rules of the House and that is that it is improper for the hon. member for Comox-Powell River to use that particular indication with regard to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett). Possibly Your Honour could rule on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I must say that the Chair is at a loss on how to proceed with that request. One thing the Chair will not do is to proceed to rule on the issue that the hon. member refers to.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, I would not want you to think for a moment that those sorts of trivia bother me. I am a much bigger person than that. I can tell you that if this group to my left wants to take a page out of the notebook of their leader, then apparently that is how much influence he has with them. He got up today and accused us of obstructing the business of the House. We are attempting to set Canadians straight and to solve problems of mismanagement, and members of that party raise an issue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It was my understanding that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal was addressing himself to the borrowing authority bill.

Mr. Corbett: Indeed I was before I was so rudely interrupted by these "has-beens" on my left.

I tell you there is a solution for Canadians, Mr. Speaker, and it is very, very simple. I doubt that hon. members opposite will hear it because they have not heard anything yet that has not been told to them time and time again. It will be told to them one more time, perhaps, after I finish telling them now.

Quite simply, it is time for Canadians to get this government off their backs and out of their pocketbooks. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when the citizens of this country next have an opportunity, not only will they turf this bunch of fellows—I was going to say felons but I will say fellows—out of office and their little red turkey friends with them but they will elect a responsible Progressive Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time that is available to me I think it should be very clearly pointed out—and it has to be emphasized time and time again—that the Conservative government in the Thirty-first Parliament was ejected from power by the Canadian people. There is no doubt that the democratic process was fulfilled and ultimately it was the will of the people to get rid of a government whose policies were not acceptable. Unfortunately, the bill before us tonight—

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You so rightly brought me back to the point that we were dealing with the borrowing authority bill. Now, all of a sudden the hon. member is dealing with the previous government. Is it not right and just that he be asked to address his remarks to the bill? He probably does not know anything about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, certainly you would allow me the latitude to develop the context in which the present borrowing authority bill is before the House today. The thrust of debate tonight has not been of a constructive nature. The official opposition has torn the proposed legislation to pieces without making a single constructive suggestion. That is unfortunate. If we look at the proposal before us tonight for a $6.5—

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member continues with his remarks I think he ought to read Hansard to see what was said earlier in the day. He has not been in the House. Many alternative proposals have been put forward.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, certainly the presentation by the finance critic for the Conservative Party was a timely intervention, particularly as he is a supporter of the high interest rate policy and many of the policies that have brought about the present problems in the Canadian economy. Certainly it was the Conservative government that initiated the high interest rates and high energy prices.

The borrowing authority bill deals with the question of priorities in this country. I would be willing to admit that bad as the government was in the Thirty-first Parliament and bad as was the direction in which they were taking us, the present situation is worse. One of the reasons for that is that there is no sense of direction today.

To pass the bill before us tonight would be like taking money and throwing it into a bottomless hole. That situation will continue as long as we do not have a plan to bail us out of the situation.

There are basically three priorities, and when the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party address those priorities, perhaps a sense of direction will be established. Maybe the borrowing will become constructive and a concrete plan will be formulated. The basic priorities are unemployment, high interest rates and the high inflation rate.

The first priority is unemployment. We got onto the subject of mendacities tonight. The second largest mendacity in this country, other than the ones being put forward on a regular basis about the sanctity of the Conservative Party in the last Parliament, is unemployment. We are dealing with about 1.9 million people unemployed in this country, not 1.2 million and not the seasonally adjusted figure or the labour surplus rate. There are approximately 1.9 million people who do not have access to employment, who do not have an opportunity to share in the wealth of the country to which they are entitled. It is time we heard from the party on the right, the "do nothing but criticize" party and the party that is currently governing the country which is the "do nothing at all" party. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, there has to be an employment strategy.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member entertain a question if time permits at the end of his remarks?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly entertain a question from the minister, but it would be preferable if he could work with his colleague on a short wrap-up because there is a very limited amount of time.

The three priorities are clear: jobs, interest rates and inflation. The question is: what are we going to do about it? There have been many suggestions, and the New Democratic Party has put forward five constructive suggestions. First, there should be a full-employment strategy. No one would disagree that Canadians should have the right to employment. I defy any sane member of this House to oppose the suggestion that everyone should have an opportunity to share in the wealth of the country. But in addition, they should also have an opportunity to contribute to this country, its basic strength, and its future. What commitment could you have to a nation if you are blocked from sharing in its wealth, if you cannot live in dignity? Basically we need a full employment strategy, and we need it desperately.

We in this country have been very roughly handled by industry. I simply point to that $2 billion windfall which the energy industry received last week from the government, no strings attached. We have seen many other cash grants and windfalls in which there was the hope for a trickle-down effect, that somehow the benefits would trickle down to those who have nothing. It has not worked in the past and it will not work today. Our suggestion, and I challenge other to criticize it, is that of production agreements in key sectors. If you receive government benefits, if you are a multinational corporation, you do not take the jobs from this country, rather, you create jobs and guarantee employment.

There is a tremendous need for housing in this country, and it is unfortunate that we did not have a little more opportunity for some dialogue with the minister. A tremendous investment at this time in housing would create an enormous number of jobs and meet a tremendous number of social needs. Certainly the minister did something, but it was far short of what was needed. Another point is assistance to exporters. I wish I had time to talk about the tremendous chaos in the forest industry, one of the greatest producers of wealth in this country. This chaos has developed because the government failed to give adequate support to Canadian producers in markets abroad. This should be an extremely high priority because it would create jobs. We produce more than we can consume and it must be exported. With those brief suggestions, I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of making this presentation.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have a limited amount of time and I would like to start by taking some time as a relatively new parliamentarian to comment on some of the suggestions made by members of the opposition here this evening. Mr. Speaker, we on this side are quite willing to listen to positive suggestions made by members, regardless of political party. I think we as a government are quite concerned about some of the people who are victims, I suppose, of the present economic situation. Quite frankly, I assumed there would be a much more positive debate here this afternoon on the part of the opposition than what I have actually heard. I refer specifically, I suppose, to the comments of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon when he quoted a speech given by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in Montreal where that gentleman said, in terms of the macroeconomic policies of this government, that the Conservative Party did not much differ with those policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: I heard the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) mention roughly three things. He felt if we were to change some of the NEP, that would solve all the economic ills facing the country today. I would like to remind that hon. member that the NEP does not apply in the U.S., yet we find the oil and gas industry down there finds itself in the same difficulties as the industry in western Canada.

I listened with some interest to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) who talked about government advertising. I want to point out to that hon. member that I am sure the responsible minister listened with some interest to some of the cost-saving measures the hon. member suggested. But I also want to point out that the government's budget for this year is $67 billion, and the hon. member chose to spend about 35 minutes to focus in on that program. He said any money spent on advertising federal government programs is wasted. I would also point out to the hon. member that the alienation in western Canada is not anti-Liberal, it is anti-central government. I would suggest a large part of that has been caused by the inability of the federal government to advertise properly its programs which affect all Canadians across the country.

Admittedly our party has difficulties at the present time because we do not have the representation in Western Canada we would wish, and will have after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: But I point out that if one looked at some of the material sent to constituents by Members of Parliament representing the Conservative Party in western Canada, one would question whether or not they believe in a federal government or federal state in this nation.

Let me focus on where we are spending part of this $67 million. For example, the Department of National Health and Welfare anticipates a net increase of $1.7 billion in expenditures for this budget year. Of that money, $1.264 billion will go directly to people covered under the Old Age Security Act. That is partially due to an increase in the number of people over 65, and also due to the Liberal government's having a cost of living allowance attached to those benefits. Is the opposition suggesting that we cut out that kind of benefit to the elderly? There will be $397 million in the form of statutory payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, which we have no control over. Are you suggesting that we cut statutory payments to the provinces? We have an increase of $249 million in payments to individuals under the Family Allowances Act, which is also indexed. Do I hear from the opposition that that is an area they want to cut?

So what I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, is that much more could have been done in terms of constructive criticism of this government. I think we are smart enough at least to listen to them if they would only take the time to give us constructive criticism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being ten o'clock, pursuant to order made Friday, May 7, 1982, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Bussières) which was agreed to on the following division:

THE ECONOMY

DEMAND THAT GOVERNMENT REDUCE DEFICIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, when the Government of Canada cannot sell its bonds even when the yield is set at 16 per cent, we know that there is something wrong, not only with the Canadian economy but also with the government itself. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That the government be immediately obliged to lessen pressure on capital markets by reducing its horrendous $16 billion deficit, thereby restoring confidence in Canadian government paper.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

MINISTER'S MEETING WITH RETAIL INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, on May 14, 1982, as reported at page 17449 of Hansard, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) stated that he was ready to have discussions with the retail food industry to find out if it was feasible to excuse some small retailers from compulsory metrication. Yesterday I learned from a confidential source that, instead of working with the group on scales, which includes some 50 representatives of the whole industry, he intends to meet next Monday with only six members of the group who represent umbrella associations within the retail food industry under the chairmanship of an employee of the Toledo Scale Manufacturing Company of the United States. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That in view of the quite disastrous effects of the present economic situation on Canadian businesses, particularly small businesses which include the independent food retailers, the industry as a whole, represented by the working group on scales, some 50 members, should be fully consulted, rather than this apparent doublecross and the stacking of the deck against the small independent retailers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MINES AND MINING

POSTPONEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF ALUMINUM SMELTER AT BALMORAL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, yesterday in Winnipeg the president of the Aluminum Company of Canada announced the postponement of construction of a 200,000 tonne aluminum smelter in Balmoral, Manitoba. Whereas this announcement means the loss, for now, of some 700 permanent jobs, to say nothing of jobs in site construction and the needed hydro development, and whereas the company laid the blame for this postponement on weak markets, lower prices, and other ramifications of the continuing recession, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this government abandon its ruinous economic policies which have strangled the Canadian economy, costing tens of thousands of jobs in its vain attempt to save it from inflation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED ERECTION OF PATRIATION MONUMENT ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, this Thirty-Second Parliament is unique in that it patriated the Canadian Constitution from Great Britain. No one man or woman in Parliament has accomplished this. Each and every member of this Thirty-second Parliament has helped to make it possible. Over two years ago on May 9, 1980, this House unanimously passed a motion to initiate the successful process, and on December 2 last this House passed the final resolution. Therefore, in recognition of this momentous event, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and having had favourable discussions with both the House leader and the acting House leader of the NDP:

• (1410)

That this government consider the advisability of erecting, at an early date, a suitable monument on the grounds of Parliament containing engraved plaques which include:

1. A listing of all significant milestones in the process of patriation of Canada's Constitution.

2. A full-sized replica of the Proclamation signed by the Queen.

3. An alphabetical listing of all the Members of the Thirty-Second Parliament, including the names of those who are deceased and those who have gone to other responsibilities.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL FOR RETALIATORY ACTION IF NEW YORK CONTRACT WITH BOMBARDIER COMPANY IS CANCELLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas following public tenders, Bombardier, a Canadian company, was awarded a contract for the manufacture of 825 subway cars for the City of New York, and whereas as a result of pressure brought to bear by the Budd Company, the New York Metropolitan Transportation Authority might make use of its right to cancel its contract with Bombardier to award the contract to Budd, I move, seconded by the member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant):

That if the American authorities cancel their contract with Bombardier, the Canadian government reserve the right to cancel its contract with the American aircraft manufacturer responsible for manufacturing the F-18.

Madam Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a motion of this kind requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED COMPENSATION FOR USERS OF RENEWABLE ENERGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, Monday, June 21 will be "Sun Day"—a day of national support for renewable energy and energy conservation in Canada, which has been organized by the Canadian Solar Industries Association, the Solar Energy Society of Canada, Energy Probe, and other energy interest groups across Canada. Recent advances in technology and standards have affirmed the significant role that solar energy can play in Canada's energy mix. In the face of dismal failures by the Minister of Energy in nearly all parts of his energy policy, including compensation paid for high price oil imports, which discriminates unfairly against renewable energy sources, and in fairness and for the sake of energy self-sufficiency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Minister of Energy be instructed to compensate solar and other renewable energy users at the same level as he compensates the use of expensive and unsure supplies of foreign oil.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

PROPOSAL TO BUILD NATURAL GAS PIPELINE FROM MAINLAND TO VANCOUVER ISLAND B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That part of the so-called "Laterals Fund" of $500 million, set aside in the "Energy Update" outlined on May 31 last by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to assist in the distribution of gas in the province of Quebec, be made available to the province of British Columbia, so that a natural gas pipeline can be extended from the British Columbia mainland to Vancouver Island.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXTENDED LAY-OFFS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the CNR announced on Monday that it will be extending its previously announced summer lay-off to a total of ten weeks in addition to the usual summer shutdown. This should make the Progressive Conservative Party very happy. For years they have been advocating that Crown corporations like the CNR act like any other short-sighted, profit-blinded enterprise. They have succeeded only too well—and too easily, I might add—in persuading their Liberal comrades. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That the Minister of Transport, and the new president of the CNR who, incidentally, made no mention at the plan to extend the lay-offs in his so-called honest and open presentation to the transport committee last week, be awarded the Progressive Conservative Callous Businessman of the Year Award for their strict adherence to the Progressive Conservative view of how Crown corporations should act.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

EVENTUAL COALITION WITH PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas after a meeting of the Parti Québécois National Executive last weekend, the leader of the party, after ambiguous and controversial discussions on the party's future on the federal scene, stated that he was considering a possible coalition with the Progressive Conservative Party, I move, seconded by the member for Beauce (Mr. Lapointe):

That the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party inform the House how he sees a possible alliance with a party that is in favour of independence, and that he clarify his position for us as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this kind of motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

QUERY RESPECTING DRAFT INCOME TAX LEGISLATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since the minister has met with his caucus all morning—I do not see any major bruises on his face—and has given his caucus some understanding of the status of the various announcements he is going to make, would the minister announce to the House today when he proposes to make his economic and financial statement, when he proposes to release draft legislation respecting the income tax measures of the budget, and when he proposes to give to the House some new estimate as to the size of the burgeoning budget deficit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that, although we in the Liberal caucus have disagreements, we treat each other with respect. That might be an attitude which could be developed in the Conservative caucus.

I have already said in reply to the Leader of the Opposition that I would update the financial and economic situation in the House of Commons before the summer recess. I have not established a firm date, but if the expectation is that the House is to close at about the end of June, it will be within that period.

The same answer applies to the question with respect to draft Income Tax Act legislation. In reply to a question asked by an hon. member from Vancouver I indicated that that would be tabled in the House before the summer recess.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, surely the minister understands that every day of delay leads to record lows in the level of the Canadian dollar. Today it is trading at below 78 cents American. Every drop in the value of the Canadian dollar leads to increases in interest rates in the country. Surely the minister understands this. Does he not realize that every time the level of the dollar reaches a record low, his credibility also reaches a record low? Will the minister give us a more precise understanding of when these announcements will be made so that people can plan and understand what they are dealing with?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is again exhibiting considerable naivete when he relates exchange movements of the Canadian currency to a possible date of an economic statement. I think that is an extraordinary linkage for the hon. member to make.

I have already indicated that I would be making a statement in the House of Commons, and I said it would be made before the House rises for the summer recess. As soon as I have a date settled upon, I will let the House know. I will come into the House and make the statement, and the hon. member can make his reply on that occasion.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I have spent my life working in the marketplace. I understand the impact of uncertainty on the marketplace and the Canadian dollar. If there is any naivete in this place, it is across the aisle from me right now.

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister might not care too much about the size of the budget deficit, which is now estimated at between $16 billion and $20 billion, but it matters to Canadians. It matters to small businessmen. It matters to people who are renewing their mortgages. When will the minister come out with some statement that will give the Canadian people some indication of the size of the deficit so that we can understand what impact it will have on interest rates and the level of the Canadian dollar?

• (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked the same question three times, and the same answer has to be given. That statement will be made in the House of Commons before the House rises for the summer recess. That is a pretty definite time period in view of the fact that today is June 16. The hon. member—anyway, I will not make any further comment about his deep understanding of the marketplace.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT TO BUILD CONFIDENCE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that the confidence level in this country is at an all-time low. He will know that his bond issue of yesterday is not selling well, and that the rate is now over 16 per cent on those bonds. The rate is over 16 per cent on his Eurodollar bonds and they are not selling well any more. The confidence level has gone.

When will the minister do something to assist Canada build back the confidence that Canadians need in their business, in their future, in their country? When is he going to do something to give us some hope for the future?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member talked about confidence. I agree with him that confidence in the future of Canada and confidence in its prospects is very important in the present circumstance. Maybe he would agree that he has a responsibility at least not to undermine that confidence. I would suggest to him that he has undermined it by suggesting that somehow the way the bond issue went was due to some Canadian policy. It was due basically to a nervousness in the market environment which was largely influenced by changes in U.S. bond prices. I am told that there will be very little difficulty in disposing of the remaining part of the issue. That ought to help the hon. member build his confidence, as I have confidence in the future of the country.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the minister blames the Americans, and now he blames the opposition for our financial policies. I wonder if he would start looking where he should look.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO BUSINESS AND AGRICULTURE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I want to put this question to the Minister of Finance. With a projected cash requirement of $13 billion to perhaps $16 billion this year, a cash requirement that will drive interest rates to unbelievable heights—if that in fact is going to be the cash requirement—what does he propose to assist small business, farmers, even large businesses that we were told last week in the committee inquiring into bank profits, by the association of trust companies, many would likely fail if this level of interest rates continued in Canada? What is the minister's answer to these problems?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has based his question on a speculation. He has projected a certain fiscal and financial situation which has yet to be disclosed in the House. I propose to do that in full detail. When that information is available, as it will be, then it will be possible to deal with the hon. member's question.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER TO LIBERAL CAUCUS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, but before that I should like to say to the Minister of Finance that the last person—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member knows that he should not be commenting on the answers.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it is clear from the heckling that the Liberals think they are still in their caucus meeting.

Mr. Andre: You are wasting time, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I will go right to the Prime Minister. In spite of the continuing decline in the level of the Canadian dollar, in spite of the fact that we now have the deepest recession in Canada since the 1930s, I have been told that the Prime Minister made it clear to the Liberal caucus meeting this morning that there would be no basic change in the economic policy of Canada. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if this was or was not the case.

● (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know better than to ask me to comment on what goes on in caucus. I do not ask what goes on in his caucus.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the people of Canada know better than to ask the Prime Minister to comment on anything, because they get no answers at all.

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering the expectations the Prime Minister raised when he was in Versailles, and the deep feelings all over this country that something serious needs to be done to change economic direction, will the Prime Minister give us his assurance that he argued before his colleagues, whether in caucus or not, about the need for a shift in economic policy, and that he will have specific policies to bring before the people of Canada in this Chamber which will indicate a significant change to a new economic direction?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Tory spokesmen were asking me what was going on in cabinet; now the Leader of the New Democratic Party wants to know what I argued in caucus. Surely the two opposition parties might get together, and maybe between them they could come up with some ideas of their own.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, that deep, arid and cynical sense of sarcasm the Prime Minister has—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —is what endears him so much to the hearts and minds of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE ACTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering that the Conservative Party has made some suggestions, and the New Democratic Party has made some suggestions—

Some hon. Members: What?

Mr. Broadbent: I will put forward suggestions, Madam Speaker, because obviously the backbenchers in the Liberal Party have had nothing to say. Will the Prime Minister consider doing something about the fisheries in Canada, the logging industry, the lay-offs in the automotive industry, and do something about all the businesses which are shutting down? Suggestions have been made on this side of the House in all those areas; will the Government of Canada finally act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, just a few days ago the hon. member was making suggestions concerning some of those industries. I dealt with them and I suggested, in so far as the representations of the Leader of the New Democratic Party were concerned, I would consider them seriously.

DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows that the Small Business Development Bond program in its original form assisted thousands of small businesses in Canada to cope with the government's high interest rates, and at the same time increased the net revenue to the federal treasury by $77 million in the first year of operation alone, as a study by Infometrica concluded. In light of that, can the minister justify his taking the "development" out of the bond, thereby reducing it to nothing more than a useless empty disguise, at a time when small business needs that assistance the most?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I explained that situation in some detail, I believe it was last week, in the House.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, we want some definite answers from this minister. He knows there are thousands of bankruptcies taking place every day in the small business sector which add to the record level of unemployment. Is the minister now prepared to reinstate the bond program to its original form, before the end of the month? If not, will he tell us why he is not prepared to do that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have already answered that question within the last seven sitting days. The same two questions have been put and answered. But I will tell the hon. member that if any decision is made about an alteration to the bond, I will be pleased to advise him when that decision is taken.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

DORVAL AND MIRABEL—FUTURE COSTS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board as the minister primarily responsible for controlling government expenditure. Has the minister's department made an assessment of government expenditure in relation to the proposed transfer of airport facilities from Dorval to Mirabel? Without getting into the detail of that assessment, is the government expenditure going to be higher or lower if such a move is made?

• (1430)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the question is entirely hypothetical because the Minister of Transport has made no announcement with respect to the proposed move at this time. Accordingly, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on the cost of a move which has not taken place and which has not yet even been dealt with at the cabinet level.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, in view of the answer given by the minister, which does not surprise me, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question.

LIBERAL CAUCUS ADVICE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, in view of the suggested hypothetical nature of my question about something that has been in the newspapers for months, could the Prime Minister tell the House, to remove uncertainty at least as far as Dorval and Mirabel are concerned, regardless of all the other large economic questions, if this week's Liberal caucus is going to come up with some advice to the ministry so that a decision could be made on this matter, which is solely within the control of the ministry and does not involve the United States or anchovies off Peru?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not honestly know if the matter will come up in caucus. It may; it may not. I know it has come up in previous caucuses. The minister is well informed. The matter will be going to committee next week, as the hon. member knows, and then we will hear views from all sides on it. Maybe we will hear views even from the Tory party.

Mr. Nowlan: You have had our views, Sir.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION ACT

PROGRESS THROUGH SECOND READING

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What has happened to Bill C-109, the bill that provides remedial measures for UFFI victims? Would one reason why the government has not brought back the bill for second reading be that it is under heavy pressure from members on all sides of this House, including the minister's own Liberal caucus, to change the bill to make it much more substantial in terms of compensation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should talk to his House leader. There is no doubt that Members of Parliament on both sides of the House feel the urgency to pass this measure which would allow victims of urea formaldehyde foam insulation to receive help from the Canadian government. We are ready to pay up to $5,000 to each Canadian who has to repair his or her home. Bill C-109 has been before Parliament already on three occasions. I hope the opposition will refrain from giving their speeches because what is at stake exclusively is the principle of paying money to these home owners.

Mr. Clark: That is untrue.

Mr. Ouellet: Indeed, the bill should be sent to a committee. I hope the Conservative Party which has so far filibustered the bill will stop doing that and allow the bill to go to committee as soon as possible.

Mr. Clark: That is another falsehood.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, on the two occasions when Bill C-109 was brought forward we put up three speakers, both on May 10 and on May 31. We have one speaker left. That is hardly filibustering such an important bill. We want to get it through second reading and into committee as soon as possible.

REPORT OF BOARD OF REVIEW INQUIRING INTO UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, could the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs give us a status report on the board of review inquiry into the hazardous nature of UFFI? Is the minister sitting on the report because of some important new evidence about the foam? Will the minister, in any event, make a commitment so that we can get that report before the committee to examine its recommendations before we head into another long hot summer which will further aggravate the concerns of UFFI victims?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am certainly not sitting on the report. I have not received it. I indicated to Parliament that, as soon as this report is received, I will make it public. That is my undertaking. I am anxious to receive this report. One member of the board of review was ill and as a result there has been some delay in the final preparation. I reported this fact to the parliamentary committee which was looking into my estimates. The hon. member knows this.

As far as the discussion of the bill is concerned, on the two occasions involved members of the Conservative Party were speaking at ten o'clock. If they were anxious to have a vote to refer the bill to committee, they only had to sit down and have a vote. I take the word of the hon. member that his party has only one more speaker remaining. I hope my House leader is aware of this, and in the usual discussions between representatives of each party, perhaps the House leaders could agree to have one more speaker per party and then refer the bill to committee.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR SEVERER PROVISIONS AGAINST PROSTITUTION

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Montreal-Mercier): Madam Speaker, a number of Canadian mayors are urging the government to introduce stricter measures in the Criminal Code with respect to prostitution. Could the Minister of Justice inform the House, using his department's statistics, whether any procurers or operators of common bawdy-houses have been convicted under the present strict provisions of the Criminal Code, or whether the legislation is mainly enforced with respect to women who are already being exploited by society, and could he inform us whether he intends to take any action to remedy the situation in the near future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, as I said yesterday, the matter is before the committee which is considering Bill C-53, and I think the hon. member's question could be answered in committee. I have no statistics right now on the number of arrests, but I am willing to co-operate with the hon. member at the committee's meetings and to give her the information requested, if necessary.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have a supplementary, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), for a supplementary.

POSITION OF MINISTER

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice.

[English]

Does the government have a position with respect to whether or not it is appropriate to amend the Criminal Code with respect to solicitation for the purposes of prostitution, or does the Minister of Justice have no opinion on the matter at all?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, at the request of hon. members of the House I referred the matter to the committee for study. I want the views of the committee. I have my own views. I am willing to discuss them with the committee. At the request of an hon. member from Vancouver Centre and others I decided to refer the matter for study because there is a controversy. There have been decisions made by courts which have made it very difficult in some parts of Canada to prosecute for solicitation. In other parts some provincial municipal by-laws have been accepted by the courts. This is the case in Alberta, and some provincial laws have been accepted by the courts in Nova Scotia. Therefore it is a most difficult and comprehensive problem. That is why I asked the committee to look into it. I am looking for the wisdom of the committee, including that of the hon. member.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DELAY IN ON-RESERVE HOUSING PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This year in Saskatchewan alone, 505 houses were allocated to Indian bands. As of today not one housing project has commenced. The on-reserve housing program has been blocked because of circular J-1 which was unilaterally imposed on this year's housing program. Will the minister please suspend the J-1 circular for this year so that housing projects may begin, and promise that consultation will take place with Indian bands before the reintroduction of the J-1 circular?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that consultation is going on with the Indian people with respect to the implications of the J circular. The problem is that the J circular calls for the commitment of all funds from every source in addition to the moneys from the Department of Indian Affairs before a house can go up. This is good in one sense. We know that houses will go up, but the situation causes delays. I am fully aware of that, as are the Indian people. We are seeing what can be done about it.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I hope the minister will take the matter under advisement, act as he said he will, and rectify this very serious problem.

CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL AT DILLON, SASK.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question concerns a commitment which the minister made to the Buffalo River band at Dillon which, because of its special situation, was to build the school in Dillon according to provincial standards instead of the inferior federal standards in place now. Will the minister have this school built according to the commitment he made? When will the minister meet with the band to sort out this very real problem?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, I did support the proposition with the Buffalo River band at Dillon that Indian schools should be built in accordance with provincial standards so they will not be inferior to schools in the provinces. I might indicate that there is some fault in the premise of the hon. member's question. There are some provinces where the federal standard, believe it or not, exceeds that of the provinces.

• (1440)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I just wanted to indicate that that is my information. We are reviewing my opinion on the Dillon Indian band proposal in terms of its implications across the country on Indian schools, but this in no way diminishes my commitment to the Dillon band.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DELIVERY OF NUCLEAR FUEL BUNDLES TO ARGENTINA

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He knows that Argentina has not signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and that it is considered capable of producing an atomic bomb. The Palme commission is the latest one to confirm that. The Prime Minister will also know that on June 8, in Vienna, the Argentine government said that it reserved the right to develop nuclear energy for military uses. Has his government now changed its policy in connection with delivering nuclear fuel bundles to Argentina? Will the government recall the Canadian technicians who are there and cancel any further work on the Candu nuclear reactor because Argentina has clearly said that it is prepared to use nuclear energy for military purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is possible that Argentina may have that intention, but it would not be exercising that intention as regards the Candu or the supplies to the Candu because they are completely safeguarded.

The hon. member will remember that there are other sources of energy supplied by other countries. As the hon. member is aware, Canadian standards are somewhat higher than those of other countries. Therefore, the only effect of accepting the hon. member's suggestion and withdrawing from the contract—in other words, breaking the contract from our point of view—would be to set Argentina free to proceed with whatever is there from Canada without the safeguards which we have negotiated with Argentina and which are being observed.

STATEMENT MADE BY PRIME MINISTER AT NATO MEETING

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. On June 10 the Prime Minister said at the NATO Summit that "no issue, however important, should take precedence over the need to avoid nuclear annihilation". On June 18, in two days' time, he will speak to the United Nations disarmament conference and propose a freeze on the development of new nuclear weapons and a strategy of suffocation. Will the Prime Minister go to the United Nations with clean hands, or will he be branded the greatest hypocrite in the universe because he is not prepared to carry out what he preaches to the rest of the world and to avoid nuclear annihilation, by giving a country the means to make nuclear weapons by reason of a contract entered into in 1974? Will he practise what he preaches?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I suspect the hon. member did not quite understand my previous answer. I said that we had a contract with Argentina—

Mr. Crosbie: Cancel it.

Mr. Trudeau: —with safeguards.

Mr. Crosbie: There are no safeguards.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is not stating the truth when he says that there are no safeguards. He should know, because he was in a government which also tried to sell a Candu—

Mr. Crosbie: We refused to sell a second one.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking me a question. I would appreciate it if he listened to my answer.

I am saying that there is a contract with Argentina to sell a Candu which is safeguarded. If we withdraw from that contract the safeguards will fall, and therefore the material and the technology which have been delivered to Argentina, not only in the period since 1976 but in the period during which the hon. member's party was in government, would be in the hands of the Argentine government without any safeguards. The hypocrisy would really be to say that we are going to withdraw from this and think that it will make the world safer. It will not; it will mean that Argentina will have technology and matarial which are no longer safeguarded. We prefer to keep those safeguards than to set Argentina free.

DATE OF FORTHCOMING ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who, I am sure, appreciates that the only glimmer of hope on the economic horizon for many of Canada's citizens is the hope that in the promised economic statement from the Minister of Finance there will be a major reversal of governmental fiscal and monetary policy. Surely the minister has a very firm idea not only of what he will say but of when he will say it. What is the mystery? Can we not learn today what is in the minister's mind in respect of when we will have this much-needed economic statement from him?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am surprised, really, at the preamble to the question. The hon. member is advocating a complete reversal of current monetary and fiscal policy. I have never heard the official critic of his party advocate anything but a stiffening of fiscal policy rather than a loosening of it. I am surprised at this new evidence of a policy shift on the part of the Conservatives, but I can only reply to him in the same way as I replied to the former questions, namely, that I will be making a statement before the House rises for the summer recess. When the date is established, I will let the House know, and everyone will have ample opportunity to come and listen to the statement and hopefully approve of it.

ASSURANCE SOUGHT THAT HOUSE MAY DEBATE STATEMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Minister of Finance has indicated that the House of Commons would have the opportunity to listen. What the people of Canada expect is that this House of Commons will act, not simply listen. I want the minister to tell us whether the House of Commons will have the opportunity to consider specific new measures in his statement for several debating days, or for a reasonable number of debating days, after the statement is made in the House and before the summer recess?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when the statement is made, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition will be entitled to ask that question. But I believe, if I answered the question either negatively or affirmatively, I would be prejudging what will be in the statement, and that has not yet been finally decided.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I am amazed that the Minister of Finance, having presided over this economic disaster, having tried to hide out in Versailles, and having now had the advantage of consultation with his cabinet and his caucus, does not know what in the world he will propose or whenever it is that he will propose it; indeed, he may not even know the date.

CONTENT OF STATEMENT—MINISTER'S INTENTION RESPECTING PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether in fact there will be specific new measures in the economic statement, and whether the House of Commons will have the opportunity to discuss those measures, or is the minister intending simply to bring in a statement declaring nothing and then use closure to force Parliament out of here?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the answer to the question is no.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Surely he can tell us whether his economic statement will require legislative changes to be enacted by the House. Could he also tell us whether the statement will be given in the afternoon or in the evening?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will reveal all these gripping details at the appropriate time.

QUERY RESPECTING STATEMENT'S CONTENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I want to be clear concerning what the Minister of Finance has said in response to me. I asked him whether there would be specific new measures. He said, "The answer is no". Is he telling us that there will be no specific new measures in the economic statement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As I heard the clinching, final part of the question, it concerned whether I would bring in nothing and close the House by closure, and I replied, "No."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR NEW ECONOMIC MEASURES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, 1,200 Canadians a day are losing their jobs, businesses are going into bankruptcy day after day because of this government, but the Government of Canada refuses to tell the House of Commons of Canada whether there will be any new measures proposed. Will there be any new economic measures proposed in the economic statement? Will there be specific new proposals to rescue Canadians from the economic disaster into which this government has cast them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I have already answered that question. The statement will be made available in the House of Commons and the contents will be known then. I will not be able to specify, until the statement is made, what will be in it and what will be left out.

Mr. Lawrence: You do not know. Good grief!

Oral Questions

THE CONSTITUTION

STATUS OF NATIVE WOMEN—ATTENDANCE AT CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, two years ago the Prime Minister said that one or two more years should be the limit before the government moved unilaterally to end the discrimination against Indian women under the Indian Act, but in the intervening two years the government has not even consulted with Indian leaders or with the leaders of Indian women about the best way to end this discrimination. Obviously, Indian women will have to speak for themselves on this issue.

Will the Prime Minister invite representatives of the Native Women's Association of Canada to attend the coming constitutional conference so that the unique problems of Indian women will not be overlooked when the conference deals with constitutional matters which directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I indicated before that the attendance at the constitutional conference will be a matter to be discussed between the premiers and myself. As a minimum, I intend to invite the principal representatives of the three aboriginal groups in other words, the Inuit, the Indians, and the Metis. That would be the minimum. However, I will see whether the provinces have any suggestions for additions or, indeed, whether the aboriginal groups themselves have any suggestions for additions.

REQUEST THAT NATIVE WOMEN BE REPRESENTED

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister, who knows that the other three groups which have already been invited all have their own legitimate concerns, and that in the pursuit of those concerns the needs of Indian women can very easily be overlooked. There is a fourth national aboriginal group, and I ask the Prime Minister if he will consider inviting that group, the Native Women's Association of Canada, to send representatives to the constitutional conference and to fund them for so doing.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must say that I disagree with the premise of the question. The hon. member is suggesting that the national representative groups of the Indian people are not representative of half of those Indian people. I suggest that that is not a compliment to those representative bodies. He may have representations to make directly to them himself, but I take it that the official spokesmen of the Indian people speak for all the Indian people.

DISPOSITION OF DONALD MARSHALL CASE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and it arises from my concern involving the Donald Marshall case. Donald Marshall is a man who was convicted of murder 11 years ago and his conviction is now being questioned. I wonder whether the minister is prepared today to tell us if he has reached a decision with regard to further disposition of this case.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member and the House that I referred the question to the Nova Scotia Supreme Court and asked the court to make a determination on this case in the light of new evidence brought forward, pursuant to Section 617(b) of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Lawrence: Why did you not say that yesterday?

THE ECONOMY

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION—REQUEST FOR NEW TAX INCENTIVES

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of State for Economic Development recently said in Victoria:

> We are going to stop propping up mature industries that will never be competitive in this generation, like textiles, clothing, footwear and a number of others.

And he also said:

> We are not going to process every one of our natural resources into the final product. For one thing, we do not have the people.

Does the Prime Minister not consider that Canada's million and a quarter unemployed people very clearly indicate that we do have the people necessary to process a far greater proportion of our natural resources into finished products than we process at the present time? I would ask him if the government is considering the introduction of a generous tax incentive to be applied to new and additional production, which will persuade entrepreneurs in Canada to undertake new, additional production in our factories so that we can provide employment for our very large number of unemployed workers.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked two questions. With regard to the first question, stated in the way it was stated, I must say that I agree with the hon. member that we do have the people. With regard to the second question, I understand that he is making a representation as to what our tax policy should be, and I assure him that it will be duly noted.

THE PRESS

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL PRESS COUNCIL—ONTARIO BODY'S VIEWS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. In a statement released yesterday, the Ontario Press Council stated that it views with great apprehension the implication of government intervention contained in the proposal to create a state-sponsored national press council. Will the minister agree to the Ontario Press Council's request that "no national council of any kind should be considered until every opportunity has been explored for encouraging full participation by newspapers in forming voluntary regional or provincial councils"?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member did not refer to other parts of that release which are largely supportive, I believe, of the measures put forward by the government. The Davey Senate Commission in 1970 suggested press councils. It is now 12 years later. The newspapers have had a long time to react. They will have the period of time between now and the introduction of legislation and, indeed, the successful passage of legislation. I have already publicly said that if various newspapers voluntarily join press councils, that would be our press councils.

Mr. Clark: The big stick.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, apparently the minister rejects that proposal by the Ontario Press Council.

FUNDING FOR COUNCIL

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Is the minister aware of the statement by one of the public representatives of the Ontario Council, Reverend Brad Massman, who said that such a body would be "twenty million dollars of the taxpayers' money thrown into the sewer". If so, will the minister tell the House how he can justify this wasteful and dangerous expenditure of tax dollars at a time when the federal deficit has grown to some $16 billion?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I might quote another member of the Press Council who is not always the best friend of the government, Doris Anderson, who encouraged us to proceed with everything we proposed.

MINISTER'S MEETING WITH RETAIL INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question today is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and stems from his commitment in this House on May 14 to call together a working group on scales to determine if the government would exempt small businesses from purchasing metric weigh scales. He has called that meeting for Monday. Unfortunately, he has chosen an employee of the Toledo Weigh Scale Company to act as chairman, and six members only of the 50 members of that sector. How does the minister justify calling only six members of the 50-member sector, none of them independent retail grocers, none of them major corporate food chains, and appointing as chairman an employee of the American Toledo Weigh Scale Company?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Holy Toledo!

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, my consultations with the industry are continuing. Despite the statements of the hon. member, these consultations are going well. When I am ready, I will make a decision, at the appropriate time.

• (1500)

REQUEST FOR ENLARGEMENT OF INDUSTRY REPRESENTATION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The corporate manager of Loblaws says that 85 per cent of them do not want metric in retail since the United States has moved off it and is back to imperial. Will the minister please answer why he refuses to include in the sector group on Monday, after five years of working with that 50-member group, instead of bringing in the Toledo weigh scale company and only six representatives, two of them federally funded groups, to vote us into metric against the wishes of the food retail sector?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, despite the fact that the hon. member repeats his question a little louder, what he is saying does not make any more sense. I listened to his question. I indicated to him that this was one meeting for consultation. Other meetings will take place. We will have extensive consultation, and it will not be only with a few members of the sector group. When the consultation process has been completed to my satisfaction, I will make the appropriate announcement. Until that time I recommend to the hon. member that he cool off, forget about metric for a little while, and concentrate on some other worth-while cause. I am sure he was not elected to Parliament only to think about metric.

MR. FLIS—POLAND—IMPOSITION OF MARTIAL LAW

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the two hundred and seventieth report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) on Tuesday, June 15, 1982, and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Order as to form.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-27, an act to amend the act of incorporation of the Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the Dominion of Canada, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CORBETT—REMARK OF MR. SKELLY

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. During the debate on the borrowing authority bill last evening, I was interrupted by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) who stated, about some remarks I had made in my speech, that:

—this is the greatest accumulation of mendacities I have heard in a long time.

The concise Oxford dictionary gives the interpretation of mendacious as "lying and untruthful". I am perfectly aware that this was probably a new word in the hon. member's vocabulary and he was not aware that the meaning of the word does connote lying and untruthfulness. Therefore, I feel I have a prima facie case of privilege. I would ask Madam Speaker to rule on it and perhaps, in view of the fact that that word is unparliamentary, or at least the meaning of it is lying or untruthfulness, request that he be asked to withdraw the term.

Madam Speaker: To be correct, that was not a question of privilege but a point of order since it deals with unparliamentary language.

I would also like to say that a point of order was raised at the time it took place and was dealt with by the Speaker at that time. The Speaker in the Chair at that time probably referred to the list of unparliamentary words cited in Beauchesne and did not find the word "mendacity". That is probably why he did not ask the hon. member for Comox-Powell River to withdraw the expression.

Hon. members might recall that very early in my mandate in the Chair, I had to deal with a member who had used an unparliamentary word which was a synonym of the word mendacity. It was substituted. I asked the hon. member to withdraw that word.

An hon. Member: Which hon. member?

Madam Speaker: For the purposes of this ruling I do not think it is necessary to identify the hon. member. That member substituted the word mendacious for the word he had used.

English not being my first language, I did not quite know what mendacious meant. It was not in Beauchesne. I thought it was quite sophisticated and proper and I accepted the word.

I will let the matter go this time. I think the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) will bear with me since the matter was dealt with by one of the Deputy Speakers, probably based on what had happened previously in the House, and he let the matter go. I warn hon. members that in my view, any word that is a synonym of a word that is unparliamentary cannot be substituted for the unparliamentary expression. From now on the word mendacity will be considered by me to be unparliamentary as well as mendacator and all other words which mean the same thing. An hon. member cannot accuse another hon. member of not telling the truth by substituting words which mean the same thing.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it would appear that a new precedent has now been set by the Chair. The words mendacity, mendacious and mendaciousness do not appear in Beauschesne, or indeed in any precedent I know, as being unparliamentary. Indeed, since I have been here, which has been more than a few years, that expression has been used on all sides of the House with frequency. It has never been ruled by the Chair to be unparliamentary.

May I suggest that before coming to this precedent-setting decision the Chair might wish to hear some in-depth submissions on the matter. What would happen if the Chair makes a decision now to add this word to the list of unparliamentary expressions—in my submission it would constitute a new precedent? Members should certainly have the opportunity of (a) examining precedents in an effort to convince the Chair of the propriety of the expression, and (b) of making submissions to the Chair before it comes to a decision setting such a far-reaching precedent.

I suggest that if the Chair wishes to go that route, it advise the House that it intends to seek submsissions on the matter, and that time be set aside for doing that.

Madam Speaker: In reply to the hon. member, let we say that I have not been here as long as he has. How did words get on the list of Beauchesne? I suppose at some point the Speaker determined that certain words were unparliamentary, and the list was carried on from one Speaker to another. I do not really know how they got on the list.

In any event, I accept the hon. member's suggestion. I will look at the procedure by which these words got on the list of unparliamentary language. I will do what has been done in the past.

• (1510)

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. If the hon. House leader of the official opposition had given the hon. member for Fundy Royal the same lecture as he has just given to you, we would not have had this problem in the beginning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. CHRÉTIEN'S ANSWER RESPECTING CASE OF DONALD MARSHALL

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Very briefly, I would like the assistance of the Chair with respect to a matter that arises from question period today. You heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) announce to the House that he was referring the case of Donald Marshall to the Nova Scotia Supreme Court. Your Honour will also recall that I directed a question yesterday to the Minister of Justice concerning the same case, asking what action he was going to take, and I received no positive answer. It is difficult for me to know, as a member of the Bar of Nova Scotia for 25 years and also as a member of the Bar of Ontario, how the Minister of Justice could possibly not know 24 hours ago that he was going to take this course of action.

Bearing in mind, Madam Speaker, the difficulties that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had with the same Minister of Justice in the case of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the Newfoundland off-shore dispute, I want to reserve my right to check the records and check the facts, to find out if the Minister of Justice was candid with the House yesterday when I addressed the question to him on the case of Donald Marshall.

Madam Speaker: The only guidance that the Chair can give the hon. member is that the Chair cannot interfere with any of the answers of hon. members. They stand on the statements they make. It is not for me to judge whether the hon. minister did not know one thing one day and happened to know it the next day. This is of no concern to the Chair. It is certainly a matter in which the Chair cannot intervene.

UNPARLIAMENTARY REMARK OF MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)

Madam Speaker: I have checked the "blues" with regard to the expression used by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) in the House yesterday. I asked the hon. member whether he thought he had used unparliamentary language, because I had not exactly heard what he said. I checked the "blues". The hon. member yesterday answered me that he had not used exactly those words, and I guess that answer was exactly correct in regard to the exchange we were having. But, having checked the "blues", I find that the hon. member said that an hon. member had lied to the country. I think that I asked the hon. member whether he had said that the hon. member had deliberately misled the House.

I do not want to get into the problem of determining whether one can not say that someone deliberately misled the House, and can say that the hon. member deliberately misled the country. I do not want to get into this distinction that one can possibly make. I believe that the idea behind what took place is that the hon. member for Burnaby cannot say, in any circumstances, that someone deliberately misled either the House or the country.

Therefore, I regret that I have to ask the hon. member, if he understands the sense of my intervention, whether he would volunteer to withdraw that expression.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, if I might just give the context of those remarks, it might assist the House. We were dealing in this particular instance with a report of the Canadian Judicial Council which, pursuant to the provisions of the Judges Act, is sent directly to the Minister of Justice. That report of the Canadian Judicial Council is a document which was then made public by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), Madam Speaker, and the contents of that report were interpreted by the Minister of Justice.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is arguing the matter that was discussed. What we are dealing with now is an unparliamentary expression. That is extremely narrow. I do not believe we need many explanations of the context. It is absolute. If a member says that someone has deliberately misled the House or the country, this is not acceptable in the House, no matter what the context is. In other words, there is no excuse for it. I would ask the hon. member if he would withdraw those words.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, Judge Berger cannot reply to a misrepresentation by the Minister of Justice. In view of that, I would draw your attention as well to Citation 321 of Beauchesne's that all references to judges and courts of justice in the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary.

Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice stated that the remarks or that the conclusion of the Canadian Judicial Council was that Judge Berger's action was reprehensible. That was not an accurate statement. Judge Berger is not in a position to correct that. Therefore I am quite prepared, Madam Speaker, if the Minister of Justice will set the record straight and stop misrepresenting the position of the Canadian Judicial Council to the public, to withdraw my accusation. But until such time as the Minister of Justice stops taking these cheap shots at Judge Berger, I certainly do not intend to withdraw any such suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: We can deal with another matter at another time, if there is any reason to deal with it. At the time I did not see anything in the intervention made by the minister that would reflect on the conduct of the judge. I do not know whether he was citing the report at that time or what he was doing. However, that can be dealt with at another time.

What we are trying to deal with now is the unparliamentary expression used by the hon. member. He knows that he simply has to withdraw this unparliamentary expression, because when an unparliamentary expression is uttered in the House it does damage to the House and to the decorum of the House and it is not helpful in the pursuit of normal debate in the House of Commons. There is all the more reason, if the hon. member wants to have some of these questions further elaborated and elucidated, that he should co-operate with the Chair and remove an obstacle to the debate in the House of Commons by withdrawing that unparliamentary expression. It is not conditional. The hon. member may not impose conditions to withdrawing his own unparliamentary expressions.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I will not be a party to this travesty of justice in which the Minister of Justice is abusing his position, and Judge Berger cannot reply. Madam Speaker, indeed the Minister of Justice did indicate that the Judicial Council found—

Madam Speaker: Order. I have to warn the hon. member that he cannot enter into a debate with the Chair on this particular question. It is clear that he has used an unparliamentary expression. It is in Hansard. It is in the record. This is not allowed in the House. These are the rules of the House, of which the hon. member is a part. He too like all other hon. members has determined that these unparliamentary expressions should not be used in the course of debate. It is quite understandable when the debate is somewhat heated, but he knows that he cannot use that unparliamentary expression. Therefore, I have to ask him to withdraw that expression.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have no intention of making a mockery of the truth. The statement I made stands. The Minister of Justice did deliberately mislead the Canadian public on this very important matter.

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. member not to follow the rules of this House. Therefore, if the hon. member is not disposed—and I will ask him another time—if he is not disposed to withdraw that expression, he knows the consequences of refusing to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Therefore it is with the greatest regret that I must name the hon. member for Burnaby.

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I would move, seconded by—

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, it must be a minister of the Crown who moves the motion.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I understand that at this time it will be necessary to move the motion.

I move:

That the member for Burnaby be suspended from the service of the House for the remainder of today's sitting.

● (1520)

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming), which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried. The motion being carried, the hon. member for Burnaby, Mr. Robinson, should withdraw from the House.

And Mr. Robinson (Burnaby) having withdrawn:

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect to the division which has just taken place, I respectfully request that the record show that although I was here in my seat, I did not vote on the motion.

Madam Speaker: The record will show that.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANGUISH—USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order with respect to what appears to be a bit of an inconsistency which could possibly confuse some Members of Parliament.

On June 8 the question of the use of unparliamentary language was raised in the House when Your Honour called the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) to order for using the word "lie" in the House. As recorded at page 18212 of Hansard the hon. member for Burnaby said:

> At no time did I suggest that the Minister of Justice abused his position by lying in the House.

Your Honour then said:

> As long as the hon. member has not said someone in this House has told a lie, that is fine; no unparliamentary language has been used.

It seems that there might be a double standard as to whether a member can refer to another hon. member who has misled or lied to the public outside the House and whether an hon. member can accuse another hon. member of actually lying in this House. It seems to me that in Your Honour's ruling of June 8 Your Honour ruled that the hon. member could use this language.

Madam Speaker: Order. That matter was dealt with at the time according to the circumstances. I do not recall whether there was an exchange between the hon. member and the Chair about what I had heard or not heard. It is quite obvious that words are often uttered in this House which the Speaker does not hear. In that case the Speaker cannot intervene. I remember the exchange to which the hon. member refers. At that time the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) told the Chair he had not used unparliamentary language. I took his word for it. That matter was dealt with at the time. This matter should have been raised at that time. This point of order cannot be entertained several days later.

Today another situation occurred. I think the matter today was quite clear. I asked the hon. member to withdraw. He did not withdraw, and therefore the House has acted accordingly.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, this is not—

Madam Speaker: Order. Those are rulings and I cannot accept comments on them.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,345, 3,485, 3,575 and 4,289.

PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PETROFINA

Question No. 2,345—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the purchase of Petrofina by PetroCan, what are the names, titles and job designations of all persons who were involved directly or indirectly in the negotiations between PetroCan and Petrofina for the acquisition of Petrofina?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: W. H. Hopper, chairman and chief executive officer, Petro-Canada; J. I. Bell, executive vice-president, Petro-Canada; D. O'Brien, senior vice-president, general counsel and corporate secretary, Petro-Canada; M. F. Strong, vice-president and director, Société Générale pour l'Énergie et les Ressources (SOGENER); Leonard Hentsch, chairman, SOGENER; Adolph Demeurs de Lespaul, chairman, Petrofina S.A.; Pierre Nadeau, president, Petrofina Canada Inc.

Order Paper Questions

Question No. 3,485—Mr. Waddell:

1. Does Petro-Canada maintain that none of its employees or agents gave prior knowledge to anyone connected with Petrofina Canada that Petro-Canada was interested in purchasing Petrofina Canada?

2. On what date did the officers and directors of Petrofina Canada, either collectively or individually, first learn that an approach had been made to Petrofina S.A. to sell all or part of its holdings of Petrofina Canada?

3. On what date was Petrofina S.A. first approached by Petro-Canada or by an agent acting on its behalf concerning the purchase?

4. On what date did Sogener, acting on behalf of Petro-Canada, first approach Petrofina S.A. about the sale of Petrofina Canada?

5. On what dates did Mr. W. Hopper of Petro-Canada contact Petrofina S.A. or its agents about the possible purchase?

6. On what date did Petro-Canada first offer or suggest $120 a share as the purchase price?

7. Did the Quebec weekly magazine "Finance" on October 13, 1980 report that Petro-Canada was offering the parent company $120 a share for the purchase and, if so, on what date did Mr. Hopper first become aware of this?

8. On what date did Petrofina S.A., or any agent on behalf of the parent company, first inform Petrofina Canada that another party was interested in the purchase?

9. On what date did Petrofina Canada authorize the purchase of additional stock options for officers of the compnay?

10. Was a recommendation made that the offer to purchase Petrofina stock include the stock held through executive stock options and, if so, by whom and on what date?

11. Did Mr. Pierre Nadeau, president of Petrofina Canada, exercise his stock purchase options and, if so, in each case, how many shares did he purchase and what was the stock's price?

12. Did Mr. Nadeau on November 20 and November 28, 1980 or thereabouts contact Mr. Hopper or any other official of Petro-Canada or agent acting on behalf of Petro-Canada about the purchase?

13. Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources satisfied that neither Petrofina S.A. nor Petro-Canada nor its agent in any way gave information about the possible purchase that would benefit officials of Petrofina Canada through insider trading in stocks?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

13. Information as to persons who had access to relevant information within or through Petro-Canada has been given to the appropriate federal and provincial authorities to assist in their enquiries as to whether any party to the negotiations made improper use of any information. This information includes the names of the few officers of Petro-Canada, the directors and legal advisers of the corporation involved in the transaction. Also, the names of the small number of government officials, who were informed of the discussions for purposes of their duties, have been communicated to the same authorities. These authorities have found nothing of concern in the matter and have reported such.

Petro-Canada reports as follows:

1. Mr. Pierre Nadeau, president of Petrofina Canada Inc. was in attendance at a meeting in Brussels, Belgium, on October 3, 1980 between Mr. W. H. Hopper, chairman and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada and Mr. Adolph Demeurs de Lespaul, chairman of Petrofina S.A. He also took part in two telephone conversations with Mr. Hopper in November, 1980.

2. Mr. Nadeau was an officer of Petrofina Canada Inc. and his contacts are noted in part 1. Details of when other officers and/or directors of Petrofina Canada Inc. learned of the transaction would not normally be known to Petro-Canada prior to the corporation actually formalizing a deal. However, the board of Petrofina Canada Inc. did convene to consider the offer in early February of 1981.

3 and 4. Petrofina S.A. was first approached by SOGENER in late August, 1980.

5. Mr. Hopper called Mr. Nadeau on November 28, 1980.

6. January 29, 1981.

7. Any speculation as to price by the press prior to January 29, 1981 is unfounded.

8. It would not be appropriate for Petro-Canada to comment on how Petrofina S.A. dealt with Petrofina Canada Inc. after the first approach in August, 1980.

9. August 22, 1980.

10. Stock options, being a legal obligation of Petrofina Canada Inc., increased the number of shares required to be purchased. This fact was known to Petro-Canada at the time of making the deal and influenced the price.

11. Yes, Mr. Nadeau exercised his stock purchase options. Details are available from insider trading reports which are publicly available.

12. Yes.

NUMBER OF SOVIET OFFICIALS IN CANADA

Question No. 3,575—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that the FBI and the CIA estimate that approximately 350 of the approximately 1,000 Soviet officials posted in the United States are working as Soviet agents as well?

2. What is the number of Soviet officials presently in Canada, including diplomats, members of the news media and representatives of the Soviet Airline Aeroflot and how many are estimated to be acting on behalf of the Soviet KGB or GRU in addition to their regular duties?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of External Affairs and the Solicitor General of Canada as follows:

1. The Department of External Affairs is only aware of these estimates through press reports.

2. (a) Seventy. (b) While there are 70 Soviet officials as described in part (a) of this question presently in Canada, it would not be in the public interest to reveal what number, if any at all, are acting on behalf of the KGB or GRU.

EMPLOYEES OF O/A ADAMS COMMUNICATIONS

Question No. 4,289—Mr. Mazankowski:

Did any employees of O/A Adams Communications of Toronto work for the Department of Communications in providing switchboard attendant services in 1981 and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the number of man-hours involved (c) what were the titles and classifications of those employed (d) were they considered public servants by the department?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows:

(a) Three employees of O/A Adams Communications of Toronto are former term employees of the Department of Communications, Ontario region who were engaged in supplying attendant services at the Government of Canada consolidated telephone switchboard, Toronto, Ontario in 1981; (b) The total person-days consumed by these former employees during the period January 1, 1981 to December 31, 1981 were 621; (c) The title of the positions occupied by these former employees was telephone operator and the classification of the positions was CR-2; (d) During the period of employment as term employees of the Department of Communications, Ontario region they were considered to be public servants.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Smith: I ask that the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—FISCAL AND ECONOMIC POLICIES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its fiscal and economic policies which have led to unacceptably high levels of unemployment, record personal and business bankruptcies and general economic instability; and its failure to address these problems in any meaningful way particularly with reference to job creation and security in communities dependent on forestry, fishing and mining.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is indeed a dark day in the House and in the country. The inappropriate behaviour of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has been uncovered.

Mr. Peterson: Nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been somewhat silent, but the hon. member has suggested there has been inappropriate conduct on the part of the Minister of Justice. I could not be in the House on Monday night because I had a cold.

I want these insinuations to be clarified. I received a report—I have said this many times in this House—from the judicial council.

Mr. Nielsen: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: Do hon. members opposite not want to hear? They allege inappropriate conduct on the part of the Minister of Justice. I thought there was a rule in this House that a person can defend himself at times.

Mr. Nielsen: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: After 19 years in this House I think I am entitled to clarify the situation. If the hon. member does not want that, he should withdraw his comment about inappropriate conduct in this House.

Mr. Nielsen: Order.

Mr. Cousineau: Withdraw, Riis.

Mr. Rose: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Cousineau: Have respect for this House and this institution. I would bet the minister's record against yours, man.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair gave the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) the opportunity to rise on this point. I shall quote from Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, page 115, Citation 128, which reads as follows:

• (1650)

A personal attack, by one member upon another, is an offence against the House, in the person of one of its members—

I think it was an attack on the hon. minister when the hon. member talked about the conduct of the minister. I gave the minister an opportunity to introduce his remarks. The hon. member—

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the—

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody. Order, please. I had recognized the hon. member on a question of privilege. He sat down and now somebody else—

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when—

An hon. Member: Sit down!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. I did recognize the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody on a point of order and I will hear him.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Justice, through a question of privilege, is going to open this whole can of worms again, I think the Speaker might be guided by another citation. In Beauchesne's Fifth Edition at page 114, Citation 321 discusses protected persons and has this to say:

> All references to judges and courts of justice of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speaker has always treated them as breaches of order.

Yesterday the Minister of Justice called the behaviour of Mr. Justice Thomas Berger reprehensible and no protection was offered by the Chair whatsoever.

All that was said today by my colleague the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap was that the minister's conduct had been inappropriate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I recognized the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody on a point of order but now he is entering into debate on something that is not before the House.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the Minister of Justice should not be allowed to smuggle in, by way of a question of privilege, something that is properly debatable by the government making the time of the House available for that purpose. There is a private member's motion standing on the Order Paper, motion No. 78 in the name of the hon. member for St. John's West. It would give a complete airing to the conduct of the Minister of Justice if the government would follow normal parliamentary tradition and procedure and make government time available for that debate. That is where the issue of the minister's conduct should be debated, not by a question of privilege that is smuggled in.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, with your leave, I would like to get back to my question of privilege—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair wishes to consult with the Table officers for a moment.

I am sure hon. members are still questioning why the Chair allowed the hon. minister to have the floor. I might refer to the Standing Orders. Standing Order 35 reads as follows:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof. No Member may reflect upon any vote—

Therefore, I recognized the Minister of Justice on a question of privilege. I would now invite the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap to enter the debate but not to use disrespectful language.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I will not refer to the Minister of Justice in any negative way.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Riis: The response to what I intended to be a rather innocent statement is not surprising on such a dark day. The inappropriate behaviour of this government, if I can generalize in that way, Mr. Speaker, has certainly resulted in the need for this special debate today on the economic collapse the country is experiencing.

The term "economic collapse" does not come from the New Democratic Party only or from the Progressive Conservative Party only; it comes from the trust companies of Canada. Just a few days ago their representatives appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. It is a very conservative group of people which is not known to cause undue alarm in the country. Yet when the question was put to those trust company representatives around the table, they said that unless the policies of the government are changed dramatically within six months, the country will face total economic collapse.

That statement was given credibility just a few days ago by the chief executive officer of the firm of MacMillan-Bloedel in British Columbia. Again, this is an individual who chooses in words very carefully when they are of a negative nature and dealing with the economy. He indicated that we are heading toward certain collapse in this country as a result of the monetary and fiscal policies of the government.

Today, in the richest country in the world, many of our elderly citizens are terrified by what they see happening around them. Their life savings of the last 60 or 70 years are evaporating before their eyes. Their security is falling away from them. The youth to whom we would look for the future of the country are disillusioned and have essentially given up hope of what the future holds for them and their friends. The people of Canada per se are in a state of shock. They cannot believe that this government is standing passive while the economy literally falls around them.

The government claims to have a solution. Today the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) came before the House and told us to be patient for a few more days, because he will make a statement. As if that is going to change anything, Mr. Speaker. What we want in this country is some legislation that will result in action which will end this ever accelerating recessionary trend that we see around us.

A few weeks ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) visited British Columbia, he slapped the people there in the face by saying that they did not understand what is going on in Canada. He is absolutely right, Mr. Speaker, we do not understand what is going on in Canada. We do not understand why our dollar is below 78 American cents, the lowest it has ever been. It is lower today than during the depths of the depression we had in this country. We do not understand that. We do not understand why the government allows this to occur.

We do not understand why our already stratospheric level mortgage rates are still going up. We do not understand why we have the lowest employment opportunities in a post-depression time. We do not understand why our dollar is at its lowest level ever. We do not understand why we have such an increasing volume of idle capacity built into our industrial system. We do not understand why we have record lows in housing construction or in consumer and investor confidence. He is right, Mr. Speaker; we do not understand what is happening in Canada and why the government is content to stand passively by and allow this to occur.

This is a dark day in Canadian history. I can say with total honesty that many people in British Columbia are facing depression conditions today. They are not looking at a recession or thinking that a depression is going to occur some time in the future; a depression is occurring in parts of British Columbia at this very moment. Of course, in any depression situation the problem is jobs. That is the bottom line. When you have this number of people unemployed in one of the richest provinces in Canada, it is nothing short of a catastrophe.

Statistics Canada tells us that 148,000 British Columbians are unemployed. That is not true. That figure does not reflect the reality. They say 148,000 people are unemployed, yet 170,857 are collecting special UIC payments, and 72,000 we consider to be part of the hidden unemployed, those people who long ago gave up hope of ever finding a job and are not actively seeking work because of the hopelessness of the situation. That gives us a real level of unemployment in British Columbia of 272,857, nearly 20 per cent of the work force. That is what happened at the beginning of the depression in British Columbia. We are staring at a depression situation with 20 per cent unemployed, not an ongoing recession.

What, Mr. Speaker, is the cost of having 272,857 people out of work? It is costing us, every hour of the day, $226,644 in UIC payments. Then, of course, we must add on provincial welfare payments. We recognize that 150,000 people are now depending upon the human resources department for their income. Another 60,000 people are receiving GAIN payments from British Columbia. By the end of this year we will have paid out nearly $2 billion in UIC benefits in the province of British Columbia.

But the real cost is not measured in dollars and cents. The real cost is measured in human suffering and torment, and in the disintegrating social structure on the west coast. That is the real measure of what is going on. Given enough time, courage and real decision-making, the economic problems can be solved. But the social costs reflected in family violence, wife battering, child abuse, increasing drug and alcohol abuse, juvenile delinquency, are the costs we will pay not for one year or ten years, but for a generation or more. It will take a long time to heal those scars.

When it comes to the unemployed, Mr. Speaker, the real crisis has to be in the unemployed youth of Canada. In May of 1981, 11.6 per cent of youth seeking work in British Columbia were unable to find jobs. One year later that figure had increased to nearly 20 per cent. These are young people who want to get out and build a future for themselves, their province and their country but are unable to because of the inaction, bungling and incompetence of the federal government, complemented, of course, by the provincial government.

In the last few days I had the opportunity of delivering graduation addresses to nearly 2,000 students in my riding. The most disappointing and depressing aspect of that was the fact that most of those young people had given up hope of finding a meaningful job this summer or fall. Unemployment in British Columbia is 10.8 per cent, according to official statistics, which of course are very low. On Vancouver Island it is 11.2 per cent. In the Kamloops area it is 13.5 per cent with nearly 10,000 people on lay-off and 1,200 more to come in the next handful of days. There is a two to three-month backlog of cases to be processed in UIC office there.

The human agony and suffering going on in that community, Mr. Speaker, is something to behold. No fewer than ten people on a daily basis come into my office filled with despair and a sense of hopelessness. They are coming in and asking for food; this in one of the richest provinces of one of the richest countries in the world. These people have families to feed and not enough money to buy them food. So we have set up a food hamper system; we are asking our friends and the public generally to come into the constituency office and donate food, and we will pass it along to the different churches for distribution.

That is the situation in this country and it is getting worse by the week. These are people caught between UIC and the welfare system. They do not qualify for UIC or they have been receiving benefits for over a year and are no longer eligible. They might be fortunate enough to own a humble home but they go to the human resources department and they are told if they have a home they cannot get welfare money; you have to lose your home first. These are people who have worked for perhaps 15 or 25 years and who through no fault of their own are in a situation in which they can only be called destitute.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, the Salvation Army gave out food vouchers in my community to 151 people. In the first four and a half months of this year, 427 food vouchers have been given out. The Salvation Army hostel for men is virtually filled every day. The number of meals served is up substantially over last year. The United Church of Canada is feeding ten families a week with food hampers. The women's emergency shelter is providing homes for 50 women a month, but of course after 30 days they are thrown out. These are women who have left their own homes because of abuse. After 30 days they are expected to be able to find a job and get started on their own, but that is totally impossible.

That is the kind of situation we have in our country today. It is indicative of the seriousness of the situation when Members of Parliament are forced to consider setting up food banks in their constituency offices to feed a growing number of their constituents. What kind of a statement is that about the Government of Canada? What kind of a state is it, my colleague the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) asks.

The results of this Liberal government's mismanagement and bungling can best be described by an incident involving a 70-year old woman in my constituency. This woman, with her husband, purchased a modest three-bedroom bungalow in 1949. They lived there for 32 years. During that time her husband passed away and she has been widowed now for nearly 23 years. In the last few years, as she approached retirement, she decided to focus all of her savings, all the money she earned, on improving that home. She had a new roof put on her home, new aluminum windows, doors and new aluminum siding. She had new carpets installed in her home. She had the home rewired She had copper piping and a new gas furnace installed. She also had urea formaldehyde foam insulation installed. All of her money and all of her dreams were focused in the modest home that she and her husband had lived in for 32 years.

Immediately after the installation of the foam she became violently ill. She suffered from headaches, sore throats, and she had respiratory problems. As a result, she had to move out and sleep in her garage for a few months. Kamloops gets cold in the winter time so she could not do that for very long. She went to her lawyer and tried to get some action. She could go into the home for only 15 or 20 minutes during the day and each time she would end up visiting the doctor. She had to move out of her home. She had to try to sell it. She was desperate; she did not have any income. The real estate agents tried to sell the home but they could not give it away.

Then along came a developer who said that he would like to buy the lot. He told her that he would bulldoze the house and buy the lot for $13,000. She accepted this and stood watching while her home in which she had put every conceivable cent building up a nest for her retirement years was bulldozed right before her eyes. You can imagine her standing there with tears welling up in her eyes as she watched her dream literally swept away through no fault of her own.

By the time this lady paid off her lawyer who had worked on her behalf trying to get some action from the federal government, she had to walk away from her dream and her home with only two suitcases. Literally that is all this elderly woman had left. She came to my constituency office and asked what I could do for her. I told her that perhaps we could arrange to get her $5,000. Is that not wonderful, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Benjamin: There is one Liberal smiling on the other side.

Mr. Riis: Some Liberals are laughing. They think this is a great joke. They think that this woman's plight, a person who is on the streets with only two suitcases as a result of Liberal promises, is a great joke. I tell hon. members opposite that the people of Canada think they are a joke. Anyone who can sit there and laugh about the plight of this particular woman, and many like her, is just a sick joke. The whole group is a sick joke.

We have the spectre of a depression staring us in the face. Nowhere is it more evident than in the province of British Columbia. Our number one industry, which is the forest industry, has one-quarter of its membership out of work. There are 12,837 IWA workers unemployed. In addition, the pulp and paper workers—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary, on a point of order.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear to the hon. member that we are not laughing at this poor woman. We are laughing at the crocodile tears being shed when these people describe a situation.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member does not have a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not apologize for feeling compassion for my constituent. If the hon. member feels that my behaviour is a laughing matter because I feel very strongly about my constituent as a result of the policies of his government, I do not apologize.

I want to describe for a moment or two the economic situation in British Columbia. One-quarter of the IWA workers are out of work. They are soon to be joined both in the next two or three weeks by about 10 per cent of the pulp and paper workers. The mining industry, which is the number two industry in British Columbia, by this summer will have 50 per cent of its total work force affected by lay-offs and shutdowns resulting in 9,000 workers being unemployed. During the month of May business bankruptcies in British Columbia were up 140 per cent. Business receiverships were not up 140 per cent in the first five months of this year, they were up 530 per cent over the corresponding five months of last year.

Then we have the business barometer which shows that what is going on in British Columbia is the same as what is going on across the country. I am referring, of course, to the stock market. We have seen what has happened to BCRIC, the magnificent dream of the Premier of British Columbia. BCRIC had a book value of $11.16 which the Premier devalued by decree to $6. BCRIC is now trading on the Vancouver exchange at $2.95. The Premier wanted to introduce the people of British Columbia to the free enterprise system and to the benefits of the stock market. He wanted to show how the capital system worked. He did it very well.

The cruellest blow of all by the federal government, and now with the co-operation of the provincial government of British Columbia, was the cut in health care. There are 1,200 fewer hospital beds today than there were a few months ago. There are 2,100 fewer hospital workers than there were a few months ago. The situation can only be described as sick when the sick and ailing of the country are no longer able to be cared for as we have grown to accept as the rule in this country. The problem is the Government of Canada and the provincial government. It is rather ironic that we wait day by day with bated breath for answers from the same group who got us into this disastrous situation in the just place.

Look what the Government of Canada has done to co-operative housing opportunities in this country. In British Columbia alone meetings were called to see if people were interested in co-operative housing. The demand was there. The halls were packed. Virtually every single meeting call was a surprise; there was an overwhelming response to the concept of co-operative housing from these communities. The government then came in with a program which for 1982 provided enough money to build 898 units. On the books are already 2,223 units that could be under construction by tomorrow morning. Many, many more could be constructed if the opportunity were there.

Next is mortgage assistance. A lot of folks in British Columbia are having trouble renewing their mortgages. Across the country 640,000 people will have difficulty renewing their mortgages. The government has a plan. The minister responsible for housing stands up and says that he has a plan that is going to assist not 640,000 people but 12,000 people, maybe. Here we have the infamous program to assist those people who are having mortgage renewal difficulties with a clause that says: "Okay, you can have assistance if you have only 5 per cent equity in your home." Not many Canadians have only 5 per cent equity in their homes. In order to get a mortgage, you have to have more equity than that in the first place. It is a rather Catch-22 solution.

Then, of course, there is the small business bond. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) sponsors his infamous small business bond which at this time no banks are supporting. No matter where you go in the country there is virtually no bank that is prepared to guarantee that particular program to their customers. For all intents and purposes, the small business bond has disappeared.

What are the solutions? The problems are obvious. The government's solutions have failed. What do we in the New Democratic Party say we are prepared to do when we are the government of this country?

As our first priority we would see full employment in this country and full employment in the province of British Columbia. Then we would identify some short-term and long-term solutions. For the short term, because no economic recovery will begin until the interest rates are lowered, we would lower interest rates right now to one percentage point above the rate of inflation as a starting point in order to provide a signal to consumers and investors in this country that we mean business. We would put $500 million into housing immediately to stimulate that industry and put it back to work, put the manufacturing industry which services the housing industry back to work, and put a good number of forest workers back to work as well by creating a demand for lumber products in this country.

Where would we get $500 million? The government set aside $5.8 billion to help Alsands. We would only ask for 10 per cent of that to be put into housing. If the government can put up that amount of money to help the oil companies, certainly it could use 10 per cent of it to start building 50,000 units in the country immediately.

We would provide in the short term a tax cut to low and middle-income Canadians of $2.2 billion to generate some cash velocity in the system. Unemployed people do not purchase refrigerators and new cars. We must put cash in the hands of low and middle-income Canadians. As a result of the government's policy, we are seeing a decay of the middle classes of the country. A small group of people are doing extremely well today as a result of this monetarist fiscal policy. More and more Canadians are finding themselves squeezed into the category of the have-nots. For five consecutive years we have seen the purchasing power of working Canadians deteriorate. The money from their paycheques buys less and less every year, but the Minister of Finance still has the gall to stand up and say that the cause of inflation in the country is working Canadians.

On July 1 Canadians will be asked to pay more for oil and natural gas. On July 1 the price of oil will be going up $2.25 per barrel, or 7 cents per gallon for those driving vehicles. On August 1 gas will be going up 25 cents per thousand cubic feet. We would cut that immediately. We would not introduce those increases and as a result save Canadian taxpayers this summer $1.8 billion which they could use to purchase goods and commodities.

We would immediately begin a reforestation program, recognizing that the forest industry is the cornerstone of the British Columbia economy. We would begin the process of forest farming as opposed to forest mining and start working toward a perpetual, sustained yield program which makes sense. This is something which must be done. It would put a good number of unemployed forest workers back to work.

These are the short-term solutions. What about the long-term ones? First we must recognize that the economic structures of the country are inappropriate and that we have ourselves in a real box or corner. It is time to stand up and say to the multinationals that we want some new production agreements negotiated and, if they want access to our domestic markets, that they must create some jobs in the country. The Japanese auto industry could be used as a case in point. We would say to the Japanese auto industry that if it wants to sell 200,000 cars in Canada in 1983, it must source the components and parts of those vehicles from Canadian manufacturers and that the vehicles must be assembled in this country. Of course, there is no more obvious place to assemble cars from Japan in this country than in British Columbia.

Mining plays an important role in British Columbia and in the economy of Canada, yet we continue to import most of the equipment used in mining and in the heavy construction industry. In a resource-oriented economy it is critical, yet we continue to welcome foreign mining equipment from Germany, Switzerland and Sweden, instead of developing and stimulating our own manufacturing industry. Again, there is no place better than British Columbia to start focusing on manufacturing, mining and construction equipment.

One could talk about the need for research and development to open up some new technologies so that we could start competing in a real way in the international marketplace. We should be encouraging Canadian industry in some of the critical sectors where we have a strategic advantage, such as the telecommunications and transportation industries. The important point is that we cannot wait. When we hear people like the chief executive officer of MacMillan Bloedel and some of the chief executive officers of the major banks and trust companies in Canada saying that we are staring an economic collapse in the face, we cannot await economic statements from the Minister of Finance. We are approaching a real depression in the country. Many people in British Columbia are now living in a depression state. Those who got us into this are the Liberals and the Tories. Canadians would welcome a proposal now that, if we are to get out of this economic and financial mess, we ought not to look to those who put us into the situation but look for a New Democratic Party solution.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I must say it is a bit difficult to know where to begin when faced and confronted with the pot-pourri of rubbish we have just heard from the financial critic of the New Democratic Party. If I were to characterize his speech, I guess I would have to draw upon the term which he used. He said that he does not understand. He certainly proved that to us in spades during the course of his remarks.

In the course of the remarks which I am about to make, perhaps I could help him understand some of the areas that give him particular difficulty. Let me begin with an example. He started by citing the case of a woman who lives in his riding whose life savings are evaporating. They are evaporating because of inflation, which apparently the New Democratic Party does not understand. All the policies of this government, policies which have been consistently stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and other spokesmen, policies, incidentally, which have been identified clearly by all members of the OECD group including the Mitterrand government as recently as this week, and all economic priorities in these countries have addressed the issue of inflation. This is something which our friends in the New Democratic Party have yet to understand. They do not understand that inflation is the evil which must be attacked with every fiscal, monetary and economic gun which the government has at its disposal. This is what the government has been doing and it is what the government intends to continue to do.

The hon. member does not understand why we suffer from such high unemployment, yet at the same time spokesmen for his party encourage and even exhort unionized labour in the country to seek higher and higher wage demands. Again, the New Democratic Party does not understand the relationship between wage increases and inflation. It has yet to understand the wage-price spiral. I will come back to that point in a minute.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) spent a few moments describing the unfortunate circumstances of a woman in his riding and others. I am sure hon. members on both sides of the House are very sensitive to the difficult problems which are besetting Canadians today. I get tired of the New Democratic Party pretending that it has some kind of monopoly on compassion. We all have compassion; we are all trying to help those people. The policies of the government are intended to help those people, but not in the short term through spending programs and the traditional nonsense which emerges from the New Democratic Party. The policies are intended to put Canada on the road to long-term economic growth so that all Canadians will enjoy the benefits of growth. Our compassion will not only be rhetoric in the House of Commons and statements to the media; our compassion will be translated into hard, firm, sound benefits for all Canadians. That is what these policies are intended to do.

When that woman next walks into the office of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap and asks, "What can you do?", she should be told that there is something he can do and that is to stop preaching increased wages to workers across this country and to begin to preach to his constituents, and to the CLC in particular, for whom he acts as a proxy in this House, that wage restraint must be the beginning of sound economic growth in this country. That is something he can do. I sympathize somewhat with the hon. member and, in fact, with all hon. members of that party, because they must march to the tune played by Dennis McDermott of the Canadian Labour Congress. It is most unfortunate.

Mr. Riis: Is that the best you have to say today?

Mr. Johnston: We all know the old adage that he who pays the piper calls the tune.

Mr. Riis: The Bank of Canada pays you guys.

Mr. Johnston: The person with the lyricist's pen, in this case, happens to be Dennis McDermott of the CLC. I can assure Your Honour that hon. members on this side of the House would very much like to hear some time, some day, in this place, the very own ideas of members of the New Democratic Party. The New Democratic Party benches are crowded with young, bright Canadians and it is a tragedy that we must sit here and listen to them spout the rhetoric which comes out of the CLC instead of some of their own thoughts. Indeed, it is disturbing to listen to the same tired, old bromides, the same old ideas—

Mr. Riis: Imagine how we feel.

Mr. Johnston: —the same lack of understanding that we have heard today. The NDP—

[Translation]

—is always looking for scapegoats. We must—

[English]

Mr. Anguish: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake rises on a point of order.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I believe that there should be some relevancy in the speech of the hon. member, and I would ask Your Honour to call on that. But Your Honour should actually overlook it, because there will be very few opportunities left for any Liberal to stand up in this House again and speak from a government perspective. Therefore, I ask Your Honour to overlook the irrelevancy in the Liberal benches.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The House fails to recognize the point of order.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I thought that the liaison between the New Democratic Party and the CLC was well known. If I am exposing something which is a matter of confidence which will come as a surprise or a shock to constituents, that is another matter.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member says he does not understand. What he clearly does not understand is that Canada's problems are not unique.

Mr. Riis: That is right: blame someone else.

Mr. Johnston: We all know that U.S. recovery is needed. Now the hon. member is calling out and saying that we always put the blame on someone else. He speaks with great concern for the forestry industry in the province of British Columbia. Surely an hon. member from British Columbia realizes that the strength and future of the forestry industry in the province of British Columbia depends to a very large extent on the health of the U.S. economy and housing starts in the United States.

Mr. Riis: How about some new markets?

Mr. Johnston: Any high school student of economics in the east knows that, so I am sure that the hon. member must know it too.

Mr. Riis: New markets are needed.

Mr. Johnston: He knows the impact of U.S. interest rates. Surely I do not have to go back over all that ground and explain what the consequences would be to the ecnomic circumstances of this country if interest rates were to be arbitrarily lowered to one point above the going inflation, as the hon. member suggests. It is ludicrous that at this point the hon. member, after having been lectured constantly on the subject, after having the opportunity to speak to the Governor of the Bank of Canada on this subject, having been made fully aware of the subject from every reputable economic source in this country, would stand up and make that proposition again today.

Mr. Riis: He convinced me that I am right.

Mr. Johnston: All countries are in a slump, we all know that.

Mr. Riis: Japan's interest rate is 6.5 per cent today.

Mr. Johnston: He says that Japan's interest rate is 6.5 per cent.

Mr. Riis: Japan's inflation rate is 3.5 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: I would also invite the hon. member to point to Japan's rate of inflation.

Mr. Riis: The real rate of interest is 3.5 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: That is exactly the point that is pivotal to this debate, namely, the effect of our rate of inflation and the expectations in this country with respect to the rate of inflation. That is what affects the interest rate, and that rate of inflation, I suggest to Your Honour, is a direct consequence of the wage-price spiral, which the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap does not understand either.

Mr. Riis: He accurately described it.

Mr. Johnston: Let me spend a moment on it so that when he next goes out to his constituents and when he next has the opportunity of exchanging views with Mr. McDermott, he can explain to him the serious dangers which will confront this country unless we are able to get our wage structure under control. We have done a very poor job in this country in limiting increases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: You have.

Mr. Johnston: All we have to do is look at the U.S. performance in autos and in steel. All we have to measure that against is the reaction of the UAW in this country, encouraged and egged on by our friends in the NDP who categorically refuse to recognize the linkage between wages and prices in a period of falling productivity. Again, the financial critic for the New Democratic Party surely knows that in the absence of productivity, wage increases are translated almost immediately and almost completely into increased prices. We are not alone in this situation. All countries have recognized that fact.

I would like to refer the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap to an article appearing in yesterday's Globe and Mail by one of the most respected economic writers in this country, I would say, Ronald Anderson, who draws heavily upon the statement of the Bank of International Settlements. I would like to quote several passages from the article. It states:

> Statistical tables indicate that Canada is making the wage adjustment less successfully than any other country among the 11 major industrial nations examined in the report.

It goes on to state:

> The BIS report comments that Japan, West Germany, Austria, and Switzerland have a good record in terms of adapting wage behaviour to the broader needs of the economy. Moderation in bargaining attitudes, by both labour and management, has allowed real incomes to adjust smoothly to changing conditions. Concern over job security—

The hon. member is now leaving the House. He said that he does not understand and we are offering him the opportunity to understand some of the problems which we face and some of the solutions we are proposing. I see that he has left his seat. In any event, I will continue and send him a copy of Hansard tomorrow. The article continues:

> Moderation in bargaining attitudes, by both labour and management, has allowed real incomes to adjust smoothly to changing conditions. Concern over job security has been a factor in persuading unions in West Germany, for example, to accept wage increases lower than the rate of inflation.

This is fundamental, as I said before, to the problems confronting us in this country. Japan and Germany have kept wage increases down and have done well. I say that in answer to the question raised by the hon. member just a few moments ago. But militant unionism in this country is not helping us at the present time. I plead with the hon. member to go forth and preach restraint to the union movement just as we practise restraint in government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: I hear some cackling from my friends in the Conservative Party.

Mr. Riis: Watch Dome Petroleum.

Mr. Johnston: Your Honour will notice that I have gone rather easy on our friends from the Conservative Party because I have one thing to say for our friends in the New Democratic Party: at least they come forward with proposals. Those proposals are totally unacceptable and will simply exacerbate the very difficult economic conditions in which we find ourselves, but at least they have the courage to come forward and suggest that we should spend, spend, spend. The Conservative Party proposals, on the other hand, whatever they may be, have remained a deep, dark secret and I suspect they will always remain so.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Withdraw the budget.

Mr. Johnston: In any event, I will ignore the cackling from that side of the House and deal lastly with one idea that I must repeat because it is such an important lesson for the hon. member to learn, since he does not understand it.

There are some who believe that if the wage increases are less than the CPI or do not exceed the CPI, they in some way do not have an inflationary impact. As I pointed out a moment ago, any wage increase in the absence of productivity gain is immediately translated into increased prices.

There is also another aspect to this matter. The hon. member clearly has compassion for the unemployed. We all have great compassion for the unemployed. It is a serious problem with which every thinking Canadian must be concerned. Those of us who have jobs, whether as Members of Parliament or members of the press gallery, are in a privileged position. Each time we put demands on the system, whether in the public or the private sector, through seeking increased wages, we are effectively taking that out of the hides of the unemployed. That capital could be used for job creation, capital investment, plant expansion and the kinds of programs the hon. member is putting forward. It cannot go into wage increases on the one hand and at the same time provide employment. When the hon. member asks what he can do, I tell him to preach to the CLC and the labour movement that if they restrain their wage demands, they will bring more of the work force back into the workplace, which is what we want.

The hon. member touched in the traditional way on the problem of high interest rates. I do not intend to go over that except to say that for 30 years in this country savers have seen their savings erode. We have seen low interest and a steadily depreciating value of those assets and debt obligations due to inflation. That is why inflation is and remains our number one problem.

What we are witnessing today is a revolt of savers. This is particularly true in the United States where the spread between the rate of interest and inflation is so large. Why is it so large? It is not only because of the tight money policy, but because savers have been burned year over year. The constituent who came into the hon. member's office and said, "I see my life savings being eroded by inflation" was absolutely right. That is one of the problems, and is why we have to focus on inflation.

Is the kind of spending recommended by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap compatible with an anti-inflationary stance? Is it conceivable that further expansion emphasis, further government intervention and further government programs of the kinds he is describing are compatible with tackling inflation, which all responsible economists and all member countries of the OECD have recognized as the major problem? I suggest it is not.

Until recently, I will confess that our friends in the NDP were able to prop themselves up on the policies of the only country of the major industrialized group which had opted for a spending approach, namely the socialist regime in France. We all know what that has come to—a 14 per cent rate of inflation and the realization as of several days ago that the only way to get back to a healthy economy in France is to tackle inflation, and that is going to demand an austerity program.

I would like to quote some comments from the June 14 Wall Street Journal which touch upon the kind of austerity program that the socialist regime in France has seen fit to introduce because of the continuing problem of inflation. First, the Prime Minister said there will be a four-month freeze on prices and wages in an effort to curb the 14 per cent inflation. Also, there has been a devaluation of the French franc, a devaluation in France and an upward evaluation in Germany, so that against the mark there has been a 10 per cent change.

The huge French deficit has to be attacked. How is that to be done? By austerity measures. The French foreign reserves have plunged dramatically in recent weeks in an attempt to defend the franc. We find elements in it such as the minimum wage will be allowed to rise by 3.2 per cent. This is against an inflation rate running currently at 14 per cent.

It is quoted here that in keeping with its socialist priorities, the government said that family allowances, housing allotments and pensions would be allowed to increase by 6 per cent, 8 points below the current rate of inflation of France. Prime Minister Mauroy said the government's immediate objective was to bring inflation below 10 per cent, and next year the government intends to hold inflation to 8.5 per cent.

I wish that our friends in the New Democratic Party would begin to understand what their cousins in France have finally understood, namely that inflation is the number one problem and that expansionist policies, rising government deficits and increased intervention by the public sector is not compatible with an anti-inflationary stance. You cannot marry the two; France has learned that. The spending solution is not the way out of the economic difficulties which face us at this time.

I suppose we all belong to a political generation which has grown up, understandably, in very prosperous times. Looking back to the early seventies, we had something like 25 years of continual prosperity and growth in productivity after World War II. This is why many people in our generation, and I take the privilege of including the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap in my generation although I may be somewhat older, have grown up to believe that spending can solve any problem. We know now that it cannot.

There was an old slogan with which I would suspect many members of this House are familiar: spend, spend, spend, elect, elect, elect. Every proposal and program put forward by our friends in the NDP should be engraved with a modification of that slogan: spend, spend, spend; inflate, inflate, inflate. I further suggest—and God spare us the day which the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap dreams of when his party forms the government of this country—that would be a fitting epitaph on our national economic tombstone. In any event, we know that France tried it and failed. We know it has been rejected by all other members of the OECD as not being the way out of the dilemma which faces this country—

—I believe there is an expression in French that is the equivalent of "two-edged sword", which is to say that there may be positive effects for a time which are then followed by extremely negative ones. There is always the matter of reciprocity. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that our country, Canada, is so dependent on international trade that the protectionism so often urged on the government by our colleagues opposite, even, it seems to me, by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), is an approach that in the present circumstances could have extremely negative results.

[English]

We have some real problems, frankly, and perhaps unconsciously because of a lack of understanding of the Canadian economy and the way capital markets work, the way investors think and the reason why free enterprisers are motivated. I think there is a serious lack of understanding. The result is, I suggest, that instead of helping the situation, the recommendations of our colleagues who believe in the socialist option are in fact reinforcing policies which, in the minds of their constituents and in the minds of Canadians, are extremely negative for this country and are not going to solve the problems of the constituents, who are indeed in very serious difficulties and for whom I believe the hon. member has great compassion.

• (1750)

The idea of stimulating a thought that we should have perpetual expectations of rising incomes is one of the cornerstones, it seems to me, of what I hear in terms of New Democratic Party policy. They would seem to suggest that we should have an inflation-conditioned society. What we must do is go in exactly the opposite way. We must make people realize that we cannot live with inflation. This country's prosperity, its future, its potential and its riches that we are so dependent upon cannot be accomplished through inflationary policies of the kind that party recommends. Surely the hon. member does not want to put us on the road to Argentina or to Brazil in terms of inflation. That is where we would be going, Mr. Speaker, with the kinds of policies that that party recommends.

I suppose that it is partly a result of the "me too" generation—help ourselves first; do not think of the greater collectivity, but help ourselves first at the expense of society. We really do, during this terribly difficult period, have to develop a sense of collective responsibility and stop pointing fingers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: You can point the finger at governments, you can point fingers at unions and at business, but that solves nothing. To help this country, we have to get together and look together in the same direction.

To correct any impression I may have left with the hon. member that the problem rests with the unions, let me say now that the problem does not rest with the unions. The problem rests with the wage demands which all sectors are making. The sacrifice and the belt-tightening that is required to make us productive, to make us efficient as a collective group, must begin at all levels. It must involve executives, parliamentarians, public servants, unionized labour and non-unionized labour. It has to involve all of us.

It disturbs me very much, Mr. Speaker, when I hear spokesmen for the New Democratic Party preaching the gospel of the CLC to workers, encouraging them to put greater wage demands on the system, and arguing through the most convoluted logic one could ever imagine that these wage demands are not inflationary. It is distressing to me and to my colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: As I have said, Mr. Speaker, we have this assembled group of bright young men in the New Democratic Party across the way. I even include the member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), who I see has left his seat.

An hon. Member: He is at least bright.

Mr. Johnston: We should hear some constructive, thoughtful ideas, rather than the old, tired bromide of spend, spend, spend. It is very easy for those who are not responsible for government, for the raising of money, to recommend its expenditure.

I would like to add one footnote to my comments, Mr. Speaker. It concerns something I read in the Montreal Gazette. It is an important message that I am asking him to deliver to the labour movement. Yesterday, June 15, it was reported in the Montreal Gazette that:

> The Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada, representing more than 6,000 residential construction firms, has called on Ottawa to allocate $600 million to revive the home building industry.

It has called on Ottawa, on the Canadian government, and that means calling upon the taxpayers, to allocate $600 million to revive the home building industry. Yet, Mr. Speaker, with the housing market desperate for help, as the hon. member himself underlined, my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), who is responsible for the Canada Housing and Mortgage Corporation, is of course very much concerned on a daily basis.

An hon. Member: You would never know it.

Mr. Johnston: He is concerned, inside this House and outside this House, as we all are, with this very important sector of the economy. It is not only concern for those people who require housing but concern about the impact that sector has across our whole industrial sector. As I say, with the housing market desperate for help, what do we see? We see Ontario construction wage settlements increasing at the rate of $2 per hour in each of the next two years, which is something in the neighborhood of 15 per cent.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to indicate to the Chair that I would have liked to participate in this debate, had the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Blais: —had the opposition not provoked another discussion and deprived this House of an hour and a half which we could have used for a very interesting debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is commendable that Her Majesty's opposition has been granted five minutes to engage in this debate. I suppose we might thank the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) for that pleasure, he having delayed the House for an hour and a half earlier this afternoon.

I listened very carefully to the speeches made by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). I might be moved to say a pox on both their houses, but I would not want to provoke an argument at this late hour. Leave it to be said, Mr. Speaker, that it was interesting that the President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible for the largest labour union in Canada, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, has not shown the kind of resolve, in terms of confronting the wage expectations of Canadian workers, that he advocated in this House this afternoon.

If we look back to the resolution of the postal strike last summer, where that minister approved a substantial increase, and together with the cabinet approved a 22 per cent increase in the budget of the Government of Canada, as put forward in the November budget, it is just appalling that he should exercise such hypocrisy in this House.

Although the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap spoke with such doom and gloom, with all of the statistics that underscore the tremendously devastating situation that confronts our economy, it was remarkable to note that his closing five minutes dealt with solutions.

Let me list some of those solutions, Mr. Speaker. There was a $500 million mortgage subsidy program, which would bring rates down to 1 per cent above prime. Yet, Mr. Speaker, he is a member of the same party that voted against the mortgage tax credit program in December of 1979. That program would have brought a $2 billion benefit to Canadian home owners this year by way of a 25 per cent subsidy on mortgage interest. That would have gone a long way to resolving that problem. He was part of an opposition which moved that motion and defeated a government which had positive solutions for Canada.

He also talked about $5 billion being set aside for Alsands. He knows that that was a bail-out, last gasp attempt by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to salvage that project. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Alsands project would have gone ahead. There would have been 30,000 more jobs in Canada today and a lot greater confidence in the future of our economy. We would be much closer to achieving energy self-sufficiency if he had not voted against the government at that time.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Siddon: If he wants $2 billion in tax cuts now, he should remember the more than $2 billion in tax credits and incentives, including an energy tax credit for low-income Canadians that he and his party voted against in December of 1979. So, Mr. Speaker, I say a pox on both their houses.

Mr. Blais: You never introduced the legislation. We did not vote against it.

Mr. Siddon: They have not addressed the fundamental problems of our economy. We are converting investment and confidence in this country into debt and despair. We have seen over $18 billion of tax revenue leave Canada for the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Section (11) of Standing Order 58, proceedings on the motion have expired.

This House stands adjourned till tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NECESSITY FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES ACTION ON ACID RAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, the government is clearly aware of the vital necessity of establishing an immediate program for the reduction and eventual elimination of acid rain, the greatest single threat to our environment today. It is also aware that, although acid precipitation from the United States contributes significantly to the problem, that country's administration is obviously unwilling to participate in a meaningful way in such a program. In light of the recent collapse of bilateral negotiations, due to the obstructive attitude on the part of U. S. representatives, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister immediately contact President Reagan to demand that priority action be taken by both nations to solve the serious problem of acid rain.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CALL FOR ACTION ON MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, housing in Canada is in a deplorable situation, while housing starts in the United States are up 22.3 per cent. The Premier of Saskatchewan today is implementing a mortgage interest rate of 13.25 per cent for housing in Saskatchewan, which will stimulate housing starts in that province. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this government take positive steps on interest rates before the House closes, in order to put an end to the depressed state of the housing industry in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

SUGGESTED ROLE FOR PUBLIC SERVANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, Mr. Ed Clark, the architect of the Liberal government's ruinous National Energy Program, is being sent off to France for one year at a cost to the Canadian taxpayer of approximately $70,000, in order that he may work for a Paris-based multinational, a company that would appear to have a death wish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Greenaway: In view of the disastrous effect that Ed Clark's policies have had on the Canadian energy sector and the entire Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the government fire Ed Clark and urge him to spend the next year in western Canada instead of in Paris, in order that he can explain the National Energy Program to the thousands who have lost their jobs and businesses as a result of his destructive policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of statements made by William Brock of the Reagan administration that his discussions with the Canadian External Affairs minister about FIRA were, "encouraging" and "would make life easier for both of us", implying a weakening of the Agency, and this in spite of the Minister of Industry's recent statement that, "the purpose of our foreign investment review law is to help provide an assurance that Canada and Canadians benefit from the investments that are reviewed under the act", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House oppose any attempt by the Liberal government to abandon the interest of Canadians by weakening FIRA.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

PAGES MISSING FROM MINISTER'S DINNER SPEECH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in a faltering voice, spoke to a Liberal fund-raising dinner in Toronto. Consternation developed when he came to that part of the speech which dealt with solutions to our economic problems, and he found the pages missing. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government undertake a nation-wide contest in which all Canadians are invited to supply the last few pages of the minister's speech. Prizes for the runners-up will include a trip to Versailles, or the Liberal nomination in Leeds-Grenville, and the grand prize, the chance to be the next Liberal finance minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Bow River.

TAXATION OF EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, the November 12 budget included medical and dental benefits—although paid for by employers—in the income of employees for income tax purposes, on the pretext that the revenue gained would be used to lower income tax rates generally to the benefit of all Canadians. The Canadian Dental Association has submitted arguments to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) which show his statements are not valid and that this taxing of employees for benefits provided by their employers is basically unsound and wrong. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House deplores this insidious type of taxation which robs the needy of dental and medical care; and urges the minister to withdraw the entire November 12 budget which contains numerous inaccuracies and inequities.

When is the minister going to stop putting the bite on the poor and the needy?

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST FOR REFLECTION IN LIGHT OF DONALD MARSHALL CASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I, too, have a motion under Standing Order 43. Twice this week the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) has risen in the the House to espouse the cause of Donald Marshall, who in 1971 was convicted of murder in Nova Scotia. Referring to the reports that another person has since admitted to the crime, the member asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), "If an injustice has occurred, can he take steps to have it remedied?" Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that a year ago this month the same hon. member represented the majority view of his party on the issue of capital punishment, when he said, "I am in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment," I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House invite the member for Halifax West and other members of his party who hold similar views, to reflect on their capital punishment position and to ask themselves where Mr. Marshall might be today if their hanging views had prevailed when Marshall was convicted in 1971.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

DEMAND FOR ROLLBACK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise with regard to the limited rollback or so-called "Update" of the National Energy Program. People expected a torrent of relief but, instead, all they got was a trickle. Canada is losing $16 million a day because of foreign crude imports while the minister and the government fumble with the levers of socialism. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the Prime Minister personally intervene in the energy picture and order a complete rollback of this destructive program which has caused the loss of jobs, investment and investor confidence in the oil and gas industry in Canada, and is adding unnecessarily to gas and oil prices in Canada, all of which is taking a heavy toll on Canadians through human suffering.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

GOLF À LA METRIC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, at a time when Canada is experiencing record unemployment, record high interest rates, and a record low dollar, it is refreshing to know that the federal government has not forgotten the golfer. Therefore, I move, seconded by my golfing seatmate, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That this House congratulates the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion for hiring one of Canada's top professional golfers to tour Canada and educate Canadian golfers, professional, amateur and recreational, on the joys of playing golf using the metric system, and at the same time requests that the government hire the hon. member for Edmonton North to do the same for football players.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon).

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the childish, adversarial decision by the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Lumley) to slow down the customs clearance of Japanese manufactured automobiles entering this country through west coast ports, which is causing inexcusable hardship and unemployment for countless port workers, transportation workers, and businesses dependent on this important trade, and whereas at present more than 3,000 cars are being held up at Fraser Wharves terminal at Richmond, B.C., saturating that facility and preventing a recently docked freighter, the Canadian Ace, from unloading a further 1,750 cars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That this House direct the Minister of State for International Trade to abandon immediately his peevish approach to trade relations with the Japanese and adopt a more creative and constructive approach aimed at negotiating a fair trade agreement with Japan which would protect Canadian jobs instead of endangering them.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA SALMON STOCKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. There will be 37 fewer fisheries officers than needed to protect the B.C. salmon industry, and the Treasury Board refuses additional funds. This reduction would place many salmon runs in jeopardy of illegal fishing, and expose more B.C. recreational and commercial fishermen to danger as a result of decreased search and rescue capability. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House recognizes the urgency and significance of at least maintaining previous patrol capabilities and demands that the Treasury Board approve the request of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for funds to carry out its mandate to protect salmon stocks and B.C. boaters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CALL FOR HOLDING OF GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, the National Energy Program is a recognized disaster, the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is a bust, and we now understand that the much heralded pension reform program has collapsed and the country's senior citizens will continue to suffer under the government's punishing economic policy. This country no longer has any government. The frightened and confused cabinet and bureaucrats have lost control. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this House move non-confidence in the government so that the Governor General can call an election and allow the Canadian people to remove this albatross from their necks.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SASKATCHEWAN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATE SCHEME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Today the Saskatchewan legislature meets under the newly elected Progressive Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: The throne speech will include a 13.25 interest rate for mortgages of $50,000 for a three-year term. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the House instruct the minister responsible for housing to offer the same mortgage package to all people in Canada in order to stimulate the economy and provide decent housing for Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

QUERY RESPECTING DELIVERY DATE OF ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who will know the latest results of the government's drift in economic policy has resulted in the continued fall of the Canadian dollar to 77.50 cents and an increase of 39 basis points in the bank rate. This could lead to an increase of a full point in the prime interest rate and the mortgage interest rates that Canadians have to pay. That underlines dramatically the urgency of stopping the drift in Canadian economic policy. Has the Minister of Finance decided on a date for his economic statement, and will he tell the House of Commons what that date is?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not yet decided on a date. When I do, I will advise the House.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I can only assume that the date is written on the last two pages of the minister's speech notes and he has mislaid those too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

IMPACT OF ECONOMIC POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, as reported at page 18416 of Hansard, in answer to a question put by my colleague, the hon. member for Cambridge, the Minister of Finance said:

Madam Speaker, of course I find the comments of the hon. member really quite unjustified and almost nonsensical when he attributes the current economic situation in Canada to the policies of the Government of Canada.

That is what the Minister of Finance actually said. Is it the position of the Government of Canada that Canadian economic policy has no impact on the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Not at all, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we are making progress, point by point.

REQUEST THAT MEASURES BE CONSIDERED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The minister has admitted that his economic policy is contributing to 1,200 Canadians a day losing their jobs, is contributing to record collapses in Canadian businesses, and is contributing to the record decline in the value of the Canadian dollar. Now that he has indicated to his caucus colleagues that he will be proposing an action program in this mysterious forthcoming statement, will he give us a firm commitment that this so-called action program will include specific measures that can be considered in this House of Commons?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we were making progress until the right hon. member asked this last question. All I can say to him is that he asked the same question yesterday, and the answer is precisely the same today.

REQUEST FOR POLICY CHANGES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has admitted the responsibility of his government for the serious economic situation facing Canada today. He knows that every day of drift drives the value of the Canadian dollar down, drives interest rates up, drives Canadians out of jobs, out of homes and out of businesses. When is he going to accept his responsibility and come before the House to give a commitment that at least the measures he is going to bring in and the statement he is going to make will include specific measures to help Canadians?

Why is he afraid to tell us whether there will be something specific in the proposals? Is he trying to set Canadians up for a statement that will contain nothing at all? If he is not, why does he not have the courage to tell the House that there will be specific changes in economic policy announced in that statement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must comment on the preamble to the right hon. member's question when he relates the question he asked today to a question that had been answered in reply to another hon. member some days ago. I believe, of course, that the interpretation which the right hon. member put on the two questions is a gross misinterpretation. Of course it is true that the economic policies of the government have an impact on the Canadian economy. That ought to be obvious even to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. The field of transportation and the field of trade for instance—all of these things have an impact on the economy. But when the hon. member a few days ago attributed all the circumstances existing in our economy to government policies, I said that was untrue. We are in a world recession. We are being affected by what, just two days ago, a member of the United States cabinet described as tragically high interest rates in the U.S. All of these are affecting the Canadian economy, and that is what I am trying to get the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to understand in order to try to expand his understanding of the situation which currently exists in this country.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, we can only hope for the sake of the country that the minister finds those two key missing pages from his speech yesterday.

PLIGHT OF HOME OWNERS FACING FORECLOSURE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, is the Minister of Finance prepared to exercise his responsibility and the responsibility of the government to shelter those who are least able to protect themselves from the government's disastrous monetary policy? For instance, the minister will know that housing starts in the U.S. as of this morning rose by almost 23 per cent over those figures reported in April, contrasted with a decline in Canadian housing starts of 51 per cent. In light of the fact that the minister's housing policy does not address itself to protecting those Canadians least able to protect themselves, is the minister prepared to exercise any responsibility or any leadership—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. McGrath: I presume the hon. gentleman who interrupts me had his say in caucus yesterday and will let me finish.

Does the minister have any leadership to show in terms of protecting these innocent Canadians, over 40,000 of whom are facing mortgage foreclosures?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that we, as a government, have already taken measures to increase housing construction. In the last budget we provided the sum of $350 million; we provided support for people with mortgages in a bill which members of the opposition took a very long time to pass in the House of Commons.

APPLICATIONS FOR MORTGAGE ASSISTANCE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I find it strange that the minister has not been adequately briefed on exactly what is happening to the governments housing policy. If he had been, he would know, for example, that under the mortgage renewal plan less than 1,300 Canadians have even bothered to apply, only 497 have bothered to apply for the one-time grant of $300, and only 800 have bothered to apply for the mortgage interest deferral plan. Even the minister responsible for housing is now saying that he cannot understand why this program has not been taken up by Canadians. He is quoted in The Globe and Mail as saying "Maybe people were confused and unaware." Madam Speaker, it is this government which is confused and totally unaware of what it is doing to the average Canadian.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): The hon. gentleman's rhetoric is one of misconstruing the facts to this House. It is a $3,000 grant to individual families, not a $300 grant. If you start with those kinds of facts, Madam Speaker, and make those kinds of inaccurate statements which go out to the public, there is no wonder the public is not using the program.

DISARMAMENT

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE—PRIME MINISTER'S FORTHCOMING SPEECH

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The ground is shifting internationally toward strong and realistic disarmament initiatives. On Tuesday of this week the delegates to the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament greeted with enthusiasm the Soviet Union's unilateral pledge not to be the first to use nuclear weapons. At the same time people around the world are demanding a nuclear freeze which would be followed by weapons reduction. Tomorrow the Prime Minister will address this U.N. special session. Since his strategy of suffocation has yet to be accepted by the super powers, will he commit his government tomorrow to new initiatives such as a no-first-use policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for drawing attention to the fact that I will be stating government policy at the United Nations tomorrow, and I will be dealing with the question of no-first-use. I hope the hon. member tunes in.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS—FIRST-USE OPTION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, can the Prime Minister let the people of Canada know what the policy might be? In response to the Soviet Union's promise this week, the Secretary General of NATO, Joseph Luns, and the commander of NATO forces in Europe, General Rogers, insisted yesterday that NATO must retain the option to be the first to use nuclear weapons. As a member of NATO, does Canada subscribe to that policy? Does the Prime Minister believe that retaining the first-use option is the best way to maintain world peace?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we recognize that the question is argumentative. I will give the point of view of the Canadian government tomorrow. I hope I will persuade the hon. member that that point of view is the right one, but he cannot say until he has looked at the arguments.

QUERY RESPECTING FREEZE ON DEVELOPMENT OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I will not continue to ask what he is going to do tomorrow, because clearly he is not going to tell the Canadian people and the House of Commons until tomorrow. What I would like to do instead is to go back to a question and answer of last Monday, which the Prime Minister will recall. Looking at the past in 1978, as reported in Hansard for June 14, 1982, the Prime Minister said:

> I did advocate the policy of suffocation, which is a freeze, but that policy was always advocated in a bilateral context—

And the Prime Minister told us that that policy was not accepted by either of the two major powers.

In his speech in Madrid, the Prime Minister said that he would be advocating a freeze on the development of new nuclear weapons. Was he saying that he would lend his support and the support of Canada to the freeze movement now taking place, which is asking for a bilateral, verifiable freeze on the development of new nuclear weapons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will have to answer that question in at least the same length as it was asked. The 1978 position was the advocation of a suffocation on new weapons, which it is perfectly justifiable to call a freeze on new weapons. That proposal, as the previous questioner pointed out, was not accepted by either of the super powers. On the contrary, since that speech was made, the Soviet Union has not suffocated new arms, it has deployed 300 SS-20s, each with a capacity of three warheads. That is what happened since I made my futile plea for a freeze. That has changed the strategic balance. The policy that NATO is following now is the re-establishment of the balance, and the freeze should continue on all other weapons.

As to the SS-20s, the NATO decision is a two-track one. It is on the one hand to be prepared to deploy Cruise and Pershing II missiles, which are a year and a half down the road at the soonest, but to hope that the threat or the possibility of deploying those missiles to counter the SS-20s will be enough to convince the Soviet Union to go either for the zero option proposed by the United States—no intermediate-range nuclear arms—or, alternatively, to negotiate a very, very reduced level of such arms. That is the position of the Canadian government.

INDEXING OF BENEFITS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the last couple of days backbenchers of his party have caused a great deal of concern across the country among those who are hardest hit and hardest hurt by the government's economic policy. Those Liberal backbench members have advocated removal of indexing for those in social programs, in other words, cutting off indexing for people who receive old age pensions, guaranteed income supplements, family allowances, veterans pensions, and disability pensions. If these people, who are the most vulnerable in our society, are going to have their indexing cut off, has the Minister of Finance given in to the pleas of his backbench members?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not given in to such pleas because I have not heard such pleas.

Miss MacDonald: The minister may deny that those pleas were made, but his backbench members, even coming out of caucus, reported that those were the suggestions made to the Minister of Finance.

PRODUCTION OF GREEN PAPER ON PENSION REFORM

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the minister as well, how long will he place the credibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in jeopardy. The Minister of National Health and Welfare gave a firm commitment last August that she would bring in pension reform proposals.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Miss MacDonald: She gave a commitment again in committee in January and February to bring in pension reform proposals. She said that they would be brought in before the end of the session.

Madam Speaker: Order, order. The hon. member must ask a question. Her preamble has lasted for over a minute.

Miss MacDonald: Why has the Minister of Finance pressured cabinet and caused the delay of the introduction of the green paper on pension reform until next autumn or later, a pension reform which would be of great help to a large number of women?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's facts are as far off the mark as the facts in the initial question.

Miss MacDonald: Then table the paper.

Mr. MacEachen: The credibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not in jeopardy. Her credibility is outstanding, and it will be further improved when the pension reform paper is produced.

Miss MacDonald: When?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN POLLUTION

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, if I may have his attention. Last week a former chairman of the International Joint Commission blamed the Prime Minister for the failure of Canada's negotiations with the United States to achieve a binding bilateral accord on the urgent problem of acid rain. Robert J. Sugarman stated in Calgary:

> There has never been a statement in the U.S. by the highest official in your government to the American people that has reflected the seriousness with which Canadians take the problem.

Given the fact that the Canadian Minister of the Environment this week said that Canada may have to scrap its negotiations with the Americans toward a bilateral accord on acid rain, will the Prime Minister finally take a leading role in Canada's efforts to impress upon Americans the urgency of the problem and the need for strong action on it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred me to a speech of which I have no knowledge. I am happy to take notice of it on behalf of the Minister of the Environment who, I am sure, knows about the speech. When the hon. member suggested that Canada take a role, I can assure him that perhaps everyone except the hon. member knows the Canadian Minister of the Environment has been taking a very strong position in this matter, and that I personally raised the matter at least twice with the President of the United States.

Mr. McMillan: The credentials of the Minister of the Environment in this matter are not suspect; the Prime Minister's are.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT AND NATO MEETINGS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, no doubt the Prime Minister had ample opportunity to discuss urgent Canada-United States issues informally with President Reagan during the Versailles Summit and the NATO Summit in Bonn a few days ago. Did the Prime Minister use either of those occasions to press Canada's case on acid rain with the Americans, and with the President of the United States in particular? If so, what was their response? If not, why did he not do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member judges that my credentials are suspect because I did not raise every outstanding bilateral matter which exists between the United States and Canada at international meetings dealing with none of these bilateral matters, then that is his judgment and I do not share it.

THE JUDICIARY

BRITISH COLUMBIA JUDGE'S VIEW OF 1970 FLQ CRISIS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I refer him to an article written by Mr. Justice Thomas Berger of the Supreme Court of British Columbia that appeared in the June/July 1982 edition of "Canadian Forum", in which he said with respect to the October FLQ crisis in 1970:

> —my view is that ordinary police powers of detection and arrest were sufficient to deal with the FLQ, with the kidnappers of Mr. Cross, and the murderers of Mr. Laporte ... By the enactment of the War Measures Act the federal government converted the kidnapping into an insurrection.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister agrees with the conclusion of Mr. Justice Berger with respect to his handling of the FLQ crisis.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be interested in knowing whether the hon. member's question is addressed more to me or to Justice Berger. If he is questioning the conduct of Justice Berger in entering into this kind of political debate, then he should address the question to the magistrature itself, not to me.

JUDGE'S VIEW ON POSITION OF QUEBEC UNDER CONSTITUTION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, in the same article Mr. Justice Berger supported the concept and suggested that there should be a veto for the Province of Quebec under the Constitution of Canada. I wonder whether or not the Prime Minister shares the point of view of Mr. Justice Berger and if he agrees with Mr. Justice Berger speaking out with respect to these political issues.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not think anything in the rules calls for me to comment upon every statement made across the country, or anywhere, for that matter, by private citizens. If the hon. member wants to ask a series of questions about the War Measures Act—I have answered them in the House—and of course if Mr. Justice Berger wants to debate them he can do so in the proper forum.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT ACID RAIN SUBCOMMITTEE BE REACTIVATED

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister; it is supplemental to the previous question asked on acid rain. As the Prime Minister may know, as long ago as last year there were requests made of the government by members of the acid rain subcommittee representative of all parties that the committee be allowed to continue. Part of the reason for those requests was the anticipation that traditional forms of diplomacy would not be sufficient to obtain an acid rain agreement with the Americans.

In view of the comments of the Minister of the Environment yesterday that these talks are on the verge of falling apart, if they have not already done so, would the Prime Minister consider giving a commitment to us and to the members of his own caucus that the acid rain subcommittee will be reactivated so that Members of Parliament in all parties could stand together on this issue and can move with some authority in the United States to pick up the pieces and get the negotiations going again?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to take notice of the question on behalf of the minister.

THE ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF CO-OPERATIVES

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The co-operative movement is an effective component of every part of the Canadian economy. It takes in agriculture, fisheries, manufacturing and finance, to mention a few. The co-operative movement is struggling to meet the real needs of people in the midst of a faltering and hostile environment, and is one of the optimistic forces in the economy today. Will his government respond to a long-standing request by the co-operative movement to establish a department of co-operatives?

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is, indeed, a request that has been—

Mr. Broadbent: Give Serge something.

Mr. Trudeau: Now the Leader of the NDP wants to ask a supplementary. I will wait for it.

POSITION OF CAISSES POPULAIRES AND CREDIT UNIONS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, the need for a department of co-operatives is very obvious. When we ask about machinery, we have to go to agriculture. When we ask about housing, we have to go to housing. My supplementary question is for either the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Supply and Services. The caisses populaires and the credit unions are put to particular disadvantage in their dealings with the government. This disadvantage is caused by archaic regulations and legislation. Last April the minister promised in a letter to me that action would be taken to alleviate this disadvantage. Will the minister give me an indication now of when that action will be taken?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am very grateful to the hon. member for that question. I want to tell him that not only are we acting on the representations that the hon. member made relating to the cheque issue and the ability to deal with certified cheques issued on caisses populaires but I would also call to the attention of the hon. member that tomorrow we will be passing, through all stages, the Co-Enerco bill which indeed is one of the most brilliant initiatives that has been advanced by this government relating to the co-op movement, and for which the hon. gentleman, as well as all hon. members of the House, should be grateful.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

HOUSING PROJECT AT RENOUS, N.B.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I have given him notice of it. As the minister knows, a housing situation has been created by the failure of his officials to act in a timely fashion in the disposal of ten housing units at Renous, New Brunswick, and by their subsequently interfering at the eleventh hour with the tender process. Has the minister had an opportunity to look into this situation, and when can we expect a resolution of this serious and unfair problem?

An hon. Member: Why do you not raise it in caucus?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Shut your mouth and ask your own questions.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member giving me notice of his question. I would point out that the action taken by myself, answerable for the department, has received the support of the Indian chief of the band in question in that particular area, by telegram the other day, confirming the decision taken. However, I do realize there is a difficulty and, as I have told the hon. member, I will be meeting with him to try to iron out any difficulties within the next few days.

MINES AND MINING

POSTPONEMENT OF SMELTER CONSTRUCTION IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister may recall that he interrupted his budget speech to announce a $350 million smelter to be erected in New Brunswick, which brought great hopes to a large number of unemployed people in that province. The proponents of the smelter have recently announced an indefinite postponement of construction. Has the minister had any consultation with the Noranda group or the New Brunswick government with a view to bringing this vital project on line as soon as possible? Does he have any favourable indications which he can give the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I shall take the hon. member's question as notice, because I have no exact information on this project at the present time. I shall be able to report on the matter to the hon. member next week.

[English]

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE EARLY ACTION

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, would the minister of Finance and his colleagues treat this matter with high priority and pursue it vigorously, since this smelter will create 1,000 construction jobs and about 400 permanent jobs in a part of New Brunswick which has 40 per cent unemployment largely because of the government's policies and acts of omission in this regard?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, on the basis of information I have received in the past, I feel the project is still progressing, and I would not want the hon. member to give the House the impression—and I know that is not his intention—that the project has been abandoned. The project is still progressing, I shall enquire about the implementation date next week—I can assure the hon. member that we are aware of the importance of this project for New Brunswick and Canada—and I shall then be able to be more specific about the dates involved.

VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT PROVIDE INCENTIVES

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It relates to his forthcoming financial statement. As the minister will know, reference has been made today to the impact of the problems of housing and jobs, family violence, and the problems of the elderly and the disabled. With respect to their particular needs during these difficult economic times in Canada, will there be reference in his statement to the voluntary sector which offers the most cost efficient way of providing services which are needed more every day by those people? This was omitted in the November budget. Can we expect that there will be a reference and incentives in the statement for the voluntary sector?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern about the voluntary sector. I share his views about the necessity of maintaining very active voluntary participation in our society. If he has any suggestions or views on that subject on how the voluntary sector might be advanced, I would be prepared to receive them and give them consideration.

MINISTERIAL REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. On March 12, I wrote to the Secretary of State with an outline of program suggestions on how the voluntary sector might be supported. I have not had any response to that. In speaking with the Under-Secretary of State when dealing with estimates we are assured that proposals were forthcoming. Has the Minister of Finance not received these representations from the Secretary of State on behalf of the voluntary sector?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure that our officials have been discussing this question. I have not, however, had these representations, to my recollection. They are probably being given consideration by the minister himself.

DISARMAMENT

SUGGESTED MEETING OF AMERICAN AND RUSSIAN POLITICIANS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It also deals with the question of world disarmament, but from a different approach. During my recent attendance at the United Nations as a member of the Parliamentarians for World Order, I was dismayed to see the lack of understanding and the distrust between representatives, at the ambassadorial level, of the Soviet Union and the United States on the subject of world disarmament at an open forum.

Would the Prime Minister, in an effort to reduce international tension and to promote mutual understanding between the two super powers on disarmament, be willing to use his good offices to bring together in the near future some members of the Senate of the United States and of the Politburo of the U.S.S.R., the politicians with power to create change, in order that they may meet and discuss mutual problems on an individual basis, get to know each other, and develop the trust that is needed if an agreement to reduce nuclear arms is to be reached?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think the suggestion of the hon. member is an interesting one. It is certain that politicians at all levels should be interested in this question, as is the hon. member. I do not think it is a bad idea at all if members of the U.S. Senate and members of the Soviet Politburo could meet together on that kind of exchange.

ENERGY

OFFSHORE RESOURCES—NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the Hibernia oilfield off Newfoundland. Will the minister agree that Premier Peckford, who is now in Ottawa, appears to have made some concessions in this dispute such as, for example, shared ownership? Premier Peckford seems to be prepared to return to negotiations before the Supreme Court of Canada case is completed. Does the minister agree with what I just said? Also, can we now expect the Government of Canada to do likewise?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I obviously cannot speak for Mr. Peckford or speculate on what he has in mind. I can tell the hon. member that we never left the negotiating table. Mr. Peckford refused to meet with us on February 16, as had been requested, and decided to go to court instead. He has refused negotiations ever since.

I had a meeting with Mr. Marshall a few weeks ago. I asked him whether he would come to the negotiating table, but was turned down. He agreed to meet with me, only on the basis that it would not be a negotiating session but simply a discussion. Therefore, the federal government has been at the negotiating table all along. We never left it.

If Mr. Peckford or his representatives want to come back to the negotiating table, they will find us there. We have been waiting for them. We have never said that we refuse to negotiate while the matter is before the courts. We are quite ready to negotiate. In fact, we indicated quite clearly, as we did with Nova Scotia, that we are ready to arrive at an agreement that will withstand any court decision, one that cannot be changed by whatever court decision might be rendered eventually.

The record is straight. It speaks for itself. We are quite ready to negotiate. We have always been ready to negotiate. The ones who left the negotiating table are the representatives of the Government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, the answer is inadequate in that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: Don't make him do that again.

ISSUE OF SHARED OWNERSHIP

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, let me direct a supplementary question to the minister. Premier Peckford is now talking about shared ownership. That seems to be something new and reasonable. The minister talks about federal ownership. Is the minister aware that we have an economic crisis in this country and we need co-operation, not confrontation? Is the minister prepared to consider shared ownership on the east coast and is he prepared, for example, to sit down with Premier Bennett on the west coast with regard to the dispute there, and Premier Peckford on the east coast, before the summer is out? This would show the Canadian people that co-operation is possible in this country and that we can reach an agreement. Why not do this on the basis of shared ownership?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the Government of British Columbia has appointed an outstanding representative that my officials have already met with that representative, and discussions have begun on that very subject. These discussions will continue at a rate that is satisfactory to both governments.

As far as the other point raised by the hon. member is concerned, we have indicated that we are ready to talk about revenue-sharing and joint management. Even leaving aside the question of management, we have said that the question of management is one that can be decided by the courts one way or the other at whatever time is satisfactory. As far as we are concerned, we have not set any pre-conditions before starting or continuing negotiations. We are as ready to talk now as we were all along, as we proved with the Government of Alberta, the Government of British Columbia, the Government of Saskatchewan, and the Government of Nova Scotia. These governments are represented by Social Crediters, New Democrats, and Conservatives. If the hon. member is suggesting that this government is not ready to negotiate, I suggest that he check to see whether it is the Government of Newfoundland that has not been ready to negotiate.

PORTS

CONSTRUCTION OF GRAIN TERMINAL AT PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The proposed Prince Rupert grain terminal continues to waver under a cloud of uncertainty. Can the minister advise what action he or his department have taken in recent days to ensure that this project goes ahead?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the grain consortium have asked us, as I have said before, for essentially two things. The first was to raise the level of government support that exists so as to make the contribution of the federal government and of the Government of Alberta, which is sharing with us on a 50-50 basis, higher. This has been agreed to and the parties are quite satisfied with that. The other item mentioned was the possibility that CN might build the tracking facilities in port. CN is convinced that this might be a good idea on a cost recovery basis; added to each tonne of grain going through Prince Rupert in the future. They are now looking at this and seem to be favourably disposed.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—TABLING OF GILSON REPORT

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the minister received the final copy of the Gilson report. Can he now inform the House and the grain producers of western Canada whether that report will be tabled while the House is in session, or will he take the other way out, as he did with VIA Rail, and table the report after the House is adjourned?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is unnecessarily antagonistic. My reputation for being friendly is well known. I do have the report. It is now being translated and will be printed. If all goes well it should be ready by June 29. Again, everything going well, I will be in a position to table it that day.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS IN FURNITURE INDUSTRY

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Furniture workers across Canada are facing mass lay-offs. In the town of Hanover, Ontario, the unemployment rate has reached 30 per cent in consequence of that. Does the minister have anything in mind that will be forthcoming in his economic statement that might provide some hope for the future of these people, the workers, their families, and those in other towns like this across Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not sure I heard every word of the hon. member's question. If he is asking me whether I have anything in mind to put in the economic statement that will affect these workers, obviously I will be able to satisfy the hon. member's curiosity when the statement is made. I am afraid I have no suggestion for him but to be patient for a little while longer.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO RESIDENTIAL CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, the minister will know that the furniture market is at least partially dependent on housing starts and on the sale of new homes. He will know from previous questions today that new housing starts are at about 50 per cent of what are reasonable levels. The unemployment rate in the home construction industry is 25 per cent. Only one in six Canadians who is renting can look forward to owning a new home. Does the minister have in mind anything that might accommodate the housing industry by way of lowering interest rates and mortgages so that new housing starts will again occur and there will be some return to the economy, that industry, and the furniture industry?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks me whether consideration is being given to the problems of various sectors of the economy, including the furniture industry, the housing industry and the construction industry. I wish to tell him that of course all these matters are being considered intensively by myself at the present time.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LETTER CARRIER WALK SERVICES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is responsible for the Post Office. In view of the statement earlier this year by the president of the Canada Post Corporation with regard to providing improved postal service, including new letter carrier walks across the country, can the minister advise when these additional letter carrier walks will be provided to rapidly-growing communities such as Elliot Lake, Ontario, thus improving the present unsatisfactory service to new subdivisions in that town?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will bring to the attention of the president the representation made by the hon. member, and report to him as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, may I ask the government House leader what the business will be for tomorrow and for next week. Presumably he can give us the business up to and including Wednesday.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker. In so far as the business for tomorrow is concerned we have made an agreement to deal with all stages of the following four bills, with a maximum of one speaker per party.

First, Bill C-116, to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation; second, Bill C-38, to provide for garnishment or attachments; third, Bill C-120, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act; and finally, Bill C-118, to provide for the retention of certain records. On each of those bills there will be a maximum of one speaker per party for all stages of the bills tomorrow.

[Translation]

As far as the business of the House for next week is concerned, next Monday will be the last allotted day for this supply period—in other words, Monday will be an opposition day. Next Tuesday and Wednesday we shall be considering the following bills, in order: the bill on occupational training, if the committee report is ready and that seems to be the case; the bill on export development, if it has been reported by the committee; and finally, the bill on national harbours. We are going to try to finish the second reading stage, and subsequently, we shall consider the bill to provide for payments to owners of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. Now it seems it may be possible to refer this bill very quickly to committee, by allowing only one speaker per party, at least as far as the Progressive Conservative Party is concerned. Thursday, as we all know, is a holiday and a very special day for French Canadians, so that Parliament will not sit on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: I thank the government House leader for that. I want to make it clear to him, in view of the exchange which took place yesterday between the member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), that we are prepared to deal with Bill C-109, the bill with respect to urea formaldehyde foam insulation assistance, with one speaker per party, and get it into committee as soon as possible.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I can confirm that that is the understanding of the agreement, with one addition. I believe it is acceptable to the government, and also to the official opposition, that in Bill C-120, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, a minor amendment removing retroactivity would be acceptable to all sides.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have had discussions with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader with respect to the bill mentioned by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody, and that is agreeable.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, this is not strictly on this point of order, but I would like to indicate to you, in keeping with our previous practices on the matter of the estimates, that given that the supply period will be over on Monday, and given the request by previous speakers when estimates are challenged, the Chair should give an opportunity for consideration of a day or two before the end of the supply period. I have talked to the President of the Treasury Board and indicated that it would be our desire to raise a point of order tomorrow in respect to some of the votes in the estimates which will come up for a vote on Monday evening.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on House business, as the President of the Privy Council will know, the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has completed its consideration of Bill C-43 respecting freedom of information. We on this side of the House are agreeable to this bill being debated, in fact today. I am wondering if the President of the Privy Council could indicate to the House when he intends to bring this important legislation forward. Will he give the House an assurance that this legislation will in fact be brought forward before the House rises for the summer?

Mr. Pinard: I suggest that the hon. member talk to his House leader, who will have all the answers. At the same time, he could inquire about the bill respecting Canada Day. I have been expecting an answer.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council about the changes affecting the credit unions and caisses populaires in the bill to amend the Financial Administration Act, which was tabled about March 18. When is this legislation going to come before the House? It is Bill C-96.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will take the representation made by the hon. member into serious consideration and discuss the matter with his House leader.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, in December, Bill C-60 was passed both here in this House and in the Senate. My constituents are patiently waiting for that bill. Their property has been trespassed and the provisions in this bill would give them the opportunity to be heard. Can the President of the Privy Council say when this bill will be proclaimed so that they will have the use of this bill?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked this question last week and I told him I would report to him. I am doing so now. I am told that this bill will be proclaimed any time between now and the end of the month.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—CORRECTION OF QUESTION ASKED DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister is in the House, but he is not in his seat. During my second question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) who is responsible for housing, I inadvertently used the figure "$300" for "$3,000" for first-time grants. I want to correct the record. However, Madam Speaker, there was nothing inadvertent about the sheepish way the minister used that to avoid answering my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, to the many households, approximately 1,500, who would use that money, there is a great difference between $300 and $3,000.

Mr. Clark: That still does not excuse your lack of courage in answering questions.

STANDING ORDERS AND PROCEDURE

MEMBERSHIP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. If there are no further questions about the business of the House, I would like to raise a related matter. I have consulted with representatives of various parties on the subject of the Special Committee on Parliamentary Reform. Today, it is with great pleasure that I can inform the House that we have agreed on the membership of this committee and consequently, I would like to present the following motion, with the unanimous consent of the House:

That the members of the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure be the following: Messrs. Baker (Nepean-Carleton), Blaikie, Collenette, Cousineau, Cullen, Daudlin, Deans, Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi), Epp, Herbert, Huntington, Lachance, Lefebvre, Lewis, Mayer, McGrath, Reid (Kenora-Rainy River), Simmons, Smith and Thacker.

Madam Speaker, these are the hon. members who would sit on the Special Committee on Parliamentary Reform, and this is a formal motion.

Point of Order—Mr. Rose

Madam Speaker: Does the minister have the unanimous consent of the House to present this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. ROSE—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF "PROTECTED PERSONS"

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek to put a question for clarification. With the greatest respect, I seek Madam Speaker's ruling about the role of hon. members in the matter of "protected persons" as described in Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 321.

The reason I seek this clarification is that yesterday the member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) was named by Your Honour for using unparliamentary language and was removed from the House following his attempt to set the record straight on a matter of consequence, at least to Mr. Justice Thomas Berger. Yet on Tuesday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) twice described the conduct of Mr. Justice Berger as reprehensible. Madam Speaker, Citation 428 of Erskine May cites the following passage; it is in the footnote on page 428:

> Mr. Speaker ruled that . . . reflections on a judge's character or motives cannot be made except on a motion, nor can any charge of a personal nature be made except on a motion.

• (1510)

Clearly, Madam Speaker, the minister's remarks were not by way of motion but in answer to an hon. member's question. Describing a judge's conduct as reprehensible is bound to be construed as a reflection on the judge's character and, according to the precedents I have cited, perhaps the judge deserved the protection of the Chair—or other hon. members—under Beauchesne Citation 321 or May at page 428.

I would be grateful if Your Honour would be so kind as to consider the points I have raised and later, perhaps, inform the House as to the duties of both hon. members and the Chair in cases such as this in order to end the confusion or any possible inference of double standards.

Madam Speaker: At all times during the course of those exchanges I was conscious that perhaps some of the things which were being said in the House might reflect on the conduct of judges. I was extremely cautious about that. It seemed to me that when the minister referred to Justice Berger in the way the hon. member has just described, he was quoting from a report.

An hon. Member: No.

Madam Speaker: At any rate, if the hon. member felt there was a point of order concerning that particular intervention it should have been dealt with at that time. Points of order have to be dealt with when they arise. They cannot be dealt with two or three days later.

It is very clear that hon. members must not reflect, except through a formal motion, on the conduct of the judiciary. That is very clear, and I can reaffirm that so that hon. members will not be confused. However, although at times that exchange came very close, it did not seem in my judgment that it reflected on the conduct of judges.

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—WITHDRAWAL OF REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, during the question period today and at the end of a question I put to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) shouted something across the floor at me. I responded impulsively and in language which was not very dignified. Whether I feel justified or not, I believe we should use dignified language in this chamber. I ask to have that comment withdrawn because I do not believe it is in keeping with the spirit of Parliament. Whether I feel that way or not, I should not tell the hon. member to do something he should know enough to do by himself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I was going to congratulate the hon. member, but I guess I will not!

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBY—REMARKS OF MR. CHRÉTIEN RESPECTING DONALD MARSHALL CASE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, you will recall that I gave you notice of a question of privilege which relates to remarks made in this chamber by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) on June 16 and previously on June 15. The minister is not now in the chamber, so I will reserve my question of privilege, if I may, for another day.

The question of privilege relates to the Donald Marshall case and the manner and circumstances under which it was referred to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may present his question of privilege even though the minister is not present in the House. I can entertain the question of privilege. Since it is a question of privilege, it supposedly is extremely urgent, so I urge the hon. member to present his question of privilege.

Mr. Crosby: Very well, then.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it is a long-standing practice in this place that, as a matter of courtesy, when an hon. member intends to raise a question of privilege reflecting upon the conduct of another hon. member, the hon. member against whom allegations are about to be made should be in his place in the House.

I strongly suggest it would be most inappropriate and certainly not in keeping with the long-standing practices of this place to raise a question of privilege reflecting on the conduct of a member who is not here to hear the allegations. I suggest there is every right and every obligation to set the question over until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is in his place.

Madam Speaker: In my time I have heard questions of privilege in the absence of hon. members involved in those questions of privilege. I am very careful not to give rulings in the House unless the hon. members involved are in the House.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) will know that question of privilege is a matter that is very, very urgent and that I am justified in telling the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) that since it is an urgent matter, he probably would want to raise it immediately. I am suggesting that he probably would want to raise it immediately, and I am ready to hear him today. If he wants to defer, that is fine with me, I will wait; but it seems to me somewhat contradictory that an urgent question of privilege can be deferred one day or even a couple of hours. However, if the hon. member wants to defer, I will be patient with him.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not that it is not a question of urgency, with the greatest of respect. The practice is that a question of privilege, particularly one of this nature which deals with personalities, should be raised at the earliest opportunity. The earliest fitting and proper opportunity is when the minister is in the House, since the question deals with reflections on his personal conduct as a minister.

I would advise my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby), to defer the question until such time as the minister is in the House.

Madam Speaker: That is fine, but I do not accept the idea that a question of privilege may not be discussed when the person referred to in the question of privilege is not in the House. The one whose privilege is affected, of course, is the first one who is concerned, and in his view it is supposed to be so urgent that we stop all business of the House because we must consider that question of privilege. That is the basic principle behind questions of privilege.

Does the hon. member want to defer? If he wants to defer, that is fine; I will wait.

Point of Order—Mr. Crosby

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, let me make it clear to you and all members of this House that my purpose in deferring the question of privilege was respect for a colleague in this chamber and not for any reasons of my own. I would be happy to go ahead with the question of privilege.

I want also to make a second point. In addressing this question of privilege, I intend to say things about the Minister of Justice which I want him to hear and to which I want him to respond. He can deny or admit as he sees fit. I certainly am prepared to go ahead, but I think I ought to—and I will—ask permission to defer, as I said, out of respect for members of this chamber.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CROSBY—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. ROSE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, with respect to the rules and the Standing Orders of the House, I would like to draw to your attention Standing Order 35 and the remarks made by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) during proceedings under Standing Order 43 today when he reflected on a vote taken in this House in which I participated. I participated in that vote and in that debate. I draw Your Honour's attention to that.

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member now raising another question?

Mr. Crosby: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: He had the floor for a question of privilege, which is quite legitimate, but if he wants to speak about another matter, he would have to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Crosby: It is a point of order, Madam Speaker. I ask Your Honour to reflect on the remarks made by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody during proceedings today under Standing Order 43. I believe he may have reflected on a vote in this House and particularly my participation in that debate and in that vote.

Madam Speaker: I will have to look at the text. I did not get that impression, but I will look at the "blues".

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, you said you would look at the "blues" to find out what the point of order is really all about. I certainly did not reflect negatively on the hon. member. As a matter of fact, I quoted from his speech and complimented the hon. member on his efforts to espouse the cause of Mr. Marshall in Nova Scotia.

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

TABLING OF CONTINUING RESPONSE TO "OBSTACLES" REPORT

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, as minister responsible for the co-ordination of the federal government's response to the "Obstacles" report presented to the House by the special parliamentary committee on the disabled and the handicapped, I am pleased to table today under Standing Order 41(2) the federal government's continuing response to the "Obstacles" report. This report describes actions the government has taken subsequent to the initial response which I tabled in the House on December 17, 1981.

PETITION

MR. SCOTT (HAMILTON-WENTWORTH)—PROHIBITION OF GROUP SEX

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of many constituents in the Hamilton-Wentworth area who view with alarm activities such as group sex in their communities. This petition is especially timely since the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at this moment is discussing amendments to the Criminal Code with respect to sexual offences. Through this petition the citizens of the township of Flamborough and elsewhere in the Hamilton area call upon the Parliament of Canada to maintain those provisions in the Criminal Code which prohibit any form of group sex.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO SPOUSES

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-657, to amend the Prairie Grain Advanced Payments Act (spouses).

He said: Madam Speaker, section 7(3.2) of this act discriminates against a married couple when both are productive. A productive man and a productive woman may live common law and both will receive prairie grain advance payments; but if the same two are legally married, then the advance payment is cut in half. This bill would remove this discrimination. If our legislation is to favour anyone, it should be those who are legally married and not those who are living common law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,695, 4,030, 4,159, 4,160, 4,161 and 4,228.

MR. PETER JOHN NICHOLSON

Question No. 3,695—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does Mr. Peter John Nicholson hold a position in the public service and, if so, what is his position and remuneration?

2. What are the qualifications (a) claimed by Mr. Nicholson (b) stated for the office?

3. Was the position advertised or otherwise offered to other persons?

4. (a) Was Mr. Nicholson in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1978 or thereabouts and, if so, what was his salary (b) did he resign from the office to be a candidate in the provincial general election in Nova Scotia and, if so, was he given any retirement or other payment from the government?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows:

1. Mr. Nicholson does not hold a position in the public service. He was awarded a contract with the task force on Atlantic fisheries to act as an advisor to the chairman for a period of eight months at a rate of $6,000 per month.

2. Extensive knowledge in the field of Atlantic fisheries. Experience acquired from one of the four largest fish companies in the Atlantic. Experience in industry-government relations.

3. No. A judgment was made that Mr. Nicholson's qualifications in both the fishing industry and government meant that he would be an excellent addition to the task force staff.

4. (a) Yes, at a salary range between $34,436 and $37,909. (b) Mr. Nicholson took a leave of absence without pay from August 17 to September 20, 1978. He resigned from the public service on September 19, 1978 to become the elected representative for Victoria County in the Nova Scotia Legislature. In relation to pension entitlement accumulated during his employment in the public service, Mr. Nicholson chose a deferred annuity as provided for in Section 12(c)ii(a) of the Public Service Superannuation Act. He has not received any retirement or other payment from the government.

REFUSAL TO SURRENDER MAIL

Question No. 4,030—Mr. Herbert:

Are there any conditions under which the post office can refuse to surrender mail to a properly identified person, when the mail bears the full residential address of the individual requesting the mail?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am informed by the Canada Post Corporation as follows:

Yes, under the following conditions: prohibitory order issued by the minister; postage due unpaid; letters in customs where the addressee refuses to open the letter when requested to do so. Items refused by the addressee because of customs charges, or items prohibited entry into Canada by law as administered by customs and excise of Revenue Canada; non-mailable matter under the prohibited mail regulations. This would contain items that are prohibited or dangerous that have found their way into the mail stream.

CANADA POST LOCK BOXES

Question No. 4,159—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many lock boxes are presently in service in post offices and how many are used by individuals that (a) are not entitled to residential delivery service (b) have no residential address or do not wish to disclose a residential address (c) are entitled to delivery service but choose to have a lock box?

2. How many lock boxes are used by companies and associations?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am informed by the Canada Post Corporation as follows:

1. Canada Post maintains approximately 1,507,000 post office boxes, of which about 1,360,000 are rented. (a) approximately 834,000 boxes; (b) the corporation has no record of any customers in this category; (c) approximately 526,000 boxes.

2. The corporation does not compile information regarding the number of companies and associations that use post office boxes.

CANADA POST—PERSONNEL COSTS

Question No. 4,160—Mr. Herbert:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 2,141 of the first session of the 30th Parliament, what percentage of the 1982-83 total budget of the Canada Post Corporation is for personnel costs and benefits, including all labour and wage related items?

2. Is it anticipated that there will be any appreciable change in this percentage in future years?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Canada Post Corporation has informed me as follows:

1. It is 71.8 per cent.

2. The corporation cannot at this time predict the outcome of future collective bargaining; therefore this question cannot be more fully answered.

POSTAL VOLUME

Question No. 4,161—Mr. Herbert:

With reference to question No. 2,136 and question No. 2,703 of the first session of the 30th Parliament, what is the present percentage of postal volume that comes from individuals and what is the percentage of postal volume from individuals to individuals?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am informed by the Canada Post Corporation as follows: The most recent data indicates that 20 per cent of postal volume comes from individuals. Of that, 41.1 per cent is sent from individuals to individuals.

DREE PROJECTS

Question No. 4,228—Mr. Mazankowski:

Since 1969 (a) in which cities and for which years has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion had offices (b) how many projects did each office fund (c) what amount did each office commit?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

(a) DREE has 33 offices across the country. A list of locations and dates of opening is listed below.

(b) and (c) Projects are not identifiable on an office by office basis. The department's annual reports provide this information by year, province and program.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 4,318?

[Text]

*"UNDERSTANDING CANADA"

Question No. 4,318—Mr. Dinsdale:

Did the government pay United States academics to write the book "Understanding Canada" and, if so, what amount?

[English]

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No, although the Department of External Affairs, in response to a need identified by U.S.A. academics, did contract with U.S.A. academics to prepare a manuscript which could serve as the basis of a multi-disciplinary text book about Canada conceived and written for United States undergraduates. The copyright of that manuscript was subsequently sold to the Association for Canadian Studies in the United States (ACSUS) for $1 in November, 1980. The book has recently been published in accordance with arrangements made between New York University Press and ACSUS under the title "Understanding Canada: A multidisciplinary Introduction to Canadian Studies".

The amounts of the contracts were as follows:

(a) In 1976 $17,000 (U.S.A.) with Professor Roger Swanson, then Professor of Canadian Studies at John Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, to prepare an initial manuscript. The amount was designed to cover editorial expenses, author's fees, referee's costs, etc. This amount was increased by $1,000 (U.S.A.) in 1978.

(b) In 1979 $1,500 (Canadian) with Professor Peter Kresl, Director of the Canadian Studies program at Bucknell University, to write a chapter entitled "Canada: An Economic Perspective".

(c) By 1980 Professor Swanson had left the academic world and there was a contract for $11,000 (U.S.A.) with Professor William Metcalfe of the University of Vermont to: edit the manuscript; bring the material up-to-date; and introduce and delete such material as required to maintain a consistent style.

Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary will correct me if I am wrong but I do not believe question No. 3,543, which I put on the Order Paper on December 14, has been answered. It is a very simple question about the Canadian Media Corporation. I should like to know if the parliamentary secretary can tell the House when that question will be answered.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to advise the hon. member of the date that question will be answered, but I will look into the matter on his behalf and see what I can do to expedite it.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CANADA'S ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That this House condemns the Government, and in particular, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, for its failure to meet any of the objectives for which the Government continues to seek authority to spend in excess of one billion dollars in this fiscal year on behalf of Canada's aboriginal peoples, for its tolerance of the miserable conditions existing in native communities throughout Canada which are of a standard vastly inferior to those found in most Third World countries, for the minister's failure to exercise his obligatory trust responsibility, and for the minister's contempt of Parliament as manifested by his deliberate refusal to comply with the statutory obligations which legally require him to report to the House on the progress of the implementation of the James Bay agreement.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, you may well ask, and we may well be questioned by our friends opposite and by people who watch us through the window to the outside today, why we would use a whole day of precious parliamentary time, when the country is in such serious economic difficulties, to discuss matters relating to the affairs of our native people. I would rather look at it as discussing a favourite subject of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—the North-South dialogue, except that this dialogue is more of a domestic nature.

I shall not have any difficulty explaining to you, or to anyone who is watching, why this has become such an urgent problem. It is urgent because the burden of economic difficulties that we must all suffer in times like these is unequally distributed in the country. A disproportionate load of the economic misery which this government has bestowed on the Canadian people is borne by the poor. And most native people in this country, Mr. Speaker, are among the poorest of the poor.

We talk about high unemployment, but in most native communities the unemployment rate is not 15 or 20 per cent, it is 95 per cent. Despite a whole series of royal commissions and studies over the last two or three decades into the housing conditions in the native communities, the housing situation is deplorable. It is not even comparable to conditions which exist in some Third World countries.

This debate is urgent because the conditions in which our native people live have attracted the attention of the world outside. International tribunals such as the World Health Organization, world courts and human rights fora are dealing with the problems of the native people in Canada. Our image as a nation which espouses certain fundamental values in terms of the human condition is being blemished. It is urgent because the government is embarking on a new phase of the implementation of its Indian affairs policy which, when completed, will have the most profound effect and consequences on our native people. It is also urgent because there is a requirement under the first part of the constitutional accord to hold conferences within one year with provincial premiers and officials to determine once and for all the role and place of our native people within the framework of our new basic law and our new charter of rights.

I do not wish to overdramatize this question but some people are asking why it is that we impose economic sanctions on countries like South Africa because of the way they treat their native people when standards of health care and education for our own natives are, in the main, very much inferior to those found in South Africa.

Some people will be offended by what I have to say today. Many people find it easy to practise virtue from a distance and manage to overlook what is occurring in their own backyard. They will say that it is not fair to make the comparison with South Africa because, after all, our native people were declared persons 30 years ago. Ten years after that they were given the right to vote by the Right Hon. George Diefenbaker.

We consider it urgent, nevertheless, when one small segment of our society finds itself totally isolated from the mainstream of life. We hear reports of life-threatening situations which exist in our native communities, and our jails are overcrowded with native persons whose only relief from frustration is alcohol and crime.

We want to talk about all these things today, and my colleagues will place on the record in some detail statistics and facts of which we should all be ashamed. On the surface, as I have said, our Indian people have all the rights society grants its citizens, or at least so it seems when one looks back over history. There are, however, some very essential differences. For instance, when an ordinary Canadian goes to the polls he elects a government; an Indian person elects himself a trustee. The ordinary Canadian in a provincial election chooses a government or representative most able to manage such things as health care, education, and community services. But the Indian on the reserve has to rely on the federal government to provide him with these things. The provinces redistribute money they have collected in taxes to municipalities and individuals in the form of per capita grants and contributions to sustain community infrastructures. But when such payments are made by the federal government on behalf of the native people, the average Canadian usually considers that to be welfare.

There are other factors which set native people apart from us. Our registered Indians cannot buy and sell their houses without the consent of the minister. They cannot start a business without such consent. If the band to which they belong has any property or assets, then the band cannot sell or convert them without the consent of the trustee, which is the federal minister. If consent is given to, say, sell land or resources belonging to Indian people under their treaty, the money is put in a trust fund maintained and controlled by the minister. That trust fund presently contains between $500 million and $600 million, which will grow to $1 billion by 1985. Incidentally, the government, of course, uses this money and pays a rate of interest 3 per cent or 4 per cent below that which it currently pays in the marketplace. I asked the minister in the House why it is that he cheats our native people of $30 million a year. I have been fighting for a year on behalf of the Fort Nelson Indian band to get the minister either to release the funds or pay a decent rate of interest. The fight is still going on and I hope the minister takes note and will remember that I will not be giving up.

There is a special trust fund for minors which the minister administers, presumably because Indian parents are not considered trustworthy to care for their own children. We have heard evidence before the committee of children for whom such trust moneys are kept in the minister's pocket here in Ottawa while they go to school hungry every day.

Such are the rights of our native people, Mr. Speaker, and such is their equality before our law. It is that trust responsibility which the minister has under the act and the way it is being discharged which I wish to examine in greater detail a little later. First let me give you an overview of the situation to which we generally refer as Indian affairs.

Under the new Constitution Indians, Inuit and Métis, all non-status Indians, are all referred to in one general category: aboriginal people. There are about 300,000 registered Indians who are governed under a special statute known as the Indian Act. The Inuit are specifically excluded from this act, but because of a 1939 court decision the minister had to assume some jurisdiction and responsibility for the Inuit people as well. By far the largest category of aboriginal people are the so-called Métis or non-status Indians. We think, although no one knows for sure, that they number in excess of one million.

The issue of the Métis, as far as the federal government is concerned, was settled during the Riel rebellion. The non-status Indians have, through bureaucratic commission or omission, never obtained or never lost their status. They are administered by the provinces, and in most cases are even worse off than their counterparts on reserves. In some cases they live on the reserves and share the same house with brothers and sisters. Under the treaties made with the Indians they were allowed to select certain lands, in most cases up to 160 acres per person, which could not be alienated or expropriated nor made subject to taxation, although much of this land has, of course, been alienated and expropriated over the years and some bands have never selected their lands. But that which is owned by the Indians and held in trust by the minister amounts in the aggregate, south of the 60th parallel, to an area the size of Nova Scotia.

These lands, even though they lie within the provinces, are not provincial lands. The resources, both surface and subsurface, are not provincial resources and the people who live on them are not governed by a provincial government. They are citizens, some argue, of a third territory who have the distinction of not being represented in Parliament. I should perhaps qualify that by saying that they are represented by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). We must assume the reason for this is that Indians are not capable of representing themselves. However, we look at the minister's mandate to represent our first citizens as part of his trust responsibility as well.

There is a lot of misunderstanding around, Mr. Speaker, even among our own colleagues here in the House, about the responsibilities we and the minister have for our aboriginal people. What is more, we believe that even the present trustee and his colleagues in cabinet are not certain what their responsibilities are. Let me quote from the report of the Auditor General who had difficulty determining what the minister's trust responsibilities were as well. In his last report he says:

> For example, managers posed the following questions: is the role of the department one of prescription, where resources are allocated according to priorities interpreted by the department, or is it one of support, where the allocation is based on priorities determined by native people? Is it some of each and should the mix vary from one native group to another? Is the department accountable for producing social and economic gains for the native people, or is it responsible simply for ensuring an equitable distribution of financial support as native groups pursue their own objectives? Responses to these kinds of questions would have implications for accountability and control within the department.

Further on he said:

> We therefore concluded that the direction given to the Department concerning its relationship with native people was not sufficiently clear to identify what DIAND should be accountable for in relation to its mandate. We also found little evidence to indicate that the Department had tried to clarify its accountability to Parliament by making assumptions in regard to its mandate, developing corresponding objectives and seeking approval for them.

The minister, in response to a question I asked him on May 13 concerning the Musqueam Indian situation in Vancouver, said this:

> It is the fundamental principle of whether the minister has a trust responsibility, which is a key question to the Indian community in Canada.

He says it is a question whether the minister has that responsibility; he does not even know. He goes on:

> That is what is involved in this particular case. I think some Indian leaders to whom I have talked realize that this fundamental question which has been a source of frustration to everyone concerned for so many years will have to be determined.

It is for that reason that he is putting the Musqueam people of Vancouver through the Supreme Court at a likely cost to them of $1 million. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you would not permit me the time to give a very precise historical and legal overview of the various acts, statutes and Royal proclamations which establish the special rights Inuits and Indians have, and what they are. But there is really no longer any doubt that special rights do exist, and the various instruments by which they were established have been badly bruised and injured and offended.

There is one general understanding which distorts the perception most Canadians have of the problem, and that has to do with the treaties we have made with the Indians in the past. None of them were treaties of surrender; rather, they were arrangements for co-existence and friendship. The Indians were never conquered. They never surrendered. They signed arrangements and contracts for co-existence. At no time did the Indians agree to give up land to which they always considered themselves spiritually attached. Instead the treaties were viewed as a guarantee that as long as the sun shines, the grass grows, the rivers flow and nature celebrates its cycles, they shall at all times be part of those cycles.

I want to quote briefly from a report of treaty commissioners who negotiated Treaty No. 8, which was made June 21, 1899. The commissioners said:

> Our chief difficulty was the apprehension that the hunting and fishing privileges were to be curtailed. The provision in the treaty under which ammunition and twine is to be furnished went far in the direction of quieting the fears of the Indians, for they admitted that it would be unreasonable to furnish the means of hunting and fishing if laws were to be enacted which would make hunting and fishing so restricted as to render it impossible to make a livelihood by such pursuit. But over and above the provision, we had to solemnly assure them that only such laws as to hunting and fishing as were in the interest of the Indians . . . would be made . . . and that they would be as free to hunt and fish after the treaty as they would be if they never entered into it.

Such is the nature of these treaties, and there cannot be any doubt about that. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the courts have come to grips with the situation and in the main agree with the native people about that.

We all know what happened to these treaties. All of us must share part of the blame. We have not had the courage to admit that what has been done in the past was wrong. Nor have we had the compassion or the will to set it right. Maybe I should qualify that by stating that we have never been stingy in providing sufficient financial resources to set this inequity right, or to solve any problems the Indian people have if money were a solution to these problems. In fact, the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has a budget which exceeds $1 billion a year to carry out his mandate. That is $4,000 for every man, woman and child under his care. In the case of a family of five, that amounts to $20,000. That excludes the Métis and non-status Indians. While that would normally be sufficient to sustain an ordinary family above the poverty line, the paternalistic system and a ravenous bureaucratic monster administering these funds is not only gobbling up the lion's share of the money, but in the process has gobbled up any self-esteem, any self-reliance and even some of the most basic freedoms and rights that our native peoples once thought they had. It has rendered the Indians totally dependent upon the welfare system.

Let me give a few examples in terms of numbers to show the enormity of the problem. Overall, in the department of Indian Affairs—and the minister is responsible for a couple of other departments as well—there are 4,463 people. This includes Indian agents and people who help to carry out his mandate. Despite the fact that Indians have taken over or are supposed to be taking over many of the programs which were formerly administered by the department itself, the number of people increased by 308 over the last two years. The over-all cost of the minister's administration is $1.1 billion. That is over $1,000 million to administer the affairs of 250,000 people.

The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in the course of examining this year's estimates, which, incidentally, led to the drafting of its now infamous fifth report which was tabled in the House and on which this motion is generally based, singled out one of the regions for closer scrutiny and special consideration. Because of a number of problems which are peculiar to British Columbia, some of which my colleagues will touch upon, the committee held two days of hearings in Vancouver examining the affairs of the B.C. region. This region stands out for two main reasons. First, most of the province was not covered by a treaty. Treaty commissioners did not cover the province as they did the prairie provinces. Treaty aid covers almost all of northern British Columbia.

Second, most of the bands and tribal councils in British Columbia have reached such a high degree of self-reliance that the departmental services and interventions are no longer required or wanted. In fact, there is duplication of some services, if not outright competition for some of the programs between departmental officials and some of the bands. Despite that fact, the region employs 557 people who are organized within ten major departments.

I have with me a brief overview of how the department of Indian affairs functions. First we have the department of the director general which has four staff members. The average salary amounts to $35,000 or $36,000. Incidentally, this department spent $63,223 on travel between April, 1981 and January 11, 1982.

Next is the department called director of local government which has 13 staff members who earn an average salary of $30,000. That group of 13 people spent $109,457 on travel between April, 1981 and January 11, 1982.

Next I will mention the director of the socio-economic development department. He and his 21 staff members earn an average salary of $30,000. They spent only $94,000 on travel in the same period.

The next department is that of the personnel manager who has 18 staff members. They have an average salary of $25,000 and spent $32,000 on travel in the same period.

Then we come to the engineering and architecture department which has 23 engineers and architects in the B.C. region. But the 23 engineers and architects have spent $119,674 in travel between April, 1981 and January 11, 1982. What I have mentioned comprises just the executive branch. There are in total 171 people who work in the British Columbia regional office.

We have many horror stories like this that we would like to place on the record today. The bureaucrats are in competition with the Indians for programs. They are in this bureaucratic game of "save your job and build your ivory tower". So fierce is the competition for control that it eats up most of the resources available to the region, to the point where those bands who experience 95 per cent unemployment, abject poverty and human deprivation of the worst kind are left out almost completely.

The minister might want to dispute these figures, but we have a document that comes from the minister's own regional office in Vancouver. It shows the per capita distribution of funds in the region. The document is entitled "Department of Indian Affairs Contribution to Band Councils, 1981-1982". One band in northern British Columbia has received $36 per capita; yet another band received $4,087. There is no norm. There is no rule. There is nothing. There are no guidelines. There are no standards or minimum requirements for community infrastructure. There are Indian villages everywhere in Canada in 1982 which are taking into account such factors as climate and that are infinitely worse off than some of the poorest settlements in the Third World countries. Often they have no electricity or water distribution or even the most basic sanitary facilities. I can take you, Mr. Speaker, to places in my riding where three generations of one family live in one room not bigger than a living room in the average home. They suffer temperatures of 40 degrees below zero with the only source of heat a converted oil drum as a stove. There is no television and no money to buy batteries for the transistor radio.

What does that do to our national pride? Are we the same people who parade around the world promoting North-South dialogue, the champions of the Third World? I make no apologies at all for taking the time of the House today to speak about these problems.

As I said earlier, there are some bands and individuals who have the ears and the attention of the bureaucrats. We heard from the Indian affairs Mafia in British Columbia. Of course, we do not call them that, but some of the Indian people with whom we have come in contact call them that. The interpretation of the word "Mafia" as it relates to the British Columbia Indian region means Members Against the Firing of Indian Agents. We heard in committee of an individual who at one time received a $300,000 loan to start a personal business. The business was not designed to create any employment or jobs. It was a trailer court, his own personal business. An official of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development told the minister right from the outset that this particular loan was intended to be a personal retirement fund for the individual. The loan was made at preferred rates of interest to start the business. When he failed to meet his other obligations and failed to repay the principal and interest under the loan, he was given another $300,000, except this time it was in the form of a gift. The second $300,000 was to help him over the hurdle. My colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King), will elaborate more on this particular case because this money has not helped him over the hurdle at all. He is still in dire need of a further infusion of funds, and the regional director in British Columbia will likely give them to him.

Earlier I said in fairness that the blame must be shared more widely than just by the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his cabinet colleagues. No matter how hard one tried, it would be difficult to create such a disgraceful situation in only 14 years. But this minister deserves a prize, if for nothing else than the selectivity with which he discharges his trust responsibility and his mandate. He is likely to end up being the minister who will preside over the institutionalization of what I call the lesser of the two evils policy.

This policy started with the white paper in 1969, shortly after the proclamation by the Prime Minister of his just society. In terms of any policy for Indians, justice had to be tempered with equality. That meant, as was pointed out in the white paper of 1969, forced assimilation of the ways of our western civilization. Some people would not see too much wrong with that, but to the Indians and Inuit it would mean nothing less than a cultural transformation. Some use stronger words—cultural and religious genocide.

To appreciate fully what that means, one should compare it with a single language policy, for instance, where suddenly either French or English is no longer an official language and where only one language would be compulsory in school. In fact, anyone who understands anything about the culture and spiritual values of aboriginal people, regardless of where in the world they are found, or anyone who has looked at racial integration from a historical perspective, will know that assimilation or integration is not possible unless some of the most fundamental values of one or the other cultures are sacrificed.

Few of us understand much about the culture of our aboriginal people, but we know that it is inextricably tied to nature and all its creatures. Unlike our western civilization which sees as its Christian-Judeo mission to subdue—the earth and to conquer it, the Indian culture is harmonious with nature, and clearly the two cannot co-exist without very special accommodations. This is in part what I meant when I said earlier that the Indian territories and their people are not represented in the House, of course with one exception—the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar).

In fairness, it should be said that those of our colleagues from all sides of the House who serve on the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development not only have a good understanding but also a deep and genuine compassion for the native people they represent. But none of us has walked in a mocassin or can really say what it would be like to accept nature, with all its splendours, with all its generosity but as well its cruelty, as one's spiritual master.

The 1969 policy of forced assimilation, despite consistent denial by the government, is in various stages of implementation even without any constitutional accord which the federal government hopes to get from the provinces in terms of their acquiesence to the forced assimilation strategy. The official land claims policy is an example. The 1980 policy approved by cabinet indicates clearly that settlement means extinguishment of rights and title, that any special rights which may exist are to be surrendered for cash and/or other considerations such as land, and that the people involved will surrender, to become the wards of the provinces within which the settlement takes place.

The James Bay settlement is the result of this policy, and one of my colleagues will speak specifically about it. Suffice it to say that there is no evidence that any provincial government feels in any way obliged to consider or recognize any special rights our aboriginal people may have, or plans to offer any special services commensurate with such rights.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Oberle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I have called this the lesser of the two evils policy. The other option which has been considered and tried from time to time is the isolation policy. Despite its abhorrent nature, it is preferred by some native leaders since it at least guarantees some form of cultural and spiritual integrity or sovereignty. In some other countries such an official policy is called apartheid. Although this policy for all intents and purposes existed in Canada, as far as registered Indians are concerned, right up to 1961 when the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker gave them the right to vote in federal elections, all of us surely must agree that this option deserves no further consideration. However, I sometimes wonder whether we would be so sure about it if our country's population consisted of 85 per cent aboriginal people and 15 per cent whites.

This leaves us to consider whether or not there are any other alternatives. Our native people certainly think so, and we in our party certainly agree with them and would like to listen to them. Even though such other options should have been considered and worked out in the context of the first stages of constitutional reform, we think it is not yet too late. However, we also know that any other options which could lead to a solution will not and cannot emerge from the kinds of meetings which were planned in accordance with the constitutional arrangement.

The provincial governments will not, nor should they be expected to, listen or agree to any proposals which would interfere with their own jealously-guarded jurisdictions and ambitions, particularly if any of the proposals include a form of Indian self-government or Indian autonomy. Naturally, we would never condone the development of a governmental structure which would not conform with our federal system. In other words, we do not see a state within a state as a solution.

I am not as certain, however, as the government appears to be, that it would not be possible to grant an Indian government certain powers and jurisdictions which are similar to the powers and jurisdictions enjoyed by the provinces, particularly when it comes to education and culture. Under such an agreement lands, which I have already identified as being lands belonging to the aboriginal people and held in trust for them, and communities on such lands, might be administered under laws similar to municipal acts of the provinces. This idea has been advanced by some native leaders. While it may need a lot of refinement, it may not be too farfetched, particularly when one considers that it was and will be necessary from time to time to give special consideration to any legitimate concerns and aspirations of other ethnocultural groups in society. It is not so farfetched when one considers that all cultures other than that of our native people, of course, and the languages through which they find expression have their origin somewhere else in the world and are from time to time enriched and replenished from their source. As you know, that is true even for the languages and cultures of the so-called two founding races.

The aboriginal people of Canada have no such outside source. Their home has been this continent for at least 16,000 years. The earth of this continent is their soul. To deprive them of an opportunity to protect their language and to move from a firm cultural base to evolve to meet the challenges of tomorrow is nothing less than genocide.

I personally feel that the natives are not yet ready to enter into the discussions that have been arranged to decide their future once and for all. Furthermore, I see it as an example of this government's stubborn, arrogant and inflexible attitude that the native people may be nothing more than observers at the conference.

I have heard evidence to satisfy me that, at least in British Columbia, responsible native political leaders have been starved out and the department has purchased itself the kind of help from among the Indians who may be prepared to sell out their brothers and sisters for their own selfish gain. They will no doubt be the representatives at the conference. I referred to one such person earlier. If they are the kind of people being groomed to represent the native interests at the conferences, native interests will be doomed for sure.

These are harsh words but I stand by them. Why do you think that the committee unanimously approved the report, including all the Liberal members who served? Regardless of what the minister says about using trickery to achieve a report, they were all there. We spent three weeks writing this report and the words in the report are strong. Why do hon. members think all the members on that committee unanimously approved that report—and agreed that it should be tabled in the House—expressing dismay and condemnation over the way the minister and his regional czars are discharging their trust responsibility?

My colleagues and I will insist that some specific problems which are more like Mafia-type operations—I will not withdraw that word as well—will be redressed without delay. We do not intend to let these matters rest for another year. We will insist that the fifth annual report of the Indian affairs committee be implemented. We will insist on that because the conditions which exist as a result of this government's policies toward our native people are a disgrace and a shame which all Canadians must share.

Mr. Ray Chénier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to express my disappointment and concern with the language of the notice of motion which is now before the House. I would also like to express my disappointment and concern with the language which was used by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) about both the department and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). I believe that some of the inaccuracies which he expressed in his speech today were very well explained to him, but he preferred to use the same tactics that he used in the committee to try to impress upon the Canadian people that we have problems.

The government has long recognized that there are very major outstanding questions, problems and challenges that have to be faced with respect to Canada's aboriginal people. The complexity of these matters is well known to hon. members on both sides of the House. Solutions which governments and aboriginal people seek are not easily attained. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), when he was Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, realized that. In private conversations he has admitted that it is difficult to obtain a consensus.

From the government's perspective, searching for those solutions involves a delicate balance. On the one hand, we need to respond to the need and aspirations of Canada's aboriginal people. On the other hand, we must meet our special obligations and responsibilities as a government in a manner which respects accountability to Parliament for the expenditure of public funds.

Not only are these issues complex in themselves, but the political environment in which governments and aboriginal people must search for solutions is rapidly evolving and is not without its difficulties.

As consitutional discussions have proceeded in recent years, Canada's aboriginal people have articulated more specific views on their present and future place within Canadian society. In some areas the positions presented are extremely difficult to accommodate under Canadian political sturctures and systems. In other areas, aspirations are realizable if government at all levels and Canada's aboriginal peoples can work effectively together.

It is this sense of complexity and challenge that is not reflected in the motion now before us. It is my belief that this government has demonstrated a priority commitment to improving the social and economic conditions of Canada's aboriginal people While it is not possible to move in all major new directions at once, as members on the other side of the House discovered while they were in government, I believe that not only is the commitment of this government apparent but so, too, are the results.

Over the course of the last decade major changes in developing land claims policies and attempting to resolve claims have occurred. Major advances in key program areas such as education, housing, economic development, support of Indian culture and language have also occurred. We have increased government expenditures in all program areas and have done this at a time of fiscal restraint.

The government does recognize that major problems remain outstanding and while the ability to move quickly, particularly in a period of fiscal restraint, is not as great as one would like, the commitment to resolving these issues is demonstrated.

I would like to now focus in more detail on the accomplishments which I believe reflect our commitment on the part of our government. Consider for a moment some of the positive achievements of the last couple of years in programs which deal directly with the priority concerns of native people These achievements demonstrate that in meeting its obligation and commitment to native people the government is making considerable progress.

First, let me suggest that we are making considerable progress in moving toward better definition and protection of the aboriginal and treaty rights of Canada's aboriginal peoples. The new Constitution Act which was proclaimed last April, with great difficulty because of the opposition—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order. That is not so.

Mr. Chénier: —had in its first draft protection for aboriginal people. It was the governments and the premiers of the party represented on that side which had it taken out. We finally got it back in.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is dreadful.

Mr. Chénier: The government is committed to pursue the Phase II conference with determination and good faith. As a matter of fact, the first meeting between the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the three national associations of Canada will take place next Tuesday. This does not mean that we will reach agreement on all issues, but it does mean that we will reach an understanding of native positions. It also means that we will have honest discussions and a clarification of the issues. It does mean that we will make a real effort to reach agreement.

At the Phase II meetings, delegates of native peoples will be seated at the table. They will sit down next to the Prime Minister and the first ministers of the provinces. The agenda will include, to quote Part IV of the Canada Act, "an item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the identification and definition of those peoples to be included in the Constitution of Canada". Let me add that the native leadership commands the respect of all of us for keeping native rights front and centre over the past months.

I would like to suggest that the Canada Act will become a powerful instrument that will help the Indian, Inuit and Métis people achieve their goals in Canadian society. On the one hand, it recognizes aboriginal and treaty rights and thus protects Indian and Inuit identity. On the other hand, it guarantees the rights and freedoms of native people as citizens of Canada.

Second, we are making progress in co-operation with the native people toward eliminating discrimination among men and women in native communities. More than a year ago, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development made it possible for bands to exempt themselves from certain provisions of the Indian Act, namely those which cause women to lose their status if they marry white men and those which cause children to lose their status. At last count, 48 bands had requested the exemption from the discriminatory provisions affecting women and about 270 others asked to be exempted from the double mother clause which affects children's rights. We expect that additional bands will avail themselves of this option in coming months. The government has also clearly indicated its commitment to removing the present discriminatory provisions of the Indian Act following consultations with Canada's aboriginal people.

Third, we are making progress in assisting native communities to strengthen their system of band government. In discussions with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development over the last couple of years, the Indian leadership has expressed the need for establishing self-government at the band level and taking charge of their own financial affairs. They want to transfer to their administration more of the development and delivery of programs.

The minister has supported the native peoples in this objective. In fact, we have been successful in transferring control and the delivery of various programs to Indian bands. By the end of last year, for example, 385 bands across Canada were administering social assistance programs on reserves. In British Columbia, 60 per cent of the regional budget is now administered by Indian organizations. It is the other 40 per cent which is administered by the regional office that did not appear in the figures that were cited by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River and that made the figures appear so abominable.

We are looking at ways and means of strengthening Indian band government in order to enable us to deal more effectively with Indian demands for increased autonomy and still provide a basis for greater social and economic development. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is examining a variety of proposals, including proposals which would enable bands to move out from under the more restrictive provisions of the Indian Act in certain circumstances. Any proposals, of course, will be the subject of consultations with Indian people, and these are going on already.

Now, a few words about education. Since 1980, native people have made tremendous progress towards achieving control of their education system. This is true of both the Inuit and the Indian people. Today, there are three Indian and Inuit schoolboards at the provincial level. Two were created following the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement. In nine provinces and in the two territories, 58 cultural centres are now being managed by Indians and Inuit. School enrolment in Indian communities has made considerable progress at all levels. There are now 157 schools serving 10,000 students, and it is expected that enrolment will increase to 20,000 by 1986. The most impressive gains have been made in post-secondary education, both in the vocational sector and the post-secondary programs. In 1969, for instance, 800 Indians were enrolled in post-secondary programs, while by the end of last year, their number had increased to 6,000.

I shall now mention some of our achievements in the field of economic development. Considering our objective to have certain areas of federal jurisdiction revert to native peoples, we have stressed community-based rather than large-scale development projects, with a view to responding to the desire for increased autonomy expressed by native peoples. Among these projects, to name only a few, I would mention the wild rice project in Ontario and the caribou management program in northern Saskatchewan, northern Manitoba and the Northwest Territories which was finalized about two weeks ago.

We have started creating jobs at the community and reserve levels, but much remains to be done. For instance, the department's Ontario regional office provides counselling for Indian businessmen and local projects, a program that has helped to stimulate job creation and to safeguard existing jobs. In last November's budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) mentioned additional funds totalling several million dollars which will be used for economic development in native communities. These funds are in addition to funds already allocated. Last year, for instance, we set aside $8 million to ensure that we would not have to turn down valid economic development projects because of lack of funds. Once again, these are supplementary funds. In addition, $5 million was earmarked to help Indians take advantage of the opportunities offered by large resource developments. In a period of budgetary restraint, I think the House will agree that the amounts involved are impressive. These figures and the new approaches involved clearly demonstrate that the government is prepared to meet its commitment to improve the economic and social status of native peoples.

The Norman Wells project should illustrate the truth of this statement to everyone's satisfaction. In this particular development, our concern is both with protecting the environment and protecting the future of native communities. We have insisted that the entire population, and especially native people, be able to obtain jobs and participate in the project on a partnership basis. Over $20 million have been spent on these programs which include providing technical and general training to help native people find jobs, either in the oil fields or on pipeline construction sites. As work progresses, at least 240 jobs and business opportunities estimated at more than $100 million will be made available to the local population. In addition, native people associations will be able to take part in joint ventures. With the skills and experience acquired as workers or entrepreneurs, native people will be able to start similar projects.

The two-year waiting period set for Norman Wells can and must be used to good advantage. During this period, we shall be able to establish training programs and give Indians and other people a chance to prepare for future opportunities for employment and subcontracting. Thus, the communities involved will have ample time to adjust to the situation.

The House will be pleased to know that the project has been enthusiastically received by the Indian people, the territorial government and business groups.

[English]

In consultation with Indian bands, we are progressing in establishing joint ventures in major capital projects such as schools, health clinics, band administration buildings and so on. Such ventures will enable band councils to be rightly involved in all aspects of a capital project on their reserve, from the design of a construction to the actual day-by-day operations. Furthermore, the joint venture guidelines that we are developing will also guarantee jobs, training opportunities and related economic developments at the band level.

• (1620)

Over the last two years the minister has met with native people and their leaders in all the regions of Canada on land claims. I believe that the actions that the minister and the department have taken reflect the concerns of native people with respect to claims. The vast majority of Canadians, I believe, would agree that the land claims have been left unresolved for too long. We are responding to that view in a positive way.

I hope that in Manitoba, for instance, where I am involved in land claims, the new provincial government will not have the attitude of the previous Progressive Conservative government that was not interested even in beginning negotiations on land claims.

Mr. Kempling: That is not true. It is typical bilge, garbage.

Mr. Chénier: We are responding to that view in a positive way. The government is committed to reaching a settlement of all legitimate claims on the basis of fairness as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chénier: The members on the other side, Mr. Speaker, seem to hurt a little bit today. The moment they hear "PC government" they get sick.

Mr. Kempling: We want the truth. We do not trust the Grits.

Mr. Chénier: As proof of our resolve, we now have in place negotiators who are working to bring the major claims to a conclusion, and we have allocated funds to support native organizations in their research, preparation and negotiations.

Recently the minister participated, along with the Hon. Allan Williams, the attorney general of British Columbia, in the signing of an accord with the Penticton band. Under this agreement, the band will receive $14 million and the return of some 12,000 acres of land that was severed from their reserve in 1916. This agreement should be regarded as a milestone—

An hon. Member: It took 70 years.

Mr. Chénier: Sure it took us 70 years, but we did it. What did the opposition do when it was in government? How many claims were resolved? None. Six months?

Mr. Taylor: You did one in 60 years, for one band.

Mr. Chénier: We settled most of the claims in Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. We have settled some in the maritime provinces. We have settled some in British Columbia. The hon. member should check his facts.

Mr. Taylor: What about Alberta?

Mr. Chénier: In addition, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) recently participated in the signing of an agreement with the Wagmatcook band for loss of reserve lands dating back to confederation. Once again the government is clearly demonstrating its determination to deal fairly and to settle long-standing grievances. This commitment is based on policies on specific and comprehensive claims which have been reconfirmed and inscribed in two recent DIAND publications, "In All Fairness" and "Outstanding Business".

Just two months ago the minister, together with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), jointly announced a new program for fighting native alcohol and drug abuse. It was backed by a commitment of $154 million. This will be a permanently funded program to support native peoples in their efforts to prevent and treat these problems in their own communities. The successful implementation of the program will depend on the development of community-based projects which they will initiate and administer. Nearly all reserves will be involved in the program; the number of treatment centres will increase from eight, under the present program, to 30, and the number of in-patient beds will increase from 140 to 730. It will be operated with the assistance of 800 trained native therapists and helpers.

In February I participated on behalf of the minister, along with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), is signing the Canada-Manitoba Indian child welfare agreement. The Indian signatory was the Four Nations Confederacy. The agreement is a major advance in devolving responsibility in the field of child welfare to the native communities. This agreement will create 53 permanent jobs at the reserve level and will cost $14 million over a five-year period. This landmark agreement, the very first in Canada, delegates powers to Indian child care authorities and band governments in Manitoba who now have the resources to deal with this new responsibility.

These are some of the achievements, Mr. Speaker, of the last year or two to which all Canadians can point with pride. They are the result of the determination on the part of the federal government to deal with Indian communities in a fair and equitable manner, and to assist Indians, individually and as communities, to achieve self-reliance. They are equally the result of the determination on the part of native people to control their own destiny.

It is with this type of progress that the government has demonstrated, and continues to demonstrate, its will and support to working co-operatively with the aboriginal peoples of Canada. Together we can and will effect major changes and resolve outstanding problems. Not only is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development specifically, and the government, doing their utmost to discharge their obligations and responsibilities, but in many areas federal programs and approaches go significantly further than those required as a matter of legal responsibility and obligation.

It is also because of this progress that I view with real disappointment the wording of the motion before the House. There is no doubt that much remains to be done. For further progress to be made, the co-operation of all members of this House—individually and through established vehicles such as the standing committee, as well as other levels of government working co-operatively with Canada's aboriginal peoples—is required. I call on all members to demonstrate their co-operation and I especially would like to see some members of the official opposition, rather than trying to obstruct, trying to offer real co-operation, so that we can resolve these problems as fast as we can.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Montréal-Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette)—Criminal Code—Request for severer provisions against prostitution; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Administration of Justice—(a) Role of parole board officer. (b) Nature of supervision; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Canadian National Railways—(a) Announcement of lay-offs. (b) Notification of unions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CANADA'S ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Schellenberger:

That this House condemns the government, and in particular, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, for its failure to meet any of the objectives for which the government continues to seek authority to spend in excess of one billion dollars in this fiscal year on behalf of Canada's aboriginal peoples, for its tolerance of the miserable conditions existing in native communities throughout Canada which are of a standard vastly inferior to those found in most Third World countries, for the minister's failure to exercise his obligatory trust responsibility, and for the minister's contempt of Parliament as manifested by his deliberate refusal to comply with the statutory obligations which legally require him to report to the House on the progress of the implementation of the James Bay agreement.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this important topic of the wellbeing of the Indian people of Canada and also to look at some of the conduct of the Department of Indian affairs.

This topic is important perhaps for two basic and fundamental reasons. First of all, our government is spending over $1 billion supposedly for the wellbeing of the Indian people of Canada. I believe that neither the Canadian people in general nor the Indian people in particular are getting their money's worth for that $1 billion. We spend $1 billion to perpetuate an inflated bureaucracy in the Department of Indian Affairs and the depressed and depressing economy of poverty and despair in most Indian communities. As the watchdog over the public treasury, this House must be concerned.

Second, this topic is important, Mr. Speaker, for perhaps a more basic and fundamental reason, but a reason which it is harder to define. It concerns who we are as a people and how we see ourselves as a people. Perhaps it would help us at this time if we contrast our vision of Canada with the way in which one writer saw Argentina over the last decade. V. S. Naipaul, in "The Return of Eva Peron", writes of "A simple history of Indian genocide and European take-over". The author says:

There is as yet in Argentina no myth of the noble Indian. The memory of the genocide is too close; it is still something to be dismissed in a line or two in the annals. In Argentina, the detestation of the vanished Pampa Indian is instinctive and total. The Argentine terror is that people in other countries might think of Argentina as an Indian country—

Land in Argentina . . . is still only a commodity. It is an investment, a hedge against inflation. It can be alienated without heartache.

I believe that Canadians want a different relationship with the Indian people and with the land from what Naipaul saw in Argentina. Perhaps some people over-romanticize it, but the fact is that Indian, Inuit and Métis people do have a close relationship with the land. It is a relationship others of us have lost but still recognize as important. On this basis we see that aboriginal people and their wellbeing are of vital importance to the Canadian psyche.

• (1630)

In Canada, from at least the time of the Royal proclamation of George III, we have always recognized that Indian people had a special and unique status. However inadequately we recognize this status both in the BNA Act and in the recently proclaimed Canada Act, it is there. Often the government of the day has been uncomfortable with special status and has sought to eliminate it by some program of assimilation. The Indian people have suffered under the treatment they have received, but they have stubbornly refused to be assimilated into a non-Indian society. They see remaining Indian as being something very basic to their lives. They have held to some vision of themselves as a separate and unique people who have a special role and a special place in our world.

We have neglected the Indian people. We have seen them die of European diseases. We have alienated their children from their parents, their communities, their language and their culture. We have tried to destroy traditional Indian religions and their political institutions. We have subjected them to alien laws in a colonial-type bureaucracy. Although some of our policies may have been genocidal in their results, we have always maintained that we have worked for the best interests of the Indian people. Perhaps we did but, strangely enough, in the process we ended up with most of the Indian land! In the process of working for what we said were the best interests of the Indian people, we destroyed the base of the Indian economy and left the Indians dependent on our generosity—our welfare payments.

The way we allow Indian people to live says a great deal about what kind of people we are. At present when our economy is in such a shambles some people might be tempted to deny or ignore the needs of Indians because we have many other problems in Canada. Nearly two million people are unemployed. There are no jobs for the young people coming out of our high schools this week and next week. The value of our dollar is sinking, interest rates are rising and there is a growing number of bankruptcies.

With these difficulties it might be easy to forget about such issues as aboriginal and treaty rights, land claims, decent housing, water and sewage on reserves, economic development for Indian people or ending discrimination against Indian women. However, there are two reasons why we cannot do that. First, we have a debt of honour to the Indian people. I do not believe we will want to say to them that we have gone morally bankrupt. We have a debt of honour, and I believe we must meet it. Second, it is important that we recognize that Indian people themselves are part of the total Canadian economy, and if we give them the means for economic development in their own communities and if we make available to them proper funds for housing and infrastructure, this money will circulate in the Canadian economy and help all of us. What we cannot afford is to perpetuate a welfare economy, so I emphasize the importance of this debate this afternoon.

In our Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development there is usually a relatively non-partisan spirit, and I must say I was pleased and impressed when the government members of that committee agreed to the fifth report. On the other hand, I cannot see how government members could have opposed it in good conscience, after they and the rest of us heard the testimony of Indian people from across the country about the conditions they face. In a non-partisan way the fifth report says exactly the same thing as this motion does with perhaps more loaded language. I look forward to the participation of other government members in today's debate because the fifth report of the standing committee, which was accepted by the House, has a real message for the minister and for the cabinet from all members of that committee, Liberals, Conservatives and New Democrats alike. We hope the minister will hear that message and act on it.

There are three basic issues with which we need to deal this afternoon. First, there is a need for Indian people to be involved in the budgetary process. Second, there is a need for greater funding for the Indian people. Third, there is a need for dismantling the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Let us look at these in order.

First, the Indian people must be involved in the budgetary process. It is a very frustrating experience for Indian bands to have to be accountable to the department but to have no participation in saying how funds are to be allocated. It is a very frustrating experience when a band such as the Cowichan band is not able to get any indication of what the target figures for its budget will be and then, in the middle of March, to be told that because their budget will exceed $3 million and because of changing Treasury Board requirements, they will now have to submit a Treasury Board application before their budget can be approved. They are told this about two weeks before the end of the fiscal year. It is a very frustrating experience for people such as the Oweekano band, who have expressed their concerns in a letter as follows:

> Our initial comments regarding this morning's meeting are not complimentary to say the least. We must voice our dissatisfaction with your process of negotiations where we are required to merely jot down those allocations you have decided we should get. We came away from the meeting thoroughly frustrated with the way in which small and isolated Bands are dealt with including ours.

Large bands are told two weeks before the deadline that they have to submit Treasury Board applications for their budgets. Small bands are called in, the so-called process of consultation involves having them jot down which items are approved, and that is that.

Then there is the problem that even after a budget has been approved and even when Indian bands are punctual in getting their quarterly reports in, the department is very lax in getting moneys out. Our committee heard testimony from the Neskainlith band in British Columbia that because of delays in the payment of funds which were included in the budget, that band has had to pay something like $10,000 to $12,000 a year in interest.

We are hearing some rather despairing cries from the banks these days about their profits, but I do not think it is really in the interests of the Canadian people that the department should be so slow in making payments to Indian bands that they are having to pay interest in order to maintain some line of credit at the banks. It is absolutely essential that the Indian people be involved in the budgetary process from the very beginning and not simply be called in at the end and told what there might be.

Second, I would like to speak about the lack of funds for identified needs. One of the reasons for the present crisis in funding is probably due to the success of one of the programs of the government. Over the last several years the government has adopted a policy of devolving administrative responsibility to the Indian people, and during that time the leaders of the Indian people have developed considerable expertise in identifying the needs of their people. It is no longer a matter of their simply accepting what the Indian agents give them. They have developed an expertise in identifying their needs but they find that the money to take care of those needs is not available.

We used to expect Indian people to get by in poverty after we had taken away the base of their economy. Today we are making promises and we expect them to get by on those, even when they are not kept. I should like to put a few examples on the record, Mr. Speaker.

A few years ago Indian students were given a spending allowance of $10 per week. In spite of the fact that inflation has cut away at the dollar and that everyone else is getting more money, Indian students are still expected to get by on that amount of spending money. Sometimes it makes the difference between whether they are able to attend school away from home or not. It we are concerned about Indian education—and we all claim to be—then we should ensure that students receive enough spending money.

I was pleased to hear the minister say in the House yesterday that he is engaged in the process of revising upwards the standards for Indian schools. Ten years ago standards were set for Indian schools but then the department decided that they were too high and reduced them. In most provinces today the federal standard for Indian schools is below that of the provinces. I was pleased to hear that the minister is going to take action on that matter and will watch closely to see what is done about it.

A program called the infant stimulation program was shared by five bands on Vancouver Island. Initially this program received funding for the training of young Indian people so that they could work with parents and pre-school children. For three years it received funds from the community development program on a declining basis and no other federal department has taken up the slack. This was a very good program and now it is threatened because of lack of funds.

The Union of New Brunswick Indians has brought to our attention many times its concern about the termination of the community development hot lunch program for children. This is not limited to Indian children. When there is a lack of money in the home children are often sent to school hungry. The hot lunch program was an attempt to provide basic nutrition for them because it is recognized that children cannot learn on an empty stomach. Money for the hot lunch program did not come through, however.

In Mission, British Columbia, the residential school of St. Mary's is facing budget cuts. This will mean a decrease of ten in the number of staff and of 35 in the number of students. Many of these students come from broken homes or isolated communities or communities where there is not adequate housing. This residence should be maintained until there is something to take its place.

Recreation budgets have not been maintained. That might seem to be a small thing to a departmental official but for the Indian people recreation and sports are one way in which they can develop a sense of confidence and pride in themselves. The budget for these items should not be cut at this time.

On many occasions the government has announced that $345 million is available for economic development over the next few years. That money has been promised but so far we have not seen any of it. No mechanism has been developed in consultation with the Indian people to allocate the money to the Indian, Métis and Inuit people.

When we visit Indian villages we see how the people suffer because their housing lacks adequate sewer and water facilities. I visited the Penelakut village in my own constituency and there I saw plastic pipes bringing the water supply up to the porch of a house. That was the extent of the running water. Side by side with the water pipes were other plastic pipes for the disposal of sewage. Both pipes were leaking, Mr. Speaker. This is the kind of situation that prevails in those communities. It is very depressing for someone from the outside but for the people of the village it is life threatening. In many Indian villages the people live on the verge of serious epidemics. We have heard testimony about this from the Cree of James Bay. We have to take action, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to make a few short comments about the work of the department. The employees are demoralized. They are not bad people, Mr. Speaker, but the system is wrong. The Indian people want the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to get off their backs.

The government should immediately begin the process of involving the Indian people in the budgetary process from the beginning. An acceptable method must be found for the aboriginal peoples to have control over the $70 million economic development fund—which is eventually supposed to total $345 million.

The fifth report of the committee asked that a special capital fund be set up for the infrastructure for housing, sewage and water supplies. We ask that the report on the implementation of the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement be tabled immediately and that the Tait report on this agreement be tabled and funds provided. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I urge that supplementary estimates be provided to meet the needs of the Indian people and that action be taken to decrease the size of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak in this debate on an opposition motion. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) who opened the debate referred to the surprise that some people might feel at having a debate on this subject today. I believe he referred to the fact that the subject is close to the heart of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that is, involvement in the North-South dialogue. I agree with the hon. member because I too have that feeling.

One of the reasons I have enjoyed my work on the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development is that I happen to be one of the few members of that committee whose riding does not have an Indian band. There are several all around my riding, however. As a matter of fact, a number of Indian young people attend one of the secondary schools in London West.

I want to talk about some of the advances in education which have taken place for Indian students as a direct result of government involvement over the years. Already it has been stated that there is a non-partisan feeling on the part of the standing committee when we meet, and I would agree with that. That is why I was rather discouraged and disheartened when I heard some of the words expressed earlier by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River. That certainly was not the feeling expressed during many of the hearings. As a matter of fact, I had the feeling when we met with many Indian bands and band councils over many weeks that while many problems do exist there is a respect held for the current Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) by many of those groups and there is a definite spirit of co-operation between the native peoples and the minister. I think that has to be said and underlined because it came through very loud and clear in many of our hearings.

I would like to take one objection to references by the previous speaker to the fifth report of the standing committee as coinciding fully with the opposition motion. I reject that observation. While there certainly are areas of criticism in the fifth report, it does not coincide with the entire wording of the motion up for debate today. I seems clear that the motion, when it speaks of the government failing to meet any of its objectives in respect of programs designed to afford development of Indian people in this country, overlooks some very obvious steps which have been taken—and I stress this—in concert with the Indian peoples themselves. This is particularly true in the matter of Indian education. As I earlier mentioned, many of the Indian young people in southwestern Ontario come into my riding for education, and that is why I want to comment on this area this afternoon.

In addressing this topic, I believe it would be useful, Mr. Speaker, to outline the relationship of changes in specific educational programs to the fundamental changes we have seen coming to fruition in the last decade of Indian education in this country. If we go back to the early days of Indian education, we see that from about 1850 schooling for Canadian Indian children was segregated in order to be protective. This derived from the government's view of the social climates of the growing immigrant communities as being potentially injurious to the welfare of Indian groups. The dark side of this residential schooling for Indian children has been well documented; the enforced separation of children from families and devaluing of the Indian culture and languages involved. The large majority of Indian children, in the years from confederation to about 1950, were educated in residential schools on reserve lands. During this period, however, a small but significant number of Indian people were able to achieve high academic levels.

Following World War II, raised public consciousness of human rights and race relations as well as representations from Indian people caused a change in education policy. During the 1960s, following some consideration of the condition of native minority groups and at the urging of some Indian leaders, the federal government moved towards encouraging the participation of Indian youth in provincial education systems. As part of that movement, the government introduced special programs designed to support financially the integration of Indian students in provincial schools. These included school supplies, travel, personal and other miscellaneous allowances. The government was addressing directly the priorities of Indian school development as they were perceived at that time.

As many hon. members are aware, however, Mr. Speaker, the work of the standing committee and the National Indian Brotherhood brought about a changed government posture which, in 1973, acknowledged that Indian education, like that provided for their fellow citizens, should defer to the principles of local control and parental responsibility. Indian control is not, of course, restricted to band-administered schools. Even within provincial jurisdictions where Indian control is admittedly more difficult to achieve, mechanisms for enabling greater involvement of Indian people in education are being developed.

In the last decade, reflecting the social advances of Indian people generally, we have seen some significant trends in Indian education as communities have asserted their influence on administration, curriculum content, teacher training and other critical segments of the system. The impact of both Indian and the department's initiatives has also been felt within provincial jurisdictions with provincial departments of education moving towards greater recognition of native Canadian cultural realities in schooling generally.

An important indicator of the place of Indian cultures in Canadian curricula is the fact that over 32,000 out of over 73,000 Indian students study native languages in federal, provincial and band-operated schools. Significant progress has been made in increasing Indian involvement in all aspects of eduction. In 1970, about 200 Indian school committees had some, generally minor, responsibility for education programming. However, by 1980 three Indian or Inuit school boards had been created under provincial law: the Nishgas of B.C. and the Cree and Kativik school boards of northern Quebec; 450 of the 573 bands are administering all or parts of their programs. There are also 137 band-operated on-reserve schools. There are band-administered education budgets, including post-secondary and student residences. These have grown to almost $110 million from about $7 million in the early 1970s. The percentage of Indian administrators and teachers in federal schools has grown to 30 per cent.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that policy and programming changes and, most importantly, the increased decision-making role of Indian authorities have necessitated the addition or elimination of various programs as priorities change with changing circumstances. Local control has naturally resulted in greater attention being focused on the resources required to continue to improve the quality of on-reserve educational services. Inevitably, reallocation of budgets based on departmental and band education authority reviews of priorities lead to decreases in, or the discontinuation of, certain discretionary programs. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is realistic to allude to this management process of redefining priorities and reallocating available resources as "cutbacks" if at the same time we are increasing our over-all expenditures on the education operations and maintenance budget, which in 1980-81 amounted to over $278 million.

It should be noted, as well, Mr. Speaker, that the department is limited by the Indian Act in responding to requests for educational services to Indian elementary and secondary students. While the federal government affirms its special relationship with Indian people, it is clear that those residing off reserves are fully entitled to all those services available to other provincial citizens, since both groups have the same obligations to their provincial administrations in terms of contributing as taxpayers.

Let me briefly address the question of how tuition agreements relate to the principle of Indian control. This is of primary concern, especially in light of the fact that in 1980-81 about 53 per cent of Indian elementary and secondary school students resident on reserves or Crown lands attended schools under provincial jurisdiction. In the same year, band education authorities controlled 26 per cent of the tuition fees paid to provincial agencies. It has been projected that in 1981-82 over 41,000 reserve or Crown land residents attended provincial schools at a total cost, excluding capital, of $145.1 million.

• (1700)

The jurisdictional situation makes the negotiating and administration of tuition agreements quite complex. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development operates within a context influenced by Indian government, the minister's responsibilities under the Indian Act and the constitutional powers assigned to the provinces. The reality of provincial jurisdiction has necessitated differing approaches to the development of tuition agreements, with the most important variable being the extent to which Indian education authorities participate in the process. This varies from Indian operation of provincial school boards to parents having only the status of visitors in schools.

Where Indian people have opted to make use of provincial educational services, the department sees a primary responsibility of the provincial authority as being the encouragement of Indian involvement in the design, delivery, administration, control, review and evaluation of provincial education programs. In such situations the role of band education authorities is considered to include representing the interest of Indian parents and communities; negotiating federal and provincial service agreements; managing education budgets; accounting for results to parents and the community generally.

The department sees its present role in this matter as being twofold. First, there will be continuing emphasis on co-operating with regional Indian associations and bands in seeking the enactment of provincial legislation to increase Indian representation on education decision-making bodies. Second, at the local level, department staff will continue to support Indian initiatives which aim at achieving more meaningful participation of Indian parents in determining the nature of programming in provincial schools.

At the same time, as I mentioned a few moments ago, there have been significant advances in the post-secondary education program for Indians and Inuit which has been specifically developed by the department. During the 1970s, as education and particularly post-secondary education became for Indians the single most important means of improving their standard of living and providing opportunity for intellectual, social and cultural development, departmental programs were evolved and developed to give full measure to those aspirations. Greater access to post-secondary education resulted in a near 100 per cent graduate employment, a teaching staff for Indian schools which is almost 30 per cent Indian, significant increases in the numbers of Indian lawyers, social workers, nurses, administrators and managers.

The Indian graduates have assumed lead roles in the development of band government and Indian politics. It was our opportunity as members of the standing committee to meet many of these individuals as they presented themselves on behalf of the various bands and councils throughout this country. Indian graduates have become models to inspire younger generations and they symbolize the turn-around from drop-out schooling to a contemporary student retrieval thrust spearheaded by active Indian educational leadership. Indian educators in curriculum development work and through cultural education centres have revitalized Indian languages and culture so that Indian people now have the opportunity to regain the pride in their Indian identity. These factors have led to a very rapidly expanding program in terms of enrolments, graduations, and expenditures.

For example, the post-secondary education of Indians has been the prime force in the establishment of the Saskatchewan Indian Federated College of the University of Regina, the Blue Quills post-secondary centre of Alberta and the establishment of university native studies programs in every province, the beginning of an Indian business management training network, and other initiatives, all of which point to the Canadian Indian community being poised for a new and prosperous era in the twenty first century.

Almost ten years ago, Mr. Speaker, the then minister of Indian affairs, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), in addressing the council of ministers of education, spoke of the joint obligation of the provinces and the federal government to respond to the need to improve Indian education by ensuring parental involvement, developing appropriate curricula, expanding teacher training requirements and encouraging Indians to enter the profession as well as meeting the demand for teacher aids.

We have today good solid indicators in the federal, provincial and band-controlled education systems that these ideas have been and continue to be valued and respected. The federal government's role has changed visibly over these years as the Indian people have assumed more of their rightful role in educating their children. Recognizing the role formal education plays in cultural continuity, the federal government will continue to support the Indian people in their efforts to achieve their goals in this most fundamental aspect of human endeavour. I think it was as late as yesterday, in answer to a question from a member of the New Democratic Party, that the Minister of Indian Affairs referred to a particular situation dealing with the building of a school where he gave his support to this matter.

I want to reiterate in closing that this federal government will continue to support the Indian people in all aspects of education so that they may develop their own wherewithal in achieving their goals in this most fundamental aspect of human endeavour.

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that in trying times those already in difficulty get hit the hardest. As this recession deepens it is evident that many of our native people are suffering more than usual. My colleague, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), has, I think, laid out very clearly the foundation to what is happening to the Indian community or, more importantly, what is not happening to our native people.

The inaction of this government, the false promises of the minister, and the inertia and callousness of a huge and insensitive bureaucracy, are grinding many of Canada's native people into the dust. The Third World conditions endured by native people across this land are well documented by groups who come before hearings of the standing committee. Unbelievable and disgraceful stories of pain, suffering and betrayal often unfold before us. By and large, Canadians are unaware of these conditions, but any member of the standing committee who has listened day in and day out, month after month and year after year, is well aware of these terrible situations. How any government can go on year after year and not get to the root of the problems and solve them is beyond comprehension.

What is interesting to me is that we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who travels the world advising Third World countries on how to deal with their problems, while in our own country, and in his own province of Quebec, conditions exist that are on a par with any in the Third World.

Let me give a very recent example of some things that have just happened in Quebec. I refer to a report in the Montreal Gazette for June 12, 1982. The first part of the story deals with a young Indian couple with a one-month old baby. They took the sick child to see a nurse in a nearby community. The nurse gave the baby a very cursory examination and told the couple to take the child home. That night the baby died. This young couple went to bury the baby on the reserve. As they were doing this, provincial police landed in a helicopter. They took the baby away and told this couple that they were not allowed to bury the child because there was no death certificate. A month later the police returned the child in a carnation milk carton to the parents. There was no explanation whatsoever about what had happened.

Mr. Oberle: And this is Canada in 1982.

Mr. Greenaway: I shall quote one sentence from the newspaper article in the Montreal Gazette. It reads:

It's commonplace, Savard says, for the bodies of Indian children to be returned to their parents in pieces, in green plastic garbage bags or in boxes.

• (1710)

That is Canada, that is Quebec, in 1982. We have 74 members sitting across from us who come from Quebec, yet some of the worst horror stories which were told before the standing committee came out of that province. I cannot understand the Prime Minister letting these kinds of things happen in his own province. I talked with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) about this particular situation, and she assured me that it was true. Also she assured me that she would investigate it and do her best to ensure that it did not happen again. These were the kinds of situations about which we heard time and time again. It is just completely unacceptable.

An important part of the motion before us today deals with the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement. The last part of the motion reads:

—and for the minister's contempt of Parliament as manifested by his deliberate refusal to comply with the statutory obligations which legally require him to report to the House on the progress of the implementation of the James Bay agreement.

Before getting into the James Bay agreement in detail and that particular problem, let me explain how the agreement came about and what it entailed. It was signed on November 11, 1975. It is a 454-page agreement full of promises to the Indian and Inuit people of northern Quebec. It is a contract signed by two governments, the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada. Also it was signed by the Cree and Inuit people of northern Quebec. It promised that, in exchange for about half the land mass of Quebec and for $225 million over a period of 20 years, the Indians and the Inuit would give up their aboriginal title to a land mass which was their home for centuries and centuries. In return for this, aside from the cash settlement of which they only receive a bit every year, they were promised improved government services, the allotment of 5,000 square miles of land, limited autonomy for the Cree and Inuit, and many other specific things. For instance, they were promised improved health care, better housing, community infrastructures such as sewer and water, air strips, improved educational facilities, roads, fire protection and many more things. They were also promised, because they were so far behind and in such bad shape, that there would be a catch-up and a continuation of the programs received by native people across the country. For all this they gave up their aboriginal title. Five years later, by August, 1980, it was a certainty that the agreement was not working.

The Cree and Inuit people appeared before the standing committee in the spring of 1981 with a litany of financial and social complaints, such as the death of children. Situations were documented by very respected doctors from the Montreal General Hospital. One such report was given to us by Dr. Gary Pekeles, a highly respected pediatrician at the Montreal General Hospital. I should like to quote a few lines from his report on April 16, 1981:

The purpose of this report is to describe an epidemic of infantile gastroenteritis among the native population of the Hudson Bay and James Bay regions of Quebec that occurred in the spring and summer of 1980. This disease affected many children under two years in the villages in this region. In several villages a majority of such children became ill. At least 80 children were hospitalized because of it, many with long and complicated courses; almost half required transfer to children's hospitals in Montreal. At least seven children died with gastroenteritis. This occurred in a region that certainly has less than 1,000 children under two years old.

We heard testimony from one community at Rupert House where the raw sewage from the local medical clinic was being discharged upstream from the native people's water supply. This community experienced an outbreak of gastroenteritis among its population. It was just an endless cycle—the children went to hospital, sewage was discharged in the river above the water intake, and around and around it went. We were told in committee that this would be looked after by a representative of the Quebec department of health and welfare. Several months later when the minister visited the community to look at the situation, he found, much to his dismay and to our disgust, that it had not been dealt with. It has been dealt with since. That is the type of story we heard in the committee hearings.

During all these health problems which the Cree and Inuit were having, the federal Department of National Health and Welfare decided to pull out of the area, to take out all its health support services because it misread the act. What was supposed to happen is that when the Cree and Inuit were ready to take over their health services, the federal government was to withdraw. But reading between the lines of the agreement, it withdrew and left the native people high and dry.

What has this led to? Since the Indian people have not received any help in the area of health, they have been required to spend money that was to go into such things as economic development on health, welfare, sewage and water systems which were supposed to be provided by the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec. It was well summed up in testimony before the committee by Grand Chief Billy Diamond, when he stated:

It is true that the Crees have received compensation moneys. However, these compensation moneys were in partial exchange for their aboriginal rights and were to be used as basic heritage funds for future generations of the Cree people. This was unquestionably recognized by both the governments and the Crees during the negotiations and at the time of signing of the agreement. What has instead resulted is that the Crees, because of the critical health and sanitation problems and dramatic absence of accommodation and infrastructures in the Cree communities, have been forced to spend over one-quarter of their compensation revenues on housing and infrastructure.

The committee, on hearing this, was so outraged that it did something it had never done before. It drafted a report which was attached to the estimates report tabled in the House. It asked the minister to take immediate action. The action which the minister took was to appoint a commissioner to go up there to look over the entire situation. He was to return with a report and recommendations which would go before cabinet. Last fall he returned with an 87-page report which documented most of the situations in the area. Some time in January the report was put before cabinet, but we are still awaiting a decision.

Approximately 11,000 people in the area have been waiting since 1975 for justice. A safeguard in the act was the fact that the minister was to report to the House 60 days after January 1 of every year. The last time we had a report was March 31, 1980. These reports should emphasize the problems with the implementation of the agreement. There is probably no way the minister could submit a report, because it would document all kinds of terrible situations and it would be an embarrassment to the government.

The fact that the minister is legally supposed to table reports and has not done so for two years put him in contempt of Parliament. This was brought to the attention of the Speaker last year by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River on a question of privilege. The Speaker ruled that there is no way she can sanction a minister's action or make him accountable. She said we would have to find other recourse. There does not seem to be any other recourse to make this minister responsible to Parliament. Maybe it will have to be public recourse.

Nothing happened after we heard this terrible story a year ago last spring. The Cree and the Inuit returned this spring with more of the same stories, most of them even worse. The Inuit told us about the great inadequacies of the education system in their area where 1,500 or 1,600 children can only go as far as grade eight. In many communities there are no opportunities to go to school at all. Sometimes school is held in small shacks.

Housing standards are completely unacceptable and hundreds of new houses are needed. We have heard stories of contaminated water and children who are still becoming sick. Tuberculosis is still raging in the area. A year ago I brought to the attention of the House the fact that there was T.B. in the area but virtually nothing has been done about it. Chief Diamond told us at the hearings a month ago that since we heard from him last year his wife has contracted T.B. I would like to quote a small sentence about the problem to let you know how bad it is. A Mr. Therien, a research agent from the community health department of the University of Laval, testified as follows:

Active or reactivated cases on the Hudson coast. The problem has been more or less eradicated in the Ungava Bay area, although there are, to my knowledge, one or two cases at present.

Before that he said:

There is a T.B. problem on the Hudson coast. To my knowledge, there are about 30 to 40 active or reactivated cases prevalent right now.

It is commonly known that tuberculosis is a symptom of very poor health conditions. It is a Third World disease and should not be acceptable in this day and age in Canada.

When the Inuit delegation came before us they even added a new dimension to their disturbing testimony. They told us of double standards where white people who came to work in their communities were put in good houses with running water and sewage systems while the native people had to live in shacks, many times with two to three families in small 14 by 18 rooms. Interestingly enough, just to illustrate the attitude of the department in its implementation of this act, I found out today that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has launched a legal suit in Québec City against the James Bay Cree, and the school board in particular, for failure to pay their electrical bills. The Cree have launched a counter-suit against the department for not fulfilling its obligation to pay for the board of students who go out of the area to attend school.

This is an example of what is happening. An act was passed which was intended to prevent all this from happening. It was supposed to provide schooling, health care, housing, fire protection and air strips. I suggest that it is unacceptable for all of this to occur.

Last week i received a letter from a law firm which represents the Inuit people. I quote from it:

On behalf of the northern Quebec Inuit, and, in particular, Mrs. Mary Simon, president of Makivik Corporation—

And he mentions other people.

—I wish to express our thanks for your continued interest in the implementation of the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement and for your support for federal measures which would ensure its implementation.

While disappointment was expressed concerning the small turnout of members at the appearance by the northern Quebec Inuit on May 19, the importance of the standing committee's role in the review process is readily acknowledged.

We would, therefore, again urge that the Committee make the strongest possible intervention at this time in light of the testimony by northern Quebec Inuit and the James Bay Crees concerning conditions in their communities resulting directly from the lack of implementation of the letter and spirit of Canada's obligations under the agreement.

This agreement was supposed to be a landmark agreement which would set the stage for all the land settlements across the country. It has not done that. Instead, it will make it more difficult to settle land claims.

Hon. members have heard my colleague from Prince George-Peace River refer to the standing committee hearings in Vancouver last month. As an illustration of how the department works, evidently some of the native organizations which appeared before us gave testimony about the department that was rather derogatory and have had their funding cut by as much as 30 per cent or more since those hearings. That was to keep them in line. I find that completely unacceptable.

I have spoken of the situation in Quebec but the same problems are rampant in my own province. Time and again I have drawn to the attention of the minister and the bureaucrats the problems of the Mount Currie band in my riding. This band consists of approximately 1,000 people who have not had any new homes built for about four years. The reason for that is that the village sits on a flood plain at the present time, and it would require approximately 11 feet of fill to bring it above the flood plain. Since it is on a flood plain, CMHC will not give that band any money for mortgages. Therefore, the native people decided to move up on to a bench above the village and build a new subdivision. They have been working on this plan for years and had decided not to build any more houses on the lower area until the subdivision is ready. In the meantime there have been 13 fires and a number of deaths. The school has been condemned three times. They are still waiting for this subdivision to be approved. They have been promised it time and again. These are the same people who were instrumental in starting the sit-in at the regional office last year in Vancouver because of their frustration.

I received a telex from them three days ago which I do not have time to read now. Nothing has happened despite the assurances I have had time and time again from the minister and his officials that they were going to address this serious problem.

These situations exist all across the country. I urge the minister to accept his responsibilities and do something about them. We are willing to help. He must keep his commitments to us and the native people of Canada because, if he does not, I am fearful that real trouble will erupt with the Indian people. They will no longer stand for the treatment they are receiving from this minister and this government.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking in today's debate in response to a moral obligation to be involved in an area of our nation's business from which it is all too easy to remain aloof. It is very easy for politicians and the public in general to dismiss responsibilities of the nation with respect to the aboriginal peoples as somehow less important when judged in the light of the total Canadian problem. I have myself had a very peripheral concern for this area of national affairs, and I say this to my shame, not my credit.

National apathy has demonstrated itself in the indifference which has permitted the unchallenged development of a self-congratulatory attitude within the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which unfortunately has resulted in neither addressing the interests of the native people nor the interests of Canadians. This is the great tragedy.

We see that the dominant interest being maintained and promoted is that of the bureaucrat to increase and expand the influence of his own empire which, in some instances, is a very large empire indeed. This is an agency of government in which the minister carries tremendous trust responsibilities for the wellbeing of a group of people who are generally threatened by a social and economic system which is opposed to their own traditional values. It is an agency of government whose failure in its purpose and its visionary but difficult opportunity is borne out by the repeated testimony of failure which came to the standing committee and was spoken about by native people across the province. This is a very sad commentary on the conduct of the minister acting as a representative of the Crown. The final responsibility does rest solely on his shoulders. This is an essential part of the portfolio. If there ever was a time when there was a requirement for parternalism for native people, that time has passed. The time now is for assisted autonomy in which an advisory, financial and management-oriented autonomy must characterize the departmental thrust.

There is no place in it by which directives are impinged upon responsible decisions of band councils and chiefs. On the other hand, there is equally no place in a departmental policy that places unrestricted and undisciplined autonomy in the hands of those local band authorities without any final degree of accountability to the minister for their actions.

I am not impressed by the minister who shelters himself from his responsibility by saying, "I have given that responsibility and that authority to the band council to accept in any way they see fit. I have no responsibility for their actions; I only sign their bylaws. It is really not up to me after that."

The minister just cannot wash his hands of liability for events occurring on Indian property which comes under his charge. I just cannot accept it that the minister has no accountability for the carrying out of the terms of contracts made with the Crown. It is entirely convenient for the minister to say, as he did in a letter to myself dated June 3, 1982, the following:

> It is up to the courts to determine when a band council has exceeded its authority.

The minister does not appear to understand his responsibility to individuals and enterprises which have entered into lease agreements with the Crown on the assumption that contracts made with the Crown would be managed by the Crown with an element of good faith. At the very least, the minister, through his department, must monitor the administrative faithfulness to the terms of each contract. Certainly when the minister has extended agent-of-the-Crown status to others, he must be responsive to grievances raised by either of the principal parties. Otherwise, the Crown itself will be brought into disrepute.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. King: Yes, Mr. Speaker, after I have completed my remarks.

Let me quote some excerpts from a message I received yesterday from one of the aggrieved parties who has a contract with the Crown for use of Westbank Indian property. He states in his message that the band is relatively wealthy by standards of other reserves in Canada. He asks why they are so fortunate. Then he answers that the Crown, acting as a leasing agent for the band at their request, consented to lease parcels of these lands to other Canadians who are willing to gamble their expertise and moneys in various ventures for their own mutual benefit and that of the band.

This gentleman says that businessmen are normally wary of any lease partnership arrangement, but the head lease invariably begins with Her Majesty the Queen. They rely completely on the integrity of the Crown, and quite rightly so. Likewise they rely on the integrity of the minister of the Crown, also quite rightly so. They know full well that neither he nor the Queen can personally administer the lease. He says in his message that the administration has to be done by an agent of the minister, usually at the nearest office of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said that although dealing with the somewhat distant bureaucracy is not always the best arrangement—and I would like the minister to listen to this—the lessee can draw comfort from the fact that a certain uniform policy would be applied by competent and honest civil servants who have nothing to gain financially in exercising their duty. Now comes the crux of this man's complaint.

He says that suddenly this past policy has changed. He says it was changed without a word having been said to those Canadians who have invested millions of dollars in land projects. It was changed without their opinion being asked, without their thoughts on the matter being sought and, in fact, without any reference whatsoever having been made to it.

This gentleman said that it became known in 1981 that the minister had assigned the administration of these leases to the local band. He adds that he has handed over the administration to people who have a vested interest in every dollar they can obtain from those who have invested their lives in these reserve projects. He says there is without doubt a direct conflict of interest involved in this matter.

This gentleman then states that the confidence he and other businessmen had in the integrity of the Crown and of the minister is not being experienced in the relationship with the band council which the minister has appointed as the agents of the Crown. The minister is aware that some very serious allegations were made to him in a letter from that gentleman dated February 17, 1982. It is a very lengthy letter in which he went into great detail. Unfortunately, he received no response. That letter includes the following statement:

> As long as the lease was being administered by the department, there were no problems. There was a good working relationship without conflict of any description.

All that this gentleman and others with similar perceived grievances are asking is that they be provided a forum, private and discreet, in which they can relate their experiences with confidence that their statements will be evaluated and that an appropriate response will be taken by the minister.

This is not unreasonable. It is not asking that the circumstances and the response be pre-judged and pre-arranged. It simply says to the minister that people are being hurt. They think they have a legitimate grievance. They want to tell the minister and his officials personally that they do not think it appropriate or practical to take every instance to the courts. They think that the minister, representing as he does the Crown, the very basis of democracy, has a duty to hear them and a duty to fulfil his responsibility as it relates to Indian people and to those with contracts which involve native people.

I do not know whether the allegations which have come to me from lessees of Westbank Indian band properties, allegations of grievous wrong being done to them through tactics of harassment and intimidation by the chief and council, are sustainable in law. I do not have the means and the opportunity to find out. The minister does not know, but he does have the means and opportunity to make that determination. He has had that opportunity for months and months, those months since he was first made aware of the grievance. I want to state in favour of the minister, because I have been hard on him, that he has set up a review procedure. It raises my optimism and my esteem for the minister a great deal. I believe that that review mechanism has the possibility, if allowed to proceed unimpeded, to resolve all of the difficulties to which I have pointed. It should have been done six months ago, and I want to thank him for putting it in place. People of Westbank who are affected, also want to say a word of appreciation to the minister.

I want to refer now, Mr. Speaker, to the committee's fifth report, which comes out over the signature of the Chairman, the hon. member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) tabled in this House on June 1. I want to read into the record the recommendation that is made. It reads:

> (11) The members of the committee further recommend an independent inquiry, specifically with regard to all activities carried out by the regional office in conjunction with Indian band members and officials of the Westbank Indian Band in British Columbia, as well as all other governmental economic development ventures affecting Indian people in the British Columbia Region.

This is the recommendation coming from the committee. It is a committee which, as has been stated, was fully attended. It was dominated by Liberal members of this House, so it came as a totally non-partisan expression of concern. I am somewhat disappointed that the type of inquiry that is set up is internal, within the department. I would have liked to have seen the independent type of inquiry that was requested. But I am not depreciating the efforts that the minister has put in. I have great respect for the people who are going to conduct this.

I must express the great feeling of relief, Mr. Speaker, that is coming from the people in the Westbank area who are grievously affected. They want me to obtain from the minister the assurances that this review will go forward without impediment and with all of the confidentiality that is required in this situation.

Should anyone consider that I am displaying some type of anti-native bias, let me point to the petition which I have here. Here is a petition which was forwarded to me by a group of Westbank Indian Band members with whose spokesman and others of that group I have met at their invitation. This petition was forwarded to the minister many months ago. It requests an investigation of the spending of the Indian revenue funds. A letter attached to it begins "Dear Mr. Fred King", and ends up with these words: "I would appreciate your help in this matter." I helped by forwarding the petition to the minister. It ends up with this: "I am good to my word." I say to those who signed that petition: "I will attempt to be good to my word as well."

My word has been to seek to have the minister take an interest and take action appropriate under his responsibility. I am going to be very persistent in pursuing this. So are my colleagues on this side of the House. I am confident that our colleagues on the other side of the House will be just as insistent that the minister report back to the committee on the progress made.

The parliamentary secretary is indicating that I am out of time, and I have only just got started. I have not dealt with other aspects of the Westbank Indian Band. It is a complex and alarming situation which has caught the attention of a number of unrelated persons.

Among those showing anxiety are departmental officials themselves who have undertaken certain reviews and investigations. Some of these concerns were explored and vented in the meeting of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development held on May 26, 1982. I would urge all hon. members to read the proceedings of that day. They make very interesting but disquieting reading. It is important, I think, that much of the information provided at that time came from internal documents marked confidential. In one case a document was marked "Confidential" "Confidential" "Confidential" "Confidential". I do not know the implications of that.

I want to read some excerpts from these two documents, simply to substantiate to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House that my calls for an intervention by the minister have not been irresponsible nor politically motivated. The obvious alarm felt within the department is simply a reflection of that felt by those who have asked for my intervention on their behalf to the minister. It says:

OWNER Toussowasket Enterprises Ltd.

N. C. Derriksan, President and Director.

This is an internal paper of the department and it says:

This project was developed primarily as a retirement fund for the locatee N. C. Derriksan . . . No jobs have been created by this project.

It goes on to describe him as a millionaire and says:

The only factions to benefit from the project are the subject (Derriksan) and perhaps the various management/supervision/construction parties.

On January 24, 1982, there was a document which says, in part:

I have examined the various documents you have provided to me regarding the contribution arrangement between Her Majesty the Queen and the Westbank Indian Band . . . 1. Contribution arrangement between HMQ and Westbank Indian Band dated: May 5, 1981—

The amount of the contribution is $300,000.00—

The legal documentation supporting this arrangement is skimpy, to say the least . . . I would say, from a legal point of view, that the contribution arrangement itself is hopelessly inadequate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

The hon. member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) on a point of order.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, I gather from the rearrangement of the furniture that we are about to have a visitor from the other place, summoning us there for Royal Assent. I would therefore seek unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King) to complete his remarks in the time that is remaining.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen.

Mr. King: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will be but a few minutes. The amount of the contribution is $300,000 and the conclusion reached after four pages is:

—from what I have seen, it appears that Indian money is being used in a most inappropriate way, to benefit one Indian, and a number of non-Indian creditors . . . Insofar as this money is Indian money the very transaction may be a breach of trust. Alternatively, we may be able to establish other "considerations" for the loan.

On March 30, 1982, the current situation is described:

• (1750)

In May, 1981, the B.C. region approved a three-year, $300,000 contribution to the Westbank Indian Band . . . for the purpose of purchasing a 50 per cent interest in the leasehold interest—

Pursuant to this contribution arrangement, the department disbursed to the Westbank Indian Band in July, 1981, the first of the three $100,000 payments. On October 1, 1981, $100,000 was received by the department from Mount Boucherie Trailer Park as payment—

As a result of the impropriety of making a contribution for the purpose (direct or indirect) of repaying an IEDF loan, the headquarters economic development branch has undertaken an investigation to determine the appropriateness and authority for the May, 1981, contribution. Pending the outcome of this review—

The director—

—has been instructed to cease all further disbursements against this contribution arrangement and to forward the necessary documentation to facilitate the above-noted review.

Suggested response:

Considering that the department is of the opinion that a contribution is not an appropriate vehicle for reducing an IEDF loan, steps have been taken to ensure that the two subsequent $100,000 payments for 1982-83 and 1983-84 to the Westbank Indian Band will not be made. An in-depth review is currently being undertaken to determine what further action, if any, is required by the department.

If we read the testimony given in that committee meeting to which I referred previously, we see that, subsequent to the recommendation that no further payment be made, both payments were made on an accelerated basis between the period March 30 when this recommendation was made and May 26 when we met in committee. The whole $200,000 has been paid despite this recommendation.

I will respond to the question of the minister now.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I just wonder if the hon. member saw any inconsistency at all in his approach in terms of what he feels I should do as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development vis-à-vis looking behind the activities of a chief and band council when they wish to take some action with reference to the affairs on their reserve. Should I go in and second guess them, as the hon. member suggests, and examine what they are doing with reference to the decision-making exercise? Does the hon. member find any inconsistency in that approach compared with what some of his colleagues said earlier about the deplorable type of paternalism which is being exhibited by the minister in the department, which, they say, should cease? I just wonder if the hon. member sees any contradiction there?

Mr. King: Mr. Speaker, I think I pointed to a certain inconsistency in my speech. I said I did not think there was room for interference in the day to day responsible decisions made by individual band authorities, but that there had to be an overview responsibility on the part of the minister. When things get out of hand—as they are out of hand with respect to the Westbank Indian Band area—someone has to take responsibility, and I suggest it is the minister who has that responsibility. Again, I am not asking for action, and neither are the people involved. They are asking for a forum in which they can speak to departmental officials. They would like to speak to the minister, but that is not always possible, in view of the minister's busy circumstances. However, there are officials who could provide that forum. If I understand the minister's decision correctly, I am pleased to note that that forum will be provided. That is all that is being requested.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, it is just a little unsettling to begin a speech when one is aware that at any moment there will be a knock at the door, so I will avoid getting into the heart of my speech.

Let me begin by saying a word about the operation of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It has been said by other hon. members that this is not a highly partisan committee. It is made up of Members of Parliament from the three political parties, but these members have been able to work together very effectively and concentrate on areas which concern them all very deeply. This is the tradition of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. At the moment I have the privilege to be the chairman of that committee, but the tradition of being concerned about the issues and the testimony brought before that committee was established long ago. It was carried on by my predecessor, for example, the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson), who still serves on the committee, and also by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), who ably chaired that committee during the administration of the Conservative government.

Your guest has arrived, Mr. Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-117, to amend the Criminal Code, without amendment.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this hon. House in the Chamber of the hon. the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Deputy Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[English]

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Honour the Deputy His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, His Honour was pleased to give in Her Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-111, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority—Chapter 98;

Bill C-117, an act to amend the Criminal Code—Chapter 99.

[Translation]

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CANADA'S ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

The House resumed consideration of the motin of Mr. Schellenberger:

That this House condemns the Government, and in particular, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, for its failure to meet any of the objectives for which the Government continues to seek authority to spend in excess of one billion dollars in this fiscal year on behalf of Canada's Aboriginal Peoples, for its tolerance of the miserable conditions existing in native communities throughout Canada which are of a standard vastly inferior to those found in most Third World Countries, for the Minister's failure to exercise his obligatory trust responsibility, and for the minister's contempt of Parliament as manifested by his deliberate refusal to comply with the statutory obligations which legally require him to report to the House on the progress of the implementation of the James Bay agreement.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, when I began my speech a few minutes before six o'clock I was expressing a word of tribute to the hard-working and dedicated Members of Parliament who serve on the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. They come from all three parties, and without exception they serve on this committee with the very best of motives. They understand and care about the issues and concerns brought before us. This is not a committee which can be manipulated or used by anyone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: This committee is not a tool of the government or the opposition, nor is it a tool of any one Indian organization or group of organizations. The members of this committee are more than sympathetically disposed to the aboriginal peoples of Canada, but we make our own objective evaluation of matters we should pursue and issues into which we should inquire. Let me say parenthetically that I hope that before this Parliament has concluded its work there will be very significant reform of our committee system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: But within the limits imposed upon all committees we have shown ourselves to be determined and independently minded. There may be, Mr. Speaker, committees of this House which are as good, but I doubt there is a committee which is any better.

The Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development now has a national constituency of aboriginal peoples who see it as a forum in which they can receive a fair, open and sympathetic hearing, and from which positive action can result. We can and do respond. For example, consider the case of the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement. Last year the committee heard telling testimony of the failure of two governments, Canada's and Quebec's, to implement fairly the terms of this major historic agreement. It is futile here and now to argue whether strict legal obligations were or were not met; but clearly there was a failure to implement the spirit of the agreement. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) concurred in this conclusion. He, of course, was not the minister who either negotiated or signed the agreement, but his concern over this failure, in my view, merits full recognition. The minister agreed there were shortcomings, and he did something about them. He assigned senior officials to examine the problem in-depth and prepare a report. In addition, he went to the communities of James Bay in the company of the committee chairman and the local Member of Parliament, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras), who also serves as the vice-chairman of the committee. He saw for himself what the conditions were, and the disappointments in this area where the agreement was supposed to have brought a new day.

In preparing the report I mentioned there were consultations with the James Bay Cree and the Northern Quebec Inuit, and finally the so-called Tait report emerged with recommendations which are now awaiting cabinet approval. The James Bay Cree and the Northern Quebec Inuit are anxious to know what moneys will be provided to fairly, decently and fully carry out the provisions of this historic agreement. It is most important in my mind and in the minds of all members of the standing committee that this cabinet decision be announced soon.

The standing committee, in its fifth report, Item No. 12, stated:

Recalling your committee's earlier report to the minister respecting the implementation of the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement, your committee is dismayed by the delay of the federal cabinet in reaching a just decision based on the recommendations of the department's review, providing for adequate funding according to the terms and conditions of the agreement.

We, on the committee, are anxious to see a fair and just settlement of this agreement for its own sake, but also because we know that it will have a significant effect on other land claims negotiations. There are important lessons to be learned from the James Bay agreement. Those who settle future claims will want to be assured of an adequate and workable implementation process. They will want to know that there are sufficient moneys to carry out the commitments expressed in these agreements or settlements. The comprehensive claims under negotiation north of 60 will require substantial sums of money. One way to ensure that these moneys are available would be to set aside a share of northern resource revenues in a trust fund for the future settlement of the very large comprehensive claims. This approach, among others, requires careful examination.

The motion of my friend, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) mentions the miserable conditions that exist in native communities across Canada. The government acknowledges that these conditions do exist and they are serious. The progress made in alleviating these conditions has been dismally slow. Today in Canada there are 300,000 Indian people in 573 bands. About 65 per cent of the Indian population is located in rural or remote communities. It is true that expenditures such as this year's commitment of $1 billion have, to some extent, improved Indian living conditions in material ways.

Those of us who have Indian reserves in our constituencies know that there have been some improvements. Housing has improved somewhat. Water and other community services are better and more plentiful. Health care and social services are more accessible to those in need. But in saying that, we must also be cognizant of the fact that the standard of living of the people of Canada as a whole has improved at an accelerated rate, and the gap between national standards and those of Indian people has not narrowed. For example, the life expectancy among Indian people is ten years less than the national average. There are more violent deaths and suicides among Indian people. The number of Indian people on social assistance has increased.

Many of these conditions are described in a 1980 Department of Indian Affairs study entitled "Indian Conditions: A survey". In the area of housing, which has been of great concern to the standing committee, the study indicated that there was a backlog of 11,000 new houses. The study also stated that an additional 9,000 houses were desperately in need of repair. Last fall in a discussion paper on Indian housing, the department expressed the need for the same number of new houses, that is 11,000, but the number of houses needing renovation has also risen to 11,000. At the present time, one in every three Indian families lives in unacceptably crowded conditions.

Why do these conditions exist? I am sure a long list of reasons could be given, but they exist partly because there is a lack of an independent economic base in many Indian communities. That is so because so many of these communities are located in isolated and remote regions of this country. What of social assistance? Much of that $1 billion is directed toward social assistance, but social assistance is both a blessing and a curse. It provides for life's necessities, that is true, but at the same time it reinforces a sense of dependency. The Indian people do not like that sense of dependency any more than any other person in this country who does not want to be dependent upon someone else, on handouts, or to be beholden to the government for his or her wellbeing and existence.

Constitutionally, it is now recognized that there are aboriginal rights. The treaties are one expression of the unique relationship Indian people have with the Government of Canada. That relationship needs to be defined, it needs to be expanded. Our new Constitution calls for this to be done on a priority basis. I hope the aboriginal people of Canada will not be disappointed in the result of that endeavour because the Government of Canada has obligations to meet and grievances to settle.

I have already referred to the comprehensive claims north of 60. There are the specific claims in the provinces which result from a long list of treaty violations. There is also the obligation to foster economic development and to restore self-reliance among Indian people. The latter calls for us to work with Indian leaders toward the establishment of effective Indian government for Indian people within the context of the Canadian confederation. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River when he said we are not talking here about a state within a state. We are talking about Indian government for Indian people within the context of the Canadian confederation. But we seem at times to be moving at a snail's pace, and the impatience with this slow progress is growing. The time is now for what the Chinese people once referred to in their development as a "great leap forward". That is what we need, a great leap forward in the area of government-Indian relations in Canada.

A few years ago I was reading an interesting book by Theodore H. White entitled "In Search of History". Incidentally Ted White is an author and a newspaperman who made his reputation by doing an in-depth analysis of U.S. presidential elections. In the final chapter of White's book "In Search of History", he dealt with the administration of John F. Kennedy. The chapter is entitled "Camelot". I was struck by White's description of the manner in which President Kennedy advanced the cause of civil rights in the United States.

In 1963, President Kennedy announced to the American people that he had drafted a new civil rights bill. His speech to the nation had a single message: the need of new laws for new times. According to White, that legislation carried the concept of civil rights light years forward. The civil rights bill which became law in 1964 was revolutionary in a legislative and social sense.

In Canada, our relationship with our aboriginal peoples needs a similar momentum, that is, a great leap forward. We need to move light years ahead, even to be revolutionary. Instead, from our observations in the standing committee where a lot of frustration and impatience is absorbed from those who appear before us, we seem to be moving with reluctance and lethargy; without courage, imagination and vision. Our approach to Indian people and our relationship with them as a government, as we all know, has evolved from one of internal colonialism to attempted, but failed, assimilation, to the now cautious uncertain recognition that some form of limited, prescribed self-government must be accepted. In the past, giving Indian people special status and having them settle on specific land areas known as reserves really derived from a perceived need to protect Indians and Indian lands from exploitation by non-Indians. That was the motivation. It had nothing whatsoever to do with an understanding of, or a respect for, the treaties. In fact, it was nothing more than a policy of internal colonialism.

In 1969 the policy which had been with us for so long was changed, and the much-heralded white paper on Indian policy was tabled in the House. In case hon. members do not know or do not remember, I remind them that politicians from all political parties thought that the paper represented very significant progress. The spokesmen for each political party, if hon. members check the record of Hansard, thought that it was a step forward.

Mr. Blaikie: We will look.

Mr. Penner: Please do.

Mr. Manly: We have learned since then.

Mr. Penner: Hon. members opposite have learned and we have learned, but let me remind my hon. friends how we have learned. We should not pat ourselves on the back. We learned because the Indian people themselves perceived that this was a policy of assimilation which meant for them cultural genocide.

Over the past several years, self-government has emerged as a pivotal concern in the quest by Canada's Indian peoples for a redefined role within confederation. For them self-government is inextricably linked to the achievement of self-determination and the preservation of their cultural heritage. Increased political activity by Indian associations has forced federal officials to move Indian policy a little more in line with actual political, economical and social development of many Indians in Canada. But, according to a recent study, the bringing of Indian policies more in line with current development has been espoused in order to head off larger and more intense challenges in the future. There is something of a stalling tactic involved here.

These new uncharted waters to which I have referred are being avoided because it is known that additional moneys will need to be appropriated. When we have a large and growing federal deficit, that is not a very appealing idea. It may require the reallocation of funds and resources within government, and we all know the kinds of difficulties which that can create. What would happen to the present control mechanism operated by the department? How could accountability be assured? My committee believes that we should confront these issues squarely, not run away from them or hide. Therefore, we requested in our famous fifth report a special reference from Parliament to examine the total financial and other relationships of the Government of Canada with Indian and Inuit people. It is my conviction that the committee, if given this responsibility, could very greatly assist the government by indicating what the desirable goals are and what new directions we must follow in order to get there.

All the wisdom in the world does not reside with our public officials.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have already extended to him the grace of a couple of extra minutes. Perhaps the hon. member might seek the unanimous consent of the House to continue. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I assume the hon. member would recognize that he has unanimous consent to continue for one or two minutes.

Mr. Penner: I appreciate the graciousness of the House in giving me a few more minutes to conclude.

As I was saying, those of us who have dialogued with Indian people for many years could, given the time and with thoughtful consultation, offer some acceptable and exciting new policy options which would be genuinely progressive.

The language of the motion before us this evening is in the traditional partisan, adversarial mould. I do not think it upsets any one of us too much. After all, this is Parliament; it is not a club for ladies and gentlemen. This is not a place for Mr. and Mrs. Milque-toast. This is Parliament, raw in tooth and claw, so no one is easily upset or disturbed. It is true that it condemns the government and the minister. It speaks of tolerating miserable conditions and of failures to meet objectives and to comply. If we put that somewhat offensive phraseology aside, it can be agreed that we must make a new beginning. We must make a fresh start and we must do so with some vigour and conviction.

Earlier I said that the constitutional conference on aboriginal rights could be such a commencement, but I say to the House that the standing committee could be of service in moving us light years ahead in the renewal of government-Indian relationships. Indian people and their leaders are ready and willing to get the process under way. Enlightened Canadians from across the country are looking to us for results. Finally, the world is watching and our credibility in the international community is at stake. We must not fail to act decisively and to do so without delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the motion tonight. There are many things to say when one rises to speak on a subject which is not often discussed in the House at a time when many groups and individuals from bands across the country have come to Parliament to indicate the difficulties with which they are faced. Before commencing the speech I should like to give this evening, I say to the hon. member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) that we appreciate the way in which he conducts the committee. If we have a chairman who assists the committee in its work, it is easier for all parties to do the best job possible in helping people. That is really what this debate is all about.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has a difficult job. In a sense, he is always dealing with people, and he has a restricted budget which has not grown perhaps as fast as we would like, given present difficulties. Of course, he must work within that budget. Many of us on this side honestly believe that there are ways of improving the expenditures of the minister and his department.

We have mentioned in our motion a number of things which are upsetting to us as a party. One area which is constantly a problem is the fact that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is still in place and that the minister, because of that, has a distinct trust relationship with native people. Because of that trust relationship, one would think that the Indian people themselves would have a certain trust. However, we find instead many cases of Indian band representatives across Canada coming to Ottawa day after day, week after week, coming to the House to tell us, Members of Parliament, that they do not in fact trust the manner in which expenditures are being made on their behalf. They are spending their money to travel here because promises have been made but have not been fulfilled.

Conditions on reserves are worse than conditions in Third World countries. Native people are coming to Ottawa in the hope that we, as Members of Parliament, the minister and his officials, will listen to their plea and act upon it. Native people who do not have much money hire consultants to help them with their pleas. They are spending millions of dollars each year. Why do native people have to hire consultants? The department is supposed to be there, surely, to fulfil that function itself and assist the native people in expanding their livelihood. The natives do not hire consultants to advise them on how to build houses; they hire political consultants to help get the minister's attention to deal with things that they believe are essential to their reserves. Native people themselves are worried about the necessity of hiring consultants. Last year, political advisers in one province took up more than $1 million of native funds to help with such things as conducting marches and preparing briefs. They do this because when they go to the officials in the capital cities or the regional directors in other areas to ask for commitments they usually get no for an answer. However, when they deliver those requests in the form of a concise report or attractive brief they often get yes for an answer. Therefore, they spend money on obtaining the assistance of consultants. Much of this money is wasted, something which they cannot afford to do.

I would like to read a comment by a chief of an Indian band. This appeared in the Edmonton Journal. He was asked why they do this, and he said:

> Take a band that has lived through 50 years of frustration. If you go in there and give them hope of any kind, they'll ride that hope right down the tube.

That is why they hire consultants.

I have been speaking of a trust relationship wherein the minister has certain funds. There must be a trust that he will spend that money properly. Many native people in Canada do not believe that it is being spent properly. The department should be working itself out of a job instead of increasing the numbers of people working in the department and using funds which are desperately needed to assist native people.

Since the minister is a lawyer I realize that he wishes every word to be taken strictly in the legal sense. There is now a new funding procedure for the use of the bands own money. Instead of the traditional method of Indian bands' presenting a yearly funding proposal to the minister for the use of their own money, they now have to present that proposal every three months. The minister has said that this must be done because it is in line with his trust responsibility. No business can operate when it does not know what its funding will be three months in the future. In fact, in order to have the three-month spending requisition, they have to send in a new requisition each month. In my opinion, instead of assisting native people, we are moving back to the ancient concept where the department knows best how native people can fund themselves with their own money which is in their trust funds. There is some $500 million in those trust funds which should be used to assist native people.

Why has this funding proposal been changed? The department has said that the management system has encouraged the department to place a sharper emphasis on structured, formalized planning than ever before. Believe me, departments of this government know best how to structure and how to formalize planning. This is one of the difficulties that the native people have.

The hon. member for Cochrane-Superior defined some of the health and social problems that native people are facing as compared with those faced by the non-native society. He said that the mortality rates were significantly higher. This was mentioned as well by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway) with respect to the health problems experienced in northern Quebec. The death rate of infants due to infectious disease is very high. Indians use hospital facilities two to two and a half times more often than the national average. In 1977 there were 1,200 families living in condemned houses. One out of every four reserve houses are in need of repair. Incomes are half the national average, and welfare dependancy on some reserves reaches 70 per cent. Is it any wonder that we suggest that conditions on many of our reserves are worse than in many Third World countries which we are, quite properly, helping?

I reviewed the recommendations of CIDA to see if assistance could be made available by that organization. It is interesting to note that CIDA is capable of operating also in Canada under its terms of reference. It is common knowledge that CIDA carries on successful projects in other countries. Perhaps it might be incumbent upon the minister to ask CIDA for assistance in order to improve the poor conditions which we have described. Perhaps funding could be provided through their expertise to assist native people, instead of providing them with such things on new housing as the so-called J circulars.

When there is a shortage of some 11,000 homes in Canada for native people, with almost as many homes that are condemned or in desperate need of repair, we now see a new housing policy which says that the government will provide $18,000 to $22,000 on condition that a certain amount of the natives' own money is added to finish building the homes. It does not makes good sense to tell a native family who is on welfare and barely able to feed and clothe itself to add its own money. Where will they get the extra money from?

Some chiefs and councils have said it is impossible for them to build a home on that amount of money, but since they have been allocated money for the construction of ten or 12 houses they will pool the money instead and build five houses. But the government says, "No. If you do that, we will take all the money back." This is the situation which results from the new J circulars which are being handed out throughout Canada. As a result, no housing projects, or very few, are proceeding this spring.

If we look at the budget that has been spent for housing in Canada for the last ten years, we see that it adds up to some $700 million, if I read the estimates correctly. If that amount were divided among the number of native families in this country we should have been able to build one house for every family. Yet we are behind by 11,000.

There are some serious questions which must be asked about the housing policy and why house construction is so far behind. The minister has access to something called the Western Development Fund which is supposedly to be used to help in the construction of houses. Western Canada is happy to provide that money if, in fact it goes to building houses since many native people reside in the west. It is my hope that this money will quickly be put to use and that this new circular being distributed will be amended.

The department also has something called "paper houses". Officials of the department indicate how many houses are to be built under this plan. In many cases the bank is in debt. They do not have a sufficient amount of money to fund other programs. Therefore, they pull it out of the housing project. The department tells them to pull it out of there. No one mentions that the homes are not built. Unless they are actually counted, the department assumes the homes have actually been built. As a result, we have something called "paper houses". Perhaps we are short even more than the anticipated 11,000 homes.

We are not being given a lot of time to speak today. That is good because it gives more members an opportunity to speak. I would like to deal with one other subject before closing. It is important to the Indian people of this country. They have their rights entrenched in the Constitution. A great deal of time was spent on this in the last year before the Constitution was brought home to this nation. Within a year of last April, a conference must be called to deal with the definition of aboriginal rights. Because there is only one year, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about this. It is a difficult question. I wanted to know what the federal government feels it ought to be doing. Have the federal government and the minister been in touch with the Indian leadership in this nation to have preliminary meetings so that there are no surprises when the conference is called? If the conference fails, does that mean the constitutional requirement has been settled? If we have no definition, do we carry on as before? When I asked the Prime Minister about this, he said no. He felt that the first step would be to consult the provinces to get their view as to a date for the meeting and as to what groups they would like to see invited.

That simply is not good enough. The minister ought to be meeting with Indian groups across this country now. He should be stating what his position is with regard to this constitutional conference. The provinces should be made aware of the direction in which the government and the native people feel we should be going. At the present time, we have not heard anything about the position of this government on the constitutional conference and the role it feels it should play in it.

Members have spoken of difficulties. They have appreciated having the opportunity to do that. I would point out that education is essential if young people are to help their bands. Many accomplishments have been made in this area. Economic development is essential to get people off welfare so that they can be productive and have pride in themselves. Economic development spending involves some $100 million. Social assistance spending is almost $300 million. The hon. member for Cochrane-Superior spoke about that. It is important that we get more money into the economic development area so that people can carry out productive work and again take pride in themselves.

It is not often that we get to speak on the issue of our Indian people. This opposition day has provided us with that opportunity. I hope the minister is now aware of some of the criticisms being laid at his feet and some of the responsibilities he must carry out in the next number of months.

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to contribute to this debate, especially since part of the motion now under consideration deals with the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement, an area which is part of my constituency. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall briefly the background of this question in order to better understand how the James Bay agreement came about and the problems caused by its implementation. It will then be easier to understand, Mr. Speaker, that the James Bay area, which is nearly totally included in the Abitibi riding which I represent, is different from every other region in Canada. These differences explain the philosophy under which this unique and unprecedented agreement was negotiated.

As we all know, the James Bay territory was purchased by the Government of Canada from the Hudson's Bay Company. The region was then called Rupert's Land. I have here an order in council from 1898 which gave part of this territory to the province of Quebec. In 1912, the rest of the territory was handed over to Quebec. To give you an idea of its geographic location, my native town of Amos was given to the province of Quebec in 1898. This territory extended to the middle of the Eastmain River. In 1912, the territory of the province of Quebec was extended to include the entire territory from the upper part of the Eastmain River to the northern boundary. However, at the same time, Quebec had to take responsibility for territorial matters and other issues concerning the native people, their interests and their claims, which were completely non-existent in the Abitibi territory from 1898 until quite recently, around 1960. It is only at that time that the province of Quebec decided to integrate Abitibi into its administrative map.

In the report of the Dorion commission on the integrity of the Quebec territory, Mr. Justice Dorion recommended: That the Quebec government take action immediately to honor the commitments made toward the Indians in the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act of 1912. He also recommended: That this commitment be kept by means of an agreement between the Quebec government and the duly appointed representatives of the Indian bands of Quebec, to be ratified by the government of Canada. I emphasize this point, Mr. Speaker, to show what problems we expected when this agreement was signed. Around 1970, the province of Quebec started to show some interest in northern Quebec and to build dams and roads, and it is only with the James Bay dam project that, following representations by the Crees and the Inuits, Quebec agreed to sit down, after all the problems caused by court proceedings, land claims and work shutdowns on the James Bay project, and try to negotiate an agreement.

• (2050)

That agreement dating back to 1975, that is contained in this document, was negotiated from 1973 to 1975. Who were the parties to that agreement? We find on page VII that the agreement was between the Government of Quebec, the Société d'énergie de la Baie James, the Société de développement de la Baie James, the Commission hydroélectrique du Québec (Hydro-Québec) the Grand Council of Crees and Inuits of Quebec, and finally the Government of Canada. It will be remembered that Mr. John Ciaccia was Premier Bourassa's official representative at those negotiations. We find at the beginning of the agreement certain facts that are quite amazing in the light of today's situation. Mr. Ciaccia explained to members of the National Assembly in Quebec, on November 5, 1975, the philosophy of that agreement which clearly shows the shared responsibilities in the development of James Bay. I would like to quote excerpts from his speech that are very telling. On page XI, Mr. Ciaccia stated, and I quote:

That agreement enables us to accomplish two great tasks to which our government was committed.

"Our government" means the Quebec government.

It enables us—

—the agreement—

—to fulfil our responsibilities towards the people in our northern areas and finally to have a Quebec presence in all the territories included within our geographical boundaries.

Those geographical boundaries, Mr. Speaker, are those that were established in 1898 and 1912.

Mr. Ciaccia went on to say:

But along with that acquisition, Quebec assumed the responsibility to settle a number of land claims and other issues involving the native people, such as their interests and claims.

It was a recognition that the province of Quebec was involved in the James Bay Indians' claims. I said earlier that the province of Quebec had not included that territory in its administrative map. It should be kept in mind that the province of Quebec had nothing to do whatsoever with the James Bay and Hudson Bay territories. Schools were under federal jurisdiction, contrary to the Constitution. The federal government was responsible for health and police services and, to further quote Mr. Ciaccia:

People in northern Quebec need schools like everyone else. They must be able to rely on health services. They must be in a position to bring their differences before fair-minded judges and have the institutions needed to enforce the law. The agreement meets these various needs and provides the necessary structures. We—

—the Government of Quebec—

—will establish local school boards, social services and health boards, police and fire departments, municipal courts, and these institutions will come under the relevant departments of the Government of Quebec.

And he went on to say:

And all those services will be provided through the facilities of the Quebec government.

In other words, any services such as schools and hospitals under federal jurisdiction which the native communities may have already will become Quebec's responsibility. The Quebec government will take over some of the existing federal programs. Mr. Speaker, I think I have said enough to show that the implementation of the James Bay Agreement is not strictly a federal issue. In the last pages appear the names of the signatories, while the parties to the agreement are listed at the beginning. As I said earlier, that agreement was unique and unprecedented. It was inspired by principles which I tried to single out in the remarks of Mr. Caccia whom I quoted a moment ago, there were problems in its implementation, and a great many terms in the wording of that agreement were rather ambiguous. There were certain steps which Hydro-Quebec as well as the governments of Quebec and Ottawa were supposed to take. So after six years we ended up without any implementation mechanism.

When I was elected in 1980, I was contacted almost immediately by Mr. Billy Diamond—who was and still is Grand Chief of the Grand Council of the Crees—and Northern Quebec Inuit Association President Charlie Watt. Both had signed the James Bay Agreement and they wanted to try to set that agreement straight. In 1981, in February or March, I believe, I was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development when spokesmen for the Grand Council of the Crees and the Inuit of Northern Quebec appeared before us to submit a brief in which they claimed that some things needed improvement in the implementation of the James Bay Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, we must bear in mind that the agreement had been signed in 1975 by the Bourassa government and that on November 15, 1976, a whole new team took over in Quebec City. Most of the contents of that document flowed from an agreement and discussions between the federal government, the PQ government which was then in power, the Crees and the Inuit. There is no need for me to spell it out, Mr. Speaker. Let us recall the situation in 1976 and it will be readily seen that the discussions aimed at implementing that agreement were rather strained because of the Quebec-Canada policies. The Quebec government was not paying much attention to native culture. It had no expertise in native matters. And, following these claims, I am grateful to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) who agreed to lend one of his senior officials to look into the James Bay development problem.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say, because of my privileged position both as a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and as member for that riding, that the government has responded favourably to the concerns of the committee as well as to those of the Crees and Inuits of the James Bay area. The enquiry, consultation and decision-making processes, which started in March, 1981, proved long and sometimes painful to all parties involved, but I feel that it was not an exercise in futility. On several occasions, the minister indicated in this House that a decision concerning the James Bay question was forthcoming. During its proceedings, the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Affairs raised also the issue of an annual report to be tabled in Parliament on the implementation of the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement. People are aware that such a document has not yet been tabled by the minister. Surely the committee is right in stressing that that obligation has not been met. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, people are also aware that the tabling is undoubtedly linked with the completion of that study. Why table only part of a report on the implementation of the James Bay agreement if the study of this implementation is not yet completed. I am sure that the government intends to remedy this situation and will make sure that all future annual reports are tabled on time.

Hon. members opposite should appreciate, however, that since this very meticulous study was carried out over the past 18 months, it would have been difficult, if not outright impossible, to table a report which would reflect a rapidly changing situation. I know that the minister has asked for the understanding of Indian groups and the House in this respect. Hon. members are indeed aware that the Standing Committee has been looking into this matter for quite a while and that it issued a special statement in March, 1981. I can now inform the House that the minister will contact the Cree and Inuit leaders within the next few days or very shortly to examine with them the Standing Committee's findings.

Briefly, I would like to draw the attention of the House on the process—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but as I have already pointed out, the time alloted to him has expired. If he gets the unanimous consent of the House, he could perhaps continue with his speech.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue for a moment or two?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gingras: I wish to thank my colleagues for their co-operation. I still have about a minute and a half to go. I mention the fact because I consider such an approach as a typical example of the co-operation which can exist between the government and native groups in finding common solutions. Of course, this analysis of the James Bay agreement is not and was not intended to be a magic formula. No doubt some other obstacles will crop up. However, I think that if we maintain this same attitude, this openmindedness, we will finally find a more adequate response in a more serene atmosphere. Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much for the congenial spirit of this House and I will now end my remarks.

[English]

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my thanks to all hon. members in the House who have spoken on behalf of natives. I too would like to give my support to this motion. The only problem I have is in knowing where to begin. I have the feeling that with a department such as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development wherever one chooses to shoot, one can likely hit a target. For an opposition critic looking for ammunition against the government this department emerges as a veritable ammunition dump. Because the department is open to criticism on so many fronts, it would be impossible to touch on everything in one brief speech.

Mr. Blaikie: The barn door of Canadian politics.

Mr. Ittinuar: Or an igloo! What I will do, then, is to focus on one aspect of DIAND's mandate which is of particular interest to me and the people I represent. I will leave it to my colleagues in the House to address the many other issues which can legitimately be raised.

What I would like to focus on is this government's policy on native land claims, a matter for which DIAND is responsible. I would like to give a brief history of how and why the government's policies on claims have failed to serve the needs of northern peoples as well as other native peoples in this country.

Before dealing with the situation as it is today, let me explain briefly why the government even deals with the issue of claims and how it has handled them in the past. In the first place, the government has been obliged to deal with claims because the British legal tradition requires that native interests in any lands be recognized and dealt with before any non-natives begin to use it. The way the federal government has always done this has been to make treaties with the native peoples and extinguish their rights in exchange for some type of compensation. When we look back over the history of treaty making, it is easy to see patterns emerge. It is easy to see, for example, that the treaties were designed to serve the needs of other people more than the needs of the natives themselves. The government's primary motivation for dealing with native peoples has always been to clear the way for development, either agricultural, non-renewable or otherwise. This was the pattern which prevailed across the prairies in the years immediately after confederation, with the construction of the CPR and the opening up of the west for farming. That is not to condemn those vocations. Indian peoples were pushed aside in the quest for land, and the treaty-making process was meant to give it a semblance of legitimacy.

The economic and renewable resource base of the native people on the prairies, the buffalo, was eliminated, and the native people were left with the option of either being assimilated into the new society or being segregated onto reserves. Either way would leave them marginalized, culturally, economically, politically, socially and otherwise.

Perhaps the most painful lesson that native people learned about the government during this period was the fact that it was prepared to use military force to quell any resistance to this marginalization process.

Only a few such treaties have ever been signed in what can properly be called the north and, unfortunately, the same pattern has emerged. Treaty No. 8 was signed in the Upper MacKenzie Valley in 1898 in order to accommodate the influx of non-natives attracted north by the Yukon gold rush. The government felt no need to settle any other claims in this area, until oil was discovered at Norman Wells in 1920. Within the year, Treaty No. 11 was signed. The government's interest obviously had more to do with securing legal control of the oil resources at Norman Wells than it did with protecting the interest of the local residents. By the 1920s most of the likely areas of settlement or development in Canada were covered by treaties, and so the process came to a halt for about 50 years.

By the late 1960s the tragic consequences of this type of approach were painfully obvious to most Canadians. Native people suffered from the highest rates of infant mortality, school dropouts, unemployment, alcoholism and, not surprisingly, suicide. This situation continues today.

While the strategy of pushing native people aside had served its short-term purpose in the nineteenth century, by the mid-twentieth century its social consequences were proving to be enormous. One would like to think that, when faced with the prospect of opening up yet another frontier area the government would now be willing, if not eager, to find an alternative approach to the land claims—an approach that would not have such tragic consequences for the people involved or such enormous long-term costs for the country as a whole.

One would like to think that the government would be interested in learning from its past mistakes, but as a close observer of the government's action in this field I have to report that it has not. This is what the government must be condemned for—not being willing to alter its modern-day approach to the issue from the one it pursued in the past, despite its obvious long-term consequences.

When I speak about the government's latter day approach, I am referring to the policies it has adopted in this last decade to deal with outstanding native claims, primarily in the north. The 1970s witnessed the dawn of a new era of frontier expansion and exploration in Canada. The north has become the focus, and the search for energy has become the driving force. As with the earlier frontiers, this drive to open up new regions carried with it the responsibility for dealing somehow with the northern peoples' claim in the lands in question.

At the outset of the 1970s, when development pressures were just beginning to emerge, the government actually felt that it could ignore the whole issue of native claims because it felt the concept of aboriginal title had no legal basis. It was content to operate on this assumption and to let the native people use the courts to prove otherwise, if they could. In January 1973, the Supreme Court of Canada issued a historic decision on a question of whether the native rights of the Nishga had ever been extinguished. The fact that that court split 3-3 on this vital question gave the concept of native rights much more legal validity and it also rather stunned the government of the day. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) reacted to the decision by telling the Niska, "Perhaps you have more legal rights than we thought you had".

What this decision did was cause the government to reevaluate its approach to the whole claims question. It could no longer ignore the fact that native people might actually have a legal claim to the land, and that any future court case could now just as easily favour the native people. Instead of leaving it up to the courts then, because they were proving unreliable, the government had to take control of the settlement process itself so that it could control the timing and the results more effectively. This is what the 1973 policy statement was designed to do.

The government's whole approach to the settlement of native claims was conditioned by its other main priority, which was to clear the way for development. As long as ownership of the land remained uncertain, investors would not be attracted to the north. So, if the government wanted to get a pipeline built, it had to take responsibility for clarifying who owned the land. Extinguishing aboriginal claims was a way of doing that once and for all.

Faced, then, with having to settle claims, the government simply dusted off the policy that had been used so effectively in the previous century, and set out to repeat the same process all over again, this time in its last frontier, the north.

The 1973 policy statement established the policy which remains in effect to this day. Let me point out exactly what it was designed to do from the government's point of view, and I would suggest that if it is allowed to proceed, it will lead to the eventual marginalization of native people in the north as well.

First, the 1973 policy statement said that settlements of comprehensive claims should be achieved through negotiations. As I said, this was designed to get the issue out of the courts where decisions were not proving as favourable as the government would have liked. Second, it said that the complete and final extinguishment of native title would be the only acceptable outcome of the settlement process. Third, the sole purpose of the negotiation process would be to determine the type of compensation to be paid for the loss of those rights, plus the amount.

I am taking the time to go into detail on this because this policy reflects a great deal about the government's approach to native peoples. While it is couched in much more sophisticated language, and there are much more elaborate structures in place for negotiating settlements than in the last century, I fear that its fundamental goals have remained essentially the same—to extinguish native peoples' rights to their land. And I also fear that if the policy is allowed to be repeated, so too will the consequences.

It is interesting to note what has happened between the government and the native groups in the north since this policy was introduced. The northern peoples have been quick to reject the premises of the 1973 policy, recognizing it for what it is—merely the nineteenth century policy resurrected. They have refused to accept their intended fate passively; they have rejected the government's approach and demanded that the door be opened to alternatives.

We realized early on, for example, that some land base was essential for our continued viability as a distinct people. Instead of having our rights to the land extinguished in a settlement, why could we not have them entrenched? Instead of having to choose between a traditional economy and a modern industrial one, why could we not have enough control over the pace of development that we might enjoy the benefits of both? Instead of having political decisions made for us, why can we not make our own, and have structures which reflect our own needs and values, and work these out with other people?

Throughout the 1970s the government did not prove very receptive to these kind of questions. It consistently refused to broaden the mandate of its negotiators, for example, to include questions of political rights. It preferred to keep it at the level of a simple real estate transaction, where a certain amount of money is exchanged for a certain amount of land, with some hunting and fishing rights thrown in. It has even gone so far as to set up separate commissions such as the one headed by the Prime Minister's friend, Mr. Drury, to ensure that such matters as political development cannot be discussed in the same forum as claims.

Despite this resistance, the native groups have gone ahead and developed their own alternatives to the "land for money" approach. The Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, for example, has submitted a proposal for the creation of Nunavut, a new territory in the eastern Arctic which would evolve into full provincial status over a period of up to 15 years. Support for this proposal is running high in the region right now, as illustrated by the overwhelming vote in favour of division in the recent plebiscite held on April 14 in the Northwest Territories. It is hoped that some action will be taken shortly to implement the results of that vote.

In the western Arctic, the Dene and Metis have also developed a vision of how things should be if their culture and economy are to be allowed to thrive. Their Denendeh proposal calls for political structures which would recognize the permanence of the native community in the area in the face of a growing population of non-natives who may stay for only a short time.

Despite our consistent demand that new models for settlements have to be found, the federal government has still not really indicated much willingness to do so. In fact, in its first update of policy since 1973, the statement entitled "In all Fairness", the government seemed dead set on holding on to the policy objectives it outlined in 1973. Even though it now prefers to speak of an "exchange" of undefined rights for concrete rights and benefits, it still amounts to the same thing: extinguishment. Given the consistent opposition to extinguishment throughout the 1970s, one wonders where the government has been. It is this kind of stubborn insistence on the old way of doing things which is preventing speedy settlements in the north, and it is this stubborn refusal to seriously consider the alternatives which is greatly frustrating the people I represent, and which causes me to support this motion.

Evidence of the federal government's continuing bad faith I believe exists in the recent wildlife agreement, in principle initialled in Frobisher Bay on October 27, 1981, by federal government negotiators and the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada. For over seven months now the Inuit have been waiting for official endorsement of this agreement. But that is only the first stage in a comprehensive land claims agreement between the federal government and the Inuit of Canada, and we will be watching closely to determine whether the government is willing to act in honesty on our behalf. Therefore, I support this motion of the hon. member for Wataskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger).

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the proceedings of the House but I have something which is of some importance and I think the House will be interested. In the provincial byelection in Hamilton West this evening the New Democratic Party won by over 2,000 votes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anguish: That is the first time that the NDP has ever held that seat.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Anguish: I did want to intervene on the motion this evening, Mr. Speaker, but I will not have time to do so.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think that had to be one of the most superficial and juvenile exploitations of the rules of order that I have heard for some time. I am sure the hon. member of the NDP who just spoke must have shrugged in utter embarrassment that we could be discussing the plight and poverty of the native peoples all day, and then the NDP, the sole possessor of social conscience, just dump their terrible concern and abuse the rules in order to interject something which is totally irrelevant to the discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): If the NDP can contain their glee for about 20 minutes while I make my remarks, I would appreciate it. I can only assume that they, like the official opposition, wish to hear the reply to questions they themselves have raised, so here they are.

First, Mr. Speaker, I feel very strongly that the standing committee has been a good committee. It is made up of members of all political parties, and therefore political life being what it is they will of necessity politicize their feelings and get the maximum impact as a result of the political position they take in the never ending partisanship which takes place. But in my experience that committee, perhaps more than in any other, has had a common theme amongst all members, one of very deep concern indeed for the wellbeing of the native peoples. It is shown by a basic sort of bipartisan approach when it really counts as far as achieving a given objective is concerned, and I think that speaks well not only for the committee but for Parliament itself. There is a very vivid and stark example of that, which is the James Bay matter which the committee wished to have rectified. I think all members will be happy to know that matter is probably soon to be rectified.

Having said that, I do not wish to attempt to correct a whole multitude of inaccuracies, but I will deal with some. I think some of these inaccuracies probably were stated in the exuberance of the point hon. members wished to make. If I thought that every Indian leader and every Indian person in Canada and the general public were going to read today's Hansard and study all the figures that were quoted, I would probably go to some considerable pains to correct each and every exuberance uttered. But I do not think I will do that. Of necessity, though, I should deal with some very briefly before making my other remarks.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) talked about administration, and about how funds are allocated not only generally but in the B.C. region. The reason I want to deal with that is that some of the charges are serious. I think the figures he has quoted show a lack of ability and capacity to understand the most basic facts about the band-funding process. The hon. member is not here, so I trust some of his colleagues will make him aware of my reply to some of his serious charges.

We have tried to explain to the hon. member in committee the band-funding process for some time. Maybe he just wants to persist in the distortions despite these endless efforts to correct him. However, for the benefit of other members let me explain some of the major faults. As many members know, program services to any one band can be provided in three basic ways. First, bands can administer the entire program. This now covers about 50 per cent of the entire budget of the department. Second, some programs, and for a very few bands nearly all programs, are still delivered by the Department of Indian Affairs. This comprises about 25 per cent of the department's budget. Incidentally, that figure includes, in addition to a wide range of educational, social and other programs, all the department's administration costs. Finally, Mr. Speaker, some 25 per cent of the budget consists of funding provided to provincial governments to provide education and social services to a large number of Indian communities. If you look at the dollars administered by the band, then, anyone can see that this will be very low indeed for bands which receive services directly from the department. They are not getting all the money for all the programs because the department is directly providing the services or the provincial governments are doing it. On the other hand, the figures will be very high for those bands who administer their own school and all other costly programs. If in a certain year they are building a large capital facility such as a water system or a school building, it will be very high. So if an analysis is done in a reasonable and fair way, without a calculated effort to distort, it will show that funds are allocated on a fair and equitable basis.

The blatant inference of the hon. member that somehow some bands, who have more influence than others have the ear of the department, and get a very high amount while other bands get a very low amount was made without taking into account the three different possible ways of delivering funds. What hon. members think of generalized distortions of the type resorted to by my friend, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River is for them to decide. Needless to say, I do not think very much of them.

As to the other question raised by some hon. members with respect to the principle of local government, let me just say that I think the department and I would carry out the concept of local government for Indian bands. This concept is one we heartily endorse. We endorse it in the sense that would cover a whole range of local governmental responsibilities to be taken over by a band council and not just in certain areas such as education and cultural activities with rather limited emphasis that I detected in what the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River said. We have had some considerable work done in this area. Along with the standing committee as an aid I hope to ascertain the feelings of the native people. I hope to discuss the matter at some future time with the chairman of the standing committee, and I hope to look into this whole question of consultation with respect to the ultimate devolution of far more responsibility at the option of the bands who wish to exercise this full range of government responsibility.

May I now move on to another area. Again, I think another very serious distortion was made, and it should be clarified. I believe the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River indicated that some bands had money for per capita distribution and that some evil, paternalistic minister of Indian affairs was residing some place and refusing to have per capita distribution made to minors under the age of 21. I think the hon. member used the word "starving" in that respect. That is ridiculous. What happens when a band has the money and its chief and band council, wish to make a per capita allocation under the act? There is no degree of volition on my part; it is subject to the advice of independent law officers of the Crown. Any minister would have to abide by the advice because of the Canadian system of parliamentary government, whether he be an NDP minister of Indian affairs, a Conservative or a Liberal one. He would have to take that advice because ministers cannot give themselves legal advice. That legal advice is that the Canadian government and the minister of Indian affairs would be held accountable legally by any minor upon attaining the age of majority if the individual does not discharge his responsibility in a legal and proper way along the lines of the concept of a trustee. If a minister of Indian affairs turns over a per capita share to a minor as if he were an adult, perhaps turning it over to the parent, that child, upon attaining the age of 21, if the parent has misused the money and did not make it available to the child in the way it should have been made available, that child can sue the government for irresponsibility in turning over his per capita share to someone else when he was a minor, and recover it when he attains majority. Not only is the government held accountable for irresponsibility in the allocation of the per capita share legally, but the minor may not receive the money at all.

We have been able to find a compromise in the situation, with legal endorsement, in limited amounts of per capita share for minors, that is $250 a month or $3,000 per year per child. That can be turned over to parents and charged off against the per capita share of the minor. There is nothing paternalistic about this. There is no desire to starve some innocent Indian child, as was so exuberantly distorted by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River. It is certainly not based on any motivation to be paternalistic; it is based on a solid legal opinion.

I must say that if there is a desire on the part of the standing committee or of members of the House to change that, they can change the Indian Act. Parliament can direct the Ministry of Justice to give legal opinions based on a legal statute. We do not have a different statute right now. We have the statute that Parliament last passed. I take it all hon. members want the statutes passed by this Parliament respected until they are changed.

I am now moving on to another area, again dealing with some of what I think are unfortunate distortions that arose relative to the British Columbia region. Again, I am referring to how serious some of the charges are. The following figures should be noted as far as the B.C. region is concerned. The region of B.C. has an on-reserve population of approximately 34,500 Indian people. In the year 1981-1982 a total of $101.2 million in grants and contributions, $4.7 million in capital facilities on reserves, $9,266,843 in child care and $21,322,615 was used for education payments under the master tuition agreement. These four items total $136,489,458, which, as anyone here would be prepared to acknowledge, represents a substantial commitment to the Indian people of British Columbia.

In order to indicate what is happening in that region with respect to the topic which the member opposite wishes to stress, that is, the level of program operation being undertaken by Indian bands themselves, let me tell you that in 1976, the department had over $20 million in British Columbia under band control and less than 100 bands were operating programs. In addition, we have reduced, not increased, the department's regional staff to 559, while the number of band employees has grown less than 300 to 970. This rapid transfer of services is clear evidence that the region is not only sensitive to the needs and wishes of native people but is providing them with the needed tools for self-overnment.

Can we not take into account some of these additional factors before making some of the wide sweeping and I think dangerous allegations, almost bordering on smear, covering a whole group of people? Many of them are civil servants, both native and non-native, who should be given the benefit of the doubt, whose good intentions should not be doubted. Many of them are well motivated, as perhaps many Members of Parliament are, and because they are public servants they cannot defend or speak for themselves.

It is getting to be rather ritualistic. If my predecessor in this portfolio were here with a Liberal opposition criticizing him, and indeed if the minister were an NDP minister of Indian affairs, he would be defending the public servants who are under attack and cannot defend themselves in the House. That is how obvious it is that this type of charge can be made for political exploitation, but it is purely ritualistic and has no substance. We all know, if the roles were changed, what they would be saying in the House if public servants were charged in this way.

This is why I find it so unfortunate that we, as adult politicians, resort to a rather phony process and ritual through which we go each time the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development come up in the standing committee or are debated in the House.

I could go through other areas which some hon. members raised about staff, for example. I think the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) asked about teachers, and so on. I will send him figures tomorrow which clearly show, without boring the House, that there has been a diminution in the staff of my department. I realize how obviously disillusioning it would be if we took a teacher from the Department of Indian Affairs and transferred him to an Indian band to take over an educational program, and then said that it was a reduction in our staff. Taking away that factor, there has been a diminution in the staff of the Department of Indian Affairs.

I opened my remarks by complimenting the committee on its work. As some hon. members have mentioned, I visited the James Bay area. When I returned I assigned one of my major advisers in the department, Mr. Tait, to follow through on the matter, to visit the communities, and to assess the James Bay areement, not in its strict legal context. I already had legal opinions. If we wanted to take it from a strictly legal point of view, it would be very difficult to establish in any court that there has been a breach with respect to federal obligations under the James Bay agreement. That was not the preoccupation of the committee, as I understood it. Certainly it was not my preoccupation as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am concerned with trying to deal, to the best of my ability, in an equitable and fair manner with the native people of the country. If they clearly perceive that an agreement is not fair or is not being implemented in a fair and equitable manner, because we are taking advantage of legal technicalities to their deprivation, it discredits governments generally and is unfortunate. Of course it is something which should be avoided.

I asked Mr. Tait to look at it from the perspective of the spirit of the agreement, whether the general intent as opposed to the legal interpretation had not been lived up to in any way. I asked him—and it was not a very hard, objective standard by which to assess an agreement—to do the best he could and to try to assess where there were shortcomings within the terms of reference. Also I asked him to try to put a dollar figure on it and to try to rectify the situation, so that basically more moneys could flow to the communities to improve the health conditions to which the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway) referred and many other areas referred to in the agreement.

That exercise took a long time. There is no doubt about it. He had to assess the situation and to report. I directed that the report be sent in draft form to Bill Diamond, the Grand Chief of the Cree, and to Charlie Watt of the Inuit people. I wanted them to see whether they felt that the report was a reasonable one. I wanted them to suggest changes which, hopefully, we would be prepared to adopt. It was to and fro with the draft before I took it to cabinet.

I went to cabinet. I assessed the costs. I have been working it out with my colleagues as to where we could find the money. All hon. members will be glad to hear that the process is just about completed. I hope to be in a position in the forthcoming week to ten days to meet with the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras), with Billy Diamond and with the Inuit people to resolve the matter. I should like to thank all hon. members for their help. I think it is a real achievement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): On the economic development front, I can only say that there has been some very real achievement. The Indian people have said to me—and I do not know what they have been saying to a lot of opposition members—that the panacea, almost in those strong terms, for all social ills from which they suffer is economic development. The social ills from which they suffer, such as alcoholism and the spin-off deleterious effects of unemployment—demoralization, marital life problems and so on—could be corrected overnight in a preventive way rather than in a curative way after the damage is done, if emphasis were placed upon economic development so that Indians, through their own initiative, could create jobs and employment. That is the area upon which they would like emphasis placed in terms of correcting the many social problems identified by hon. members today in the House. Indeed, these problems were identified in the document dealing with Indian conditions which I published when I first became minister. I am talking about high mortality rates, high suicidal rates and so on. These are all signs of the stark and abysmal poverty of the Indian people in some parts of the country.

We have seen the commitment and will of the goverment to do something about it. Perhaps we could talk in positive terms with respect to our native people. We have indicated that we are prepared to commit moneys to native economic development. There were such moneys included in the budget of October. Over the next four years, in addition to the moneys which are already committed in the estimates of our department, $345 million is committed for the native people of Canada. This is a major commitment and it is indicative—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Nickerson): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his allotted time has expired. He will need unanimous consent of the House to continue. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I thank hon. members. I might indicate that that money will be added to $8 million for last year for major imperative projects and an additional $5 million this year. Also there are the ongoing programs in the department. I am talking about an approximate $8 million to $10 million in direct guaranteed loans for economic development. There is a $35 million contribution in terms of economic development moneys which we have already allotted. They are not counted in the $345 million, or in the special allocation of $8 million to $10 million, or in support services of $15 million. We are now getting some substantial money to put emphasis upon the much-needed area of economic development.

Let me touch upon another area to which hon. members referred, the area of education. Some native people would like us to touch upon some of the positive areas rather than the negative ones constantly and incessantly. There has been very impressive upgrading of standards and achievement by native peoples in the educational area. There are now more than 10,000 students and 157 band-operated schools. We expect—and the figures show that it is true—that the enrolment will reach at least 20,000 by 1986. Similar impressive improvements are being made in post-secondary enrolment. As recently as 1969 only about 800 Indians, as opposed to the present 10,000, were pursuing courses in post-secondary education. This is something from which all of us can take some satisfaction. Indeed, we congratulate native people for placing emphasis upon the educational system. It is some reflection of our desire and commitment of funds to provide the facilities for them to achieve those much needed numbers.

I can only conclude by again indicating in terms of equity and fairness the tremendous emphasis which has been put on comprehensive and specific claims in the last two years as well as much added expenditures by this government over what has ever been done in the past. I am also talking about my immediate predecessor government. Negotiators have been put in place in all the comprehensive claims north of 60 and they have been given the research moneys. When I first became minister there were no negotiators in place. There was very little research money to allow them to even approach a state of readiness to negotiate as well as to settle any specific claims made by the provinces, such as the most recent claims by British Columbia and the maritimes.

I could go on with a list of accomplishments but just let me say that, with the commitment now in place in the Canada Act to the recognition of treaty and aboriginal rights plus the political will shown in the allocation of needed funds to meet the priorities of the native people, perhaps we have entered a new era. Perhaps more has been done and more emphasis has been placed on the concerns of the native people in the last year and a half to two years by this government than in any other comparable period in the history of Canada.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to ask one very short and important question of the minister.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member has sought unanimous consent and unanimous consent has not been granted.

Mr. Burghardt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Due to the interest shown in the minister's presentation this evening, and being a member of the standing committee I know that committee members from all three parties always welcome the appearance of the minister before the committee, I wonder whether it would be permissible, as it is nearly ten o'clock, to ask if the minister would be prepared to continue his presentation and to give his views and explain the operations of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his involvement. I wonder if all members would agree to that?

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand the point raised by the hon. member. I hear some members saying that it is not a point of order. However, it is quite acceptable practice that if an hon. member seeks unanimous consent he is given enough time during a point of order to do so. Having said that, the issue is whether or not the hon. member has unanimous consent for his proposal that the minister continue to be available for questions. Before I recognize the hon. minister I have to seek unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to continue his participation in the debate?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) on a point of order.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that case, the Chair has no difficulty. I have to recognize the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). There was an hon. member from the New Democratic Party who just spoke and I have to move to another party.

Mr. Anguish: I believe my name was on the list.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In due course, perhaps I could discuss the matter privately with the hon. member and explain the procedure to him.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to pick up the shreds of a 20 minute speech when I originally had 17 minutes and now, with points or order, I have six.

Mr. Chénier: Summarize.

Mr. Huntington: I will have to. First, I come from a riding which has a very substantive native population. Indeed, I think that in terms of the global and the native community it is a very fortunate and successful community which has good self-government. I think that some wonderful Canadian citizens are coming out of the universities and other institutions who were produced by that community.

Now that the Liberal Party is so proud of the negotiations that were started by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), in terms of the settlement in the Penticton cut-off case, I would hope that they could now proceed with the IR No. 5 lands cut-off problem because we could not proceed with that in the thirty-first Parliament until the Penticton matter had been settled and that process of evaluation had been established.

In his address, the minister spoke rather extensively of the legal point of view. I suppose it is because of his professional background. He talks of spirt and legal intent. It is this area of communication between the Canadian community at large and the communities of our native people, particularly with the community and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, with which I have some concern. I keep repeating that Solzhenitsyn, in addressing the western world, has warned us about what we are getting into as we increasingly drift into a legalistic type of society where everything becomes dependent upon legal interpretation. As I see it, a behavioural and attitudinal problem has developed within the department that is at odds with what I have always considered to be the Canadian sense of fair play and morals and the rough give and take of the business community.

Since I have been a member I have had to deal with the economic development that has been attempted in Bella Coola where an entrepreneur builds a marine way and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development builds a marine way beside it, and neither are economic so they collapse. Another example is a hotel being built by one entrepreneur and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development building another hotel, and both collapsing because of being uneconomical.

I have had to deal with the Ehattesaht matter where the department poured $5 million into a logging operation, which was a very sound economic development project for the Indian community. However, the students were paid the full trade rates in the forest industry so that within six months $5 million went down the drain and $1.7 million of receivables were lost by the industrial community around it.

If there is to be economic development in the Indian community, which I agree with the minister is their way out of many of the social and human problems they have, surely we must apply the basic rules of the marketplace and the balance sheet to that area.

I have arrived at the minister's point on legalistic terms and sense of legal intent. The minister wrote me a letter on April 29 concerning the Toussowasket problem. In my riding there is an engineering and contracting firm which has gone into receivership as a result of the legalistic games that have been played by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the band chief in the area. Donaldson Engineering Company is a firm in my riding which has now gone bankrupt and had received a Supreme Court judgment against Toussowasket Enterprises. The minister wrote me a letter telling me to have that firm proceed, that another $300,000 had been arranged to be paid to the band, and that the FDBD receivership claim, which was prior, had been paid off, so my constituent could proceed. I went to seek legal opinion on how accurate, on a legal basis, the minister's letter telling us to proceed was. I could not believe the game had been played. Obviously, a good part of my time here has been used up to prevent me from putting on the record the disgusting game, in terms of legal technique, that has been played to avoid the settlement of a Supreme Court judgment on behalf of a contractor who had performed legitimate and complete work in the Westbank Indian Band, Toussowasket Enterprises. The band chief, with the assistance of the legal department of this government has created the shell behind which there are no assets on which that judgment can be made. It has been done in one of the most shameful ways that I have ever witnessed in a lifetime in business. I have never in my life seen such legal trickery being used. I am sorry I have to use such extreme language, but I did not have enough time to put this properly on the record of the House. If I have been extreme, it has been because of the pressure of time. I see that it is ten o'clock and my time is up.

• (2200)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair regrets to interrupt the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), even though the hon. member is my twin, but it is ten o'clock.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been made.

CRIMINAL CODE—REQUEST FOR SEVERER PROVISIONS AGAINST PROSTITUTION

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Montréal-Mercier): Mr. Speaker, this week, I put a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) regarding a matter that is causing some concern to a number of mayors in Canada, namely, soliciting for the purpose of prostitution. For some weeks we have been receiving letters from the mayors of various municipalities including Vancouver, Niagara and the Quebec City area, urging us to amend the Criminal Code so as to make this a more serious offence and thus enable the police to carry out more arrests.

Mr. Speaker, it is my humble opinion that our mayors are making a serious mistake if they want to use the Criminal Code in order to correct a situation that is causing traffic problems or a disturbance on the sidewalks of their municipalities. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think we have seen that there are a number of activities that take place on municipal sidewalks and these may include selling religious objects, selling other products that are not altogether legal, such as drugs, or soliciting with a view to prostitution, and I think that if we want to use the Criminal Code to regulate all the activities that take place on these sidewalks, the Code is, in my view, sufficiently clear in this respect. In any case, in one case in Alberta, in Calgary the Westendorp case which is now before the Supreme Court of Alberta, the municipal bylaw of the city of Calgary which prohibited activities related to prostitution on sidewalks was upheld. Mr. Speaker, that is why I am opposed at this time to any changes in the legislation and in the Criminal Code. I feel that, now we have adopted a charter of rights which guarantees equal rights for women, we cannot allow this kind of discrimination, which has already been with us for too long, to continue.

Recently in this House, we tabled a report on battered women and we know what the response of some of our colleagues was in this House. Statistics also show that two thirds of working women in Canada are paid the minimum wage. Then, I ask myself this question. Why should we victimize any further these women who, whatever we may say are practising a profession as old as the world itself and which was not of their own choosing? Reports of inquiries all indicate that these women are exploited persons, that they are victims and more cruelly beaten than the others. These women are at the mercy of people who exploit them as far as drugs and money are concerned. They are the victims and we want them today to be still more victimized.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we are shifting the problem and when I referred to the statistics provided by Statistics Canada on offences dealing with prostitution, the legislation was amended in 1972, and since 1972, I noted that there has been no dramatic change. Indeed, from 1976 to 1980, there has been a decrease in the volume of offences and I think this is merely due to the fact that the law is not enforced. Moreover, as I mentioned it to some of the mayors in connection with other activities such as pornography in public places such as theatres and elsewhere, there are no statistics on arrests, no offences reported. The number of reported offences with respect to pornography is so low that the Canadian statistics do not even take them into account. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I wanted in the first place to point out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) the views of several women's organizations which appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs whose proceedings unfortunately are not televised.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we have sections in the Criminal Code that deal with indecent acts, nudity, loitering, disturbing the peace, procuring, bawdy houses. For procuring we have penalties up to 10 years, and looking at the statistics in that area, out of 1,520 charges laid, 60 males and 18 females were arrested in 1980. Where are all the people exploiting Canadian women in such distress, what did the provincial governments do? What do municipalities intend to do? I would invite all those prudish mayors and authorities, all those police officers, all the people charged with enforcing the law, to look at the Criminal Code and find out that sections dealing with these matters are already in it. Section 195.1 already deals with soliciting and arrests can be made. But let us not prohibit women from walking the streets thus increasing discrimination. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I hope the committee on justice and legal affairs and also the Minister of Justice will at least and at best maintain the section as it is. And if we have any courage, let us recommend that this House repeal that section because I feel that those who exploit that trade should be very severely punished. Our statistics should not report for a whole year in Canada only 60 cases of people convicted of such a serious offence, as exploiting. In other countries mention is made of white slavery. These things happen to young people. Currently I am told that in Vancouver, young people are involved. The Young Offenders' Act provides for severe penalties for abduction of a minor, and I wonder what provincial attorneys general are doing, I wonder what provincial authorities are doing, what police officers and judges are doing in those cases.

Looking at statistics I tell myself that once again we are the most victimized members of society, and it is not by changing the law or by putting teeth into it that we will correct the problem. I see that what concerns our colleagues is a case heard in British Columbia, where a police officer used as bait could not get one of those girls convicted. The facts of the case are clear, I think that the police officer simply did not do his job properly or should have been better informed, because I think that if we want to enforce the act as it is, it is very easy to do, but let us not be hypocritical and tell people that because this is a federal act and the Criminal Code, that the federal government is doing nothing in this matter when in fact the blame should be put on local authorities.

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien), I shall reply this evening to a question asked by the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette), who has just spoken on the same subject. Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Justice told the hon. member in the House yesterday, members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs are now considering the issue of solicitation for the purposes of prostitution. As a member of this committee, I have myself attended all the proceedings on this matter and on Bill C-53.

As the hon. member has just stated, the mayors of Vancouver, Calgary and Niagara Falls, as well as the mayor of Etobicoke, in his capacity as Chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Commission, have appeared before the committee. On the one hand, Mr. Speaker, the mayor of Vancouver asks that the Criminal Code be amended. He would like the offence of solicitation not have to be qualified as insistent or persistent. He would also like the customers who solicit prostitutes to be charged, but on the other hand, the mayors of Calgary and Niagara Falls would be happy to have the problem dealt with by municipal bylaws. The mayor of Calgary even urged the members of the committee to do whatever is necessary to guarantee that these bylaws cannot be considered ultra vires.

Finally, the Supreme Court of Canada has granted authorization to appeal the issue of the legality of the Calgary bylaw, and this appeal will be heard only in September, 1982. According to the testimony, it seems that the municipal bylaws of Calgary, Niagara Falls and Vancouver deal effectively with prostitutes and their clients, whether men or women.

To my knowledge, no change in the section of the code which deals with this matter has yet been suggested to the members of the committee, in the event it should be established that this section no longer meets present needs. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the hon. members that the committee is still considering ways to settle this difficult issue and that it should be able to comment on it and to bring forward suggestions by next fall.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—ROLE OF PAROLE BOARD OFFICER. (B) NATURE OF SUPERVISION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak about a very serious matter. I know all members of the House agree it is serious. I think it is appropriate for me to point out the question I raise is within the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) who, and this is quite an uncommon occurrence, but one I commend, is here tonight. I understand he will be replying to my remarks. I know the Solicitor General is here because he is deeply concerned about the matter my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), and I raised on Monday. It concerns the terrible case of a man named Kocurek who was convicted recently in British Columbia of the killing of a 15-year-old girl on August 2, 1981. The tragedy, and that is all that it can be described as—a terrible tradegy—is made more terrible by the fact that Kocurek was out at the time on what is called mandatory supervision.

Kocurek had been convicted of indecent assault on a four-year-old girl, but after he had served two-thirds of his sentence, he was out on mandatory supervision. As pointed out by the Solicitor General, this is a matter of law. It is very interesting that the federal authorities are reported in the press as having said that Kocurek could not have received ordinary parole because he was considered dangerous. He was denied parole, apparently, because reports said he liked to choke women during the sex act. One psychiatrist's report warned that he would kill if he went untreated. He was released on June 22, 1981, as the Solicitor General knows, after he had served two thirds of his sentence. I agree with the Solicitor General that in law that was all that could happen. He had to be released, but justice officials then warned provincial authorities and the local mental health authorities that, and I quote from a press release:

Kocurek should be carefully monitored and reports made to his parole officer.

Unfortunately and tragically, when he missed his appointment at the mental health clinic, apparently nobody told the federal authorities. Apparently the federal parole authorities were not able to keep close enough supervision on Kocurek, so his activities were not in fact monitored.

The matter of mandatory supervision has been raised before, and I want to remind hon. members that on October 29, 1981, the Solicitor General said in answer to a question in relation to mandatory supervision put by my Conservative colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

When I got the study in July—

This was in relation to a study on mandatory supervision.

—I circulated it through the criminal justice constituency across the country. I indicated that I would wait until the end of October for their comments on these recommendations.

That was October of last year.

I expect to close the book on receiving comments from these groups shortly. I hope that within a few months I will be able to go to cabinet with proposals for change and for improving the mandatory supervision system.

Later, on January 27, 1982, another colleague in my party, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), raised the matter with the Solicitor General, and the Solicitor General said, as recorded in Hansard:

• (2215)

—and I am planning to go to cabinet shortly with proposals for change.

On June 14 the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and I raised this matter in the House. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra asked:

Why was Kocurek allowed to be lawfully at large, carrying a pistol and handcuffs, after failing to show up for his first scheduled visit to the mental health unit?

Then I asked:

Was there in fact a parole board officer to whom Kocurek was supposed to report? If there was, why was that parole board officer not keeping track of what Kocurek was supposed to be doing? I refer especially to his refusal to turn up at the mental health clinic? Why did no one know about this?

The Solicitor General replied:

—I would like to have the opportunity to look into that further before answering the question.

It is interesting that a paper was delivered on November 13, 1981, by Graham Stewart, the executive director of the John Howard Society of Kingston. With respect to mandatory supervision he said:

I would like to add here that in addition to mandatory supervision not being able to either offer control or substantial assistance, the report acknowledges that staff involved in the mandatory supervision are not able to identify those who are likely to be dangerous even if they could assert this control.

It may or may not be appropriate to maintain mandatory supervision—I am inclined to think that it is not—but what is certainly of importance is that as long as it is maintained in the law, and I understand the difficulties the Solicitor General has with this because it is mandatory, then surely he can do something to tighten up the so-called supervision that goes with it.

I know the Solicitor General is deeply concerned about this case and others, as are the people in the part of British Columbia in which this happened, and as are all hon. members. I would ask the Solicitor General to give us some assurance tonight that the report to which he referred many months ago will be dealt with. I know it takes time to get cabinet decisions but I hope that even before that is forthcoming the Solicitor General can give us some assurance that supervision is taking place and will continue to take place. I hope he will do more than tighten up the system, but will improve it considerably.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the kind words said about me by my hon. friend. In three short minutes I should like to talk about this case and, what is more important, about the system of mandatory supervision.

As I said I would, I have inquired into the matter and have learned that Kocurek was reporting to a parole officer. He was supposed to report every two weeks and he did. Between his reports there were telephone calls. I can assure the hon. member that if there had been any knowledge at all of the alleged facts—that he was carrying handcuffs and a fire arm with him—he would have been in violation of his mandatory supervision and it would have been suspended.

In addition, he was to report for psychiatric attention regularly. He missed one of those appearances and phoned the mental health unit to inform them that he had the flu. That may well have been true—he may well have had the flu. No further check was made into the claim that he had the flu and before any further visits were to take place, the tragic murder occurred.

A terrible dilemma is presented by dangerous offenders who are reaching the end of their sentence. The simple fact is that as they reach the end of their sentence it becomes inevitable, because the sentence is limited, that they will be on the street. The question which is presented to society and the question upon which I ask my hon. friend to reflect and upon which he will be called to vote when, shortly, I hope, tougher legislation will be introduced in connection with mandatory supervision, is do we as a society get a better handle on these dangerous offenders by having a period of time when they are on the street but still under warrant? In these circumstances they could be watched and be subject to conditions and be guided by psychiatrists, social workers and parole officers.

On the other hand, is it better to keep them in until the very end of their sentence? I wonder if the extra eight or nine months of incarceration, which is about the average, would make them less dangerous or less of a threat? Is it better to keep them in until society has no more right to claim their attention or give them direction, and then let them out cold turkey into society?

We have always had the theory in our country, because we have had early release for decades, that it is better to get the individual into the street for some period of time, recognizing the risks but having the benefit of being able to control and direct them. That is one of the arguments for mandatory supervision and I ask my hon. friend to reflect on that when my proposals are brought forward, which proposals preserve mandatory supervision but considerably toughen it up.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAY-OFFS. (B) NOTIFICATION OF UNIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, on May 20 I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) a question about the CN announcement of lay-offs in Transcona, Point St. Charles and Moncton. At that time CN announced a six to eight-week shutdown in addition to the usual summer shutdown; six on the "motive" power side and eight on the car side. Since then the lay-offs have been extended to ten weeks past the summer shutdown, thus adding to the problems of many of my constituents who work in those shops, and further compromising the role of the CN as a service and not just any other out-for-a-quick-buck business enterprise.

In answer, the minister said that it was not his policy to interfere in the day to day affairs of CN. I reminded him that he did not have any qualms about interfering in the activities of VIA Rail when he saw fit, and surely the lay-off of thousands of people could not be rightfully regarded as simply a day to day activity. Now, when he has the opportunity to do something intelligent with regard to the railways, he sits on his hands and says it is none of his business.

The fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that it is his business. The CN acts upon the instructions of the government, and since 1975 has been instructed by the Liberals to make a profit at all costs. Indeed, up until 1982, it was doing just that. Then, because of traffic reduction and subsequent revenue loss—thanks in part to the economic mismanagement of the Liberals themselves—it has not made a profit and this has led to the lay-offs; not because there was no work or no future for the railway, not because there will be no need for the equipment which will go unrepaired during the lay-off, but only because they did not make a profit. In my view, this is the ultimate in shortsightedness and social irresponsibility; the kind of thing only Conservatives could be happy with. By that I mean the Tories have always wanted Crown corporations like CN to operate only according to profit and to hell with the lives of the workers.

I have nothing against an efficiently run railroad, Mr. Speaker. All railroaders want to feel they are part of an efficient and admirable enterprise. To this extent they also have been glad that the CN has redeemed itself in the public eye, even though most of its historic debt was due to inheritance rather than operating deficit. But no one is in favour of the short-term profit motive when it comes to transportation. Transportation is not a need which is going to go away; it will always be with us. The railway will always be an important part of that transportation system, especially as we move into the energy-scarce future.

The CN must be given the money it needs for capital expansion and expansion in general, but this money must not come from Canadian farmers through changes in the Crow rate, or from railway workers themselves in the form of lay-offs. It should come from general revenues as an investment by the Government of Canada in the future of this country, a future in which the Canadian National and other Crown corporations will be used as instruments of the public interest and not as isolated meaningless profit centres.

• (2225)

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members are aware of the facts. Faced with a first quarter loss—not a profit as the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) would lead the public to believe—of $34.7 million and no immediate improvement in the economic outlook, CN Rail announced an extended close down of its three main shops, in Moncton, Montreal and Winnipeg. The close down will be in addition to the normal four week summer break, July 12 to August 6, 1982, and will affect locomotive and freight car repair operations. Both operations will re-open October 15.

Lay-offs in the railway industry as a result of a decline in traffic have taken place before and are not considered an unusual response in times of slow economic activity. For example, in 1975, CP temporarily laid off 3,000 workers for seven weeks in the post-holiday period. In 1977, CN instituted a four-week extension to the normal holiday period for some workers.

The hon. member said that workers could be working and repairing existing equipment. At the moment, CN has 240 locomotives and 8,000 freight cars sitting idle. I am confident that CN is maintaining its fleet adequately. It is simply a case of there being fewer cars and locomotives to maintain.

Mr. Blaikie: Not all those cars are repaired. Eight thousand are waiting for repair.

Mr. Flis: I am surprised that the hon. member encouraged the minister to interfere in CN operations by directing it to cancel the lay-offs. As the minister explained to the hon. member, the role of a minister with respect to Crown corporations is to indicate general policy guidelines. It is not to dictate how many people should be laid off over what period of time. He did not say, as the hon. member mentioned tonight, that it was none of his business. That is not what he said at all. He said his role is to set policy. Why have Crown corporations if the minister is going to be involved in the day-to-day operations of these Crown corporations?

Mr. Blaikie: I am complaining about policy.

Mr. Flis: Decisions regarding lay-offs are not easy ones to take and are not taken lightly by railway management. I share the hon. member's concern for the employees affected in this difficult period. However, it should be remembered that employees with at least two years' service enjoy 80 per cent of their normal take home pay as a result of UIC payments and the provisions of their collective agreement. Employees with less than two years of service are entitled to normal UIC benefits.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. This House is now adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow morning.

At 10.28 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

POLITICAL PARTIES

POLICY RESOLUTION PASSED BY WATERLOO LIBERAL ASSOCIATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, on Monday night at the annual meeting of the Waterloo Riding Federal Liberal Association a resolution was adopted calling on the Liberal government to abandon its high interest rate policy. Instructions were given to represent such a position at the fall policy convention of the national Liberal Party. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House urges the Liberal government to heed the words of the Waterloo Liberal policy chairman, Victor Coté, that "I don't think you have to be an economist to know there is something wrong with the current policy", and speedily introduce a new economic policy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT

CONGRATULATIONS TO PARLIAMENTARIANS CELEBRATING TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Madam Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On June 18, 1962, the people of Canada elected four Liberal members under the leadership of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, and one NDP member. These five members continue to serve the House of Commons on behalf of the people of Canada. They are the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan), and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House sends its congratulations to these Members of Parliament, wishes them good health and happiness, and prays that they may continue to serve the people of Canada and the House of Commons for many years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes).

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

EQUALITY IN WORK PLACE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, last evening, because of the leadership and dedication of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the proposed new National Training Act was amended in committee to provide equality of opportunity for handicapped people in federal training programs. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House instructs the government to bring forward new initiatives that will ensure equality of opportunity for handicapped people in the work place.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT

ANNIVERSARIES OF TWO NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I do not think my motion will have any trouble receiving unanimous consent. This is an important day for two distinguished members from the city of Winnipeg in addition to those mentioned by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is 74 today, and his outstanding record of service is widely known and admired. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) today celebrates his twentieth year, as noted earlier, as a Member of Parliament, crowning a career which includes being a member of a school board, being on a city council, and being an MLA. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House offers both these gentlemen congratulations and best wishes on this important day in their lives.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR PEACE RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, yesterday in his speech the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) said, and I quote from page 18561 of Hansard:

—in British Columbia responsible native political leaders have been starved out and the department has purchased itself the kind of help from among the Indians who may be prepared to sell out their brothers and sisters for their own selfish gain. They will no doubt be the representatives at the conference.

This is a slur on many responsible Indian leaders in British Columbia, and particularly on Chief James Gosnell, who was elected by the Aboriginal Peoples Constitutional Conference in British Columbia to be the spokesman for British Columbia Indians at the constitutional conference. Chief Gosnell is a fighter for his people and is not the kind of person—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member making a speech or presenting a motion?

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, I move:

That the House give the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River unanimous consent to rise in his place at the earliest opportunity and withdraw the remarks and apologize to the Indian people of British Columbia and to their leaders.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE MINISTRY

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), I move:

Given the fact that the salary of the Minister of Finance now stands at $102,100, which means that at 25 cents a throw he can play 408,400 video games of Pac-Man, and since this could take several years of the minister's time, that we all send the man packing.

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT MINISTER OF FINANCE EXPLAIN CURRENT SLUMP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas the dollar has reached its lowest level since Confederation, and interest rates have reached their highest level in many months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) explain to the House how he has managed to have a dollar that is so devalued, interest rates and unemployment that are so high, and galloping inflation, all at the same time, something economists have never seen before.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for presentation of this motion?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED REACTIVATION OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON ACID RAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that negotiations with the United States with respect to acid rain have collapsed almost totally, and whereas the lacklustre and ineffectual performance of the Minister of the Environment has contributed to a considerable degree to this failure, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the minister immediately reactivate the subcommittee on acid rain, a request the committee members themselves made many months ago, so that the committee can continue its discussions on acid rain with its United States political counterpart where progress was being made last year before its work was abruptly terminated by the government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, whereas all things that come from on high are not necessarily good for one's health, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That if the Minister of Finance is out walking on Parliament Hill today, he keep his head up so that he does not get run over by a falling truck.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Oral Questions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

PRIME INTEREST RATE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would he explain to the House why Canada has to live with a 18.25 per cent prime rate, a rate higher than such countries as Japan, Switzerland, Holland, the United Kingdom, West Germany, France, the United States and Belgium—indeed it is twice the rate of places such as Singapore or Spain—bearing in mind the havoc it is wreaking on millions of Canadians from coast to coast?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite aware of the trends of the last short period which have resulted not only in pressure on the Canadian currency but also in a very regrettable rise in the prime bank rate yesterday. Short-term interest rates have been strengthening in the United States. That has an impact on Canada. The United States currency has strengthened against the Canadian dollar and against all currencies. That is the explanation why, at the present time, the Canadian currency and the Canadian prime rate have been affected.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—LEVEL OF RESERVES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The minister must be aware of the fact that today our dollar touched the low of 77 cents in relation to the United States dollar. That is 7 cents below where it was when the minister introduced his budget last November. The minister has lost $1.4 billion in our foreign exchange fund so far during the month of June defending the dollar. This is at the rate of $100 million for every business day. Would the minister indicate to the House what exactly his strategy is with respect to the Canadian dollar? How does he intend to recover those lost reserves? Is the minister going to back into the lines of credit that were established, or sell off gold that we now hold?

• (1115)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the expression used by the hon. member when he described the use of reserves was that they were being lost. The expression has also been used in the House that these reserves have been spent.

Mr. Lawrence: It is a hemorrhage.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member knows that what happens is that American dollars are transferred and converted into Canadian dollars. These are added to the cash balances of the Government of Canada. There are no funds lost. There are no funds spent. American dollars are converted into Canadian dollars. I believe that is a very important point for the hon. member to understand.

GOLD RESERVES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Finance who must be aware of the fact that he began this month with reserves of approximately $2.8 billion. He is now left with approximately $1.3 billion in reserves. How does the minister intend to replenish that loss of funds? Does he intend, as is rumoured, to continue selling off gold, or does he intend to back into lines of credit? Would the minister inform the House whether he is going to try to clear the picture by finally bringing in a new budget at the earliest opportunity so as to get some certainty back into the Canadian business community?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not the intention of the Government of Canada to sell off its gold reserves. As I believe the hon. member knows, my predecessor had established a practice of selling off, as appropriate, certain amounts of gold reserves.

Mr. Gamble: That is good advice.

Mr. MacEachen: But that has not been the practice in an effort to iron out fluctuations in the Canadian dollar. We do have standby lines of credit with the banks and we draw on these as required. I believe the hon. member will agree with me that the use of these reserves for the purposes indicated does not represent a loss. It does not represent an expenditure. It represents a transfer of American currency into Canadian dollars which are added to the cash balance.

Mr. Stevens: Is it a good thing?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is attempting to create the impression that these funds are in some way lost and have vanished into thin air, but that is not the case.

LEVEL OF INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. The average Canadian is so angry at the minister's economic policies that one of them has come to Parliament Hill and placed a truck on a crane outside this chamber right now. The reason, of course, is the increase in interest rates, which means that Canadians renewing their mortgages may be paying between 19.25 per cent to 20.25 per cent, and owners of small businesses, like the man outside with the crane, will be paying between 19.75 per cent and 22.25 per cent on loans just to stay in business. A major retailer in Vancouver, Margetson-Lee, is going under. What answer does the minister have to give to these businessmen and Canadians? How can he reconcile these latest increases in rates with his promise made to the House on June 1 that he proposed to do everything possible to bring interest rates down?

• (1120)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is the intention of the government to do everything possible to bring down interest rates. There are various proposals which are being made to bring down interest rates that, in my view, would be more damaging to the Canadian economy than the present situation. I have noted that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition on one or two occasions was asked with respect to the inter-relationship between the Canadian and the American dollar and between Canadian and American interest rates, and that he himself acknowledged that he had not found a different way of handling the problem.

Mr. Clark: That is a falsehood.

Mr. MacEachen: I hope, if hon. members have a different way, or have an alternative, that they will bring it forward.

REQUEST THAT BUDGET PROVISIONS BE WITHDRAWN

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. While he tells Canadians to abandon hope, our alternative, as he requested, is for him to abandon his budget.

A special government survey of business investment intentions for 1982 indicates that for the first time in 14 years there may be no real increase in business investment and that investment plans for the year are down 5 per cent in the last six months. The minister knows that the reason for this drop in investment is because of the hostile environment created by his budget provisions. How can he justify his delay in withdrawing those measures in the budget which are creating the depressed economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I once again disagree totally with the hon. member's premise. The hon. member has the very false idea that the recession through which Canada is going at the present time is somehow related to the tax measures of the last budget.

Some hon. Members: It sure is.

Mr. MacEachen: If she pursues that line of logic, she might explain how these tax measures could affect the United States, how they could affect West Germany, or how they could affect every European country. Could she explain how the tax measures in the Canadian budget have brought about 30 million unemployed in the OECD area? Her questions and her analyses are so amateurish that they hardly deserve a reply in the House of Commons.

REQUEST THAT INCREASE IN PRIME RATE BE HALTED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, when it comes to running the financial affairs of the country, the Minister of Finance is the last person in Canada who should call anyone else an amateur.

The Government of Canada has had the brilliant policy of favouring a perpetual rise in interest rates as a means of artificially propping up the dollar. As every Canadian knows, that has not worked to keep the dollar up, but it has worked in the destruction of businesses and jobs. Considering that since the Versailles meeting alone the prime rate has gone up a full 1.25 per cent and that, as a result, with understated figures, 1,000 businesses are likely to go right out of business and 25,000 more men and women will likely lose their jobs when those businesses disappear, will the Minister of Finance take immediate steps to ensure that there will not be another rise in the prime rate in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks that the government take immediate steps to prevent a further rise in the prime rate. I assure him that no one regrets more the increase in the prime rate at the present time.

I want to assure the hon. member that, rather than favouring an increase in the prime rate, and rather than favouring an increase in the bank rate, the government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have done everything possible under the circumstances to prevent a further rise in the Canadian bank rate, and subsequently in the Canadian prime rate. The hon. member can be assured that we are doing everything possible to prevent these increases. But I do not believe that there is an alternative policy to be employed in the present circumstances that would not have the effect, in a very short time, of putting additional pressure on current interest rates in Canada. I wonder if the hon. member believes that it is possible for this country to insulate and isolate itself, in a sense, from all the market forces in other countries. That is the alternative policy that he must have deep in his mind when he asks a question like the one he just asked a moment ago.

Mr. Broadbent: I have no such empty-headed isolation policy in mind. The minister has already heard in the House today that there are least a half dozen countries, and many more industrial countries, that have interest rates which are substantially lower than our interest rates that are due to the interest rate policy pursued by the Government of Canada.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering that other countries are able to have lower interest rates, not simply because they do not have the same proximity to the United States as we do, but because they primarily have sound economic policies provided by their governments for their people to create business confidence, why does the Minister of Finance not duplicate that? In short, why does he not announce that there will be a major new direction in government policy in Canada by the end of next week at the latest, and restore some international confidence in the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is correct in saying that there are some countries that have lower prime rates than Canada. The two notable cases which he could bring to mind, of course, are Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany.

The reason in both cases is that they have been able to establish inflation rates much lower than Canada's. The hon. member knows that, and must understand that it is a basic fact of life. Further to that, he understands as well that there is quite a difference in the relationship between Canada and the United States. The size of our trade account and the size of our capital flows with the United States are very large indeed in comparison to any of these other countries.

We have benefited in the past from our economic relations with the United States. We have benefited from that very large market, and in these circumstances we are being harmed by that very same source because of the extraordinarily high real interest rates in that country and the impact that this has on our capital markets and on our currency. That is the point that has to be understood. These rates in the United States, as Mr. Brock said this past week, are tragically high. They are holding back recovery in the United States and in Canada. That is the difference between our situation and that of the other countries to which the hon. member makes reference.

ROLE OF RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, since the two points that the minister has just made are indeed inextricably related and should show the Government of Canada the reason for change, I would ask him to consider that it is true that West Germany and Japan have had lower inflation rates but the reason for this is that they have had an industrial manufacturing strategy policy for years which has emphasized research and development. They have put emphasis on creating a first rate manufacturing sector. Why does the Government of Canada not duplicate that instead of selling off resources, getting us into more debt in the short run in that line?

Second, considering the minister's reference to the United States, I, too, agree with what he said. We have carried on major trading with the United States, but considering that that trade has resulted in massive, billion dollar deficits with the United States in manufacturing goods, which has caused the drain on the dollar, why does the Government of Canada not move to redress that imbalance which would produce a better value for the Canadian dollar and more jobs for Canadians?

• (1130)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: Do you understand the question?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised a number of points—

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, in reply to yours!

Mr. MacEachen: —and I have no complaint about that. I believe the hon. member has accepted a good part of my analysis of the situation.

Mr. Broadbent: But want some action to get out of it.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, yes, he has related a better performance in the Federal Republic of Germany, for example, to its insistence or emphasis on research and development, as I understood the question. I have no intention of dismissing that as an important factor, because the Government of Canada is also placing a very strong priority on research and development.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Who are you kidding?

Mr. MacEachen: But when I listened to the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany at the Summit, a friend of the hon. member for Oshawa—

Mr. Lawrence: And of your own Prime Minister.

Mr. MacEachen: —his explanation, as I understood it, for the strong performance in the Federal Republic of Germany at the present time was the restraint demonstrated by the trade unions in their wage settlements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I think it is worth telling the hon. member, in the interest of dialogue, that the Chancellor pointed out to us that the largest industrial union in the world, the German Metalworkers, recently made a settlement lower than the rate of inflation in an effort to bring the rate of inflation down further, in that country. But I believe that is a very important element in any economic policy. I ask the hon. member, does he subscribe to the belief that in the present circumstances wage settlements and income demands, not just those of workers but of those in all sections of society, including managers, executives and businessmen, in order to get us out of this difficulty, ought to be restrained and that those people should reduce their income demands upon the economy? Does he agree with that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I will wait until the Minister of Public Works has finshed having his nervous breakdown before I put my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cousineau: How low can you get, Joe?

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we have just heard the Minister of Finance referring once again to policies in countries other than Canada and refusing to address the urgent need for his government to act in a way which will solve problems which his government has created here in Canada. A moment ago he said that his government wants to do and is doing everything possible to prevent increases in interest rates in this country. He knows that the National Energy Program is driving investment out of this country which could create jobs, investment which must earn high interest rates in order to be kept here or be brought back. Why, then, if he is doing everything possible, will he not withdraw or change the National Energy Program?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: It is supported by all the provinces.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised the question of the National Energy Program and has asked us to withdraw the program as a way of helping the current situation. The National Energy Program is an essential part of the policy of this government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —because we believe that it is essential that Canadians get greater ownership and control of this strategic sector of our economy. That is our belief, and the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Andre: Why are you putting the boots to the Canadian-owned companies then?

Mr. MacEachen: —is entitled to have a different view, but that is the view of the Government of Canada.

Recently the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did make—

Mr. Lawrence: You want government control, not Canadian control.

Mr. MacEachen: —some very important adjustments in order to assist this industry and in order to provide a greater cash flow for the various firms in the industry. That is our attitude. We are prepared to make adjustments as a result of changing circumstances, but we are not prepared to withdraw the National Energy Program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: And you are wrong!

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF BUDGET MEASURES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, knows that his program has bankrupted Canadian energy industries and has aided only the Arabs. But the point we are making here is that he has just solemnly said that he is prepared to do everything possible to prevent high interest rates. It is absolutely 100 per cent clear that the National Energy Program is driving away investment and that we must use high interest rates to bring investment back here. If he were telling the truth about wanting to bring interest rates down, he would get rid of the National Energy Program because it is driving interest rates up. That is absolutely clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He says that he wants to do everything possible to bring interest rates down. He has brought in a budget, the effect of which has been to drive investment out of this country and to undermine investor confidence which must be restored by high interest rates. If he wants to do everything possible to decrease interest rates in this country, why will he not withdraw those provisions of his budget which are causing increases to interest rates in this country? If he wants to be believed and wants us to think that he is telling the truth—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Clark: —why will he not withdraw those measures of his government which are causing interest rates in Canada to go way up?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that there are no such measures in the budget which are causing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Read it, for goodness' sake!

Mr. MacEachen: —interest rates to be sent way up, as the Leader of the Opposition puts it. There are no such measures. The Leader of the Opposition knows that, because he cannot specify such measures.

IMPACT ON INTEREST RATES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Just so that I can be clear and the people of Canada can be clear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —I would like to ask the minister another question. We know that it is not the position of at least 27 members in the Liberal Party who have attacked the budget and the national energy policy because of their effects on creating unemployment in Canada and driving interest rates up, but just so that we have some understanding of the extent of the ignorance and naivete of the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —is he telling the House of Commons that the National Energy Program has no effect on Canadian interest rates and that the budget he brought in has no effect on Canadian interest rates? Is that what he is telling us?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): What I am telling the Leader of the Opposition is that the specific measures in the budget have not had and do not have the effect of sending interest way up in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: When the Leader of the Opposition wants to mention specific measures that he has in mind which are having the effect of sending interest rates up, then I will consider them. He is unable to do it, and if he refers to naivete and ignorance of economic policy, I do not think that there is a better demonstration than that given by him every time he rises to ask a question on the economy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MEASUREMENT OF IMPACT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I am prepared to take such glimmers of progress as we can find. The Minister of Finance has changed his position again. He said that the government is not pushing interest rates way up. Is he prepared to concede that this budget policy and his energy programs are pushing interest rates a little bit up in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: If he is prepared to accept the reality that they are, and if he wants to be believed when he says that he is doing everything possible to bring interest rates down, will he change those provisions of his policy which he indicates are pushing interest rates a little way up in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1140)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not made any such indication. I have asked the Leader of the Opposition for the third time to specify the specific items in the budget that he believes are sending interest rates way up. For the third time he has failed to do so, and he has failed to do so because he does not know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, surely the Minister of Finance should recognize by now that his economic policies have produced the worst of all possible worlds. Through his economic policies he has created crippling interest rates, destructive inflation, higher unemployment, no growth, no confidence in the economy, and a disaster for the Canadian dollar. Furthermore, he has caused farm bankruptcies and business bankruptcies to reach an all time high. How long does the minister intend, as Minister of Finance, to pursue these destructive policies which are destroying the economic fabric of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member wants to ask a question rather than make a series of rhetorical statements, I will be pleased to answer his question. I do not intend to get on to this kind of rhetorical trend that the opposition is using when its members really cannot put together concrete specific questions.

DOME PETROLEUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, in addition to the record number of business failures, small business failures, and farm bankruptcies, we now know that on the horizon there is a number of big name bankruptcies looming, and specifically Dome Petroleum. May I ask the Minister of Finance if the government is considering any kind of a bail-out provision for Dome Petroleum and, if so, what is it? Has he had any discussions with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or are we simply going to ignore the small business enterprises and bail out some of the pets of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. member for ending his statement with a question. The answer to that question is no.

SMALL BUSINESS

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICIES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Governments, both federal and provincial, have been urging Canadian business to concentrate more on new fields such as microelectronics and high technology. Given the fact that the Canadian government and provincial governments are amongst the highest purchasers of these kinds of products, given the fact that small business in Canada is almost 100 per cent Canadian owned and provides 60 per cent of all the jobs in Canada, and given the fact that in the United States 30 per cent of all government purchases are specifically directed to small business, would the government give consideration to adopting that kind of policy, so that small business which is facing increasing difficulties and thousands of bankruptcies—would be able to survive in the difficult period we are experiencing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the question is directed to me. It seems to be a question more clearly directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but I will take notice of the question on his behalf because it has to do with policy.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE MEASURES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): This is a supplementary, Madam Speaker, to a question asked a few moments ago by one of the Conservative Party members. In testimony before the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs committee which has been looking into bank profits, it has become apparent that our Canadian banks have been very ready to make very large loans to large Canadian corporations for takeover purposes, loans which these companies have not been able to repay, and on which very frequently they have not even been able to meet the interest payments. At the same time Canadian banks have been calling in loans of small businesses, increasing the demand for collateral, and have been forcing, as the minister knows, close to 5,000 small businesses this year into bankruptcy. Can the minister say what specific steps, if any, he is going to propose to alleviate the difficulties of the small business community; or are we to except, not 10,000 bankruptcies, which we will have at the present rate, but possibly 15,000 bankruptcies by the end of 1982.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member had based his question on evidence which he alleges was presented before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I am pleased that the committee is studying all these questions. When the committee reports, which I hope will be very soon, I will be pleased to consider any specific recommendations which its members propose with respect to the operation of the banks and the practices which they follow in making loans. If the committee recommends legislative changes to the Bank Act, based upon the evidence, then of course that would also be considered by the government.

STATEMENT MADE BY SENATE GOVERNMENT LEADER

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister may know that in the last week of May, Liberals in the province of British Columbia held a convention. He may know also that several of his colleagues in the cabinet, also attended that meeting and that among them was the government leader in the Senate. The Vancouver Sun dated May 29 quotes that person as saying the following:

> The federal government has major initiatives up its sleeve designed to revive the economy and create jobs—

Did the Government—and you will remember that this was before the congress at Versailles—on May 28 have major initiatives up its sleeve, to revive the economy and create jobs, while still controlling inflation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there are lots of things up one's sleeve. The important thing is when they are taken out.

QUERY RESPECTING CABINET POLICY

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I would hope that the Minister of Finance would shake his sleeve and tell the 1.2 million unemployed what major initiatives he has, and this government had on May 28 of this year. Otherwise, can he explain to this House if it is a policy of this cabinet, in which he is the Acting Prime Minister, to allow ministers to flim-flam the people of western Canada and mislead them by double-talk and double-think?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member refers. I have not discussed the matter. I will be pleased to look into the source of the hon. member's information. I would tell him in reply to his interest that, as I indicated earlier in the week, I intend to be making a statement to the House. Whatever is up the sleeve or out of the sleeve will be disclosed at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE ON CAR RENTAL FIRMS

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is directed also to the Minister of Finance. In the minister's budget of November 12 he reduced the capital cost allowance on automobile rentals from 30 to 15 per cent. Since that time he has rescinded part of that directive and has actually increased the capital cost allowance on daily rentals. I suppose that would include people such as Hertz and Avis. He has increased it to 40 per cent. At the same time he left the automobile dealers of this country, who lease cars, at the original 15 per cent rate. Will the minister, in order to correct this obvious imbalance which he has created, make an announcement in his economic statement to correct this double standard and give the automobile dealers of Canada who lease cars the same advantages as are given to the daily renters?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member can convince me that I have created a serious imbalance, or that I have applied a double standard, then of course I would be pleased to consider his representations. I do not believe that either has happened, that there is an imbalance or that there is a double standard in application.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TAKE ACTION

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I do not know what we have to do to convince the minister that there are problems facing small business in this country. One of the problems is that of the small businesses and the car dealers who lease cars. If a car dealer in Canada leases 400 cars at 15 per cent capital cost allowance, he stands to lose $67,000 in the first year. Now Statistics Canada tells us that car sales in Canada are at a ten-year low. The car dealers of Canada, Madam Speaker, do not need this Minister of Finance. They wrote to him on March 6, they have telephoned him numerous times since then, and they have yet to get an answer from the Minister of Finance. My supplementary to the minister is very simple: just what does he propose to do to correct this screw-up he has created?

• (1150)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I said to the hon. member, if he has a serious proposal to make and if he wants to demonstrate that there is an imbalance or a double standard, I would be pleased to listen to him, but in his question he has cited some statistics which I do not believe are correct or will stand up under examination.

Mr. Bradley: Read your mail, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member wants to demonstrate that he has a case, I wish he would do so and not rely, as is the custom every day in the House of Commons, on rhetorical and abusive language in order to make a point.

FINANCE

AUTHORITY TO DISPOSE OF TAXPAYERS' PROPERTIES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In the budget papers of November 12 last, it is stated that the minister may acquire and dispose of any interest in a taxpayer's property that the minister is given the right to acquire in legal proceedings or under a court order. What is the dollar amount which would trigger the Department of National Revenue's seizing a taxpayer's home and selling it from under him, and what is the status of such a seizure if an objection or an appeal has been registered and has not been heard?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, as far as I know the department does not actually get involved in seizing homes. There have been more instances in which, if all efforts to come to an agreement with the taxpayer have been exhausted, we obviously apply to the courts for the moneys that are owing to us. The sheriff in such a case would take whatever course of action is open to him under provincial law. However, to my knowledge there are no cases in which the Department of National Revenue has seized and sold homes. If indeed the member has a specific case he wants me to look into, I would be glad to do that.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I am trying to prevent specific cases. I am wondering why this is in the act.

Mr. Lalonde: Hypothetical.

Mr. Kempling: No, it is not hypothetical. The government has the power under the Income Tax Act to seize and sell chattels. It has the power to garnishee wages. It has the power to seize and sell assets, and the power to seize a taxpayer's bank account.

REASONS FOR DEPARTMENTAL POWERS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister why he is seeking the power to seize and dispose of a taxpayer's home. How much power does he want?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, we do not want, need or request any more power than we have at the present time, I know of no instances in which homes have been seized or sold by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Kempling: Why is it in the budget?

Mr. Rompkey: I do know that in some cases it is proper for the department to put liens on bank accounts and to extract moneys from bank accounts; that is, proper under the law.

Mr. Clark: Why are you seeking new power?

Mr. Rompkey: I know of no cases in which homes have been seized and sold. If the hon. member has evidence of that, I would like to hear from him.

Mr. Clark: Read your budget. Maybe you missed the last two pages of the budget.

WORLD ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I wanted to address my question to the Secretary of State, but he is not here. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his parliamentary secretary are not here. I would like to address my question to anybody in the government who might be able to answer it. It is an important question, and time is running out.

My question concerns the type of government support that will be made available to the World Assembly of First Nations which will be held in Regina next month. This Assembly will attract indigenous people from all over the world. Thousands of people are expected to attend this event. Entertainers, and the international press will be there. On March 9, I wrote to the Prime Minister asking what type of support the assembly will be receiving from the federal government, but as yet I have not received a response. It is important that we are informed, because many people will be coming to Regina. There is a shortage of facilities in Regina. The organizers need some assistance from the government. Is the government prepared to say at this time whether it will be supporting the assembly?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the decision taken on that matter by the government is that the Assembly should be supported out of the regular budgets and existing programs of the various ministries. I can inform the hon. member, for example, that the RCMP has been invited to play a support role at that Assembly and that the force is delighted to do so.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, it is good to know that the government is willing to provide assistance in the form of RCMP officers, but is the government also willing to make assistance available in the form of providing accommodation, food, and health services to the 25,000 or 30,000 people who are expected to descend upon Regina next month? It is good to have police there if problems do arise, but what about some assistance to prevent problems from occurring?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the police role to which I refer is not one of crowd control. It is participation in the event. The RCMP will be doing that because it was requested to do so.

With respect to the larger question, the support that will be forthcoming from the government will be limited to that which can be provided by departments out of existing budgets and existing programs.

HOUSING

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. What words of encouragement and what hope can the minster give young people in Canada who wish to own their own homes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when young people in Canada address inquiries to me directly, I will be pleased to respond, but I will not attempt to provide advice and responses through the hon. member. He has a responsibility also to provide whatever advice he is asked for.

Mr. Lawrence: Our advice is for you to get out.

PROPERTY TAX DEDUCTIBILITY PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, the minister knows very well downpayments are not the problem. The problem is carrying charges. The minister will be making a financial statement. Is he considering a mortgage interest and property tax deductibility program to get the construction industry out of the doldrums it is in today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the mortgage and tax deductibility program introduced in this House by my predecessor, I think the answer quite clearly is no.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Only in Saskatchewan you say.

AIRPORTS

USE OF MIRABEL FOR ATLANTIC CANADA ROUTES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I would like to know if he is still planning to divert flights which might affect Atlantic Canada or travellers to and from Atlantic Canada to Mirabel and, if so, has he consulted the various ministers of transport, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, the chambers of commerce of Atlantic Canada, or any others who might give advice on this matter respecting the cost and difficulty involved in any such transfers of flights?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I know my hon. friends opposite try these days to invent all kinds of questions having to do with Mirabel, but we have never had such intentions, so consequently I cannot comment further.

Mr. McCain: Madam Speaker, I hope that means the minister has abandoned the idea of transferring any flights within Canada to Mirabel.

COST OF GROUND TRAVEL BETWEEN DORVAL AND MIRABEL

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, if the minister is still considering this, which apparently he is, has he given any consideration to the cost which will be imposed upon the traveller who arrives in Montreal on a flight diverted to Mirabel and who may connect with Atlantic Canada? Conversely, has he given any consideration to the additional cost in terms both of time and money which will be involved for flights connecting from Dorval to Mirabel to other points of destination?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this question is very elementary. We investigated all possibilities, as I said, and at all times we had the interests of the carriers, the interests of travellers, and the interests of governments in mind. We were looking at all costs that any of the scenarios previously described would incur. The question is really a basic one. We looked at all possibilities. We looked at all factors.

DEFINITION OF DEPRESSION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that the inflation rate is unacceptably high, that bankruptcies in the country are running rampant, that our dollar is at a record low level, and that the number of unemployed is the highest ever, would the Minister of Finance, who has used—today and frequently—the words "recession", tell us what is his definition of a depression? Most Canadians losing their businesses and homes consider this to be a depression.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not have a definition of a depression because I do not think we are in a depression.

• (1200)

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, perhaps I can help the minister by telling him that psychological depression is listening to an answer given by the Minister of Finance. An economic depression is receiving the results of actions taken by the Minister of Finance.

HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): May I ask the Minister of Finance more specifically what is the reason that we have a program of high interest rates if the result of such a program is for farmers, fishermen, businessmen and investors in the country to lose their businesses? What advantage is that to the country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have explained, and the Prime Minister has explained, that we do not have a program of high interest rates. High interest rates exist, but they are certainly not sought or promoted by the Government of Canada.

PETITION

MR. SCOTT (HAMILTON-WENTWORTH)—PROHIBITION OF GROUP SEX

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the two hundred and seventy-first report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) on Thursday, June 17, 1982, and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1982-83

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, the point of order I raise at this time is basically the same as the point of order I raised last year on June 1, March 31 and March 24, and which has been raised several times in the past by myself and others, going back to 1969 when the rules were changed in regard to the handling of the estimates and appropriation bills.

About this time last year, Madam Speaker, you summarized and clarified the position of the Chair in regard to this matter. If I might quote briefly from your remarks which appear in Hansard for June 12, 1981, on page 10456 you stated:

> In 1971 the Chair ruled that items in the Estimates that attempt to amend existing statutes are of order. This was confirmed by most subsequent rulings.
> In 1974 and 1976 the Chair went further and dealt with the question of matters of substance being put in the Estimates. The Speaker, in effect, ruled that the Appropriation Act is not the place to seek authority to do something such as to establish a program. Rather, the Appropriation Act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute.
> In 1977 the Chair continued to lay down these principles that should be followed in the use of the Estimates and added that it makes no difference whether the item attempted to spend a large sum or simply one dollar. The distinction is unimportant. The test is whether or not the government is putting forward a spending estimate under authority it already possesses, or whether it is really seeking new legislative authority to do something.

You then quoted a previous Speaker and added in your own words:

> In other words, the government may not by the use of an Appropriation Act obtain authority that it does not have under existing legislation.

In summary, Madam Speaker, you indicated first that estimates that amend legislation are out of order, saying that: "the Appropriation Act is not the place to seek authority" for a new program, and that the test bust be whether the government already has the authority to spend or the estimates seek that authority. You said that the government may not use the Appropriation Act to seek authority that it does not already have.

Based on that test, Madam Speaker, and based on those clear rulings made by yourself and your predecessors, I believe that there are a number of votes in the Main Estimates, 1982-83 which violate those principles laid down by yourself and your predecessor.

I should like to deal first with a number of votes which basically try to do the same thing, that is, they seek authority which does not appear in existing legislation. I should like to read from one of those votes, Madam Speaker. Communications Vote 1, which appears on page 3-6 of the Main Estimates, reads as follows:

> Communications—Operating expenditures, the grant listed in the Estimates, contributions and authority to spend revenue received during the year ... 97,961,000.

The offending words are "and authority to spend revenue received during the year". What the vote says is that $97,961,000 is requested for operating expenditures for the grant listed in the estimates—although no grant is listed in the estimates—for contributions and the authority to spend additional money which will come into the Department of Communications by way of revenue. That is what that spending authority seeks to do, Madam Speaker.

I refer Your Honour to the definitions in the Financial Administration Act. Section 2(d) reads in part as follows:

> "public money" means all money belonging to Canada received or collected by the Receiver General or any other public officer—

It goes on to define that as "money received or collected for or on behalf of Canada". Therefore, all money received by the government, whether the Department of Communications, the Receiver General or anybody else, through licences, fees or anything else, is public money according to the definition in the Financial Administration Act.

Section 11 provides that "all public money shall be deposited to the credit of the Receiver General". That is to say, all receipts in whatever form, licences, fees or what have you, are by definition public moneys and, by definition, are to go to the Receiver General and therefore, by definition, are to go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Section 19 of the Financial Administration Act provides:

> —no payments shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund without the authority of Parliament.

Section 20 states:

> All estimates of expenditures submitted to Parliament shall be for the services coming in course of payment during the fiscal year.

That is to say, the estimates for the following year must clearly define the amount of money to be spent for that particular service. An estimate cannot just say that a department has additional authority to spend whatever receipts may come in by virtue of fees or licences or whatever.

Section 21 provides that where an appropriation is made for any purpose in any act of Parliament, there must be a warrant from the governor in council and that must be appropriated from the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

As proof of the legal interpretation of the intent of this act, I bring to Your Honour's attention Bill C-96, to amend the Financial Administration Act, which has been introduced for first reading. Clause 7 of that bill states as follows:

> The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 20 thereof, the following section:
> "20.1 (1) A vote in an Appropriation Act may provide that receipts and revenues may be spent for the purposes specified in that vote."

What this attempts to do is to make legal and proper what is attempted in Vote 1 of the Department of Communications estimate by use of the phrase "and authority to spend revenue received during the year".

Clearly the legal officers in Treasury Board have recognized that they do not have the authority in that provision to spend revenue, and by the vote seek to get that authority by putting in the words "authority to spend revenue received". Through changes to the Financial Administration Act in Bill C-96, they are seeking to make it legal, so that they will not to have to acquire the authority through an Appropriation Act.

Citation 486 of Beauchesne's fifth edition provides:

> If a Vote in the Estimates relates to a bill not yet passed by Parliament, then the authorizing bill must become law before the authorization of the relevant Vote in the Estimates by an Appropriation Act.

● (1210)

So it is quite clear that if Bill C-96 was passed, there would be authority to spend those receipts. If it is not passed, there is no authority. They are seeking through the estimates to achieve that authority, and that is inappropriate according to Citation 486 of Beauchesne.

In addition, Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention several other votes which concern us in the same way. Communications, Vote 70, dealing with the National Museum, reads:

> —authority to spend revenue received during the year from the sale to the public of books—

And so on. Those are public funds to go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund according to the Financial Administration Act and the spending thereof must be authorized by a specific vote. That portion of the vote is out of order; that is, the authority to spend receipts. Communications, Vote 80 is the same, dealing with the Public Archives.

Energy, Mines and Resources, Vote 1; Environment, Vote 5; Finance, Vote 1; Public Works, Vote 10; Supply and Services, Vote 1; Transport, Vote 1, Vote 10, all end with the phrase:

Program expenditures and authority to spend revenues received during the year.

Transport, Vote 45 reads:

—and authority to spend revenue received during the year including the spending of an amount equal to, in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue, the amount received—

And it goes on. Clearly, Madam Speaker, those votes seek authority which does not exist under current legislation. The government is in fact attempting, through Bill C-96, to gain that authority. If it succeeds, then presumably it would not need that language to seek that authority; but at this point in time it does not have that authority.

In spite of the Chair's very clear rulings there is one vote—perhaps two others, but I am not certain so I will not raise them now—which seeks to amend legislation. I am referring to Privy Council, vote 1 which states:

Program expenditures, including the operation of the Prime Minister's residence; the payment to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a minister without portfolio or a Minister of State who does not preside over a Ministry of State of a salary equal to the salary paid to Ministers of State who preside over Ministries of State under the Salaries Act, as adjusted pursuant to the Senate and House of Commons Act—

The Salaries Act, as amended last July, states the remuneration to be paid to each minister. Section 5 states:

The salary of each Minister of State, being a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, who presides over a Ministry of State is $30,800 per annum.

What Vote 1 of the Privy Council seeks to do is amend that act, because it says that ministers of state who do not preside over a ministry of state will have a salary equal to that paid to a minister of state who does preside over a ministry of state. That is exactly parallel, Madam Speaker, to a vote which you ruled out of order, appropriately so, last year, being vote 30 of Agriculture in the 1981-82 Main Estimates. That vote stated, and I quote:

Agri-Food Regulation and Inspection—Contributions including compensation at rates determined in the manner provided by Section 12 of the Animal Disease and Protection Act to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under that Act that have died or have been slaughtered in circumstances not covered by the Act.

So that vote attempted to extend the act to situations not covered by it. Quite properly, Madam Speaker, you ruled that was an amendment to the legislation. Privy Council, vote 1 does exactly the same thing, and is clearly out of order based on your ruling of last year.

Another series of votes which I believe to be out of order is Public Works, Votes 15, 25 and 35, which seek authority for expenditures not authorized under existing legislation. Vote 15 reads:

Capital expenditures including expenditures on works on other than Federal property and authority to reimburse—

And so on. The key words are "expenditures . . . on other than federal property". Madam Speaker, the Public Works Act in Section 9 provides:

The Minister has the management, charge and direction of the following properties belonging to Canada, and of the services in this section enumerated, namely:

And then subparagraph (h):

—all other property that now belongs to Canada and the works and properties acquired, constructed, extended, enlarged, repaired or improved at the expense of Canada, or for the acquisition, construction, repairing, extending, enlarging or improving of which any public money is voted and appropriated by Parliament—

So what this act says is that when the minister spends any money extending, improving, etc., any property, it belongs to Canada. That property belongs to Canada. There is no authority granted to spend money on non-government-owned property. If the minister improves the buildings, puts in leasehold improvements, they become the property of the minister. The only exception is when there is a distinct subsidy involved.

I would also point out that the recognition of that fact is obvious from Bill C-91, which has been given first reading only, which states in Clause 1:

• (1220)

The Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, incur expenditures or perform, or have performed, services or work in relation to (b) properties not belonging to Canada.

What Bill C-91 would do if it were passed is give the minister legal authority to do what he is attempting to do through Votes 15, 25 and 35 in the estimates. No authority exists for the minister to spend public moneys on non-public property based on Section 9 of the Public Works Act. Bill C-91, which has not been passed by this House, seeks to give the minister that authority, but until it is passed it is now law.

Again, I refer to Citation 486, I believe it is, of Beauchesne which says that you cannot anticipate legislation in the estimates. A vote is out of order until the legislation is passed.

The other class of votes which are out of order are those perhaps best demonstrated by IT and C votes 25 and L35 on page 14-6. It is my submission that these votes attempt to create a new program which is clearly contrary to the decision you made last year at this time, Madam Speaker, when you said:

—the Appropriation Act is not the place to seek authority to do something, such as to establish a program.

I might refer in particular to Grants Vote 25, which reads:

Payments in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council to companies engaged in ship repair on the Canadian east and west coasts for the construction and extension of dry docks and for the purchase and construction of supporting facilities.

There is no program of that sort, Madam Speaker. Perhaps there should be. We are not speaking against the program. The telltale language there is the terms and conditions approved by the governor in council. In essence, we are being asked to delegate to the governor in council authority to set up this program under the terms and conditions the government decides. That is not in keeping with your ruling, Madam Speaker.

Vote L35 is perhaps a more obvious example of attempting to set up a new program. This vote reads:

Loans in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by regulations of the Governor in Council,

(a) for the purpose of promoting the establishment, growth, efficiency or international competitiveness of Canadian industry and to foster the expansion of Canadian trade to a person engaged or about to engage in a manufacturing, processing or other commercial activity; or

(b) to a person who has previously obtained assistance under a program of assistance to industry or any trustee or receiver authorized by law to carry on the business of such person for the purpose of protecting the Crown's interest resulting therefrom.

Very clearly, vote L35 would give the governor in council regulation-making authority. We are being asked through Vote L35 to give the governor in council the right to make law, the right to make regulations, to set up a whole new program to promote the establishment, growth, efficiency or international competitiveness of Canadian industry. No one is arguing about the merits of the program. Clearly it is a whole new program complete with its own set of laws and regulations which Parliament is being asked to authorize through an appropriations bill. That is clearly contrary to the conditions of your ruling of last year.

Vote 40 of Public Works, which is found on page 23-54, reads:

Land Management and Development—Program expenditures, contributions and authority for Toronto Harbourfront Corporation to spend revenues received during the year in respect of Toronto harbourfront properties owned by Her Majesty and payments to a corporation to be established for the purposes of developing the port properties of Chicoutimi owned by Her Majesty.

That is out of order for two reasons. First, the authority to spend revenues. These are Her Majesty's revenues which are public moneys and which should go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund according to the Financial Administration Act. But we are being asked to delegate the authority to spend those revenues to the Toronto Harbourfront Corporation, which is a Crown corporation of some sort, I guess. It is one of the mysterious 400 Crown corporations that are making life so wonderful for Canadians. In any event, it is clearly contrary to the Financial Administration Act.

Second, it is for the purpose of payments to a corporation to be established. The government is asking us for authority through this vote to establish a new Crown corporation. That clearly goes way beyond what is the proper role for a vote as articulated by yourself and your predecessors, the Hon. Mr. Jerome and the Hon. Mr. Lamoureux. Those votes are clearly out of order.

One last vote which is clearly out of order is Secretary of State, Vote 40. This one is almost an affront to the House. It is out of order because the government relies on an authority that exists but is not valid. At page 26-42 we find Vote 40, which reads:

Contributions, and authority to make payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to charge said payments to the National Lottery Account, for the purpose of physical fitness, amateur sport and recreation programs in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by order of the Governor in Council, the aggregate of said payments and payments made pursuant to paragraph (d) of Treasury Board Vote L27a, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1976, not to exceed at any time 5 per cent of the aggregate of the amounts credited to the National Lottery Account.

It relies on its authority for paragraph (d) in the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1976, Vote L27a. However, if you look at Vote L27a of the Appropriation act No. 4, 1976, it states: "To provide, in respect of Loto Canada". I shall put on the record paragraph (d) of Vote L27a. It reads:

(d) in the current fiscal year, for the purpose of physical fitness, amateur sport and recreation programs in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by order of the Governor in Council, of an amount not to exceed 5 per cent of the amount credited to the said Account in the current fiscal year; and—

In other words, this authority, the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1976, which is used in Vote 40 of the Secretary of State's estimates for 1982-1983, has essentially been dead for six years. The government is using authority which ended at the end of that fiscal year. "In the current fiscal year" is the operative language.

Mr. Beatty: It is like the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who has been dead since last November.

Mr. Nielsen: But he will not lie down.

Mr. Andre: I will point out that the rest of the vote looks like it is setting up a program as well, and probably should have been ruled out of order on its merits.

You may notice that throughout the estimates there is the wording in brackets at the end of votes "As previously provided in Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82". That language is there, I am sure, as a result of your ruling last year when a great number of votes were examined and ruled out of order, most appropriately. The Treasury Board when drafting these estimates put in this language, as previously provided in Appropriation Act No. 2, as somehow sanctifying these votes.

• (1230)

I merely want to point out, Madam Speaker, that you and your predecessors by your decisions, by example, and I believe by statements, have clearly indicated that the fact that an improperly constituted vote might have passed in the past is not justification for saying that therefore it is okay in perpetuity and one can do that.

May I also point out that you and your predecessors have quite properly ruled that it is not the role of the Chair to go through every vote to see if it is in order, but that the Chair will rule on points of order raised by hon. members. Last year I pointed out, as I have done in previous years, that even though I had a very extensive list of votes which I felt were out of order, I did not in any way, shape or form claim that it was a definitive list. Indeed, I made the observation last year that quite likely there were numerous other votes which were out of order. I simply lacked the resources, the staff and so on to go through and check every one of these votes in terms of their legality or non-legality.

I understand what the Treasury Board officials were doing when they included the language, "As previously provided in Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82". The mere fact that that kind of language might not have been raised by myself last year, when I had an extensive list of votes which I felt were out of order, was in no way, shape or form an indication that I or other members of the House felt that it was appropriate. It was only because within any one estimate period there is only so much one can do. I just did not have the time to check the whole thing. It is pretty hard for my research assistant and I to match the thousands of people in Treasury Board, and of course I have had one or two other things on my mind.

If Madam Speaker examines the votes raised and the indications which I have presented here in particular as against the very clear, precise and concise ruling of Your Honour last year and the rulings of your predecessors, it becomes pretty clear that these votes are out of order.

I repeat to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that our object is not to confuse unduly or to cause problems for the minister. Our object is simply to get him to treat the House with respect and to obey the law and the rulings of the Chair. In drafting this document again this year, I think they have taken liberties which are inappropriate. I feel Your Honour should rule these votes out of order.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of responding to the point of order. I congratulate the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for his tenacity in this matter. I only wish it were matched by legal talent.

The first point I should like to make in responding to the arguments of the hon. member for Calgary Centre is that timing in raising points of order of this kind is of the essence. I refer to Citation 235 of Beauchesne, wherein it is indicated that an hon. member raising a point of order "should do so as soon as he perceives an irregularity in the proceedings which are engaging the attention of the House". It continues:

> The Speaker's attention must be directed to a breach of order at the proper moment, namely the moment it occurred.

Last year the hon. member for Calgary Centre had the courtesy to raise his point of order on June 1. He raised his point of order today before the last allotted day, Monday. I suggest that on that ground alone the point of order should not be entertained. However, it is not at all necessary for me to rely on that point, but I suggest that it is relevant and applicable.

The arguments put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre suffer from a number of fatal flaws. We paid great attention to Madam Speaker's ruling of last year when we prepared the Main Estimates in order to ensure, beyond any doubt, that there were no new legislative provisions provided for in the Main Estimates which I tabled. I should like to refer you, Madam Speaker, to your ruling of June 12, 1981 wherein you said:

> The test is whether or not the government is putting forward a spending estimate under authority it already possesses, or whether it is really seeking new legislative authority to do something.

Then Madam Speaker went on with two comments which perhaps the hon. member for Calgary Centre has not noted. As reported on page 10547 of Hansard of June 12, Madam Speaker stated:

> However, two of the items, External Affairs Votes L50 and L55, have previous statutory authority, albeit previous Appropriation Acts, and thus are in order.

Further you went on to say:

> As I said earlier, the programs described by External Affairs Votes L50 and L55 are authorized by previous Appropriation Acts, and therefore the moneys sought for the instalment to be paid are in order.

There is no magic in what the Treasury Board has done this year in terms of the language which has been added to the Main Estimates. It is there for convenient reference by readers of the estimates, because of Your Honour's ruling last year. In each of the cases cited by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, it is to be noted that there is previous authorization through an Appropriation Act.

Everything to which the hon. member referred has received prior parliamentary approval through Appropriation Acts. Let me deal just very briefly with a few examples of that, just to make the record absolutely clear. The hon. member referred to Communications, Vote No. 1. This is when he was dealing with the issue of authority to pay. Madam Speaker will recall that he categorized a number of votes as providing authority to a department to expend funds received within the operation of a program. On page 3-6, Communications, Vote 1 reads as follows:

> —Operating expenditures, the grant listed in the Estimates, contributions and authority to spend revenue received during the year (As previously provided in Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82).

I do not want to take the time of the House by going through each one of the sections which the hon. member raised, but if Madam Speaker refers to the Main Estimates, I can assure her that she will find in each single case the same authority and reference provided. The authorization is clearly given.

Then the hon. member for Calgary Centre made reference to the provisions of proposed legislation, Bill C-96, Section 20.1(1), where he said that we are attempting to provide for this kind of authority. Indeed, we are in strict compliance with Madam Speaker's ruling last year. We recognize the validity of the ruling which was rendered, and hence in future it will require the sanction of the provisions of the proposed law to provide for similar programs, but not for programs which have already received parliamentary approval within the scope of the ruling which Your Honour delivered and in accordance with the specific passages which I read.

Of course, the same is true with all other votes, more particularly with respect to the provisions of Bill C-91 which authorizes the Department of Public Works to expend funds on other than public property. That will provide authorization for such expenditures in the future. If Madam Speaker refers to the Main Estimates, she will note that we have been very careful to ensure that no such new authorities are provided for. Of course, as I pointed out, what is provided for are those which are there. I understand that a number of these votes which the hon. member for Calgary Centre has challenged today have in fact been in the estimates for many years, if not decades.

I suggest that the hon. member has improperly—I do not mean that in any propriety sense, or simply has not applied your ruling to an analysis of the Main Estimates as he should have done. That being said, I would also point out, as I did at the outset, that your ruling has changed the position which we have taken with respect to the preparation of these Main Estimates and we have been most careful to comply strictly with the rules which you laid down in your decision of June 12 last year.

I think I have covered the points I wish to raise. I do not want to take up a great deal of time of the House on this because the ruling is so straightforward and clear, but I think it is important that the hon. member for Calgary Centre understand exactly how the Main Estimates were prepared this year. I would like to give my assurance to him and to you, Madam Speaker, that no matter how much research he conducts he will not find in these Main Estimates any provision which is in conflict with your ruling.

Madam Speaker: I thank both hon. members for their submissions. Of course, I want to look into the different arguments that have been brought forward and I will take that point of order under advisement.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I ask, Madam Speaker, that all questions be allowed to stand, and Monday we shall try to answer as many questions as possible.

Madam Speaker: Shall the questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand?

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, if I can get the attention of the government House leader, I have the list of the questions being answered, if the government House leader would like to read them into the record today.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my colleague is fortunate to have the list. That shows how courteous we are. I do not have a list myself. That is why I have asked permission to give those answers on Monday.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CO-OPERATIVE ENERGY ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH THE CO-OPERATIVE ENERGY CORPORATION AND THE CO-OPERATIVE ENERGY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-116, to establish the Co-operative Energy Corporation and the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Madam Speaker, Bill C-116, an act to establish the Co-operative Energy Corporation and the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation, is another step toward the achievement of the goals of the National Energy Program. It will enable the Government of Canada to participate in a joint venture with an association of co-operative marketing and financial institutions. It will provide a new source of funds to the petroleum industry, new investment opportunities to individual Canadians and an increase in the share of the oil and gas industry that is owned by Canadians. The joint venture will be called Co-Enerco.

As all members of this House are aware, the capital requirements of the petroleum industry in Canada over the next decade will reach unprecedented levels. The Government of Canada is committed in the National Energy Program, to increasing the share of the industry that is Canadian-owned.

Co-operative organizations, with nine million members and an estimated $45 billion in assets, represent a significant new source of capital. In the past, co-ops have had little participation in oil and gas investments, although there has been some involvement in refining and sales. With the new financial and fiscal regime introduced in legislation, particularly the petroleum incentives program now before the Senate, and through agreements with the producing provinces, investments in oil and gas will become extremely attractive for Canadian-owned firms.

Discussions took place between representatives of co-operative organizations—and we are happy to have some of their representatives in the gallery today—and representatives of the Government of Canada over a period of months. The result of those discussions was an agreement in principle signed on December 17, 1981, and tabled in the House on May 17. Bill C-116 is the legislative expression of that agreement.

The credit for this achievement is shared among the members of the co-operative movement who participated in the discussions and supported the idea, and a number of people in the Government of Canada, most notably Senator Hazen Argue, Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board, as well as the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) whose tireless efforts turned an idea into an agreement.

Twenty co-operative organizations from across the country have so far agreed to participate, including wheat pools, retail co-ops, credit unions, caisse populaires and co-operative insurance and trust companies. They are the Alberta Wheat Pool, British Columbia Central Credit Union, Canadian Co-operative Credit Society Limited, Co-op Atlantic/Co-op Atlantique, Coopérative fédérée du Québec, Co-operative Fire & Casualty Company, Co-operators Insurance Association, Co-operators Life Insurance Company, Credit Union Central of Alberta Limited, Cumis Insurance Society, Cumis Life Insurance Company, Federated Co-operatives Limited, Fédération des caisses populaires acadienne, Manitoba Pool Elevators, Newfoundland and Labrador Credit Union Limited, Nova Scotia Credit Union League, P.E.I. Credit Union League Limited, Saskatchewan Co-operative Credit Society Limited, Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and United Co-operatives of Ontario.

While co-op participation has been nationwide, it should be noted that the western co-operative movement has taken the lead role. For example, Federated Co-operatives Ltd. of Saskatoon and the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool will be the largest shareholders. It should also be noted that the registered offices of the Cooperative Energy Corporation will be in Calgary. The government is therefore particularly pleased to join in a predominently western enterprise.

Three new organizations will be created. The Co-operative Energy Corporation, to be called Co-Enerco, will be a holding company whose only shareholders will be the Government of Canada and the participating co-operative organizations. There is the cooperative energy investment fund, designated as CEIF. The third one is the Co-operative Exploration and Development Corporation, CEDC.

The co-operative energy investment fund will sell units to the public through the credit union system. The fund will invest in energy companies and plan a valuable role in increasing Canadian ownership of this sector.

The Co-operative Exploration and Development Corporation will be an operating oil and gas company which, through this legislation, will always be completely owned and controlled by Canadians. Among the options open to the CEDC will be joint ventures with established oil companies or the purchase of an oil and gas company. The government does not wish to limit the range of options. The involvement of the co-operative movement in production and exploration will be part of a general increase in Canadian ownership and control of the upstream side of the petroleum industry, which is one of the major objectives of the National Energy Program.

The federal government will subscribe start-up capital to Co-enerco in an amount that matches the capital committed by the co-operative organizations up to a ceiling of $100 million. This figure makes it clear that although there is a limit to our participation, it is a generous limit. The potential contribution to energy investments by the co-operative organizations and their members is very large indeed. The substantial federal participation is designed to put Co-Enerco on its feet and to make available to the petroleum industry this new source of capital as quickly as possible.

Our half of the start-up funds will be turned over to Co-Enerco immediately. The co-ops have four years in which to supply their initial commitments. So far, the co-ops have committed $57.8 million, giving the corporation an initial capital of over $115 million. Further commitments from the co-ops will be matched, dollar for dollar, by the federal government until its contribution has reached $100 million.

The bill provides that the government share in this joint venture can be bought out by the co-ops in the future. From this and other provisions, it will be obvious that the role of the federal government is limited to assisting the start-up of Co-Enerco. This joint venture does not represent an attempt significantly to increase the share of the petroleum industry that is owned by the Government of Canada.

Although three members of Co-Enerco's board of directors will be appointed by the government, control of the corporation will be in the hands of the co-ops, who will appoint nine members to the board. The government does not intend to involve itself in the day-to-day operations of Co-Enerco. This function will be carried out by the co-ops. It is our view, and I am sure it is shared by hon. members, that they have a solid record of sound and responsible financial management.

For as long as the government is involved financially, major transactions of the corporation will be carefully scrutinized by the government representatives on the board to ensure that the public investment in Co-Enerco is safeguarded. This scrutiny will not be motivated by a lack of confidence in the management team assembly by the co-ops. Far from it. It will be simply a matter of normal prudence in the management of public funds, and it will have the effect of providing a double assurance to individual investors.

Nine million Canadians belong to co-operatives or credit unions. That number is a measure of the confidence that Canadians have in the management of these organizations. For the small investor who is accustomed to thinking that energy investments are particularly risky, the proven record of the co-operative organizations will be reassuring. A second level of reassurance will be provided by the participation of the federal government.

How much money will be attracted to Co-Enerco? Some representatives of the co-ops have estimated that $1 billion will be available in the next five years. That amount will make this joint venture a significant new player in the petroleum industry and it will provide an important increase in Canadian participation in the industry.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada welcomes the interest of co-operative organizations in petroleum investment. It is pleased to join in a partnership with a national network of organizations that have a long and proud record of service to Canadians in the fields of marketing and finance. We are certain that this joint venture will provide new sources of capital for the exploration and production of oil and gas, that it will provide new and accessible opportunities for Canadians to invest in our energy future, and that it will increase the share of Canadian ownership in the petroleum industry. I am confident that all hon. members of this House will support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, once again, I would like to point out that Bill C-116 will establish a joint venture called the Cooperative Energy Corporation, in which an association of co-operative marketing and financial institutions will participate with the other major partner in this undertaking, the Government of Canada. In establishing this venture, the government has three basic goals in mind: to promote the Canadianization objectives of the National Energy Program, to involve the co-operative movement in oil and natural gas production and to provide a new source of funds to the petroleum and gas industry. On December 17, 1981, the Government of Canada signed an agreement in principle with representatives of seventeen co-operative organizations with a view to promoting investment in the energy sector. Bill C-116 will give this agreement force of law.

The Cooperative Energy Corporation will be a holding company whose only shareholders will be the participating co-operative organizations and the Government of Canada. The Corporation's board of directors will have nine members appointed by the participating co-operative organizations and three members appointed by the government. The Corporation will in turn act as director of two offshoot corporations. First, the Cooperative Exploration and Development Corporation which will be an operating oil and gas company with restricted partnership. It will be completely Canadian owned and controlled. Eventually, the public may own a controlling interest in the Corporation. Among the options open to the CEDC will be joint ventures with established oil companies or the purchase of an oil and gas company. As for the other corporation, the co-operative energy investment fund, it will sell units to the public through the credit union system. It is expected that the majority of unit holders will be credit union members.

The co-operative organizations that have agreed to participate in this joint venture cover a wide range of institutions including wheat pools, retail co-ops, credit unions and caisse populaires, and co-operative insurance and trust companies. Federated Cooperatives Limited of Saskatoon played a decisive role in this project. French Canadian co-operatives include the Coopérative fédérée de Québec and La Fédération des caisses populaires acadiennes. The total assets of these co-operative organizations add up to $45 billion. So far, the co-ops have committed over $56 million over a period of four years. Some co-op representatives estimate they will be able to invest $1 billion in the venture. Furthermore, the Canadian government has promised to match the contribution of its partner up to $100 million. Obviously, the government does not intend to involve itself in the day-to-day operations of Co-Enerco. It will, however, have to approve any major transaction through its representatives on the board of directors.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress the fact that the new investment opportunities created by this legislation will make it possible for many Canadians to take part, with very little risk, in the development of our energy sector. The co-operative organizations have an excellent reputation among their nine million members, and they have a solid record of sound management. These organizations have shown a lively interest in Canadian energy investments, and I am confident that all hon. members of this House will support this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please! It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1.02 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, our party will certainly support Bill C-116, to establish the Co-operative Energy Corporation and the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation. We always welcome a new oil company, whether it be in Alberta or elsewhere in Canada. We are certainly in favour of that.

In his opening remarks, the minister indicated that this was one more example of fulfilment of the National Energy Program. He almost lost me there. I do not know why he would stigmatize this new Co-operative Energy Corporation by any association with the National Energy Program. Much as the new company is welcome, it unfortunately will not be capable of replacing those dozens and dozens of companies that have been devastated and driven out by the National Energy Program. The National Energy Program is known to the country, especially to everyone associated with the oil and gas industries, as that program which put the boots to the industry. So I would not think he would be doing it a great favour by associating this company with that program.

The minister indicated there would also be established under this cooperative effort between the federal government and the co-operatives a cooperative energy investment fund, a drilling fund, in essence, for investment in projects of the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation and of other oil companies.

May I take this opportunity also to indicate that the problem with drilling funds is in the November 12 budget. We cannot put the boots to the investors, so if we want to get drilling funds going, not just in terms of cooperative energy but drilling funds that were such an important part of our Canadianization of the oil industry from 1976 on, up to the time of the National Energy Program, he should sit down with his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). He should see if he cannot remove some of the more severe disincentives that were part of the November 12 budget. The general taxation levels have also served to discourage drilling funds.

In particular, I wonder if the minister might re-examine what he considers the grandson of the National Energy Program, which undoubtedly will be produced one day soon. He might examine extending to individuals the provisions of the petroleum and gas royalty tax rebate that was part of the son of NEP, whereby corporations did not pay the first $250,000 af PGRT. Some sort of extension to individuals would be called for, to re-encourage investment by Canadians into drilling funds. As things stand now, in order to participate and get the benefit of that, individuals will have to incorporate. Incorporation will mean great work for lawyers and accountants but it will not find any more oil or gas. If finding oil and gas and encouraging Canadian investors is what we are all about, then that is a change he should look at.

The minister informed the House that it is the intention of the federal government to participate in Co-Enerco to the extent of perhaps $100 million. He said that was generous. I ask, "Compared to what?" Compared to the $1.5 billion spent on Petrofina, that sum is very modest. One hundred million dollars is certainly a reasonable contribution, but compare it to the billions that have been blown particularly on PetroCan's purchase of Petrofina. This $100 million investment that the federal government is making here is very likely to return much more by way of value to the federal government than an equivalent $100 million given to Petro-Canada for such useless purchases as Petrofina.

I want to put on the record some of the experiences we have had with this legislation as it is before us today. It is a bad-news-good-news story. The bad news part of it is that earlier on I was presented with draft proposed legislation by the minister's parliamentary secretary. We were asked for our reactions as a political party. My colleagues and I agreed that the principle was fine. We could accept the principle and felt we could go along with it, but the legislation was atrocious. Indeed, it was extremely poorly drafted. It had in it many things to which we had been objecting strenuously—not just members on this side but members on all sides of the House—in the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. It seems there is continual pressure to put into legislation delegation of law-making authority to the governor in council, but the original draft of this bill contained the delegation of law-making authority to civil servants in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There was delegation of law-making authority, not just administrative authority. It was a terribly poorly drafted bill. That is the bad news.

The good news is that the government brought the bill to us before it was presented to the House, and we were able to overcome those problems. To me that was an example of how this place can work and should work. There were a few meetings between officials, myself and others, and I discussed the matter with members of our party. It probably took more time than it should but, nonetheless, in the course of time we were able to come up with improvements and produce legislation which addresses some of the very serious concerns we have.

I suggest to the minister and other government members that in the future they ought to examine that method of proceeding more often. They might find that this place will function much more efficiently and effectively. Their legislative programs might get through more quickly and be more effective if there were that kind of consultation. Changing legislation which has on it the stamp of approval of the governor in council is a kind of backtracking on the part of the minister or the cabinet. Backtracking is a very difficult thing for politicians to do. It should not be as difficult as it is but, nonetheless, it is difficult. There should be that kind of prior consultation and working together. Members of the House should be able to act as legislators in a real sense. They should be able to participate. I think the experience we have had commends itself, and I recommend to the minister and his colleagues that in the future they consider doing more of what has been done in this case. They might find that the harmony in this place would increase considerably, and productivity would increase considerably as well.

That having been said, I repeat that the proposed Co-operative Energy Corporation and the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation will certainly be approved by us. We trust and hope that the government will receive a good return on its investment of $100 million. We are convinced that the country will receive a good return from more activity in the oil and gas industry, and for that reason we gladly participate in this debate and co-operate in getting all three stages of this bill completed this afternoon.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this week members of the Canadian co-operatives movement met in Ottawa to discuss the future of their movement locally, provincially, nationally and internationally. One of the matters at which members of the movement looked closely was the investment by the co-operatives movement in energy development.

Bill C-116, to establish the Co-operative Energy Corporation, is a much bigger step for the co-operative movement than people realize. On many occasions I have been told that co-operatives are into everything, and "why not energy?" Co-operatives have actually been into energy. In many ways they certainly are into everything from cradle to the grave. As a matter of fact, they are involved in maternity and daycare centres right through to funeral homes. Why, then, is this venture into energy different? To understand the differences it is necessary to look at the origins of the co-operative movement.

How and why were co-operatives formed? Those of us who grew up on the prairies are vividly aware of co-operatives and credit unions. Co-operatives were spawned during hard times. They are the result of the need of producers for fair prices for their products. The pools on the prairies grew out of the need for protection from the gouging of line elevator companies that were handling producers' grain. The credit union movement started in Lévis, Quebec, in 1900 and grew, because previously people were unable to obtain money from banks even at high interest rates.

As democratic socialists in Canada, we face many of the same problems the co-operative movement faces. How can we develop our basic belief that we are our brothers' keepers and that through co-operation and sharing we can make a better life for everyone?

The co-operator, like the democratic socialist, has some difficulty translating his belief into an organization which will survive in the capitalist system. That system is based on materialistic gain and greed at the expense of others and is diametrically opposed to the principles of co-operatives. Back in the early days people found they had to protect themselves from that greed in order to survive with some security for their families. On the economic level people formed co-ops and credit unions. On the political level people formed political parties. The Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, the old CCF, grew out of the despair of the depression and, in many ways, out of the co-operative movement on the prairies. I recommend to all hon. members the play "Paper Wheat" which is the story of co-ops and the development of the wheat pools on the prairies.

The New Democratic Party has always recognized that its aims were common to those of the co-operative movement. We share many of its ideals and we share the same struggle to survive in a dog-eat-dog environment. Consequently, the New Democratic Party has done what it could to support the co-operative movement.

Only in provinces where there have been New Democratic governments are there departments of co-operatives. In the House yesterday I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question—which he refused to answer—about whether his government would establish a co-operative department. His refusal to answer perhaps shows the limited interest the government has in this particular area. Nonetheless, I repeat my question: Will this government form a department which will provide a place to which co-operatives can go?

I am speaking today in the House of Commons about this bill to establish Co-Enerco because my leader, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), has recognized the tremendous contribution and importance of co-ops and has appointed me as spokesman for co-operatives. This is the first co-operatives critic post in the federal Parliament.

Today we are debating the Co-Enerco bill which is another attempt by the co-operative movement to protect people from an uncaring economic environment. It is attempting to deal with the capitalist system by modifying it rather than by replacing it. As a socialist, I cannot entirely agree with this support of the system but I have nothing but admiration for the groups of people in the co-operative movement who are trying to cope with the system. They are trying to adapt to the present economic order and they are trying to make changes to the system to match their principles.

What is a co-operative? Co-operatives provide an organizational framework of structures and processes that enable people to co-operate with one another. Co-operatives are both associations of people and economic organizations, with social and economic goals. They attempt to merge political democracy with economic activity to create economic democracy. Co-operatives are distinctive because, first, they are owned and controlled by their primary users, consumers, producers and workers, rather than by investors. Second, control is based on democratic values and various structures are used to enable member participation and representation. Third, the benefits from the operations and resources flow to members as users of services, not as investors. That is why I said at the beginning that this is a greater step for the co-ops than many people realize. The benefits flow to the members as users of the service, not as investors. In the case of Co-Enerco, the co-ops are indeed in a new area because they are becoming investors.

Anyone trying to deal with the economic problems we face today should be supported, and the co-operative movement in this venture is setting a positive example for Canada. A New Democratic Party economic task force travelled across the country last year. The only consistent notes of optimism we heard on that tour came from co-op groups—from Federated Co-operatives, the wheat pools, even small co-op farms and co-op housing groups.

In these troubled economic times, however, we must ask why it became necessary for the co-ops to enter the energy field to this extent. The government assured Canadians that we could be self-sufficient in energy in a very short time, but the government has abdicated its responsibility and cannot achieve that objective in the manner it planned.

Co-operatives cannot live without planning. They face many difficulties if their future is not planned. It is by planning and sharing that co-operatives can protect their members from the worst effects of our economic system. They can inject a note of optimism into our economy even in times of depression.

This is not the first co-op adventure into the energy field. The Consumers Co-operative Refineries Limited was established in the 1930s. In the early part of the century co-operative retail and bulk outlets bought much of their stock from small independent refiners. By the 1930s, many of the independents were being bought out by the major companies. The majors had considerable influence over wholesale prices and the co-operatives therefore considered backward integration.

In the winter of 1934-1935, ten co-operatives in the Regina area decided to build a cooperatively-owned refinery. They raised $32,000 as share capital and the plant came onstream on May 27, 1935. It had a capacity of 500 barrels per day, which grew to 28,000 barrels per day in the 1970s. Expansion at the end of the decade to 40,000 barrels with the potential of 50,000 barrels cost $30 million, almost a thousand times the sum gathered for the original refinery. Federated Co-operatives now operates the refinery and supplies about 850,000 members, but only 3 per cent of its refinery feedstock is owned by the co-op.

Federated realizes that it needs an assured source of supply for its members and customers. That 3 per cent is dangerously low. It could not depend entirely on government promises, so it began looking at the possibility of expanding its control of some of the sources of oil and gas. As Vern Leland, president of Federated, explains the process, Federated soon realized that getting into the oil business took more money than one co-op could possibly raise.

The co-operative movement is not small—it is widespread, diverse and powerful. From the co-operative movement comes the impetus for this energy corporation. Co-operatives in Canada are involved in almost every sector of the economy—agriculture, supply and manufacturing, feed mills, plywood mills, farm machinery, fertilizers, finance, fisheries, housing, health services and childcare.

The Canadian Union of Co-operatives works with the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society through the Co-operative Development Foundation of Canada to promote social and economic development through co-operatives in the Third World. The co-op movement has also established the Co-op College of Canada in Saskatoon, the Coady Institute at St. Francis Xavier University, and a program in co-ops is offered at the University of Sherbrooke. It is this strength that is going into this Co-Enerco project.

I want to stress that the material and human strength is made a thousand times more potent because it is formed around co-operative ideals—the idea that people are important; the idea that by working together we can have economic democracy and can thus ensure our survival in this world.

The co-operative movement has entered the energy field on a fairly large scale. Co-Enerco is a strong statement of faith in the ability of people to shape their own future and develop economic democracy. Co-Enerco is being developed with four basic objectives: first, to explore for and produce petroleum products and other energy sources to provide long-term security of supply for the co-operative system and Canadians at large. I think all Canadians have accepted the need for Canadian ownership of the resource industry. Second, to provide an investment opportunity for long-term capital appreciation for co-operatives, credit unions, caisses-populaires and their members, a new field of investment for co-operatives. Third, to assist in efforts to Canadianize the oil and gas industry in accordance with the co-operative principles of Canadian ownership and control, referred to by the minister as part of the NEP. Fourth, to assist in the research and development of alternate sources of energy and to encourage conservation. The organizations involved are very broad and I am not going to go into the numbers to any extent.

• (1430)

This bill will set up the Co-operative Energy Corporation and two companion organizations, the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation and the cooperative energy investment fund. Bill C-116 is based on an agreement reached last December between the participating co-operatives and the federal government. The co-operative participants are a formidable group and represent an incredibly large membership. There are almost nine million members with assets valued at about $50 billion. The agreement is the result of exhaustive research and study and we hope and believe that it deals with all possible contingencies.

All co-op members will recognize that this is a new adventure for them. Joint ventures with the government have not always been good. This one is something new because of its scale and the fact it is an area where co-ops have only limited experience. But they are strong business organizations which have proven themselves over the years and consequently know where they are going. I should point out that this whole idea arose with the co-ops, not with the government.

The New Democratic Party supports this bill, Mr. Speaker, because we believe Canadians generally have accepted the need to Canadianize the energy industry. The co-op movement is truly Canadian, and these corporations being formed will also be truly Canadian and operate for and on behalf of Canadians.

I know the government will say that we have had Canadian corporations before, such as Dome and PetroCan. One of those companies is a private firm and the other is a Crown corporation. I challenge anyone here today to try to change a director of Dome or, as far as that goes, of PetroCan, but the Co-operative Energy Development Corporation will have some say in who is a director. I said earlier that I have some concerns about co-operatives getting into this kind of corporation and investment, but they are democratic institutions and the participating members will have some effect on what goes on in this organization.

The co-operative movement is based on some very specific principles which must be protected. The subversion or compromise of these principles should be of concern to the membership of every co-op taking part in this adventure. During the last months and years co-operatives have been looking at their future direction. This is a new direction for them and therefore it is our duty to watch where it takes them. In a recent meeting the co-operatives started out with a vision which they discussed for several days. There were several key words, such as "without exploiting people", and I think the members must make sure that they do not enter into the investment field on the basis of exploitation. They also suggest that they "must not degrade nature". Where does this corporation stand on offshore drilling, and in particular on nuclear development. By becoming a corporation they must also now recognize the responsibilities of corporate citizenship. Their powers must be rooted in communities and local organization. Does this structure maintain that democracy?

I look forward, Mr. Speaker, to the day when the federal government truly recognizes the importance and potential of the co-operative movement. I look forward to the day when co-operative enterprise will play a central role in an economy which puts the needs of people first rather than the selfish interests of corporate enterprise. I look forward to the day when the people of Canada will have effective control over their political and economic institutions, and will be able to use their co-operative movement to stride forward rather than to guard against greed and rapaciousness.

We hope that these co-operative enterprises work well. We wish them well and feel assured that the democracy of the co-operative movement will do the best for its members and all Canadians.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because I do not want to hold up this bill. It is a very good bill and I just wanted to indicate that the independent party in this House fully supports it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I think it is appropriate that all members congratulate the co-operative movement of Canada for taking the initiative to evolve this legislation and bring it before the House. It is certainly appropriate for me to recognize and thank some of those co-operative organizations who came forward with their views, particularly the Alberta Wheat Pool, the Credit Union Federation of Alberta, the Federated Co-ops of Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and others. They are to be congratulated, all of them. I am particularly pleased that the head office is to be located in Calgary, the heart of the oil and gas industry in Canada. The co-operative movement, and particularly the federal government, might learn something from the industry being located in Calgary.

• (1440)

This is indeed a western corporation and a western enterprise. We all expect great things from this partnership of the co-operative movement in Canada and the federal government. The minister stated that the joint venture will probably grow to a capitalization of $1 billion in five years, well beyond the limit of $100 million of injected capital by the federal government. I wish the group well. I hope that it grows to $2 billion in five years.

This brings me to my main point today. I believe that this voluntary direction of Canadianization of the oil and gas industry is a marvellous direction. The industry needed good direction. This is a voluntary direction. It is not forced but voluntary.

This is a somewhat similar direction to what happened in Alberta some years ago when the Alberta Energy Company was formed. I would hope that this joint venture will approach the Alberta Energy Company at the earliest opportunity for a possible joint venture with it. Since this new venture will primarily be related to development and exploration on provincial lands rather than federal lands, I must ask some questions of the minister. Why is the PIP program discriminatory for ventures like this on provincial lands?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House is discussing second reading in which the principle of the bill is discussed. It is my understanding that it is the intention of the House to go into Committee of the Whole, at which point if the hon. member wants to ask questions, the opportunity will be afforded to him. May I suggest to the hon. member that that would be a more appropriate forum.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ. I want to raise two very important matters of policy in this House because we are discussing the principle, the policy, of this piece of legislation. If you wish, I will not put it in the form of a question, I will put it in the form of a policy. It will not take me long; I do not intend to hold up the bill.

The policy question is very simple. Why should a joint venture like this be subjected under the PIP program to 35 per cent in grants, while on the other hand if it was doing its work on federal lands it would get 80 per cent in grants with respect to expenditure on exploration? That is a very important policy question with respect to this legislation. I hope that in the legislation the minister might find some way of providing this joint venture with greater PIP grants than 35 per cent listed for joint ventures and companies exploring on provincial lands.

The second very important matter with respect to this joint venture, from a policy point of view, is that the federal government has established a policy of assigning 25 per cent ownership to the Crown or to a Crown corporation of development on all federal lands. I suggest that this joint venture will be involved on federal lands at some point in the future. I would think that the federal government would look seriously at whether or not it will continue its 25 per cent allocation with regard to this joint enterprise that is being formed under this legislation.

I put those two policy positions forward because I think they are important as this joint enterprise grows in future years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has a problem at this point. The motion before us would refer the bill to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. From the remarks of the government House leader yesterday and the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) earlier today, the Chair assumes there is unanimous consent for the motion to be amended to go to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Pinard: You are absolutely right, Mr. Speaker. This procedure will also apply to the next bill to be studied later on this afternoon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Francis in the chair.

Clauses 2 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some short comments from the minister on the two policy positions I raised with respect to the PIP grants for an enterprise like this on provincial lands which are limited to 35 per cent as opposed to 80 per cent on Crown lands. Second, would it be the intent of the federal government to take its 25 per cent ownership share in all projects by this joint enterprise on Canada lands?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, first on the question of the PIP grants, they are of a universal nature. They apply equally to all companies, government-owned companies, provincial government-owned companies, federal-owned companies, strictly private companies and co-operatives. We do not believe that those grants, any more than the taxation system, should be of a discriminatory nature. All companies operating in the oil and gas fields should be put on the same basis in terms of taxation and grants. It is not the intent to provide for a special category of grants for this particular company compared to other companies.

• (1450)

On the second point, the same applies in the Canada lands. The 25 per cent share is in compensation for the contribution provided by the taxpayers of Canada for exploration in the Canada lands. As the hon. member indicated, the contributions may go up as high as 80 per cent of the cost of exploration. In return, the people of Canada get a 25 per cent share of any development which will take place. The same rule will apply. There will be no discrimination.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GARNISHMENT, ATTACHMENT AND PENSION DIVERSION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-38, to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State for Mines): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House this afternoon to introduce for second reading Bill C-38, the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act. Hon. members of the House and perhaps the people of the country will question why I, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, would be standing to present a bill which appears to be a rather dry bill with no particular human reference. I should like to reassure hon. members of the House that indeed it has a very human effect upon a great many people in our country, particularly women. I urge its swift passage.

I remind hon. members that I feel this bill has been somewhat bogged down for the past two years. Due to the efforts of a number of very active women, including the wives of parliamentarians, we have been able to bring it to the House and I hope to swift passage.

Agents of the Crown, who include in their numbers hon. members of the House, have long enjoyed protection from garnishment and attachment of their salaries. Creditors are barred from pursuing all the normal avenues open to them to collect what is legally due to them, only by virtue of the fact that their debtor works as an agent of the Crown. The effect of the legislation before us today will be to remove this age-old security blanket of Crown immunity for garnishment actions. The rationale for Crown immunity crumbles in such cases, for the action is against Her Majesty in name only. We all know that the real culprit is the malingering debtor.

Just to give an idea of how far-reaching the exemption is, let me list those who are protected by the security blanket in the federal jurisdiction. They include all federal public servants, appointees to boards and tribunals, employees of Crown corporations, Canadian Armed Forces personnel, federally-appointed judges, parliamentary staff, and last but certainly not least, hon. members of the House and of the other place. Again I might add that we owe a great deal to the wives of parliamentarians who have taken such active interest in the passage of this bill.

As a result of this immunity to garnishment, many spouses are otherwise unable to enforce their family support orders against their former partners who are employed by or who receive superannuation benefits from the federal government. In addition, creditors are unable to collect on judgments obtained against a small number of federal employees who are not reliable in paying their debts. Bill C-38 will make it possible for support orders and other debts to be honoured out of the Crown's purse for those who receive their salary from the federal Crown.

While both Bill C-49, which was introduced in May, 1978, and Bill C-52, introduced in March, 1979, would have permitted the garnishment of salaries by amending the Financial Administration Act, Bill C-38 creates a new act—the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act. In addition to permitting garnishment of salaries, it expands the source of moneys available to satisfy family financial support orders, and I will explain why.

The procedures to be used in enforcing garnishment orders against the federal Crown will, for the most part, be pursuant to provincial laws. Of course, this is essential if we are to have a smooth transition. However, I wish to emphasize the areas where the procedures will differ slightly. The first of these is the notice provision. Service of a notice that the creditor intends to garnishee wages payable by the Crown will benefit the creditor and the Crown. Service of a notice will enable the government, as the employer, to locate from employment records the proper employee within the large and decentralized federal public service. The resources of creditors will not be wasted by directing a garnishment summons to the wrong employer or by attempting to garnishee wages of persons who have ceased to be employees of the Crown. I would point out that the notice is only needed in order to initiate the first garnishment proceeding. Thereafter, the notice will be required if there has been a break in service of the employee or where there has been a lengthy time lag between garnishments by the creditor.

The other changes involved pertain to the application of provincial laws relating to garnishment. Under most provincial laws, where a garnishment order has been served on the employer after the employee's regular payday, the creditor must absorb the costs of the unsuccessful garnishment and proceed anew; that is, he has to start all over again. Bill C-38 will allow the garnishment order to apply to the next closest pay day of the employee, regardless of when the order is served in relation to a regular payday. It is common sense; sometimes common sense must be applied, and we are ensuring that it is applied in this case.

In addition, there will be no need to calculate how much was owing to the employee on the day the garnishment order was served, as the order will apply for the whole of the regular pay period. Again, this is common sense. This will resolve the difficulty and reduce the labour involved in calculating what is due or owing to an employee on the day the garnishment order is served. This provision will allow the attachment of the full salary for every regular pay period, except that which is exempt by provincial law.

Part I of the bill also clarifies the position of Crown corporations. At present, some Crown corporations have their own bank accounts and are not in receipt of payroll funding from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Others do receive their payroll money out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. What happens is that under Bill C-38 those Crown corporations which do not receive their payroll funding from the Consolidated Revenue Fund will be subject to provincial garnishment laws. However, those Crown corporations which do receive their payroll funding from the Consolidated Revenue Fund will be subject to the garnishment provisions of Bill C-38 and these Crown corporations will be identified in the regulations.

Due to the mobility of the Canadian Armed Forces and the fact that there are already requirements for compulsory pay allotments for family support orders, the rules governing garnishment of members of the Canadian forces will be set out in regulations pursuant to the National Defence Act. These regulations will follow the principles set out in Bill C-38.

In these difficult economic times I am sure that creditors will welcome these important provisions which make it more difficult for those on the federal payroll to avoid their legitimate debts.

There is a very special group of creditors who will benefit more than most from the provisions of this legislation. That group is the women of this country who are dependent upon support payments from a spouse or an ex-spouse.

Women are disproportionately represented among the poor in this country. This is even more true of families headed by women. An astonishing 41.5 per cent of all families headed by women in this country live below the poverty line. The risk of poverty for families headed by women is six times that for men. These figures are from the National Council Welfare's 1980 preliminary statistics on poverty in Canada.

Many of the women who head families are separated or divorced from their husbands. Many have signed separation agreements or have a court order entitling them to maintenance for themselves and their children. However, and this is a figure that I find equally shocking, 70 per cent of all maintenance orders are in arrears within five years of the court order. Trying to collect the arrears is a time and cost-consuming ideal and one that families dependent on the support payments can ill-afford. I doubt very much if there is a Member in the House who has not received an appeal from a constituent who is facing just such a problem.

As you know, most aspects of family law, with the exception of divorce, fall within the jurisdiction of the provincial government under Section 92 of the constitution act of 1867. This government is committed to doing everything within its jurisdiction to ease the burden of these women, and this bill is one such measure.

Of course, spouses who obtain a court order for maintenance against anyone on the federal payroll, which includes all the people I have listed at the beginning of my speech, will now be able to enforce it through garnishment or attachment like all other creditors. In addition, we have included provisions applicable only for financial support orders. This act will allow the government, upon application by a person with a support order, to divert pension benefits for the payment of the support order. This is a very important and significant change because we know that older women are the poorest of the poor. Few elderly women receive benefits under private pension plans. This is because they are more likely to work for small employers who do not have private plans, and few can look to their spouse's pension plans for survivor benefits. As I have said time and time again, those woman discover that the old adage is simply not true. They do take it with them when they go.

The second part of the bill deals with the diversion of pension benefits to satisfy family financial support orders. The existing scheme of diverting pension benefits has been expanded and refined with respect to enforcement of family financial support orders. I want to make it perfectly clear that it does not allow the garnishment of pensions. Only a few provinces at present permit the enforcement of family financial support orders against pensions by means of garnishment. I want to emphasize today that we are talking about pension benefits payable to former public servants, Members of Parliament, judges and others.

What this bill does not do, and I want to be very specific, is provide for diversions of pensions such as veterans pensions and old-age security pensions. They are not touched by this bill. The bill is applicable only to superannuation or employee-employer financed benefit plans, and is restricted to benefits only when they become payable. In no way will it interfere with the contributions being made to those plans. The few Crown corporations who do not use the Consolidated Revenue Fund for their payroll but do participate in pension plans paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, are also subject to this part of the bill.

Currently, under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Candian Forces Superannuation Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, pension benefits may be diverted to a person seeking to enforce a family support order. However, whether or not a diversion takes place is at the discretion of the minister responsible for that plan. This is also a very important point. While this discretion has always been exercised in favour of a diversion, such diversions rarely exceed 50 per cent of the pension benefit. Provisions of the bill remove the ministerial discretion and make a diversion compulsory if there is a valid court order and the basic requirements, such as Canadian residency, are met.

Where there is no provision under provincial law for the diversion, attachment or garnishment of pensions for family financial support orders, the amount to be diverted will not exceed 50 per cent of the net pension benefit. Where provincial law does permit garnishment, attachment or diversion or such pensions for family financial support orders, the amount to be diverted will be determined in accordance with provincial laws.

I urge the Members of the House to pass this very important piece of legislation. A law of this sort is absolutely necessary if spouses and ex-spouses of federal employees are realistically to exercise their full legal rights under maintenance orders. I suggest to Members of the House that it will make life in their constituencies a great deal easier, and I would also like to make it clear that there will be no more special treatment for parliamentarians.

Since I am concerned that there will not be enough people aware of these changes, especially those women who have been suffering for a long time under previous circumstances, we intend to prepare pamphlets outlining these amendments after the bill is proclaimed. We will see that they are placed in public areas so that women with support orders will be able to pick them up. Of course, we will make sure that these pamphlets will be placed in family courts where they are likely to be picked up by those most interested.

What is equally important is the fact that these measures have the support of the provincial governments. I understand that hon. members of the House are anxious to see the bill passed and implemented as soon as possible. Once the bill is enacted it will take a few months to promulgate the required regulations and to ensure that all the necessary mechanisms are in place. I hope that this can be accomplished quickly and that the bill will come into force as soon as possible.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, today, as the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) has pointed out, will mark the end of one more ancient and Royal prerogative. Many years ago, the image of a creditor was one which could be conjured up while reading one of Charles Dickens' novels. But who is the creditor today? Today he is the corner grocer, the mechanic or the dentist. He could even be one of us, just as we, as hon. members of the House, could be losing the protection which was ours heretofore. It is the easy credit life which most of us live in a credit card society. But anyone in the practice of law has known the difficulties and the frustrations that existed when he attempted to recover a debt from a Crown employee. The storekeeper yesterday, as today, could not afford to write it off because of the cash flow restrictions, yet he was faced with a kind of difficulty as outlined by the government spokesperson. No attachment or garnishment could be levied against a person who owed money and was an employee of the Crown. If one were an Armed Forces representative, one would have to rely upon the commander, the department head or even the minister. Unless one had that person's support and authority, recovery was indeed difficult. The exemptions from execution still remain as against the Crown, but the execution, attachment and garnishment went back many years, as we all pointed out, and made it then impossible to effect the recovery which this bill will now enable with the passage of time.

I was rather surprised to hear the minister make several comments with respect to the urgency of this legislation and the great help it will be to women. With the passage of time, at least six provinces and the two territories have already eliminated the protection which people within their jurisdictions had with respect to the provisions now coming forward in this federal bill. We come on the scene rather late. We ask why government employees should be given that preferential treatment. Obviously, the answer is that they should not be so privileged because we have seen the public service grow until today there are over 500,000 federal civil service employees. Whatever justification there was at an earlier time to give them the shelter which was theirs at that time no longer exists now. It has not existed for a good number of years.

Bill C-38 is a bill which is not before us for the first time. It has been before us since 1978. I would like to pay tribute to the late Tom Cossitt, the former Member of Parliament for Leeds-Grenville, who sought to make this legislation reality at least two years ago. It was his persistence which is now paying off in the form of this very long overdue bill.

I realize that the Minister of State for Mines has given a very detailed and precise outline of what the bill contains and to whom it applies, but I note again that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is not in his place. The bill was presented to this House in the name of the Minister of Justice. His parliamentary secretary is not here to present the bill in his place. The Minister of Justice does not have that many bills before the House. I wonder if he is not here because of his anxiety to move over one seat to his right, or because he is critically tied up or otherwise engaged, but he should be in the House to address the House on his bill and make certain there is more justice for Canadians.

An hon. Member: Surely you could be a more passionate speaker than the minister.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): The hon. member will have his turn to speak if he wishes to take his time and delay the bill that much longer.

The comments of the Minister of State for Mines were very helpful. They were so helpful that I will reduce my comments somewhat substantially with respect to the specific terms. But I would like to emphasize once again the two areas which are covered by the provisions in the bill. The first concerns salaries, remunerations, honoraria, and fees which any one of us might receive, or any other person in the employ of the Crown. That debtor must now be a judgment debtor in the usual provisions of the province before attachment proceedings might be initiated. As the minister has already pointed out, those attachment or garnishee proceedings are not the same as they would be in the province. They could come under the usual debtor arrangements, which would have simplified matters that much more; but no, the Crown, in this instance, had to introduce some new variations or procedures. But one finds, on reading the bill, that these do not prove fatal, and so we are prepared to accept them.

The second area of concern relates to the diversion of pension funds. I suppose this gives justification for the minister who is responsible for the status of women to make some comments which do not particularly relate to the bill, but certainly this bill does relate in a good, substantial measure, to support clauses. The second area covered, then, is the area of pensions which government employees might enjoy, and these are subject to what the bill refers to as a diversion. They do include a diversion of contributory superannuation plans and funds, as the minister pointed out, not including the Canada Pension Plan or pensions payable to veterans.

The party on this side wants to applaud these two exemptions. That is one of the reasons we have been emphasizing for so long the necessity for introducing the bill. Pensions may only be attached or diverted as they are referred to in the act, and only when there is a support order by a court of competent jurisdiction in the province of residence. While collection companies may not be able to get at those premiums or pensions, spouses, former spouses and dependants might now make application to divert up to 50 per cent of the pension payable.

I do not think I heard the minister say this, but it should be noted and emphasized that many of our public servants are facing the same difficulties as are Canadians all across the land. They might have as much difficulty as other Canadians in paying the bills chargeable to them. The bill has an express provision so that they will not be allowed to discharge the employee by reason of having come under the provisions of this bill if that is the only reason upon which such application for discharge is based. It is then reasonable to assume that they should be placed under the same provisions as any other Canadian in the collection or recovery of debts. However, I hope they will continue to remember that they are federal public servants.

There is no need for us to prolong this debate. The argument have been presented in a very detailed form. I want to say that it has been a privilege to speak to this bill, even at this late date, and to say on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition that we urge its early passage through all stages.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I wondered a little while ago whether or not we were going to talk out this very important bill this afternoon. The minister spoke at length and in great detail, and eloquently, of course. There are two other bills we have agreed to let go through. I thank the other two members for their detailed explanation of the bill and their words certainly do not to be repeated by me, therefor I have no intention of doing that. I see a nod of agreement over there. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the way a person judges a bill is to see who is for it and who is against it.

I thank my party's justice critic, the hon. member from Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), for the work he has done on it. He has been anxious to see this bill go through, and has been pressing this matter vigorously, along with a number of other people. Let me give a brief list of those who favoured this bill. They are the Law Reform Commission, the chairman, Mr. Frank Muldoon, and his commission, and the Public Service Alliance of Canada who might not necessarily be expected not to be as anxious perhaps to have this bill passed because at the moment their members are protected from garnishments and pension attachments. Then there is also the Ontario Society of Collection Agencies; this group is naturally jubilant. We can easily understand their impatience, as they wait for the passage of this bill. Finally, there are the women of Canada who, as everyone knows, probably earn little more than half the average wage of the male. Many have been abandoned or retired or are widows, and older women at the lowest end of our economic totem pole. They also would be anxious to have this additional protection.

The matter of maintenance payments needs to be straightened out. That was recognized a long time ago by the Law Reform Commission. It is a form of privilege really, that members of Crown agencies or civil servants or public servants historically could hide behind the fact that they are employed by the Crown, to evade maintenance. These are the skippers, the people who run out on their responsibilities. They will not be very happy with this as they try to evade responsibilities. It is important that we pass this bill and pass it with all due alacrity.

It is important to pay tribute to the Public Service Alliance of Canada here. Their spokesperson, Mr. Del Hewitt-White, says that he sees no reason why public employees should continue to enjoy this benefit unavailable to other citizens. The Public Service Alliance has looked into this matter, it has sought legal advice and has voiced no objection to this bill. As a matter of fact, the Alliance is encouraging its passage, as long as the scope of the bill does not go beyond that which is operated and prevails in the private sector in garnishees or pension attachments.

I understand that many of the provinces are in favour of this bill. I will not go further than that, Mr. Speaker, because I know that there are two other bills which we are anxious to consider this afternoon. I would congratulate the government for bringing the bill in. It is long overdue. The malingering debtor is someone who should not be able to hide behind his position and escape his obligations merely because he happens to be a member of a Crown agency, or a Member of the House of Commons or of the Senate, or happens to work as a civil servant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The understanding of the Chair is that hon. members may wish to put this motion and bill through all stages today.

The present motion contains a reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I would need a motion, plus the unanimous consent of the House, to amend this reference.

Shall I put it then, in the name of Mr. Kelly, seconded by Mrs. Killens, that the motion be amended to refer the bill to Committee of the Whole?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we would consent to that, of course, but it would have to be moved by a minister of the Crown.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am informed that that is not necessary, because we have some spending—

Rather than dispute the issue, I will certainly put it in the name of a minister.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that the bill be now referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Nickerson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in glancing at the first page on this bill I find that it carries the recommendation of the governor in council for the moneys that need to be appropriated to carry this into effect. Therefore, Sir, I would submit it is in fact a money bill and does require that the motion be moved by a minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I was in error then and I am grateful for the correction by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-38, An Act to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments. Shall Clauses 2 to 20 carry?

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question concerning Clause 12 which I would like to put to the Minister of State for Mines who is sponsoring the bill. Clause 12 deals with regulation-making powers. Paragraph (a) allows the authority to designate by regulation places where service shall be made. I wonder if it is the intention of the government to have one place in Canada where, pursuant to Clause 7, submissions can be made by registered mail; or whether it is the intention to set up one office in every province and territory, or to establish a series of offices throughout the country, more than one in each province or territory.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that this will vary from province to province, as the place of residence. I think that all of these considerations will take some time to put into place properly.

Mr. Nickerson: And the Territories?

Mrs. Erola: And the Territories as well.

Mr. Nickerson: Is the minister confirming that there would be an office established in each Territory, besides the provinces, where such service could be made?

Mrs. Erola: No, Mr. Chairman, I was not confirming that. I was saying only that the place of residence from which the application came would be the area.

It is my understanding—I may be corrected in that—that there would be no offices set up in each province, that there would be no additional bureaucracy required.

Mr. Nickerson: I do not really understand what the minister said, Mr. Chairman, but we will leave it at that and perhaps she could get back to me privately afterwards.

On the same Clause 12, in regard to paragraph (b), in reading through this bill, I get the impression, which I am sure is correct, that the normal provincial garnishment legislation would in general apply. That provincial legislation generally specifies the proportion of a salary which can be attached. But under this 12(b), it seems to be the intention of the government to restrict further, under certain conditions, the amount of salary that can be attached. In this paragraph, they take here the authority to specify an amount which may be deducted from the salary, in order to come up with the net salary which then might be attached according to the provincial legislation.

I wonder if we could have an explanation as to why that particular provision is necessary, and an example of when it might be put into effect.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, it would be difficult for me to give a specific example at this time. I would be very happy to look into the regulations and to discuss them to see just what specifics it would apply to.

However, I would suspect that in this particular case there may have been additional allowances to which they refer, as in the case of certain officers who serve abroad.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: An hon. member to my left has suggested that we might proceed clause by clause rather than by a group of clauses. I will put the question again by reference to all of the clauses in Part I.

It appears that I can put, under Part I, Clauses 2 to 20, as one question. Shall Clauses 2 to 20 carry?

• (1530)

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I have one question. This is no reflection on anyone here, but I want it made patently clear in the reply from the minister that this legislation in no way whatsoever would attach the pension payable to a war disability pensioner, a recipient of a war veterans allowance, a recipient of a merchant seaman's service allowance, pensions or benefits under the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act or any derivative of those four acts. While I recognize that the schedule in this bill does not mention it, there was nothing said in the minister's opening statement nor was there anything said in any of the speeches which followed. However, I wish to have it made crystal clear and on the record that this legislation will not touch those pensions or entitlements.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that they will not, but I will clarify that completely for the hon. member in just a moment. Some of these may come under the National Defence Act, and I would like to get clarification. I am under the impression they will not, but I will get confirmation for the hon. member in one moment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The House may wish to delay further questions for a moment because I understand one of the officials of the department will be available.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. Lambert: Does this bill have any application to payments under war services disability legislation, under the War Veterans Allowance Act, under the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act and any payments made under those acts to survivors with respect to survivors' benefits?

Mrs. Erola: It does not.

Mr. Lambert: I thank the minister.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, may I respond to the question put by the hon. member for Western Arctic? Wherever there is an office of the Department of Justice it will be handled through that office. As I said earlier, there is not to be the creation of new offices. There are offices in the Territories and Yukon.

What was the second question?

Mr. Nickerson: The second question dealt with the authority sought under Clause 12(b) to reduce the amount of a salary which might be attached by way of garnishment.

Mrs. Erola: It is exactly as I suggested earlier. These are the extra allowances such as, for instance, for boots and gloves to postal workers. They would not be included.

Mr. Lambert: Expense accounts?

Mrs. Erola: That is defined under "salary", apparently. If hon. members will look at Clause 4, they will see the definition of "salary".

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a discussion here because there is an agreement.

Mr. Nielsen: Right.

Mr. Lambert: However, there is a disagreement as to the contents of this bill, and it is absolutely not to be passed until we have a crystal clear understanding.

Mrs. Erola: In Clause 4 "salary" is defined as the following:

(a) in the case of a member of the Senate or House of Commons, all moneys payable under the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act and the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, other than moneys not included in computing the member's income for the purposes of Part I of the Income Tax Act—

That is very specific.

Mr. Lambert: That is clear, Mr. Chairman, but in some of the provinces there are provisions that there is a part of a salary which cannot be touched. In other words, all of a man's salary due on payday cannot be attached because he must have something on which to live. I do not know what it is today. It used to be something like $85 a month about 25 years ago. Whatever it is, it is to be set by regulation, according to Clause 12(b).

Mrs. Erola: No.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, it is.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair has a difficulty. It is obviously no imposition on the Chair that the minister and the hon. member should have this discussion, but the stenographers have a difficulty because the minister and the hon. member are tending to speak before their microphones are turned on. Possibly they could wait until they are given the floor by the Chair.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, apparently the rules are very clear that provincial laws will prevail.

Clauses 2 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I put the question on all clauses under Part II, Clauses 21 through 37?

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, I have one last question. Clause 23(2) deals with the situation in which a pension is to be attached in favour of a minor, someone under the age of 18. This clause gives to the minister the discretion as to who should collect that money. I wonder why that discretion is given to the minister and not to a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of mobility. It is a question of a person moving out of the home. A problem is created, so it has been dealt with in that way.

Clauses 21 to 56 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIMITATION OF BENEFITS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-120 to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand that it is desired to put this bill through all stages. That will require an amendment to the motion.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, we have two bills to deal with this afternoon in the little time remaining and both are very important in terms of saving money and providing better management of that money for the taxpayers of the country.

At the outset I should like to move that this bill be referred to Committee of the Whole instead of to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Since it is the minister's motion, the procedures do not allow him to amend it. The Chair will recognize the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that the motion be amended to read that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Johnston: This bill proposes the so-called prorating amendment to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act—the SRBA for short. As members know, the SRBA provides for the January adjustments to all public service pensions to compensate for increases in the cost of living over the past year.

Under present provisions, the full annual increase is payable each January to all pensioners, even those who retired during the preceding year. This has meant that there is a tendency for employees considering retirement to do so at year-end to benefit both from a full year's salary and a full year's indexing. It is proposed that this anomaly of a double adjustment for the last year of work be eliminated by providing that the first indexation benefit be prorated on the basis of the time elapsed between the date of retirement and the end of the year. This means that the first indexing benefit would be directly related to the time when the employee is actually retired.

The arrangement proposed is quite straightforward. Perhaps I can provide an example. Someone who retired in January of a given year would receive eleven-twelfths of the full year's adjustment paid the following January. Someone who retires in June of the year would, the following January, receive six-twelfths of the full benefit. Finally, someone who retires in December would receive nothing by way of an adjustment but would receive a full adjustment in January of the second calendar year following retirement. The bill provides that the prorating adjustment of the first year's indexing benefit will apply to anyone becoming entitled to a pension on or after January 1, 1982. A press release was issued last December explaining that this was how the proposed legislation would operate, and all departments and agencies were asked to bring this to the attention of those who might be affected.

Adoption of this amendment will mean cost savings that will grow year by year. That is, there will be a cost savings of some $6 million in 1983 alone, and because the savings are both additive and compounded, they escalate rapidly in subsequent years. This is very useful as far as personnel management is concerned, because of the tendency of public servants to retire in the last quarter of the year. I am advised that last year, better than half or 56 per cent of retirements took place in the last quarter.

There is a final dimension to the bill that I would like to discuss, and that is the effective date. The original intention was to have prorating apply to anyone who retired any time during the year the amendment was proposed. Every effort was made to draw this application to the attention of those who might be affected.

However, we are conscious of the representations made by the New Democratic Party that this timing does effectively change the rules of the game for those who retire before the change is actually enacted. The government is prepared to entertain an amendment to that effect when the bill reaches committee stage.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak to this bill which is long overdue. This party supports the bill but deplores the time taken to get it before the House.

As the minister has said, the bill will correct the longstanding loophole commonly referred to as the "year-end loophole". The government is given to closing taxation loopholes and I am glad to see that this one will not take money from the average citizen but will merely correct a provision in the act. I was glad to hear the minister say that a lot of money will be saved as a result of this legislation, but he did not indicate how much money had been wasted over the years because the loophole was not closed earlier.

The thing that concerns this party is that the government took so long to bring the legislation before the House. When the government came into power in 1980, one of its major platforms was pension reform. That was to include all pensions—for Members of Parliament, civil servants, the CPP—everything. In the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that Parliament would be asked to consider a program of action that was designed to respond to individual needs by promoting greater security for the elderly. He also said that the government would convene a national pension conference in the fall of 1980 and that work must begin immediately to design better methods of providing flexible, portable and secure pensions. That pension conference was not held until late 1981, Mr. Speaker. Then the Prime Minister said that he would talk to the provinces and promised a meeting in July 1981. It was not held, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has promised a green paper on pension reform every month since last November. Only recently she had indicated in speeches to pension conferences that pension reform would come about by the end of June. We find out now, however, that the green paper or the buff paper or the white paper or whatever colour it is, will not come before the House until some time next fall. That is an irresponsible and inadequate response to the needs of pensioners of this country.

For a long time there has been a great deal of discussion about pensions, most of it initiated by the government. The studies include "Canada at the Pension Crossroads", a report prepared for the Financial Executives Research Foundation (1978); the Confirentes Report by the government of Quebec in 1978; "the Joint Health and Welfare/Finance Study of Retirement Income in Canada", the Lazar Report, 1979; the Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies (1979), and the Economic Council of Canada's "One in Three, Pensions for Canadians to 2030 (1979)". That was followed by a select committee of Parliament in Ontario, and the final report was received this year.

So it is very difficult to say that most of the studies, most of the information available, most of the research has been done. What I am asking this House, and in particular the government, is, why the long delay? I am asking the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister if they could not bring forth the results of their studies a lot sooner than next fall. Because of the long delays we have many people very worried. Recently we have seen additional reports from Quebec and British Columbia, and most recently a rather comprehensive report on pensions from the Canadian Labour Congress. I personally have seen reports and studies done by small business in Canada, and they are certainly concerned with the delay. They are concerned about the delay, the amount of uncertainty, and the kinds of signals they are getting from this government as to what direction pension reform is going to take.

Certainly we are all indebted to the women's organizations, in particular the status of women groups, for holding very comprehensive conferences throughout the country to bring forth the real problems which pensions hold for women. Yet the government, in spite of all this information, refuses to act. We depend on pensions, and I feel members opposite have not taken advantage of the climate in this country to have the government bring forward proposals to be discussed and passed into law.

It is interesting to know that by and large most of the authors of the studies have agreed on a few essential but major changes in our pension schemes. All these studies indicate a general agreement that the elderly living in poverty should be helped. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has many times in her speeches emphasized that this is her first priority. Why have she and the government not acted on that issue? Most of the studies agree that pensions should be more portable and vested earlier. These are not difficult things, so why have we had no response from the government? These people all agree pensions should be more effectively protected against inflation, surely a basic thing in these highly inflationary times. They all agree that more people should be covered. Certainly our private pension schemes are not broad enough to do the necessary things.

They all agree, and I think this is most important, that women need better pension protection. When is this government going to give the women of this country better pension protection? Finally, all these studies agree that our pension system will be costly to the individual taxpayer, the business owner, and government. Of course, in these times that is a key issue. Delay and more delay by this government is making it impossible for us to reach satisfactory conclusions on and solutions to the pension problem. To cover the cost of our first problem in pensions, that of elderly people living below the poverty line, would cost some $750 million. I would be the first to say that this is a very serious matter, and I would like to point out that this government has spent some $1.4 billion to buy non-productive service stations for PetroCan. It spends more than $100 million a year on advertising to try to convince the public it is a good government, when the public knows the story is a far different one. Now I find it is going to spend at least $5 million to celebrate July 1. If the government got to work it could promote and pursue schemes to allow us to finance that $750 million.

I could pursue this area further but I will not because I know we are in a hurry. However, I think it is incumbent upon the government to proceed on pensions and on its green paper. Surely the small businessmen, workers and elderly people of this country are not going to put up with it much longer. They are going to remember and they will act, I am sure, if this government does not.

I wish to say again that we support this amendment. Our only concern is that it took so long. I hope it will not take so long for the minister's green paper to be brought down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), it has been mentioned to the Chair that there is a disposition not to see the clock at four o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable as long as we do not see it at five o'clock for the equivalent amount of time we go beyond four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There may be a difficulty in that regard. I had not mentioned it because I did not want to comment on whether or not the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) was in fact going to appear. The business of private members' hour, to which the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred, is Motion No. 7 standing in the name of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. I have no information as to where that matter will proceed.

Mr. Nielsen: We will cross that bridge when we come to it, sir.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Exactly.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with an act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. During the past year representatives of all three parties have been discussing this, and it is unfortunate that it has taken until June to get it before the House. For that reason we have presented an amendment, which I will place before the House at report stage, and which I believe has been agreed to by all parties in the House. Thank you.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blaker in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-120, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

• (1600)

The Chairman: Shall Clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—

Mr. Parker: Mr. Chairman, we have some concern with Clause 1. We have had agreement from all parties in the House, I believe, and because of the lateness of the adoption or the presentation of this bill we have expressed our concern. Many people could have been planning for their pension earlier on but now all of a sudden because of this bill they could be affected. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That Clause 1 of Bill C-120 be amended

(a) by striking out line 11 on page 1 and substituting the following:

"1982 or later year, and who retires, or whose spouse or parent retires, on or after the day on which this section comes into force, for a month in the"—

and we carry on with the rest of the bill.

In area (b) by striking out line 27 on page 1 and substituting the following:

"retirement year in 1982 or a later year, and who retires, or whose spouse or parent retires, on or after the day on which this section comes into force, for"—

Then we follow on with the rest of the bill.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 1 as amended, carry?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, as long as your text is the same as mine, because it was not read accurately by the hon. member putting the amendment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Then we had better have the amendment in the hands of the Chair as the one which the House will consider.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps it should be read, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay-East Revelstoke reads:

That Clause 1 of Bill C-120 be amended

Retention of Records

(a) by striking out line 11 on page 1 and substituting the following:

"1982 or a later year, and who retires, or whose spouse or parent retires, on or after the day on which this section comes into force, for a month in the"

(b) by striking out line 27 on page 1 and substituting the following:

"retirement year is 1982 or a later year, and who retires, or whose spouse or parent retires, on or after the day on which this section comes into force, for"

That is the motion in possession of the Chair. I hope that is the same as the one in the possession of all hon. members. Therefore, I will now put the question as to whether the amendment is agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 1, as amended, carry?

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I think that if you could forget the clock, we could deal very quickly with all stages of Bill C-118. We have a speech of only thirty seconds, and I think the Progressive Conservative Party Whip has a short speech, and in any event, as far as we are concerned, we are willing, provided there is unanimous consent, for you to forget the clock, and in return, we will agree to the period for private members' business lasting the usual hour.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I might indicate to the President of the Privy Council—perhaps he was out of the chamber for a moment a little earlier—when the Chair was advised of that wish on the part of the House, it was agreed that the Chair would not see the clock.

Mr. Nielsen: With that condition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Yes.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS THAT PROVIDE FOR THE RETENTION OF RECORDS

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Serge Joyal (for Mr. Johnston) moved that Bill C-118, an Act to amend certain acts that provide for the retention of records be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, briefly, it costs a lot of money to retain records in the business community these days. This bill will set a standard of six years' retention with the opportunity of diminishing that, depending upon the circumstances. We hope this amendment, through the record retentions act will save approximately $100 million a year in storage costs. For that reason, we believe it has received unanimous support of all members of the House. Before I sit down, I would like to thank the critics of the opposition parties who were so helpful in expediting the debate this afternoon.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I will only be a few moments. We welcome this bill. I am pleased to see that it was brought forward. It will allow businessmen to dispose of a lot of old records. In many cases it will free up valuable space and file capacity.

The only change that I could suggest to the bill which I believe would improve it will be to allow the owners of defunct businesses to turn over their records to the government or a government agency if a businessman dies and his business is wound down. A widow should not be obliged to keep records for six years. Perhaps in the consideration of the implementation of this bill that suggestion could be looked at. I do not think it would be a very difficult problem if the information were broadly disseminated across the country to allow for that provision. Other than that, we welcome the bill. We hope it is the beginning of the several regulatory reforms that we need in the country. We know it will aid the business community, and we thank you very much.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to offer the support of our party for Bill C-118. On the one hand, records are certainly necessary but we also know that businesses are often encumbered by a good deal of red tape and problems of storage of records and that kind of thing. If this bill does assist in lessening that burden somewhat, we will be very pleased to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will require a motion, as in previous instances, in order to refer the bill to Committee of the Whole.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1610)

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, by unanimous consent considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being after four o'clock, the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

As indicated earlier by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the House will give a full hour's consideration to private members' business. Hence, it will proceed until approximately 5.12 o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GRAIN

PRODUCTION COSTS SUGGESTED AS BASIS FOR FLOOR PRICES

The House resumed, from Friday, June 27, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Schellenberger:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of setting floor prices related to costs of production for cereal and oilseed crops one month before planting in order that farmers may be provided adequate returns to ensure sufficient production to meet Canada's domestic and export needs.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this motion does not really have to be debated. It was introduced in the House two years ago, but the session has been so long it has come up again. Since the mover and the seconder of the motion have already spoken, they have asked me to explain the background of it. Hopefully, all parties, as I think they did the last time, will agree that it should be allowed to go through and be considered in committee.

As read by Mr. Speaker, the motion concerns a very simple technical decision which must be made each year by the Canadian Wheat Board. In effect, it asks the government to consider making it mandatory for the Canadian Wheat Board to do this one month before the commencement of the planting of crops. Approximately eight times out of ten the announcement is made one month before seeding, but every so often, whether the Canadian Wheat Board goes to sleep or the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board goes to sleep, it is not announced. This causes considerable worry and strain for persons trying to decide what crop to seed that year and particularly whether they will get back their money if they sow a particular crop.

This is not a political matter or a matter of philosophy. Simply it is a request of government to let the Standing Committee on Agriculture consider the possibility of including a direction to the Canadian Wheat Board from Parliament that we would like it to do this one month in advance of seeding time, which is roughly the middle of April. It is very simple. The House should not have to listen to an hour's debate. It is simply a request of government to consider this, which means putting it before the standing committee to let it decide.

I hope by the end of my remarks that this matter could be checked out by someone on the government side who knows something about it. Technically the matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board who, by our custom, is not allowed in this chamber; he sits in the other place. Therefore, it really falls on someone in the House to listen to the message in this motion and to support it. As I have just said, there is nothing to it. It is just a matter of making formal what the Canadian Wheat Board does anyway.

I should like to give the background of this motion. This debate gives me the opportunity, which I personally appreciate, to put on the record the importance to Canada of having made the decision 47 years ago to put western grains under some form of organized marketing that did not take control away from the farmers. It was simply an organization to set the price; that is all it does. Then it turns this monopoly on the right to sell it, which Parliament gave to the Canadian Wheat Board, over to private enterprise to sell.

The only thing we have is a board which meets every day to look at the world situation and to set the price. There is another division which looks after the movement of grain around the country and tries to persuade the railways and the grain companies to do something to make money, but essentially it has only one function—to set the price. We have collected the brains of all the universities and all the public servants who sit there every day to decide what the supply and demand are like in the world and to set the price. The practice has been, over the last six to ten years, for them to simply look at the newspapers to see what speculators are doing with the wheat price down in Kansas, Chicago or Omaha. They have to be literate and able to read the prices set in United States markets. Then they announce the price for which Canadian grain will be sold the next day.

I should like to refer to the importance of the Canadian Wheat Board. One way of setting price is to announce it daily for any sales actually consummated on that day, but at the beginning of the year the Canadian Wheat Board has to announce the initial price for every bushel of grain grown and delivered in the coming crop year. This initial price is like a downpayment. Farmers want to plant in the middle of April, to harvest in August, and to get the grain into the elevator. When they deliver it to the elevator, they receive a downpayment or a partial payment on the grain. Before farmers plant they are able to produce several crops. They know roughly what it will cost to produce each type of crop, and they like to know what price, roughly, they will obtain at the end of the year. The initial price is an indicator to them of what the Canadian Wheat Board thinks is a safe level so that they will not lose any money. Technically the announced initial price is not a floor price, but in reality it is because farmers are given money the minute they deliver the grain, even though the grain may not be sold for another two years.

When all the grain is sold, all the figures are brought together into a pool and averaged out. After the costs are taken off because farmers pay for everything, then the board makes a final payment about a year and six months or a year and eight months after the grain was actually grown. This system has worked for 47 years. It is slow, but it satisfies the great majority of farmers. They will all get the same price for the same grain, plus or minus the cost. Since this system has worked for the last 47 years, why should we be concerned about the timing of the price announcement? As I said, the farmer would simply like to have an indication of what the best grains are that he can put together and what the Wheat Board thinks the price will be for that year. If the Wheat Board determines that the price may be $6, it will probably make an initial payment of approximately $4.50. With this information, the farmer can receive his $4.50, and when the final accounting is completed the Wheat Board can decide that he has a final payment owing to him of approximately $1.25, depending on the final sale.

Would hon. members not agree that it would be of assistance economically for farmers to have at least a rough expectation of return on a certain crop, whether it be oats, barley, wheat or cereal crops such as rapeseed? It is a very simple proposal to have the Standing Committee on Agriculture consider the advisability of making it mandatory for the Wheat Board to remain aware of conditions and give its best estimation of prices at least one month before the middle of April each year in order to give the farmer a chance to choose which crop he might expect to get the best returns on. Let the Wheat Board indicate to him what they think the best returns will be.

The heart of the resolution is found in the expression "setting floor prices related to cost of production". I have already indicated in my remarks that the price is actually set on the best guess of what the final price will be during the year. A certain proportion is taken from that price. The purpose of this motion is to have the government consider basing this amount on the cost of production along with announcing it a month in advance, of planting.

This brings me to the consideration of the long background of this phrase "the cost of production". It was in 1958 that the national agricultural policy was announced in the House by the then Prime Minister, John Diefenbaker. There were five points in that national agricultural policy. The first point was to accelerate marketing. As you know, during that period we developed markets in the Communist countries.

The second point was the stabilization of prices. As the House knows, we enacted several bills to deal with this point but the key one was the Agricultural Stabilization Act. This act concerned all products, not just wheat. Wheat was already covered by the Canadian Wheat Board in the initial payment. This act gave the government the statutory authority in effect to set a floor price based on the cost of production in order to assist farmers. However, the Canadian Wheat Board price was simply the best guess of what the initial payment should be on the farmer's bushel of grain.

The third point of that national policy was the stabilization of income. The Crop Insurance Act is an example of how we implemented that point.

The fourth point was to establish a modern system of farm credit. Out of that evolved the Farm Credit Corporation, which is still in existence today, the legislation for which was amended just a few months ago.

The final point in the policy was conservation, which concerned making the best use of our resources through environmental study and the improvement of soil conditions. The main example of that is ARDA.

This national agricultural program with its five directions has been in place these last 25 years and has been honoured by every government since 1958. We use the same legislation with slight amendments. Since all parties support the basic principles of this national agricultural policy, agriculture has not really been a partisan matter in the House during the last 25 years. We have the responsibility, however, of continually reviewing these programs in order to make them better. Every session, there are always one or two amendments to make improvements to it. For example, there was the Western Grain Stabilization Act which was introduced by the Hon. Otto Lang, the minister at that time. That act is still in effect today. Therefore, these stabilization principles are constantly being modified.

The purpose of relating that policy to the motion before us today is to point out that the key issue we are discussing concerns the way to stabilize prices. The key document in this regard was the Agricultural Stabilization Act of 1950. At that time a great debate ensued as to how to create a formula to protect a farmer's cost of production so that if he took a chance to grow a certain product he would at least get his expenses back. Therefore, we set up the act on the basis of a formula. In order to arrive at that formula we had to consider several factors, the cost of production being the main one. However, it proved almost impossible intellectually to determine what the average cost was. For example, if you took 100 farmers who were producing the same product, each farmer would have a different cost. If you took the middle group of farmers as the mean and set a cost of production, if that cost on which you would guarantee a minimum return was lower than a certain farmer's cost of production, he would take a beating. On the other hand any farmer whose cost of production was lower received a large bonus. Therefore it was impossible on the sheer basis of averaging statistics to arrive at a precise cost of production figure.

The work done by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) and the summary of his work which he presented in his speech at that time is an example of the imaginative and innovative quality of the work he did. He put those figures on the record, and by working the index backwards and forwards he discovered that the concept of the index was not entirely fair either. I will not go into the details which are the concern of the statisticians. It is very difficult to make statistics work accurately for you and it is equally difficult to allow for the changing conditions which we have seen during the last 30 years.

The Agricultural Stabilization Act, as it was originally passed, was based on a formula in the form of a guarantee that if a farmer were go to grow a crop, such as beans, at a previously set price, he knew before the crop was planted that he would get 80 per cent of a three-year moving average price, which was the closest method of establishing the estimated cost of production for beans.

The statisticians who established these prices worked hard, but no matter how hard they worked—looking back at it 25 years later—one realizes that it was impossible to be precise. Therefore, the cost of production is still an active subject to be studied by those statisticians. If any hon. members want to know what I mean by the difficulty of determining a price, they should read the last report of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in which their officials spent two years working with the Department of Agriculture trying to arrive at cost of production figures. Do not blame them, as humans beings, for failing. I think it is humanly impossible to actually project any firm cost of production. Unless you have some relationship to the cost of production, any form of support price which is established is not much good. In effect, what the farmers are asking this House to do, through the Canadian Wheat Board, is that when the price is set, is not simply to use the criterion of the best guess of what the price will be in the United States over the next year. Take a look at the farmers' costs of production. Even if it is proved, pick some initial price related to the cost of production which is reasonable. If one reads through the speeches given by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) over the last ten years, one will see he has been trying to do this in relation to other products. He has changed the three-year working average. He has changed the percentage from 80 per cent to 90 per cent and up to 100 per cent, searching for a better way of doing it. But the wheat farmer does not receive that type of attention from the Minister of Agriculture because these particular items, cereals and oilseeds, are under the Canadian Wheat Board.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin is really requesting that we give to the farmer who works under the socialized control of the Canadian Wheat Board, if one wants to call it that, a type of initial price based on the cost of production rather than the best guess. There is a risk involved in this because the Wheat Board does not have any money of its own and when it sets its initial price, it must go out and borrow from the banks to pay the farmer. Then when the grain is sold a year or a year and a half later, the farmer accounts for the price he actually sold it for, the cost of interest is taken off along with the cost of shipping and all the rest and then the second or final payment is worked out. The farmer is very happy when he gets more than he expects because it is still a guessing game. What the farmers need now, considering all the changes during these last few years along with high costs, is an initial price based on something better than the best guess. We should see whether we cannot decide a floor price based on a rough equivalent of the cost of production of various types of grain. I will not put words into the mouth of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, but I know that is what he is trying to do.

I would suggest that on this particular motion, which is only requesting the government to consider this proposal, it would be quite safe for whoever speaks for the government to stand up in the House and say there should be no change in the value of Ways and Means of the government. The government should simply be asked to accept this motion and put it before a standing committee of the House to let it determine some form of direction for the Canadian Wheat Board. This would allow the farmers under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board to make the same effort in planning as those producing other products in Canada covered by the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act. It is very straightforward. It will never be perfect, but at least there will be a little improvement.

This motion is obviously very simple. It will simply put up the cost of production using the formulae available, worked out with great trouble by the Department of Agriculture and by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They will relate that initial price and announce it a month in advance of the planting season so that the farmer can consider his various choices. He will know the floor price, or at least the initial price, so that he will know what his costs will be if he produces a certain crop or how close he is to his cost of production. If he can see that he will make some money out of it, he will probably grow the crop. But if he sees that he can make even more money from another grain, he will go the other route. This will simply help the farmer to plan. It will not cause the treasury of Canada to bear any cost. If the Wheat Board sets the initial price too high, there will be a smaller final payment, the farmer will simply take the money ahead of time, and then he will pay it back. He will have to pay the interest. Therefore, the farmer will take all the econmic risks. All we are asking is to please give the grain farmer equal treatment with other types of farmers under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act.

I think I have made a fair representation as to what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin wants done under this motion. I would like to add a few thoughts of my own. I was involved with the setting up of the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act and I praised it many times in the House. On every occasion, I tried to help improve it. But I still think there is much to be done based on the type of proposal made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin concerning the grain department. We should apply some of his background knowledge on the figures to other products covered by the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act. I am referring to fundamental products like potatoes, beef, fruits and vegetables. I know much work is being done under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act, and the formula is constantly being changed, but I do think additional work could be done such as that being done in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Department of Agriculture with respect to grain. This deep study of the figures should be applied to arrive at a fair floor price, not only for producers of grain which come under the Wheat Board Act, but also for all farmers and all of these key products.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time expired at 4.33. Perhaps he might want to seek the unanimous consent of the House to complete his remarks. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): For many years Canada has fought for international commodity agreements. This is particularly important concerning food products which are increasing in volume in international trade. I hope that hon. members in all parties who may read this speech will keep up the fight. I made a major speech on this subject in 1964. I have attended United Nations meetings. I have attended international parliamentary meetings in Australia and Senegal. I have worked with great care on the presentations of all nations at the United Nations conferences on trade and development. All parties in this House supported this stand. But what I am really saying here is that I hope that even though we are trying to help our producers to stabilize their incomes and prices in our country, we still work toward an international framework to stabilize those prices, not to set the prices, but to determine the rule of law for the competition between those floors and ceilings.

Canada led the world with the international meat agreement in 1949, which was destroyed in 1966-67, with the United States, Canada and Australia. Now we must get back on the road together. I know that Members of Parliament from all parties have met with their counterparts in the United States. Some have spoken to Members of Parliament in Australia. There is no parliament left in Argentina, but we are in contact. We know that the Argentinians sent their representatives here to Ottawa on April 24 and 25. So did Australia, Canada, the United States and the Europeans. The motion for the restoration of international agreement has been placed. But we in Canada who have led the way for the world in international commodity agreements should continue to lead the way. If it is very important in relation to food for world security and stability, it is also equally important in relation to the other resources, such as the forestry resources and particularly this very valuable mining resource of ours.

I want to thank the House for letting me make these comments of my own. In addition to what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said in his attempt to bring just a little common sense to this announcement date, not only on the timing one month in advance but also on the cost of production, I would like to say that we also have some responsibilities, wherever we are, to keep up this pressure so that the producers of the world unite together, sit down with the consumers and work out a rule of law, because these products must be stabilized or either the producer or the consumer will be destroyed. There should be a rule of law placed on these variable prices. Nature cannot be controlled, but we can control, to a reasonable degree, the stability of prices in world trade.

I simply wanted to ask the hon. member who spoke for the government today to please say to the minister in the other place who is responsible, "Do not just sit there. Do something. All you must do is to put a reference before the committee, and if you can move this one step further it would help us all and we could get this very simple motion off the books."

• (1640)

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: I thank the members for the thunderous applause they afforded me this afternoon.

It is always good for me to enter into a debate with the distinguished Member of Parliament for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). Earlier on, when Mr. Diefenbaker was prime minister, he was the minister of agriculture. I regret that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) is not able to be with us today. It may seem strange to some members that I would be intervening in this particular debate. There are some reasons why I have come forward. I represent a riding which is a twin of the Wetaskiwin riding. I have had voluminous correspondence with constituents of that riding, as well as with many friends I met there over the last three years. I believe that the problems that are being faced in Wetaskiwin are problems that are being faced throughout the west, in the grain-growing provinces.

The objective of this motion is quite reasonable and I have no quarrel whatsoever with it. It must be pointed out, however, in asking for the type of protection considered here, that there already is a great deal of protection in place for the producer. I have used the term "protection", which is the word the member for Wetaskiwin used in his motion. Canadian producers, Mr. Speaker, must be protected, and they want protection. They have at their disposal a number of policies and instruments which enable them to continue producing without introducing the additional regulation and intervention which cost of production, full price, would entail.

First and foremost in the form of protection is the Canadian Wheat Board. Its mandate is to market grains on the producers' behalf at the best possible return. Who could argue with anything as straightforward as that? The board continues to do an excellent job. The Canadian producer obtains returns on the world marketplace which compare favourably with other exporting countries.

At the end of the month of April, Senator Hazen Argue, who sits in the other place and who is the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, tabled the board's 1980-81 report. It says that the sale value of last year's crop was a record $5.6 billion. The value of the grain delivered in the 1980-81 crop topped the previous record of about $3.9 billion, set a year earlier. These kinds of returns are vital to prairie producers, facing ever-increasing farm input costs, with high interest rates. The board is just the agency to ensure the highest returns possible in the world markets.

The farmers were able to deliver all the grain they wanted and farm carryovers were lower than for many years, at the end of the crop year, this, Mr. Speaker, in spite of drought conditions early in the crop year. The report said that the 1980 crop year was better than the ten-year average and grain exports at 23.5 million tonnes were just a shade under the record of the previous year.

Senator Argue said, according to the Release of May 28, 1982, that there are no guarantees in the grain business, what with the fickle weather and changing economic conditions, and shifting trading patterns, but it is still the brightest light in the economy right now. It was noted that we were able to establish the initial prices for the 1982-83 crop year at last year's levels. That should encourage farmers to produce all they can to meet the growing world demand for grain. I have no doubt that the market is there for all the grain farmers can grow. I am hopeful that prices will improve enough before long to ensure the farmers' returns keep up with the rising costs.

This House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, went on record a few weeks ago, as agreeing unanimously that the Wheat Board is doing a good job. The proof of that is than when the member from St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) brought forth a motion, he got unanimous consent to it, congratulating all groups in the grain industry for having surpassed the all-time export record with still seven weeks to go in the crop year. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the system does indeed work.

The third point I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is that a related institution, the Canadian International Grains Institute, assists in the promotion and marketing of Canadian grains by providing a range of ongoing educational programs. This is to me a rather interesting point, Mr. Speaker, because my profession before coming into politics was in education. As a teacher, as one who works in this field, I believe that education is an ongoing matter for all people in our society—understood and included, the farmers of Canada.

The federal government has also established the Western Grains Stabilization Program. It protects producers against periods when there are downward signs in the market and when their income drops significantly in relation to historical levels. How is it done? As the hon. member from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain pointed out, it is done by taking a sliding average of farmers' income. I stand to be corrected by the hon. member, but my information is that it was over the previous five years and not over the previous three years. If this is not the case, I hope the hon. member will correct the record at the end of my intervention. How does it work? If in the current year the revenue income drops, then the stabilization mechanism is triggered.

This program is cost-shared by the government and the producers. The government puts in 4 per cent of the eligible receipts and the producer puts in 2 per cent, subject to a $900 maximum for each producer. You might ask yourself, Mr. Speaker, as well as might all other members of this House, how much the farmers, the producers, benefited from this since its inception. The fact is that this fund has paid out some $370 million to our farmers, our producers, since its inception. This is a scheme, Mr. Speaker, which the farmer contributes to in the good years and benefits from in the less good years.

To deal with temporary cash flow problems, Mr. Speaker, there is the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Under it, producers can take out an advance payment on farm-stored grain until there is an opportunity to deliver it. For wheat used for domestic human consumption, producers have the protection of the domestic wheat price policy. Under this policy, producers are guaranteed a minimum price of $5 a bushel on all wheat used for domestic human consumption, even if export prices fall below this level.

What do we mean by human consumption? We mean that the grains are used, for example, in the making of such everyday things are bread, pasta, all biscuits and cookie manufactures. Again I am involved there, because in my riding there are manufacturers of these commodities. It is very important to them that they get the type of grain that they need to produce and manufacture wholesome foods for the people of Canada.

It was said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that our transportation system is involved in this matter. Major improvements have been made in the Canadian grain handling and transportation system in recent years. There is the provision of new hopper cars. I will put more detailed information on the record. There is also branch line rehabilitation. The process of upgrading our system will continue as we move increasing volumes of grain for export.

• (1650)

As I mentioned, while this point is not directly related to the farmer in respect of farm costs, obviously it is important to the farmer to have an excellent—not a good, but an excellent—transportation system to move his products to market. That is why the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has been putting so much effort into this particular area.

To be specific, with regard to hopper cars, the federal government—the government of this day—has already bought or leased some 10,000 hopper cars. Recently the minister announced in this House the purchase of another 1,280, which will provide jobs in my area around Hamilton, Ontario, in Sorel, Quebec and also Trenton, Nova Scotia.

With regard to branch line rehabilitation, originally this was to have been a ten-year program with a $700 million budget. This started in 1977. Just recently the Minister of Transport arranged to index the annual spending on this program so that yearly amounts will not be eroded by inflation. What this means is that if there is $70 million in a given year and inflation increases 10 per cent, then in the next year there will be $77 million, and we will be able to buy the same number of hopper cars and do the same amount of work. In that way there will not be any penalty involved.

Under these programs as well as the recent initiative of the Minister of Transport, $3.2 billion will be invested in grain transportation alone over the next four years. That investment is to take place—I would say 95 per cent—in the west.

The government already guarantees initial payments for wheat, oats and barley marketed by the Canadian Wheat Board. These are floor prices which are guaranteed by the government. They are market-oriented and provide the producer with a significant degree of security. This in itself, I submit, guarantees the producer at least the minimum price.

We have had ongoing discussions with many countries. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has mentioned that he has taken part in many trade delegations. He has been to the United Nations, as have many members of my party. I think the hon. member will agree with me that one of our closest partners in the marketing of grain throughout the world is the United States. There was a meeting held in late May between Senator Hazen Argue, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. John Block. At that meeting they discussed the general grain situation and opportunities for closer co-operation among exporters. This was done so that we could work together and see to it that whatever bugs there were in the system would be worked out so that we would have maximum benefit for the farmers and maximum use of our transportation system. In that way we would get a maximum return for the people of Canada.

Following the meeting, Senator Argue indicated that efforts will be made to arrange a meeting of ministers from all grain exporting nations in the fall. We are looking to the future. We are going to try to anticipate whatever problems will be coming up, and this meeting will be held in the fall. At the meeting to which I have referred, we are told, there was an exchange about the possibility—perhaps even the probability—of a meeting at the ministerial level to discuss the grain situation, particularly if grain stocks build up this season. We are told that the American delegation responded very favourably.

In discussing the marketing systems of the two countries the Americans referred to their efforts to stabilize world grain markets through their loan rates and grain reserves program as well as to encourage U.S. farmers to reduce their seeded acreage. However, there was no request for Canadian acreage controls or cutbacks. Our farmers in the west are encouraged to grow virtually all they can.

In my opinion the Americans have a good understanding of Canadian policies in the grain business, and I think it is incumbent upon this government to make sure the Americans are kept abreast of things we are doing in this country so that they know what our specific intentions are.

Canada supports efforts to improve world prices for producers, but the U.S. and Canadian systems are very different, and we contribute through careful management of our export system. Our objective is to maintain a reasonable level of production, of which our farmers are capable, and to have in place a transportation system that is efficient and will take our grain to market. We expect the export trade in grain to continue to grow, and we expect to share in this expansion.

How am I directly involved in this? It should be pointed out that virtually all of the Welland Canal is situated in my riding, and a great deal of the grain which is shipped from the western provinces comes through the Lakehead, down through the Great Lakes, through the Welland Canal and out through the St. Lawrence Seaway. I submit that we in my area of the Niagara Peninsula—Welland specifically—are benefiting a great deal from the grain sales which are going on and the grain exports we make to other countries.

There are rumours that the U.S. government might subsidize American grain exports to make their grain more competitive on world markets because the Americans are concerned about the European Economic Community export subsidies—and so are we—but nothing said during the course of that meeting would suggest that the Americans are making threats to anyone about entering into a program of subsidization of the export of American grains.

In wrapping up, I would like to say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin that what is asked for here is reasonable, in terms of discussion. It is reasonable that these points be raised in committee, but it is also very important that the people of Canada know that we do have a great deal of protection in place now to help our farmers. As has been mentioned, this protection has been provided over a period of some 47 years, and it will continue in the years ahead. We hope our grain producing provinces will produce more grain. We hope they will be able to sell more. We hope our exports will increase and that that will help our balance of payments.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House of the motion we are debating this afternoon. It was placed before the House on June 27, 1980, by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). It says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of setting floor prices related to costs of production for cereal and oilseed crops one month before planting in order that farmers may be provided adequate returns to ensure sufficient production to meet Canada's domestic and export needs.

I think it is important that we reread the motion. We have had some discussions about Wheat Board operations, and while I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) about his personal opinion that oilseeds should be under the Wheat Board, that is not the position of the Conservative Party nor, I think, that of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. What they are talking about seems to be something quite different.

However, this is something which should be referred to a committee of this House for further clarification and discussion, because the concept of cost of production grows in importance during periods of inflation. Agriculture, and in particular farmers who are producing grain, feel a double-whammy effect from the inflation cycle at this moment in time. Two factors are impacting on production costs. Agriculture, like the rest of the economy, has to put up with high interest rates. We also are experiencing violent and sudden increases in the cost of energy. The impact of these energy costs is doubled and tripled in agriculture as they work into fertilizer costs. Most of the seed stock for the production of nitrogen-based fertilizer comes from natural gas. As those prices are followed to increase or are legislated upwards according to agreements between the federal and provincial producing provinces, the price of natural gas, and therefore the price of fertilizer, increases.

• (1700)

In addition to the regular cost of energy for tractors and for heating farm buildings, farmers experience this secondary effect in the price of fertilizer.

The third effect hits them in the price of herbicides and pesticides, the bulk of which come from the petrochemical industry. As the price of petrochemicals goes up, so does the price of herbicides and pesticides. Consequently, production costs of Canadian grain farms have far outstripped costs experienced by other people in the country. Instead of a 10 per cent to 12 per cent inflation rate, agriculture has been facing a 15 to 20 per cent inflation rate in the last couple of years.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain correctly pointed out that some attempts have been made to look into the question of stabilization but they did not point out that the formulae used for triggering a payout under the old legislation are based on a percentage of the three or five previous years. They are not at all useful to the farmer who is faced with a 15 per cent or 20 per cent annual increase. The average of the five previous years' production comes to about half the actual cost of production today.

Any legislation that will deal with the stabilization programs will have to deal directly with today's production costs, or at least the production cost of the previous year. There are two reasons for this. The first is the whole question of fairness. It is the only fair way to handle the situation in times of inflation, and second, we are aware that we could be faced with deflation. We are hovering on the edge of a massive depression in the world's economy, and this could trigger enormous price declines. In those situations the old kinds of stabilization programs could be unfair to the extent that they would pay more than production costs with the formulae which are in existence. In a period of sudden depression or sudden deflation, payments would be considerably larger than actual costs if prices go down and could drain the treasuries of countries in an unexpected way. The fairest way, both for the farmer and for the taxpayer, is to move to a more direct, more immediate cost of production formula.

The question, then, is what kind of cost of production formula would be used. It is not as difficult to work that out as is sometimes believed. There are basic points that almost everyone can agree upon. From a review of proposals that have been placed before us we can get some ideas of what participants in negotiations mean by a cost of production formula. Does it mean all costs? Or does it mean that the farmer will be paid a wage comparable to that of the average factory worker, plus a return on his investment comparable to what other investors receive? Does it mean he will get all his cash costs? I think everyone agrees that he would get all his cash costs, but none of the programs in place now pay much attention to the cost of his labour and his investment costs.

One philosophy of the cost of production is to move to a parity concept. We picked that one up in the United States, and it has been around ever since I can remember and probably for a good many years before that. That concept began with a base rate in the period 1914-17; it was then changed to the 1930 period, then it was switched to 1951. At no time was there ever complete parity, except during one war when there was an attempt to increase production. Usually a percentage of parity was used. I think the parity principle works into the concept of cost of production. In this country the two are almost interchangeable.

Some marketing boards, such as the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, have worked out cost of production formulae that provide a wage, although it is not equivalent to the average factory wage. They also provide some return for the farmer's investment. Usually it is assumed that the equipment the farmer uses is seven years old and that it has been depreciated. Basically they are talking about 50 per cent or 55 per cent of the farmer's investment going into the price of the commodity.

There are other kinds of costs of production formulae outside agriculture, and I only mention them for comparison. There is the cost of production formula worked out by Snavely who determined the cost of production of railways for the Government of Canada. That is a very healthy kind of cost of production formula and one that most farm groups would certainly accept if it were applied to them. They object somewhat to its application to railways, and I think with good reason. That formula provides that the return on the investment should be 25 per cent and that not only should the railway be guaranteed 25 per cent on its total investment but it should be guaranteed 25 per cent on the money that the people of Canada provided, gratis, as part of that investment. In contrast, farmers are receiving about four per cent return on their investment. The question then becomes whether the production of goods is as important as the transportation of goods. It only makes economic sense to come down on the side of the producer. Without basic production there would be no economy left. Using the Snavely formula, the average wheat farmer in Saskatchewan would be paid $12.94 per bushel of wheat. Even the most grasping farm leader in the country would say that was more than the production cost. That is not the case from the railways point of view; they are quite willing to accept that kind of analysis. I think once we have discussed production costs, we have to also be cognizant of the fact that we can probably extract full production costs, or very close to it, for those goods produced for vital consumption within our economy. But we must remember the reality of the situation in the grain business is that about 80 per cent of the production is sold outside of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday, June 21, at two o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.12 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CALL FOR RESIGNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, over the past two years Canadians have witnessed the most arrogant, incompetent, and destructive government in Canada's history, responsible for a gross national product that in the last quarter was the lowest in 28 years; over 1.5 million Canadians out of work; investment capital leaving Canada at an unprecedented rate; the Canadian dollar at its lowest ever in the country's history; inflation at 11 per cent; interest rates over 20 per cent; every major energy project dead or dying; business failures up 50 per cent; farm bankruptcies 70 per cent ahead of last year, and our deficit approaching $16 billion this year alone. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That all members of this House shoulder their responsibility and force the resignation of this inept and incompetent government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, on January 29 of this year in this place, the Liberal member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) said, "If the Liberal Party thinks we", that is, the Liberal Party, "have to be communistic, we shall be communistic." Now the Liberal Prime Minister has taken up this message and on Saturday in western Canada advised his Liberals to embrace the left. Further, he implied that to solve the government's economic disasters it will be necessary to scare the hell out of Canadians. Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That this House advise the Prime Minister that he and his government have already scared the hell out of the Canadian people, and that a more simple and humane solution would be for the Prime Minister and his government to resign and scare the hell out of the communists and other left-wingers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. While the New Democratic Party has always said that FIRA was not the cause of the outflow of capital from Canada, and while the Reaganite Tory Party and U.S. businessmen have been calling for the removal of FIRA, the net result of which would be to put more Canadians out of work by increasing our balance of trade deficit with the U.S., and hence to raise interest rates in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House endorse the position taken by Abraham Rotstein in a study by the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy, who maintains it was "the over-all effect of foreign direct investment since 1976 along with U.S. branch plants which has been responsible for the outflow of capital from Canada", and that this House call on the government to strengthen FIRA and to start repatriating our manufacturing industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENT TO INCREASE CASH ADVANCE PAYMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was put in place to allow farmers to borrow against grain grown but not marketed. The funds involved are not gifts, but loans which are repaid. The current maximum available under the cash advance program is inadequate and should be raised to a more realistic level. With the current situation of unprecedented high interest rates and low commodity prices, the need for such an adjustment is even more critical to the western Canadian economy. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the federal government proceed as quickly as possible to initiate the legislative amendments required to bring the maximum under the cash advance program to a more realistic level.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VIA RAIL

PURCHASING PREFERENCE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, given his penchant for buying foreign equipment whenever possible while chairman of the National Harbours Board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Transport issue direct instructions to the new president of VIA Rail to give Canadians, at all times, first preference in purchasing equipment and supplies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR PRINCE GEORGE-PEACE RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On June 17, the Tory member for Prince George-Peace River spoke in this House about funding and native leadership in regard to the upcoming Constitution conference. He said:

—in British Columbia responsible native political leaders have been starved out and the department has purchased itself the kind of help from among the Indians who may be prepared to sell out their brothers and sisters for their own selfish gain. They will no doubt be the representatives at the conference.

Whereas this is a typically irresponsible kind of Tory muckraking and venomous, slanderous attack on the democratically elected Constitutional conference leadership, including the democratically elected spokesman James Gosnell from the Nishga tribal council, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That the Leader of the Conservative Party have these vicious remarks withdrawn, or admit that in leaving them on the record they stand as Tory policy for the upcoming federal election.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

DEMAND THAT NEW BUDGET BE INTRODUCED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, rather than scaring the hell out of Canadians by creating unemployment, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) advocated this past weekend in Alberta—

Mr. Peterson: He did not.

Some hon. Members: Yes, he did.

Mr. Elzinga: —I urge the government to act quickly to stimulate the economy and cushion the adverse effects on the average Canadian. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the Minister of Finance immediately roll back all provisions of his November, 1981, budget and the National Energy Program, and table a new budget immediately which will stimulate the economy and restore investor confidence in Canada, putting Canadians back to work and lowering interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER CALL GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, two of the major chartered banks in Canada raised their mortgage interest rate to over 19 per cent on Friday, and the others are expected to follow suit this week. The banks have obviously taken note of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in western Canada over the weekend when he defended his government's tight money policy as a means of "scaring hell out of the people". In light of the fact that what really scares Canadians the most is the continued reign of a government which has mismanaged the economy of this nation to the point of disaster, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister who, because he is the Prime Minister, scares the hell out of the people, immediately call a general election so Canadians, who are obviously ready and willing to elect a new and capable government, will have no reason to fear the future.

Madam Speaker: Is there uanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LOUIS RIEL

PROPOSAL THAT POSTHUMOUS PARDON BE GRANTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Madam Speaker, today Canadians enjoy political freedom which has few parallels anywhere in the world. Indeed, democracy can probably be gauged by the extent to which a nation tolerates dissent. Today we tolerate literally all forms of political dissent, from elected advocates of separatism to others who advocate union with the United States. But surely another measure of political maturity must be the ability of a nation to forgive past transgressions against the authority of the state.

With the benefit of hindsight, Madam Speaker, I and many others in this House believe that the case of Louis Riel, who was elected to the Canadian House of Commons as the hon. member for Provencher, deserves to be reconsidered. For his political leadership of the 1885 rebellion, he was charged with high treason, tried for murder, and hanged despite a jury recommendation for mercy. In retrospect, many historians agree that mistakes were made on both sides and that natural justice for the Métis people has not yet been realized.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), the hon. member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) and, I hope, the entire Progressive Conservative caucus:

That this House grant Louis Riel a posthumous pardon for the crime of high treason.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FORESTRY

NECESSITY FOR SUPPLEMENTAL JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, in view of the government's slow and inadequate response to unemployment in British Columbia's forest sector, in view of the fact that the present B.C.-Canada employment bridging assistance program for forestry workers requires participants to be on unemployment insurance, and in view of the fact that many loggers and millworkers have already exhausted their UIC benefits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That the government immediately establish a supplemental program to provide jobs for forestry workers who do not qualify for the bridging program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT WITHDRAW POLICIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will put my question to the Acting Prime Minister who will be aware, I am sure, that the gross national income of the country dropped in the first quarter, on a seasonally adjusted annual basis, by 8 per cent. That is the second largest percentage decrease since records have been kept. Since the dollar is also in a free fall, will the minister explain why the government does not feel that now is the time for the government to swallow its pride and withdraw those key policies—any key policies—which are causing some reduction in economic growth, some increase in unemployment, such as the energy program, the last budget, and the huge deficit in the federal government budget?

• (1415)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I must agree with my hon. friend that there has been a decline in the first quarter in the real gross national expenditure by 2 per cent. I am informed that on an annualized basis it is 7.8 per cent. That situation is not particular to Canada. I observed this morning that the United States has forecast an annualized decline of 4.3 per cent on the same basis as Canada.

There are a number of good figures in the national accounts that my hon. friend prefers not to talk about, and it is pretty obvious why. For example, the balance of payments on a current account basis has a surplus of $1.2 billion for the first quarter. The merchandise trade surplus stands at $3.5 billion. Personal disposable income has increased by 1 per cent. Personal savings stand at the same level of 13.3 per cent. These are a number of the rather positive statistics.

Mr. Stevens: Unemployment is up. Interest rates are up.

Mr. Nielsen: Inflation is up.

Mr. Pepin: Again, my hon. friend is free to choose the figures he wants, but I just wanted to indicate that there is in the national accounts a number of statistics that are really unfavourable and that we deplore, and others that are quite good.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, surely the minister understands that the 8 per cent drop in real terms in national income means that 1.25 million people are unemployed. Canadians are not interested in selective statistics which the minister can pull out of a hat. Canadians want to know what the government is going to do to get the economy going again.

I should also point out to the Acting Prime Minister—he missed it this morning—that the Gross National Product in the United States just went up in the second quarter by 0.6 per cent. The United States is coming up. Canada is still in a free fall going down.

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have one simple question for the Acting Prime Minister. How much of a decline in the economy and how much of a decline in the Canadian dollar is the government going to allow before it changes its mind, swallows its pride, and introduces changes in the basic policies which are causing these problems?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was doing what I think is normal on this occasion. When my hon. friend chose only one set of statistics, in order that Canadians get the whole truth I indicated that there were others. I am quite entitled to do that. The truth does not hurt. People want the whole picture. My hon. friend took one set of statistics, and I indicated that there were others.

On the subject of what the government will do at this time, I am reading the Prime Minister's statements from the weekend. As reported by the Canadian Press, we find the following:

> Trudeau promised new economic initiatives being prepared by the government wouldn't be mere tinkering but would have real substance.

Mr. Nielsen: Scare the hell out of them.

Mr. Pepin: This is what the Minister of Finance repeatedly said last week. He intends to present that statement. He will take part in the debate this afternoon. There will be plenty of time for him to explain what is happening. There will also be the statement in which the minister will lay down what the government reaction is to present circumstances.

Mr. Nielsen: Grit times are hard times.

EXPECTATIONS OF CANADIANS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister should know that the truth is hurting. It is hurting those Canadians who are being laid off; it is hurting those people who have to roll over a mortgage at 18 per cent, 19 per cent or 20 per cent, and it is hurting those businesses that are going bankrupt today.

Over the weekend the Prime Minister said that the obvious solution to our economic problems would be for Canadians to cut their wage and salary demands and lower their expectations. That is a quote I got from the newspaper today. If the Minister of Finance in his mini-budget will only ask Canadians to lower their expectations, can he tell the Canadian people how in the world we will get the economy going again?

• (1420)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this lowering of expectations is not something that only the Prime Minister has been saying. I have seen a number of quotes from members of the opposition saying the same thing, for example, one even willing to exercise that by cutting back on foreign aid; another requesting a 10 per cent reduction in the general expenditures of the government.

Mr. Wilson: Is that all?

Mr. Pepin: The lowering of expectations is not an expression on which the Prime Minister has a trademark. It has been recognized by many, by most, as being—

Mr. Clark: Not by us.

Mr. Pepin: Well, we will see what the Leader of the Opposition has to say this afternoon on that subject, but generally speaking it is recognized in Canada as one of the fundamental measures to take at this time.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. The Prime Minister has admitted over the weekend that the direction of his policies since the November budget has been to scare the hell out of people by creating unemployment and causing bankruptcies. I would say that he has certainly succeeded. I cite the case of a couple with two children. Both parents have lost their jobs and they are about to lose their home, and they are scared.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Miss MacDonald: What has this couple ever done, except to work hard all their lives, that they should be the target of the Prime Minister's threat to scare the hell out of people?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, again, the Prime Minister is not doing anything that is not done in most developed countries of the world. I spent the weekend looking at statistics on this subject. A few months ago, for example, the Leader of the New Democratic Party was telling us the wonderful things which the socialist government was doing in France. I read on the weekend of the latest developments in France. They are certainly not of the nature which the leader of the NDP had in mind. Mr. Mitterrand has done a 180 degree turn, reducing social security and increasing the contributions of employers and employees to unemployment insurance and so on. I am just trying to say that the situation which exists in Canada is one which exists in all countries or in most countries of the western world at this time. The measures which are taken in other countries of the world, of course, will not be so dissimilar from those which will have to be taken in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND BANKRUPTCY LEVELS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, does the Acting Prime Minister understand what the Prime Minister is saying? He is saying that if enough people are unemployed, if enough businesses go bankrupt, then he might persuade other Canadians to lower their expectations, and that is unconscionable. How many does the Prime Minister consider enough? Is two million unemployed enough? Is 2.5 million unemployed enough? Is 2,000 bankruptcies enough? How many does the Prime Minister consider enough before he stops his sadistic policies?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is quite good at adding passion to the debate. I am trying to remain realistic on the subject. She makes a great to-do about bankruptcies. Again, if one looks at the statistics, one will realize that bankruptcies have happened in Canada regularly over the years. There were instances, for example, in 1978, when we had more than we have at the moment. While sympathizing, and being extremely aware of the difficulties in the Canadian economic situation at this time, I think one has to remain objective and try to see these issues in proper perspective. That was not what my hon. friend was doing a minute ago.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister who says that Canadians want to know the whole truth. I suspect that Canadians do know the truth, and they know that this group across the way is taking us to hell in a hand basket because of its economic kamikaze policies. With the present annualized fall in our gross national product of 8 per cent, I think it has fulfilled the Prime Minister's dream and he has been successful in wrestling the economy to the ground. Will the Acting Prime Minister not agree that because of the government's policies a number of sectors of the Canadian economy are too far gone to be reclaimed? How long must this country wait? Must we find ourselves in economic ruin before the government is prepared to take some real gutsy action?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think that the Prime Minister's words are being distorted. What he said during the weekend was that hard measures will have to be taken and, as I quoted him a moment ago, they will not be mere tinkering. They would have real substance. I think that the rest of the words put in his mouth by previous questioners have been distortions.

Mr. Riis: It sounds as though the Acting Prime Minister agrees with the Minister of State for Economic Development when he made the great revelation on the weekend that Canadians never had it so good.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister's intent is to scare the hell out of the people of Canada, suggesting that perhaps the tonic we need right now is higher unemployment—more people out of jobs—I would ask the Acting Prime Minister if creating higher unemployment is a tactic we can expect from the government in its economic war with the Canadian people? I suggest it is one of the most cynical tricks ever played by a government on its own people, if it is.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this gives me a good opportunity to indicate that what the Minister of State for Economic Development said during the weekend is quite different from the quotation that has been given.

Mr. Riis: That is what he said.

Mr. Pepin: Let us have a look. Even from the paper from which the quotation was taken there is the following paragraph in which the minister says:

> —that things "look particularly difficult" for people who went deeply into debt because they "didn't believe there would be an end to the inflationary special . . . But the 60 to 70 per cent of the total who don't have debts probably never had it so good."

That is quite a different statement from the one my hon. friend just put to the House. I suspect that this is the sort of thing we have been hearing since the beginning of this question period. I have just indicated that in this particular instance the quotation attributed to the Minister of State for Economic Development was quite false. Reading from the very paper that reported the first part indicates that this was so. My hon. friend should not have asked the question in the manner in which he did.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT TO LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In an interview which the Prime Minister gave on the weekend he is quoted as saying the following: "The federal government may have to restrict money supplies even more severely to scare Canadians into lowering their expectations." Obviously, restricting the money supply will mean even higher interest rates than exist at the present time.

Given the fact that present high interest rates have led to the million and a quarter unemployed, the highest number we have ever had, and given the fact that they have also led to an increase of almost 40 per cent in business bankruptcies, which means if interest rates continue at their present level we are likely to have 15,000 or 20,000 bankruptcies, how many bankruptcies, how many more unemployed do we need before the government will drop this insane idea of higher interest rates and tighter money?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, because of what just happened, I hesitate to take the quotation attributed to the Prime Minister at face value. Unfortunately, I received a copy of his speech only about two minutes before I entered the House. I have not had a chance to read it all. However, the points that were raised by the hon. member could be the subject of debate this afternoon. I am quite sure that the Minister of Finance, who will be taking part in the debate, will want to reason with our friends on the other side of the House, on what is happening in the area of bankruptcies, the relationship between bankruptcies and interest rates, and other matters of this kind. So, could we postpone this matter? I am sure that my hon. friend would want to take part in the debate, and at that time he could make his arguments.

VIA RAIL

APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. He had notice, more or less, on Friday when I was trying to ask him this question. Can he please explain the appointment of Pierre Franche as the new president of VIA Rail, especially at a very critical time in that organization's life, when there is no VIA Rail bill, and when the government has appointed a president who has no experience with the railway whatsoever, according to his curriculum vitae?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, most people thought that what was needed was a good administrator, and Mr. Franche was not a port expert when he became chairman of the National Harbours Board six years ago. Since then, the operating income of the National Harbours Board has gone from minus eight to plus 30 million dollars. Productivity has gone from 67,000 tonnes per employee to 91,000 tonnes. In 1976, 11 ports were losing money, and now all 15 are making money. So, we felt that this was the sort of man VIA needed at this time. If Mr. Franche does as well for VIA as he has done for the National Harbours Board, my hon. friend will be the first to compliment us on his selection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RELATIONSHIP WITH PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I will not go into the history of the National Harbours Board and the capitalization of existing debt which does produce a rather interesting black picture in terms of operations. However, I would like to ask the minister a very deliberate question. I would ask him to clarify some confusion, and explain to this House whether Pierre Franche is not the brother-in-law of Dr. LeClair, the president of the CN? If he is the brother-in-law of the president of the CN, which just happens to be the biggest client of VIA Rail, does the minister not think that this is a rather invidious position in which to put both of these individuals?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed they are brothers-in-law. I do not think one should be punished in life for having a brother-in-law, nor should one be rewarded. So, we felt that this consideration was really immaterial in the selection of the new president of VIA.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GRAPH PROJECTIONS OF CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS FOR YEARS 1984 TO 1991

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my pigeon has just gone out into the lobby. Oh, I see that the hon. minister is on his way back.

My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. A year ago the minister provided committee members with a 15-year capital program projection chart and graph and this year he provided the members with a revised graph. If one compares the two graphs, one will find that the Department of National Defence has had its capital requirements for the years 1984 to 1991 reduced by over $3 billion. Would the minister tell the House what programs are to be deleted or postponed?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as far as I know from the information I have received from my department, and the decisions which have been taken by this government, there is no major program which has been delayed. All the programs are in progress and are proceeding on time. If the hon. member wants to know about the F-18 program, the frigates program or the small arms replacement program, all these programs are on time and will be completed.

FRIGATE CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. If there is not a shortage of $3 billion, the minister is putting out very misleading graphs. May I ask him about the frigates which have not received cabinet approval at the present time for anything beyond the $63 million contract definition phase? Would the minister explain how that program is to go ahead as scheduled when his expected cash flow is being so severely restricted?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member for Victoria also wants to confuse this House. He knows very well that the CPF program put forward was well protected according to the forthcoming budget, and there has been no change in the way we will carry it out. Obviously, the two contractors will make their submissions in October, and we will not evaluate them until March or April, 1983. Then, according to my knowledge, everything should go according to plan in relation to the six new frigates. A decision will probably be taken in due time to have the funds available for this program.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DESIGNATION OF ONTARIO REGIONS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for regional and industrial expansion. The minister is well aware of the fact that the country's current economic mess is having a disruptive and damaging effect on the economies of a number of Canadian provinces, including Ontario, which has gone from being a "have" province to a "have-not" province. The minister has promised that his department, having concluded a review of the guidelines and designated boundaries now in place, will announce the extension of both, to permit and encourage the creation of new industries and businesses and the expansion of existing ones. Will the minister inform the House when this announcement will be made and what new areas, particularly in Ontario, will be so designated?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I do not accept everything in the premise to my hon. friend's question. I can tell him that the review to which he has referred has not been completed, nor have the necessary conclusions on that review been reached. But as soon as that point is achieved, I will be happy to make an announcement.

REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF GRANT PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the same minister. Would the minister not agree that the expansion of the grant program in Ontario would stimulate the economy of the province, creating new jobs, and would not in any way contribute to the very serious problem of inflation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I hope that the hon. member for York-Peel and his colleagues will appreciate the hon. member's representation for greater government expenditure. I will certainly give it every consideration.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

PUBLICITY ISSUED BY MONTREAL FESTIVAL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. As the minister knows, yesterday the Festival du Vieux Port de Montreal started its summer program. Would the minister explain how this federal program, under his department, operating in Montreal where one quarter of the population is English-speaking, is able to flaunt the Official Languages Act and the language provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms by publishing all of its publicity materials in French, including a half-page ad in French in the English-speaking Montreal Gazette? Why is this federal program not carried on bilingually, and what will the minister do to see that it is so carried on?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention shortly before question period today. I report to him and to hon. members of the House that the Corporation of the Vieux Port in Montreal was established with local representation as an agency of the federal government, rather than on-line responsibility, in order to attempt to be sensitive to local community conditions and aspirations. I have not had time to investigate, but if the situation as relayed to me by the hon. member is accurate, then, in my opinion, the corporation has been most insensitive in that particular advertisement. When I do have an opportunity to investigate the facts, I certainly intend to bring to the corporation's attention not only sensitivity, but also the programs and policy of the government which have been supported by all parties in this House, that is, of promoting both official languages in this country.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for housing. Does the minister recall when mortgage interest rates peaked at 20 per cent last year and thousands of Canadians were out in front of the Parliament Buildings trying to get Ottawa to take some action to assist them? We were told to wait for the budget. We then received Bill C-89. Only 300 Canadian families were able to take advantage of its provisions. Interest rates are now back to 20 per cent. What does the minister propose to do to try to bring interest rates down to a level which people in Canada can afford?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the starting point, in response to the hon. member's question, as would be my response to the editorial in The Toronto Sun today, is to implore hon. members to investigate the facts, that is, to discover what has actually transpired under the assistance program made available by the majority of hon. members in the House. Rather than 300 families taking advantage of that program, or, as The Toronto Sun states, 400 families, in fact there are 1,400 families benefiting under that program today.

• (1440)

At the time of the escalation of interest rates last fall, many members brought to my attention difficulties of individual Canadian households as a result of that. I recall saying that the government would attempt to respond to those very difficult situations. I am very happy to note that 1,400, some 400 more than the individual cases brought to my attention by all members of this House of Commons, have found assistance under that plan. In conclusion, if members will genuinely try to understand the plan and promote it among their constituents, more Canadian families will be able to benefit by it.

Mr. Deans: I am not going to enter into a contest with the minister about numbers. He is wrong.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ACT TO REDUCE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. I will put it quite bluntly. Why does the Government of Canada not bring in legislation to require that interest rates for mortgages be provided to Canadian families at a price they can afford? The minister knows full well that Canadian families cannot afford 20 per cent mortgage interest rates. The program he has offered does not even begin to put a dint in the problem.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I would again ask the hon. member and all hon. members that, when they request the Government of Canada to spend more money and put more money into the economy, they consider the choices. Whom do we serve? We serve a wide spectrum of Canadians. There are those Canadians, for example, who sacrificed to pay off their mortgages in this difficult time. They did without things in order to pay off their mortgages. There are those Canadians who rent. There are those Canadians who pay less than 30 per cent of their incomes and find it easier to meet their own housing needs. We, as a government, have to be responsible to them as well. We have attempted to balance relief to Canadians. We have asked Canadians to spend up to 30 per cent of their income on their shelter needs. We think that is a fair request.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH DIESEL ENGINE PLANT IN WINDSOR, ONT.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister will be aware of the proposal by Chrysler Corporation to put a new diesel engine plant in Windsor, which would have created 1,400 new jobs. He will also know that his inability to gain support in cabinet has now lost 500 of those jobs to the state of Michigan. With the Province of Ontario already putting its money on the table, can the minister offer any hope to the unemployed in his riding that he can come up with the money and guarantees necessary to proceed with this project?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend's impressions of the matter are not particularly correct. I have not yet come to the conclusion that what has been proposed by Chrysler, and it is something that has changed from week to week, has yet reached a point where I can say it is a good deal for the workers, the communities in question, and taxpayers in general. When I get to that point I will be happy to seek the advice of my colleagues. I hope my hon. friend will give the same priority that I do to making sure there is a good deal for all those concerned.

REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I would like the minister at some point to tell me where I have been inaccurate. Certainly I am accurate in the fact that 500 of these jobs have already gone to Michigan. I am accurate in the fact that the province of Ontario has put its money on the table. I am accurate in the fact that the people in the area want those jobs. If the minister is unable to convince his cabinet colleagues to spring a few dollars free to guarantee jobs for those in his own riding, how can he expect us to have any confidence in him, and why then in fact should he not resign?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I do not think my hon. friend has a complete and accurate picture of the situation. The proposals by Chrysler, which are still very much a matter of discussion and negotiation, have changed a number of times since the matter was first raised with the government. I do not think it is definite that the benefits and the corresponding cost to the taxpayer are necessarily as optimistic from the point of view of workers and communities as he suggests. To give an example that he does not know what he is talking about, the plant in question is not in my riding. It is in a riding represented by one of my colleagues. When it comes to working for the working people in the Windsor area, I will be happy to stake my achievements against the non-achievements of my hon. friend and his colleagues any day.

THE ECONOMY

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. He will know that two hours ago the Canadian dollar was trading at its lowest point in history against the U.S. dollar. The minister will also know that on Tuesday of last week the Prime Minister was asked four questions by the hon. member for Yukon, the last one of which asked the Prime Minister to confirm that it was not the intention of his government to impose foreign exchange controls. The Prime Minister refused to respond in the fashion that everyone in this House would have expected him to respond, by suggesting that it was a matter of cabinet solidarity which precluded him—

Madam Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member feel he has to repeat all questions that have been asked in this House? He should ask his own question. That is why he was recognized.

Mr. Gamble: Having regard to the condition of the dollar today, will the Acting Prime Minister deny that the government has any intention of imposing foreign exchange controls?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this has been done many times. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have denied it. My hon. friend will have an opportunity this afternoon to take part in the debate. If he wants to raise the question after the Minister of Finance has completed his oration, I am quite sure the Speaker will permit him to do so.

REQUEST THAT SPECIAL COMMITTEE EXAMINE ESTIMATES

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has frequently asked the members of this House to offer positive suggestions with respect to how this country may be assisted in its economic plight. Will the Acting Prime Minister accept the suggestion made last week that this House establish a special standing committee for the purpose of examining the estimates with a view to reducing those that can be reduced in order to pare the cost of government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I look forward to the debate this afternoon because, presumably, we will hear from the Leader of the Opposition. In the last week or so we have heard from a number of members on the other side. For example, the hon. member who asked the question asked for a reduction in Canada's foreign aid. Others have asked for a 10 per cent cut in government expenditures. Others have asked for an increase in the money provided for housing, others asking for an increase in the money provided to home owners, and so on. We have had a real hodge-podge of suggestions.

This afternoon will be a great day for the opposition. They will have an opportunity to reconcile their views and come out with a co-ordinated stand. We on this side of the House have done so. The Minister of Finance is now building on the consensus that we developed among ourselves. Hopefully the opposition will do the same thing. It will be useful to the country if we can take a generous, widely-based position on what needs to be done at this time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

URANIUM PRICE-FIXING TRIAL—CONTENTS OF BERTRAND INQUIRY REPORT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister is aware, about ten days ago the Court of Appeal of Ontario confirmed a superior court judgment with respect to the uranium cartel and said that Uranium Canada and Eldorado Nuclear were immune from prosecution. What method does the minister, who is in charge of these Crown corporations, propose to allow the people of Canada and the members of this House to know the results of the Bertrand inquiry as they pertain to those two Crown corporations?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the matter has been before the court. It is still subject to being further appealed, if the parties so desire. Therefore, I would not want to comment. My only comment is that I will let the law follow its course.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, in this case the minister and the government are guilty of the most massive cover-up ever in this House. I say to the minister, as his own counsel said, that he had the directing mind and will of Uranium Canada, and completely controlled and determined the acts of that corporation. In light of what the Court of Appeal said in an unreserved judgment from the bench, will the minister tell us how the Canadian people are to understand what the Bertrand inquiry put forth? What method does the minister propose to allow the Canadian people and members of this House to know that?

• (1450)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I respectfully submit to the hon. member that he is talking through his hat. I do not have a counsel before that court.

FOOD AND DRUGS

WARNING ON USE OF ASPIRIN BY CHILDREN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On June 4 the United States Health and Human Services Secretary, Richard Schweiker, ordered the food and drug administration to take the necessary steps to warn parents and others not to give aspirin, ASA and other salicylates containing drugs to infants and young children suffering from influenza, chicken pox and other types of viral infections because the drug is linked with Reye's Syndrome, an illness which causes permanent brain damage and death in 30 per cent of the cases.

I would like to ask the minister if her department is aware of this problem and, if so, will she also be taking the necessary steps to warn parents and other members of the Canadian public of the danger of giving this drug under the circumstances I have mentioned?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, in Canada, no guidelines have been issued as yet to Canadian parents or Canadians in general regarding the use of aspirin for children, but we are aware of the situation in the United States. We are watching developments closely in the U.S., and in Canada, we have decided to start discussions with the Canadian Paediatric Society, with whom we have been in touch about this matter.

[English]

We decided to wait for their annual meeting a little later in June of this year to finalize the dossier. We may then have to issue a warning to all Canadian parents. Before any formal move it should be noted that, if possible, aspirin should not be given to children whenever something else could be used.

ENERGY

MARKET INCENTIVES FOR SOLAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, despite the showers today it is "Sun Day" in Ottawa. I therefore have a question for the affable Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Earlier this month the solar industries okayed their long-awaited warranty program which ensures consumer protection for their products. That removes the last roadblock, which the alternative energy report said was necessary before market incentives could be put into place.

I wonder if the minister is prepared to tell us today what market incentives he has in mind for the solar industry so that solar can finally compete with the heavily-subsidized gas, oil, hydro and nuclear industries.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the affable member for his question. He forgot to mention one step, and that is the establishment of standards. I am pleased to inform the hon. member that tomorrow the Canadian Standards Board will probably approve new standards for the solar industry. That will also be a very important step in ensuring the viability of that particular industry.

I would also like to inform the hon. member that the National Energy Program has allocated about $160 million to support the solar industry in the next five years, either through research or support for a number of activities. The industry has requested that we give particular attention to the commercialization of the solar industry. That is indeed a welcome initiative, and the government will examine this particular aspect with great interest.

IMPORTANCE OF EXPORT MARKET

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, we know that the PUSH program was to be a five-year program. After four years only about $20 million of the $125 million allocated has been spent. We spend $10 billion a year on oil compensation. We have spent about $4 billion on nukes. I could go on and on, but I am sure you do not want that, Madam Speaker. The point is that the amount directed to solar and its marketplace incentives is peanuts compared with the billions we are spending on more traditional and centralized forms of energy development. Our solar collectors can compete, and they have won awards all over the world. If we are not prepared to provide some incentives in the domestic market, what of the $4 billion foreign market? What is the minister prepared to do to ensure our share of the export market? At the moment it is equally puny.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Canadian solar industry has indeed been extremely dynamic and innovative. We are very happy that the PUSH program, to which my hon. friend has referred, has been the mainstay of that industry during the last few years. Had it not been for the support of the federal government, we probably would have no solar industry at the present time. We are making solar energy an alternative under the oil substitution program, just as natural gas, electricity and wood qualify for conversion grants. We have indeed taken steps to support and encourage the use of solar energy in our country.

As far as exports are concerned, the Minister of Trade and his department have also been actively engaged in supporting that industry. To mention only one example, there was an energy exhibition in Kenya last summer at which the Canadian solar industry was well represented. Significant sales were made, thanks to the support the federal government has given to that industry.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DAMAGE DONE TO FISHERMEN'S NETS AT HALIFAX, N.S.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a very brief question for the Minister of National Defence, if I might have his attention. I draw to the minister's attention incidents involving Canadian destroyers which have inadvertently—I am sure through some misunderstanding—destroyed probably 40 per cent to 50 per cent of the herring catch capability of fishermen on the eastern side of Halifax harbour during the last week or ten days. The matter has been corrected through local intervention. Will the minister intervene with the Adjutant General's office in the Maritime Command to ensure the most expeditious settlement of claims so that the fishermen might purchase additional nets and participate in the lucrative herring fishery which is just now coming into full swing?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, we pay very close attention to any remarks he makes because most of the time they are very ably made on behalf of his constituency. I agree with the hon. member. We will take all the steps necessary to see that claims can be settled in the interests of both the Canadian Armed Forces and the fishermen of his region. We will do everything possible to help. The hon. member may tell the fishermen—and we will tell them—that we will try to settle the problem as quickly as possible.

ENERGY

DEPARTMENTAL REACTION TO COMMITTEE REPORT ON ACID RAIN

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister will know, in October of last year the all-party unanimous subcommittee report on acid rain was released. The minister will also know that last week the Minister of the Environment seemed to indicate that talks between the United States and Canada are falling apart. Can the minister advise the House what the reaction of his department was to the recommendations of the subcommittee report on acid rain, and what response the minister has given to his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, with respect to his department's part, now and in the future, in carrying out the recommendations?

Point of Order—Mr. Andre

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my department is represented by me as a member of the cabinet. I give full support to the Minister of the Environment in his actions to deal with the question of acid rain. When the Minister of the Environment speaks about the acid rain issue, he speaks on behalf of the government of which I am very proud to be a part.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased the minister is proud to be part of the government, but that was not the question.

NATURE OF DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSE

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, what has the minister or his department done to communicate to the Minister of the Environment or anyone else the reactions, suggestions, criticisms or whatever there may be, in some sort of document, with respect to the recommendations brought down by the acid rain subcommittee last October? That is what we want to know. That is what we are asking the minister. We are not asking for an off-the-cuff comment about how proud the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of the Environment are to be part of the government.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my department communicates directly and practically on a daily basis with the Department of the Environment.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1982-83—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: I will rule today on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) on Friday last. He raised a point of order with respect to the procedural acceptability of a number of votes in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1982-83. I want to thank him for bringing those matters to the attention of the House and the Chair. I did appreciate, of course, the usual thoroughness and detail of his submission. I want also to express my appreciation to the hon. President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) who, unfortunately, is not in the House today. I have to rule on this particular point of order despite his absence.

• (1500)

Points of order relating to the procedural acceptability of funds in the estimates have been raised many times since the change in the rules on supply in 1968. The background has been well covered and indeed I dealt with it myself in my ruling of June 12, 1981. I do not intend to take up too much of the time of the House by repeating it all today. I invite the attention of all hon. members to that ruling and would remind them that the role of the Chair is to rule on procedural aspects only and not to decide questions of law.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre objects to 11 items contained in the Main Estimates. These are: Communications, Vote 1, 70 and 80; Energy, Mines and Resources, Vote 1; Environment, Vote 5; Finance, vote 1; Public Works, Vote 10; Supply and Services, Vote 1; and Transport, Votes 1, 10 and 45. The hon. member is of the opinion that these votes should be ruled out of order on the basis that they seek authority which does not appear in existing legislation, that is, "authority to spend revenue received during the year".

As I said in my ruling of June 12, 1981, an item that seeks to establish a new program in the absence of other legislative authority and the funds to put it into operation runs counter to the rulings of the Chair since 1974, which hold that legislation is required to authorize new programs, particularly matters of major substance.

I quite agree with the hon. member on this particular principle. However, after examination I find that the 11 items objected to are indeed based on legislative authority, which is the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82, and therefore are in order. This is consistent with my ruling of June 12, 1981, with respect to two votes in the Main Estimates 1981-82 of the Department of External Affairs, in which I said:

> However, two of the items, External Affairs Votes L50 and L55, have previous statutory authority, albeit previous Appropriation Acts, and thus are in order.

I would like here to make a brief aside. Last year, in the same ruling, I did express the wish that "if all votes included a reference to the statutory authority on which they are based, it would be easier to determine whether or not they were in order." I wish to thank the President of the Treasury Board for doing just so in this year's Main Estimates. It is a step forward in making it easier for the House to find its way through the complex world of estimates.

In his argumentation, the hon. member for Calgary Centre made reference to Bill C-96, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act which is now on the Order Paper. He cited this in support of his contention that what is being attempted to be done in the estimates is clearly out of order. My response is that this is immaterial in the matter before us because statutory authority exists. We are not dealing with new programs but a continuation of programs which exist. This bill might well solve the problem in authorizing new programs in the future. It is not yet law, however, and is therefore of no assistance in the present circumstances.

The next item objected to by the hon. member for Calgary Centre is Privy Council, Vote 1 on the grounds that it seeks to amend legislation and, on this basis, the hon. member makes a parallel with Agriculture, Vote 30 in the 1981-82 Main Estimates which was ruled out of order on June 12, 1981. I must admit this vote caused particular concern to the Chair. Agriculture, Vote 30 was specifically seeking to go beyond Section 12 of the Animal Disease and Protection Act and was ruled out of order for attempting to amend existing legislation, whereas Privy Council, Vote 1 does not refer to specific legislation but is in fact a continuation of a vote in the 1981-82 Main Estimates covered by the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82. In other words, Privy Council, Vote 1 does not attempt to amend the Salaries Act but provides for the salary of certain Ministers of State assigned by virtue of Section 23 of the Government Organization Act, 1970, which is itself the legislative authority required. The authority for the amount can be found in the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82. I therefore find Privy Council, Vote 1 also in order.

The third classification mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre dealt with expenditures not authorized under existing legislation. He cited Public Works, Votes 15, 25 and 35, and pointed out, based on Section 9 of the Public Works Act, that no authority exists for the minister to spend public moneys on non-public property. He added that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Public Works Act and the Public Lands Grants Act, not yet passed by this House, would give that authority. The three votes in question, however, appear in identical terms in Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82 and are therefore authorized under existing legislation. These are, therefore, not new programs and are in order.

The hon. member then offered a submission that Industry, Trade and Commerce, Votes 25 and L35 attempt to create new programs and are therefore out of order. Funds were appropriated for them, however, in the 1981-82 fiscal year in Appropriation Act No. 2. In view of this circumstance, I cannot agree that these votes authorize payment for new programs. I must rule them in order.

At this point the hon. member invited attention to Vote 40 of Public Works, contending that the vote is out of order on the grounds that it establishes a new Crown corporation and authorizes the corporation to spend revenues received during the year. As in the instance of the Industry, Trade and Commerce votes, funds were appropriated in 1981-82 for this program. On the second ground, that of spending revenues received during the year, I might well have included this vote for discussion under the hon. member's first classification. I find this vote also to be in order.

Finally, we come to Secretary of State, Vote 40 which the hon. member submits is out of order because it is based on an invalid authority, namely, paragraph (d) of Vote L27a of the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1976, which, he contends, lapsed several years ago. After thorough examination, I must respectfully differ with the hon. member. Paragraph (d) gives the terms and conditions of the payment and describes how payments are to be made. The statutory authority, again, is the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82 and intervening Appropriation Acts.

By way of conclusion, I should like to make a brief comment. The President of the Treasury Board in his response argued that, when raising points of order of this kind, timing is of the essence. As all hon. members are aware, estimates are a complex subject and their examination is time consuming. My predecessors and I have noted that it would be helpful to the Chair and would assure a more appropriate procedure for challenging the estimates if points of order are presented as soon as possible after the estimates are returned to the House from committees. However, the hon. member for Calgary Centre was well within his rights in raising the point of order when he did.

In summary, I have examined all cases. I wish to return briefly to my ruling of June 12, 1981, when I said:

> Finally, it seems clear that it is in order to extend the purposes of an item in an Appropriation Act by means of an item in the estimates provided that it does not amend any other legislation.

It seems to me that in each case we have sufficient legislative authority in a previous Appropriation Act or elsewhere.

• (1510)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, may I get a clarification on the point you have ruled on? Are the Appropriation Acts to which you referred dated prior to 1968 or subsequent thereto? The distinction is rather important because, as you know, Appropriation Acts after January 1, 1969 are non-debatable. As a matter of fact, they are subject to very little review. There were some that did cause the House to question them, but there again the point at issue is can anything pass through this House and not be debated? If there is an estimate which is posted and raised as question of order, and the legislative authority is deemed to be an appropriation bill, with the greatest respect I submit that is begging the question.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is asking me to comment on a ruling and I will not do that. The ruling is there to be read. It has been prepared with all the expertise that I can command, and I would ask the hon. member to consult it and guide himself accordingly.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISTRIBUTION OF SUPPLY BILL

Madam Speaker: Since today is the final allotted day the House will go through the usual procedure this evening to consider and dispose of the supply bills. In view of recent practice do hon. members agree that the supply bill to be dealt with later today be distributed now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed?

PETITION

MR. FULTON—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILES ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on the very important issue of disarmament which was signed by over 400 people in Kitimat, British Columbia. The petition notes the Liberal government's plan to allow Cruise missile testing in Canada, and calls on the government to support a worldwide disarmament program. I urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to take heed of this message and review their respective positions on Cruise missile testing, and I hope they will support the growing worldwide peace movement.

DND—MILITARY AND CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Question No. 2,387—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, what was the total person years of (a) military (b) civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence?

2. What number of civilian personnel are employed outside Canada?

3. What is the estimated percentage saving, if any, when a civilian replaces a military person in the department?

4. Are civilians used in positions that could be filled by military personnel and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): 1.

	(a)	(b)
Fiscal Year	Military	Civilian
1976/77	78,033	37,288
1977/78	78,446	37,016
1978/79	78,866	37,453
1979/80	79,315	37,494
1980/81	79,692	36,742

2. Forty-nine.

3. It is 13.3 per cent (This percentage was obtained from the per capita personnel costs as shown in the department's estimates).

4. The Department of National Defence carries out its approved roles, tasks and missions with a unique combination of military personnel and civilian personnel. Canadian Forces (CF) personnel carry out military tasks and these CF personnel are supported by a work force of mixed military and civilian manpower. The structure of the work force is derived from a simple set of principles which ensures, where possible, a task is carried out by the least expensive manpower, while at the same time ensuring that the Canadian Forces has the competence to discharge its operational responsibilities in time of war. The civilian component of the department is composed largely of technical and operational categories which are necessary to the operation of DND bases, dockyards, airfields, repair facilities, supply depots, etc. Civilian personnel are employed in positions which could possibly be filled by CF personnel but for reasons of efficiency, continuity in function and availability of specially trained staff, selective use of civilian personnel has been deemed more economical.

CPP DISABILITY BENEFITS

Question No. 3,749 (Revised)—Mr. Greenaway:

1. By constituency, over the past three years, how many applications for CPP disability benefits were made by residents of British Columbia?

2. By constituency, how many of the applications resulted in benefits being granted?

3. By constituency, what is the average monthly disability payment made by CPP?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The total number of applications for CPP disability benefits made by residents of British Columbia over the past three years is 11,991. There were 3,814 applications in 1978-79; 3,936 in 1979-80; and 4,241 in 1980-81.

2. Of that number, 8,329 applications resulted in benefits being granted; 2,517 applications were accepted in 1978-79; 2,668 in 1979-80; and 3,144 in 1980-81.

3. The average monthly disability payments made by CPP at the end of each fiscal year were: $172.05 in 1978-79; $190.84 in 1979-80; and $212.92 in 1980-81.

There is no breakdown of this information below provincial level. Information by constituency is not available in this case.

STORAGE OF BAIT FOR JAPANESE FISHING FLEET

Question No. 3,894—Mr. Crosby:

1. Was a proposal made to the government, through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans or otherwise, by Associated Freezers of Dartmouth/Halifax, Nova Scotia or by someone else to freeze and store bait for the Japanese fishing fleet and to freeze and store tuna caught by the fleet for transshipment?

2. Was permission refused by the government, through the department, to freeze and store bait and tuna for the fleet and, if so (a) for what reason (b) how many jobs or hours were lost and what amount of revenue was lost by such refusal?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. A number of proposals for storage of bait and tuna for the Japanese fleet were received by the department in the autumn of 1981 from several sources. A brief summary and disposal of each proposal is provided as follows:

Mariculture proposal—This proposal which was approved on October 5, 1981, requested the offloading of 3,000 tons of albacore and yellowfin tuna for storage and later transshipment to Puerto Rico or U.S.A. It also included the possible landing and sale of 3,000 tons to Canadian processors. In return the operators of the tuna vessels agreed to purchase up to approximately 5,000 tons of squid from Canadian processors. The first vessel unloaded on November 30, 1981, and by March 1, 1982, 13 vessels had unloaded a total of 165 tons for which sale to a Canadian company has been arranged. This was stored at Associated Freezers in Dartmouth.

Ishiwata Trading Co.—On October 23, 1981, Ishiwata Trading Co. requested permission to transport squid from U.S. to Associated Freezers in Dartmouth for the tuna fleet. The tuna fishery in Canadian waters closed on October 25, 1981, before approval could be given.

Zengyoren Tokyo proposal—On September 29, 1981, this company, through its agents Messrs. Pickford & Black requested authorization to land and store bait for the tuna fishery by bringing a reefer boat to Halifax. A telex approving this proposal was sent on October 2, 1981. Shortly thereafter agents discussed preliminary arrangements with the department to bring an Italian vessel to Halifax to unload squid. No further requests or approaches were made to the department and it was later learned that the vessel was directed to St. Pierre to offload its cargo. The unloading occurred sometime between October 8 and October 15, 1981. From the beginning of this transaction no refusal was given by the department and it must therefore be assumed that either the vessel owners or Zengyoren decided to use St. Pierre for freezer storage.

Toshuku Ltd.—On October 7, 1981, this company requested permission for two Korean vessels to load approximately 40 tons of squid in Halifax. This request was denied as no bilateral agreement exists between Canada and Korea.

2. (a) See part 1.

(b) It is obvious from the above that little or no employment or revenue was lost due to actions by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, nor can it be suggested that the department's decisions influenced vessels to conduct their business elsewhere as in the case of Zengyoren.

It is possible that some proposals were not completed as anticipated due to the decreased demand for freezer storage brought about by the nature and early closure of the 1981 tuna fishery.

RENTAL SPACE AT QUINPOOL CENTRE, HALIFAX

Question No. 4,186—Mr. Forrestall:

With reference to the rental of office space by the government in the Quinpool Centre, Quinpool Road, Halifax, Nova Scotia for regional customs, regional excise and port of Halifax—customs (a) who is the landlord of the centre and, if it is a limited liability company, who are the principal shareholders (b) what is the total square footage being rented (c) what is the exact amount of space rented for (i) regional customs (ii) regional excise (iii) port of Halifax—customs (d) what is the rental fee on a square footage basis?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): (a) F.S. Industries Limited is the landlord, carrying on business under their holding company's name of Willowgate Development Corporation, principal shareholders being: city of Halifax as head lessor, John R. Fisk Investment Ltd., Hugh K. Smith Investment Ltd. (b) 35978.34 square feet. (c)(i) 19897.07 square feet rented for regional customs, (ii) 6942.72 square feet rented for regional excise, (iii) 9138.55 square feet rented for port of Halifax—customs. (d) $11.15 square foot.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—AMOUNT OF LEASE

Question No. 4,235—Mr. Herbert:

1. What amount per annum is paid in rent for the accommodation at 1616 Dorchester Boulevard West, Montreal used by the Department of Employment and Immigration?

2. What was the commencement date of the lease and what is its duration?

3. Is there an escalation clause and, if so, does the clause have an upper limit?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. The annual rent amounts to $530,730.40 for the office space and $9,600 for the parking.

2. The commencement date is 1981-08-01 and the termination date is 1984-07-31.

3. The lease contains an escalation clause for the increase or decrease of municipal and school taxes and an escalation clause for the operating costs for that portion of the building occupied by the Department of Employment and Immigration. No upper limit exists for the increase of taxes and operating costs.

CPP DISABILITY BENEFITS

Question No. 4,315—Mr. Greenaway:

1. Over the past three years, how many applications for CPP disability benefits were made by residents of each province, excluding British Columbia?

2. How many of the applications resulted in benefits being granted?

3. What is the average monthly disability payment made by CPP?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Number of applications made for CPP disability benefits by residents of each province excluding British Columbia during the last three years (1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82):

Province	Number of Applicants
	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82
Newfoundland	1,008	1,001	1,252
Prince Edward Island	218	211	258
Nova Scotia	2,604	2,441	2,822
New Brunswick	1,546	1,379	1,482
Quebec	—	13	29
Ontario	19,003	18,187	20,671
Manitoba	1,884	1,879	1,901
Saskatchewan	1,282	1,194	1,273
Alberta	2,167	2,109	2,147
Total	29,712	28,414	31,835

2. The number of applications resulting in benefits being granted was 18,671 in 1979-80; 22,673 in 1980-81; and 22,790 in 1981-82.

3. The average monthly disability payment made by CPP at end of each fiscal year was $183.36 for 1979-80; $204.64 for 1980-81; and $233.76 for 1981-82.

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW HOMES

Question No. 3,542—Mr. Schellenberger:

From 1970 to date, by year, what amount was spent on the financing and construction of new houses and on housing rehabilitation by (a) the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (b) the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (c) the Rural and Native Housing Program (d) any other department or agency?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, on March 31 I placed on the Order Paper a relatively simple question with respect to the rental of office space by the government in the Quinpool Centre, Quinpool Road, Halifax. If the parliamentary secretary has some objection to answering this, I could phrase the question in another way or put it to him in written form. I simply do not understand why information which must be contained in the rental agreement is not forthcoming after two months.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I do not know the answer to that offhand but I will be happy to look into it and bring the information to the hon. member's attention.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—THE ECONOMY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House approves the government taking immediate action to lower interest rates, stimulate production, investment and jobs, strengthen the dollar and lower the rate of inflation.

He said: Madam Speaker, I have today introduced a motion which expresses goals on which I believe this House of Commons can agree, and I would hope that our time today can be spent considering what is happening in Canada, why it is happening, and what we who live in the richest country in the world can do to pull ourselves back to prosperity.

We all know what has happened. Canada is in the worst recession since the reconstruction immediately after the Second World War. We had reports today that the gross national product in the first quarter of 1982 was down 2 per cent. That indicates that for the third quarter in a row Canada has had negative growth. This country, with all our potential and strength, instead of moving forward is slipping and falling backwards.

[Translation]

In May, the unemployment rate was at 10.2 per cent. This means that 1,241,000 Canadians declared they were unemployed, and according to Statistics Canada, there are another 100,000 Canadians who are not included in this percentage because they have given up their search for employment. Every day, an average of 1,200 jobs are lost, which means that during the weekend, 2,400 Canadians lost their jobs. Another 1,200 will join the ranks of the unemployed today. During the last five months of this year, 4,425 Canadian businesses went bankrupt. Farm bankruptcies have increased by 61 per cent over last year. Our manufacturing sector is operating at 70 per cent of its production capacity, the lowest level since these figures were first recorded.

[English]

Our productivity as a country has dropped for four years in a row. Real wages are down for the fourth year in a row. Our inflation rate was 11.3 per cent as of April, 1982, while the United States rate is only 6.6 per cent. Interest rates in this country are going up again. Our dollar is trading at the lowest level in its history. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) claims it is not fair to compare the Canadian dollar with the American dollar, and I suppose he is right. We should be comparing the Canadian dollar with the American cent because that, unfortunately, is the comparison which counts today.

• (1520)

The government made an error of 60 per cent in calculating its budget deficit. The deficit will be somewhere between $16 billion and $18 billion. In seven months a 60 per cent government error occurred. We hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), if he speaks today, will at least clear up exactly what the projected deficit is so that Canadians will know just how heavy the burden is that we are facing as a country.

Those are the hard, unchallengeable statistics. Those are the cold facts of the world's richest country sinking gradually into economic disaster. But the disaster is much more than economic. What we are facing in Canada today, as any of us know who travel this country and talk to Canadians, is not just an economic disaster, it is a human tragedy. It is a tragedy that is tearing the hope, the heart and the pride out of thousands of Canadians each day.

We have seen the facts about the number of Canadians unemployed, the shameful number of Canadians who are out of work. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask my colleagues in the House of Commons to think about the neighbour of the man or the woman who has just lost a good job and is worrying if he or she is going to be next. Think about the parents of children coming out of school with no work to go to. Put yourself in the place of a woman or a man who is the only provider for a family and who has either lost a job or fears that job will go tomorrow, next week or next month. If I might borrow a phrase from the Prime Minister, these are the Canadians who have already had the hell scared out of them. They cannot afford any more economic policies designed to scare the hell out of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This House deals very often in cold statistics and hard facts, but we are also a community. We in this Parliament are the only ones to whom the people of Canada can turn looking for some help, hoping that we might, through the force of our arguments and to the extent of our determination, be able to force this government to change policies that are bringing agony into the lives of individual Canadians.

I want the House to dwell for a moment not just on hard economic facts, but on some of the human implications of what is going on. I ask members of this House, all of us comfortable, all of us well paid and all of us with positions that are reasonably secure—at least until the government calls an election, which it must, and then the positions of Liberal members will suddenly become insecure—to think of the plight of others. We in this House are among the privileged in the land. We have the obligation at least to ensure that when we talk about what is happening to our country we try to place it in some kind of human perspective. I ask members of this House to think of the tensions that are created by the deliberate economic policy of the Liberal government. Think of the fighting now in individual families over money. Think of the family breakups. Think of the people pushed beyond the edge of despair. Look at the statistics that came out this weekend on suicides among young people. Ask yourself, Mr. Speaker, about the relationship between those suicides, economic conditions and the pressures that exist in homes across the nation.

We do not like to think about human costs. Statistics are cold. They are hard. They are manageable. You get used to them. But you do not get used to alcoholism; you do not get used to suicides; you do not get used to wife beating; you do not get used to family breakups. All of these increase when the economy fails. My friends in this House, those are the realities of our Canada today.

When we talk about an economic policy that is driving Canadians out of work, we have to calculate the human cost. When we talk about an energy program that is driving away the investment that can create jobs, we have to realize that the jobs which could have been created if that investment had stayed here would have meant people would have kept their hope and some people may have kept their lives instead of risking them. That is what we are dealing with here. We are dealing with policies that are forcing people into alcoholism. We are dealing with policies that are forcing people into family breakup. We are dealing with economic policies that are forcing Canadians to commit suicide. That is the context in which we have to see what is being done to our country. That is the context in which we have to judge our duty to our fellow citizens as the one institution in the land which has the power to force this government to act.

Some of you know that in the city of Windsor two years ago the mayor of that community established a special committee on services for the unemployed. That committee reported in 1980 that Windsor's high level of unemployment led to uncontrollable stress, in the words of the report, and increased use of tranquillizers, alcohol and other drugs.

A Toronto study of 100 violent family situations in which the police had been involved found that 80 per cent of wife beaters were people who were unemployed, who were responding in that vicious way to the tensions that unemployment and economic privation have placed upon them.

In Canada, as the unemployment rate rose from 6.9 per cent in 1975 to its present rate today, the suicide rate rose from 12.4 per 100,000 to 14 per 100,000. A disproportionate number of those suicides are among young people. A disproportionate number of those people are young people who are children of single-parent families. Those are facts. Those are the consequences. Those, quite literally, are the victims of the economic policies that the Liberal government is forcing on this country today.

Family violence has doubled in five years. Wife beating claims an estimated 24,000 victims per year in this country. In the United States where research is often more advanced than ours, a study by John Hopkins University has determined that every 1 per cent rise in unemployment foreshadows a 4.1 per cent rise in suicides, a 5 per cent rise in homicides, a 4 per cent rise in prison admissions, and a 4.3 per cent rise in admissions to mental and other hospitals.

We are a different society in some ways in that we have less crime in Canada or the statistics would be somewhat different. But the comparison is there. The relationship is there between those horrible social consequences and the economic policy that this government is imposing on its people. Economic problems create social problems that will take decades to heal. That is what is happening in this country. Those are the hard facts and those are the human results of those hard facts.

We as a Parliament have to ask ourselves why that is happening. Why is that happening to this, the richest nation in the world? Why are we allowing that to happen in this, the most compassionate nation in the world? Of course we are influenced by international conditions. Of course we are part of the world. But allow me to let the government in on a little secret; so is every other nation part of the world. Yet we are unique by our ability to solve our own problems here. We have immense resources which the world needs, whether food, natural resources or human resources. We have a tradition of people wanting to work and wanting to build. Canada has the highest literacy level in the world. We are a country that should not be begging others to bail us out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What is different about world economic conditions as they apply to Canada and as they apply to other countries? Other countries have faced world conditions and acted to make their situation better. Canada's government has ignored world conditions and has acted to make the Canadian situation much worse than it needs to be. I assume that members of this House of all parties want to solve Canada's problems. Certainly we should because that is what we are here to do. That is what we are paid for. That job is fundamentally beyond payment: that is our duty to the people who sent us here.

Let us look at what caused some of those problems. Let us not pretend that everything that is going wrong in Canada is caused by Ronald Reagan, Margaret Thatcher, François Mitterrand or some other foreigner safely distant from debate in this place, because a large number of our problems were caused right here in this country. We can solve them right here in this country if we have the guts and if we have the will to do so.

[Translation]

For instance, let us have a look at what is causing inflation. In Canada, inflation is largely caused by the fact that the government has indulged in unrestricted spending and taxation since 1972-73. Government deficits during the last ten years, ending in 1981-82, have totalled over $77 billion.

• (1530)

Thus, today, the federal government's second largest budget envelope covers payment of debt interest and debt charges which, according to the government itself, will reach $16.6 billion during the current fiscal year. Out of every $5 spent by the federal government today, $1 is for debt interest and charges. This is one of the major causes of inflation in Canada.

[English]

What about interest rates? They are in part, of course, caused by inflation, but they have been 3 per cent or 4 per cent higher because of the need to protect the weak Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar is weak because in the period from 1974 to 1981 we have had $30 billion in deficits on the current account of our balance of international payments with the rest of the world. We are paying the price now for the legacy of John Turner, Donald Macdonald, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the present Minister of Finance.

Then in the face of that and in the face of developments in the world, the government introduced an energy policy and a budget designed directly to drive away Canadian investment and foreign investment which create jobs and growth in Canada. At precisely the time when the Government of Canada needed to build investor confidence, the government delivered this double whammy of its budget and its energy policy. It literally drove billions of dollars of investment and hundreds of thousands of Canadian jobs out of the country. That was not done by any other country; it was done by the policies of the Government of Canada in a budget that is wrong and in a National Energy Program which is dreadfully and disastrously wrong. Everyone with a modicum of common sense, everyone who went beyond grade three and many who did not get that far, knows that investment which creates jobs needs a stable climate, needs conditions upon which one can count, needs rules which will not be broken at the whim of a minister or the whim of government. Canada has become as stable as a string of firecrackers. No one knows where the government will pop off next. It has breached contracts, it has confiscated land, it has deliberately destroyed the ability of individuals to save, and it has deliberately stopped incentives which it knows on the record would create jobs.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: And they laugh! They laugh about confiscating land in the country. They laugh about breaching contracts in the country.

Mr. Guilbault: We have more savings than before.

Mr. Clark: They laugh about destroying the capacity of Canadians to obtain jobs. These are Canadians.

[Translation]

And those laughing today are Quebecers, from a province and a region that is suffering most as a result of the policies of this government. They must be people without any sense of shame, considering the fact they are supposed to represent those who have suffered such hardship as a result of the policies of this government.

[English]

The result of this deliberate introduction of the double whammy of a budget which is bad and an energy policy which is bad has been that $10.2 billion in direct capital investment left Canada in 1981 alone. That is direct capital investment; it does not take account of the other $9 billion in unidentified capital flows, a figure which, by the way leapt fourfold in the last year. In the seven years before the double whammy of the budget and the energy program, Canadians invested $16 billion in foreign countries. In 1981 that direct capital investment by Canadians soared to $10.2 billion in one year. That was made up of $5.3 billion in foreign capital which left the country and $4.9 billion in direct investment abroad by Canadians.

The Canadian Institute for Economic Policy, headed by the Hon. Walter Gordon, suggests that $1 million in direct investment creates 40 to 50 jobs. Let us just assume that $1 million of direct investment creates 40 jobs, according to the low figure of Walter Gordon. If just $1 billion of that job-creating capital which has left Canada had stayed in Canada, it would have meant 40,000 jobs here. If that money had not been driven away by the Minister of Finance, there would be 40,000 Canadians working today who are not working today. If the $4.9 billion which Canadians invested abroad last year had stayed in Canada, it would have created 196,000 jobs in Canada.

Those are the stakes. We are dealing with people's lives here. We cannot blame other people. It has been the policies of the government which have driven away the money that could have created the jobs, the hope and the faith which Canadians want to find in their country.

Let us look for a moment at some of the other direct results of Canadian government policies. The House knows that before the Liberal government took office, the Cold Lake and Alsands projects were ready to go. The Liberal government lost them both. The National Energy Board estimates that those two projects would have created 153,000 jobs in Canada between now and 1990. Those 153,000 jobs were lost when the Liberals lost the Alsands and the Cold Lake projects.

The petroleum and gas revenue tax, the PGRT, wiped out the profitability of many marginal oil wells which require frequent services. This means that well servicing was down by 31 per cent in 1981. In that industry, too, thousands of jobs were lost directly because of the government and its taxing policy, which taxes and punishes the people to fatten the government which then tries to blame others.

[Translation]

Under the Canadian ownership program, $7.7 billion were spent to purchase foreign oil companies. If this money had been available for investment in Canada, we could have created 307,000 jobs. The National Energy Program has cost this country 343,000 jobs in the last 18 months. About 300 drill rigs have left Canada because of the National Energy Program. This means 15,000 jobs that are now lost to Canadians. So much for the National Energy Program.

Now for the budget, whose aim was to stop Canadian private investment and increase government revenue. Corporate tax changes alone have cost Canadians nearly $1.7 billion. If this money had been left in the pockets of Canadian investors and had been invested directly, it would have been possible to create 68,400 jobs this year.

[English]

To take specific examples from the budget, the provision to allow only onehalf of the capital cost allowance results, according to Walter Gordon's figures, in the loss of 44,000 jobs in Canada. The decision to extend the corporate surtax for large business results, in applying the standard of 40 jobs per $1 million of investment, in 18,600 jobs lost. The decision to impose a 12.5 per cent tax on dividends paid by small businesses from income taxed at lower rates results in the loss of 3,600 jobs. Thirty-six hundred people could have been working in Canada if it were not for that one budget provision alone. And so on it goes. You can take the receipts that they gain, you can compare them to the standard that the Gordon Institute puts out, and you can see just how many jobs this government is costing Canadians day after day after day. You can see just how much agony it is injecting into the lives of ordinary Canadians.

• (1540)

We are talking about hundreds of thousands of Canadian jobs that were lost, not because of American policy, not because of world conditions, but as the direct result of Canadian government policies that are wrong. I wonder if the Minister of Finance has any idea of what his energy and budget policies have done to this country.

Miss MacDonald: Or cares.

Mr. Clark: Or cares. That is a question we must now put when we look at the human cost of these policies. I wonder if he has any idea of what those policies to which he and his colleagues cling so stubbornly—putting their pride ahead of the wellbeing of Canadians—have cost Canadians. Those policies have cost Canadians 714,000 jobs since the introduction of the National Energy Program and the budget.

For the Minister of Finance to absolve himself of responsibility and to blame everybody else is like a classic drunk standing with an empty bottle in each hand and saying, "It is not me who is scaring the hell out of people, it is just the pink elephants." Well, the disease is the minister's to cure. The minister must start by changing his own most basic assumptions.

That brings us to the question of what we can do in Canada to solve Canada's economic problems. First, we must insist that the statement or whatever planned by the Minister of Finance for the next few weeks must be, in effect, a budget or a mini-budget. He cannot escape with less. He owes the people of Canada that much.

Second, all of our actions must be based on the understanding that while we, too, are part of the world, we have a unique ability to control our own destiny in Canada. We should build Canada, not blame others.

Third, we should accept the principle that this nation needs investment to create new jobs and security that are the key to growth, individual security and to confidence in our country. We must re-establish a climate of confidence in Canada as a place to invest.

A fourth assumption must involve the recognition that an excellent way to reduce the government deficit is to put the Canadian people to work so they can pay taxes instead of collecting unemployment insurance. The House should know the facts about this. Between August of 1981 and May of 1982, the number of Canadians with jobs dropped by 320,000. We have estimated that the average Canadian taxpayer will pay $2,737 in federal income tax and $1,313 in provincial taxes, which averages out to a total of $4,050 in federal and provincial personal taxes. If those 320,000 Canadians who have lost their jobs—who were working and are no longer working because of the government—were still working and paying taxes at average rates, they would be contributing to the federal treasury and the provincial treasury respectively $875,840,000 and $420,160,000, for a total of $1.296 billion in new tax dollars to help cut the deficits. That does not take into account the amount of money which would be saved by not having to pay unemployment insurance to people who would rather be working. Those are the assumptions on which new policies should be based.

Let me come to the specific policies which we think must be followed and the changes which must be made. First, the disastrous November budget must be withdrawn. The attack on incentives which is central to the November budget must be abandoned and a new budget must be brought in which encourages individuals to invest in Canada and create jobs here. That new budget should reject the idea that the only purpose of tax policy is to enrich the federal government. It should accept the idea that tax policy can create growth, investment and hundreds of thousands of jobs in Canada.

Second, the government must recognize that the National Energy Program has absolutely destroyed confidence in the Canadian energy sector as a safe place for private citizens to invest.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Clark: An hon. member says nonsense. Would he identify himself? They do not identify themselves because anyone who knows anything about what is happening in Canada will know that no one with a nickel to invest in the Canadian private energy industry would do so unless they had an iron-clad guarantee that is safer than the iron-clad guarantees that the minister said he had from the American government.

[Translation]

Once again, we are hearing from a member from Quebec. I hope that next time, perhaps today, he will speak to defend his fellow citizens and not to defend the policies that have caused them to lose their jobs.

[English]

One of the dramatic facts about the energy industry was that our Canadian energy industry grew and was becoming increasingly a Canadian-controlled industry due to the initiative of individual Canadians. That must be the tone of a new energy program. If that is the tone, the purpose of the energy program must be to find energy for Canada and not simply to find tax revenues for the government in Ottawa.

Third, the review of the activities of the Foreign Investment Review Agency which began during my government should be continued in order to reduce uncertainties, to target on the major investments which might cause real problems of Canadian control and to reduce the time lost to bureaucracy. We need both Canadian control and Canadian jobs. The reform of FIRA can give us both.

Fourth, the restraint side of economic policies must be pursued by this whole Parliament. We can all enumerate individual examples of government waste, whether it is three JetStars flying to Winnipeg because the ministers do not like to talk to one another or whether it is the hundreds of millions of dollars being spent on Liberal Party propaganda in the name of government advertising. However, there needs to be a much more thorough examination of expenditures by this whole Parliament.

The other day my colleague for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) proposed a motion under Standing Order 43. He asked that the government set up a special committee of the House to examine such measures in the estimates that might be reduced or eliminated, and that that special committee be entitled to call witnesses to examine expenditures with a view to reducing government expenses by 10 per cent. That proposal was rejected by other parties but I believe it merits the most serious consideration.

Finally, we must restore a sense of partnership in this country as the basis for solving our economic problems. I was personally shocked to hear the Prime Minister of Canada declare recently that co-operative federalism is dead. If co-operative federalism is dead, then Canada is dead. The only way this country can function is by bringing its partners together and making them work together. I have personal experience with the possibility of achieving that. The government which I had the honour to lead was bringing Canadians from all backgrounds and groups together in the national economic development conference.

Mr. Collenette: Is that why you lasted nine months?

Mr. Clark: I am asked if that is why the government lasted nine months by the member for York East (Mr. Collenette), who will soon be returning to private practice. The government lasted nine months because the NDP-Liberal coalition voted to bring us down. We will remind Canadians of the reasons that occurred every day between now and the next election.

Mr. Collenette: Absolute incompetence.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member for York East has just described himself as an absolute incompetent and the rest of the House shares in that definition.

The point I am making is that when there is a government in Ottawa that is prepared to exercise leadership to bring people together, that leadership can be exercised and people can be brought together. Because the great majority of Canadians, whether they are provincial Premiers, labour leaders, business leaders or whatever, want this nation to work. They want this fighting to stop; they want this nation to work. If the program that I have outlined is followed, we can bring down interest rates by at least three or four points. We can stimulate production, investment and thousands of Canadian jobs. We can strengthen the Canadian dollar by restoring confidence in the Canadian economy. By demonstrating our seriousness and exercising the restraint that these times require, we can bring down the rate of inflation. That is our challenge and I hope that this Parliament is up to it.

• (1550)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate which has been launched by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in which he has put forward very important questions concerning interest rates, production, investment, jobs, the Canadian dollar and the rate of inflation. In the brief time at my disposal, I would like to try to deal with some of the questions which have been raised and are of such importance to the Canadian people.

The Government of Canada and the Liberal caucus have been discussing the economic situation with a view to intensifying the efforts to improve our economic performance and to prepare ourselves for the future. I particularly appreciate the efforts which have been made under the leadership of the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) to bring forward ideas and proposals which address themselves to the current economic situation. I have indicated to the House of Commons that I intend to make an economic and financial statement to the House before the summer adjournment. I would hope to make that statement as quickly as possible.

Today the Leader of the Opposition has recommended that that statement be cast in the form of a budget or a mini-budget. Whatever form my statement takes, there is no doubt that the economic situation is serious. The Canadian economy is in recession, a recession which has been much deeper and much more prolonged than any forecaster, government or private, had predicted. Unemployment is extremely high, businesses are in difficulty across the country, high interest rates and high inflation are stifling economic activity and holding back investment.

We are sharing in the international recession into which the United Stated and the rest of the industrial world have been plunged for many months. It is natural that in these circumstances, and particularly prior to the statement which I intend to make, the Leader of the Opposition should have seized this particular occasion to highlight problems in the economy. Certainly, in these difficult circumstances, there is a clear need for all participants in the economy and all participants in governments, federal, provincial and municipal, to join together as much as possible in seeking economic solutions. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he places a high priority on Parliament and the necessity of Parliament working as effectively as possible in order to bring about solutions to the problems of the country.

When the Leader of the Opposition spoke last March, the day on which we dealt with parliamentary reform, he made an observation which certainly attracted my attention. He said:

> Our country has changed tremendously since Confederation, and its problems are more numerous and often more complex. We cannot solve today's problems with 19th century tools. There must be a way to agree on limiting debate.

That is not the point which I particularly wanted to highlight in the paragraph; rather, it was the concluding line which states:

> Common sense and mutual respect must prevail if differences are to be resolved.

I would hope that I would conduct my remarks with respect for the views of the Leader of the Opposition, if not agreement with those views. The opposition has been demanding action and solutions. Last week when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and myself returned from the Versailles Summit, the Leader of the Opposition and hon. members opposite recited a list of problems and called upon the government to take action. They then discounted, and indeed again today the Leader of the Opposition discounted, the international sources of our difficulties. They suggested that by pressing the United States to reduce its interest rates, the Canadian government has simply been looking for excuses. I get the impression from listening to opposition members that they believe there are quick and easy solutions to the problems which face the government and that if only the government would see the light and drop its pride, if only it would abandon the policies to which we give our confidence, then everything would be all right. In a sense, we heard the same views expressed today by the Leader of the Opposition. Withdraw the budget. Withdraw the National Energy Program. Withdraw FIRA. These are solutions which the Leader of the Opposition has advanced.

In referring to the National Energy Program, he has failed to put it in a context of falling energy prices and falling demand throughout the world and, in fact, in the context of what is happening in the country of our neighbour, the United States. For example, I do not think the National Energy Program is responsible for the current situation in the United States drilling industry. What is that industry like today in the United States, not in Canada, not influenced by the National Energy Program? The fact is that in the first quarter of 1982 the drilling industry in the United States suffered its most significant downturn in activity since 1970. The drilling industry experienced a drop of almost 25 per cent in its activity in the first quarter of 1982. That had nothing to do with the Canadian National Energy Program.

I could go down the list and say to the Leader of the Opposition that he must be much more forthcoming and precise if he is to make a contribution to the debate which is now raging in the country and if he is to make a contribution to the solution that we are seeking. I have heard him say nothing about monetary policy, which is a main influence on our economic activity. I have heard him say nothing about incomes policy, which is so critical to our situation at the present time. I have heard him say very little about fiscal policy except to say that we all ought to engage in the laudable effort of expenditure restraint. Of course, I agree with that. Members of Parliament have an opportunity, when they examine the estimates in committee, to propose reductions if they wish. They can suggest what may be done to bring about expenditure reductions, not in a punitive, political way to embarrass the government, but rather in a way in which the objectives set by the Leader of the Opposition can be achieved.

• (1600)

It is open to members of the opposition, as it is to members on this side, to say, as an hon. member said the other day, that maybe we ought to review our foreign aid program. Maybe we ought to have a big drop in our expenditures in foreign aid. However, I heard not a word from the Leader of the Opposition as to where he would make these cuts and in what programs. Therefore, it is my appeal to him to give some precision to his proposals and to his ideas, which have been sadly lacking this afternoon in his statement. He would give the impression that the unemployment that exists in Canada is entirely due to wrong-headed government policies.

Miss MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) says "Hear, hear". She agrees with the Leader of the Opposition that all the unemployment we have is because of bad government policies. We know that unemployment carries with it very heavy costs, both economically and socially.

Certainly the first priority of the government is more jobs and stronger growth in the economy. It will be impossible to provide the number of jobs we need in Canada unless we get inflation under control. The Leader of the Opposition made passing reference to inflation in his speech. It is mentioned in the motion. He mentioned it one or two times, but did he give the House of Commons a recipe or proposal that would have the effect of reducing inflation in Canada at the present time? There was no such proposal.

I ask members of the opposition what is their proposal at the present time. Do they believe that we can have more jobs and more economic growth in the country if we persist in having a rate of inflation of over 11 per cent, one that has now put us in the forefront of the countries of the world with inflation performance? I worry greatly about that. I worry about inflation because I worry about unemployment.

The ministers who attended the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund tried to express their concerns about inflation and unemployment and tried to relate one to the other. Because the communiqué was signed by so many countries and because the discussion was participated in by so many ministers in such a major way, I think that the words they used express clearly the attitude of this government with respect to inflation and unemployment. I quote as follows:

> The committee voiced particular concern regarding the high levels of unemployment now prevailing in most countries. The comprehensive type of policy approach that it advocated—

Namely, the committee.

> —did not rest on a view that the fight against inflation is more important than the fight against unemployment. Rather, the committee's view was that combating inflation is a necessary step for resumption of sustainable growth at a satisfactory pace. The committee considered that reduction in inflation and inflationary expectations, in nominal and real interest rates, and in existing rigidities is essential for steady expansion of output and reduction of unemployment.

All the ministers tried to relate inflation and unemployment because they have been, unfortunately, linked together in the last number of years. The countries with the best inflation performance have the best employment performance. The lower the inflation, the lower the unemployment.

I take responsibility for the policies which the government administers. We all do. But to draw the conclusion that government policies are responsible for the world recession and for the high unemployment in Canada is not only to be unfair, but to be simplistic.

We have 1,200,000 people unemployed in Canada, a very high figure. Every effort ought to be made to bring down that rate. In the United States there are 10,500,000 unemployed. My policies are not applicable in the United States. In Japan, a great performer as a nation, there are 1,400,000 unemployed. In France there are two million, in the United Kingdom almost three million and in Italy 3,200,000. In West Germany, another great performer economically, the unemployment rate is 7.3 per cent. That is extraordinary by historical standards for the Federal Republic of Germany. Even though they have a way of controlling their unemployment through the control of guest workers, nevertheless they have 1,700,000 unemployed at the present time. I repeat, their rate is 7.3 per cent, which is very high by their historical standards. I am saying that all countries share the same problems. They share the strong determination to bring down these frightfully high unemployment rates and to do so as quickly as possible.

We have a comprehensive set of employment programs in Canada at the present time covering training, labour market development, direct job creation and measures to stimulate employment in the private sector through wage subsidies, tax credits and assistance to the small business sector. Total funding for these programs is approximately $1.7 billion in 1982-83. That is in addition to the employment tax credit. This $1.7 billion for 1982-83 which is directed to the employment side includes the initiatives taken since the November budget, which total about $400 million for fiscal year 1982.

I attach the highest importance to unemployment, and I recited the extensive measures that the government is taking in order to relieve the problems of unemployment in this country. However, the fundamental cure is to get recovery under way not only in Canada but in the United States and Europe as well. All of us are interdependent. Seventy per cent of our economic relations are with the United States. How can we prosper, develop and get out of a recession when the United States economy, according to the words of the United States treasurer several weeks ago, is dead in the water?

I mentioned the United States. This brings me to the question of the Canadian dollar. The Leader of the Opposition said the weak Canadian dollar is all due to the bad policies of the Government of Canada. That, of course, is wrong. Events over the past several weeks in exchange markets the world over have borne out the contention which I have been making in the House of Commons almost every day, that the unprecedented high and volatile real interest rates in the United States are the prime factor behind the meteoric rise in the exchange value of the American dollar against all major currencies of the industrialized world. To single out the Canadian dollar and say it is weak against the American dollar and then to say that is because of bad government policies is unfair, inaccurate and unjustified.

Last week there was a 2.3 per cent decline in the value of the Canadian currency against the United States dollar. What was the decline for other currencies? Their depreciation was even more dramatic than that of Canada. The depreciation in the Japanese yen was 3.3 per cent; the Deutschemark, 3.5 per cent; the Swiss franc, 5 per cent; the French franc, 6.5 per cent; the Italian lira, 3.6 per cent; the pound, 2.8 per cent; the Belgian franc, 4.4 per cent; and the Dutch guilder, 3 per cent. In every case the depreciation of those currencies against the American dollar was greater than the depreciation of the Canadian dollar. In every case, each of those currencies was weaker against the American dollar than was the Canadian dollar. If countries like Germany and Japan, so often described as the real success stories, cannot insulate their currencies and their economies from the impact of high real interest rates in the United States, how much more naive to think that Canada, with its greater degree of trade and financial relations with the United States, can insulate itself from the high interest rates in the United States which contribute to and provide strength to the American currency.

The fact of the matter is that as a country we have had to walk a narrow path between moderating volatile interest rate movements and maintaining a degree of stability in the foreign exchange rate. Those who assume, totally erroneously, that the government has abandoned the dollar and is engaging in the de facto devaluation fail to recognize the incredible magnitude of the depreciation in recent weeks of all OECD currencies against the American dollar.

What does become painfully obvious, however, is that such a marked depreciation in the value of the Canadian dollar, a strategy proposed by some people in the country, does not bring interest rates down but, rather, adds more pressure to already onerously high interest rates in this country.

Observe what is happening. It gives the lie to those who say there is an easy way out by letting the currency go. Like many other countries, Canada has had to intervene in the market to maintain orderly conditions. The other evening I listened to the radio telling us that the central bank of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Bank of Switzerland were active in the exchange rate market for the same reason Canada was at the same time.

I do not believe there are underlying weaknesses in the Canadian dollar. I do not believe that at all, and I ask hon. members to take a look at the recently released balance of payments figures for the first quarter of this year. Canada's current account, seasonally adjusted, swung into surplus at an annualized rate of $1.2 billion. The performance of the current account in the first quarter, if annualized, gives us a surplus. That is a rather significant performance, and it reflects a healthier merchandise trade balance, which virtually doubled to a $3.6 billion surplus over the first quarter of last year. Part of it is due to declining imports, but not all of it. There has been movement in exports as well.

We hear about capital outflows. Today the Leader of the Opposition attempted to spook everyone about a flood of capital leaving Canada. I ask him to take a quick glance at the balance sheet; it reveals some encouraging signs. It shows a strengthening of the long-term capital account, from the net outflow of half a billion dollars in the first quarter of 1981 to a net inflow of $4 billion in the first quarter of 1982.

If there is pressure on the Canadian currency—and there is—it comes from transactions in short-term financial instruments, often the form for highly speculative and interest-rate-sensitive transactions. That is where the principal pressure on the Canadian currency is coming from at the present time. I say to the Leader of the Opposition that he should not continue with this blind opposition to the facts. The Canadian currency, compared with all other currencies, is weakening less—or is stronger—than all the other currencies I have mentioned. That was pointed out today in a very interesting commentary by an economist on the CBC.

Mr. Wilson: That is authoritative?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not ask members of the opposition to pay much attention to that; I sometimes do not myself, but I find it very odd that the same motion which calls for a strengthening of the Canadian dollar also calls for lower interest rates. How can that be done? How can it be done immediately? Hon. members opposite want immediate action. Can anyone in the Conservative Party get up today and tell me how we simultaneously can have lower interest rates in Canada and a strengthening of the Canadian dollar? I am afraid, given the harsh realities which all industrialized countries face, this is hardly a workable alternative strategy. However, I am preparing an economic statement, and I would be prepared to hear how we can have lower interest rates and a strengthened dollar at the same time.

Mr. Mazankowski: Ask Herb Gray.

Mr. MacEachen: The last time these questions were linked together was at the first ministers' conference when the Premiers said we should lower interest rates by reducing the value of the dollar. Some of them said they could live with a 75-cent dollar. We argued against that at the time. I must say the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) was on the right side at the time because he said what had been proposed by the Premiers at the first ministers' conference was a policy of desperation. I ask the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre to take us into his confidence.

Mr. Wilson: I am.

Mr. MacEachen: What are his solutions to the recent decline in the exchange rate? I know that in a television interview he trotted out a few tired old hobby horses which might not make it to the home stretch, if they were permitted to get to the starting gate. His solutions are so long term, so vague and so general that they cannot be implemented in any concrete or specific way. As I read his proposals, if we were to try to adopt them, we would be jeopardizing energy self-sufficiency and jeopardizing greater Canadian control over Canadian resources. The Leader of the Opposition has to get his lines in order. Does he believe in greater control by Canadians over our resources? That is what the Canadianization program is all about. We believe in that, but the Leader of the Opposition is asking us to withdraw the Canadianization program. Is he ready to make that proposal in a concrete way? I believe that is the dilemma the Conservative Party faces at the present time.

I turn now to interest rates. How can we lower interest rates immediately, except by some general proposal that can never be implemented? Interest rates in Canada are high for two basic reasons. First, because interest rates in the United States are exceptionally high. These interest rates have put pressure on the Canadian dollar. Funds from every country are attracted and are flowing toward those high United States interest rates, particularly at a time when U.S. inflation is declining. That is why the American dollar is strong at the present time.

• (1620)

Second, we have high interest rates because we have high inflation. At the Versailles Summit we called upon the United States to do everything possible to reduce the extraordinarily high interest rates prevailing in that country. We have been clear on that point; we have been persistent and have acted in the clear interests of Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition calls this shifting the blame. Would he have us, among all the seven nations sitting around the Summit table, not raise the question of high interest rates in the United States? I believe we would have been shirking our responsibility had we not called upon the United States, in the present circumstances to do something about their interest rates. According to an article in The Wall Street Journal, just this week the secretary-treasurer of the United States said they recognized that interest rates are unacceptably high. So does the rest of the world, Mr. Speaker. They want us to get those interest rates down and so does the man in the street.

I believe you are rising gently to ask me to end my statement, Mr. Speaker. I would just conclude by asking the members of the opposition a few questions about their effort to assist at the present time. Do they support the current monetary policy or would they ease that policy and flood the system with funds in order to bring down interest rates? Do they believe that would be constructive?

Do they believe in a restrictive fiscal policy or an expansionary fiscal policy? What is their policy on income demands and income settlements? What do they propose to do in the face of income settlements of 11 per cent now in the public service and in that range in the private sector? These are hard questions that have to be answered. Not one sentence in the otherwise interesting speech of the Leader of the Opposition dealt with the hard issues that the Government of Canada must face in the present circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I want to put forward some suggestions, if the minister can bring himself to listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has the floor.

Mr. Deans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your drawing the rowdies to order.

I want to spend a few moments of my 20 minutes speaking about what might be done in Canada. To begin, I want to say to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), as he once again bleats about the defeat of his government, that it is quite clear to anyone on the outside looking in that the reason his government was defeated was that the budget he brought in did not meet with favour either with the House of Commons at the time or with the public subsequently. There is no point crying about the problems that the budget created. The fact of the matter is that the Leader of the Opposition decided to have an election thinking he was going to win and discovered that there was not support across the country for the measures he had introduced.

I want to deal with other matters because they are much more important than that. I want to talk a little about the state of the economy in Canada. You do not have to analyse statistics to see the problems in this country. I do not think the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) thinks for one minute that the people in this country believe that the policies he is pursuing on behalf of the government are working. He must surely understand now that the very high interest rates that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has made sure are in place at the behest of the government, are causing inflation to rise, causing people to lose their jobs, causing farmers to lose their farms, causing small-business men to have to cut back substantially on the use of their productive capacity and the employment of people who would normally work in those industries.

You do not have to be a genius—and I am sure the Minister of Finance is not because I have been watching him for two years—to appreciate that if high interest rates are causing all these problems and are creating as many problems as they are solving—and I suggest they are creating even more—then we must begin by coming to grips with the question.

The Minister of Finance asked about fiscal policy and about monetary policy and about an incomes policy. With regard to a monetary policy, there is a time for selective stimulation and there are certain parts of the economy that desperately require some assistance at this time. I say to the minister that there is no question in anyone's mind that the housing industry has the capacity to produce jobs in the hundreds of thousands while at the same time meeting a social need. There is no secret about the fact that every dollar put into that industry yields more in return than any other single industry dollar in terms of employment and meeting social needs of the country.

If at this time it is necessary to impose certain new restrictions on interest rates in order to guarantee that people will be able to buy and maintain the homes that should be available to them, then the government has to take that kind of action. There is no question, in my mind at least, and I think in the minds of hundreds of thousands of people who today are faced with the problem of renewing their mortgages, that the single factor that is undermining their economic stability and creating many of the hardships that the Leader of the Opposition spoke of with regard to the impact on families is the exorbitant increases in monthly mortgage payments which are far beyond what people can reasonably be expected to afford.

In monetary policy terms, there are places where stimulation is required. There are times to stimulate. It is not an over-all loosening of the purse strings or pumping in massive sums of money which is required. I suggest that the minister begin by selecting an industry that may be able to meet two objectives, one being social need and the other being employment requirements.

The minister asked about an incomes policy. How does he expect people who cannot now pay their bills on the incomes they earn to accept that they should receive less than the increase in the cost of living? How can the minister argue that an incomes policy that will give people wage increases lower than the cost of living increase is reasonable, given that many of them are now faced with the prospect of losing their homes and being unable to provide for their families?

The minister may sit with his back to me if he wishes but that does not alter the facts. The facts are that the minister cannot expect the vast majority of working Canadians, who are at this very point in time barely eking out an existence because of the ridiculous economic direction this government has taken, to survive somehow on an increase which is less than the cost of living. You can argue it all you want but it does not wash in the minds of the majority of Canadian families.

Then, of course, there is fiscal policy. The minister talked about how the opposition has an opportunity in committee to reduce estimated expenditures. Try it! Just try it and see what happens to you. You will be quickly beaten down by this overwhelming majority of subservient backbenchers who insist that this government, though it is wrong, must be right because they have more numbers than anyone else. That is not the way Parliament is supposed to work. If the minister were fair and honest about it he would say there is no opportunity for opposition members to reduce government expenditures, there never has been and there never will be. To make that kind of argument is to tell other than what everyone knows to be true.

What is really wrong in this country? There are a number of serious things, but I want to put to the minister quite bluntly that not all of them require government expenditure. We proposed not two weeks ago that if the government wanted to give substantial aid to the auto industry and thereby create large numbers of jobs all across this country, it could simply impose on imported vehicles a level of entry consistent with what other countries—Japan being the prime example—impose upon us without legislation. If we were to restrict their sales volume until such time as they bring their production in Canada up to a point which begins to meet that sales volume, that would have a beneficial impact on the manufacturing sector, which is currently Canadian or at least operates in Canada, and produce tens of thousands of jobs for Canadians. If we wanted to, we could take steps to protect the shoe manufacturing industry in Canada, because without that industry the price of footwear will rise by leaps and bounds. We could take steps which would not cost this government dollars out of its pocket. But the government refuses to act.

We could have taken steps some time ago, Mr. Speaker, to protect the farm machinery industry. We could have instituted a plan which would have made it more attractive to farmers to purchase that machinery now rather than delay it for two or three years, when the only place they will be able to buy it would be outside Canada, because the industry here will no longer exist. We could have embarked on the kind of housing program which I put before this minister and the minister responsible for housing on numerous occasions, which would have created for forestry workers in British Columbia and other parts of Canada the opportunity to work rather than go to the unemployment insurance office. But the government turned it down.

The government says we have no concrete proposals or policies to offer, so therefore it does not want to listen. Well, I suggest to the Minister of Finance that our policies, as opposed to those currently being used by the minister, would work for Canadians.

The Minister of Finance tells us that interest rates all around the world are high, therefore ours must also be high. That is patent nonsense. Go to Great Britain and see how much mortgage interest rates are. They are at least 50 per cent below our levels here. I say to the minister that when he starts talking about these things, for heaven's sake man, go and find out for yourself. Mortgage interest rates in the U.S. are considerably below those rates charged for other commodities. Mortgage interest rates in Great Britain are down to 10 per cent and below, which is half of what ours are. Mortgage interest rates in Europe are considerably below the normal interest rates charged for other manufacturing of commodity purchases. They treat that sector of the economy as it should be treated, as an essential part of an economic package and a social need. It is a number one priority in guaranteeing people will have an opportunity to get accommodation at a price they can afford.

But what does this government offer? This government offers a never-never scheme, a program where you can take your interest and add it to your principal and never in your lifetime will you be able to pay off the mortgage. Other parts of the world require by law that affordable mortgage interest rates be made available so that people can obtain the accommodation they need.

What has happened in this country that it has now become more attractive for people to buy an investment certificate or a bond rather than put their money into risk ventures in the hope of making some real gain? What has happened that it is now more attractive to hold a guaranteed mortgage certificate than it is to hold stocks in a blue-chip company? We have allowed interest rates to become the single lever with which we are going to manage the economy and it does not work. It cannot work. It cannot possibly be expected that there would be growth in the economy if people can get more by putting their money into a guaranteed investment certificate. You just cannot win that way, and I say to the minister that this is where the error has been made.

Why does the Bank of Canada have to set an interest rate five percentage points above inflation? The Bank of Canada does not have to receive a massive return. Why is the Bank of Canada not prepared to combat inflation by setting an interest rate let us say one percentage point above inflation and then require the financial institutions to follow suit and set interest rates which are manageable for Canadians? If that were done, there would be more money in the economy. Would it be money that the government is putting into the economy? No, it would be money the average Canadian is putting into the economy. It would then be more attractive for people to manufacture products because there would be people with money left over at the end of the week to buy them.

The minister may well say that the level of savings in Canada is higher than it need be. That may well be true, but most of the purchasing in any economy—and this one is no different—is done by young families. Most of the new consumer-oriented products are purchased by young families, and after they have met their fixed costs they do not have sufficient disposable income to make those kinds of purchases. I say to the minister that a dramatic change in his policies is required. It is not just simple tinkering, it is not another $150 million in a housing program which currently does not work, and it is not simply giving the oil industry more money. As far as that industry is concerned, let me just point out to the minister that by July of next year the price of a barrel of oil will have gone up another $10.25. By most analysts' statistics, every dollar increase in the cost of a barrel of oil adds .5 per cent to the cost of living. Therefore this government has negotiated a 5 per cent increase in the cost of living over the course of the next year. How is that combating inflation? How is that holding the line? How is that consideration for and commitment to this country's future?

As my time wears on, Mr. Speaker, I want to move an amendment and then make a few comments about it. I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

• (1640)

That the motion be amended after the word "inflation" to add: "and urges prompt action to increase Canadian ownership of the manufacturing, oil and gas sectors, as well as direct the Bank of Canada to lower its lending rate to not more than 1 per cent above the rate of inflation."

In the remaining time I have left I have some comment about the minister's argument on interest rates. It has been my contention, and the contention which my party has put forward for a long time, that the major problem in this country which keeps our economy from rebounding, which keeps the manufacturing sector from growing, which is forcing businesses, farmers and people into bankruptcy, is high interest rates.

The minister always makes reference to what he calls the facts. He says that interest rates around the world are high. Yet of central bank rates around the world in 1982, Canada had the third highest rate, behind only Ireland and Italy. Canada's interest rate in March, 1982, was 15.11 per cent compared to 12 per cent in the United States and 5.5 per cent in Japan. In inflationary terms in 1980 and in 1982, the composite average of industrial countries showed an increase of 12 per cent in the inflation rate. The rate in the United States was 13.5 per cent while in 1980 it was only at 10.1 per cent in Canada. However, between then and now the industrial composite has gone down to 7.9 per cent in the United States to 6.7 per cent, but in Canada it has risen to 11.6 per cent. Why has that happened? Because Canadian businesses have had to add into the cost of doing business here exorbitantly high interest rates; because Canadian businesses have had to add into the cost of carrying inventory exorbitantly high interest rates; because the house building industry in Canada knows that Canadians cannot afford to purchase the homes which they are capable of building because of exorbitantly high interest rates.

All across this country people are beginning to understand that their incomes are being eroded daily because they are being asked to pay exorbitantly high interest rates. If this government is serious about its battle against inflation on the one hand, and about its battle against unemployment on the other hand, about its commitment to make sure the necessities of life are available to people in all walks of life at a price they can afford, then the government will begin to solve the problem by coming to grips with exorbitantly high interest rates.

I suggest that if there was one single theme to follow in trying to establish in Canada an independent path, if the government wants to establish in Canada the road to recovery, then it should begin by stopping the increase in oil prices next year which will add at least five percentage points to the cost of living, and by taking steps to ensure that the Bank of Canada reduces interest rates to people, businesses and farmers across this country and allows the Canadian economy to work again.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, in its terms the motion today calls upon the government to take immediate action—not next week, not next month, not next year, but immediate action now. There is a very simple reason for that. These problems with which we are faced today just cannot wait. We have a weak Canadian dollar of which we are reminded daily. Three weeks ago when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) announced that the budget deficit would be substantially higher but he would not tell us what the amount was, we told him that was dangerous as far as the exchange markets were concerned. The dollar then was worth 85.5 cents U.S. Today it is bumping along just above 77 cents U.S. We have to move fast because the weak Canadian dollar is forcing up interest rates and we can see that happening daily.

Industry is in a perilous position. The Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce have given us very graphic figures showing that about two-thirds—60 per cent to 65 per cent—of cash flow today is being used by industry across the country just for interest rates. This cash flow is not going into reinvestment. That is why we have the very weak economic figures announced this morning. The gross national product, or the national income of the country, is down 8 per cent on an annualized basis in the first quarter of this year.

Allen Marchement, head of The Trust Companies Association, said that a number of industries are in such a perilous position that they might not last another six months if interest rates continue at the levels we have today. We must act now. That is what we are calling on the Minister of Finance to do. We are not saying that we are going to get immediate results overnight. He knows that, we know that. But action would follow quickly if the people of this country felt that there was a plan of action or an understanding of the problems which the country is facing. What is required is a plan of action to stem the crisis of confidence and remove this sense of floundering which we see in Ottawa on the part of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of not knowing what to do. In addition, we have to strengthen the Canadian dollar and take pressure off interest rates. We have to have an action plan today that will lay the base for a long-term recovery program.

Last year the Minister of Finance said that economic renewal was one of the primary objectives of his budget. He seems to be approaching economic renewal in the same way that we approach urban renewal in this country. We wipe out the neighbourhood. We flatten the neighbourhood to the ground and then bring in programs of economic renewal, as is done with urban renewal. That is not the way to build this country. We will lose so much long-term productive capacity if we continue in the direction in which we are moving today.

I listened to the minister today as I have listened to him on other days when he has said that the problems are not his fault, that these things are outside of his control. He is right to some extent. The problems were started back in 1972, 1973 and 1974 when John Turner was minister of finance of the country. Government spending rose 108 per cent during Mr. Turner's three-and-a-half year term of office. That is when monetary policy went completely out of control. That is when it all started.

That style was continued by Donald Macdonald and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). We had a reprieve when the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was Minister of Finance. We had a change in the direction of government policy in this country and better management. We had a more competent degree of management in controlling the way government tax dollars were spent in this country.

Yes, the world economy and the high interest rates in the United States are part of our problem. We recognize those things. We do not deny them. Having said that, the minister cannot wring his hands and say there is nothing that we can do about our problems, that there is nothing we can do to convince President Reagan to change his policies. We have to deal with the realities of today. We have to accept the fact that there are not these quick and easy solutions which the minister says are the only way. There are other ways of dealing with the problems.

We cannot continue to spend our time casting the blame on people in other countries. We must deal with the realities of today, the problems and the policies at hand which are causing the problems in Canada. When we hear the Minister of Finance talking this way, is it any wonder that the confidence level of businessmen in the country has dropped from 58 per cent in 1979, when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was the Prime Minister, to 10 per cent today? One businessman in ten has confidence that the government knows what is going on. This is why we have to have action.

The forthcoming financial statement or the mini-budget which we are urging the minister to bring down immediately is the most important economic statement or the most important thing which he will be doing during his term of office. If it does not do the job, if it does not rekindle the air of confidence in the country which we must have to get the economy moving, then the measures which will have to be taken in the fall in the full budget will be much more Draconian, much more difficult and much more hard for Canadians to accept.

I want to dwell on the most immediate problem which the country is facing today—the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar is a reflection of high interest rates, lay-offs and high unemployment in the country today. If we can turn around that problem, then we can make some real inroads toward solving the problems of inflation, unemployment and high interest rates. This is the number one goal which the minister must address today. There are other problems down the road which he will have to address, but that is the first job or the first thing he must do.

The outflow of capital which is at the heart of the weak position of the Canadian dollar must be stopped. It is an open wound today and the minister is doing nothing about it. Let me talk about the reasons for this; the Leader of the Opposition referred to some of them. I should like to touch on them in somewhat more detail. Last year we had $10.2 billion worth of direct capital flowing out of the country. It was five times the level of the previous two years. Unidentified outflows of capital, such as items that were too small for the statistics people to pick up, represented an outflow of $8.4 billion or four times the level of the previous year. The total is $18.6 billion or an outflow 4.5 times the outflow during the previous two years.

The result is that it has greased the slide of the Canadian dollar on which we are right now. It is causing high interest rates, as the Bank of Canada is told by the minister to respond with high interest rates to stop the slide of the Canadian dollar. Most important, the key problem which we are facing in the country today, unemployment, is made far worse because the job creation toward which that money could be directed in this country is now directed toward job creation in the United States, Germany, Belgium, Australia and other countries. If that money were invested in Canada, it would have created 190,000 jobs. That is equivalent to 1.5 times an Alsands project or about 1.5 times the amount of money spent coast to coast in housing. I urge the House leader of the New Democratic Party to pay attention to that figure. This is how we could solve the unemployment problem about which he keeps muttering in reference to the housing industry.

I heard the minister today use the spurious argument that we have had a capital inflow and that we have not had a capital outflow. Sure, we have had a balance in favour of money coming into the country, but let us look at the reason for it. The money coming into the country to offset the huge outflow is money which is going into government bonds and bank deposits. Why? Because we are paying record high interest rates in Canada. The Bank of Canada is told to jack up interest rates to bring in this money, to retain the balance in our balance of payments and to hold the Canadian dollar so that it does not slide down to 70 or 75 cents. If we did not have the original outflow of capital, we would not have to increase interest rates and try to draw in capital which is seeking one thing and one thing only—high interest rates.

The Minister of Finance said that he wished the opposition would tell him how we could have lower interest rates and a stronger Canadian dollar. It is very, very simple. Those countries which have strong currencies have lower interest rates. The policies which Canada is following are putting pressure on the currency and are forcing up interest rates. If we had policies which drew money into the country, we would have a strong currency and lower interest rates.

I should like to refer to a speech which was made last weekend by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), wherein he said:

> To the extent that equity replaces borrowed capital, it reduces the upward pressure on our interest rates.

If we have equity capital being invested in the country so that we do not need high-cost borrowed capital from other countries, we would have lower interest rates. The President of the Treasury Board is saying exactly the same thing. I think the Minister of Finance should come down from his ivory tower into the real world and understand what is going on. I suggest that he speak to the President of the Treasury Board.

The government must change its policies. We must change the budgetary policies in the way outlined by the Leader of the Opposition, such as the anti-investment and anti-job-creating aspects of the budget. We must change the National Energy Program, but not by the tinkering which was done in the House three weeks ago.

Turning to FIRA, I heard the Minister of Finance again distorting the words of the Leader of the Opposition. We have no desire whatsoever to scrap or abandon FIRA, as he tried to distort the words of the Leader of the Opposition. We are saying that the nature of FIRA should be changed so that it does what it was originally intended to do—to screen foreign investment coming into the country and to get it in on the best possible terms for Canada. Right now it is an obstacle because it is under the direction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), who is a nationalist extremist in the way he has administered this policy. He is forcing foreign investors to withhold investing money in the country in a way which would create jobs. Surely jobs are what we need the most.

The fourth area to which I should like to refer is the need for a genuine program of restraint. We have seen the budget deficit of the government run totally out of control. It is up around $16 billion to $18 billion. I was hoping the Minister of Finance would tell us that figure today. The market needs it. It is one of the reasons the dollar is weak and interest rates continue to rise.

These four initiatives must be at the heart of any stabilization of the Canadian dollar and at the heart of any road to recovery if we are to get the economy moving again. They are not the full answer. I make no claim that they are the full answer. That awaits a budget in the fall. But they are alternatives which we put before the House and I urge Liberal members to respond to these and tell us why they think they are not the answer.

I hope Liberal members of the House will support our motion to lower interest rates, to increase the value of the Canadian dollar and to increase production. Surely that is the direction in which we in the House should be urging the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to move. These are the first steps to recovery and the first steps to a reduction of lay-offs, a reduction in the number of bankruptcies, a reduction in high mortgage rates and a reduction of the high inflation rate. If we have a strong Canadian dollar, we will have lower inflation. Every economist will agree on that.

In the economic figures which have come forward over the past six to nine months, we have seen all parts of the country being affected by the weakness in the economy, some parts of the country more than others.

[Translation]

As a result of the federal government's economic policies, Quebec, a province represented by 74 Liberal members, is paying a very high price for those disastrous policies. No doubt the 74 are proud of the fact that there were 1,950 commercial bankruptcies during the first five months of 1982, an increase of 49 per cent over last year.

• (1700)

Nearly 2,000 bankruptcies mean 40 per cent of the total number of bankruptcies in Canada. No doubt they are pleased with the fact that since April last year, 156,000 jobs were lost in Quebec, compared with 161,000 in the rest of the country. I would ask the gang of seventy-four not to put the blame on the provincial government. After all, the provincial government does not represent Quebecers in Ottawa, nor does it develop federal economic policy, or set interest rates at levels that are strangling small-and medium-sized businesses. In 1968, there were 350,000 people unemployed in Canada; today, we have about the same number in Quebec alone. The 74 members who are suffering from inertia should explain to these people that they are unemployed because their members opted for the wrong policies or, even worse, because these policies are causing more hardship in Quebec than elsewhere because their members have failed to give them adequate representation.

[English]

Today we have proposed a number of motions to show how a Progressive Conservative government would restrain growth in government spending, how we would reduce the size of government and how we would live more within our means.

I would like to discuss some of the votes we are considering today. First, I would refer to Vote No. 5 under Energy, Mines and Resources which calls for a 27.5 per cent increase for that department. An increase such as that cannot be considered at all as restraint. It is particularly unacceptable for that department to ask for an increase in spending when it is the one that is supposed to be responsible for optimal federal energy policy strategies with due regard to their economic, social, regional and environmental impact.

Let us review the impact of the energy policy. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is the department which introduced the national energy policy which resulted in the departure of 226 oil rigs from the country. So much for the economic impact.

As far as the social impact is concerned, there is a large increase in unemployment directly resulting from the National Energy Program. With respect to the regional impact, there has been more division caused by this energy program between the east and the west which has led to a sharp increase in the degree of separatist activity in the west. That department now has the gall to ask for a 28 per cent increase in spending for the damage it has done. That increase should be refused and I think the House knows that.

The next votes I would like to refer to are Vote No. 10 and Vote No. 20 under the Department of Finance for the Inspector General of Banks and the Department of Insurance. We are in opposition to these requests because we want to criticize the minister responsible for not accepting his responsibility to control those two departments. Those departments are to be the watchdogs of the insurance and banking industry. You are signalling me, Mr. Speaker; I thought I had five more minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has 20 minutes. His speech commenced at 4.45 p.m.

Mr. Wilson: I will quickly move along then. I wanted to refer to a number of votes but since I misjudged my time let me say that there is one particular request which we feel it is very important to stop. It is the increase in spending requested by the Canadian Unity Information Office. There has been a total misuse of that office. It is clearly political and partisan promotion of the government and it should be ceased. It is totally out of keeping with the requirements and the original objectives of that office.

In closing, let me make one observation. During the 1960s we judged the performance of this country against the huge potential which existed for us. In the 1970s, as our performance began to slip we started to judge ourselves against the performance of other summit nations. Now in the 1980s, when our performance has slipped to the rock-bottom of those countries, those countries are being blamed for the problems which exist in our country.

Surely we must go back to the guidelines of the 1960s and judge ourselves against our huge potential. That is what we are attempting to do in our party today by submitting these alternative policies. We urge the government to embrace these policies in a manner which can bring us back to the spirit of the 1960s where we can judge ourselves against that huge potential which we all know is there.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I must admit I was not too surprised at the Opposition Leader's speech, because after all, we are used to his way of analysing the facts and to the solutions he tends to suggest. However, I was very disappointed in the comments made by the member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), because he usually seems to have a more logical turn of mind and to be more realistic in the kind of solutions he proposes. If he reads what he just said in the House, he would realize that he recited three disappointing verses which merely repeated his leader's refrain. I was particularly surprised at his comments in referring to the votes in the Estimates for the Office of the Inspector General of Banks and the Department of Insurance. It is quite obvious that these two agencies are government watchdogs of the industries they are supposed to regulate, and I am sure that the hon. member, following the testimony given before the standing committee by representatives of the Office of the Inspector General of Banks and the Department of Insurance, will agree that they are indeed the watchdogs of this kind of institution, and that in the last few years a number of factors relating to the Bank Act review, as far as banking institutions are concerned, and to the Department of Insurance, have provided ample justification for the additional funds being requested for these two agencies.

• (1710)

The hon. member alluded to a rather special situation in Quebec, and I must say that his analysis is quite astonishing, because he is making it appear that the federal government actually wants the situation in Quebec to be worse than in other provinces. If Canada's general economic situation is suffering the adverse effects of its dependence on other economies, the hon. member should pursue this line of reasoning and try to explain why certain sectors of Quebec's economy are being more severely affected and thus making that economy particularly vulnerable.

The Leader of the Opposition has told us that he realizes economic trends cannot be turned around overnight. He also said that blaming others will not solve our problems, and his solution was to point out that the basic cause of our problems is the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) last November, in addition to the National Energy Program presented by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and finally, he asked for changes in the Foreign Investment Review Agency. Throughout his speech, not once did he mention the basic cause of the uncertainty and lack of confidence that were undermining our economy, namely, inflation.

He said the major cause of inflation in this country was government spending, and he then went on, but forgot to tell us where government spending should be cut. If we want this debate to be a little more realistic, we must ask ourselves what is causing the present economic situation in western economies and more specifically, in our country. As I said earlier, Canada's economy is an open economy which is heavily dependent on what is happening in other countries. This dependence makes us even more vulnerable when economic trends elsewere change or weaken. It is common knowledge that at the present time, the economies of the West are going through an extremely difficult period and are, in fact, in a recession, and our vulnerability is in direct proportion to the position of our economy which is an open one vis-à-vis these other economies. We are now suffering the effects of this recession in addition to our domestic economic problems. What the government wants to do through its policies is to get at the root of the problem. The government does not support high interest levels; its policy is aimed at bringing them down. The government's policy is to create stable employment in the long term, and its first objective is to get rid of inflationary pressures and bring about an economic upturn in as many sectors as possible.

Mr. Speaker, as long as our society is prepared to live with high inflation rates and encourages inflationary expectations, we may be certain that high interest rates will continue to be with us. We shall have to make a superhuman effort to create jobs and we shall be increasingly vulnerable to the slightest economic disturbance. When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked to have the budget withdrawn, he was not contributing anything of substance to the debate, because if we look at what is happening in other countries, then we also see high unemployment rates and high interest rates, although the budget that was tabled in this House by the Minister of Finance was not tabled in other countries which, nevertheless, are suffering from the same symptoms. It is certainly not the budget tabled here in Canada that has caused high unemployment and interest rates in other countries. We must therefore conclude that the opposition leader's reasoning in which he blames the November budget is entirely wrong. He also told us to set aside the National Energy Program. Mr. Speaker, the aim of the National Energy Program, which was presented by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), is to ensure that Canada will achieve self-sufficiency. The program proposes a wide range of measures, from Canadian ownership of enterprises involved in oil and gas exploration and production, to helping and encouraging Canadians to save energy and change their habits vis-à-vis energy use—for instance, by converting home heating systems from oil to other energy sources such as gas, electricity or solar energy—and including a multitude of objectives that will make Canadians energy self-sufficient as soon as possible. There was a breaking-in period which demanded considerable adjustment on the part of Canadians, so that mechanisms that would ensure the success of the National Energy Program could be quickly established. As the economic situation changed and various components of the program were established, we adjusted the program's pace to the economic situation and the needs of the moment, so that today we can say that the National Energy Program is well established and will provide the greatest possible benefits to Canadians.

The Leader of the Opposition has suggested a reform of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. The member for Etobicoke Centre said that the objective was not to break up the Agency but to change its nature. Mr. Speaker, when we change the nature of things, we are apt to destroy them altogether. I think the House should be told at what stage, and how, the hon. member wants us to change the nature of this agency—which according to the Act, is to review foreign investments, and find out whether they are in the interest of the Canadian economy in general—and the hon. member should tell us what he wants to do with it. If he wants to change the nature of the Agency, how does he want to change it? Finally, after having said that he wants to change the Agency's nature without destroying it, he said that all was not well with the Agency today, because it was administered by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). I really fail to understand why anyone would bother stating, first, that they do not want to change the Foreign Investment Review Agency, second, that they want to change its nature, and finally, that if the Agency is not working properly, this is due to the fact that it is being administered by one minister rather than another. That is the kind of double talk we have had to listen to this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the comments I made at the beginning of my speech. If we want our economy to recover, if we want to create jobs on a permanent basis, if we want to see interest rates go down, we must deal with a problem that is undermining investor confidence and preventing us from having confidence in the economy, namely, inflation rates, and in order to bring about a substantial drop in inflation rates, all economic partners, including governments, businesses and private citizens, must reduce their demands on society. Instead of demanding more personal wealth than the economy is able to afford, we must make a concerted effort, as individuals, as a society and as a government, to increase our collective wealth, which will then be redistributed at the individual level in the form of dividends and profits for corporations and also in the form of revenue for governments, which will then be able to reduce their substantial deficits. Bringing down inflationary expectations means greater realism, an increase in individual and corporate productivity, and this positive approach demands that we get rid of the climate of uncertainty and instability caused by inflation, which is slowly destroying the hopes and expectations of all Canadians.

The Minister of Finance has attended a number of international conferences; the International Monetary Fund and at the Versailles Summit, to name a couple. Since his return, he has had a series of close consultations with his cabinet colleagues and the Liberal caucus, and he has indicated that before the summer recess, he will be making a statement to the House on the state of the economy. Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I would like to repeat the need for all economic partners to make a concerted effort to get rid of this climate of uncertainty caused by inflation, to ensure that a more positive approach will create a proper climate for investment which in turn will create new jobs and reduce unemployment, and thus give everyone a better future to look forward to.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, today we are considering this motion submitted by our leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

That this House approves the government taking immediate action to lower interest rates, stimulate production, investment and jobs, strengthen the dollar and lower the rate of inflation.

Twenty-eight months ago, encouraged by repeated promises of a better and brighter future, Canadian voters returned the Liberal Party to office. For those 28 months, indeed almost from the beginning of this period, the very government which promised Canadians heaven on earth has transformed the lives of thousands of them into a living hell.

Just this past weekend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), having created this hell, said his government is now assuming the role of exorcist, and by its tight money policy is now scaring the hell out of people. Well, he certainly is. He is scaring the hell out of people by what he is doing as Prime Minister and because he remains Prime Minister.

The litany of ills which has befallen this nation since this government resumed office makes the description of punishment contained in Dante's book "The Inferno" pale by comparison. In the first quarter of this year, the Canadian economy fell by about 1.7 per cent, the sharpest quarterly decline in 28 years. In the fourth quarter of last year, Canadian manufacturers were operating at only 75 per cent capacity on average, their lowest level of utilization since 1961. This has resulted in a net loss of about 157,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector since last August.

It has been predicted that farm income will decline by 15 per cent this year while expenses for farmers will rise by about 10 per cent. Farm bankruptcies in the first four months of 1982 were 13 per cent higher than in the corresponding period last year. Business bankruptcies in the first four months of 1982 were 37 per cent higher than during the same period last year and 61 per cent higher than in the first three months of 1980.

In May, a record 1.2 million Canadians, 10.2 per cent of the labour force, were unemployed. This figure is even higher when one includes those not registered as looking for work, those who have simply given up hope and are probably living on welfare or eking an existence out of some savings. I presume this would represent an over-all total of 1.5 million people.

Some 195,000 jobs were lost to the Canadian economy in the first five months of this year. Each of these lost jobs has cost the federal government an average of $2,737 in lost federal revenues and $1,313 in lost provincial revenues, for a total of $4,050 in losses to both levels of government.

Canadians who are having trouble keeping their jobs are also having trouble keeping their homes. In the fourth quarter of 1981, a family income of $45,000 was needed to afford an averaged-priced home in Canada. That was the average. In many parts of the country, the figure was nearly double. In 1965, 50 per cent of Canadians could afford to buy a home. Today less than half of them can afford such a purchase.

Those once able to afford a home are now losing their homes when faced with mortgage renewals at interest rates now at the 19 per cent level, which in some cases have nearly doubled the monthly payments. Canadians able to cope with their housing needs are being forced to cut back on such essentials as food and clothing. The value of building permits issued in March of this year was down 12 per cent relative to the same month last year. When inflation is taken into account, building activity is down by 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

There is no doubt that the housing situation in Canada is critical. The government made a half-hearted attempt to address this problem in the November budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The effort was obviously an abysmal failure. In the budget, provisions were made to assist up to 12,000 payments with mortgages deferrals, but only 700 applicants have so far responded to the plan.

The budget also contained measures for the creation of up to 30,000 rental units across the country based on a 15-year interest-free loan of up to $7,500. Although there have been some applications for this loan, none has been taken up and no new units constructed up to the present time. Obviously these two measures have failed to address the needs of Canadians.

Equally obvious, the government must initiate new programs which will contain more practical plans to assist first-time home buyers and those requiring rental accommodation. A very practical way to accomplish this would be for the government to implement a mortgage interest deductibility plan and a municipal tax allowance of up to $1,000 for home owners. These measures were contained in the Progressive Conservative government budget and were two of the many sound policies shunted aside when the government, then in opposition, rose to oppose the budget and defeated the government, with the help of the NDP.

If confidence in the government's ability to solve the housing crisis is at an all-time low, so too is confidence in its ability to manage other aspects of the economy and the country. This month, for the first time in history, the Canadian dollar was trading on the world currency markets at less than 80 cents as compared to the U.S. dollar. The level today is 76.99 cents and many experts are predicting that the dollar will fall to 75 cents some time this summer.

An estimated $24 billion was erased from the value of shares traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange in the first quarter of this year, the worst quarter since 1934. This lack of confidence at all levels has resulted in apprehension and a deep sense of insecurity across the land. Canadians, being asked again to tighten their belts and lower their expectations, are growing increasingly angry with a government which does neither.

The nation is deeply in debt, an estimated $135 billion in debt. This year alone the government's deficit is expected to reach $16 billion and some place it as high as $18 to $20 billion. The cost of interest on the public debt will be about $16 billion this year, the equivalent of $1,750 per taxpayer. One dollar in five is now being spent to pay interest on the debt.

Given these astronomical financial burdens, one would expect the government to place a priority on the reduction of its own expectations and spending. Such is not the case. Despite the staggering deficit and the threat of further economic chaos, the government continues its wasteful spending.

• (1730)

The money grab undertaken by this government is evident in the estimates it is presenting to Parliament for approval, probably later today. More than $94 million has been budgeted for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983. Approval for this amount should be denied until the government introduces programs which would be of benefit to the consumer and to businesses, both segments with their backs to the wall. But it is sheer folly and dangerous to our future for the government to insist that the solutions to our problems are in the hands of others. We can, and we should, be implementing a series of sound and practical programs to encourage investment, development, productivity and employment.

The government also seeks to spend more than $9 million on the Metric Commission this fiscal year for a program the majority of Canadians overwhelmingly opposed and one that is causing confusion, anger and added costs.

Then there is the $103 million the government plans to spend for health and social services. Both these are important government services, but I strongly suggest that if Canadians were given the opportunity to work and did not have to struggle to obtain the necessities of life, the need for health and social services would drastically decline.

This nation has a number of very serious problems to solve and overcome. The greatest tragedy of all is the government's response to Canada's economic woes. Although it is responsible for the disastrous situation in which we find ourselves, the government repeatedly refuses to adopt new policies of economic renewal and recovery, opting instead to place the blame somehwere else. It would be unreasonable to suggest that Canada is alone and apart from other nations in these hard times. Rather than whimpering in resignation over the situation and the rest of the world, we should be responding to these influences in a positive way. Yet this government remains committed to a policy of high interest rates as a means of "wrestling inflation to the ground". It says high interest rates are inevitable and caused primarily by the economic policies of the United States. This attitude of the government cannot be justified and must be condemned. Our deficit and the growth of unnecessary government spending are at the root of our economic problems. This government is costing the taxpayer more than it is worth. Our interest rates are high, not because the money supply is tight but because it is expensive to support a government whose grandiose schemes and plans bear no relation to the problems at hand and whose spending is out of control. It is expensive to support a government whose plans for raising even more money to throw away causes the economic base of the nation to crumble.

Even with the resulting changes in the November budget, instead of solving our problems it has created worse ones. The National Energy Program, which raised gasoline prices far above the promised increase of 14 cents a gallon, is now in shambles. Twenty-eight months after the promise of a better, brighter future Canadians are wondering if they have one to look forward to at all.

The personal hardships being suffered by individual Canadians are matched by, and in some ways the result of, the disastrous effect of this government's policies on industry. The automobile industry is a prime example of one of those hardest hit. Canadian automobile sales are at a ten-year low. The government introduced some amendments to its November budget to ease the burden for those involved in daily car rentals, but something should also be done to change the penalties on those leasing cars on a regular basis. It is a known fact that many automobile dealers, both large and small, derive considerable income from the leasing of vehicles to businessmen, professional men and others, and this has certainly declined drastically since the budget.

There is not an area or region in Canada which has managed to escape the massive problems created by the economic mismanagement of this government. The part of the country I represent, northern Ontario, is no exception. All of Ontario, once a wealthy, prosperous, have province, is now a have-not province. While the problems of the economy are felt throughout the entire province, those in the northern area are feeling the effects more deeply. Although there is a number of industries of some size in northern Ontario, the economic base of the region consists essentially of small and medium-size businesses. The impact of inflation and the high interest rate policy of this government has all but wiped out this financial base. Companies which have been growing and expanding on a regular basis are either struggling to keep their doors open or are going out of business altogether. I have seen many cases of this in my own riding and, yes, in my own town, where one business went bankrupt and another, because of high costs, just folded its tent and closed up. That was the end. This has resulted in the loss of jobs in various communities and exerted unbearable pressures on the economic and social services the communities offer. We do not often hear of these problems because the jobs involved are not of the scale of those lost when giant industries lay off or cut back, but they are of relative and equal importance. When a small business goes under, that frequently causes problems for other businesses which supplied either the firm in question or the people who worked for it.

I have spoken of the snowball effect of the loss of a business to a community, and today we are seeing more and more of this happening. If something is not done soon, many communities may never recover.

This government should consider the immediate expansion of the scope and guidelines of the Small Business Development Bond. Measures contained in the November budget did enlarge the eligibility criteria but then restricted application to those businesses on the verge of collapse or bankruptcy. Before waiting until a business goes under for the first time, the government should be offering assistance to small businesses which have proved their ability to swim, even against the tide. The change would be a sound and obvious way to generate much needed employment across the country.

Tourism is one of the major industries in all of Canada, and particularly in my area of northern Ontario. There is not a community, large or small, which does not welcome travelling visitors to our beautiful area of the country. Some would suggest that because the Canadian dollar is worth less than the American dollar, visitors from the United States will be flocking to this region and will help the economy of the area. While we do have our share of American tourists, the people in that country are also pinching pennies, and the flow of tourists is not great. While tourist traffic is of admitted benefit, its reduction is not the main reason that the industry is in trouble. And I point out that Canadian tourists spend a great deal more than American tourists. It is on that basis that we should be worrying even more.

The mining industry in Canada is also in trouble. This has created monumental problems in northern Ontario where many mines are located. In the first quarter of this year mining companies have lost $119 million; 8,150 employees have been fired, and 50,000 others are facing temporary layoffs. The Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) has described mining as the backbone of the Canadian economy but has admitted that the government is doing nothing but keeping a close watch on the situation and studying ways of sparking an upturn. That is a typical response. The government spends and spends and then studies the problems the spending creates.

As I said to the House last week, the Prime Minister, having promised prior to his trip to the Versailles Summit conference that he would come back with solutions to our problems, left empty-minded and returned empty-handed. My motion at that time was that the Prime Minister, having failed in his attempt to change world thinking—let alone that of Canadians—should call a general election and let the people of this country select a government capable of getting the nation back on its feet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hate to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1740)

Mr. Darling: There are sound policies and options open to a government which is serious about resolving the problems of the Canadian economy. The government has repeatedly demonstrated that it cannot do the job; Canadians know there are others who can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canada is on a perilous course. I want to do all I can to change that direction. I want the Government of Canada to stand for hope instead of despair. I want new leadership to turn the economy around and get Canada, moving forward again. I want policies to create jobs, unite the country, make the aged secure, and reduce the terrible burden of taxation and rising prices on Canadians in the lower and middle-income groups. I want policies to restore the work ethic, strengthen the family unit and be responsive to the needs and demands of the Canadian people.

It is clearly time for a change in the policies of the government, and I want to do all I can to bring them about. If the government wants to adjourn the House before it deals with the tragic problems facing Canadians, it will do so over the strongest objections that I can muster.

With over one million Canadians unemployed, our dollar shrinking to the lowest level in our history, with inflation raging and real growth near zero, it is time for all Canadians of every political persuasion to unite and develop policies for the economic recovery of our nation.

The government says that it has done all it can. It is tired and worn out. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) tells us to lower our sights and reduce our standard of living. Mr. Speaker, I reject policies that discourage growth and discriminate against investment. I reject the theory that the Canadian economy must slide more deeply into recession before it can regain its potential heights of achievement. I reject the government's policies. I believe that to live is to grow and that if we lower our expectations we will lower our achievements.

It is true that resources may indeed be finite, but man's ingenuity is not. We are a nation of immense possibilities and great potential. We inhabit one of this planet's greatest treasure stores of minerals and natural wealth. In energy alone we are the envy of the world. With our vast resources, the tar sands of Alberta, the untapped resources of the Arctic and the continental shelves, the coal fields of Saskatchewan and the maritimes, our spectacular potential for hydroelectric development in Quebec and Labrador and in the Bay of Fundy—what industrialized nation would not envy Canada?

What people except Canadians can point to such abundant blessings, as we prepare to face the future and claim the twenty-first century as our own? Mr. Speaker, it is not just energy that provides us with unbridled opportunity. Our educated population, our vast arable lands, our unequalled fresh water resources, our unexcelled human resources of honest, hard-working people—with these and other aspects we have all the vital ingredients necessary for a real and lasting prosperity. All we need is the national will and the leadership to put all this to work for us.

There is one reason why Canada trails the western industrial nations in development, one reason why unemployment exceeds one million Canadians, one reason why the federal budget continues to skyrocket, and one reason for so much idle capacity in both our factories and our labour force. That reason is the mismanagement of our economy by this government.

Too often our extracted wealth is exported as raw materials, letting others manufacture the prosperity that rightfully belongs in Canada. We gain little when half of all goods purchased in Canada is made elsewhere from coal, oil, natural gas, wood or other materials extracted from our own reserves.

In these and other ways we have, over the past decade, the wasted years, turned our backs on the challenge of creating wealth. The legacy of this decade of experimentation has been a litany of economic problems. The cost of government has soared. Prices have exploded. Investment capital has either dried up or fled the country. Economic growth, the engine of jobs, has been stifled. In 1968, there were 375,000 Canadians out of work; in 1974, it was 500,000, and today, 1.25 million Canadians are looking for work and thousands of others in our school system will soon join the quest for employment.

The legacy of a government that has run out of ideas, lacked the imagination, the creativity and the courage to pursue innovation and encourage the free-enterprise system, has become an albatross around our necks. It is the tragic errors in judgment that have shackled the free-enterprise system, eroded our work ethic and dimmed our shining promise for tomorrow.

I believe that the free-enterprise system can deliver our incredible national potential. Within our vast borders lie tremendous forest and agricultural reserves—coal, iron, lead, uranium—indeed, most of the raw materials demanded by industrial growth. We have oil and natural gas and, more important, we have an abundance of fresh clean water—almost one third of the world's fresh water supply. We can be self-sustaining in food. In relation to our population, we have more arable land than any other nation, and we have not yet begun to farm the three oceans that wash our shores. And geography has situated us alongside the richest market in the world.

Today, with more than one third of the world's population about to embark on the industrial transition we have already gone through, the need for our expertise in developing large-scale public works such as transit systems, water purification plants, electrification and waste treatment facilities, has never been greater. The Arabian states, countries in the Far East, and South America need our high technology, our skills and commerce, and our know-how in transportation, banking and insurance.

There is indeed a world market for Canadian skills and Canadian products, but it will never be reached with a preoccupied, inward-looking government that wrings its hands and says, "We have done all we can." We need new policies to demonstrate faith once again in our ingenuity and individual initiative. We can generate the economic activity that will enable us to be a compassionate nation.

By turning our economy around we can restructure our badly overworked tax system so that it deals fairly with lower and middle-income groups. We can then let the wives of farmers and working Canadians join the Canada Pension Plan. We can elevate the standard of living of our senior citizens who now live in poverty, and we can work to enable them to remain independent in their own homes as long as they are able to do so and to treat them with compassion and thoughtfulness when they are not.

A blueprint for the economic development and recovery of our nation will require a package of many things. Two of the most dynamic are an enlightened science policy and a modern transportation system which can enable us to produce our goods more efficiently and transport them to the markets of the world.

I have talked to Canadians who feel they have no future in their country. I have visited senior citizens who are waiting out their lives in empty idleness, and I have looked into the faces of our young people, our nation's greatest hope, and seen disillusionment and anger because their country has no place for them to work and their government gives them the impression that it has given up or that it does not care.

I do not lightly dismiss the difficulty of leading the economic recovery of our nation, but these are not normal times and Canada is not an ordinary country.

At the bottom of the Great Depression, before he lit the light of hope in the United States, President Roosevelt said, "The only thing Americans have to fear is fear itself". He referred to an attitude that was prevalent in his country and an attitude that is growing now in ours.

We must recognize that the quality of government and its attitudes, as well as policies, can be either a serious deterrent or a major contributor to technological and industrial development with their intended social pluses and minuses. It is therefore the responsibility of government to set challenging yet reasonable economic, social and national objectives leading to a scientific, technological and industrial policy, and energetically and consistently to support and encourage all aspects of that policy. A national objective supported by tax and investment policy should be set to match and eventually surpass those declared goals of competitive advanced nations in the field of research and development. Industrial policy must concentrate on the strengths of Canada, both human and physical.

• (1750)

Our policy should clearly identify and deliberately support advancing technologies and industries such as the challenges in the electronic, microelectronic, communications and biotechnological fields. Our policy should also support a strong basic research role through national and academic institutions. With the changing complexion of the world economy, Canada is faced with the opportunity to move forward on the wings of change with the new wave of industrialization that is starting to take hold in North America.

In reality, we have no choice. The large and growing number of unemployed Canadians is repugnant to this nation's social conscience, and a great but aging industrial structure, which has given Canadians one of the highest standards of living in the world and the most generous social justice progam, is finding it difficult to maintain those standards. Canada needs a new and enlightened industrial strategy to meet the challenge of a changing and developing world, and that policy requires a strong regional complement. We are merely in the beginning of a North American reindustrialization of such a magnitude that our regional problems may once again be overlooked unless we seize the opportunities that are presented and act to take advantage of them. Clearly we must build on strengths in areas of Canada that suffer from regional disparities, and this policy must be central to any national policy of economic recovery.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to four votes taking place tonight which are related to the economic issue now before the House. The purpose of those votes is to give all Members of Parliament an opportunity to indicate with their vote whether or not they feel these programs have been operated efficiently and fairly in the best interests of all Canadians. One vote will deal with the Canadian Home Insulation Program. All members who feel that it has been efficiently and fairly operated—and I am not one of them—will have the opportunity to express their feelings tonight. Another vote has to do with the Export Development Corporation, which has just financed a very large sale to another country at 9.7 per cent, which is a much lower rate than that at which Canadians, even the Canadian government, can borrow money. We will see whether or not all members feel its operation is commendable. A third vote will deal with the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and whether it has been efficiently and fairly operated. I do not think so, and other members will have an opportunity to show how they feel about it tonight. Finally, there will be a vote dealing with the Privy Council office, which is the catch-all for just about every research project which no other department wants to undertake. I hope members will avail themselves of the opportunity to show where they stand on that. Most certainly the members of my party will.

I feel there is a number of very challenging issues which face the government, not the least of which is development of the transportation system in the Atlantic provinces. We have in the Atlantic provinces the two deep-water ports of Halifax and Saint John. They contain the deepest water of any port on the Atlantic seaboard because of the configuration of the continental shelf. As hon. members know, the continental shelf is very shallow along the United States and the Atlantic seaboard, but the exceptions are found in Halifax and Saint John. We feel development of these two ports, which jut way out into the Atlantic, will enable them to receive the largest vessels in the world, bringing with them armadas of profit for Canadians. We can sell that transportation facility to the entire Atlantic seaboard for unloading huge ships and trans-shipping by rail or smaller vessel the cargo they carry. This means that Saint John and Halifax become assembly plants for all types of manufactured goods which can be exported to world markets through the two ports.

For the rest of the Atlantic provinces to avail themselves of this prosperity we need in place a modern transportation system. That, Mr. Speaker, is what we do not have in the Atlantic provinces. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), in an ill-advised move, wiped out one half of the rail passenger service in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and it has not been replaced yet with the high-speed trains which he indicated would make it a pleasure for us to not have this less expensive form of transportation. We have under study now before the air transport committee of the Gander Transport Commission applications for inter-city air transportation which, if a decision is forthcoming soon, will help solve the inter-maritime problems in transportation. But the heavier transportation of which I speak requires modern rail transportation, modern vessel transportation, and the development of our two deep-water ports which I think can help this come about.

Another area I hope the government will look at is in the field of electrical energy and the development of Fundy tidal power in concert with the Gull Island and Muskrat Falls development in the same grid in eastern Canada.

I notice my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I am two minutes over, and I would like to thank you for your courtesy.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer).

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, since the previous speaker had a couple of minutes left on his time I wonder if he would be so kind as to allow me a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) accept a question?

Mr. Howie: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Royal Family

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie). I thought he gave us an interesting speech. It had a nice blend of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member is going to ask a question, he should ask it.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to tell the hon. member how much I appreciated his thoughtful comments. At the same time I think he was a little bit short on one or two of the details—

Mr. McDermid: Ask the question.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I believe you had recognized the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). I think the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) is just killing time because they do not have a speaker ready. We have a speaker ready to go.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Portage-Marquette.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important debate because the country is clearly looking to this place for some leadership.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fisher) on a point of order. What is his point of order?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I believe we had arranged that I could ask a question of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and he still had some time left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member does not have a point of order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Portage-Marquette.

Mr. Mayer: I believe that the motion put forward by my leader is a very appropriate motion in the sense that normally opposition days are taken up with—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

MESSAGE OF CONGRATULATIONS ON BIRTH OF SON TO PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion. It will be evident from the contents of it that it will be appropriate to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) to move a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to offer the congratulations of this House on the birth of a Prince, a son to Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales; and assuring Her Majesty that this happy event affords the greatest joy and satisfaction to Her faithful Members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has passed an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, expressing congratulations on the occasion of the birth of a Prince, son of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and requesting Their Honours to unite with this House in the said Address.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark:

That this House approves the government taking immediate action to lower interest rates, stimulate production, investment and jobs, strengthen the dollar and lower the rate of inflation.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, this is an important debate or discussion which we are having this evening because it deals with the economy. If one stopped and asked any Canadian on the street today what is his or her main concern, I am sure it would be something to do with the economy. In line with the remarks made by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) last Friday, I think that in many ways we are experiencing, if not a real depression, at least a psychological depression because many people have partially given up hoping or believing that anyone knows what they are doing in the country.

I believe many people have rightly looked to the government for some answers. That is fair game and proper. In many cases they have the right to look to government for solutions because the average taxpayer in the country works for one level of government or another. From January 1 to the beginning of June, average Canadian taxpayers have worked approximately five months for government, and when governments take a lot away in terms of their earnings, in terms of their gross national product, or however one wants to define it, I think taxpayers and citizens in general have a right to expect something in return. When so much is taken away from people in the form of taxation, they have a right to expect something back. When the government becomes so large in terms of its meddling or interference in our lives or in the economy, again it is fair game that citizens should expect something back from governments. It is in that kind of context that I think we should approach the debate this evening.

This is what we in the opposition tried to do in framing the motion. Most motions on opposition days condemn the government for one thing or another. This motion does not do that. It asks:

> That this House approves the government taking immediate action to lower interest rates, stimulate production, investment and jobs, strengthen the dollar and lower the rate of inflation.

It is asking the government to do something. It is not condemning it for past sins, although we could easily do that. In the name of common sense and in the name of some urgency, it is asking that the government do something. There is a lot of urgency because of the present economic situation.

I should like to leave the government with some suggestions this evening as to what can be done. Too often we in the opposition are accused of simply criticizing and not offering any suggestions. I should like to make three or four suggestions along the lines of those which have been made already, and I should like to close with some specific suggestions as to what could be done in some of the areas with which I am familiar.

The first one about which I want to talk is the National Energy Program. Many statistics have been bandied about in speeches and in articles in various newspapers across the country. I think it should be obvious from all the statistics—and I do not want to get into them this evening—that the National Energy Program is causing massive problems in the country. If we look at it in terms of the investment it has chased out of the country, it makes no sense whatsoever to discourage Canadians from investing in Canadian industries and in Canadian energy related industries, to discourage foreign investment from coming into the country to invest in our industries, and at the same time to raise interest rates to attract that money back into the country. It does not make any sense to anyone.

Essentially the same thing is being done with FIRA. We all want to own our country. One of the goals of the National Energy Program is that we have 50 per cent ownership of the energy industry by the year 1990. That is truly a laudable goal with which we all agree. I think we would have to question what Canadian would not agree with Canadians owning 50 per cent of the industry by 1990. FIRA is in somewhat the same category. It wants to encourage ownership of Canadian industry. There is nothing wrong with that, but many people find it hard to live with the fact that FIRA is too discretionary. It is almost akin to making up the rules as one goes along. If FIRA had some firm guidelines or some firm rules at which potential investors could look and know that the government would adhere to them over the life of the investments people were contemplating, FIRA would probably work and work well. Essentially FIRA is a game played, and the rules are made up as the game progresses. This discourages people from investing in Canada.

I am not referring only to big industry. For example, last Friday I had an opportunity to speak with a banker in Brandon. As a matter of fact, he was my banker, so I was all the more interested in talking with him. He pointed out that many small industries—and we were not talking about millions of dollars; we were talking about probably tens or maybe hundreds of thousands of dollars—are affected by FIRA. He said that people have given up applying to FIRA for permission to buy because of the red tape through which they must go. They submit and get a proposal back, they resubmit and get another proposal back. This discourages people from investing in the country. Again, it makes no sense to me—and I do not think it makes sense to many Canadians—that with FIRA and the National Energy Program Canadian dollars are discouraged from staying in the country and investment is discouraged from coming in from the outside, investment which creates jobs in the country. To counter this they raise interest rates, which attracts money back into the country, and we all know what happens when we raise interest rates at home. It hurts business, it hurts Canadian business. Surely the best way to buy out or own our own country is to have a healthy, expanding and vibrant Canadian economy. By raising interest rates people are simply driven out of business. That is no way in which to own our country.

Since I do not have a lot of time, I want to go fairly quickly through the points I want to make this evening. Let us talk about the budget for a minute. The budget is a document which, in effect, discourages production in Canada. We have heard about inflation. A basic definition of inflation is simply too much money pursuing too few goods. I suggest that what the government and what the Bank of Canada has done up to the present time was to emphasize the supply of too much money over too few goods. If the government were serious in addressing Canada's inflationary problem I believe that one of the logical solutions it could pursue would be to study ways to make use of its fiscal policies, which is essentially the taxation policy of the government, as well as using the Bank of Canada to encourage production. I do not understand how inflation can be brought down by pursuing a policy which raises interest rates to such a level as to discourage people from spending their money. This has the effect of lowering demand and inflation but it also chases people out of business, which results in a shortage of goods. If there are not enough goods on the market, the price will go up. Therefore there must be a point at which a rise in interest rates contributes more to the inflationary spiral than relieves the problem. When one looks back at these three areas, the National Energy Program, FIRA and the budget, one realizes that the main intent of the government has been to have greater central control of the Canadian economy through its bureaucracy.

I would like to make a point with respect to bureaucracy in my part of the country. I consider the first bureaucrat to have gone to western Canada to be John Palliser. I would like to repeat what he said about that part of the country. He was sent to the Red River area by the British Parliament to explore it and report on its potential for settlement in 1860. He visited Red River, and what he had to say upon his return is worth noting. He said:

> The Red River is an oasis in the midst of a desert, a vast treeless prairie on which scarely a shrub is to be seen. The climate is unfavourable to the growth of grain; the summer though warm enough is too short in duration, so that even the few fertile spots could with difficulty mature a potato or a cabbage.

I want to point out that he was talking about Manitoba, where I come from, which now produces, I suggest, the finest potatoes in North America. He defines the area which has come to be well known as "Palliser's Triangle". It runs approximately from Boissevain in southwestern Manitoba, to Saskatoon, to the Waterton lakes. He said that that area, "presents a barrier to continuous growth of settlements between the Mississippi Valley and the states on the Pacific coast." He went on to say:

> This central desert extends, however, but a short way into the British territory, forming a triangle having for its base the 49th parallel from longitude 100d—

And I have already referred to the areas of Boissevain and Waterton lakes. The point is that Palliser was the first bureaucrat to visit that area, and he said it could not be settled. We did not listen to the bureaucrat. We settled the area. It was not the bureaucrats who settled it nor was it settled by a direction from the central government. Bureaucrats did not homestead and make sacrifices to achieve prosperity for that part of the country and the country as a whole. They said we could not do it.

What we see today are bureaucrats, through the National Energy Program, FIRA and many of the budget provisions, telling us not what we cannot do but what we can do by giving directions from this cocoon called Ottawa. They give directions from this hermetically sealed place that in many ways operates from outside the real world.

John Palliser was incorrect when he told us that it could not be settled, and it should be obvious that today's bureaucrats are incapable of giving direction to what should occur in Canada's economy today. The lesson we should learn is that we should be wary of turning too much control over to the centrally located bureaucrats.

I believe that the excessive involvement of the bureaucracy in the affairs of the economy of our country has led to many of our difficulties. I suggest that it is responsible for a million and a quarter unemployed. For example. Our lumber industry has literally collapsed in northwestern Ontario and in northern British Columbia while at the same time we are told that there are 50,000 to 60,000 housing starts which are needed but have not begun. It makes no sense to people when they see how rich we are in human and natural resources, resources which need to be utilized but the use of which cannot be co-ordinated. As Adam Smith once said, we need the invisible hand working among us helping to make decisions on an individual basis deciding what is best for the individual.

Another drawback to our recovery is the fact that there are too many government grants. Taxes are being collected and given back in the form of grants. These grants are more in the form of penalties which dictate what the recipient does instead of providing incentives to begin new ventures. One gentleman described a government grant as taking a quart of blood from one arm and transferring it to the other arm while losing half of it on the way over. This is true of the bureaucracy. The taxpayer's money is taken from them but much of it is lost in the process of returning it. Money is the lifeblood of our country and our productive capability.

We need a tax system which will review that productivity through incentives instead of penalizing success.

In the time I have left I wish to make a few comments on the Bank of Canada. The purpose of any parliamentary democracy is to have Parliament accountable to the people who sent us here. However, I submit that the Bank of Canada is involved in fiscal and taxation policies in Canada to a greater extent than are many members who sit in the opposition who are elected and accountable. I believe it is not properly accountable to Parliament when it has so much involvement with fiscal policy. For example, the Bank of Canada can increase the money supply to help the government of the day finance deficit. However, we know very little about how the Bank of Canada operates. There is some question, for instance, as to whether it understands or is able to calculate accurately what the money supply is. Yet we are told interest rates are being raised to regulate the money supply and thereby lower demand and inflation.

I would like to reiterate a suggestion which I made approximately one year ago. In order to make the Bank of Canada more accountable we should seriously consider appointing two members of the House to the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. At present, there are 12 members on the board. I defy anyone in the House, or anyone listening, to name one of those directors. Yet the Bank of Canada has great influence on our daily lives. If two Members of Parliament were elected to the board it would make the Bank of Canada much more accountable for the daily running of its affairs. This would be a very positive step, I suggest.

I listened very attentively to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) this afternoon when he replied to our party's leader. He told us that we are sharing in an international recession, which is something we realize. I believe Canadians would say that they are having more than their share of recession as a result of this government's policy. However, that is not the problem. The problem is for the government to identify some of the areas in which it can take action. We have all made suggestions as to areas in which the government could cut back in its spending. The Minister of Finance mentioned the fact that we in the opposition have said nothing about monetary policy. As I said, I do not see how pursuing a monetary policy to the extent that it raises interest rates to the level at which they drive people out of business is a responsible solution. I do not believe you could find anyone who has gone broke, lost his job, lost his home or has had family problems as a result of interest rates who believes this was necessary in order to protect the value of the Canadian dollar. No one who has lost his business through high interest rates gets much satisfaction from the fact that he did this to protect the Canadian dollar. That makes no sense to anyone, yet that is what this government is doing with monetary policy.

As far as an incomes policy is concerned, let me tell the Minister of Finance that the best way to have an incomes policy is to have a healthy economy which is growing, so that the citizens, the taxpayers of the country, are able to share in something that is progressive and growing. If we keep going the way this government is sending us, the government will not have to worry about an incomes policy because there will not be any income. So, I say again that I do not understand why the Minister of Finance should talk about an incomes policy.

He made reference to the fact that the opposition had not talked very much about a fiscal policy. Fiscal policy simply means examining the expenditures of the government. If one looks at the votes we will go through this evening, one will find that Vote 40 of the Department of Agriculture should be deleted from the estimates. Let me tell hon. members about some of the things that we could delete as far as the fiscal policy of this government is concerned. There were $111,000 spent to study improvement in the spreadability of butter. I am sure we could live without some kind of academic study on improving the spreadability of butter.

Mr. Deans: It is easy. Leave it out of the fridge.

Mr. Mayer: We could refer to many other areas. The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), whose seat is in front of mine, moved a motion under Standing Order 43 pointing out that the Department of Finance should very seriously consider looking at all the estimates with the idea of cutting back on 10 per cent of government spending. This was a serious suggestion. We do have some suggestions relating to fiscal policy.

The Minister of Finance said that we in the opposition had not said anything about inflation. Let me tell the Minister of Finance that there are two sides to the equation of inflation. In the classical definition of the economist, inflation is simply too much money chasing too few goods. If we ignore the productive side of that equation, I think we do it to our detriment, because we simply cannot attack the inflationary problem by trying to screw down the supply of money and therefore to restrict the purchasing power of consumers. I want to suggest that what we need is more productive policies from the government so that people can have some faith in the future of this country. After all, we do have more natural resources per capita than any country in the world.

Let me close by telling a story which is rather humorous. We are not in a very humorous situation, but I think we all must have a sense of humour. This story reminds me of the way in which this government is carrying out its economic policies. It concerns a man who bought a hot air balloon. I am sure that those of us in the chamber are familiar with hot air and I think Your Honour has heard this story before. The man who bought the balloon asked his friend to go with him one Sunday afternoon, in the heat of the day, to fly this hot air balloon. They went out into the country into a field and went up in the hot air balloon. In the middle of the afternoon some cumulus clouds drifted by and they became very nervous about where they were because they had never flown a balloon, they could not see the ground, and they did not know what kind of predicament they were in. All of a sudden they drifted into an opening in the clouds. They looked down and saw a man in a field. One of the men in the balloon hollered down and asked, "Where are we?" The gentleman in the field looked up and said, "You are in a balloon". Just then the balloon drifted into some clouds and they could no longer talk to the man on the ground. One of them said, "That man must be an economist". His friend asked, "What would make you think that?" He said, "Who else but an economist could give us such accurate, precise, yet utterly useless information?" In many ways, that is the kind of information and those are the kinds of policies that we are getting from this government.

I would hope that the government would pay attention to some of the suggestions that we in the opposition have made here this evening and act on them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that these times are difficult times for every country in the world, including Canada. I want to stress that we on this side of the House are very conscious of and very concerned about the unemployment levels, the high interest rates that Canadians are facing, the lack of growth in our economy and all the difficulties this situation means for individuals and families all across the land. In the debates which have taken place today and previously, the opposition, particularly the Conservative opposition, has tried to blame all those difficulties on the budget and the National Energy Program, ignoring what is happening in the rest of the world today, particularly in the industrialized world. We are encountering a situation today in which we have about 30 million unemployed in the industralized world.

I would like to spend a few minutes discussing the National Energy Program because of the importance which appears to be given to it by the opposition in connection with our current difficulties. I would certainly be very pleased to see importance given to this program, if it were also combined with some rational, fair-minded understanding of what the program is all about. But, unfortunately, what we have seen and heard more often than not are biased and hysterical reactions based on misunderstandings or deliberate distortions of our energy policies and goals.

Conservative critics have portrayed Canada's economy as the all but devastated victim of an energy program designed to scare off foreign capital. In the few minutes available to me today, I would like to respond to this line of thinking or, should I say, to that brand of scaremongering.

Mr. Gamble: Scaremongering of your own.

Mr. Lalonde: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) stated that he would absolutely change the National Energy Program, and in this he was merely echoing the views of his backbenchers who were saying that they would scrap the National Energy Program. What do they mean? Do they mean that they would scrap the conservation programs and the $500 grant that we have given to over a million Canadian families in the last two years in order to help them convert, to insulate their homes and reduce the costs of heating their homes?

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Lalonde: I hear the Conservative opposition saying, "Yes". That is part of their program. Would they abolish the off-oil substitution program whereby we are paying people up to $800 to switch off oil to natural gas or to electricity, and the programs whereby they would expand the distribution of natural gas to the maritimes? I see that an hon. member from Vancouver is nodding his head and saying, "Yes". Would they scrap the hundreds of millions of dollars in the research and development provided under the National Energy Program? Some now say that they would not. Would they scrap the agreements with the provinces whereby we will have a secure and sure environment for energy investment in the oil and gas industry between now and 1986?

Mr. Epp: Marc, your nose is growing.

Mr. Lalonde: Would they scrap those agreements with the three western provinces and Nova Scotia? Would they do away with the tax breaks for the oil and gas industries, whereby the Government of Alberta and the Government of Canada have given $7.4 billion in tax breaks to the industry in the last two months?

Mr. Mayer: Oh, how much did you take away?

Mr. Lalonde: What would they do? Are they proposing higher prices for consumers than they are at the present time?

Mr. Gamble: Not as high as yours.

Mr. Lalonde: We know what they have in mind. What they have in mind is to attack our Canadianization program, and we saw the best evidence of that this afternoon in the speech by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Lalonde: That is what they have in mind. We heard the speech this afternoon in which the Leader of the Opposition attacked our Canadianization policies as being contrary to the best interests of Canadians. This criticism can be expected on the part of some of the foreign investors who gained particular advantages in the Canadian energy industry, operating for many years under a set of rules and incentives which inadvertently favoured their progress over that of smaller companies and prospective new companies in the industry. To expect that from the Conservative Party of Canada is rather strange. It is all the more strange that they are turning into mere echoes of foreign companies in this regard.

We have addressed that problem in our energy program with a new incentive system that opens up the oil and gas sector to more and more Canadian companies willing to invest in the search for oil and gas. However, we have ensured that the incentive to find oil and gas remains powerful for all companies, regardless of nationality. Let me review just a little of the background in this regard.

• (2030)

The basic reality facing Canadians as they entered the 1980s was this. They would have to pay more and more for their oil and gas and in the process would finance the vast majority of the costs of replacing what they used. Yet Canadians did not have anything resembling a fair chance to share in the benefits of that huge investment. It was not optional that they be afforded this opportunity. It was a prerequisite for the kind of vigorous growth that will be required in the petroleum industry in the years ahead.

It is the judgment of the Government of Canada and the vast majority of Canadians that an increase in domestic participation in the petroleum industry is a national priority. As of October 1980, no less than 72 per cent of upstream oil and gas revenues were accounted for by foreign-owned companies. The goal, which must sound ludicrously modest to most Americans and other foreigners, is 50 per cent Canadian ownership of these revenues and Canadian control of a significant number of the larger corporations by 1990.

I cannot emphasize too much that our goal allows for the foreign-owned sector of the petroleum industry to grow and prosper in real terms if it chooses to take advantage of the opportunities. Our policies are pro-Canadian, not anti-foreigner. I believe that the future course of development in our promising offshore and frontier regions will demonstrate particularly the accuracy of that description.

Let me repeat. Our policies are designed to ensure a fair share of the total benefits for Canadians, not just through direct participation as investors but also as providers of goods and services and across the broad range of socioeconomic impacts that major offshore developments can bring.

We want to minimize the costs of all kinds and maximize the benefits. It is a challenge calling for a comprehensive policy approach, and that is what we have provided. Our policies are in keeping with our international obligations. They are fair to Canadians, fair to foreigners and fair to all others who work and invest in Canada.

It is absolute rubbish to claim, for example, that the Canada Oil and Gas Act requires oil companies to give preference to Canadian suppliers. What Canadian suppliers want and need is not preference but an opportunity to be considered and to compete, not to be ignored as they have been in the past.

Another argument that we often hear from the Conservative Party and in some other circles is to the effect that Canada's prosperity has been primarily created by foreign investment and that any change in that supposed situation endangers Canada's economic future.

The fact is that Canadians have for many years provided the vast majority of the funds needed to finance the expansion of the energy industry and of the economy as a whole. These funds were in large measure provided to the extremely profitable growth of foreign subsidiaries in Canada.

In that context, it is interesting to note that even under the National Energy Program, the multinational oil companies are still doing very well in Canada. However, we know that the oil and gas industry had become a net exporter of capital in the latter part of the 1970s, long before the introduction of the National Energy Program. So, it was simply wrong to picture the oil and gas industry's dramatic improvement in financial fortunes during the 1970s as having anything to do with an inflow of foreign capital.

As I have said, we need foreign capital now and in the future, and we have ensured that the incentive will be there in the energy industry. However, we also need, and we are getting, a basic change in the participation of Canadian investors and Canadian companies in this industry. To obtain a fair share of the benefits, Canadians must share more in the direct ownership and, I might add, the risks of direct ownership of the oil and gas industry. That is what has begun to happen under the National Energy Program.

Of course, it is clear in retrospect that these have not been the easiest times for Canadian companies to be increasing their debt loads in direct response to the need for greater Canadian participation in the oil and gas industry. Oil price expectations have changed dramatically. Interest rates have remained higher than expected as a result of policies beyond the control of the Government of Canada. Markets for oil and gas have been softer than expected as a result of the general economic slowdown around the world.

To lay the blame for the effects of this kind of international financial and economic difficulty at the door of a Canadian energy program is transparent nonsense, yet it is propagated by the Conservative Party and some foreign critics of the program.

Thus we have the attempts to blame the Alsands shutdown and the National Energy Program while the Colony oil shale project in the United States, in which Exxon have invested a billion dollars, is abandoned for supposedly economic reasons. Again, the opposition blames the decline in over-all drilling in Canada on the National Energy Program while in the United States it is just the oil industry tightening its belt in the face of lower prices and soft markets.

There is a very serious need for perspective in these matters. I invite those interested to read a very revealing article in Fortune magazine of June 14, 1982, entitled "Getting Lean and Mean in the Oil Business". You would think you were reading the most depressing article in the Alberta Report, yet in the United States they do not have a national energy program. This article reports that the oil and gas industry in the United States is going through very difficult times indeed.

What we have in Canada at the present time is a situation where for both Canadian and foreign companies there is a very positive environment for investment in the oil and gas industry. For example, let me tell hon. members that the after-tax rate of return is more favourable in Canada than in most other oil areas.

A foreign company operating in Canada which is currently taxable will have a rate of return after-tax of 27.7 per cent. In Norway, the rate of return for a stand-alone project would be 18.3 per cent, 24.4 per cent in the United Kingdom and 21.6 per cent in the United States. That is the situation in terms of return on investment. If you compare the after-tax cut of $100 worth of exploration, it shows that a foreign company operating in the United States pays out $54, whereas the same company operating in Canada expends only $40.

• (2040)

The incentive for oil and gas exploration in Canada is much greater than in the United States because of better geological promise. In the United States 12 barrels of oil are found for each foot drilled. In Canada the discovery rate is 43 barrels per foot drilled. In the United States 200,000 cubic feet of gas are found per foot drilled. In Canada 860,000 cubic feet are found per foot drilled. That is the situation in which companies in the oil and gas field are invited to invest in this country. It is a good environment for Canadian companies, and it is interesting to note in particular the comments made by a large number of small Canadian companies in connection with the moves made by the Government of Alberta and the Government of Canada in the last two months. It is interesting to note that even for foreign-owned companies Canada is still a place where it is better to invest than almost any other place in the world. That is the situation today, and that is the situation which will be maintained under this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There may not necessarily be a House agreement, but I understand there is agreement between some hon. members that the Chair should recognize the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), followed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and then by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). Does any hon. member wish to comment, or may I proceed in that fashion?

Mr. Nielsen: D'accord.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was reminded today in an editorial in the Toronto Sun headed "Paul's Plan" of the maxim that it pays to advertise. It is somewhat ironic to get that reminder from a newspaper which has not always been supportive of government advertising in the past, but the statement is made that this government has not sufficiently advertised the Canada mortgage renewal plan. As I begin my comments I must take issue with that statement. The article says: "There hasn't been much about the mortgage assistance plan." I recall very well, as I am sure do other hon. members, the complaint right after the budget that newspaper advertisements were taken out and that empty space was held so that the government could advertise the plan the day following the budget announcement. I find it somewhat ironic that the accusation is made that that program has not been advertised sufficiently. I recall very well hon. members opposite flashing a newspaper advertisement entitled "Attention Home Owners". There was criticism of that advertising at the time.

What is more important is that the plan has been advertised since the majority of the members of this House supported it. There have been further widespread advertisements in newspapers across the country. We have repeated that newspaper ad and attempted to draw the plan to the attention of Canadians renewing their mortgages. I have distributed information, documents and kits on the plan to all hon. members on both sides of the House so that they could bring the plan to the attention of constituents who call their offices inquiring about it.

I take issue with the Toronto newspaper which says the plan has not been advertised enough. I know there has been some free publicity. It has not been tremendously positive all the time but, nonetheless, there have been newspaper comments—free publicity I suppose—in newspapers such as The Financial Post.

Obviously, I must accept the admonition that it pays to advertise, and we should talk more about government programs, but I do not accept the admonition in The Toronto Sun. The reason I say that is the article itself. The introduction to that criticism about lack of advertising contains the contention that only 400 people have responded to the plan. We know that some 1,400 people have responded to the plan. We know that about 1,000 people have been approved under the plan. We know that in response to the last advertisement, which was national, 7,766 people clipped brochures, wrote in and asked for further information on the plan, which has gone out. I know I have to publicize and advertise when, for example, the plan has been described—inadvertently—by the official critic in th Conservative opposition as being a plan providing a grant of some $300 when it provides $3,000. This afternoon the housing critic of the New Democratic Party again alleged that only about 300 people have made application under the plan when, as I have indicated, over 1,000 people have already been approved under the plan.

What is the background of the plan? I think it is worth reviewing and publicizing. In April, 1980, the Speech from the Throne of this government in starting its mandate said that the government would:

> —act to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided.

Those were the words. That is the way the program started. That was the commitment given by the government. The plan was to carry out that commitment.

Then there was the further assertion that this program could be introduced without the government's embarking upon a major subsidy program. I underline that because the thrust of my remarks will be that even though we are pressed to advertise and even though we are pressed to increase funding under this plan and other plans, the government must of course be practical and provide plans in a way that is efficient and takes into account all the demands upon the government for more funding for housing in these days.

Recently the critic for housing in the official opposition moved a motion under Standing Order 43 which I do not accept. That motion was:

> That this House directs the Minister of Finance to reinstitute the MURB provision and to designate those funds allocated for the Canada rental supply plan to non-profit and co-operative housing as part of his financial and economic statement to this House.

The minister has promised to make a statement to this House. A need has been demonstrated. I recall giving a reminder to hon. members on both sides of the House this afternoon about a response to constituents in very difficult circumstances. Last fall interest rates were over 20 per cent. Constituents wrote inquiring what could be done by me at the time of the budget and subsequently. I am very pleased that we have this program and that $350 million has been set aside by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). We have been able to respond to a number of Canadian families. Our response has been more than the individual requests of members in the House who have taken the time to write to me and to bring to my attention individual cases of constituents who have been hard pressed and who have asked for help. As I say, over 1,000 families have been assisted under this plan. It is a plan which addresses the difficulties of families. On renewal of a mortgage, when a family has paid up to 30 per cent of their income toward meeting principal, interest and taxes, they are then assisted by the government, either by way of deferral of interest or by way of an outright grant of up to $3,000. The plan had to be funded. The commitment was made in the Speech from the Throne. The finances were provided; $350 million were allocated by the Minister of Finance. We appreciate that that funding provided for that specific need might be in competition with requests of hon. members for funding for other needs identified by their constituents. Such needs are identified and requests are made by Canadians facing other difficulties in these difficult times. In difficult times and when resources are scarce, the government has been pressed for a plan and a way by which to respond which will provide some practical relief and some sensitivity to the needs of Canadians. However, at the same time the government must take into account that the funds allocated come from only one place, and that is the taxpayer. We all know that. We have indeed picked our priorities. We have set funds aside and attempted to publicize as best we can, within limits, the allocation of those funds and how they will be used. To those Canadians who do not benefit from specific plans I say I sincerely hope there is an understanding that Canadians who have sacrificed and worked to pay off their mortgages will support the government by being willing to support those in need. The government responds first to those who need help most. Roughly half the Canadian population rents and is not building up equity in shelter needs. We hope that those people will also find comfort in the fact that they are supporting Canadians who otherwise would face the prospect not only of losing their homes, but also of being in the position of looking for rental accommodation, which is difficult to find.

Finally, for those Canadians who are not paying up to 30 per cent of their income for accommodation, we hope that support under the Canada mortgage renewal plan will assist the people who would otherwise face losing their homes. This involves the government putting its priorities on the line, and stating what it feels is important in response to difficult times.

My critic in the Conservative Party said that the Minister of Finance should reintroduce the MURB program. As minister reporting to Parliament for Canada Mortgage and Housing, I do not promote that proposal. I do not think that it addresses those Canadians who are facing the most critical need. Amongst those, of course, are renters who are having difficulty finding accommodation. Is any Member of Parliament unaware of the publicity about people trying to find affordable accommodation? Rather than support the MURB program, which was primarily a tax incentive program for Canadians looking for means to shelter income, we chose to allocate the $350 million to people seeking rental accommodation.

The Canada rental supply plan was designed to produce 30,000 moderate rental units in Canada, one third of which would be designated to serve Canadians whose means are very limited and who are therefore supported by this government and many provincial governments, on a rent geared to income basis. We feel that this plan responds to those people who would have to rent, to people who need support to meet their rental payments and to the handicapped. Five per cent of all those units are designed for handicapped persons. We believe that program is a much more effective way of serving people who have actual and pressing needs.

I cannot support the motion of the housing critic of the Conservative Party that we return to the MURB program. We do not see that as a good course of action at this time when resources are scarce. By definition it means that we would have to decide where the assistance should go first. We believe that the government's initiatives through the Canada renewal plan and the Canada rental supply plan serves another objective which is to provide jobs quickly—although not as quickly as we would wish—in the construction industry. I wish the House had responded to my request last December that the legislation be passed right away. In that case, the plans could have been in place sooner. The rental supply plan will generate 30,000 units of housing accommodation. In turn, that will generate at least 60,000 person years, directly and indirectly, in construction.

In this way the government is addressing priority social needs as well as addressing the problem of employment in the trades. Employment has been severely undermined by the fact that the public is not buying property at current interest rates and by the fact that in the United States, which is our biggest market for lumber products, housing is perking along at about 50 per cent of the rate in Canada.

These plans not only serve the needy, they serve to stimulate the economy, and they serve to provide jobs in an area which all of us know requires attention.

The government has taken other initiatives in the housing field since the budget. I can argue, and I will demonstrate, that our concern is for people in need. In our response to people in need, we have supported employment. As a matter of fact, the thrust of the opposition's motion is that we should be addressing that very problem. And we are, Mr. Speaker. The Canada home renovation plan is an example. It is designed to provide up to a $3,000 grant for home improvements to households who earn less than $30,000 per year. There is a graduated reduction from the amount of grant available as the income goes up to $48,000.

The effect of this plan is to help home owners who had difficulty financing renovations at current interest rates. It will accomplish two other things as well. First of all, it will create an additional 10,000 person years in the construction industry, which is so hard pressed. As well, the $3,000 grant is conditional upon individuals spending at least $6,000. That has the benefit of levering funds from the private sector to support the trades that need employment at this time. That is an effective program and it has been well received. Many communities across the country have responded, and at this point the plan is almost totally subscribed.

The improvement in the Canada home insulation plan was designed with the same thoughts in mind, to support people in need of assistance, with a $500 grant. The plan is now available to people whose homes were constructed up to 1971, which is a move from the 1961 deadline. In addition to serving the conservation of energy, that plan will employ 20,000 people across the country.

I began my comments with reference to the criticism which appeared today in The Toronto Sun that reminds us that it pays to advertise. I am taking this opportunity to respond to the criticism and comments made by hon. members opposite by pointing out that these plans are available. They will serve renovation needs, the purchase of homes, the finding of rental accommodation and assistance to families that have been most severely affected by high interest rates. These plans are designed, in place, and can serve Canadians. The resources are there but they have not been fully utilized. I think I have demonstrated that the use of these plans will have the following effects: they will put Canadians to work in the trades; generate employment for people who are skilled in these trades but unemployed; they will bring new money into the economy, or should I say out of the banks, and put it to work generating employment in these trades.

I believe my comments fall in line with the thrust of the latter part of the motion put by the opposition today, that there has to be co-operation. What I am asking for, Mr. Speaker, is recognition and co-operation by all members who sought the assistance of the government for some of these plans, in order to take advantage of these plans so as to respond to their constituents who may not be aware of them, as The Toronto Sun says today. I believe in using our resources in a way which will first of all serve the needy, and secondly, support the economy and get people back to work. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that kind of co-operation is a common goal shared by all members of the House irrespective of their political philosophy or commitments.

Mr. Nielsen: Are you going to vote for the motion?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the speech we got from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) this afternoon was the usual defensive and apologetic speech we have come to expect from him in the last couple of years. It is a far cry from the kind of speeches he gave and legislation he used to support when he was the minister of labour and then the minister of national health and welfare and helped to bring into being the Canada Pension Plan and the medical insurance plan which have brought such great benefits to the people of Canada. In recent years he has become one of the most conservative members in the present government. He has become the complete captive of his officials who have consistently given him the wrong advice, advice which has produced the highest unemployment rate in the history of Canada, the highest rate of inflation, and a situation which is becoming worse almost daily.

In his speech this afternoon the minister brought forth figures with which he tried to demonstrate that, while we were having difficulties in this country, we were doing quite well as compared to other countries.

We decided to accept the challenge in that argument and obtain figures showing the per capita income of Canadians in 1968, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was first elected, and for 1980, just to see what has happened. We were not completely successful but we were able to get from the United Nations 1979-80 year book the per capita income figures for a number of western industrialized countries for the years 1970 and 1978, the figures are very interesting, Mr. Speaker, and disprove completely the minister's contentions this afternoon. In 1970 the per capita income of Canadians was the third highest in the western world, behind Sweden and the U.S. In 1978 we were eighth, behind Switzerland, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, the U.S. and The Netherlands. Not only that, Japan had an average per capita income in 1970 of just half of Canada's, and they had almost caught up with us by 1978. I should point out that I am not including OPEC countries such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, as the Prime Minister accused the leader of my party of doing some weeks ago. I am talking about the industrialized countries.

When the minister says we are doing quite well, Mr. Speaker, he is just dead wrong. He has admitted that we are in a recession, one deeper and more prolonged than any forecaster had predicted. That is not quite true. It is deeper and more prolonged than the minister's so-called experts had predicted. There were other experts who had predicted precisely what has happened. The minister says our problems are due to high interest rates and high inflation which are stifling investment. That is true, Mr. Speaker. He said there are no easy solutions to our problems, and that is true. But then he said the first priority of the government is to create more jobs, and to do that we must get our inflation down. That is what the government has been saying for the last six years, and to achieve that end, between the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, we have had high interest rates. How are we going to improve the economy and get people to invest in productive capacity when companies are not making profits, when they are working at less than 70 per cent of capacity and paying 18 per cent and 20 per cent interest? How are we going to improve the economy when interest paid on savings is running anywhere between 13 per cent and 16 per cent for term deposits, and when last year's Canada Savings Bonds paid 19.5 per cent interest? People who have money to put into savings are not completely stupid. They are not going to invest their money, even in blue-chip companies, when they will get at best 6 per cent or 7 per cent, and the value of their stock has dropped in the last couple of years by probably 25 per cent or more.

As usual, Mr. Speaker, the minister had no real advice to the Canadian people. The Prime Minister has been saying lately that we have to tighten our belts. What are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance saying? They are saying that Canadians should be satisfied with wage or salary increases of 6 per cent or 7 per cent. Mr. Speaker, the cost of living has risen in the last year by almost 11.5 per cent. So what the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are saying to the Canadian people is that they should accept a reduction in their standard of living of 5 per cent or 6 per cent. They are not going to do that voluntarily, and they should not. If you could persuade people to reduce their standard of living and purchasing power by 5 per cent or 6 per cent, at a time when industry is working at less than 70 per cent of capacity, all you would do would be to make the position of Canadian industry and business even worse. So, Mr. Speaker, I say that the few proposals we got from the Minister of Finance really offered no hope to the Canadian people.

The same can be said for the speech by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). He said we need to produce a feeling of confidence for the Canadian people. I say to him, as I said a few moments ago to the Minister of Finance, how can you get Canadians to have confidence in our economy, how can you get them to invest in productivity improvements in Canadian plants and industry, when they can see that those plants are now working so far below capacity? Why should people invest in new plants and equipment when industry cannot sell the goods it now produces with existing plants and equipment. Why should they invest in Canadian industry when they can put their money into government bonds or term deposits and make substantially more than they would by putting it into even the best of the blue-chip companies?

Then the Leader of the Opposition said that we need to have government restraint. He was very careful not to indicate where a Conservative government would cut back. In other words, where the restraint would come from. Some Conservative Members of Parliament have not been as careful as the Leader of the Opposition was today. Some Conservative members since November, 1980, have not infrequently expressed admiration for the kinds of policies which are being enacted in the United States under the leadership of President Reagan. Let us look at those policies for which, I think, some Conservatives have a great deal of admiration. Let us just take a look at what President Reagan has done to get restraint in the American economy. He has cut back on medicare and medicaid. He has cut back very drastically on the food stamp program, which is the closest thing the Americans have to our family allowance system. He has cut back on financial assistance to American states and cities. He has cut funding to American universities. He has cut back support for research and development and he has urged cutbacks in the American social security benefits.

If that is the kind of restraint that Conservative Members of Parliament believe in, they ought to be honest with the Canadian people.

Mr. Gamble: You should, too.

Mr. Orlikow: I think the Conservatives ought to tell Canadians that that is how they would cut back on government expenditures. If they did that, I am certain the Canadian people would not want to support parties which advocate those kinds of programs.

Mr. Gamble: What about the giveaways?

Mr. Orlikow: I wish the hon. member would rise in his seat in his own time and tell us which are the giveaway programs. Is medicare a giveaway program?

Mr. Gamble: What about foreign aid?

Mr. Orlikow: Is social security a giveaway program?

An hon. Member: What about the CBC?

Mr. Orlikow: Is hospital insurance a giveaway program? Those are the kinds of giveaway programs that I want to continue and expand. If hon. members want to cut back on those, they ought to tell us.

Unemployment has reached a crisis situation. Unemployment is at a 40-year high. Some economists, either tenured economists in our Canadian universities or economists with good paying, secure jobs in the Department of Finance or even economists with the Economic Council, are telling us that we should not worry about unemployment, that the situation is not very serious. We are told that we are into the post-industrial age, and we have to accept the fact that our manufacturing industries will gradually disappear. I wish some of those so-called experts would talk to some of my constituents.

One of my constituents whom I met last week came to this country from Portugal in 1959. He came to Canada because he had been told and had read that this was a great country. He came here prepared to work, and he did work for 13 years for the Swift Canadian packing plant in Winnipeg. Swift is a multinational company. It is one of the giants in the food industry. After working there for 13 years, Swift Canadian closed its plant in Winnipeg and put 600 people out of work. This constituent of mine got a job with another Canadian giant. This time his job was with the CPR as a machinist's helper. He was doing a good job, but after two and a half years, because of a slowdown in the economy, he was laid off. I wish those so-called experts who think unemployment is not very serious would talk to my constituents and to thousands of others who, through no fault of their own, are no longer working.

As the Minister of Finance said this afternoon, we have 1.25 million people unemployed. But those are official figures. The minister and other members of the House know that those figures include only those people unemployed who are still actively looking for work. There are areas in Canada; in Newfoundland, in Cape Breton, in the Gaspé and in the Interlake area in Manitoba—where it is no use looking for work. People are not looking for work in those areas any more and they are not counted in the unemployment figures. We have probably another 300,000 or 400,000 unemployed, if they were included in the statistics.

Bankruptcies have increased by almost 40 per cent. We now have 800 to 900 businesses that go bankrupt every month. Probably for every one that goes bankrupt there are four or five businesses that close up voluntarily before having to declare bankruptcy. It is no longer only the unskilled people in the slow growth areas who are unemployed. Today, we find it is no longer only the small, inefficient companies that are going bankrupt. Today we find that vacancies for accountants, executives, engineers, scientists and other professionals have decreased by 47 per cent in the last year. University graduates are finding it more and more difficult to get jobs. Statistics Canada tells us that 32,000 managers and administrators are unemployed. I am sure that every Member of Parliament knows some person in his or her constituency who has a middle or senior executive job who has worked 25 or 30 years for a company and suddenly, now that he is in the 50 to 60 year age group, he is either out of work, laid off or the company is closing up. The jobless rate for this occupational group, which he always thought was immune to unemployment, is now running at 3.5 per cent. This means that unemployment is no longer a problem only for the lower-income groups but also for middle and high-income groups.

Bankruptcies are no longer a problem for just small and inefficient companies, we are seeing more and more well established companies, companies which operated successfully during the Great Depression of the 1930s, which are now going bankrupt. Our large companies are finding it increasingly difficult to face these difficult times. A recent article in The Wall Street Journal states that Massey is edging closer to joining the bankruptcy list. Analysts at Merrill Lynch Royal Securities published a report on mining listing seven companies as "near the edge", with financial conditions that are, or could become, precarious. These companies include Brenda, Denison, Falconbridge Nickel, Hudson Bay Mining, Inco, Sherritt Gordon and Teck. This is not at all surprising when one realizes that interest payments are killing these companies.

Mr. Huntington: That is right.

Mr. Orlikow: According to financial reports, 66 per cent of all corporate cash flow is now going into paying interest. That compares to 25 per cent of all corporate cash flow going into interest payments just a year ago.

I presume members of the Conservative Party are chuckling because they believe in high interest rates.

Mr. McDermid: Don't be silly.

Mr. Orlikow: Last year, Massey-Ferguson paid out 187 per cent of its cash flow in interest payments. Global Communications paid out 167 per cent. Those companies will not be able to continue much longer.

We have been told again and again that we have to get our inflation rate down. We have an agreement between the federal government and the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan which says that in the next 13 months the price of a barrel of oil in Canada will go up by $10.25. Every dollar increase in the price of a barrel of oil adds one half per cent to the cost of living. We are looking at an increase of close to 5 per cent in the cost of living in the next year because of the price of energy.

How can we get the cost of living down when that kind of thing is occurring? Payments of unemployment insurance benefits are at an all time high. They increased in March of this year by 48 per cent over March, 1981. From city after city we are receiving reports of sharp increases in welfare. This is happening because many of the people who are unemployed have now exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. The process is accelerating—more and more people who were laid off last year will exhaust their benefits, and then they will go on welfare.

We in our party believe that it is absolutely insane to pay hundreds of thousands of people who are willing and able to work. These people could produce many of the things we need in the country, yet they are paid to sit at home and to draw unemployment insurance benefits or welfare.

In the few moments remaining I should like to make some concrete suggestions as to how to deal with the emergency we are in now. I would like to list a few important steps which we believe should be taken. We believe that the government should scrap its high interest policy. It should admit that the policies followed on the advice of the deputy minister of finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have been a failure. We need a made-in-Canada interest rate which would be much closer to the actual increase in the cost of living than the present 5 per cent to 6 per cent gap. We need an emergency housing program which would revive the forest, construction, furniture and appliance industries. We believe that $500 million should be invested to produce 50,000 more homes than we are now producing this year and that that would produce 100,000 jobs. We want the government to bring in a tax cut of $2 billion which would essentially go to low and middle-income Canadians.

Mr. Kelly: Reaganomics.

Mr. Orlikow: No, not Reaganomics. President Reagan believes in giving the reductions in income tax to top income earners. That is the exact opposite to what we would want.

We believe that Canadians need a reduction in income tax to meet increased costs of living. We believe that that would produce 50,000 new jobs. We want policies to get the manufacturing industry, which in recent years has been cut to ribbons, back into production. We believe that the government should do these things and that these policies would provide jobs for Canadians. Perhaps they would not provide jobs for every Canadian because we live in a world which is going through a recession. But must we accept the fact that a million and a quarter Canadians need to be unemployed? We believe that we need a policy of full employment rather than the kinds of policies which we have had from the government.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the minister responsible for housing, I thought I should take a minute to read the motion which we are debating this evening. It reads:

> That this House approves the government taking immediate action to lower interest rates, stimulate production, investment and jobs, strengthen the dollar and lower the rate of inflation.

Lowering interest rates is the only single made-in-Canada benefit which can have a major impact that will save the economy. No one questions that interest rates will be lower once the economy collapses. Do we want interest rates to be once again at 5 per cent with no one able to borrow? That is what we are heading into if we continue along with the government policies that are in place today. Thousands more Canadian people will be broken in pocket book and in spirit if the government and its bureaucracy continue to impose this bookkeeping type of economic discipline on the average Canadian. Admittedly, material expectation levels have to be brought down, but does the government also want to destroy the expectations for work, achievement and security?

The only difference of opinion between the government and a large majority of Canadians is whether interest rates are to be brought down now or whether many more Canadians are to be added to the roll call of casualties of present policies. The benefits of lower interest rates are many. First, we would have more competitive production and exports from our industry. We would also, with lower interest rates, be able once again to start building and modernizing new plants with new investment. Housing would once again become viable in this great country. There would be a substantial reduction in government borrowing costs. We would be able to remove that terrible burden from the backs of Canadian taxpayers. There would be substantial increases in tax revenues to the government if we lowered interest rates. Also there would be lower transfer payments for unemployment and welfare costs. We would have, as a result of rising revenues to the government, a lower federal deficit.

One of the two principal negatives of lower interest rates, which are quoted by all those associated directly or indirectly with present government policies, is that they will cause more inflation. I could hardly believe my ears today when I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) say in the House that lower interest rates will cause more inflation. To the people on the government side and their advisers who keep saying this, I say that the opposite is the case. High interest rates have not decreased inflation in the country. They delivered lower inflation in the United States, but the cause of high interest rates there was the Eurodollar call on its reserves. Their problem is not our problem. We can control our own destiny if we manage our affairs properly. Throughout the world the nations with the lowest interest rates have the lowest rates of inflation. The literature, the statistics and magazines are full of proof in that regard. It is logical that businesses being subject to high interest rates have higher interest costs which have to be incorporated into their prices?

The second negative we keep hearing from the government and its advisers against low interest rates is that they cause a weakening of the currency. I heard the minister say this in the House today when he spoke. I say again to hon. members of the government that the opposite is the case, for around the world the nations with low interest rates have strong currencies. All we have to do is to look at Switzerland and Japan. Switzerland has an interest rate of about 6 per cent and Japan has an interest rate of about 7.75 per cent; both have strong currencies. To some considerable degree their strong currencies are the direct consequence of the normal function of future exchange markets. Why do we in Canada not learn that?

Now I should like to move to the part of the motion to "stimulate production, investment and jobs". Over time we Canadians as a whole live only as well as the total which we produce. To achieve our previous standard of living and to maintain the promise and opportunity this very rich and great land offers, it is necessary to have all of us increase our expectations for work, achievement and security. Increased production, investment and jobs require continuing and increased purchasing power and desire in the domestic market, particularly through productive investment. It is no good having people with savings and capital sitting on 15 per cent and 20 per cent rates of interest. The need for that money is out in the creative areas which create jobs, modernize plants and deliver wealth. Increased production also requires export markets. Both domestic and export markets reap the maximum benefits from long-term financing at reasonable cost. In other words, lower interest rates and demands are placed on the cash flows of the productive elements of the nation.

Why has this Liberal government moved the country to short-term financing where mortgages are on a one-year term, at a floating rate and very difficult to renew for most people?

To strengthen the dollar we must address the policies of the Bank of Canada. One of my colleagues spoke about that tonight. I believe that this is where we are going wrong.

• (2130)

To enjoy confidence and stability and to reduce inflation we must have a strong dollar. This means that the Bank of Canada must have undoubted reserves to cover foreseeable obligations. In the long run, these reserves will have to be earned through the export of goods and services or the sale of Canadian assets. I would prefer the former.

Prudent management of our short-term position, combined with long-term borrowings, can give us breathing room for long-term correction, if we have the will. Devaluation makes for little improvement in exports. It only causes significant further inflation.

My reading tells me that for each cent the Canadian dollar drops we increase the upward pressure on the cost-price index by one third per cent to one half per cent.

Since the Minister of Finance was asking many questions of my leader today, I will ask him some questions. What is wrong with the Bank of Canada borrowing adequate funds internationally on a medium to long-term basis to maintain undoubted reserves and to permit orderly repayment of private and corporate borrowings? The nationalization program of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the follow-through from the private sector has cost this country some $18 billion to $19 billion of call on its reserves. We now have to address that. This would not increase our over-all external debt. The debits and credits would balance.

Another question: why does the Bank of Canada not maintain a forward exchange market in the Canadian dollar at levels which will eliminate undue pressure on domestic interest rates?

Why does the government budget not provide something like $2 billion a year for the Bank of Canada operating deficit which could be recovered many, many times from the tax on profits on increased revenues within our productive sector and from reduced UIC payments? I would suggest that the factor might be as high as thirty to one on that.

Why does the Minister of Finance not increase the withholding tax to 30 per cent on all foreign interest payments from Canada on loans with less than a 60-month term?

I have another question. Why does the Minister of Finance not introduce penalty taxes with respect to price and wage increases in order to break the current inflation spiral?

All of these things would take the heat off the currency flows and would allow the Canadian government and the Bank of Canada to lower interest rates. We will never get back into the international game unless we start managing interest rates and our economic health. If that is what we as Canadians want, it is time that the government took action.

I have offered these questions because I think they have to be asked, examined and answered. The Keynesian economics are not addressing the rigidities which once again come into our national lives and economies. These rigidities have to be addressed if we are to resolve the present downturn in the business cycle.

Let me now turn to the other part of the opposition motion which concerns inflation and its reduction. This is really public enemy number one. It is behind the interest rate dilemma that we face today and the correction which we are going through, which is very painful indeed.

If we stimulate the economy it will be necessary to have some restraint. Otherwise, we have suffered this pain for nothing. In my opinion, we will need a tax-based policy, as just suggested. We also need an addition to a pact, or a social contract with organized labour, with some form of price restraint so that recovery from the bad days of this recession will not be too sudden and set the inflationary spiral in motion again. I believe that is an essential element of long-term recovery.

If the government continues its present path millions more will suffer as a result of a complete collapse. It will take ten or more years to recover. I have lived through the thirties. Not everyone in the House is of that age. It was rough. That is why I appreciate everything that this country has given me and others, and the benefits that have attracted so many new Canadians to this country. It is all at stake once again, but we do have the knowledge that we can crack the nut if we have the will.

These bookkeeping methods of the government and the Bank of Canada are doing more damage to this country than a massive physical catastrophe, for when you have an earthquake or some other disaster, the people come together to work and somehow get organized into some kind of disciplined form and know exactly what to do to rebuild what once was. However, today the whimper and the cry at large within this country is, "What can I do? What is going on?"

The other night there was a simple little rally in my riding. It normally would have attracted 90 to 150 people. There were over 700 people there asking, "What is going on? What can we do to help? Is there no way out?"

I have asked some questions here tonight in the few minutes I have and have made some suggestions that somehow or other will break through that impasse of the Keynesian economists who cannot, will not, and are not addressing the rigidities of supply and the reaction to supply-demand that we need to get back to.

We talk about an oil surplus. The oil surplus is ridiculous. There is no oil surplus in this world. If one ever saw an example of the supply-demand working, it was when the people started driving smaller cars, turning their thermostats down and reducing consumption. As a result supply came up and world price dropped. Why not go back to that fundamental natural law instead of trying to mismanage it?

With no government leadership and direction, the only positive action that is taking place in Canada today is an outflow of our intellectual talents, the enterpreneurial talents that risk, build and create jobs and an outflow of capital from the country. I just read that over $18 billion, I believe, of private capital has left Canada this year. What a national tragedy! I see the entrepreneurs, the skills, the talents in the engineering field and the business field packing up to go south where the free enterprise system will survive alongside the corporate giants because their laws address behaviour and they have competition laws that allow free enterprise to survive. That is a national tragedy. The present government policies are destroying the country from within. We are destroying ourselves mentally and spiritually all because of bookkeeping which causes high interest rates done by those still seeped in Keynesian technology. That day has gone. There must be a new dawn.

I attended an international economic conference and very senior economists were there. I have listened to economists debating in this country. It is a debating society. They do not have answers. Somehow or other we, as a people and as a government, must start opening up our minds to these new management technologies and techniques available within the Bank of Canada. I would ask hon. members of the government to read Hansard and to read some of those questions I have asked in these few remarks tonight and ask why these things cannot be done, because very good international banking people are telling me that it is entirely possible. That is the way in which a country like Switzerland operates. It is not exactly the way Japan operates, but it operates on those fundamental principles. A low interest rate is the only way we will bring down inflation in this country . We must get ourselves ready for the GATT era, and if we are to do so, we must start changing tax laws, tax policies and monetary policies which interfere with the creation and the production of work and jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: In this country we have the ability, the talent, the technology, the universities, the people and the will to do it. But we must move our attitudes into the twentieth century. Those of us in organized groups must stop demanding more from the system than the system has to offer. If the private sector is to survive and blossom again, the managers and owners in the private sector will have to realize that those enterprises are there to serve employees, suppliers and consumers. Our tax laws must deliver us back to addressing tax costs, not profits. If we are to move into the area of free trade, a country like Canada can no longer continue under a customs union which favours one part at the expense of others. But we can address that if we get our act together and move on proper, creative, new economic thrusts which can take us into the twenty-first century.

That is where it is at, and that is what our young people coming out of our schools and universities today want from this government, from this Parliament. That is what we must deliver. The challenge is ours, yet we play around in stupid, little, narrow, political games, trying to knife each other when the country is going right down the drain with these socialist, old-fashioned, Keynesian, new, international world order policies and thrusts. Look at Britain. It nationalized industry after industry. The payrolls of some of those manufacturing industries were larger than their gross revenues, and they are finished. That country has had the hard struggle of returning those out to bottom-line management. I keep coming back to what Professor Florey had to say. The government controls the private sector. No one controls the public sector. So why continue with these nationalization policies? I say to Your Honour and others on that side, vote against this motion and you vote against the lowering of interest rates, which we can do as a country if we determine our own style.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: Vote against this motion and you vote against the stimulation of production of goods and jobs which are desperately needed. Vote against this motion, and you are voting against a stronger dollar. All of these things are the key elements to a lower rate of inflation which is the future of our kids and of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 58 (10).

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask whether the House might consider unanimous consent to allow the vote which has just been taken to apply to the next three votes, since I believe that the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party will be voting the same way in the next three votes as they have in the one just preceding.

Madam Speaker: Does the House give its unanimous consent to allow the vote which has just been taken to apply to the next three votes?

Mr. Nielsen: If that is the case, with the New Democratic Party voting the same way as we are voting, that is acceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Therefore, the vote which has just been taken applies to Votes 6, 7 and 8, I believe. I will check.

The next question is as follows—

Mr. Deans: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sorry, but I understood that it would apply to votes Nos. 7, 8 and 9. I thought we had just voted on No. 6, or, in other words, up to Vote No. 30, in the amount of $245,758,000 under the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Madam Speaker: We have just voted on No. 5 in the amount of $113,944,000. That would apply. This page was marked "six" and this one is "seven". Therefore, it applies to Nos. 7, 8 and 9.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 5, ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 5, in the amount of $113,944,000 under the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources—Energy Program—Operating expenditures, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Vote 1 agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might again seek the unanimous consent of the House to consider Vote No. 11 to have the same count as No. 10, and to consider Votes Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 20, and 22 the same as Vote No. 9.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House give its unanimous consent that this motion apply to the votes mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain?

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would go through those numbers again?

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I would like to have the following consideration, that Vote No. 11, Vote No. 17 and Vote No. 21 be considered the same as Vote No. 10.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I am afraid that was a different proposition than the one I heard the first time. If the hon. member would get his act together and make a proposal, I will consider it.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I am trying hard not to play games. Let me make the proposal I made before, that Vote No. 11 be considered the same as Vote No. 10, that Vote Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 20 and 22 be considered the same as Vote No. 9.

Madam Speaker: That is not quite the same proposal as the first one. Perhaps we can repeat it and hon. members might agree to it. It is that Vote No. 11 be considered the same as Vote No. 12—

Some hon. Members: Ten.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the vote we have just taken was Vote No. 10. I would like to suggest for consideration that Vote No. 11 be considered—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry. The vote we have just taken was Vote No. 11. It was credit L40 in the amount of $299,100,000. That is the vote we have just taken.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I am very sorry, but could I just ask for guidance. What became of Vote No. 10?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member give me two seconds. The numbers on this page do not correspond to the numbers I am getting when I am proposing the motions. I will just straighten this out. My memory serves me better than this sheet. We have just voted on credit L40 in the amount of $229,100,000.

Mr. Nielsen: That was $299 million.

Madam Speaker: Two hundred and ninety-nine million. That was No. 10.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, this is the last remaining element of control that this Parliament has over expenditures. It is sufficiently important to exert that control by voting separately on each one of these motions.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 10, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 10, in the amount of $1,119,000 under the Department of Finance—Inspector General of Banks—Program expenditures, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members. Shall we dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: Are members playing games with me? Shall we dispense with the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Johnston) which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Vote 10 agreed to.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have been voting now for an hour and a half, and at the current rate we have another hour and a half of voting. Perhaps the House might want to rise for ten minutes and take—

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I want to be sure there are no mistakes on the record as far as any of these votes are concerned which, as the House is aware, are very important. Just now, there seems to be some confusion between your numbering of the various votes and that done by the representative of the New Democratic Party. I will try not to confuse the issue further, but it seems that the request made just now by the New Democratic Party members, which received the unanimous consent of the House, was to have the three votes following the one that had just been called considered as having been agreed to in the same proportion. Now, according to your numbering, one vote appears to have been omitted, and to make sure that is not the case, I would like to at least clarify what has already been done, and I shall not be referring to the remaining votes.

I understand, according to your own numbering, that the last vote was Vote No. 11. Please stop me if I am wrong.

Madam Speaker: This is Vote No. 12, but on those sheets it is a different number. According to my numbering, it is Vote No. 12, that is, Vote 10 in the amount of $1,119,000.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we are talking about Vote 10, Department of Finance, and the vote recorded immediately before Vote 10 was Vote L40, Department of External Affairs. What I would like to clear up is that the four votes preceding Vote L40, External Affairs, are deemed to have been agreed to by the House in the same proportion as when we voted on Vote 1, Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. If that is agreed, the record is correct and I have nothing further to add. But if there is no unanimous consent, I would like to make sure that all votes following Vote 1 of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have been voted by the House.

Madam Speaker: Just to get things straight, I have the impression that the votes as numbered by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) correspond exactly to what the House seems to have agreed to do.

● (2330)

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, as you know, I sent you a note, and the reason I rose the last time was for the same purpose. My understanding of the votes to date is that this evening we voted on the amendment of the New Democratic Party and on the main motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Then we voted on the following votes: vote 40 in the amount of $5,623,000 under Agriculture; vote 1 in the amount of $94,142,000 under Consumer and Corporate Affairs; vote 5 in the amount of $8,871,000 under Ministry of State for Economic Development; vote 1 in the amount of $17,529,000 Energy, Mines and Resources; vote 5 in the amount of $113,944,000 Energy, Mines and Resources; vote 25 in the amount of $262 million, Energy, Mines and Resources; vote 30 in the amount of $245,758,000, Energy, Mines and Resources, and then we voted, for some reason, on vote L40 in the amount of $299,100,000.

I followed it very closely, Madam Speaker, and my understanding to date was that we did not yet vote on vote 30 in the amount of $43,500,000.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely right, and that is why I rose to ask the unanimous consent of the House, because the votes that were called also cover Vote 30 in the amount of $43,500,000, Department of External Affairs. If there is no unanimous consent, we shall request a separate vote.

Madam Speaker: Does the House give its unanimous consent to the vote called for No. 6, that is, Vote No. 1, also applying to Vote No. 10, that is, Vote 30, in the amount of $43,500,000, External Affairs? Is there unanimous consent for the vote as recorded for Vote No. 6 to apply to Vote No. 10 as well?

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I should like to propose that vote L40 in the amount of $299,100,000 under External Affairs be applied to vote No. 30 as well, in the amount of $43,500,000 under External Affairs.

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker, I think the basic difficulty is that the Chair is working from a numbered list that does not appear on the Order Paper. Everything is confused thereafter. I suggest that the Chair call vote No. 5, department such and such, and that that be the only title to a particular vote.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) referred to an enumeration which corresponded to the one I had. That is why I answered him, referring to that enumeration. However, I quite agree that the best way to do it is to call the vote.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is asking unanimous consent for the vote for credit L40 in the amount of $299,100,000 for the Department of External Affairs in the proportions registered by the House to be applied to the vote for credit No. 30 in the amount of $43,500,000, Department of External Affairs. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I am afraid that I have that vote recorded as 144 yeas and 126 nays. Everybody else seems to have come to the conclusion that the vote was not taken. If the House is in such confusion that they want to vote twice on the same motion, we are prepared to vote again.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, my understanding is that at 25 minutes to 12 this group of rational individuals is set to take about two more hours to vote, if we proceed in this way. I should like to make a serious proposal, to which I hope all parties will agree, and that is that we set aside five minutes for the House leaders of the three parties to organize the vote. Instead of taking two more hours, it could be all over in 25 minutes and we could come back fresh and work in a civilized way tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, before considering the suggestion by the hon. member, the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), I wish to say that an attempt was made well before the House started to vote, and our suggestion was turned down. Before considering his request, however, I would like to clear up the confusion about the vote on Vote 30 in the amount of $43,500,000, Department of External Affairs.

The Chair asked for the unanimous consent of the House. We said yes, the New Democratic Party members say yes and the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) seems to be saying that if we have to vote twice, we are going to vote twice. Perhaps he could say yes or no and if it is no, we can vote on that particular vote. Let us clear this up once and for all.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party and his supporters may be perfectly willing to dispense in such an easy fashion with the last vestige of any control or order over the expenditures of the House of Commons. We are not. We are bound by the Standing Orders that were altered in 1969, to follow this ridiculous process—and I agree that it is ridiculous. Nonetheless, those were the changes that were forced down our throats at that time by closure by that government. We are not prepared to dispense so easily and cavalierly with this right of control over the public purse, which is the last function that the opposition has—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I cannot allow that to pass. The facts of the matter are that we have already followed a practice not unlike this one in the past, and common sense tells us that where there is the opportunity to expedite the business of the House without forgoing any of the rights of Parliament, then common sense should prevail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: May I ask the House again if the House gives its unanimous consent, as was suggested by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), that the vote as recorded in the proportions recorded for credit L40 in the amount of $299,100,000—that the proportion of the votes recorded be applied to vote 30, External Affairs, in the amount of $43,500,000?

Mr. Nielsen: I say again, Madam Speaker, as I said before, that the vote recorded for vote L40 under the Department of External Affairs is 170 yeas and 100 nays. The vote that I have recorded for vote 30 under Department of External Affairs is 144 yeas and 126 nays, so of course we cannot consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: In the circumstances, Madam Speaker, because of this infantile behaviour and this inability to say a straightforward yes, I request a separate vote on Vote 30 in the amount of $43,500,000.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the House leader of the Liberal Party and the Liberal government may regard Parliament as infantile—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Clark: We have faced his attempts to bulldoze democracy before. We did not stand down then and—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2340)

Mr. Clark: We will not allow the government House leader to treat this Parliament with that contempt.

Madam Speaker: The confusion comes from the fact that we are not sure that the vote recorded previously applied to Vote No. 30 in the amount of $43,500,000. Therefore, we have simply decided that a vote as recorded previously applied to that one. We have not voted formally on this particular vote. Therefore, there is no problem for the Chair to put it to the House and we will have a separate vote on it.

Mr. Johnston, seconded by Mr. Pinard, moves that Vote 30, in the amount of $43,500,000 under the Department of External Affairs—

Some hon. Members: Out! Out!

Madam Speaker: Order. The Chair will again put the question to the House, is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Out!

Madam Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is everyone settled down?

Mr. Johnston, seconded by Mr. Pinard, moves that Vote 30, in the amount of $43,500,000—the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, I have been trying with very great difficulty, as I am sure have all hon. members and the Chair, to follow these events tonight. But I do rise to point out to you, Madam Speaker, that what you are reading does not conform with the Order Paper of Monday, June 21, page XXII which says:

June 2, 1982—That Vote 30, in the amount of $250,000—

I am wondering, Madam Speaker—

An hon. Member: We are on page XIX.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, someone says we are only exhibiting our ignorance. I have to say that most of the members, certainly the public, are now long lost, and I would ask that you make it very clear what vote we are voting on. In the interest of some common sense around here, perhaps Your Honour could relate what you are referring to to the document which most members have in front of them because they do not have the advantage of your list. That is not too much to ask for, Madam Speaker, and I say this in order to help you in a difficult moment.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member. It seems to me that the question we are voting on is what is put to the House and what I read to the House. If that, for some reason, does not correspond with the Order Paper—

Mr. Lambert: Oh, now just a minute.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: We are not going to have that.

Madam Speaker: What was the hon. member's reference, because this corresponds exactly? We have page 1982 of the Order Paper and Notices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Page XIX.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: That is exactly what I have just read to the House.

I think we have our pages straight now. The hon. member agrees?

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 30, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 30, in the amount of $43,500,000 under the Department of External Affairs—Canadian International Development Agency—Operating expenditures and authority, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Johnston) which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Vote 30 agreed to.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I never get discouraged. I would ask for the concurrence of the House to have the vote that we have just taken recorded similarly for Vote 75 in the amount of $5,284,000 under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Vote 45 in the amount of $110,908,000 under the Department of National Health and Welfare. On the paper I have they would be listed under number 17 and number 21.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, we are seeing an attempt at grandstanding, which is quite outside of the Standing Orders.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: They laugh over there at the right of the opposition to question supply by this process, the only process available to us. Standing Order 58(10) requires the Chair to put every question necessary to dispose of these proceedings forthwith successively without debate or amendment. That is what we should be doing without entertaining grandstanding points of order, propositions and negotiating on the floor of the House. These are the proceedings of supply. It is our last opportunity to oppose estimates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Conservative House leader having—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Quiet down and listen for a change, Mr. Clark.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Sit down, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the great respecters of parliamentary tradition to my right would listen, they would obey the rules and let the Speaker recognize the person who has the floor.

I would like to suggest to the Conservatives, having demonstrated their profound understanding of democracy, that perhaps they will give unanimous consent to allow the pages to go home at this point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: If you cannot stand the heat, get out of the kitchen, Ed.

Madam Speaker: It might be more difficult to operate without the pages. They are essential to the operation of this House, especially at this late hour. However, if the House agrees, those pages who want to go home, might go home and those who want to stay, can stay and work.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is right, of course, that unless the House gives its unanimous consent to other than what is provided for in the Standing Orders each vote should be taken separately. I did ask the House for its consent. Obviously, we do not have unanimous consent to apply certain votes to some of the votes.

I will now proceed.

Mr. Harquail: Madam Speaker, I plead my own rights with respect to the interventions we have already heard tonight in the event they could be misleading. We are also prepared to vote and we are here to vote. We call also for the protection of our own rights to continue with the vote in accordance with the way it is laid down in the Standing Orders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 20, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 20, in the amount of $11,094,000 under the Department of Finance—Insurance—Program expenditures, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Johnston) which was agreed to on the following division:

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1, DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 1, in the amount of $43,532,000 under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—Administration—Program expenditures, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if we could have an explanation as to which side of his mouth the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) was voting from.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Are we right in presuming that the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) should be counted with the nays?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Clark: More or less!

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Vote 1 agreed to.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1982-83

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, laid upon the Table, Tuesday, February 23, 1982, except those items disposed of earlier this day and less the amounts voted in Interim Supply, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, laid upon the Table, Tuesday, June 1, 1982, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Johnston thereupon moved that Bill C-121, an act to grant Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1983, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Johnston thereupon moved that Bill C-121, an act to grant Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1982, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon. Mr. Francis in the Chair.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: On division on all of them.

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I should like to get clarification on a statement directly from the President of the Treasury Board, that this Appropriation Act contains no legislative enactment, so that we can have quoted, as we were earlier today, that certain practices objected to by the hon. member for Calgary Centre had been approved, allegedly, by an Appropriation Act, giving legislative authority for those particular points. The question is, simply, are there any legislative enactments contained in the language of this bill?

● (0130)

Mr. Johnston: As I pointed out in the course of the debate on the point of order on Friday, there are no new legislative decisions contained in this bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, reading from page 22 of the bill of schedule A, Privy Council office, Vote 1, Privy Council we read the following:

Program expenditures, including the operation of the Prime Minister's residence; the payment to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a Minister without Portfolio or a Minister of State who does not preside over a ministry of State of a salary equal to the salary paid to Ministers of State—

The question I want to ask at this time concerns the Minister of State no one knows for what. We are not permitted to ask. The provisions of the Financial Administration Act, Section 23, require that upon appointment a minister of state, in order to lawfully hold that position and draw that salary, must have a responsibility allotted to him. This Minister of State—I cannot even name him correctly because we do not know his responsibility—is not so appointed.

Unless that matter is cleared up to our satisfaction—perhaps he has a responsibility by now—Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act certainly clearly sets forth that he must do. I would suggest that the Prime Minister explain what that responsibility now is before we are called upon to vote for this measure. I believe, unlike the vote that was just taken a moment ago, there is in our practices a prohibition, or at least an inhibition, applying to members voting on a measure in which they have a pecuniary interest unless they declare that interest. However, I will not press that point. I do press, however, the point of the responsibility, if I could have a reply from the Prime Minister.

The Chairman: This morning, the Speaker did rule on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Yukon, and ruled that this item was admissible.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, the member for Yukon is raising a point of parliamentary practice. Both parliamentary practice and Standing Order 58(10) are perfectly clear on the fact that at this stage, there shall be no questions put nor any debate; questions are to be read by the Chair immediately and put to a vote.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, the items are at this stage. I am not referring to a point of order raised today. I am referring to a question which surely the Prime Minister is required to explain in response to a civil question put to him. What responsibility does the Minister of State from Hochelaga-Maisonneuve have?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, the member is asking a civil question. I would be happy to deal with it at some other time. However, the rules at this time call for us to vote without debate, and that is what I propose to do.

The Chairman: Shall Schedule A carry?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the rare occasions when we have the Prime Minister in committee. Perhaps there is no explanation. Perhaps there are no services performed by the Minister of State from Hochelaga-Maisonneuve.

This House of Commons has just been put in a situation imposed upon us by closure by a former Liberal government of having to ram through billions of dollars of estimates without adequate debate. We now have a situation where we are asked to approve a particular estimate that pays a ministerial salary to a minister who apparently does nothing at all except perhaps help the Minister of Justice and his various propagandist activities in the province of Quebec.

It is a very legitimate question. If the Prime Minister has something to tell the House—the Prime Minister has just indicated that he has nothing to tell the House. That clearly indicates that the Minister of State has no responsibilities that merit his collection of a substantial ministerial salary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Why, in the name of God, are we paying this man so much money when his own boss does not know what in the world he does?

The Chairman: The rules of the House do not provide for debate at this stage. The hon. member has posed his question and, at this stage, as chairman of Committee of the Whole I must put the vote. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, let me, just to set the record straight, and it is important for us to do it tonight because we have been misled by the opposition, once by the hon. member for Yukon and now by the Leader of the Opposition. The supply rules were adopted unanimously on December 20, 1968, and not by closure. He should know the facts before making such accusations.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Clark: Since the architect for the government side in the bells matter has now entered the debate, and since he is apparently answering for his silent Prime Minister who can tell Canadians nothing except that he intends to scare people to death while he is spending millions and millions of Canadian dollars—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The rules of the House provide at this stage that all questions shall be put, and I am quoting, " . . . forthwith successively, without debate or amendment" in accordance with Standing Order 58, subsection 10. With all due respect to the parties involved, the Chair will now put the question.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a long-standing practice of this House that members having a pecuniary interest in a matter upon which they vote are obliged to declare that interest. I therefore suggest that the Minister of State, for whatever responsibility he has, if he has one which I do not think he does, should rise in his place and declare whether or not he is minister of state drawing any money attached to that position.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Yukon again raises another point of order. I have to rule that it is quite apparent the capacity in which the hon. member would draw his salary. This does not relate to a personal conflict of interest that is in connection with whatever duties are assigned to him in the House of Commons.

Mr. Clark: What are they? There are none.

The Chairman: Again, I am referring to the rules of the House. The rules provide that at this stage questions shall be put forthwith successively without debate. I am therefore calling for the vote.

Some hon. Members: Take the vote.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, we are not rubber stamps.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Taylor: We refuse to be rubber stamps.

The Chairman: With all due respect to the hon. member, we have Standing Order 58 which provides for votes to be called at a certain stage. I have recognized a number of members who have raised points or order and who have put questions to the government. At this stage I will ask those in favour of Schedule A to please rise.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Order. Learn your business.

The Chairman: The Chair is asking for yeas and nays on Schedule A.

Mr. Nielsen: No one has asked for yeas and nays.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Nielsen: A point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

• (0140)

Mr. Clark: Those fascists over there.

Mr. Nielsen: We are entitled, Mr. Chairman, to allow the—

The Chairman: On Schedule A, those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Chairman: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Chairman: Those in favour will please rise.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order. I rise on a point of order!

Mr. Clark: Order! Order!

Mr. Nielsen: I want to be heard on a point of order!

Mr. Clark: Thief, thief, thief!

And the members of the Official Opposition having left the chamber:

The Chairman: All those in favour will please rise.

All those opposed will please rise.

Schedule A agreed to: yeas, 136; nays 24.

The Chairman: When shall Schedule B carry?

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Chairman: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Chairman: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Chairman: Those in favour of Schedule B will please rise.

Those opposed will please rise.

Schedule B agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: On division?

Mr. Deans: No.

Mr. Trudeau: They want a vote.

An hon. Member: Ring the bells.

Mr. Deans: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members.

Some hon. Members: Dispense with the bells.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the bells be dispensed with in calling this vote.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to dispensing with the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Johnston moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Speaker: It being nearly two o'clock in the morning, this House stands adjourned—

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in a few days it will be the first of July, and the first of July is Canada Day as we all know. Since this evening we seem to have cleared the air in this House and a more parliamentary spirit seems to prevail, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House for proceeding quickly with all stages of the bill to make the first of July Canada Day.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, in the absence of the official opposition, I do not think that would be an appropriate move this evening.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: There is no unanimous consent. It being nearly two o'clock in the morning, the House stands adjourned until two o'clock this afternoon, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 1.54 a.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 22, 1982

The House met at 2 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATUS OF FUND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, as the Liberal recession continues to put more and more Canadians out of work, the unemployment insurance fund is running dangerously low. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration table the latest figures showing the extent of this depletion and advise the House of how much he plans to increase unemployment insurance premiums to make up the shortfall.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POSITION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT AND SUPPORTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, last evening the government clearly indicated to the country that it has no intention of cutting back on government expense. The opposition stuck its neck out and was prepared to eliminate programs totalling nearly $1.5 billion, yet the government blindly has decided to spend its way into national bankruptcy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House condemns the government and the members of the Liberal Party who blindly voted to maintain programs of government expense that are no longer essential in this time of economic depression.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in light of the 1,000 deaths, 20,000 disabling injuries, and 15,000 fatal cancer-causing incidents occurring each year in the Canadian workplace, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper):

That this Liberal government stop stalling on promises made two years ago, and that the Minister of Labour introduce changes to Part IV of the Canada Labour Code, accepting the recommendations of the NDP task force entitled "Graveyard Shifts, Life and Death on the Job in Canada" released yesterday, and use that as a basis for government action to save the health and lives of Canadian workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PORTS

CHURCHILL—MEASURES TO IMPROVE UTILIZATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, whereas the government has never given serious thought to the proper utilization of the Port of Churchill, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the Minister of Transport discuss the potential of Churchill with the responsible ministers from the three prairie provinces; consider the construction of ships with icebreaking capability for use on the Hudson Bay Route which would have the effect of not only lengthening the shipping season but of acting as a stimulant for our shipbuilding industry; and further discuss with the Minister of Defence the possibility of manning the icebreakers with naval personnel from the Canadian Armed Forces.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

EXEMPTION SOUGHT FOR INDEPENDENT FOOD RETAILERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity for the small retail food store owners of Canada. At yesterday's emergency meeting for some of the members of the working group on scales, the wishes of the small independent food retailers were overridden by a self-interested group of government and metric scale company employees. This meeting was no more than a setup to lend false justification to the government's policy. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government finally give at least one part of the small business community in Canada a break and allow some of them to be exempt from these ridiculous regulations—passed by order in council—which force them to buy expensive new metric weigh scales at a time when hundreds of them are staring bankruptcy in the face and are being forced to close their doors.

It should be noted that our national electronic and newspaper networks announced the heir apparent to the Canadian throne in our conventional Canadian form of weights and measures as a strapping, healthy, bouncing boy of seven pounds one and a half ounces.

INCREASE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of today's announced increases in the consumer price index, notably the increase in food costs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That this House recognizes that the increase in the CPI has been 47 per cent in the period 1977 to 1981 and is cognizant that farm costs have risen much faster than the CPI during that period—notably, fuel costs up 85 per cent; fertilizer costs up 70 per cent; tractor costs up 65 per cent; pesticide costs up 50 per cent—and urges that the government forgo the proposed July 1 increase in the energy agreement of $2.25 a barrel, or seven cents per gallon, which becomes effective September 1.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA DAY CELEBRATIONS

PROPOSED FIREWORKS AT YELLOWKNIFE, N.W.T.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Once again the Liberal government's priorities are going up in smoke. The city of Yellowknife has been told to take $83,000 for daylight fireworks or get nothing for the Dominion Day celebrations even though it requested that the money be used for desperately needed health services. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That this House demands that the government see daylight by eliminating the wasteful and frivolous expenditures on badges, balloons and fireworks and redirect these funds to other areas in desperate need of additional support such as the bankrupt farmers and the unemployed, and that Yellowknife be commended for taking a practical and common sense stand on this explosive issue.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DOMINION DAY

FUNDING FOR CELEBRATIONS IN ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In that the federal government has allocated $270,000 for the Province of Alberta to celebrate Dominion Day at a time when a large number of young married couples are having a hard time buying groceries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the $270,000 be used for the more practical purpose of assisting in some positive way the people who are unemployed, declaring bankruptcy, and are having difficulties putting groceries on the table for their families.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VOTE ON FUNDING FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a vote was taken last night on funding for the Medical Research Council, with 176 in favour and 68 opposed, and in light of the fact that the objectives of the Council are to expand the scientific and technological base for health care and to provide a research base for health services across Canada, and since 68 Conservatives voted against funding for scientific medical research into health care, while some 20 Conservatives found their party policy so stupid they did not vote for or against the funding, and some seven other Tories were so disgusted with their neanderthal party policy that they voted for health care, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the people of Canada be informed that a Conservative government would destroy medicare more quickly than the Liberals, and by terminating funds for medical research would be opting for the long sought Tory policy of free enterprise medical research—where research is done only on diseases that affect the wealthy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ADMINISTRATION

DEMAND FOR GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The fiscal programs of this federal Liberal government are disastrous failures. This government wrestles inflation, and inflation goes up and up; it presents a budget, and farm and business bankruptcies double; it bolsters the dollar, and the dollar sinks lower and lower; it talks about new jobs, and unemployment soars; and it argues at Versailles against high interest rates, and then increases the interest rates in Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House requests the Governor General to call an election because this government has lost all credibility, and heaven help Canada if we have to put up with this administration for another three years.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EDUCATION

FACILITIES FOR HEARING IMPAIRED STUDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Cutbacks in the American education budget could affect hundreds of Canadian deaf students who are now planning to study in the U.S.A. because no university facilities exist for them in Canada. Gallaudet College in Washington, D.C., the world's only liberal arts college for the deaf, is under pressure from the U.S. government to stop accepting deaf Canadian students. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That this House urges the federal and provincial governments to co-operate in offsetting the lack of opportunities for such students as may be prevented from attending Gallaudet College, and further co-operate in the setting up of various community college and post-secondary programs for the hearing impaired in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that another prominent Liberal in British Columbia, Senator George van Roggen, has now condemned the Prime Minister for moving the Liberal Party too far to the left and for his inability to understand the aspirations and concerns of western Canadians, adding to a long list including former MPs Jack Davis, Ron Basford, Art Phillips, and Liberal guru, Gordon Gibson, as well as B.C. Liberal leader, Shirley McLoughlin, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

• (1415)

That the Prime Minister admit that the Liberal Party of central Canada has absolutely nothing in common with Liberals in B.C. who are little more than closet Progressive Conservatives.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which I find typical, yet weird, on a day that the consumer price index has taken a sharp increase, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Today's consumer price index confirms that nothing is working and that the government has done the impossible. Interest rates are up, unemployment is up, bankruptcies are up, and now the cost of living is going up again. Since today's figures show the complete bankruptcy of the government's anti-inflation policy, what hope will the Minister of Finance be able to give consumers of Canada in terms of getting out of this horrible inflationary spiral?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, yesterday we had a very full day's debate on the economic situation. I participated in that debate and gave my views on the situation and what had to be done in order to bring about changes in the very worrying high inflation which still continues in Canada. I am certainly disappointed that the decline we have experienced for some months in the CPI has reversed itself and that this month shows an increase. Even though it is primarily due to increased food prices and due to changes in provincial retail sales taxes, it is still a matter of concern to me and to all members of the government.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I will read the minister's speech again in Hansard, but I do not know what hope he offered to the average supermarket shopper. The minister and any supermarket shopper will know that high food costs, especially of imported goods, account for the largest increases in today's figures. The lower the Canadian dollar continues to fall, the higher the consumer price index will rise in the next year.

RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister, whose government spends so much time criticizing the American administration, why it is that they are getting their inflation rate down to around 6 per cent while our inflation rate is going up, and we are now at twice the level of U.S. inflation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have had occasion to refer to the good performance in the United States in bringing down inflation, but I notice today that that trend has also been reversed in the United States. There has been a one per cent increase, month to month in the rate of inflation there which, on an annualized basis, would be 12 per cent.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): During the first five months of this year the American inflation rate was four points lower than ours has been. That was a monthly estimate, and they estimate that by the end of the year their inflation rate will be down to around 5 per cent. That gives American consumers some hope.

BANKRUPTCIES

INCREASE IN NUMBER

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, now that we have the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in his place, I should like to deal with an area of his responsibility, the bankruptcy branch of Corporate Affairs. In view of the startling statistics that there have been 11,429 personal bankruptcies between January and May of this year, meaning personal tragedy for many Canadians, and that the government's economic policies are destroying families, what help, hope, or specific policies can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs give these people? Does he have any specific policies in mind which he is recommending to his colleagues in cabinet?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am a little surprised that the hon. member should ask me what my department intends to do to help Canadians who are having financial problems, since it is a fact that for months we have been trying to get a bill through the House that will facilitate the settlement of such problems. The hon. member certainly cannot expect my department to provide macroeconomic solutions, but it is clear that if, through legislation, we can facilitate financial settlements between a person and his creditors, we could most certainly adopt this bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act, which has been eagerly awaited not only by financial institutions and consumer associations but also by the provinces, who have asked the Canadian government to pass this legislation so that they can set up their own provincial system. I trust the hon. member will discuss the matter with his colleagues so that we will be able to pass this bankruptcy legislation as soon as possible.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs knows that we have agreed to one more speaker on that bill, if he would bring the bill forward and complete the amendments on which he agreed with us in committee.

THE ECONOMY

STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that his colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development, stated in Banff that Canadians have never had it so good. Does the minister agree with that view, particularly in light of today's statistics where we now have an 11.8 per cent inflation rate and where it looks like we will have an 8 per cent drop in productivity in Canada, when we have 10.3 per cent of the people declared to be unemployed—really more, in fact—and when our banana dollar is selling for 76.86 cents? Does the minister agree with the view that Canadians have never had it so good?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not looked at the statement alleged to have been made by my colleague. However, my appreciation of the situation in the country was set out yesterday afternoon in some detail. I certainly described the situation which presently exists in the Canadian economy as being a very serious one. That is my view, that is serious. As I pointed out, we are undergoing a very difficult situation, largely caused by the world recession and high interest rates in the United States but also being inflamed in this country by persistently high inflation rates. That is my assessment of the situation at the present time.

COST OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, one of the major problems we have is the massive amount of the deficit, now projected at $17 billion, perhaps $18 billion. Last evening the government did not go along with the efforts of this party and of almost all of the opposition with respect to eliminating $1.5 billion, approximately, in government programs.

The Minister of Finance knows that there are a great number of priorities for the country which are not perhaps priorities today. Is it the minister's view that all of the matters that were suggested by the opposition as unnecessary in today's economic recession are, in fact, necessary as far as the government is concerned?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, last night we did have a series of votes and I must say that I was astonished at some of the proposals that were put forward by the opposition which, if accepted, would have caused serious disruption in the economic and social life of the country.

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. For over a year the minister and his cabinet colleagues have been trying to convince the people of Canada that high interest rates were necessary to bring down the cost of living. Not even his backbenchers in the Liberal party believe that any more. Does the Government of Canada have one specific new idea today that will enable Canadians to cope better with increasing prices?

• (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker. There are certainly quite a number of new ideas.

Mr. Broadbent: That answer was at least succinct. It might have been a little helpful if the minister had told the people of Canada what he has in mind.

COST OF OIL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF BUDGET PRESENTATION ON JUNE 28

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I will try to get some specifics from the minister. The people of Canada do not need to have today's figures to know that for home owners, mortgage prices on the one hand, and energy prices on the other for those Canadians who drive a car, as most do, were the two principal reasons why the cost of living went up year over year. Both of these items, mortgages and energy prices, are the direct responsibility of the government. Considering that next Thursday Canadians will be faced with another 7 cents a gallon increase in the cost of oil, will the government just once come down on the side of the consumer, and go to the producing provinces to try to negotiate a complete elimination or at least a postponement of that 7-cents a gallon increase?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me to tell him what I have in mind. I want to inform him that on Monday evening next I will be telling the House of Commons what the government has in mind. That will be next Monday evening. I intend to cast my statement in the form of a budget speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, all I can say to that, on behalf of 20 million plus Canadians, is we hope to God it is a lot better than the last one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT FOCUS ON CREATION OF JOBS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, will the minister assure us that at least, in the budget we are looking forward to, its central focus will be the creation of new jobs for the thousands of men and women in this country who would rather be working instead of collecting unemployment insurance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I ought to answer the second last question by telling the hon. member that the price increase he has mentioned does not come into effect until next September rather than July, as he suggested. That is the fact.

Mr. Broadbent: It is at the wellhead next Thursday.

Mr. MacEachen: I wish the hon. member would listen to the answer. I want him to understand the economic situation here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

FINANCE

QUERY RESPECTING PROVISIONS IN 1981 BUDGET

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I would tell him that after six retreats from the previous budget, and some 28 changes, we on this side welcome the budget the minister will be bringing forward on Monday night. Will the minister be withdrawing any more of the provisions of the last budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will have to wait and see.

* * *

LEVEL OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, the minister will know that the government has been fighting inflation, which is what we have heard about today, with high unemployment and high interest rates. The 1982 deficit in the United States is $100 billion. The 1982 deficit in Canada is $17 billion. Our deficit per capita is 60 per cent higher than the deficit per capita in the United States. How does the minister expect to get interest rates down to a reasonable rate for Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I attempted to explain in some detail my attitude and view as to the cause of very high interest rates in Canada. I believe that it is commonly understood and accepted that short-term interest rates in many countries of the world are higher than they would otherwise be in the absence of the current very high interest rates in the United States. But I also went on to say in my statement, and the hon. member will readily understand this, that we must make further progress in bringing down the rate of inflation in this country. I hope to be able to address these problems in more detail and possibly convince and satisfy the hon. member next Monday night. I recommend that he come in early and have a good seat.

• (1430)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HOUSING

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for housing. The minister will know, of course, that as a result of the increase in the prime rate last week, mortgages are now hovering around 20 per cent. Does the minister have any new advice or proposals to submit to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, which will provide some measure of relief to the half million Canadians who are facing mortgage renewals between June and October of this year?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member was present last evening when I spoke on the motion moved by the opposition party. I indicated that the initiatives taken in the last budget by the Minister of Finance, such as the Canada Rental Supply Plan and the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan, set $350 million aside. Those programs have received only modest response from the public, but it is my feeling that the public may well not be aware of the provisions under those plans. I encourage the hon. member asking the question to assist the government, himself and his constituents, by making those plans readily known and available to his own constituents.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF INTEREST DEDUCTIBILITY FOR TAXATION PURPOSES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Veterans are not receiving the same financial benefits as average Canadians. They may only claim $100 for eligible interest deductibility, whereas other Canadians may claim $1,000. Will the Minister of Finance make the necessary changes to the tax laws to allow veterans the extra $900 worth of deductibility to which they are entitled, and remedy this obvious inequity?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will certainly consider the hon. member's representations. Following the budget of November 12 there was some misunderstanding that certain groups might be adversely affected on the $1,000 deductible provision. At that time the veterans were mentioned. I had assured concerned persons at the time that they would not be affected, but I will further consider the hon. member's representations to see whether there is any continuing confusion at this point.

QUERY RESPECTING LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The minister knows that most legislative changes in his department take about ten years to develop, while veterans wait. Will the minister use every means at his disposal to persuade his colleague, the Minister of Finance, of the immediate need for this legislative change? What efforts has the minister made to date?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, first of all I do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question that it takes ten years to introduce legislative changes as they affect the veterans. I think the hon. member is quite aware that all hon. members of this House have been very co-operative in terms of responding to legislative changes. I can tell him, in response to his proposal that the interest deductibility provision be considered, that it is under active consideration right at the moment.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT TO STAGE FIREWORKS DISPLAYS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services. It concerns a very recently awarded contract for $430,000 to put on fireworks displays in 16 cities on July 1. Ampleman Pyrotechnie of Montreal, a small firm, underbid the winning firm this year. It did half of the job last year in half of the cities. It received its invitation to tender documents in the English language only, although the principals of the firm are French-speaking. Would the minister tell us why the contract was awarded to Hands Fireworks this year, and why the bidding practices were substantially changed on a matter of importance?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I am afraid I am not able to give him full information on it today. I will take notice in the absence of the minister. I may say to him that my preliminary understanding, in the short period of time since last evening when I first heard of the situation, is to the effect that the person in question did not bid on the entire contract, but, rather, only on portions of it. However, I would appreciate the opportunity of inquiring further into the matter and giving a fuller answer, either through the Minister of Supply and Services or myself.

REQUEST THAT CONTRACT BE SPLIT

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, the contract was divided last year, as the minister will find. Mr. Cardinal was given four days in which to tender this year. The contract is of prime importance to the survival of his business, I gather. Is the minister prepared to look into the matter? If he finds that the bidding practices were substantially changed, is he prepared to divide the contract again between now and July 1 so that Mr. Cardinal's firm can survive in this manner?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, we are certainly prepared to look into the matter thoroughly to be assured that fair and equitable practice was followed. On behalf of the Minister of Supply and Services I will certainly undertake to report to the hon. member on the matter.

HOUSING

ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF GRANT PROVISION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question, which is directed to the minister responsible for housing, specifically deals with AHOP homes, and primarily with a Hamilton area subdivision, though it has application across the country. Last year, when interest rates rose so substantially, the minister agreed to defer the $5,000 grant repayment for a year, and has subsequently decided that repayment should now be commenced at an interest rate level of 18 per cent. I ask the minister, given the fact that interest rates have once again risen to 20 per cent, and the same kinds of situations that prevailed a year ago prevail today, in fact, might even be worse, would the minister consider extending the $5,000 grant provision for four more years without any change, to allow those people the opportunity to keep their homes so that they can have decent places for their families to live?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, one of the first matters that came to my attention upon taking office in 1980 as the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation was, in fact, the AHOP program. As members know, that was a plan that provided preferred incentives to house purchasers for the first five years of occupancy of homes. In 1980, because of the difficulties with the program, its benefits and plans were extended for 12 months. I indicated that, if the situation did not improve, it would be reviewed. Indeed, it was reviewed and extended last year, in 1981. I can say to the hon. gentleman asking the question, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, that a review of that program by the government is under way and will take his representations into account.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER COMMUNICATE WITH HOME OWNERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, would it be too much to ask the minister if he would correspond with all of the people who have been given 30 days in which to choose how they will commence their repayments, and assure them that, since the government is reviewing the program and giving consideration to extending the period for repayment, they need not respond to the letters they have received and that some further communication will be forthcoming?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, yes, I can give the assurance to the hon. member that I will communicate in writing with the occupants of the homes he has described. Over the last 12 months I have written to approximately 15,000 Canadians and I will certainly continue that practice.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In February, 1980, when the present government and the present Minister of Finance took office, the unemployment level in Canada was 949,000. Today it is 1,250,000. That is 300,000 extra workers, with families to support, who are out of work. Will the Minister of Finance, with his policy, accept responsibility for the additional 300,000 Canadians out of work today as compared with the time when he took office?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, because the hon. member has referred back to 1980. From that date, unemployment in Canada gradually decreased until a year ago. Until last August unemployment in this country was at the lowest level it had been at in five years. When we had that very strong performance of the economy, I did not hear the hon. member paying us any compliments for that strong performance. The fact of the matter is that, in common with other countries, we have slipped into a recession, and that is the cause of the problems at the present time. It is not the policies of the Government of Canada. The policies of the Government of Canada are directed with the thought in mind of reducing unemployment as much as possible.

STANDARD OF LIVING

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): My supplementary, Madam Speaker, is also to the Minister of Finance. If the Minister of Finance would check the record, he would know that on many occasions he has taken the credit for reductions in unemployment through his economic programs. He now fails to take the responsibility for the increase in unemployment with the same programs.

Madam Speaker, high interest rates are the most significant factor facing business, agriculture, and prospective home owners in Canada. If there are not major economic changes, the crisis we are facing will turn into a panic. The minister repeatedly tells us that he is the victim of international circumstances. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, if that is the case, why since 1968, when Canadians enjoyed the third highest standard of living in the world, we have now slipped to thirteenth under his programs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not necesary to answer that question because the allegation in the question is unfounded and untrue.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CANADIAN CONTENT IN IMPORTED VEHICLES

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In a speech prepared for him and delivered in Toronto on his behalf before the auto parts manufacturers, it was stated that the Volkswagen agreement, with respect to Canadian content added, was the harbinger of things to come in the automobile industry. In the light of present circumstances, and in the light of the comments made by the Prime Minister of Japan, has the minister backed off from that position, or does he still take the Canadian content added as a thing to come?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we still look to increase Canadian content in imported cars sold in this country, and that is a very important objective. I repeat, as I said in my speech to the auto parts manufacturers, which was given on my behalf by my parliamentary secretary, that the agreement with Volkswagen is a very good model for Canadians, and for countries wishing to sell cars into our market.

CONSEQUENCES OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, the minister has pointed out that he still looks to and accepts this as the model. In the light of the comments made by other representatives in his cabinet in this House, when does he expect to have some fruit fall from that production and that position being taken by the minister himself?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we are working actively on a number of possibilities. I look forward to progress and hope to have announcements in the coming months. It will be a lot easier to ensure that progress, if the questions and comments by all my hon. friends' colleagues on that side of the House would not give aid and comfort to those who do not want us to achieve these objectives.

SMALL BUSINESS

INQUIRY RESPECTING PARTICIPATION BY QUEBEC IN FEDERAL PROGRAMS TO ASSIST EXPORTS

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. According to an article that appeared in Monday's edition of the newspaper La Presse, the Quebec Minister of Industry, Tourism and Trade stated that small- and medium-sized business in Quebec were at the bottom of the scale, as far as assistance through federal export development programs was concerned. Could the minister inform us whether that is the case, and if so why, and if not, why do we have this statement by his Quebec counterpart, who, although he has thirteen corporations to think about, might have found the time to promote the Quebec private sector a little more?

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I read the article which appeared in yesterday's La Presse, and I was rather surprised at what it said. This is probably, and unfortunately, just one more case of Quebec government members not having the slightest idea of what they are talking about. After reading the article, I checked the facts, and I found, for instance, that under the export development assistance program, in 1980-81, Quebec received 34 per cent of all the grants in this area, and a little over 26 per cent in 1981-82. In the case of projects financed by the Export Development Corporation, Madam Speaker, in 1981-82, Quebec is receiving over 36 per cent of the Corporation's expenditures on this type of financing. Consequently, I think my colleague, the Quebec Minister of Industry and Trade, should have done his homework first.

FINANCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING CONTENT OF FORTHCOMING BUDGET

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister today has made quite an incredible admission. He has effectively withdrawn his November budget, without that budget even being laid before the House in the form of legislation. I believe that is the first time that has ever happened, that a budget has died on the Order Paper like that. Will there be a new Ways and Means motion? Will the minister be withdrawing, in effect, his total budget of November 12, and be superseding that with a totally new set of policies to fight inflation, to increase employment, and to stabilize the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member's history is quite incorrect. He told the House last week that he had spent his life in the marketplace, and knew a lot about it. I could never say that, but I have spent most of my life in the House of Commons. I know from my experience that what the hon. member has said about tax legislation and budgets is quite incorrect. He ought to check up on his facts.

NATURE OF WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister has not answered the question I put to him. It is a question of great importance to Canadians who have been labouring under the measures that he put before the House last November. Will there be a totally new Ways and Means motion that supersedes the budget proposals put forward in November of last year? Will this be a total withdrawal? Will it be a new set of directions for the country that he is going to propose to the Canadian people on Monday night next?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I told his colleague a moment ago, I think the hon. member will have to wait until Monday night and hear what will be said on that occasion.

QUERY RESPECTING STATUS OF 1981 BUDGET

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, it is the same minister who brought havoc to this country on November 12 last, robbed people of their jobs in my riding and in the ridings of all his colleagues, and who has compounded it by having seven months of uncertainty, with 28 changes. The people of this country do not have to put up with six more days of uncertainty. Is that November 12 budget dead? Has it reached the death it so richly deserved? Is it now in the ash can where it should have been in the first place? That is the question.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland.

EXTENT OF BUDGET DEBATE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Will the Minister of Finance guarantee that the government will not attempt to close down this House at least until we have a full opportunity of seeing all the details of the budget and having a full debate in regard to resolutions and budget bills, before it attempts to gag us and trot us out of here for the summer?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should direct his question to the President of the Privy Council. My experience has been that it is not the goverment that has the last word in closing the House; it is usually the opposition.

● (1450)

PRESENTATION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, with the unprecedented new budget coming within seven months of the old one at a time when we have not even seen some of the budget resolutions from the old budget, can we have a guarantee that at least with the new budget we will have those resolutions and budget bills within a matter of a few days after the presentation of this much needed new budget on Monday night?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will do my very best to accommodate the hon. member.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I had a question for the Prime Minister but, in his absence, I will put it to the Minister of Finance. As a result of the Prime Minister's trip to western Canada last weekend, I should like to put a question to find out what he learned.

There have been a number of lay-offs, shutdowns, bankruptcies and closures in western Canada, including the Cominco Smelter at Trail and Kimberley Mines with 6,300 lay-offs; one quarter of the 12,800 forestry workers in B.C. laid off; in Alberta over 50,000 people laid off; in the Yukon 250 people laid off at Whitehorse Copper; Ipsco in Regina has laid off hundreds, and there have been cutbacks, lay-offs and shutdowns in every northern Manitoba community. I recognize that the list is too long to allow me to go on, Madam Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Finance if the Prime Minister learned anything as a result of his trip?

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill on a supplementary.

FINANCE

QUERY RESPECTING MEASURES TO BE CONTAINED IN NEW BUDGET

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I presume the answer to my previous question is no.

During that same trip the Prime Minister complained about the conservatives in the Liberal Party. Perhaps he was talking about the federal cabinet. Will the Minister of Finance assure the country that this grandson of the November budget will not be another Conservative budget in drag, but that it will actually do something to produce housing starts and lower interest rates in this country?

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for York-Peel.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. As the minister has been contemplating his budget, Mark II or III, could he inform the House, after reflection, to what extent he believes government spending and ballooning deficits have contributed to inflation, high interest rates, and the general economic decline in our country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking me to give an opinion on matters upon which he ought to be able to make up his own mind. If he wants to ask a question with respect to government policy I would be pleased to answer him, but I believe his question really is in the world of opinion in which he is as expert as I am.

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance again if he would give us the benefit of his reflections at the present time. If he likes to say it is government policy, so be it. Has he come to any conclusion about the extent to which the National Energy Program and energy pricing have contributed to some of the economic malaise in this country, in particular the state of the oil and gas industry, the decline of our dollar, and high interest rates?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I did come to some conclusions on those points. I tried to set them out yesterday in my speech to the House of Commons when I said it was absolutely false to attribute all the difficulties that exist in the oil industry to the National Energy Program. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, took part in the debate last evening and illustrated very clearly that the same problems which Canada faces in that industry, exist in the United States. I do not believe that the National Energy Program has been introduced in the United States; at least Business Week magazine has not told us that yet.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENT OF BUDGET DEBATE

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. The Minister of Finance has already indicated that next Monday night he will make a budget statement. Is it the intention of the government House leader and of the government to have a full budget debate following that statement? Second, will the government bring forward legislation pursuant to that budget?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, according to the Standing Orders of the House, when a budget is brought down, it is followed by six days of debate, and it is up to the government to decide on which days the debate will take place. During the session, we have, on occasion, interrupted the budget debate to consider various bills. As far as the present situation is concerned, I have made no decision as yet. I shall be consulting my colleagues in the caucus and cabinet, and I intend to meet with the House leaders fairly soon. I should then be able to inform the House whether there will be a debate on six consecutive days or whether the debate will be interrupted. I shall try to reach some kind of agreement on arrangements for debate on legislation pursuant to the budget, if there is any legislation, since I have not seen the budget. It is therefore somewhat premature to inform the House specifically on what is to happen following the statement by the Minister of Finance Monday evening on June 28. However, I can assure the hon. member that we shall certainly abide by the Standing Orders of the House.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING DATE OF SUMMER ADJOURNMENT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I think the essence of the question and the concern of all of us on this side and, I think, of all Canadians, is whether the government intends that the House will adjourn before the budget process is finished. Will the House leader give an assurance that the House will not adjourn before it has completed full debate on legislation with respect to the budget?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, that depends whether we have a debate on six consecutive days or the debate is interrupted so that we can consider legislation pursuant to the budget. It will depend on the results of negotiations I shall be having with the representatives of each party. As far as we are concerned, we are prepared to consider any serious proposal for limiting debate on certain aspects of the budget, if there is to be any urgent legislation arising from the budget, but at this time, it is too early, first of all, to speculate on the content of the budget and second, to decide on how we shall allocate the days provided under the Standing Orders for completing debate on the budget. Finally, I would not wish to make any assumptions regarding the House leaders' willingness or unwillingness to co-operate in limiting debate either on legislation pursuant to the budget or on an adjournment motion, if there is one.

INDUSTRY

EXTERNAL OBLIGATIONS OF MASSEY-FERGUSON

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister conversant with the U.S. $25 million obligation that Massey-Ferguson has guaranteed in a foreign country, which will fall due at the end of this month and which will probably rebound to Massey-Ferguson for payment? What, if anything, is the government going to do to protect its position in light of this development which could force Massey-Ferguson into receivership?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, our obligation with respect to Massey-Ferguson is that reflected in the agreement which we entered into along with the Province of Ontario, to guarantee a portion of the new equity investment in Massey and it does not extend beyond that.

ROLE OF CHARTERED BANKS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I am glad the minister mentioned that, because it is the basis of my supplementary question. Now that Massey-Ferguson has missed on its dividend payment regarding its preferred shares, thereby setting up the position whereby the banks could trigger the government's guarantee, I want to know whether the government has done anything to induce the banks not to pursue this option that is open to them, since both the banks and the government are at record lows and this could produce some kind of reaction. This would not be helpful in view of all the other guarantees the government has made to industries such as Canadair, Chrysler, and so on.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we are simply in a position to carry on our obligation under the agreement. That is as far as we have gone.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESS RESPECTING CONGRATULATIONS ON BIRTH OF SON TO PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES

Madam Speaker: I have the Honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the following address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General, namely:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

May it please Your Excellency

The Senate ... of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have agreed to an address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing congratulations on the occasion of the birth of a Prince, son of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and respectfully request that your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBY—REMARKS OF MR. CHRÉTIEN RESPECTING DONALD MARSHALL CASE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, with your permission I would now like to pursue the question of privilege for which I gave written notice by letter dated June 17, 1982, and which I raised in this House the same day. At that point the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), to whom the question of privilege relates, was not present in the House and I undertook to wait until an appropriate day. The minister is now here so I now wish to present the question I raised.

Let me say clearly, Madam Speaker, that I recognize the burden is upon me to establish that my privileges as a member of this House were adversely affected by the minister's response to my question, and that I must establish a prima facie case that the response contained a misleading statement. I am also aware that I must move at the appropriate time for a reference to the proper standing committee of the House. I am guided in this regard by the precedent set by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) three years ago when he raised a similar question of privilege with regard to a ministerial statement.

Let me briefly outline the subject matter of my question of privilege. On June 15, 1982 I directed an inquiry to the Minister of Justice concerning the case of Donald Marshall, a Micmac Indian, resident of Nova Scotia, who was convicted in 1971 of the stabbing death of Sandy Seale. He spent 11 years in federal prison, but finally rumours were circulated that he was innocent of the crime. Investigations were conducted, and evidence was adduced that he was not guilty of this offence.

On June 15 I asked the minister what course of action he intended to follow in this matter and he said:

—I am reviewing it and I am having discussions with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, but we have not as yet resolved the problem.

The very next day the same minister rose in this House in response to an inquiry about the Marshall case from his colleague in the Liberal Party and said:

—I referred the question to the Nova Scotia Supreme Court and asked the court to make a determination on this case—

In addition to the statement made in the House the minister issued a press release dated June 16, attached to which was a document pertaining to the proceedings in the appeal division of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. That document contains this statement:

And whereas the Attorney General of Nova Scotia and counsel acting on behalf of Donald Marshall, Jr., agree with the undersigned—

That is, the Minister of Justice.

—that this new evidence is of sufficient importance to be considered by this honourable court.

There are two vital points, Madam Speaker. First, Section 617 of the Criminal Code of Canada, under which the reference is being made, vests the minister with complete authority to make this reference. He does not have to refer to any other authority. He acts on his own. Secondly, even more importantly, there were no discussions between the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Nova Scotia between the time the minister rose in this House on June 15 to say he was having discussions and the time he announced his decision to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. There were no discussions. It is evident from the document from which I have just quoted, which was attached to his press release dated June 16, 1982, that any discussions there were had taken place before that date. The only fair inference which can be drawn from the minister's statement on June 15 in this House was that he would discuss the matter with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia and then decide on a course of action.

The only sensible inference, Madam Speaker, which can be drawn from all the minister's statements in the House, his actions and the document signed by him and dated June 16, 1982, is that he had conferred with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia prior to June 15, 1982, and knew exactly what action he would take. If there is any defence, the minister can make it, but the facts speak for themselves. He knew the action he was going to take and he refused to stand in this House on June 15, in response to my inquiry, and tell me, this House and the Marshall family that he had made up his mind and would make his decision.

I will move the motion at the appropriate time, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not want to give a very long explanation. Of course, the member is right, I do not have to consult with anyone. It is my responsibility. But as it was a very important case in Nova Scotia I felt that it was my duty to communicate with the Attorney General, Mr. Harry How, or his officials about the matter. We had many options open to us and one was a referral. There was the possibility of recommending something else. There have been discussions, I have written to Mr. How and he has written to me and so on, and there were discussions the previous week.

On the Monday I was not in the House because I had been sick at home, and when I came into the office on Tuesday morning they told me that the problem was resolved. So the question came at two o'clock, but just as I was coming into the House of Commons I was told by my assistant that there was a problem, because we were consulting with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia and, although I was not obliged to, with the lawyer of Mr. Marshall, and I was consulting with the court, too, because it was a very unusual procedure. When I came into the House I was told by my assistant, on the advice of Mr. Rutherford, my senior adviser on this subject, that there was a major problem. So I accepted something in the morning, and I was told there was a major problem as soon as I was coming into the House.

During the question period there was some communication in fact—not with the Attorney General; I did not know there was a problem; there was discussion with the lawyers and with the Chief Justice of the appeal court of Nova Scotia. When I came out of the House they told me the matter was not resolved. There was some communication in the afternoon, according to my information, by Mr. Rutherford with the Chief Justice, and at the end of the afternoon Mr. Rutherford tried to reach, at four o'clock our time, Mr. Gale, who is an official to Mr. Harry How. He was not in his office. The problem was resolved. In the morning they tried to get Mr. Gale again and he was not in his office, but there was a discussion with Mr. How or his officials and there was an agreement on the courts and Mr. How was strongly in favour of a reference and not another course, of action. It was still a reference, with some change in the wording to meet some of the defendant's lawyer's preoccupation and that of the Chief Justice.

It was in that spirit at ten o'clock in the morning on Wednesday that I signed the legal document, and I gave the answer in response to a question asked by a Member of Parliament on this side of the House. I am informed there was some discussion on Tuesday afternoon with the Attorney General. I did not call him, I sent him letters. There was an exchange of correspondence. There was verbal exchange all along between Mr. How's officials and mine, the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia and the lawyers.

I do think that is a valid explanation, Madam Speaker. When I heard that the hon. member wanted to raise a question of privilege, I thought I had a good explanation to give to him and I tried to reach him many times.

Mr. Crosby: Nonsense.

Mr. Lawrence: He has been here. Where have you been?

Mr. Chrétien: Perhaps the hon. member did not want to talk to me. I placed a phone call.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I want to state the facts.

Mr. Lewis: As you see them.

Mr. Chrétien: I placed a phone call to the hon. member's office in Halifax yesterday morning. I telephoned his home. I left a message for him to return my call. I asked my parliamentary secretary to talk to him and give him the facts. I asked my parliamentary secretary to ask him if he wanted me to talk to him. He did not know. He wanted to raise a question of privilege.

I am not embarrassed at all. When I got up in this House, I was informed there was a major problem. I said in good faith that there were still some things that needed resolution. In fact, there was no need for further consultation with the Government of Nova Scotia because the final agreement with the lawyer and with the Chief Justice was along the lines suggested many weeks before by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia.

In those circumstances, I cannot be any more candid. All the facts are there. I think the explanation is valid and I am glad to have the occasion to say that. But the matter was not worth raising a question of privilege about because the same information should normally have satisfied a member of the bar. Before lawyers make charges, usually they do not refuse to look at the evidence.

Mr. Jarvis: That is a pretty shabby explanation.

Madam Speaker: I will rule on that particular question of privilege later.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Will you give me an opportunity to respond to the minister's allegations?

Madam Speaker: No, I am afraid I cannot. Hon. members speak only once on a question of privilege. They cannot use a point of order to respond. I have heard the two presentations. I will read the arguments very carefully and rule on that question later.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): There are two points on the point of order about which I seek clarification, Madam Speaker. Naturally it is within your discretion as to the number of members you hear and for what length of time you wish to hear representations on questions of privilege. But likewise, there is no standing order or practice that prevents members from speaking more than once on a question of privilege if the Chair wishes to hear them.

The second point is necessary because you said it so quickly that I did not hear. Are you reserving on the question of privilege or are you going to deal with it later this day?

Madam Speaker: The first point in answer to the hon. member for the Yukon is that no other member got up to seek the floor on this question of privilege except the hon. member for Halifax West, who rose and said he had a point of order. He stated that his point of order was to refute or rebut what the hon. minister said, to which I replied that could not be done.

Mr. Nielsen: It can if you allow it.

Madam Speaker: I am not saying that I would have heard a great number of other speakers, but no one rose. There is no problem there.

Second, I said that I would deal later on with this question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I do not question your ruling at all. I simply point out that it is in the Chair's discretion as to whether or not the same member raising the question of privilege might be heard again. There is no rule against that, but if the Chair does not want to hear it, naturally that is at the Chair's discretion.

When you say that you are going to deal with the question of privilege later, Madam Speaker, does that mean later this day or on another sitting day?

Mr. Axworthy: Later.

Madam Speaker: On another day. I think the practice, though I stand to be corrected, is that members who raise a question of privilege are not allowed to speak a second time on the question of privilege.

An hon. Member: No.

Madam Speaker: It is a practice I have followed, at any rate.

PETITIONS

MR. DOMM—IMPOSITION OF METRIC SYSTEM

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition from the residents of the federal riding of Kootenay West, British Columbia, who now avail themselves of their right to present a grievance common to petitioners in the certain assurance that this honourable House will therefore provide a remedy. These petitioners bring to over 200,000 the number of people who oppose the mandatory imposition of the SI metric system in Canada. We believe the pace, degree and nature of change to SI metric should and must be determined voluntarily in the various sectors of trade and industry by the individual firms or industries directly concerned, and with minimal government interference.

MR. EPP—RECONSIDERATION OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition signed by approximately 1,000 constituents from the riding of Provencher. The signatories are residents of many small communities in eastern Manitoba.

Your petitioners oppose the provisions of Bill C-451 and bring it to the attention of yourself and the House.

CANADIAN FORCES SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSIONS OF PERSONNEL DISCHARGED FOR MISCONDUCT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-658, to amend the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act (retirement for misconduct).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to limit the extraordinary discretion of the Treasury Board under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act to reduce substantially pensions of Canadian Forces personnel who have been discharged for misconduct, sometimes for less than major offences. It is to stop such miscarriages of justice that I introduce a bill that I hope some day will receive approval from all sides of the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA

Question No. 3,829—Mr. Lawrence:

For the years 1976 to 1980, what was the number of inmates at the Carlton Centre, Halifax and how many were convicted of (a) first degree murder (b) second degree murder (c) attempted murder (d) manslaughter (e) rape and attempted rape (f) other sexual offences (g) assault (h) robbery (i) weapons offences (j) break and enter (k) cannabis offences (l) other Narcotic Control Act offences?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned:

For Carlton Centre

Table 1: Total number of inmates

1976	1977	1978	1979	1980
53	48	61	100	88

The above table indicates the total number of inmates for each year 1976 to 1980. Each figure includes the inmates on register as of January 1st of each year plus all admissions and transfers to the institution during that year. For questions (a) through (l) see Table 2 below.

Table 2

Carlton Centre

Number of inmates, per offence, who were serving their sentences during the years 1976 to 1980

		1976	1977	1978	1979	1980
(a)	First degree murder:	nil (1)[i]	nil (1)	nil (1)	nil (1)	nil (1)
(b)	Second degree murder:	nil (6)[ii]	nil (6)	nil (4)	nil (4)	nil (4)
(c)	Attempted murder:	1	1	1	nil	1
(d)	Manslaughter:	2	1	4	2	1
(e)	Rape:	1	1	3	1	4
	attempted rape:	nil	nil	nil	nil	nil
(f)	Other sexual offences:	nil	nil	4	4	1
(g)	Assault [iii]:	nil	nil	1	1	nil
(h)	Robbery:	15	9	15	12	8
(i)	Weapons offences:	nil	nil	nil	1	nil
(j)	Break and enter:	15	4	10	15	16
(k)	Cannabis offences [iv]:	nil	nil	nil	nil	nil
(l)	Other Narcotic Control Act offences:	2	2	10	6	2

Footnotes:
[i] and [ii] Number in brackets indicates inmates convicted of capital and non-capital murder prior to the 1976 Criminal Law Amendment Act (No. 2).
[iii] "Assault" includes the following offences: common assault, assault causing bodily harm, assault with intent and other assaults.
[iv] "Cannabis offences" are only identified by the CSC's national headquarters computer if they involve "cultivation of opium poppy, marijuana". Other cannabis offences such as "trafficking in marijuana" are included in (l) Other Narcotic Control Act offences.

The table indicates, for each offence, the number of inmates incarcerated on January 1 added to those admitted and transferred to the institution during the remainder of the year. This gives the number of inmates incarcerated throughout each year for each particular offence. It should be noted that the figures cannot be added either horizontally or vertically. Horizontally because an inmate convicted of a specified offence could remain at the same institution for each year, therefore, giving the impression that there were five inmates convicted of the offence when in reality there was only one and vertically because some inmates may have been convicted of more than one crime.

ECONOMIC PROGRAMS

Question No. 4,242—Mr. Roy (Laval):

Under the various economic programs implemented in order to stimulate employment over the past five years (a) what was the annual breakdown, by province, of the various government contributions (b) what percentage of the total budget did the contributions represent (c) what was (i) the approximate number of person-years required for the administration and the related budget (ii) the total cost of the programs?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The government has implemented a wide range of programs over the past five years that have sought to stimulate employment either directly or indirectly. In some of these programs employment creation has been the primary motivating factor as, for example, in the case of the employment tax credit introduced in October, 1977. In many other programs employment stimulus has been but one of a number of complementary objectives as, for example, with the Canadian Rental Supply Plan introduced with the November, 1981 budget where an equally important purpose was to increase the available supply of rental accommodation. Indeed, virtually all of the government's economic programs and many of its non-economic programs provide a major stimulus to employment.

In view of the complex nature of the various federal economic programs influencing employment, and in view of the varying degrees to which these programs are specifically focussed on job creation, it would not be possible to provide the detailed breakdowns and aggregations requested.

BILINGUALISM IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 4,244—Mr. Herbert:

Of the bilingual persons occupying designated positions in the public service, how many attained levels (a) A (b) B (c) C in (i) written comprehension (ii) oral comprehension (iii) written expression (iv) oral expression and how many reached the exemption level?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): The table hereunder shows the distribution of all certified bilingual employees occupying bilingual positions by language proficiency level attained in each ability. The "Others" column is comprised of abilities not required in the language profile of the position or the profile of the position has been established as a "P" which denotes a technical or professional level that is not measured by the language knowledge examination (LKE).

"R" or "Instrumental" level: At this level, a person can understand and express himself/herself as well as someone at level A but only in recurring situations where the language communication activity is habitually reiterated and stereotyped. The Public Service Commission recognizes this level only for certain special cases of the operational category.

Return tabled.

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not put too many questions on the Order Paper. However, I did put a series of 250 questions on the Order Paper which mainly seek statistical and background information, information which would be readily available to the government, relating to the correctional service of Canada. About one fifth of these questions have been answered today, leaving approximately 200 still to be answered. As I say, it is routine, statistical background information that has been requested.

Can the parliamentary secretary tell me when the major bulk of those questions will be answered? Why have they not been answered with the ones that have been answered today?

• (1520)

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, to date the government has responded to 3,406 questions. Today there were 55 questions asked by the hon. member which have been answered. I think Canadians know that each question costs us over $100, I believe, to answer.

Mr. Lawrence: Not these.

Mr. Peterson: Now, we have made a sincere effort to respond to the questions put forward by the hon. member. We will bring forth answers to his other questions in the future when we can get around to answering them. We understand that they are important, but as he realizes, we do not have unlimited resources, nor do I think we should have in all these cases. Therefore, I would be very happy to bring them to the notice of our officials and try to get those answers for him as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: As requested by the hon. parliamentary secretary, shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—PROCEDURE DURING COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order arising out of last evening's proceedings and involving the manner in which the Deputy Speaker conducted our proceedings last night. My point of order, in order to be put into proper perspective, must necessarily concern itself with a meticulous review of last night's proceedings. I note that we do not yet have Hansard available to us, so I cannot back up my recollections by citations from Hansard. I can understand why it would be late.

Last night I raised a point of order which was a serious one concerning the right of the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, the Minister of State (Mr. Joyal), to vote in last night's proceedings. I did that on the basis of the possibility of his having a pecuniary interest in the subject matter of the vote. I do not intend to go into the merits or demerits of that point of order. I simply refer to it as being the point at which the irregularities commenced. The Deputy Speaker who was in the chair of the Committee of the Whole at the time ruled, for entirely irrelevant reasons in my view, that there was no point of order.

I then rose again on a point of order intending to appeal that ruling under the provisions of Standing Order 55(4), which allows any hon. member to appeal the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. I am sure Your Honour is aware that that would require the Speaker to resume the chair and deal with that appeal. I will have a citation in that regard for the convenience of the Chair in a moment.

My point is that the microphone at that point was turned off. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would not recognize me, despite the fact that I stood here and shouted at the top of my lungs that I had a point of order to be heard. He just refused to hear me at that point. I was denied the right, then, to rise on a point of order under Standing Order 55(4) to put in motion the machinery to appeal that ruling.

At that point the Deputy Speaker, in the chair of the Committee of the Whole, called for a vote on the schedule to the measure which was then before us, Schedule A of the appropriations bill. At that point I said quite loudly "on division". Normally when that occurs the Chair simply repeats "on division", the subject matter which is being voted upon is passed, and we go on to the next vote, which in this case was on Clause 1 and the title of the bill.

I rose on a point of order again to draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that I had said on behalf of members in the opposition "on division", so that the vote would pass in that fashion. Again he would not allow my microphone to be turned on, and again he would not listen to my point of order. He would not even listen to find out what the point of order was. He called at that point for a standing vote.

It does not lie, in my submission, within the prerogative of the Chair or within the prerogative of the occupant of the chair of the Committee of the Whole to determine whether there will be a vote. That is the prerogative of Members of Parliament, and once having made that decision, it does not lie within the Chair's prerogative to decide how that vote will be taken; again that is the prerogative of members of the chamber.

In this instance the Deputy Speaker, in the chair of the Committee of the Whole, insisted upon a standing vote, notwithstanding the expressed desire of myself as House leader of the opposition on behalf of my party that that vote would pass on division. He would not even recognize me to explain that point of order.

That having occurred, I again rose and in a very loud voice asked to be recognized on a further point of order to appeal that ruling implicit by the occupant of the chair of the Committee of the Whole. Again he refused to hear my point of order, and I would point out that it was raised before he called for a standing vote. We did not call for it; the Chair called for it. My point of order was twice raised in a loud enough voice to be heard—it was heard by Hansard, I am sure; it was certainly heard by my colleagues at the farthest ends of the chamber—and he refused to recognize me on a point of order. That, Madam Speaker, is very serious. We have—

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Nielsen: I hear "Oh, come on". I have a great respect for the right of Members of Parliament to be heard, particularly in this chamber. I notice an increasing tendency to stop Members of Parliament from being heard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I hear laughter from Liberal members opposite. One of the things which has been practised over the 25 years that I have been here is that when members raise serious points of order, at least the occupant of the chair listens long enough to determine whether or not they have valid points of order. In this instance we have reached the stage where we are not even recognized to explain a point of order at all, and they laugh over there; they think that is funny. I think it is very serious, and I suggest to Madam Speaker that it is not my intention to take the most serious of courses available to me in order to rectify the conduct of the Deputy Speaker in the chair. I could do that, but I do not intend to do it.

I rise today in the hope that, in your morning meetings which I know you have with your deputy and your other officers, you will consider this matter very seriously and perhaps decide to reverse this process of cutting off members immediately they rise, before an adequate opportunity is given to members, whether it be on a point of order or on a question of privilege, at least to be heard sufficiently to determine whether or not there is a point of order or a question of privilege. That is what was denied me last night, and that was the reason there was no further purpose in remaining in this chamber, if we could not be heard.

In support of those submissions, I refer the Chair to Standing Order 55(4). It is our undoubted right to appeal a ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. We were denied that right twice last night, simply because I was not allowed to be heard. That is backed up by Beauchesne's fifth edition, 1978. On page 163, Citation 471 reads:

• (1530)

(1) The Chairman maintains order in the Committee of the Whole, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the Speaker. No debate is permitted on any decision.

(2) In cases of an appeal to the Speaker, it is the duty of the Chairman to leave the chair immediately and report the point of order which he has decided. The Speaker must then rule upon the matter. No discussion is allowed on the appeal. Should the Speaker be absent, the Chairman takes the Chair of the House and another Member makes the report of appeal to the acting Speaker who will at once rule upon the question.

(3) If a Member wishes at any time to call in question the conduct of the Chairman in the execution of his duties, his proper course is to give notice of a motion to that effect. Sir John Bourinot, Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada (4th ed., 1916), p. 397.

If the Chair refers to that citation, she will be referred to a text by E. W. Peel, Decisions on Points of Order, Rules of Debate, compiled by E. G. Blackmore at page 55, which sets out the process which I do not intend to pursue today. As I said a moment ago, my purpose in rising is simply to draw this forcefully to the attention of the Chair so that incidents like this will not occur again.

Again quoting from Bourinot, which I have just cited, at page 397, approximately the middle of the page, it states:

If a member wishes at any time to call in question the conduct of the chairman in the execution of his duties, the proper course is to give notice of a motion to that effect in due course.

The one precedent that I wish to draw to the Chair's attention which deals with Standing Order 55(4) concerns an exchange which took place on April 6, 1971, after the new rules came into effect. At page 4969 of Hansard there was a question which arose as to whether or not an appeal of a chairman's ruling could be had. Mr. Baldwin, House leader of the opposition at that time, said as reported in the left-hand column, two thirds the way down:

With due respect, Mr. Chairman, I must appeal your decision not to allow me to appeal your decision.

They were in Committee of the Whole on this occasion as well. There was a case where the chairman on that occasion ruled that his decision was not appealable. The opposition House leader at the time appealed that decision.

In the right-hand column, after a further submission by Mr. Baldwin, he says about half-way down the page:

But I also respect my rights and the right of any other hon. member to appeal that ruling. I raised a point of order to start with. It was my point of order on which the discussion was initiated. Your Honour, in the breadth of your discretion, disallowed my point of order. I am now appealing your refusal to accept the point of order which I raised. Surely when I raise a point of order and Your Honour decides against it, I am entitled to appeal that decision.

At that time the chairman took a different tack. At that stage in the exchange, toward the bottom of the page, he had this to say:

—I gave the floor to the hon. member for Peace River subsequent to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Gaspé, and I now take it from the hon. member's remarks that having obtained the floor quite properly in the sequence of events, he is appealing the ruling. If I am correct in that, I think the hon. member has the right to appeal the ruling. Of course, under the rules the appeal will be submitted to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin then said:

Your Honour is correct. You can consider that the appeal has been made and that the machinery has now been launched.

On the following page, 4970, Mr. Speaker had this to say after the machinery had been crystalized and the Speaker retook the Chair:

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair and read the question as follows:

That is the question that was reported on the appeal to the Chair:

The question is an appeal of a decision of the chairman of the committee of the whole under the provisions of section 4 of Standing Order 55, as follows:

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

When clause 14 of Bill C-207, an Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incedental thereto, was being considered in committee of the whole the hon. member for Peace River raised a point of order to the effect that a document referred to in committee of the whole should be laid upon the table.

The chairman ruled that there was no known procedure whereby a document could be laid upon the table of the committee of the whole since the committee was down by its order of reference which in the present instance was clause 14 of Bill C-207.

Whereupon the hon. member for Peace River appealed to Mr. Speaker from the decision of the Chair.

I draw your attention to that process, Madam Speaker, because notwithstanding the terminology of Standing Order 55(4) which would lead one to the conclusion that all the Speaker can do is hear the question and then put the question on appeal, the Speaker on that occasion allowed debate in order to come to a decision as to whether or not there existed a valid point of order and in order to decide whether or not to put the question on the appeal. I draw that precedent to the attention of the Chair for that purpose.

With regard to the question which I raised as a valid point of order with respect to the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, I do not discuss or advance the merits or demerits at all. I had a right to raise that point of order. I had a right to have it ruled upon. I then had a right to appeal.

I raised the point of order, the Chair ruled upon it. I was denied even being heard on a point of order to appeal. The vote went ahead. I said "on division" on the passage of the schedule when it was called. I rose on a point of order when the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole called for a standing vote in order to say that that was improper. He refused to hear me. I wanted to appeal that refusal which was an implicit ruling that that was not going to be a point of order.

I felt, as hon. members on this side left, that we were railroaded last night. That is not a healthy atmosphere to arouse in this place. We simply were not heard.

Mr. Olivier: Oh, come on!

Mr. Nielsen: I hear the usual interjection from the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier). Anyone who wishes to treat this submission, which is a very serious submission, with the contempt displayed by the member for Longueuil does not think very much of this place.

The question I raised is a very serious one indeed. It involves the treatment of the members of the House of Commons, particularly the opposition, by officers of the House. The least that we can expect is not to be gagged. The least that we can expect is to be heard for a sufficient time in order for the Chair to find out what we are objecting to. The result in this case of not even listening was that we were denied on two occasions very substantial and fundamental rights given to us under the Standing Orders to appeal the ruling of the Chair.

I simply raise this point to draw it very forcefully to the attention of the Chair in the hope that when you have your morning meetings with your officials you might address this question, in the fervent hope that it will never, never happen again.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I listened very patiently and closely to the speech made by the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and I must admit that I could hardly keep a straight face, because basically, he was merely trying to justify an attempt by representatives of his party to make a disturbance yesterday evening, and their entirely infantile and irresponsible attitude in leaving the House.

I shall recall, if I may, that the circumstances in which the Progressive Conservative Party acted so irresponsibly and childishly were the following: the House, in Committee of the Whole, was considering legislation concerning the business of supply, and debate on this subject is clearly regulated in the Standing Orders of the House. I may refer hon. members again to Standing Order 58(10), which reads, and I quote:

—If the motion under consideration at the hour of interruption—

—at 9.45 p.m.—

—is a no-confidence motion, the Speaker first shall put forthwith, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of that proceeding, and forthwith thereafter put successively, without debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply—

—and so forth.

Thus, Madam Speaker, the context and circumstances in which the member for Yukon attempted to be recognized by the chair were as follows: the House was in the middle of proceedings that are very strictly regulated, and normally, this type of proceedings takes place without interruption, without debate or amendment, and as quickly as possible. Only exceptionally can hon. members intervene on points of order. Now, last night, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, although functioning within this very restricted framework, was extremely patient and courteous in his dealings with the Official Opposition, considering the arrogant and irresponsible and, I say it once again, infantile attitude they showed at the time.

He was patient, and he acted fairly and equitably, because he heard several points of order before deciding to apply Standing Order 58(10)—points of order which, in fact, they were not, because Hansard shows us exactly what was said on the occasion of these pseudo-points of order. These delaying tactics, this means of creating a disturbance in the House were used to protest that a minister of state did not have sufficient responsibilities and therefore the adopted or proposed votes could not be justified. An attempt was made to infer—I was later obliged to deny this formally to get the record straight—that the Standing Orders relating to the business of supply were steamrollered through the House under the threat of closure, although that is absolutely false.

I had to deny this formally and clearly establish that the Standing Orders on the business of supply were adopted unanimously by the House on December 20, 1968. Now that was the kind of argument that was raised within the context of a voting procedure, where there should have been no debate or amendment, and this had been going on for some time when the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House decided to simply apply the Standing Orders after having been extremely patient. It was then the Chairman decided to take a standing vote. The House was still in Committee of the Whole. Then what happened? Instead of waiting his turn—today the hon. member is claiming that he wanted to appeal a ruling, which, in any case, was not clearly specified—in fact, he still had enough time last night to do so later on, if he had stayed in the House, with the members of his party, to raise his point of order after the vote in question, at the report stage or the third reading stage of this particular bill. Madam Speaker, I think it is important to draw the Chair's attention to the fact that a point of order may not be raised at all times, without any consideration and as hon. members please. A point of order is subject to a number of rules determining how it is to be raised and especially, when it is to be raised. I may draw your attention to Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citations 235, 236 and 237, and I shall quote a short passage from Citation 235:

> A point of order may be taken after a debate is concluded and the Speaker is about to put the question to a vote or after the vote has been taken—in fact, at any time, but not so as to interrupt the Speaker when he is addressing the House.

Thus, the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) would have been able to raise his point of order if he had chosen to remain in the House like a big boy after the voting procedure followed by the Speaker of the House.

Citation 236 reads, and I quote:

> If the Speaker's attention has been called to a breach of order in the course of a division, he has directed that the division be completed—

Yesterday, that was exactly the course of action open to the member for Yukon. If he really wanted to raise his point of order, he could have stayed in the House and raised it after the vote called by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. You yourself were in the chair later that evening and could have recognized the hon. member at that time. Finally, still in Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 237 reads, and I quote:

> A point of order against procedure must be raised promptly and before the question has passed to a stage at which the objection would be out of place.

Madam Speaker, today's objection is arrogant and out of place. Yesterday, we adopted the bill on third reading, and during the vote there was a complaint about the attitude of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. The opposition members had their chance last night. If they had shown some respect for this institution and had behaved like adults and not like unruly students—if they had remained in the House, they would have been able to make their point before we proceeded with third reading, in other words, the final stage, of the bill in question. Today, it seem clear that the hon. member for Yukon is complaining about the work of the Chairman of the Committee and is telling the House, in a manner which I find unacceptable: In the future, give him a good scolding at your meetings and tell him how to behave in Committee of the Whole. However, Madam Speaker, in the light of the facts I have just described, we have no reason to criticize the behaviour of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House last night, on the contrary. He was extremely patient and fair, and it is entirely unacceptable that a Standing Order should be used, as it is being used today, to try to discredit the work of one of your representatives, namely, the Deputy Speaker and Chairman of committees of the whole House. This point of order was not raised at the appropriate time. It is not factual and I suggest that it is simply a sham to disguise the doubtful, childish and irresponsible tactics used last night by the opposition to the prejudice of order and good name of the institution of Parliament. In view of the circumstances, as I have just explained, I found it difficult to take the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) seriously in his clever attempt to prove his point using his parliamentary experience of a quarter of a century, as he has just explained. I do not question his ability. I do not question his good will either, but I think that he has a very bad customer in the person of the Leader of the Opposition, who is an irresponsible child who wastes the time of the House, and I pity the hon. member for Yukon to have to plead such weak cases for a client with so little maturity.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I will not deal at all with the personal references made by the government House leader. Let me simply draw to the Chair's attention that what he is suggesting is that we close the barn door after the horse has gone. What he is suggesting is that we could have appealed these matters under Standing Order 55(4) after they had passed. The time to appeal them was before the vote was taken. I will just leave that with the Chair.

There was one further irregularity last night, however, which I overlooked drawing to the Chair's attention, and I do so merely for that purpose. After we had left the chamber, we were watching the proceedings on television. Some of us were in the lobby and some of us were behind the curtains. When the bill came before the House for third reading, the yeas and nays were taken. The Speaker declared that the yeas had it and the members were called in. The bells started to ring.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Then the point was raised, I believe by an hon. member in the NDP, that the bells should not ring, and the bells were turned off. My point is that the bells were started.

Mr. Pinard: No, no!

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, they were. They were heard by too many people to deny it. I am sure Your Honour heard them very briefly. Those bells rang. Well, I see Your Honour shaking your head in the negative. I insist that those bells rang and Your Honour can check that with the officers of the House. They rang very briefly and then they were turned off.

It is my personal view that once the bells are started, they must continue until the whips are in and until the division is taken. In this case, it would have been a very quick division, I am sure, because we had no intention of coming back in to participate in a process in which we were muzzled. But I do draw that irregularity to Your Honour's attention so that it might not happen again. If it does, it is my view that the bells should continue to ring until a division is taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: This also deserves a reply. If the hon. member had remained in the House, he would have seen what happened. Here, in any case, we did not hear the bells, and I heard nothing myself. In any event, it is not a member of the NDP who asked unanimous consent to proceed with the vote. I stood up and asked for the vote myself, and this was also shown on television, and I am surprised not to have been seen in the members' lobby, but it would have been very simple for the Progressive Conservative members to remain in the House and then to see what was happening. I asked unanimous consent for the bells not to ring so that we could vote immediately and consent was given by all members present in the House. There was therefore absolutely no irregularity, and if there was, we did not realize it, and everything was covered by the unanimous consent which was granted at my request.

Madam Speaker: All that I can confirm is that the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) asked unanimous consent for the bells not to ring and that the Chair agreed to dispense with the bells.

[English]

I have a few comments on these particular submissions. I want to say to the hon. member for Yukon that he is quite correct in all of his quotations as to the right of hon. members to appeal decisions of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. All of his quotations are particularly relevant. The difficulty is that the decision was not appealed. The hon. member does not at this point feel that he wants to appeal that decision.

Mr. Nielsen: I can't. It's too late.

Madam Speaker: It was not appealed in Committee of the Whole and therefore not reported.

Mr. Nielsen: I tried.

Madam Speaker: I do not deny that. I do not pronounce myself on that fact. Of course, the Chair was not present and is therefore unable to make a judgment on facts that took place in the course of the Committee of the Whole.

Since none of these facts were reported to the Chair, it is very hard for the Chair to make a judgment on those particular facts. I know the hon. member understands that I cannot possibly rule on them in the absence of a report. If the hon. member wanted a formal redress, and he said that in his presentation, he would have another recourse, but he does not want to take that recourse. Perhaps one of the reasons is that Hansard is not available today; it is a bit late. We understand why it is late. The hon. member has not been able to check the record to see exactly what took place. However, his version is on the record today. We have to accept that as his version and we do not dispute what he has to say.

I understand that the hon. member for Yukon simply wanted to draw the attention of the Chair to a practice that he does not particularly appreciate. He rose today on a point of order precisely to draw the attention of the Chair to a practice in general. He is not referring to anything in particular, although he has referred to it for purposes of explanation. The hon. member is not asking me to look into the specific incidents of last night. He is just drawing the attention of the Chair to a particular practice which he does not appreciate.

I thank the hon. member for that. It is always useful when members practice their right and remind the Chair of the manner in which the rules might be interpreted. The Chair and the assistants certainly do not have objection to that. In a sense, members can co-operate in the manner in which the Chair might interpret the rules and practices. Of course, once the Chair rules, I know hon. members accept the way in which it rules. However, in between there is space for interchange on these matters.

I thank the hon. member for having brought this particular practice to my attention. I can assure him that we always review everything that goes on in the House. It is done on a daily basis. We like to look back on what we have done and perhaps learn lessons from what we have done the day before. Therefore, we always do that. We certainly will look at those events in light of the remarks the hon. member has made today as well as in light of the remarks made by the President of the Privy Council. I thank them both for this exchange.

MR. LAMBERT—PROPRIETY OF DEPUTY SPEAKER VOTING

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It draws attention to another fact which was exemplified last night. It is not the first time I have raised this with the Chair and with the officers concerned.

After 23 votes cast in a partisan manner, since they were cast with the government, I find it extraordinary that the Deputy Speaker should then step into the chair and be involved. It is my view, strongly held, that the Deputy Speaker should not vote. It is strange, really strange, that the Standing Orders preclude the chair—not that the House doubts the objectivity of the officer occupying the chair—from voting. They state specifically that the Speaker shall not vote.

In the practices that apply in this House, where the Deputy Speaker occupies the Chair at most second and third readings and also in Committee of the Whole, I find it extraordinary in light of the practice that goes on in Westminster that the Deputy Speaker should vote in a partisan way.

I raise this as a matter of reflection in the same way my colleagues have on the practices of the Chair. I am not calling into question the motives or the attitude of the Deputy Speaker. I am calling into question a severe censure of the practice of the Deputy Speaker presiding in your chair, in the chair of the Deputy Speaker, and then voting on behalf of the government at all times.

The British House arrange their matters differently.

Since the committee on procedure is now sitting, it might look very carefully at the practice there and improve the procedure here.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): In fact, the hon. member recognizes that there is full justification for what occurred under our rules. He is arguing for a change in the rules of the House. I cannot share his views for the moment. However, I invite him to make his views known to those of his colleagues who are knowledgeable in procedural matters and who were chosen to sit on this very important special committee which will deal with parliamentary reform. At that time, his views can be seriously considered.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Madam Speaker, I rise on the point of order, which relates to the intervention of a former Speaker of the House of Commons, whose views I respect. I say that quite sincerely. However, I am at a loss to understand why this point is being raised.

I want to ask for clarification in light of the fact that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole acts in that capacity and sometimes acts in the capacity of Speaker. Those are two entirely different roles.

Second, the hon. member went to great lengths to elaborate that he was not in any way casting reflection on the integrity of the hon. member. I then ask him, what is the point? When the hon. member in the role of Deputy Speaker becomes the Speaker, we agree with that. He is bound by the rules in order to limit, or expand if you like, the parameters in which the Speaker can perform his or her duty. In other instances, the Deputy Speaker or the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole acts in the capacity of Chairman of the Committee of the Whole with a different set of criteria.

The point I am getting at is that those watching this very interesting, or perhaps not so interesting, debate could be left unintentionally with the feeling that somehow we are questioning the integrity of the member, that somehow the member cannot play both roles. They might not quite appreciate that he is bound by two sets of criteria, two sets of precedents, two sets of rules.

Frankly, I am at a loss to follow the point the hon. member has made. It may be that in the mother of Parliaments they treat things differently. However, we are talking of this Parliament. Never in all my years in this House have I heard that point of order raised. Whether we like it or not, it does infer an inability of the hon. member to abide by the rules.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have to stop this debate. If hon. members want to discuss changes that we might make in future in the rules or practices of the House, there is a standing committee of the House of Commons set up specifically for that purpose. It is quite clear that the Deputy Speaker acted according to our practices. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that the practices in Westminster are different. We are sitting in this Parliament. The hon. Deputy Speaker has acted within the confines of our own practices and traditions.

• (1600)

An hon. Member: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: That is fine. It might be with you, but I think it is quite clear that those are our practices.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NATIONAL TRAINING ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House proceeded to the consideration of the report stage of Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved:

Motion No. 1

Bill C-115, An Act to establish a national program for occupational training, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 13 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"thereby, declare, by order, any occupation to be an".

He said: Madam Speaker, I thought that in the report stage this amendment would require some small explanation. In the discussions I had in the other place during committee hearings that they were holding on this bill, it was brought to my attention by Senator Tremblay that in the opening of Clause 2, where we have the designation of occupation, unless we were to make a slight amendment to it, it meant that we could not redesignate an occupation. By introducing the words "by order," "par ordinance", we therefore have the power to designate an occupation or to change an occupation. It is a technical amendment, Mr. Speaker, that I would commend to the House during this report stage.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, is the minister suggesting that he would change the wording?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Mr. Crombie: That is certainly acceptable to us, Mr. Speaker. The wording suggested by Senator Tremblay was suggested in committee. It was acceptable to us and we are happy it is acceptable to the minister and his officials.

Motion (Mr. Axworthy) agreed to.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale) moved:

Motion No. 2

Bill C-115, An Act to establish a national program for occupational training, be amended in clause 12

(a) by striking out line 21 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"12.(1) The Commission shall invite the gov-"

(b) by adding immediately after line 26 at page 7, the following:

"12.(2) That such information needed to assess the requirements of the labour market as described in Section 12(1) will be provided through a data base within the Commission. Such data shall be solicited from the Governments of the Provinces, business and labour.

12.(3) That the Commission shall supplement said data base in Subsection (2) with labour market information and analysis solicited from non-governmental sources representative of labour, business, industry, and special needs groups."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is an important aspect of the bill. I will not spend much time with it because there has been a change in the motion which I would like to proceed with now. The motion which you have before you and which is now before the House was put in committee in similar words and ruled out of order.

The purpose of the motion was to establish within the bill the principle that there ought to be established a national labour market institute. Mr. Speaker, the national labour market institute was a proposal that was made three and a half years ago by the Business Council on National Issues, in conjunction with the Canadian Labour Congress. It envisaged participation by business and labour and some funding by government in order to provide a vehicle for seeking a definition of labour market needs.

The minister had some difficulty with some of the principles involved here. In particular, the minister sent a letter to the interested parties, asking them to broaden the labour base and to broaden the base for picking up statistics to include those groups which were so-called equity target groups.

The fact of the matter is that just about everyone agrees with the principle of a national labour market institute. Indeed, the all parliamentary task force put forward a unanimous recommendation in its report; Section 163 recommended a national labour market institute. In a report yesterday afternoon and at a press conference this morning, the Economic Council of Canada indicated their strong support for the development of that concept, in order to have an efficient way to detect future labour market needs.

The reason I need not spend to much time on it now, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister was able to advise me this afternoon that there was wording that was acceptable to him and to the government that embraced the same principle as in my motion. What I would like to do, with the unanimous consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, is to withdraw my motion, the motion standing in my name, and substitute the following motion, on the the clear understanding that this wording is 100 per cent acceptable to the government:

That Clause 12 of Bill C-115 be amended (a) by striking out line 21 on page 7 and substituting the following:

"Joint committee" "12 (1) The Commission shall invite the gov-" and (b) by inserting immediately after line 26 on page 7 the following:

"Statistical information" "(2) For the purposes of assessing the requirements of the labour market for skilled workers, the Commission shall request statistical or other information or study from appropriate sources, including the government of any province, employers, labour organizations and groups representing adults with special training needs."

The only concluding remark I would make in support of that, and I think it now has the support of all sides of the House, is that this is an idea that has been around now for three and a half years. It is an idea that is fundamental. The need is urgent and the time is now, so I am very pleased that the government has agreed to the principle and is going to put it in the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have a request to withdraw the motion that was before the House and to substitute this new wording. That can be done with unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

Motion (Mr. Crombie) withdrawn.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the initiative by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) in asserting, as he has both here and in committee, the notion of establishing a labour market institute. It is a sensible idea that I also endorse.

As I pointed out in committee, it would have been wrong to include the direct definition of that in the bill, because we were in negotiation. I have undertaken to reply to the Canadian Labour Congress and the Business Council on National Issues, who made the original proposal, suggesting amendments to their proposals, and it will all have to be worked out. We are in favour of the principle and are hoping to realize the solution to and the realization of that within a short period of time, if we can get agreement of all the respective parties.

This amendment does not make a direct reference to the labour market institute. As the member for Rosedale said, inherent in it is the principle that we would move toward an institutional framework.

In the meantime, what this section does do is very clearly enunciate what has been part and parcel of the national training plan, which is that we want to incorporate information statistics and data from both provincial governments and from the respective elements of the private sector. This amendment codifies in the statute our intention to draw upon the resources and information of the different elements of the labour market, for the kind of valuable assessment we need. The amendment does not mention the labour market institute although we are well on the way toward achieving our goal. It clearly establishes the basic objective of the national training program which is to work in a consensual fashion to bring about the co-operation of different parties.

The ramifications and implications of the wording have been checked by officials in the Department of Justice, and as far as they are concerned it is quite correct and they are happy to accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Rosedale.

• (1610)

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, we in the New Democratic Party support this amendment because it is an attempt to embody the principle of the labour market institute in legislative form.

In reply to questions in committee the minister indicated that he was in favour of the principle of the labour market institute and this amendment reiterates that commitment on behalf of the government. This is important because the institute was conceived by both the business community and the labour community, by the Business Council on National Issues and the Canadian Labour Congress. It was conceived to meet a need to identify, clearly and pragmatically, training requirements for the future. This can only be done by an independent institution which involves direct participation by business and labour.

We support this amendment but I caution the minister that the negotiations which must obviously follow this legislative statement of principle and the underlying concept of the labour market institute must be respected and implemented in full, so that we do not end up with a watered down version that will not do the job.

Amendment (Mr. Crombie) agreed to.

Mr. Axworthy moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): By leave, now.

Mr. Axworthy moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on third reading which relate not only to the principle of the bill but also to the process by which it has finally reached this stage. I had the opportunity to speak at length on second reading of the bill when I described the historical development of technical and technological education in this country. I made the point that, by and large, since 1910 when we first established technological training in a serious way there have been four or five watershed years when new legislation was brought down to provide greater opportunities to the federal government to participate in technical and technological education. The result was that the federal government spent billions of dollars on thousands of educational training programs to help millions of Canadians over the last 75 years through technical and technological training.

I felt that three principles were worth mentioning as they were the criteria by which we on this side judged the way in which the bill addressed the tradition of technical training in this country. The first of those principles was that national training should be linked to a national economic strategy. The second was that technical training should balance well with sound educational principles. The third was that in order to accomplish that balance and some national economic strategy, there ought to be fundamental co-operation between the provinces and the federal government and, by extension, the municipalities.

No one disagreed with the principles of the bill so it was carried at second reading, but there was some serious difficulty with some specifics of the bill. In our view, it had some deficiencies. It was interesting to see the change that occurred in committee. I will not go over all the changes but nine significant amendments were put forward, eight of which were accepted by the minister and the other one was accepted today.

In these times of daily acrimony it might be worth paying tribute to the minister and his officials for providing the co-operative environment in which we were able to discuss the bill. The changes were not minor or technical or grammatical changes but were fundamental changes to the operation.

Three of the amendments dealt with the relationship between the federal government and the provinces. Initially, of course, all the provinces were on record as opposing the bill. All provinces, plus the two territories, but excepting the province of Quebec, finally got together and asked the minister of education for Ontario to speak on their behalf. She appeared before the committee and met with the minister, with the result that three amendments which this party and the New Democratic Party supported were accepted by the minister. These three fundamental amendments allowed one of these traditional principles to be achieved—that is, the requisite federal-provincial co-operation. This legislation, which will be of great benefit to the country for the next 20 years in my view, starts out by offering a great opportunity to the federal government and the provinces to act in an atmosphere of harmony.

At least as important in my view is the fact that members did not come to committee to play politics. Members on all sides came to try to make the legislation better. That is why the other six amendments from this side of the House were accepted after some discussion. Members worked hard to make sure they were dealing with the problems of others and were improving the legislation for the benefit of Canadians.

The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), who would be too modest to mention it himself, brought forward an amendment without which the bill would have applied to preschoolers, which was clearly not the intention of the drafters. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) did some very creative work. In the morning he showed up at committee with a clear understanding of what he wanted to do over two days. By the time he was through he was able to amend clause 4(3) and clause 9(1)(a), which gave him the opportunity to make sure that the bill will be of benefit to Canadians who have special training needs. Those are people who are stuck in non-traditional roles. The handicapped, native Canadians, people who have special training needs are clearly brought within the purview of this bill. That was the excellent work done by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

There are other amendments which were offered and accepted in a spirit of compromise. As a consequence of a good legislative process, this bill is substantially better than the one which came into the House. Anyone who is looking to reform the House of Commons might want to look at the way in which Bill C-115 went through the three readings and committee. I thought that was one area worthy of comment because the bill is a product of this House, and I think the House should be proud of it.

As I mentioned earlier, I put forward an amendment which was ruled out of order because of its wording. The principle of that motion is now in place as the minister, indeed all sides, have accepted new wording from the law officers of the Crown. It deals with the national labour market institute, with which I was particularly concerned because the very essence of this bill, indeed the essence of technological education in Canada, is that education and training brought together will allow us to have employment opportunities, economic performance and development. This bill will not do that by itself, but it provides the framework within which it can be done.

When I spoke on second reading I talked out only of co-operation between federal and provincial governments and a balance in education and training, but of the first principle that national training in this country has always been related to a national economic strategy or set of goals. That is why the institute, while itself a small step, is a major principle, because it requires co-operation between all those people—government, business, labour and consumer groups—who speak for those with special needs. It takes the co-operation of all those people in groups in order to target the needs for the future. Any fool can target the needs of yesterday, but it takes some sophistication and, more importantly, co-operation to target the needs of the future.

The reason it became an important principle is not mysterious, Mr. Speaker. We have known for the last six or seven years—some people knew before we did—that we live in a new technical and technological environment which is fundamentally changing the world. In mining, fisheries, forestry, agriculture, all the resource industries, the technological revolution is upon us, and if we are to take advantage of that many things will have to change. That is why the principle of co-operation was so important. We need economic co-operation in this country, not economic conflict. We need integration, not segregation. We need economic consensus, not economic discord. That is why co-operation, integration and consensus are no longer just good warm thoughts; they are now new realities.

Let me speak for a moment of an economy which has tried to work on those three principles. There is an excellent report which I am sure some members have seen—if not, they should get a copy—called "the Japanese way" put out by Labour Canada. It deals with contemporary Japanese industrial relations. In early 1982 the Canadian index of industrial production was falling at an annual rate of 16.5 per cent; in Japan it is 2.5 per cent. Between 1977 and 1980 industrial productivity in this country rose only by 2.9 per cent; in Japan it is 22.7 per cent. Expenditures on research and development in Canada this year are .9 per cent; in Japan, it is 2.4 per cent of GNP. Interest rates— the ability to borrow money to produce—in Japan are now 6.4 per cent; in Canada, they are 18.25 per cent. Unemployment in Japan is 2.3 per cent; in Canada, it is 10.2 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, you cannot argue with that reality. Some people have suggested that we cannot copy the Japanese because they are culturally different; much of what they do is related to their history and their culture. It seems to me that our own history and culture is not devoid of the principles of co-operation, integration and consensus. Indeed, those always struck me as good Canadian principles. So co-operation, Mr. Speaker, is the key to the future. The old fight between government, labour and management, the lack of co-operation, is now hurting us. Consequently the amendment we put forward which puts into the bill the principle which allows all those groups to have a say in the targeting of labour market statistics and policies may be only a small step but it is a very big principle. The reason it is in there is because members from all sides decided when they came to committee that they were going to produce some legislation which was useful, rather than politics which was not.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support this bill on third reading.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity on second reading to outline the social and economic problems which I felt training legislation had to deal with. Having dealt with the bill at committee it is good to have the opportunity once again to address the issue. We in this party will be supporting this legislation, but that does not mean that the legislation is really up to par and fully meets the need. We are supporting it because it is action at a time when the need is very great, and any action, no matter how small, obviously requires some support.

We also want to give the government a chance to live up to the promises it has made in placing this legislation before the House, which it says will meet the real training needs of this country. By allowing this legislation we will give the government that opportunity, but we feel that the bill is really not sufficient or good enough, and neither is the program which will be supported by this legislation.

The reason we feel that way, Mr. Speaker, is that the legislation brings about no real and fundamental change in the training system in this country. Basically, it continues the same old approach to manpower training which has operated in Canada for the last 15 years under the old legislation. Granted, there have been some marginal improvements and they are welcome.

To give you an example of what I mean, Mr. Speaker, let me deal for a moment with the very great need for skilled workers in this nation. It is visible to any Canadian who reads newspapers that at a time when unemployment is so very high it comes as a great shock that there are still skilled jobs for which Canadians have not been trained. Somehow the training system that has been in place for the last 15 years has not met the need.

We feel the need was not been met for some fundamental reasons. By and large, industry does not train workers for the skilled jobs that are offered by industry. Only a very small percentage of workers are trained for skilled work. Industries do not train skilled workers because they are afraid, having spent the money to train someone for a skilled occupation, that another company will come along and take this worker from them.

We need a training system that will encourage and require training on a comprehensive basis by all sections of business. This is not provided for in this legislation. We need a comprehensive industrial training system paid for by all companies within a particular industry so that even those companies that do not have training programs but benefit from the fact that other companies do will be paying for the trained workers in the economy. Companies not training workers should be paying for this training since they benefit from the training system.

The type of system that we are talking about is a system that has been proposed by the Canadian Labour Congress. It has become known as the grant levy system. It means that every company within industry would be levied a certain amount of money in order to pay for the costs of training within that industry. Each company training, would receive grants and money for having done so. It is an equitable system which spreads the cost of training across an industry, providing funds to those companies doing the training.

This would be a comprehensive and fundamental change in our approach to training in Canada. No such change comes about by virtue of this legislation. We are continuing with the same old training system which involves incentives to industry to train, government money going from its coffers to the companies to train workers. This approach has resulted in the present situation that we face, which is one of highly skilled jobs going begging at a time of high unemployment.

Another issue not faced up to by the program to be run under the legislation is the question of functional illiteracy. Functional illiteracy is a very real and significant problem in Canada today. It was identified very clearly by the Allmand task force, which called for immediate and significant action to eliminate functional illiteracy in this country. The task force members even spoke of what they described as the ten-year right to read program. There is nothing in this legislation nor is there anything in the description of the national training program to indicate the government is taking seriously the challenge to eliminate functional illiteracy from Canadian society.

It is very important that we, as people having identified this problem, do something to solve it. There are significant numbers of people in Canada who do not have the education to hold down a job. This means a loss of wealth to the economy and an aggravation of the inequities that exist by virtue of income that people can earn in society, and it is simply a waste of Canadian human resources. There again is another fundamental problem which the government has simply not addressed in a serious way in the national training program nor in the legislation that will underpin it.

I want to make it clear that, while we support this legislation because it will be doing something in the area of training—and obviously something needs to be done even if it is not enough—we continue to criticize the government because there are fundamental training problems which the government simply has not addressed in this legislation. Nor has the government addressed them in the national training program.

This legislation falls short for another reason. It has to do with federal-provincial relations. I am thinking about two aspects. One deals with the nine anglophone provinces which came to some accommodation with the government with regard to the legislative provision. But Quebec is still left out in the cold with this legislation. Let me refer to the telegram we all received from the Quebec government under the signature of Mr. Marois, who is the Quebec minister involved in training matters. I am doing this to make the point about the concerns of the Quebec government and how it sees this legislation. Its criticisms in an early paragraph of the communication, I must say, in its fundamental principles, are pretty accurate. It reads:

[Translation]

The Quebec government gives top priority to adult occupational training. It is aware that this sector of vital importance to support the economic development of Quebec and to correct social inequalities needs major revamping to reach its assigned objectives. The Jean commission report in the province of Quebec and other reports prepared under other governments, have highlighted the drawbacks and inefficiencies of the current adult occupational training system.

That is Mr. Marois' basic analysis of occupational training issues. Having expressed his views on this question, he said this to the federal minister, and I quote:

If you are really prepared to listen to the arguments and suggestions of Quebec and then take them into serious consideration, I would be glad to meet with you with a view to making this project an acceptable tool geared to the needs of Quebec workers and employers.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec called for a meeting with the federal minister. The federal minister did have talks with the governments of the other provinces, but why—I do not know—at the last minute did he not meet a representative of the government of Quebec?

• (1640)

[English]

What I have said in French, basically, is that the Quebec government has made a fundamental analysis of the training program which is before us. It has said that any national training program has to do a couple of things. The first one is to support the economic development of a region of the country. Second, it must correct the social inequalities which exist in society. Those are the two fundamental points which I make about this legislation as well. This is why I spoke of the need for a new training system, the grant-levy system which is not in the legislation, and that is why I focused upon the matter of functional illiteracy which is a matter of social inequality.

The federal minister took the trouble to meet with a representative of the nine anglophone provinces. I applaud him for that. The results of that work were useful. The minister and the representative of the Ontario government were able to come up with a wording which better expressed the desire for federal-provincial co-operation in the matter of training, yet at the same time he received a communication from the Quebec minister calling for a meeting in order to discuss what he considered to be problems with the training legislation. The meeting did not take place. I do not want to underestimate what I think would be the difficulties in negotiations between the federal government and the provincial government of Quebec, but once the federal government made the choice of meeting with a representative of the nine anglophone provinces, it should also have met with the representative of Quebec.

Everything in Bill C-115 depends upon negotiations, whether they are negotiations with the provinces, with unions, with employers, with native groups, or with women's groups. While there have been some positive amendments to the legislation with regard to consultations with the provinces, the actual agreements which will flesh out the training program that will operate under the legislation have not yet been made. Those negotiations continue. It is very important that the negotiations be carried on in a sensitive fashion so that the needs and aspirations of all regions of Canada can be met.

In addition, it is very important, when the minister and his government negotiate with groups such as women's or native groups, that they be particularly sensitive to the fact that they have a very strong hand in the negotiations. If anything helpful in terms of meeting the needs of people is to come out of the negotiations, then the federal government will have to be particularly sensitive.

I mentioned these negotiations because of the fact that even after being before the committee with regard to the estimates, it is very difficult to know what the national training program will be in the end. What the training program becomes depends upon the negotiations between the government and the provinces and between the government and various groups in the country.

To sum up, basically we support the legislation, but it really does not go far enough because there is no fundamental change to the present training system and there is no real attack on the social problem of functional illiteracy which has been well identified for us. While the government in legislative amendments has indicated its commitment to the principle of a labour market institute, it has yet to act on the principle. How it acts on that principle, whether that action is satisfactory, will obviously depend upon negotiation.

One of the main weaknesses of the legislation is that training in itself is not enough. Training must relate to the economy. When the national training program was originally conceived, as we read the briefing notes which were passed out to us, it was clearly tied into the notion of resource development. The resource development and economic strategy of the government have really come to a halt. The megaprojects which were in the last budget have fallen to the ground. The government has no real economic strategy today. It is not just I who say that, it is not just I who recognize that. Training programs must be connected to economic development.

I should like to quote briefly from an article that appeared in the June 22 edition of The Globe and Mail. It indicated that the economy is in a tailspin which has had no equal in 28 years. It read:

The economy is in a tailspin unmatched for 28 years, and only more consumer spending or greater exports are likely to pull it out—

In my time remaining I will try to wrap up quickly. The article went on to point out the facts that we are in an economic crisis and that the government opposite is following a harsher monetary and fiscal policy than that of the Reagan administration in the United States. It is not enough just to train people; we must have jobs for them once they have completed their training. It is time for the government to take some immediate and long-term action with regard to the economic situation. Otherwise, all efforts at training will be lost.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer)—Farm Credit Corporation—Availability of funding. (b) Advance crop payments; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Environmental Affairs—Request that acid rain subcommittee be reactivated; the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel)—External Affairs—Inquiry respecting measures government intends to take to help Lebanon.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL TRAINING ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training, with a certain amount of satisfaction. I guess everyone who sees the fruits of his or her labour suddenly arrive in some form of a legislation has a feeling of satisfaction, as I do today.

For a moment I should like to discuss the work of a task force which was chaired by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). Six of my colleagues in the House of Commons were members of the task force, one of whom, due to sudden death, is no longer with us. We miss Bruce Lonsdale around here immensely. The seven of us got along well. We travelled the country from coast to coast over a period of approximately 12 months. We sat down to write a report which took a couple of months.

The report of the Special Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s ended up producing 186 recommendations, of which there were only minority reports written on three or four. This shows most graphically how well we got along, how we co-operated, and how we saw the problems associated with manpower training and a whole scope of issues once we got out there and experienced them first hand. I congratulate the government for setting up the task force. Some task forces have been more productive than others, but I think some very, very useful information has come out of every one of them. I think the minister will agree with me that Bill C-115 is the result of this task force and others which he had set up within his ministry. He may comment on that later.

There are a number of task force recommendations which are embodied in Bill C-115. The feeling, I suggest, is very similar to being a father; you experience the thrill of seeing something born after working so hard at it for so long a period of time.

• (1650)

I rise this afternoon with a good feeling in my heart. Now that we have Bill C-115 which does encompass certain recommendations from the committee, I hope that the minister will now convene the committee again for a meeting with himself in order that we may discuss some of our recommendations which have not yet been considered. Since the report was filed last October we have not had the opportunity to discuss with the minister which recommendations he does not favour and which ones he may be working on at the present time. Obviously, we know the ones which he favours because he has implemented them. However, I think a follow-up meeting is important because we hear the criticism from people time and time again that a matter is being studied and it will only result in another report which will end up on the shelf. We do not want that to happen.

We would like to see similar action taken to that taken by the task force on the handicapped and their follow-up on the Obstacles report. I would like to suggest to the minister today that he return with a counter report in order to reveal what has been accomplished, what is being considered and what has been rejected. That would be a very postive gesture on his part.

My colleague the hon. member from Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) mentioned the legislation process earlier and how well this particular process worked. There were a number of factors which arose from the process. We had a small committee which was comprised of members who were very knowledgeable on the subject we were discussing. No one was there to protect the government's rear flank or with any other similar motive. Our purpose was to attempt to reach a common goal. That process, I believe, could be used in many other areas. For instance, I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) sitting in the House. I believe that when he is dealing with housing issues he should take a lesson from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). The graphic example given to us by that minister was very important.

While I say this with all kindness, I am not quite sure what happened to the minister's point of view between Tuesday's meeting and Thursday's meeting. My first concern in committee was co-operation with the provinces. On Tuesday the minister said that too often they—meaning the provinces—approach it as a one-way street: we co-operate and consult, and they simply decide. He went on to make a number of statements as to why certain provisions could not be put in the bill to assure co-operation with the provinces. One concerned the discussion of veto in course content and the construction of certain buildings within provinces that the federal government might fund. He summed it up to us on Tuesday by saying:

That is why I would not want to give a veto to any one of those segments and say that we are the only body in the country, as a national government, that can represent a national point of view.

The minister changed his mind some time between Tuesday and Thursday. To his credit, on Thursday he accepted a number of amendments that did allow vetos for provincial governments on certain aspects of the bill.

The hon. Dr. Bette Stephenson, who represented nine provinces, the territories and the Yukon, made a very strong plea for co-operative federalism. I believe that her presentation and her ideas probably exemplify what we on this side of the House would like to see happen to federal-provincial relations. Consultation with the provinces is now provided for in the legislation. It is assured that provinces will be given the opportunity to veto certain matters, although they do not have to do it. This is true for all provinces, including the one which unfortunately was not represented by Dr. Stephenson.

The absence of representations by Quebec was a grave disappointment to me. Although I am an Ontario member, I am very concerned about my sister province of Quebec and the attitude that government takes toward participation in matters such as these. Our committee spent a considerable amount of time conducting hearings in Quebec. We visited Chicoutimi, Jonquiere, Quebec City and Montreal. We had what I consider to be excellent representations by people representing the workplace, academics and the unions from that province. I believe that their concerns and thoughts were embodied in our report as much as any others. I found it extremely unfortunate for the Quebec minister to refuse absolutely to participate or co-operate with the other provinces in relating his concerns and improving our report. I, too, saw a very long telegram from the minister from Quebec, Mr. Marois, which did not offer any concrete changes to the act, and that concerned me. I suggested to the committee that we ask him to appear before us with his proposals. While he did not appear—in all fairness to him the invitation was not extended specifically to him—I am sorry that he did not co-operate on this bill because I believe it will benefit the workers in Quebec as much as the workers in the other nine provinces and the territories in Canada.

Another concern I had was over the consultation process with the private sector. One of our report's very strong recommendations was the use of the national labour market institute. It was a vehicle which would allow the private sector to become involved in the decision-making and information-gathering process.

Once we began our trips across Canada we became concerned when we quickly discovered that there was inaccurate information as to what is happening and what will happen in the marketplace. There was a complete lack of statistics and information. We were dealing with old statistics that had absolutely no further relevance to the conditions of the '80s. We believed that a national labour market institute which tied in business, labour, the large and small entrepreneur and the special needs groups, could provide the necessary information as one of its functions to make reasonable and proper decisions on how training should be implemented in Canada.

My colleague from Rosedale spoke earlier about the amendment he introduced in order to insert the institute into the legislation. With the amendment that was accepted today by the government, we do have the framework for that. While we are somewhat concerned about iron-clad and firm commitments from that side of the House, we do have the commitment from the minister, which he made in committee, that he and his officials will work very diligently to set up this type of vehicle. It may not be exactly what the CLC wants, or what we proposed in the task force, but it will be something similar which will provide the necessary information in order for the minister and his officials to make reasonable decisions.

Something I would like to make very clear, and I think the minister will agree with this, is that we were somewhat preoccupied during committee with the issue of apprenticeships as if it only applied to apprenticeship training. I believe it should be made clear that while part of this bill does affect apprenticeship, there is other training required in Canada for very highly technical skills that may not be of apprenticeship nature but which nevertheless is required for the use of new equipment which is being installed in offices every day. We need people who are able to maintain that equipment. Technicians are sadly lacking in Canada today. We want to make it very clear that this bill covers training of a very wide scope, but training which is required in today's marketplace. I think someone said that for far too long the Ministry of Employment and Immigration has been training too many barbers and hairdressers, more barbers and hairdressers than there are heads of hair to cut in this country. I think that points out the problem we have been experiencing. It has obviously been recognized by the government in appointing this task force and also by this bill, and I am pleased to see that.

• (1700)

The apprenticeship program in Canada is sadly lacking. We found that in Germany, for example, 90 per cent of the manufacturing industries train people. In Britain, about 75 per cent are involved in training. In Canada we found from testimony that 20 per cent train in Canada. That was as near as we could figure because information is hard to get. People like to compare the European apprenticeship programs with the Canadian apprenticeship situation, but that cannot be done. Because of our split jurisdictions on various aspects, provinces have jurisdiction over education and that has been confirmed in the new Constitution. Other countries do not have those problems. I think that is the first point.

The second point is that we found that young people in European countries who sign on for apprenticeship finish that apprenticeship. It is like going to school. They are assured that they will finish that apprenticeship if they pass all the way along. They are not guaranteed jobs at the end, but they are assured of that apprenticeship and that if there is a slight slowdown in the industry, the apprentices are not the first to go. They are guaranteed that they will finish their course unless, of course, there is a complete disaster. The negotiated agreements with their unions indicate that. I think that is very important.

I would encourage labour in Canada to take a very long and hard look at that type of program because I am concerned that apprenticeship programs are on for a few months and then they are off. In these economic times, there is no question but that it is the apprentices who are being laid off first and are missing out on that much-needed education. So I appeal to the ministry, to the minister, to labour and to management to get together and take a long, hard look at our apprenticeship programs in this country and see whether we are doing the right thing. We should take a look at the modular educational process as opposed to the old process of four years of apprenticeship, because I think that maybe those days have gone.

Finally, as my colleague from Rosedale did, I want to congratulate a few people. It is always good for young people like us, rookies in the House, to watch an old pro at work, if I can use that terminology and it is not unparliamentary. As everyone in this House and many people in Canada know, for a great many years the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and his wife have diligently worked for those less fortunate than the rest of us. He was on the task force on the handicapped and he came to that committee with one purpose in mind—to ensure that those people with special needs were included in Bill C-115. Like a tenacious little terrier who has got hold of someone's pantleg, he would not let go until he had finished the deed. I want to congratulate him and thank him very much for teaching we rookies how to get the job done, an important job done.

To my colleagues, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) and the hon. member for Rosedale, who served on the committee and also spent a great deal of time in the committee, I say thank you. To the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold), and to the staff who were most co-operative with us, I also want to say thank you.

I think I had only one disappointment in the whole process. That was that those people who served on the task force really did not show up in the committee, with the exception of the chairman, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East, who just showed up for one of the meetings. I was disappointed that they were not there to help put forward the points that we were trying to make to encourage the minister to bring in the amendments and to produce a good bill. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) will be following me. He was on the Employment Opportunities for the '80s committee. He did not show up, but he had some changed responsibilities and had good reason not to be there. That was a disappointment.

Now we face the challenge. Now we have the training bill in place. Now we must start training people. But, more importantly, we must train them for jobs which are available in the eighties. Right now those jobs are lacking, with one and a half million people unemployed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has disappointed us for two and a half years. I hope and pray that on Monday night he will come in with a very positive, very upbeat, very inspirational type of budget which will get the economy back on its feet and give faith to the Canadian people who have lost their trust in the Canadian government, so they can be assured that when they invest, their investments will be good and so we can provide the jobs that are needed. Now that we have this training bill in place, I urge the minister to get on with the job of training.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), I was spokesman for our party on questions of employment for a number of years. I served with hon. members from the other parties on the parliamentary task force which looked at the question of employment for the eighties. I was then assigned different responsibilities. Therefore, I was not really able to participate in the work of the standing committee which considered this bill, but I closely followed its work and its recommendations.

I want to say, as did my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper), who is now our spokesman on employment matters, that we will vote for this bill. We will do it despite the fact that we have some serious doubts about the government's programs or the ability of this bill to do a much better job than has been done in the past. I want to remind members of the committee that when the head of the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen was before the parliamentary task force, he referred to the present department of employment and its ability to do the job it is supposed to do. While I may not quote him exactly, I am certain that I will relate the spirit of what he had to say. As I remember, he said that if an employer is looking for a good, skilled employee to fill a vacancy in his plant, the last place he would go would be to the department of employment. I think that is a very serious indictment of the department.

Let me deal with what I consider to be some of the major difficulties, not only with the act but also with the government's approach to the problem of unemployment. It is pretty obvious to me that the major proposals contained in this bill were drafted some considerable time ago, a time when the depth and severity of the depression we are presently in was not expected by the government. I say "depression" in all seriousness because I think it is much more than a recession.

As usual, the government received incorrect and bad advice from its senior economic advisers. According to official statistics from Statistics Canada, we now have one and a quarter million unemployed. We all know that there are probably another 300,000 or 400,000 people who are also unemployed, but Statistics Canada only counts as unemployed those who are actively looking for work.

Today's Financial Times highlighted the severity of the problem with a front page story headlined "UIC rates set for huge rise". I will read into the record a couple of paragraphs indicating its predictions. It states:

> Some private forecasters now believe that the total bill for unemployment insurance benefits in 1982 will be at least $7 billion to $8 billion, maybe higher if the unemployment rate continues to rise. This is a huge increase over the $4.8

billion in benefits paid out last year. And it means the account will face a deficit by year-end of at least $2 billion—ten times more than the $218 million shortfall originally planned.

• (1710)

It goes on to indicate the very sharp increase in unemployment insurance premiums which will be required to be paid next year by both employees and employers. As I see it, even if the programs to be implemented under the provisions of this bill succeed, which I doubt for reasons that I will indicate later, we will simply have a much better trained large group of unemployed.

The bill was obviously prepared before the failure of the megaprojects became apparent. The failure of these projects on which the federal government's whole job strategy was based considerably modifies the employment situation in Canada.

In his address to the Canadian Information Processing Society in Saskatoon in May of this year, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) mentioned the strong position of Canada due to the resource industries in the west. It is clear in this speech that he considered that developing of skills required by these industries where they were located constituted a crucial aspect of the whole national training program.

The picture today is, of course, totally different. Today the unemployment rate is over 10 per cent. Those who are unemployed are no longer only the unskilled workers. In the past year vacancies for accountants, executives, engineers, scientists and other professionals decreased by more than 47 per cent. It is reported now that university graduates are faced with increasing difficulties in finding jobs.

The petrochemical industry and the forestry and manufacturing sectors are among the hardest hit. The financial sector opportunities for university graduates also appear to be limited. Under these circumstances, it seems to be clear that any program to improve the employment situation in Canada should be placed within a broader strategy and a stronger commitment to full employment.

We know that the parliamentary task force on employment in the eighties, which unfortunately the minister did not pay much attention to, said that the goal of the Canadian government should be full employment. It defined full employment as 96 per cent of the work force employed and only 4 per cent unemployed. As I have indicated, we now have 10 per cent of the work force unemployed.

It would be impossible to carry out job creation and training programs which would be of any real benefit given this situation. This prediction of the parliamentary task force is in contrast to the departmental task force headed by Dr. Dodge which ignored that advice, unfortunately and so was not followed by the minister. The Dodge report overlooked completely the whole question of unemployment in this country.

Another principle underlying the bill before us is the perception of labour market planning simply as a problem of matching workers to jobs. The bill reflects no attempt to situate employment planning in the wider context of planning of the whole economic activity. For example, in his Saskatoon speech the minister maintained that the service sectors will continue to be improved in employment creation, that growth will no longer be centred in the health and educational fields but rather in the business and computer-related services.

This is an end result of the government policy rather than a natural development. Moreover, it is not at all clear whether it is a desirable development, given the unsatisfactory performance we now have in health and education services and given the fact that the more we computerize, the more people, particularly women in the traditional fields in which they work, will be out of work. There is no indication in the provisions of this bill or in any of the speeches made by the minister that the serious inequities which now exist in the field of employment for women have been considered at all or that they will be improved in a meaningful way after this bill is enacted.

Let me illustrate briefly what I mean by this claim which I have just made. Women are under-represented in manpower training courses. In 1979, women represented 39 per cent of the employed labour force, 46 per cent of the unemployed labour force and 51 per cent of the source population. Yet in 1979-80, female participation in full-time institutional training programs was only 33 per cent.

In the industrial training courses, the percentage of women participants declined from the 1978-79 figure of 29 per cent to 27.4 per cent. Worse, women comprise only 3 per cent of the apprenticeship training program, a rate which has remained constant for the last ten years. This is despite the previous claims of the minister that the government is giving serious consideration to ways to improve the situation for women in these non-traditional fields.

Occupational segregation of women starts with manpower and its department. The inequities of women's occupations in the labour force have been well documented. Sixty per cent of all working women work at three kinds of jobs: clerical, sales and service. These jobs are typically low-paying, dead-end jobs requiring few skills. Rather than becoming an instrument of change, manpower training programs initiate and encourage ghettoization. In 1979-80, 93 per cent of all manpower trainees enrolled in clerical and related institutional training courses were women. Clerical and related courses ranked first as a specialty for women in industrial training courses as well.

The CEC counsellors, who are the first entry to the system, are the first barrier to women doing better. The individual CEC counsellor has almost total control in the selection of programs for women. They overwhelmingly stream women into traditional occupations. The counsellors are not only hampered by personal biases and attitudes; the majority are further handicapped by a lack of formal training in job counselling. Furthermore, counsellors often lack comprehensive knowledge of the range of courses available to their women clients.

Essentially, the counsellors do not work as career planners but perceive training as an end rather than a means. In effect, women are often streamed into short-term training programs to eliminate their numbers from the unemployment rolls because CEC counsellors are under tremendous pressure to process clients as quickly and as cheaply as possible.

I now wish to comment on wage subsidy programs. In 1978, 75 per cent of the wage subsidies went to small, non-union firms with 20 or less employees. In these small firms, women run the risk of becoming a cheap source of labour, vulnerable to lay-offs and unemployment. In 1975, three months after women completed their training in a non-traditional occupation, it was found that they earned $67 less than men with identical characteristics in similar occupations.

Since the department does only a limited three-month follow-up of its trainees in the wage subsidy program, it is difficult to determine if women are retained as permanent employees in any significant numbers. Without long-term monitoring and evaluation of the career paths of these women trainees, it is difficult to assess if they are promoted in any significant numbers from their entry level positions.

By creating a policy which subsidizes small firms for accepting female trainees and by slotting 10 to 15 per cent of the non-traditional instutional training seats for women, the goal of promoting women into better-paying industries and jobs that have been traditionally dominated by men is not being satisfied.

The government and the minister have rejected the principles enunciated in the parliamentary task force of contract compliance and affirmative action. I will talk about those in a few minutes. The national training program of the government reflects the government's response mainly to the Dodge report to which I have already referred.

• (1720)

Virtually, Mr. Speaker, the minister has rejected most of the important recommendations made by the parliamentary task force, a task force of which the majority of its members come from the Liberal majority of this Parliament. It is a task force whose recommendations were, as the member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) said, almost all unanimous, yet most of the recommendations of that parliamentary task force were ignored and rejected by the minister. We see that in this proposal with regard to the National Training Act.

Let me indicate some of the proposals which were in effect rejected by the government. The parliamentary task force was told repeatedly by representatives of labour, industry, educators and by community groups that until now employers, with very few exceptions. have not trained the skilled workers they need. They have been content to import skilled workers from overseas or to steal skilled workers from other employers.

There is no proof at all, Mr. Speaker, that employers will do better as long as they are not required to train by law or by regulation. Voluntary efforts, or the kind of give-aways and bribes which the minister proposes the government follow, will be a failure as they have been in the past. I will deal with that a little later.

Let me deal with three or four of the specific recommendations which the parliamentary task force made and which have been rejected and ignored by the government. The parliamentary task force pointed out that 28.4 per cent of Canadians are functionally illiterate. Mr. Speaker, that is almost a record and a record of which we ought to be ashamed before any of the modern industrialized countries of the western world.

The parliamentary task force recommended that a special effort would have to be made to prepare these people for higher skills-training. There is no sign of that in the bill or in anything the minister has said.

My colleague mentioned earlier that the parliamentary task force recommended a ten-year crash program, operated jointly by the three levels of government. The parliamentary task force pointed out that women, natives and the handicapped are underrepresented in the skilled trades and professions. It said that the government should reaffirm its commitment to eradicate functional illiteracy and should introduce an affirmative action program and a program of contractual compliance for an increase in the training of women, natives, the handicapped, and other minority groups. It recommended that there should be an Indian economic and employment strategy, together with an Indian educational training strategy, to be developed by Indians. There is no sign of that, Mr. Speaker.

This bill is based on recommendations made by that internal task force, of the employment department, headed by Mr. Dodge. It did not do what the parliamentary task force did; it did not go across the country listening to groups from one end of the country to the other. It met with a few bureaucrats in the department, and probably with a few bureaucrats in some of the provincial departments, and made its recommendations.

The recommendations made by the Dodge task force which are embodied in this bill were supported to a large extent by the private sector. It was received with suspicion and is under a great deal of suspicion by trade unions and by provincial governments. Provincial governments, however, realizing the power and the financial ability of the federal government to fund programs, even if they are not completely satisfied with them, have had to go along with the proposals of the government.

The trade unions are concerned by the very limited role assigned to them under this program. They have also pointed out that there is an increasingly large role to be played by the employers in providing training. The unions, however, feel, with the vast experience they have, that the on-the-job training has been quite unsatisfactory, as did most employers, educators and community groups that came before the parliamentary task force. This raises doubts as to the effectiveness of training programs left to the initiative of employers.

I would point out today, Mr. Speaker, as I have in the past, that the particular agreements for training which the minister has made with various industry groups were made without consultation with the unions in those industries. Such programs are thus likely to be essentially generous subsidies to the private sector, which do not and will not make a significant contribution towards the solution of the country's employment problems.

As an alternative, the Canadian Labour Congress suggested a grant-levy system, to be administered by a training board composed equally of representatives of trade unions and management. The board would have had authority to set a levy for all employers in their sector to cover (a) the administrative expenses of the board, (b) the training program, (c) the research of the board and (d) grants to employers.

All employers in the sector would pay the levy set by the board. Then the employers who actually provide training according to the standard set by the board would receive a grant to offset all or part of the cost of training. If a firm does more than its share of training, it could receive more back in grants than it had paid in the levy. This system would provide both an incentive and a penalty, and would thus persuade employers to train. That is an objective which it is very difficult to attain without such a mechanism of enforcement.

The parliamentary task force did not accept that proposal of the Canadian Labour Congress, but it did bring forward an alternative. Under the alternative, employers would have had to pay in a different form for training, whether they did it or not, and would be compensated if they trained their workers. That recommendation of the parliamentary task force was, in effect, rejected by the government.

The task force report was prepared and adopted without consultation with unions or other groups. The suggestions of the CLC were not taken into account by the minister or his department. Like the labour unions, the provinces too were dissatisfied with the increasing role given to the private sector in the training programs.

At present, the balance of the institutional industrial training is 85 per cent to institutions and 15 per cent to industrial training. In 1980-81, $656 million, out of a total expenditure of $770 million, federal training dollars, were channelled through provincial educational institutions. The switch of training funds to the private sector, which is to be given more encouragement to train workers, means that the provinces will have their funds cut by up to 10 per cent this year. Like the labour unions, the provinces have expressed their concern about reliance for training programs on the voluntary compliance of the private sector and the lack of explicit mention of governmental action which might be necessary in the absence of this voluntary compliance. This point was expressed very forcefully by the Ontario ministry.

The provinces have also mentioned that the program might lead to a situation where already available services are duplicated. It has every reason to be suspicious about the ability of the department to deliver the kind of programs that they talk about. We know from bitter experience how wrong the department has been in past years.

Finally, they raise doubts as to the ability of the federal government to forecast accurately what skills will be in demand in future. Given previous federal failures in certain areas—and I refer to the forward occupational imbalance listing, which was ignored by industry for planning purposes, and the Canadian occupational forecasting program, which was judged not very useful by local CEIC centres—the forecasting ability of the Canadian occupational projection system, or COPS, as it is known, a major component of the training program, remains an important provincial worry.

Apart from these issues raised by the concerned parties, there are important problems related to the principle underlying the National Training Act about which I have very serious doubts. Let me deal with some specific shortcomings that I see in the government's program. There is a need to train thousands who lack basic education, to which I have already referred is deficient. It means that they are not now able to get the kind of training that is or may be available for those skilled jobs for which there is or may be a demand. In other words, Mr. Speaker, even if we have the right training programs, a very large percentage of the Canadian people would not and do not have the education to qualify to take that training opportunity which would be available. I have already spoken about the large number of Canadians who are functionally illiterate.

The parliamentary task force recommended that we adopt the national right to read program operated by the federal and provincial governments together with private and voluntary organizations. There would be a need for a major increase in funds for such programs, to provide the basic training for skill development. What we have actually seen in recent years, however, were substantial cutbacks in these programs rather than the increases which the task force and other groups indicated were needed.

We have failed to deal with the needs of special groups. The government has rejected any real commitment to the use of affirmative action programs to provide employment opportunities to minority groups, which include women, natives, the handicapped and new immigrants, so that such people can take their place in our modern society. Even if training were provided for these groups, if employment is not assured then the training would be self-defeating in a period of high unemployment. At this time, when there are so many people unemployed, it would be much easier for employers, both public and private, to find work for the many middle-class men and women who wish to work rather than for natives or immigrants who would require longer and more expensive assistance to find and keep meaningful work. Unless we help them they will be permanently forced into low paid, unskilled, dirty work, or onto the welfare rolls of our cities.

The record of government departments in hiring native people is poor, almost without exception. The government's supposed commitment to affirmative action will not be realized unless these programs are given teeth, and senior administrators are given the responsibility of delivering specific goals by specific dates. There are signs that this is taking place.

There are jobs for these minority groups. We need native teachers, we need native social workers and health workers, building maintenance people, and resource officers, as well as prison workers. We need them on the reserves and we need them in the cities to which they are moving in increasing numbers. The government and the department have failed completely to face up to the problem of these people as they have refused to face up to so many problems for which they have responsibility.

We see these shortcomings. We are not too hopeful that the bill will do a better job than the old act, or that the government will do more than it did in the past. This new measure is better than none, however, and so we will vote for the bill although, to say the least, reluctantly.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a few short comments to make on this bill. I know we have a royal assent at 5.45, and that the minister also wants to say a few words, so I shall be very brief. Nevertheless, I would like to add my own words to other comments made in this House regarding the exceptional efforts made by my colleague from Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) in his word on amendments to this bill. It would seem that the legislation has been vastly improved as a result of amendments that were accepted after prior discussion in committee.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, as a member for Quebec, I am once again far from happy to see that nine provinces plus the Northwest Territories have agreed and that Quebec is not a part of this general agreement. Granted, the amendments give the provinces some increased powers, but as a result of these amendments, the provinces will also have to take the blame for turning down certain federal proposals.

I had hoped, and I pointed this out in committee to the minister responsible, that the Quebec minister's request to have a discussion before the bill was passed would be met. I did the best I could to make the minister understand, after his very pertinent remarks to the committee, that it was important for him to meet the Quebec minister, considering the comments sent by telegram to the minister and a number of members. I felt, and I will feel, that it is vital that the two ministers should meet. I know, and the minister certainly has many possibilities, that he would be willing to try to show some flexibility if such a request were made. He was finally advised not to meet the Quebec minister on this subject, and that is probably why Quebec is not part of this agreement. It is unfortunate, and I truly regret this fact. It also puts me in a rather difficult position in relation to other members, because of their comments and the agreements between various provinces, and I wish I could be as pleased as my colleagues are about the fact that their provinces have agreed to co-operate with the federal government on this legislation.

That is not the case, however, and since the minister did not make the special effort he could have made, Mr. Speaker, I find the whole situation most unfortunate and regrettable. I know, people are going to tell me that amendments will make it possible for Quebec as well as all the other provinces to have a say in this kind of consultation, but the fact remains that proposals will be initiated by the federal government, and that is the kind of unilateralism we have often criticized. This reminds me of other subjects and conflicts we have witnessed here in the House of Commons, in which the federal government unilaterally maintained its proposals and let the provinces take the blame for failing to agree or co-operate. Much has been said about consultation, and the minister has tried to convince us that there would be real consultation, but, Mr. Speaker, experience has shown that consultation is not always enough. I would have preferred agreements, and in view of the very positive arguments put forward by the minister, and the objectives of this legislation, it seems to me it should have been possible to convince ten, and not only nine provinces. Of course, there will be those who say that today, nothing can be done with the government of Quebec. I can assure the House that previous governments under Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Johson were just as demanding with respect to occupational training as the present government of Quebec. It is always useful to remember Quebec's history.

I have just a short comment to remind the minister of one of the recommendations of the Pepin-Robarts report. In fact, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was the right person to remind the minister responsible that the report contains a recommendation which demands recognition for the distinctive position of Quebec, compared with the other provinces, a recommendation that was not drafted by the separatists but by federalist Tories and Grits, among them the Minister of Transport who is a member of the cabinet. If the Minister of Transport had wanted to show the slightest bit of good faith, he could have reminded the minister that this distinctiveness should be reflected in the proposals being made today by the federal government. Today, this distinctiveness has been totally ignored in the bill now before the House. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see that nine provinces have approved the principle of this bill and are prepared to co-operate with the minister in this area. However, I find it most regrettable that the government failed to obtain Quebec's co-operation, and I am convinced not enough has been done, and to prove it—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member, on a point of order.

Mr. Tousignant: The hon. member just mentioned that nine provinces had reached an agreement. He now wants to insinuate that the federal government is to blame if Quebec does not want to be part of the agreement. Nine provinces have agreed, Quebec does not, and once again the federal government is to blame.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I am doing my utmost to speak only a few minutes so as to let the minister finish his comments on this legislation, and I hope that the members on the government side who did not speak to this bill will give me a chance to do so. It is too late for them to speak, in any case. I am sure that if the six dozen Quebec members opposite had insisted that the minister meet with the Quebec minister, this would have satisfied me. However, they did not. They were delighted with Quebec's objections and then asked the minister to ignore them. Mr. Speaker, I feel the time has come for me, as the member from Quebec on this side of the House, to ask the members opposite to at least have the decency to ask the minister responsible to find a way and make a special effort to produce a better agreement and set a real example of co-operative federalism.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I could have made further remarks. I regret the absence of Quebec. Once again, I trust some way will be found to achieve genuine co-operation, and I still hope that it will be possible to conclude provisional agreements. In the circumstances, I shall have to end my comments so that the minister can make his final remarks. Thank you, Mr. Speaker for the time you have allowed me.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I recognize the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), I should indicate that this is third reading, and consequently the minister does not have the right of reply without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gesture. There are many things I could say about this bill. The fact that it has taken us close to two years to achieve this major change in training is one. Perhaps I could just indicate to hon. members that this will provide, in what has been a very long session, one of the most important gestures this Parliament can make toward those Canadians who are looking to their future in the job market. It will give them some hope and ambition, and confidence that the future can be theirs because they will have better training.

It means that we will be able to offer well over $1 billion in expenditures for new training to over 250,000 Canadians. It means there are special measures for women to go into non-traditional work. There are special measures to encourage employers to hire native people and those with disabilities. There are major efforts to provide every province, and employers and unions across Canada, with the ability to build new training facilities, new equipment and new laboratories to expand our training system across Canada substantively.

This is a very major moment for this Parliament, Mr. Speaker, and it is not, as members opposite have said, the product of one or two people; it is the product of many people. It started with the task force, and contrary to the impression the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) tried to leave, it was very much based on the recommendations of that task force which was composed of members from all sides. There were a lot of very diligent and loyal officials of this government who spent literally hundreds of thousands of hour working to bring about a training program. There was the co-operation of many provincial officials who worked with us in two federal-provincial conferences to bring this about.

I would point out to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) that the lack of participation by the Quebec minister is not our fault. He did not come to those conferences, even though he was invited; he did not prepare recommendations, even though he was asked; he did not offer any suggestions, even though the invitation was given.

[Translation]

It is not true that the government of Quebec wishes to co-operate with the federal government, but I hope to reach an agreement with the government of Quebec quite soon, although the latter will have to declare its intentions with respect to this agreement.

[English]

So, Mr. Speaker, there are many people involved, and I want to pay tribute in particular to my parliamentary secretary who was responsible for guiding this bill through the labyrinth of Parliament and obtaining co-operation from everyone concerned. I also want to pay tribute in particular to members of the committee. We worked very closely together over the past two weeks to arrive at what I think is a good bill which will serve Canadians in the future.

We can now go to young people, natives, women, the workers of this country, and say we have a framework of training which gives them some hope and confidence that the skills they need for the new workplace can be theirs. But we will have to continue this spirit of co-operation. I hope members on both sides will continue to work with me and my department as we take this legislation and turn it into reality so that we can deal with these difficult economic problems of our times, and provide a real sense of purpose and direction for the workplace of the future. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills without amendment: Bill C-38, an act to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments; Bill C-120, an act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act; Bill C-118, an act to amend certain acts that provide for the retention of records; and Bill C-121, an act for granting to her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983.

[Translation]

I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

June 22, 1982

Madam:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Bertha Wilson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 22nd day of June, 1982 at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to some bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Jacques Noiseux
Deputy Secretary

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, June 14, consideration of Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act, and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, as we await the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod I want to resume my comments on Bill C-92 by indicating to my colleagues that I had just finished reminding the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) that among the issues with which we are concerned with respect to ports legislation is the capacity of the central Crown corporation involved to act in the role of banker. How this would happen, its desirability, was spelled out in background papers which were widely discussed in Canada and which emanated from the ministry. I had indicated to the House that we were somewhat disappointed, to say the least, to find that those provisions were not carried through in the bill. I indicated, and I reiterate now, that those are provisions we will at least hope to see when the matter is finally before us in committee.

There are some other aspects of the bill that require further clarification. For instance, a port, as long as it is not a local port corporation, may be allowed to change its status to a harbour commission, providing for even further autonomy.

A local port corporation in order to achieve that would in effect have to disband itself and then apply for harbour commission status. I do not believe, nor did I understand, that that was to be the intent of the minister or his officials in the drafting of this legislation. Regretfully that is the situation within the bill itself. Our concern, of course, is that we do not believe that any port should have to suffer through that much red tape in order to change its status.

With respect to local port corporations, and again this hinges on the local autonomy issue—the degree of autonomy that will be extended to local port corporations under this legislation—why is it just the Canada Ports Corporation that would be allowed to petition the minister for establishment of a local port corporation? If one of the criteria for the establishment of a local port corporation is that of local interest, then why can the local community not be allowed to petition the transport minister? Would this not be further proof of the need for a local port corporation if the local community itself were able to participate directly.

Another criterion for the establishment of a local port corporation is that of financial self-sufficiency. What is the definition of financial self-sufficiency? Will it differ from one port to the other? If it will not, then why is the Canada Port Corporation allowed to select and choose which statutory powers to give each local port corporation contained in the list of powers in Part II of the Act? These are questions for which we will be seeking detailed answers. Why should not all local port corporations be established with the same set of ground rules, and have equal and identical statutory powers? The act does not give as much guidance on that.

If one local port corporation will be allowed by the CPC to have more statutory powers because of its so-called financial self-sufficiency, does this mean that the CPC will have more stringent control over the local port corporation that does not have as many or as broad statutory authorities? I think this is a vital concern and I hope this discrepancy will be clarified and, more important, rectified in committee.

Canada Ports Corporation Act

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Madam Speaker: Order, please, I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-38, an act to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments—Chapter No. 100;

Bill C-120, an act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act—Chapter No. 101;

Bill C-118, an act to amend certain Acts that provide for the retention of records—Chapter No. 102;

Bill C-121, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983—Chapter No. 103.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8:00 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from June 14, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-92, an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, when the distinguished Senate and her representatives, the Governor General in her presence in the Senate, summoned us to other business in Parliament, I had been talking about some of the concerns that we on this side have with respect to Bill C-92, the pending ports legislation.

In the time I have remaining I would like to put on the record some of the other concerns which we have about this bill. I would sum up what I have said up to this point, but having had my speech interrupted three times already, I believe I will simply carry on. The minister is aware of some of our concerns, a few of which are being looked upon favourably by the minister. I believe when this matter goes to committee you will find a non-partisan committee such as the one which dealt with the bill we considered this afternoon. I believe you will find a committee which is prepared to work at rectifying some of the reservations we have about this bill. As I indicated at the outset, some of those concerns are critical and need to be assessed.

Another concern we have is that all of the local port corporations' board of directors are appointed by cabinet. Although the language in the bill has been made neater, it still in fact provides for a cabinet appointment on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). While we may all love the present philosopher who occupies that high post, it is not always the case that this chamber can automatically have trust and confidence in the selection processes made by a minister with respect to appointments to these local boards.

To allay fears of some over-zealous, crass patronage, of which we have seen a lot recently—I would remind the minister of our former colleague, Jack Horner, going all the way to the top of CN. We do have to talk about Pierre Juneau and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We do not have to talk about Sylvia Ostry in OECD. We surely do not have to talk in this chamber about the brother-in-law team that we now have running VIA on the one hand and Canadian National on the other. That is nepotism in its worst form, and conflict of interest.

Mr. Laniel: Jack Horner was your transport minister.

Mr. Forrestall: I know that he was. Tell me how you can avoid conflict of interest when brothers-in-law are running VIA Rail and CN?

Mr. Laniel: Competence.

Mr. Forrestall: Competence in conflict. This country deserves better than that. Does the hon. member mean to tell me that there are not other people who could competently run VIA Rail?

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Forrestall: If you sit in your chair I will entertain your question when I finish.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member agrees with me that Pierre Franche, before he was appointed to VIA Rail, was doing a very good job in all of the functions and appointments he received from the federal government. He is a well-qualified man. He received his qualifications from all over the world.

Mr. Forrestall: I will respond to that question. I come from the port of Halifax-Dartmouth, in Atlantic Canada. I suggest that he take a look at the money spent, if the hon. member wants to join the debate, and tell me how it is fair. Of course Pierre Franche did well. He had $600 million to spend between Beauharnois and Québec City. What did we have in Atlantic Canada in the same period? We had $40 million. Tell me how that equates. Surely he did a good job. Everyone in Montreal knows he did a good job and everyone in Quebec knows he did a good job, but he is damned outside of those two areas. Talk to the people on the west coast and on the east coast. He did not do a good job, and he will not do a good job with VIA Rail. He will have to prove it every step of the way. It is negativism, and the hon. member knows it, and it is nepotism of the worst kind.

We want to allay these fears, so all we are asking is that the minister consider, just consider, between now and the time this matter gets into committee, whether or not he might not extend the capacities extended under the Harbour Commissions Act, so that we might draw into this decision-making process labour and the municipalities. It is not that I necessarily want them or believe that they should necessarily be part of the local ports corporation, but they should be drawn into the recommendations and into the government's thought processes so that there will be belief and credibility in the names of the nominees placed before cabinet for these jobs. We want to allay the suspicion that these are nothing but pork barrel positions. I think it is time we did that. Knowing the minister, I am sure he will consider a formula which accommodates the capacity of the Harbour Commissions Act.

Also, will he at least consider making certain that his nominees at least live in the area of jurisdiction with respect to appointments? With respect to these 20 mini Crown corporations, we do not want to see boards of directors such as that found in the Canada Development Corporation. What is the analogy? This government puts its head office in Vancouver and a chairman, a chief executive officer, president of the board, in Toronto.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He does not live in Vancouver.

Mr. Forrestall: No, so we want to avoid that. It is humiliating, somewhat arrogant, and it did not serve that area well. So, assure us that the process will not be an insult to the local community.

In conclusion, I welcome this bill. Some of my colleagues have strong reservations with respect to it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Misgivings.

Mr. Forrestall: They have some misgivings about it. But if there is one thing that I need to say tonight, it is that Canada needs this piece of legislation. It is not good legislation. It is not legislation in its best form. I believe the Standing Committee on Transport can improve it. I believe the minister has a sufficiently open mind that he will allow improvements. I think we can produce a good piece of legislation.

We need more accountability. I will reiterate just one or two points. We want joint auditorship or sole auditorship by the Auditor General of Canada. That relates to accountability, and the reason we need or believe that we want that at this point in time is simply that we have not seen the government's intentions with respect to Crown corporations over the medium to long haul. In the absence of a white paper and in the absence of legislation dealing with Crown corporations in our system, in our structure, we have reservations and we believe them to be valid. In that context, we believe that accountability, credibility of accountability, can be enhanced or enriched if the minister will accede to an amendment which will allow the Auditor General to be either the auditor for the Canada Ports Corporation and the local ports corporations or at least joint auditor. Therefore, I ask him to consider that.

The second point that I would reiterate in closing relates to the perception of autonomy. The bill, at first reading and on first blush, does indicate some degree of autonomy. We still have to see all the bylaws. We have to see the borrowing powers. We have to see the degree to which ports are treated equitably with respect to their statutory obligations, regulations and so on, the things that give them life and make them work. But remember, Mr. Minister and Mr. Speaker, that the people in the port community in this nation and its users will be watching this piece of legislation. They will be watching it to see whether, in fact, it does extend autonomy, whether there is that individual capacity to move, to expand, to promote vigorously, and to develop and compete without extending to any one port an advantage over another port.

I refer to the comments of my hon. friend opposite about the chairman of the National Harbours Board. The harbours and ports in this country have not been dealt with equitably over the last 15 or 20 years. The minister knows that. I hope this bill will extend equal statutory authority to all ports which will enhance and enrich their capacity to compete vigorously with one another for offshore export trade and import trade. The legislation designed in the early 1930s, coming into law in the mid-1930s, surviving for 45 years, has in fact been an excellent piece of legislation. It has served this country well, but it is outdated and it must be changed. I give to the minister my undertaking to support him to the degree I can, here on the floor on second reading, in the committee and back on report stage and on third reading. All that we on this side ask is that he support us in trying to make this a piece of legislation which will last as long as did the legislation based on the work of Commissioner Gibbs in the 1930s.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be the first to speak for our party on the ports bill, Bill C-92, an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and Recreational Harbours Act. As the Member of Parliament for the riding of Vancouver East, which borders on the Port of Vancouver, I have a very special interest in this bill. Over the past year, as part of the planning process in which the minister invited us to participate, I have consulted with National Harbours Board officials, maritime unions, regional and neighbourhood planning bodies, city councillors and also community residents near the port to get their opinions and their reactions to the proposed change in Canada's port policy.

I might say that the minister who invited this kind of involvement process seems to have indeed ignored many of the suggestions which were put to him, at least those made from my part of the country. The intent of the bill and its main features involve the creation of autonomous local port corporations, which are expected to be financially self-sufficient, regional administration of the smaller harbours and ports in Canada, as well as the creation of consultative bodies which would advise on port planning. A new ports policy which would embody a decentralized approach to port management and administration of ports has long been requested in this country and has long been delayed. We on this side of the House will support this bill in principle, but we do have a number of concerns which will require amendments before we can vote for it.

I would like to briefly review some of the historical trends which are relevant to the bill before us today, that is, Bill C-92. The concept of local autonomy in ports was present early in our history, way back in the 1800s, in the administration of the Port of Montreal as well as other ports. By 1906, however, the Port of Montreal had become so badly managed that the local board of trade asked the federal government to revert to the original form of central control. We see a reversal of the process that we are talking about today.

Because of the difficulties that Canadian ports were experiencing, by 1932 it was requested that Sir Anthony Gibb, a British authority on ports, investigate the financial losses and the inefficiencies of the Canadian port system. His 1932 "National Ports Survey", as it was called, reported that the local harbours boards were riddled with patronage. That was a very important point that he made. It is very relevant today. We are riddled with patronage by the party in power. He said they did not have the financial resources to provide low transport charges required for Canadian trade, and they failed to represent local interests and port users. This is quite important. The criticisms by Mr. Gibb are particularly relevant to some of the proposed changes in Bill C-92.

In 1936 the National Harbours Act established a highly centralized national ports system for Canada. We then moved to the National Harbours Board structure. Policy decisions were made in Ottawa for some ports that in some cases were thousands of miles away. As ports developed and national trade expanded, a highly centralized system of control became much too restrictive. Of course, it was overly bureaucratic, with long delays in decisions needed for practical operation of the port. Operational decisions were delayed by communication problems between coastal ports located thousands of miles away from isolated Ottawa.

Most restrictive, of course, was the statutory ceiling on contracts which required Treasury Board approval for any expenditures over $50,000. In his remarks the minister referred to the quite unrealistic administrative restrictions which this resulted in. Also, rates were imposed centrally by a three-person National Harbours Board.

The Glassco commission of 1962-63 recommended decentralization of the federal government services. Remember, this was in 1962, over 20 years ago. At that time it concluded, "Time and considerable correspondence and expenses will be saved if the local office is given the authority to make its own decisions in all cases except those involving government policy". Twenty years ago we needed decentralization. The need for reform was established 20 years ago. Yet subsequent Liberal governments have continued to delay changes time and time again.

The continuing problems therefore and the increasing inadequacy of the centralized port system led to a Speech from the Throne in 1974 which promised a reorganization of Canada's system of port management.

In July, 1975, the Scott committee, an interdepartmental committee, recommended the establishment of a new, single comprehensive port organization based largely on a national ports policy, but with substantial local autonomy in the management of the local ports and regional participation in the port-planning process. Still no action was taken by the Liberal government.

In 1977, Bill C-6, an act respecting Canadian ports, was prepared. This was to reflect the considerations of the Glassco commission and the Scott commission to foster local port autonomy where this was of local interest and where a port was expected to be financially self-sufficient. Need I say this bill was not enacted. It is almost like a conspiracy to delay changes.

In the glorious days of 1979 when the Conservative Party came to power, the needs of Canadian ports remained the same. The then minister of transport proposed a very similar bill which, of course, went down the tube with the Conservative government.

Because the Conservative position on decentralization was similar to that of the Liberal government, and reflected strong pressure from all regions of Canada, I cannot understand why some members of the Conservative Party, and I believe some from my region of the country, are opposing this bill. They certainly do not reflect the desires of the city of Vancouver which has undertaken a major study of this legislation. I will quote some of their recommendations later.

The city of Vancouver has asked for quick passage despite some reservations which we hold and which we will insist should become amendments in committee. The greater Vancouver regional district also supports this legislation, again with some caution. It certainly is important that we act on this, but with the changes that are needed.

The complex trends and developments in recent years require a much more responsive and effective system of port management. These trends include an enormous increase in economic development throughout the world, and an accompanying expansion of international trade. There has been a development of new multi-model systems for containerized cargo and larger size facilities. The 1973 energy crisis characterizing the OPEC decade greatly increased competition between ports. In addition, there are community demands for more sensitive, integrated and responsive approaches to planning and, I might say, more control over safety and environmental factors as well in the development of ports situated in major urban areas.

It is evident to all hon. members, I am sure, that reforms are long overdue. The reason for successive delays cannot be justified by this government. Greater decentralization must allow port profits to be invested in modernization and development of all international ports in Canada.

Continuing federal subsidies will be needed for smaller ports such as the port of Churchill, for example, that are essential to a region but that probably will never be able to achieve financial self-sufficiency. It is most important, as the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) said to me a few minutes ago, that a Canadian ports corporation set national policy to ensure that there is a co-ordinated and well integrated port strategy across Canada that takes into consideration the special needs of smaller less economically efficient ports.

Unlike some Conservative members who I believe are advocating complete privatization of our ports with no strings attached, we in the NDP believe that a national ports system should be co-ordinated federally while allowing maximum autonomy for local decision making.

The port of Vancouver makes a profit each year despite outdated facilities, facilities that have remained outdated because of National Harbours Board restrictions. Ottawa, under the National Harbours Board, at present continues to take away the gravy. It takes away the surplus funds. In fact, it generally controls the budget in the port of Vancouver. This has inhibited local development plans which cannot be implemented.

We believe that profits in the larger ports must be reinvested in port improvements in order for them to be competitive internationally. When these developments are completed and the financing or long-term capital plans are assured, surely then we can afford to share some of the surplus funds with other regions of Canada, but not under the scheme proposed in Bill C-92. We do not agree with the proposals in Bill C-92 which provide for continued federal control of budgets of local ports and which will still cream off surpluses which could forestall much needed port development and improvements. We, of course, Mr. Speaker, do agree with the concept of local autonomy for larger ports that are able to be self-sufficient now on in the near future. We believe this should be done within a co-ordinated national system. I must say we also agree with the last speaker, who has pointed out that we are not at all convinced that the Liberal minister and the Liberal government really believe in this, and certainly they have not spelled it out in detail to our satisfaction in Bill C-92. Therefore, there must be specific changes in this bill which will clarify the concept of decentralization and autonomy to the much greater satisfaction of local ports.

The port manager must have greater autonomy to make operational decisions under the direction of a local port operation without having to wait for approval from Ottawa. Currently a port authority must apply to the National Harbours Board through Treasury Board for capital expenditures up to $50,000, no more. Since one container crane costs $5 million, this is hardly realistic for most of the larger ports. Federal delays are intolerable.

The local port corporation also is the most logical port body to upgrade and modernize the port facility, and to be competitive within a particular region. There must be capital funds for long-range plans. In Vancouver, for example, we have a 20 to 30-year planning scheme being developed now with the municipalities, the provinces, the maritime unions, the businesses and adjacent communities, as well as with users of the ports. Users and regional bodies must be represented in the planning. These developments must be co-ordinated with multi-modal transport systems.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, I was amazed in Vancouver when I spoke to the port manager there at one time and learned that he did not know whom to contact in the railway system if there should be a major disaster in downtown Vancouver. He did not know the name of the person. There did not seem to be any intersystem kind of linkage that would assure the citizens, the city and the residents of our region, that we would not be blown up by some of the very dangerous cargoes that go through downtown Vancouver.

The capital funds for long-range plans must be assured, so that we can have reasonable planning. The local board must co-ordinate with the interprovincial and national policies and plans through the Canada Ports Corporation which will replace the National Harbours Board. This party agrees with the concept of local autonomy in port administration. We do feel that the government must be more explicit in terms of financial autonomy.

We do not agree with some of the other concepts which are implicit in this bill. It is indeed unfortunate that Members of Parliament are not allowed to discuss the regulations as well as the bill itself, since we fear that many of our concerns will be built into specific regulations, as the bill itself is very general in nature.

Our major concerns, Mr. Speaker, are in the following areas. First of all, there is the method of appointment to local port corporations, which will foster patronage, the typical way of developing ports on the part of the Liberal government, which allows no local or provincial appointees. We do not feel that regional advisory groups which are rather token in nature and do not have any real authority, are good enough to provide the input and the rational decentralized planning which is needed.

Secondly, there is the requirement that the local ports must be financially independent before they can achieve autonomy. This will impose a user-pay type of policy, which again is a favourite Liberal concept that will be penalizing and self-defeating for most ports in Canada which may not have a continuing high volume of business.

Thirdly, we are concerned about the lack of accountability to Parliament. This Parliament should be the body to decide when a local port corporation is applying to move for a change in category, for example, to become a harbour commission, in effect an independent Crown corporation. Under Bill C-92 this decision is made by orders in council with no reference to Parliament and no requirement for parliamentary sanction.

Mr. Pepin: Wait ten years?

Mrs. Mitchell: I would like to elaborate further on these points, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to hear from the minister afterwards.

As Sir Alexander Gibb said in 1932—and how apt it may be with regard to this bill if it goes through as planned:

> Local ports should not be riddled with political patronage by the party in power.

This undoubtedly will happen if Bill C-92 is passed as it stands. If the minister recommends appointees to the board and the cabinet decides, I think we can all speculate on who is going to be on that board. We will recommend in committee that the structure and process of appointments to the local port corporation board must include greater accountability to the local region which is served by the port.

We agree that the port board members must be experts who are knowledgeable about port operations. It should not just be anyone. We can have political patronage at the local level as well. It is particularly important that experienced workers be appointed to the boards, locally and nationally.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: I met with the CLC Committee which involves all waterfront unions, and this certainly is their opinion. We also agree that token appointments by city council or municipalities of just any old local alderman is not the way to go. We will press for a revised structure which will allow municipalities to recommend qualified people to the local port corporations board, as well as candidates who are proposed by maritime unions, local businesses, and the province, with a minority of federal appointees to be added. It is essential that the board members reflect diverse local interests and are not just defeated Liberal candidates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: We also feel that local board chairpersons should be voting members of the national board, not just ex-officio members. What is the point in having a national harbours board simply with token liaison persons from the local board? We feel that they must be voting members of the national board. The local port authority must be required to plan in a co-ordinated way with the municipalities and adjacent communities on matters such as access roads, traffic problems, movement of dangerous goods, environmental concerns as well as recreational access to the waterfront and port activities. Why should should children, for example, not be able to go and see at first hand the workings of the port? Why should our citizens who live near the port not have open access to the waterfront of the port? It should not be only the more affluent people who have access to beaches and waterfront areas.

Another question is that of financial self-sufficiency. As a Vancouver member, I agree that the port of Vancouver must be autonomous and financially self-sufficient with powers to reinvest the surplus in developments that are needed. This is necessary not only for the Vancouver region but for all of Canada, as this port is vital to the economy of Canada.

Our party also is just as concerned about the total port system in Canada and particularly about the less affluent and northern regions where financial self-sufficiency is an impossible dream. We are also concerned about ports like that of Prince Rupert, which is of interest to the member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: This is the fastest growing port in Canada and it deserves local autonomy, even though at this time it does not have the huge profit and needs much development to make it the port of the future.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. Let us hear more about that.

Mrs. Mitchell: There are also many activities going on to my left, Mr. Speaker. Just as we opposed a laid-on user-pay system for Canadian National Railways and other transportation systems in Canada, we oppose user-pay policy for our ports. Our national transportation system in Canada, a country so large and diverse, simply cannot be seen as just another business which can be operated only on a user-pay concept.

• (2040)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: There is no conceivable way we can do that. We do not object to realistic rates, particularly for multinational corporations and some of the international users of our ports. Regional needs and ability to pay the same rates must be a deciding factor, however, in a flexible and realistic rate system. Will small businesses in the north, for example, be required to pay the same rates as multinationals that use our southern ports? Since they have less income, will the port of Churchill or the port of Halifax continue to be run less efficiently from Ottawa because they cannot qualify financially to become autonomous? Surely they can be administered locally.

Statistics show that on the average our ports earned only a 2.5 per cent return in 1980. This is not enough income to raise the capital or pay market interest charges in the future. Most ports will need money at lower than market rates in order to invest in new technology and to expand their capacity to compete with international ports on this continent.

These are only some of the concerns we have and which will require amendments in committee. We agree with many of the points raised by the lead speaker for the Conservative Party and that amendments will be required in committee. Other members of this party will comment on the needs of ports in other regions, particularly the hon. member for Churchill.

In the time that remains to me I should like to speak about the port of Vancouver and refer to some of the recommendations made by the Vancouver Economic Advisory Commission in a document entitled "A Brief Respecting the Question of Local Port Autonomy" which was based on considerable study. I hope that the transportation committee will study this document in detail because its comments refer to the national port system.

While the Vancouver Economic Advisory Commission agrees with the over-all principles and proposed structure and function provided for in this bill—that is the local port corporations—it is very concerned that a gradualist approach will further delay port modernization, which is essential now if we are not to lose permanent business to United States ports. I hope that the minister will take note of this recommendation.

We hope that this bill will go through in an amended form, but it should not delay improvements that are needed in the larger ports that have the necessary funds to make those improvements. Vancouver cannot wait for the total Canadian port system to change. We need decentralized decision making to proceed with improvements now. The brief of the Vancouver Economic Advisory Commission makes the following recommendation:

> Local control over budgets (where financial responsibility and viability can be demonstrated) is fundamental to the efficient operation of certain Canadian ports; we are convinced that such powers are necessary if the Port of Vancouver is to realize its current and future potential.

We are appealing for a phased in development that will allow ports to go ahead with changes that are needed now, even though we realize that change on a national scale may take more time.

In the city that I represent, which has a huge, expanding international port, developments are severely hampered by outdated centralized administrative and financial control systems under the present National Harbours Board. Yet Bill C-92 will retain central control over local port budgets and surplus funds. Creaming off incomes when a port needs major upgrading and expansion is hardly the way to promote international trade and economic recovery. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, this is essential for all Canada.

While Bill C-92 will delegate more administrative and planning responsibility to a new local port corporation, it will not achieve the necessary port development unless surplus funds are reinvested in new technology and expansion to meet the expanding needs of the Pacific rim for many years to come.

We all know that the federal government is broke. We know there is a huge deficit. We know that the National Harbours Board under its new name, the Canada Ports Corporation, will need funds. Yet we do not think it helps the total system, and certainly not specific ports that need development, to cream off profits in one region too quickly.

The potential of trade and commerce from all regions of Canada, through the great coastal ports to Pacific rim countries must not be lost. This is vital to the national interest. I am sure my colleagues from eastern ports feel the same way.

I should like to read into the record some of the specific concerns of the Vancouver Economic Advisory Commission as set out in their brief of August, 1981. It reads in part as follows:

> —but we have serious concerns with specific reference to how these proposals might apply to the Port of Vancouver—
>
> There is a demonstrable need for local powers which would enable the port authorities to:
>
> (A) have administrative autonomy to more expeditiously conduct day to day affairs
> (B) have financial autonomy to raise the necessary funds for port development and port operations
> (C) have operational autonomy to respond more promptly to a vast and complex range of opportunities and challenges.
>
> To illustrate: the Port of Vancouver is expecting a doubling of cargo tonnage in this decade, and is planning for a capital expenditure of some $100 million over the next five years.
>
> The planning for such development is complicated by the need to deal with provincial and local government in some cases and at other times in areas which have a multi-jurisdictional character.
>
> The Port of Vancouver must be able to deal directly with local government on a wide range of issues (such as access roads, citizen access to port areas, land use questions, acquisition of properties for port development).
> Several of Vancouver's competitors—Seattle and Oakland—are locally-operated ports, and have a considerable advantage over Vancouver inasmuch as they may respond more quickly to evolving circumstances.
>
> It is significant that many of the world's largest and most successful ports—Rotterdam, Antwerp, Hamburg, Kobe, Yokohama—are operated by local and/or regional authorities.
>
> Local control over budgets is fundamental to the efficient operation of Canadian ports. We are convinced that such powers are necessary if the Port of Vancouver is to realize its current and future potential.
>
> We submit for consideration that:
>
> Local boards formulate policies and undertake programmes for local port development while the National Harbours Board determines over-all strategies for port development in Canada.
>
> Local boards should be comprised of members who live in the region and can offer a wide range of expertise.
>
> Local boards should be allowed to retain their surplus funds, and should be given the authority to invest them so as to increase the capital available for port development.

This is the Vancouver city council report—

An hon. Member: With no Liberals on the board!

Mrs. Mitchell: Vancouver city does not say that, but I am sure most members on this side of the House would agree. The brief continues:

> Local boards must be allowed to act as partners with local government rather than principally as intermediaries on such matters as planning and access.

This report was approved by the Vancouver city council and the greater Vancouver region. The city of Vancouver also has a detailed proposal which outlines 12 conditions of support, including the divisions of responsibility which it sees as being preferable. When the bill goes to committee I hope that these will be studied in detail. They endorse the concerns that we have expressed, that there must be a clear definition of the structure, composition, accountability and mandate of the local port authorities. The city of Vancouver makes 12 recommendations as conditions of its support for a Canada ports policy.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, we believe in administrative autonomy for ports in Canada and we support decentralization of port administrations which will result in administrative, financial and operational autonomy. However, we feel it is not possible to achieve this goal under the proposed procedure for appointment to local port corporations. Under the centralized budget control, which still remains under Bill C-92, it is essential that the local board be composed of locally appointed officials who have interest and expertise in port matters. Political appointments by the minister would detract from the credibility and autonomy of the corporation.

As to financial autonomy, surplus funds from financially viable ports should first be available for upgrading and modernizing to make local ports competitive. These funds should not be centrally controlled as in the past, although fair sharing requires some obligation on the part of profit-making ports to eventually assist underdeveloped areas. Efficient decentralization should allow local ports the power to borrow funds from either the private market or the government. This is not included in the bill. Government approval should only apply where a government guarantee is required.

On the subject of national policies, a co-ordinated national policy is needed to maintain certain standards common to all regions in Canada. In particular, we feel a uniform pay scale is essential to ensure equal pay for work of equal value for all workers in the Canadian ports system. There are many other reasons for maintaining a national port strategy to meet the needs of areas like the prairie provinces, which indeed depend on our coastal ports, and they must have a say in the development of our ports system.

We are concerned that the user-pay philosophy which is present in federal policy will have an adverse effect on many ports in Canada which are not profitable. According to the 1979 National Harbours Board annual report, only five out of 15 national ports realized a surplus in that year. Many ports in remote areas will continue to need subsidies to service underdeveloped areas. Therefore, while we agree that to be efficient, port administration should be decentralized to the greatest degree possible, we, unlike the Tories, would oppose any moves which might lead to privatization of our major ports. Port corporations, Mr. Speaker, must remain public bodies in order to control our import and export activities in the interest of all Canadians, and to enhance the local, regional and national economy of Canada.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, having heard the last speech I still cannot figure out where the Liberal Party west is on this bill. They seem to go all over the map, but I gather they are going to support a bill which is a rip-off of Vancouver and the western ports of this country.

Let me begin my remarks by being as mild, calm, quiet and polite as I possibly can. Mr. Speaker, Bill C-92 is an invidious, insidious and despicable piece of legislation. In my three years as a Member of Parliament I do not think I have ever seen a worse piece of legislation. That is saying something when you consider some of the things we have seen come through this House in the last two years. As the federal member for North Vancouver-Burnaby I represent a riding which surrounds the Port of Vancouver; one-third of the waterfront is in my territory. It is the largest port in Canada, the largest on the west coast of North America, and one of the largest in the world. As the federal representative for the port's interests, it is imperative that I convey to this House the absolute disappointment, distrust and concern that Bill C-92 has generated on the west coast.

Mr. Benjamin: That is not what they told us when we were out there.

Mr. Cook: It is equally important that the members opposite listen to what I have to say. It is imperative that the members of the Liberal Party, who do not represent the interests of Canada's western provinces, fully realize the detrimental effects of policy making and implementation at the behest of the east and at the expense of the west. In my remarks I will focus on the situation facing the port of Vancouver, the discriminatory and punitive effects Bill C-92 will have on the port's ability to meet the challenges of the future, and that port's importance to the Canadian economy.

The crux of the issue, Mr. Speaker, is local autonomy. We have, on the one hand, a pressing need for the displacement of a highly centralized system of port administration to the local level, and, on the other hand, we have the fabricated claim by the minister and his officials that this bill will provide the National Harbours Board group of ports with greater local autonomy. This particular booklet they have put out is full of lies, and I use that word advisedly. This is apparently what most of the people of the west coast have read, and certainly what my friends in the NDP have read, without really looking at what the legislation says. Indeed, this bill does not provide any greater measures for local autonomy than is now provided under the National Harbours Board. In fact, there is less autonomy than under the National Harbours Board Act of 1936. This bill has glaring deficiencies which, quite frankly, I do not believe can be rectified in committee. In addition, the minister and his bureaucrats have been telling people in the port of Vancouver that what is not provided for in the legislation will be provided through faith, trust and promise. Well, I do not believe that anyone on the west coast is naive enough to believe that this government will ever govern in the best interests of western Canada.

I have studied the minister's speech of June 14. Mr. Speaker, in the 40 minutes he spoke he provided a vague and inadequate list of the responsibilities of the local port corporation which will constitute local autonomy. He stated, first, that the local port corporation would be given the authority and responsibility for the day-to-day operation of the port. That is an incomplete comment. The ports already have that authority and responsibility. The minister has not stated how this power or right has been enhanced in this legislation. He has not done it because he cannot. Second, the minister stated that local port corporations would be allowed to set their commercial rates. What he failed to mention is that this right will be subject to the whims of the governor in council and the parent corporation. Clause 6.4(2) of Bill C-92 will allow the governor in council to amend the bylaws of any local port corporation. Clause 6.6 of the proposed legislation gives the parent corporation the right to issue directives to local port corporations, which these local bodies must comply with. Not "may", but "must".

According to the minister, the third measure of local autonomy accruing to the local port corporation is responsibility for all personnel matters. Mr. Speaker, they already have this power.

Fourth, the local port corporation will be allowed to tender and contract within designated limits. The minister, however, has not yet released the spending limits.

Mr. Pepin: We will do that in committee.

Mr. Cook: The best figures I get on this, by scuttlebut and by doing my homework, is maybe $5 million for the Canadian Ports Corporation, and maybe $1 million for a local port corporation. These figures are ridiculous. It will cost you $5 million for a crane, and you are talking about $1 million. What can you do with $1 million in a port the size of Vancouver?

Fifth, according to the minister, the local port corporations will be able to manage port property. Again, Mr. Speaker, the ports already have this right and, my God, I fight with them enough over what they are attempting to do in terms of raising their rates on water lot leases in Vancouver right now. This is a big deal, is it? That is no more authority than they already have.

Finally, the sixth measure promoting greater autonomy is that local port associations will be able to appoint the chief executive officer of their port. The minister himself went so far as to admit in his speech that this provision is merely a symbolic transfer of power, that it was cosmetic. So with the tabling of a new ports bill, the only real measure granting local autonomy to the ports of Canada will be their ability to appoint their port manager.

Quite frankly, I am offended. The concept of local autonomy espoused by the minister, his Liberal colleagues and Transport Canada officials, is an illusion. If Bill C-92 passes into law, the change made to the ports will be totally cosmetic. Real change will not be realized under this bill and the ports will not be granted the operational and financial autonomy which they desperately need.

Any member sitting in the House who had has any involvement with any of Canada's National Harbours Board ports realizes the pressing need to amend or replace the 1936 National Harbours Board Act. The existing legislation governing the port of Vancouver is almost 50 years old. Recent trends and developments, including increased economic development throughout the world and an expansion in international trade, the development of new multi-modal systems for containerized traffic, new technology attending large bulk facilities, community and regional demands for increased participation in port operation and increased competition between ports, have undermined the utility and relevance of the 1936 act.

Ports in the 1980s operate in increasingly complex markets and under a different set of circumstances than what existed in the 1930s. I think the minister will agree that the legacy of National Harbour Board control over the port of Vancouver can be characterized by the highly centralized National Harbours Board administrative structure which has been too slow and too distant to respond to the commercial requirements and aspirations of the port. In retrospect it almost seems ludicrous that a piece of legislation implemented in the 1930s would survive intact today. In fact, Canada is unique in its highly centralized system of port administration.

In Europe, harbour administration practices vary from country to country. However, decentralization of administrations is a standard feature. In the United States, ports and harbours are the responsibility of local entities, such as states, countries and cities. Financing of American ports and harbours is facilitated through grants from local or state authorities, the sale of bonds to the public and in some cases local taxation.

In Japan, the main functions of port administration were transferred into the hands of local bodies when Japan's port and harbour law went into effect in 1950. The main purpose of the Japanese law was to create port authorities independent of administrative organizations. That is what this government is not prepared to do. It is not prepared to give to ports, independence from the Ottawa administration.

Throughout Europe there is independence of the harbours. They compete with each other. They are efficient. We in Vancouver must deal with a bureaucracy 4,000 miles away that does not know what it is talking about. You might equate the situation to the port of Hong Kong being administered by a group of civil servants in London, England. You can imagine what the port of Hong Kong would be like if it were administered by a group of civil servants in London, England. That is what we are faced with in Vancouver. It is a port administered by a group of civil servants in Ottawa. An saying of maritime commerce states that there is no rivalry as strong as that between sea ports. When one looks at the recent progress of the port of Seattle, the port of Vancouver's natural rival 120 miles to the south, one can ascertain the consequences of the National Harbours Board's highly centralized and detrimental administrative structure.

Sources close to the port of Vancouver claim that the philosophy governing the port threatens to undermine the prominence of Vancouver as a world-class facility. Port of Vancouver users have had to contend with the National Harbours Board decision-making process of continuing consultation with bureaucrats and departments in Ottawa, this uncompetitive and uncommercial philosophy has hindered the viability of the port and the growth of the port. The philosophy governing the port of Seattle, a locally run port, Mr. Speaker, has been to build up the port's facilities in anticipation of increased maritime commerce.

Today, the port of Seattle which has 18 container cranes is thriving while the port of Vancouver which is struggling to obtain its fourth crane is losing business daily to its American west coast competitors. In 1979, container traffic provided more than 3,486,000 tonnes of the port of Seattle's business. In contrast, the port of Vancouver's share was only 975,000 tonnes. Analysts predict that the port of Vancouver will continue to lose out to the port of Seattle in container traffic, and it will be lucky this year to match last year's tonnage.

In a May, 1980, national transportation week seminar Keith Dixon, president of the Canadian Importers Association, told his Vancouver audience the following:

> Of all Canadian ports, none has lost more business than the port of Vancouver, where over the last decade, there has been a steady attrition to the port of Seattle and other western ports. Seattle, by being as autonomous as it is, is able to employ people or agencies to go out into the marketplace and extol the virtues of their port and its connecting transportation modes, while the port of Vancouver is severely constrained by the National Harbours Board's uninnovative approach to the whole subject of container traffic.

When the National Harbours Board Act was debated in this House in 1936, members held serious reservations about the consequences of a commercial alliance conducted between divergent parties separated by a continent. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat today remarks made by hon. members in 1936.

Vancouver mayor and member for Vancouver-Burrard, G. G. McGeer, had the foresight to realize the implications of the 1936 act. He stated:

> I have no reason to believe that men living in Ottawa can ever have the understanding, the sympathy, and the faith that are necessary to support and sustain the development of a port of the Pacific ocean.

Another west coast member, Howard Smith, the representative for Vancouver South stated:

> Ottawa being so far away from the Pacific coast, questions may come up from time to time which will not be properly or efficiently dealt with by a board serving in Ottawa.

We have suffered ever since. And how correct these men in 1936 were, Mr. Speaker. Even the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the man who has failed so miserably to understand the west, and the man who more than any other prime minister in this country's history has alienated western Canadians, has publicly recognized the serious implications the highly centralized National Harbours Board Act has had on the port of Vancouver.

During the 1980 election campaign, the Prime Minister called into my riding of North Vancouver-Burnaby. He is welcome in my riding any time because he is worth a few votes. A Canadian Press news story of January 20, 1980, reported the following:

• (2110)

> In his speech in North Vancouver-Burnaby, Trudeau said operational control of the huge Vancouver port would be transferred from the National Harbours Board in Ottawa to a local harbour commission.
> Aides said the move would mean local municipalities and area representatives to be appointed to the commission would be able to make major decisions on matters such as port expansion without having to seek approval from Ottawa.

Need I add that the Liberal candidate from North Vancouver-Burnaby was not elected, nor was the promise of the Prime Minister delivered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

Members opposite have a habit of raising expectations and failing to act on their promises. Nowhere is this more apparent than in Bill C-92. The Minister of Transport raised expectations in Vancouver in the past year with the distribution of two booklets published by Transport Canada Marine entitled, "Canadian Ports Policy". These two booklets outlined the objectives of a new Canadian ports policy.

The thrust of the new legislative initiatives is apparently to provide "local ports with a high degree of autonomy to manage and operate the ports". None of this is in Bill C-92, not a word of it. The pamphlets lie. I would not call the minister a liar because to be a good liar requires a man of high intelligence, but I will call his officials liars for putting out this kind of cheap propaganda. That is all it is.

The rationale for new ports policy restoring greater operational autonomy among the National Harbours Board group of ports received the full support of port of Vancouver interests. The Vancouver Economic Advisory Council welcomed the government's initiative by stating:

> It is our view that a new ports policy embodying a decentralized approach to NHB management and administration would confer very significant advantages upon Canadian ports, and is broadly analogous to approaches adopted by many of the world's largest and most successful operations.

However, upon the introduction of Bill C-92 in February of this year, it became quite apparent that the interpretations of local autonomy held by Transport Canada and the port of Vancouver people are totally incompatible.

Specifically, it had been anticipated in Vancouver that Canadian ports would assume responsibility for formulating operating and capital expenditure budgets which would be sent to Ottawa for information only, not approval. Marine administrators in Transport Canada are unable to comprehend that local control over budgets is fundamental to the efficient operation of certain Canadian ports. I cannot stress enough that such powers are essential if the port of Vancouver is to realize its current and future potential.

The administrative structure created by Bill C-92 will see a local port corporation governed under five levels of management. Four of these administrative bodies—the governor in council, the Treasury Board, the Ministry of Transport and the Canada Ports Corporation—will be centred in Ottawa. The Crown corporations, concept indicated that the government is unwilling to give up its financial domination over national ports. As Crown corporation these ports will be dependent upon Treasury Board approval for their operating and capital expenditure budgets. The perpetuation of Treasury Board approval will not free the port of Vancouver from the diatory process of bureaucratic intervention, which is the most offending aspect of the present legislation.

I cannot see how the Canada Ports Corporation will differ from the National Harbours Board, the corporation it replaces, when it comes time to make a decision. The people with real power in ports matters, the Ottawa bureaucrats responsible for the over-all policy directives and with the authority to approve long-term development plans and annual budgets, will be as far removed from the sea, especially on the west coast, as they have ever been.

Let me give a typical example of what DOT is all about. On the question of the national energy policy and what was being done to small bunkering companies in Vancouver harbour, we tried to get somewhere with the national energy people in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. We got nowhere, so we tried the Department of Transport. We thought its officials might understand the west coast a little better, what was going on out there and how they were ruining some of these firms. I finally got one of the officials of DOT on the telephone. I said, "Don't you realize what you are doing with that new taxation? There are people in Vancouver harbour still going bankrupt because these ships can go into Puget Sound, and refuel there at considerably less cost". I was going to continue, but suddenly the DOT official said to me, "Pardon me, Mr. Cook, where is Puget Sound?" If such people are concerned with ports policy, then how can we expect anything else but alienation on the west coast? An official of the Department of Transport did not even know where Puget Sound was. That is a true story. I fail to see how the decision-making process set up in this bill will be in any way enhanced or speeded up with so much bureaucracy standing in the way.

The financial autonomy of local corporations is further eroded by Section 34(1) which will allow both the parent corporation and the Minister of Transport to determine what earnings of the local corporation are excess funds and to expropriate that amount. This provision erodes the limited autonomy which National Harbours Board ports have today. The concept of expropriating excess funds of a local port corporation is unprecedented in port administration in Canada. I will not read what Section 34(1) of the legislation states because I do not have time, if I want to get through all the objections I have. Such a provision is not in the 1936 National Harbours Board Act. In fact, Section 31 of the act reads:

> Separate accounts shall be kept for each harbour under the jurisdiction of the Board and for each work or property transferred to it for administration, management and control and the revenues derived therefrom shall be assigned exclusively for the purposes of each harbour or work or property.

This is not in Bill C-92. They will be able to steal our money in Vancouver. Bill C-92 will allow either the minister or the parent corporation to expropriate the excess funds of a local port corporation without defining what they will consider to be excess funds or providing any kind of process for the local port corporation to appeal such an outright theft. Progressive Conservative members—and I warn hon. members of the New Democratic Party—who vote for the bill with that provision will be known as persons who voted to allow Ottawa to steal funds from the port of Vancouver the next time they face the electorate. This is particularly offensive to the port of Vancouver, one of the only ports under National Harbours Board control consistently to turn a profit. The B.C. Wharf Operators Association, the Vancouver Economic Advisory Council and the Vancouver Board of Trade have all submitted written briefs to the Minister of Transport outlining the grave consequences of this rip-off provision, but he has allowed it to remain in the act.

In effect, members of the Liberal Party are saying to Vancouver that whatever profit it makes in its port is theirs and that they will spend it in the east where they will perpetuate unstable, unviable and inefficient port operations. What the minister is going to tell and has told Vancouver in his soothing and paternalistic tones is, "No, we are not stealing your surplus funds; what we want to do is bank them for you". In his two briefing booklets, the minister stated that any excess funds drawn away from a local port corporation will be earmarked and earn interest before their eventual return to the port. I should like the Minister of Transport to tell me where this provision has been entrenched in Bill C-92. I have read the bill many times, and I have yet to find any mention of it in Bill C-92. It is not there, but the minister is running around talking about it. What kind of con game is the government trying to run against the people of Vancouver? Transport Canada officials have been unable to explain to me why they feel the need to look after local ports surplus and why this glorious concept of a central bank for the Canada Ports Corporation ports has not been spelled out in the legislation. It is not there and the minister knows it. He talked about it on the west coast and I think it is a con job.

As well, he is expecting the House to put a stamp of approval on this piece of legislation which is incomplete. The $50,000 spending limit under the National Harbours Board Act has never been amended. Bill C-92 proposes to make the spending limits of the parent corporation and its subsidiaries bylaws of their corporation, yet as this bill reaches second reading, the spending limits have not yet been determined. In view of the importance of a ports spending limit, how can the minister expect reasonable debate on the merits of this bill when all the facts are not evident to the House. Again, we see secrecy by the government. Let the government produce those regulations so we can look at them and have an opportunity to criticize the bill. Measures promised by the government to promote financial and operational autonomy have been qualified in the fine print of this bill. It is true that the local ports corporation will be allowed to invest in government bonds or other obligations. However, the latitude of the investment rights are limited as these investment decisions will be contingent upon the approval of the Department of Finance.

I wish to repeat this so we all understand what this bill proposes. As far as the Port of Vancouver is concerned, depending on the issue, the governor in council or the cabinet makes the decision, or the Treasury Board makes the decision, or the Department of Finance makes the decision, or the Minister of Transport makes the decision, or the Canadian Ports Corporation makes the decision. There are six levels of senior management, and the government talks about giving us autonomy in the west coast. Like hell, there is no autonomy for this bill on the west coast!

The minister must have been prepared for opposition to this bill because in his briefing booklets he stated that any National Harbour's Board Ports not wanting to go along with the local port corporation concept could opt out and become a harbour commission port. That is what is said in the booklet. However, when I read the legislation and the amendments to the Harbour Commission Act, I discovered the minister had prohibited such a transfer. Section 3(1) of the Harbour Commission Act states, and this will be the law:

> The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister, by proclamation, establish a harbour Commission for any harbour in Canada in relation to which a local port corporation is not established—

By putting the word "not" in there, the entire purpose of the act is defeated. It means the port of Vancouver cannot be made a harbour commission port. I suggest to the minister that this is what the legislation says, and he should not shake is head. Just read what the actual legislation says. Harbour commission status is probably the best form of administration for the port of Vancouver. In his speech of June 14, even the minister acknowledged the advantages of that form of administration when he stated:

> The Harbour Commission Act of 1964 . . . already recognizes the objectives of local autonomy, as we all know. In fact, these ports provide an excellent example of how well the concept of autonomy can work.

I am not surprised with the scope of the amendments to the Harbour Commission Act I just mentioned. If the port of Vancouver is to become the major revenue source for the Canada Ports Corporation, the bureaucrats of Transport Canada will be reluctant to remove this port from its greedy grasp.

This is a deceitful bill. On the one hand, the Department of Transport is telling the people of Vancouver that Bill C-92 will indeed provide the port of Vancouver with greater local autonomy either through amendments to the 1936 act or amendments that will allow greater flexibility for ports to transfer their status between our three groups of ports. However, when one spends the time to actually read the provisions of C-92, one comes to the conclusion that it is a terrible fraud to the west coast of Canada.

I am appalled by the absolute powers of discretion allowed the Minister of Transport in Bill C-92. It has been unanimously stated in the port of Vancouver that the success of any port's legislation will depend upon the type of people appointed to the parent corporation and to local boards. In Vancouver, these sentiments are rooted in historical precedents. The administration of the principal ports of Canada prior to the passage of the National Harbours Act proved far from satisfactory under politically appointed commissioners. Norman Hocking, a Vancouver historian, wrote that the board of the 1913-1936 Vancouver Harbour Commission became:

> —a political football, a source of sinecure jobs for the party faithful. The commissioners were removed with each change in government, and most of the employees were subject to party patronage. As a consequence, the commission system was far from efficient as a succession of party hacks—with no previous port experience took over control of the board.

In the past month this country has witnessed two extreme examples of political patronage. I do not have the faith—indeed, I do not believe any Canadian has the faith—that this Liberal government can operate on honourable principles when it comes to filling appointment posts. This bill makes no attempt to ensure that appointments to the various boards created by this act will be based upon merit and not political affiliation. No provisions are made in Bill C-92 conceding input into the local board selection process from the provinces, municipalities, local boards of trade and commerce, port users, employer associations or employee unions.

The Liberal Party is not the national political party. It is the party for central Canadian interest. Bill C-92 will perpetuate ultimate power in the east through its centralized decision-making mechanisms and its leverage for these patronage appointments.

The inadequacy of this bill serving western Canadian interest is particularly shocking when one takes stock of the importance of the port of Vancouver for the city of Vancouver, the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and indeed the economy of this country.

The port of Vancouver ranks as the second biggest port in North America after New York in volume of foreign cargo being handled annually. It is situated almost midway between Asia and Europe. It provides a logical end destination or interchange through-point for international maritime cargo. Almost 2,500 vessels from more than 50 countries utilized the port facilities annually. In addition, the Alaskan and international cruise ship trade generates a significant influx of tourist revenue for the local community. Approximately 160,000 cruise ship passengers come to the city of Vancouver each year.

The National Harbour Board officials in Vancouver have calculated that in its immediate area, the lower mainland of British Columbia, the port generates one in ten jobs through directly related port activity. Sources close to the port stress, however, that the port of Vancouver is not solely the port for Vancouver or British Columbia but has a national significance servicing the economies of western provinces.

An efficient, competitive and responsive port of Vancouver is of national significance, and a rational approach to its management is a necessity. What we have seen with the tabling of Bill C-92 is a careless and cowardly act by the Liberal government opposite. Bill C-92 represents the fourth attempt in five years to modernize Canada's system of port administration. Three bills have died on the Order Paper. While these bills were not perfect, they would have initiated greater change and would have provided more local autonomy than the bill we are dealing with today.

In his speech on June 14, the minister stated that, "We must have the best ports policy we can muster." I agree wholeheartedly with that statement and I would like to inform him that the House has seen bills such as C-61, C-6 and C-50 which are better than Bill C-92. They would have provided more of the degree of local autonomy that the port of Vancouver so desperately needs. Bill C-50, Bill C-92's immediate predecessor, was introduced in the House on March 19, 1979. The inadequacies of Bill C-92 are glaring in comparison with Bill C-50. First of all, in Bill C-50, the transport minister, after Treasury Board consultation, can give direction on financial management, operating and capital budgets and evaluation of assets to a port commission. In Bill C-92, the local port corporations will be classified as Schedule C bodies—which I might add is not explicit in the bill either—and their operating and capital budgets must be approved by Treasury Board.

• (2130)

In Bill C-50, port commissions can receive initial working capital for a total aggregate not to exceed $98 million, and can receive working capital, repayable in one year, and total aggregate not to exceed $20 million. There is provision for cancellation of National Harbours Board debts up to $505 million, and some portion can be deemed as capital for a port commission. In C-92, the Canada Ports Commission and the local ports commissions can receive working capital, but the total aggregate for both cannot exceed $10 million. There is no provision for cancellation of any debt, and all liabilities are transferred to the local port corporations.

Mr. Pepin: It has been done.

Mr. Cook: In Bill C-50, port commissions can make bylaws with cabinet approval. In Bill C-92, there is provision for cabinet to amend any bylaw of a local port corporation. There is less of interface in Bill C-50. Port commissions deal with the Canada Ports commissioner who implements the minister's responsibilities and directions, while local port corporations must deal with the minister and board of directors of the Canada Ports Corporation.

In Bill C-50, all substantial ports were to be proclaimed as port commissions by governor in council. In Bill C-92, a non-corporate port which wants to achieve the status of a local port corporation must receive the approval of the parent corporation, the minister and cabinet.

In Bill C-50, the port commissions were to receive their powers automatically. In Bill C-92, it is up to the CPC to decide which powers to give a local port corporation. In Bill C-50, the Auditor General was to have been a joint auditor for the port commissions. There is no such provision in Bill C-92. Why? Is the minister afraid of having the Auditor General audit the books of the Canada Ports Corporation, and if he is not, why is it not there? It is not in the bill, again. In Bill C-50, port commissions—I could go on with this matter. I could go on and talk for an hour about it, but I do not really think it makes much sense for me to do so. I think I have indicated enough distaste, enough anger and enough annoyance with this deliberate attempt to centralize the port of Vancouver back here in Ottawa and the deliberate attempt, by the use of propaganda booklets, to convince the people of the west coast that it is a good thing, and none of it is in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I think I will close on this note. I would like to state that the only way I would support this bill would be if the port of Vancouver were excluded from its provisions by amendment and if its status were changed to that of a harbour commission port.

Mr. Pepin: They asked to be included.

Mr. Cook: If the Liberal Party cannot deliver on its leader's promise, then I ask that this bill be allowed to die and the question of marine policies of this country be addressed only to the Progressive Conservative Party when it may be returned to power.

Mr. Pepin: How sad!

Mr. Cook: We have three Senators on the west coast, we have the apologizer, the fund-raiser and the sneaky Pete. All three of them out there are selling British Columbia, through this bill, down the river and the river happens to be the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Pepin: You should go home occasionally.

Mr. Cook: I am not prepared to allow Ottawa to continue totally to decide our fate and to steal the profits which the port of Vancouver makes, without any recourse whatsoever. I warn my colleagues in the NDP and I warn hon. members of the House that when they go to the electorate in British Columbia again, let them remember that one of the things people will realize, because I will make sure they realize it, that if anyone votes for this ruddy bill, this rip-off of British Columbia, they will face the electorate on the basis that they voted to allow the central Canadian government of this country to steal the profits from the port of Vancouver and not to give the port of Vancouver any of the autonomy it so richly deserves and needs to operate in the 1980s.

It is a despicable bill, and I thank you, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: I might run against you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Regina West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who just concluded his remarks: where was he in the last two years in the transport committee?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Port of Regina.

Mr. Benjamin: I would like to ask him if he intends to show up at a meeting of the transport committee and do the work that his colleagues in his own party have done for ten years on this bill. Will he quit insulting Members of Parliament—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Order!

Mr. Benjamin: The guy has never shown up for a bloody meeting; he has never been there!

Mr. Crosby: He is there when you are not!

Mr. Benjamin: He does not know what he is talking about!

Mr. Mayer: You missed a few transport meetings, too, Les! Calm down!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair is having a bit—

Mr. Benjamin: He insults his own colleagues!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair—

Mr. Mayer: Let us worry about that!

Mr. Benjamin: He has not done a lick of work for it and for Canada at this time, nor at any time.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He has read it, have you?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He does not read, that is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Regina West will understand that the Chair is having some difficulty finding a question on a point of order.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina West is having some difficulty, too.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Well, I fear it may result in an exchange which is more along the lines of hot debate than it might be as an appeal under the Standing Orders.

Mr. Cook: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benjamin: My point of order was a simple question. Is the hon. gentleman going to start appearing at transport committee meetings?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Benjamin: He has never been to one.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Down, Benjy!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has no choice but to recognize an hon. member who seeks the floor on a point of order. I recognize the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby on a point of order.

Mr. Cook: My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that I do not believe that a cheap canard like that can be allowed to stand without allowing me at least to answer the hon. member's question. My simple answer to his question is that I am not concerned with VIA Rail rates. They do not concern me. That is the hon. member's business, being from the city of Regina. However, when it comes to the ports bill, I will be in that committee, proposing at least a hundred amendments. So look for me then, Sir.

Mr. Benjamin: You have yet to show up!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I was there! You were not! A bunch of your colleagues worked on it, too, and you were not around!

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, maybe I can resolve the debate between the Conservatives and the NDP. In all fairness to the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), I have seen him at transport committee meetings and, as he says, he is there when topics of interest to his constituents come up. However, at the same time, I would also like to congratulate—

Mr. Pepin: That is once a year.

Mr. Flis: —the official spokesman for the NDP who never misses a meeting and comes up with very constructive suggestions in the transport committee.

Mr. Benjamin: None of which you accept.

Mr. Flis: We accept all of the constructive suggestions we can. However, so far in this debate, one issue of great concern seems to be arising—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Two are right and the other is wrong.

Mr. Flis: —and that is the issue of local autonomy and whether this bill provides real autonomy or whether it is just paying lip service to it. So, I just wanted to take about five minutes of the time of the House to perhaps clarify that matter, because I know that the opposition has lined up many hon. members who will speak, and we would like to give them the opportunity to speak to this bill.

Mr. Benjamin: Beware, Jean-Luc.

Mr. Flis: In introducing this bill, the minister clearly stated that he expected most National Harbours Board ports will be able to achieve local port co-operation status. Therefore, let us look at the powers of a local port corporation compared to what the NHB ports have now. Let me give hon. members just a few examples of the new powers this bill would provide. First, port managers are now appointed by the National Harbours Board in Ottawa. A local port corporation would have the power under this bill to appoint its own port manager.

Mr. Pepin: That makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. Flis: So, that is why I do not know why the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) is drawing in the red herring of patronage and everything else. The local port corporation will have this power to appoint its own port manager.

Second, rates and tariffs for services are now fixed by bylaw and are therefore subject to governor in council approval. Under Bill C-92, the local port corporation would set its own rates and tariffs with the single exception, of course, of harbour dues which will still be set by bylaw. Third, at present there is a $250,000 limit on spending for local projects and programs. Beyond that, Treasury Board approval is required, and we all know how long that process takes. Under the bill, much greater spending authority will be granted.

If funds for the proposed program are derived solely from working capital, that is not requiring government grants, then authority in the order of $5 million is being contemplated. Now there is a limit in legislation, as the hon. member who spoke before me mentioned, of $50,000 on the awarding of contracts. Again, a much greater limit is envisaged. In addition, any limit would be contained in bylaws rather than the legislation itself, so that changes can be made to fit future circumstances. The minister will be in a better position and will have more time to provide specifics when the bill reaches committee stage.

Finally, local port corporations will have clear authority over the employment of all persons necessary for the conduct of the affairs of the individual port. These examples clearly indicate a greater degree of autonomy. When the minister introduced the bill on June 14, he made it very clear that the ports had reached adulthood. The time has come to give them more freedom of operation than in the past.

The hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby referred to Bill C-50. A comparison with the predecessor to this bill, Bill C-50, shows that the degree of autonomy at the outset in perhaps not as great as in the present proposal. The minister made it very clear in his speech that the reason is that a balance had to be struck between the objectives of autonomy and accountability. The approach taken in this bill is one of evolution. It is quite possible that the degree of autonomy will be as great as in Bill C-50 over time, but the evolutionary process must take place.

This is because it will be possible to transfer from a Schedule C to a Schedule D Crown corporation without change to legislation. For the time being, ports will remain as Schedule C which, it should be recognized and I think hon. members recognize, has certain advantages. They do not have to pay any income tax. There are no dividends. They are eligible for government grants. Also, it will be possible to transfer to harbour commission status, the most autonomous of port structures in Canada.

I should add that this bill fulfills the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in January 1980 in Vancouver. The member for North Vancouver-Burnaby referred to that visit by the Prime Minister. I think the Prime Minister's promise has been fulfilled by this bill, that this government would give greater autonomy to the port of Vancouver, something I am sure the members from Vancouver would wish for their constituents.

In summary, I am convinced that the autonomy that will be achieved by individual ports through this bill will be very real. It is not just paying lip service. The changes are not cosmetic. Port communities across the country will applaud Members of Parliament in all parties for having supported this important piece of legislation.

Before closing, I would like to take a moment to commend the members of the Transport Committee for the way they worked together, sometimes in a very partisan fashion, but when the need arose for partisan politics to be set aside, they pushed through good legislation and good policies. If we can get this bill into committee, I know with that committee it will come out a much better and improved bill, something that Canadians right across Canada want.

I commend the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). When he spoke on the bill, he said:

> We want this kind of legislation. It is constructive legislation . . . The minister knows I personally want to see this bill through second reading, into committee and back into this chamber before we adjourn for the summer.

That is the kind of commitment and undertaking that Canadians want from the Official Opposition. The members in the gallery are listening to this. It has caught their attention. Members in opposition have a role to play, as do members on this side. The members on the Transport Committee are not pushed around. They know what they want. They know what is good for Canadians. I know that they will put this bill through and it will come out an excellent bill in the long run.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me begin my remarks on Bill C-92, which enacts the Canada Ports Corporation Act by considering the main thrust of the new part of this legislation. The two major features of this bill are, first, the establishment of a national ports policy and, second, the creation of a new corporate structure or framework to permit implementation of that policy.

If the national ports policy is sound and sensible and the organizational structure is efficient and effective, the bill will be a forward step for Canada's marine transportation industry. However, there is a real danger that a deficient ports policy and an inefficient and ineffective organizational structure will not be quickly or easily remedied. Indeed, it has taken over 45 years and three false starts in the House of Commons to produce Bill C-92. The warning and the challenge are both clear. We must examine the provisions of Bill C-92, particularly the new ports policy and the new organizational structure with a critical but open mind.

If on balance the new legislative provisions have merit, the bill ought to proceed to the appropriate committee for close and detailed examination. However, if the provisions contain defects that cannot be rectified or remedied, we ought to recognize that the eventual enactement of Bill C-92 will wreak havoc on a delicate but viable national ports system. For this reason, we should examine the current scope and status of the national harbours system in the context of the total marine transportation system.

First let me explain what I mean by the marine transportation system. It is an integrated system of onshore facilities and marine vessels coupled with the land transportation system that allows cargo to flow internationally and across Canada and to other points of destination.

Canada is very much involved in international trade. As the minister mentioned when he made his remarks on second reading of Bill C-92 on June 14, 1982, the 15 national ports handle 50 per cent of the cargo that flows across all Canadian ports and port facilities. That is 80 per cent of the total exports that Canada delivers to points beyond its boundaries.

It is very easy to see what is the force and effect of our port system. It handles the great bulk of export cargo and is very much a part of our international transportation system.

I commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) for allowing that international flavour to continue to exist in our marine transportation system. If he were to take the attitude of his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who looks upon the petroleum industry as something that can be Canadianized, other international participants being excluded, we would have havoc in marine transportation in Canada and in its interconnections with international associations. There is within this national ports policy the capability to continue the international connections that have existed since time immemorial in Canada. We will be able to take part in a national transportation system to the benefit of all parts of Canada as well as to the benefit of our trading partners, and to the benefit of participation in international trade. That is something that must be kept in mind as part of the larger world. If we exclude ourselves from that it will be to the detriment of the whole of the nation.

Let me look at the structure of the National Harbours Board as it exists today. We have the central authority, we want to have it decentralized. I would remind members of the House that that act of decentralization has already been started. In fact, many of the positions and many of the divisions and many of the internal structures that are part of the National Harbours Board complex have already been decentralized. So there has been taking place within the structures of the National Harbours Board a degree of decentralization and to some extent some of the ports like the port of Halifax have experienced that kind of decentralized control. So in many ways it exists throughout the national port system. I am referring primarily to the 15 national ports that are distinguishable from the harbours commission ports and the ports that are merely operated under the Government Piers and Harbours Act. There does exist with respect to some of those 15 ports a kind of local autonomy. I think those ports, like the port of Halifax, that have had a degree of local autonomy, realize and recognize that this is a very viable kind of control and that if it is increased and advanced in the future it may have traumatic effects on the ability of local ports to service their communities and to create greater economic opportunities within those coastal communities.

One thing we should keep in mind, however, Mr. Speaker, is the competition that already exists amongst national ports that operate under the National Harbours Board at present. That competition, Mr. Speaker, in many ways can be quite healthy but in other ways may be quite damaging. Just as evidence that such competition exists, I refer to an article by Mr. Charles N. Forward, entitled "The Development of Canada's Five Leading National Ports". I hasten to add that included in that designation of five leading national ports are the ports of Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, as well as the port of Vancouver. Of course, the first four named ports are on the east coast of Canada and are in direct competition. Mr. Forward says in his article:

> Competition between the ports has waxed and waned throughout the years and specific regional rivalries have developed. Montreal and Quebec have competed for the trade focused on the St. Lawrence system, as have Halifax and Saint John for that focused on the ice-free Atlantic coast. But in a broader context, Montreal and Quebec have co-operated against their Atlantic rivals in defending the St. Lawrence share of national trade versus that of the Atlantic ports.

What that statement makes clear, Mr. Speaker, is that the ports of Montreal and Quebec, with the assistance of the national structure that exists in the National Harbours Board, have combined their efforts to take an unfair advantage of the east coast ports of Halifax and St. John. Nobody knows that better than the participants in port activity in the port of Halifax. They have always seen the Montreal-Quebec complex as being unfair competition. Whether that statement can be documented in terms of statistics over the years hardly matters, because the perception is very clear. The federal authority, through the National Harbours Board, has given unfair advantage to the ports in Quebec, and particularly the port of Montreal.

What example can I give, Mr. Speaker, of unfair advantage? There are allegations of sweetheart deals in the port of Montreal, given by the National Harbours Board through its local officers, to companies and to onshore companies which operate vessels, like the TASK group that maintain facilities and utilize the port of Montreal. How can that allegation be countered? Very simply, Mr. Speaker, by producing the facts that relate to these deals that exist in the port of Montreal and in all the national ports under the control of the National Harbours Board.

Is that kind of information forthcoming, Mr. Speaker? No, Sir, there is litigation before the courts right now, where the litigating parties are asking for this information. Mr. Speaker, Halterm, which operates the major container terminal in the port of Halifax, has had an increase in its rental fees, at the demand of the National Harbours Board, from 15 cents a square foot to 65 cents a square foot. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, the operators of that tremendous container facility in the port of Halifax want to know if this is a fair increase in the rental for the facilities they have. They can only know that if they know what their competitors are paying in the port of Montreal and the port of Quebec and other ports operating under the same National Harbours Board system. That information is not provided, so they do now know, and thus the suspicions rise. So, Mr. Speaker, it is important that we recognize what has been happening in the current set up through the National Harbours Board. We have the competition between the ports, particularly the ports on the east coast. We have that competition based on what may be unfair practices, in terms of sweetheart deals for rental facilities at less than their value.

I would remind members of this House, Mr. Speaker, that the National Harbours Board in its last report, for 1981, had a net income of $59.8 million, and that was on total revenues of only $180 million. So, Mr. Speaker, the National Harbours Board is doing very well through the ports that it now operates, the national ports like Halifax and St. John's. We have to be very wary, Mr. Speaker, to be sure that the National Harbours Board is administering the act fairly among the ports under its jurisdiction.

There is another point that we have to put on the record in this House, so that we can properly judge this bill and judge whether it is going to remedy the mischief that has occurred in the past. I refer to the recent write-off of debts by the National Harbours Board with the aid and co-operation of the Government of Canada. That write-off amounted to something like $475 million. The Minister of Transport recently in the House quoted an amount of $500 million, which is even greater. That write-off of debt consisted of $350 million of capital debt and $150 million in interest on that capital debt. That debt of $500 million that is owed by the National Harbours Board to the government and to the people of Canada was simply wiped out. But how is it wiped out and in respect of what ports was it wiped out? Well, $133 million in capital and $98 million in interest was wiped out, cleared off the books, cancelled, in respect of the port of Montreal. So, Mr. Speaker, there we have $231 million of debt wiped out in the case of the port of Montreal. That is over half of the total debt write-off. When you do things like that, Mr. Speaker, it is not hard to realize that this great national organization called the National Harbours Board can show a net income of $59.8 million. But the taxpayers of Canada should not be fooled by this, because there is no $59.8 million in real net income terms. It is simply $59.8 million taken from one pocket of the taxpayers and put into another pocket of the government and a government agency. So, Mr. Speaker, we have to be very wary.

I wanted to point out, before I get to more positive remarks about the bill, that we do have a few complaints about the National Harbours Board, we do have a few complaints about the way the government has dealt with the National Harbours Board and with the way the National Harbours Board has dealt with some of the national ports, particularly the port of Halifax, in debt write-off and in the matter of creation of facilities.

There is a great deal more, Mr. Speaker, that I want to say, but if I might call it ten o'clock and resume the debate at a future time, I would be quite happy to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is proposed by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) that I call it ten o'clock. Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—AVAILABILITY OF FUNDING. (B) ADVANCE CROP PAYMENTS

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago I had an opportunity to question the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in this House during question period concerning items very important to the agricultural community in Canada. I asked about plans that the government may or may not have for assisting farmers in financing their day-to-day affairs. Specifically I referred to some of the things the government could be doing now as the result of the passage of Bill C-88, dealing with farm credit, that enables the Farm Credit Corporation to raise money by any means, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance.

• (2200)

I asked the Minister of Finance about plans he may or may not have to support the Minister of State in the other place, who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), in their efforts to raise the level of cash advance under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Specifically, I was concerned about what the government intended to do with the Farm Credit Corporation.

As the farmers of this country know, for a long time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) promised that the Farm Credit Corporation would receive additional funds with which to enable farmers to meet their financial commitments. Many times over the past few months, prior to June 1, the minister has made the statement that the corporation would receive an additional $1 billion in funds on June 1 that would be available for loans to farmers at favourable interest rates. Many members of the agriculture committee which dealt with Bill C-88 thought that the minister was going to make use of Clause 16 of the bill which reads as follows:

> The Corporation may, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, borrow money by any means, including issuing and selling bonds, debentures, notes and other evidences of indebtedness of the Corporation.

To a lot of members that meant that the corporation was going to be in a position, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, to make use of the small business bond which had worked quite well during the two years it was in operation and before the Minister of Finance changed it in the budget of November 12, 1981.

If the Minister of Agriculture can prevail upon the Minister of Finance to allow the Farm Credit Corpration to make use of some of those areas of the bill that would allow the Farm Credit Corporation to raise money, it would be of assistance to the farming community.

Members of this party have often suggested that the agribond concept be adopted. This would mean that a farmer would have the opportunity to lend money to the Farm Credit Corporation at a preferred rate of interest and would likely do so, if he was assured that the money would be made available to farmers or people engaged in agriculture in his own area in order to assist them with their ventures.

This is important to the farming community, because farming has become very productive in the past few years due to the fact that it is increasingly capital intensive. This means that more money is needed to finance the day-to-day operations of the farm. Anything we can do to assist farmers to gain access to financing at reasonable rates will help them.

This is evident in present conditions of extremely high rates of interest. The books of many farm operations show that the largest single cost is not in relation to seed, fertilizers, repairs or wages, but interest payments. This situation puts a strain on the farming community's efforts to remain as productive as it has been in the past. This is a very serious matter and the Minister of Finance should pursue it. I hope the parliamentary secretary will respond favourably tonight to the suggestion I put forward in my question two weeks ago.

The second thing that I want to cover is what is happening to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The purpose of this act was to enable the Canadian Wheat Board to make advances to farmers who have grains, handled by the board; wheat, oats or barley, in storage; that is, to borrow money against them. The money is not in the form of a gift, but simply an advance against the grain that has been grown but not yet marketed. The loan is interest free; the federal government picks up the interest. That provision has been widely used in the past. The act went into effect in 1957.

At that time the limit on the advance was $5,000. Subsequently, it was raised to $15,000. But that can only be a portion of the money represented by his stored grain. As an example, if a farmer only grew $10,000 worth of grain, he would not be able to obtain a $15,000 cash advance. He could obtain approximately two-thirds of the initial price, which would work out to probably something like 50 per cent of the value of the grain. So it simply means that once a farmer has grown the grain and stored it, if he is not able to sell it he can go to the Canadian Wheat Board, get a cash advance and use that as normal operating funds to pay for fertilizer, seed and other operating expenses.

This has been very useful, Mr. Speaker, but I have two statistics which point out what has happened as interest rates have gone up and farmers, like any other businessmen in the country, have found themselves in a cost-price squeeze. In 1980 there were something like 15,400 applications. In 1981 that number almost doubled to 28,000. But the interesting fact is that in 1980 there was something like $61 million advanced to farmers under this act, but in 1981, even though the number of farmers did not quite double, the amount of money loaned out went up by three times, to over $205 million. That gives you some idea of the use of that provision by farmers.

I suggest that if the government is interested we on this side would co-operate and put through an amendment to the bill which would substantially raise the level from $15,000. I do not know what the figure should be, but I suggest it should be $25,000 or $30,000 at least. There have been suggestions that it go to $50,000. If the government did that, farmers would have access to additional funding for the beginning of the crop year, which is August 1. I hope the parliamentary secretary will respond favourably to those two suggestions.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked the minister to take a look at some of his ideas, and I personally welcome them as concrete suggestions. I may say in return that the hon. member must know that the minister, as he showed today, has quite a few ideas of his own and we are all looking forward to his announcements next week. We will hope that we can have additional discussions on this in the future.

The minister is aware of the financial difficulties faced by many farmers, and he is examining new measures being proposed to provide selective aid to those farmers with viable operations but who are in financial distress. The member has mentioned the question of an extra $1 billion for funding the Farm Credit Corporation. I refer him to Bill C-88 which was proclaimed on April 8 this year. It provides for an extra $75 million in government equity in the FCC, and that amount in turn increases the corporation's statutory borrowing authority by an additional $1,875,000. Amendments to the act also enable the FCC to borrow funds externally with approval of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and this provides a more flexible source of financing, the use of which is currently being studied by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the FCC. Initially it would, of course, be unreasonable to expect the FCC to borrow $1 billion as its first venture into the private sector.

Bill C-88 also provides for interest rebates of 5 per cent over two years under the $45 million special loan program designed to assist farmers in financial distress.

The hon. member has referred to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. An amendment to provide additional funding is under consideration. However, the hon. member suggests that additional funding could be made available to farmers under this program without increasing the deficit. He should know that advances under that act are made to farmers by the Canadian Wheat Board using its line of credit with chartered banks, guaranteed by the Minister of Finance under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. The government pays the cost of interest and is liable for any loss which may occur in the event of a default.

The hon. member should know that in the year ended March 31, 1982, payments in connection with the Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act totalled some $13 million as was reported to this House in the final supplementary estimates for that year.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST THAT ACID RAIN SUBCOMMITTEE BE REACTIVATED

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see that my good friend, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) is here this evening. We served together on the acid rain subcommittee. Acid rain is the subject of my remarks tonight. I want everyone to know, hon. members and anyone who is listening or watching these proceedings, that the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean and others serving on that committee came down with a unanimous report on the terrible urgency for this country and the United States to do something jointly about the acid rain problem.

What is significant is that the all-party subcommittee on acid rain worked extraordinarily well together. All of us believed, no matter what our partisan political position, that Canada is being hammered to death by acid rain, as is the United States although not proportionately to the same degree. However, certain places in the United States are taking just as much punishment.

Our subcommittee agreed jointly and in a non-partisan way that something had to be done about acid rain. We had the unique advantage of being able to go to Americans and say, "One of the differences you have in this country is the acid rain situation." On this subject there was no partisan difference among the major political parties of our country. Acid rain has to be stopped. We cannot stop acid rain all by ourselves. Fifty per cent of the acid rain that falls on Canada comes from the United States and 50 per cent comes from us. But the only way to stop acid rain is by having a joint agreement. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, along with many members of all parties, who know exactly what I am talking about, will not disagree—I hope they will not disagree—with anything I have to say tonight.

In recent days we have seen headlines in newspapers. There was a report in The Globe and Mail on Wednesday, June 16, 1982, which stated that the U.S. blames the stalling of talks on acid rain was as a consequence of statements made by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) for the Government of Canada. The minister is saying effectively that the Americans do not want an agreement—at least the American administration does not want an agreement. There is a big difference there because this does not apply to all Americans. The American administration does not want an agreement and is stalling. That is what the minister is saying.

Hon. members know that on June 17, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), my colleague in the Conservative Party and spokesman for environmental affairs for our party, raised the following question with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau): "Please, will you get involved in this in a much more high profile way?" On the same day I put a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, asking him to please reactivate the subcommittee on acid rain. The Prime Minister said he would take those remarks under consideration and pass them on to the Minister of Environment.

On June 16, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), a member of the New Democratic Party who served on our acid rain subcommittee, moved a motion under Standing Order 43, asking that the government reactivate the subcommittee on acid rain. A day later I put questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) asking what response his department has given to the subcommittee's unanimous report that was brought down last October on what must be done to stop acid rain in this country and in the United States. I am sorry to say that the Minister of Energy said he had discussions occasionally with the Minister of the Environment, but the Minister of Energy did not answer my question about what kind of response in writing that department had given.

I must tell hon. members that we are in a very, very serious situation. The Minister of the Environment is not mincing words when he says that these talks with the Americans are in imminent danger of collapse. I urge all hon. members to join with me tonight in endorsing the necessity to reactivate the acid rain subcommittee.

This is not the first time this has been requested. I wrote a letter to the Minister of the Environment on May 12, 1981, asking that the acid rain subcommittee not be disbanded. On June 5, 1981, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin), who was the chairman of our very effective committee and who gave great service to the country and to the committee—and I do not apologize for saying that—also wrote to the hon. House leader asking, "Please don't disband the acid rain committee."

Recently the Minister of the Environment spoke to the Air Pollution Control Association in New Orleans on June 21, 1982. By the way, I was invited by that group some number of weeks ago to participate in a special seminar on air pollution problems in North America. At that time the minister said:

• (2215)

In Canada we are deeply disappointed with the state of negotiations between my country and the United States government on acid rain. The footdragging and interference in the development of scientific information has reached frustrating proportions. The administration's rejection of our proposal to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions in eastern North America by 50 per cent by 1990 and a clear indication that it may be some considerable period of time before it will be able even to begin to discuss control actions, is a bitter pill for us to swallow.

In the moment or two remaining I want to say that if we are to win this battle, we must break away from traditional diplomatic channel because they are not sufficient. I see the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean nodding in agreement. We have been through this and we know that we must find other ways to get at American legislators. We need to reactivate the acid rain subcommittee. We need to have Members of Parliament from all parties going to the members of the House of Representatives and to American senators. We need to support our own Canadian coalition against acid rain. We need to have individuals working under a policy to co-ordinate and support the efforts of hundreds of thousands of Americans who also want to stop acid rain in their country.

My question is simple. It arises out of the questions which I and other members have put in the House and through correspondence. Will the government consider reactivating the subcommittee on acid rain to give us a chance to get at American legislators? I know, because I have been there, as have other members, that we can get to them on a personal basis. That is not possible through traditional diplomatic channels. We must use every possible resource, tactic and strategic, available to us. If we do not do that, I say that we will fail in this. We cannot have a quarter of our country savaged by this terrible phenomenon because it will not be accepted by our children or our children's children.

Mr. Jim Schroder (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to respond to the question of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). The fact-finding report of the subcommittee on acid rain has been helpful in raising public awareness of the acid rain issue in both Canada and the United States.

A number of the recommendations of the subcommittee form part of the program activities which we have been carrying out for some time. To note just a few, in April, 1981, Environment Canada issued national emission guidelines for new thermal power plants. A review of new motor vehicle emission standards for nitrous oxide is underway. Standardized monitoring techniques are being put in place. United States legislators and journalists have visited Canada to see our concerns first hand.

The hon. member for Vancouver South quoted from the minister's speech in New Orleans. I should like to continue that quotation, wherein the minister said:

> The latest obstacles, which occurred less than one week ago at a negotiating session in Ottawa, are forcing us to an agonizing reappraisal of the usefulness of continuing discussions.

He continued:

> Our emission reduction proposal was drawn from the same science that U.S. negotiators have drawn diametrically opposed conclusions. On a per capita basis our proposal is more costly to Canadians than to Americans. We are willing to put our money where our mouth is. I can only conclude that the values and factors influencing Canadian decision-making are considerably different from those in the U.S.

• (2220)

Acid rain remains one of our foremost environmental problems. We are looking for ways to break the log jam, to continue constructive dialogue with the United States to find solutions to this problem. This is important since in Canada, as a whole, 50 per cent of our acid rain originates in the United States, and in the regions of particular concern, such as the tourist and recreation areas of Ontario, as much as 75 per cent of the acid rain comes from the United States.

When the sub-committee reported on the nature and complexity of the acid rain problem it concluded that the problem was indeed serious. The nature of several of its recommendations also clearly indicates that regardless of the complexity, enough is already known to begin taking control action. This position has been clearly accepted.

The minister is aware of the concern hon. members have expressed over the state of acid rain negotiations. He shares their frustration with the lack of progress that has been made so far. Indeed, he welcomes any suggestion which could help bring discussions with the U.S. to a fruitful conclusion.

As I mentioned earlier, the Department of Environment is currently undergoing a reassessment of its approach in these difficult negotiations. Reactivating the subcommittee is one of a variety of options which are available to the government. The suggestion and the interest of the hon. member is appreciated and will certainly be considered as a possible alternative to our current method of negotiation.

If the minister and the government decide that reactivation of the subcommittee may help resolve the serious problem of acid raid, this option will be given serious consideration. In any event, with the vast amount of knowledge that members of the subcommittee have accumulated, I would encourage them to continue making their views known so that we can continue keeping up the pressure on the United States.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO TAKE TO HELP LEBANON

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, before coming to the issue I wish to raise this evening, I would like to say that I am in complete agreement with the last comments made by the hon. member for Vancouver-South (Mr. Fraser) concerning acid rain. He has my full support and I hope that his representations will bring results.

As for the issue I want to raise myself, I directed a question this week to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) concerning the opportunities available to Lebanese people wishing to come to Canada because of the war in their own country. I asked to bring up this issue again, Mr. Speaker, because I want people in Canada to be better informed about the situation in Lebanon and the reasons why Canada should now help the Lebanese people.

As Canadians, we have some responsibility in this matter. For two years, I have been trying to explain this responsibility in the House, but it has not always been easy because the problem is very complex. I shall now try in the few minutes available to me to explain this responsibility. Hon. members will know that, for whatever reason, 40,000 Syrian soldiers have been residing in Lebanon for the last six years. Even though they were once invited into the country, these 40,000 Syrian soldiers constitute a foreign military force in Lebanon. I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that Lebanon has always been an ally of Canada and of the western block, a capitalistic country, one of the most beautiful countries in the Middle East and of all the countries in the Middle East, the one which probably resembles most Canada. This has therefore been the situation in that country for the past six years. For two years, I have been asking the Canadian government to take a stand and to request that Syria withdraw its troops from Lebanon because, as everyone knows, the Lebanese people and the Palestinians, or the PLO for those who prefer, have been living together for years with no problem at all. There would be no problem if they were allowed to live together under a Lebanese government or under the supervision of a United Nations international force. These people are able to live together. The problem came about because the fact that a small country such as Lebanon, which has a population of 1.5 million, also included with its borders 40,000 Syrian soldiers as well as 300,000 Palestinians ten per cent of whom are armed to the teeth, in addition to all the weapons which enter the country regularly. This has created a kind of channel which was bringing war to the very borders of Israel, and for the last two years, I have stated frankly in this place for everyone to hear that Israel eventually would have no other choice but to attack Lebanon because of this enormous concentration of troups. This is the responsibility that Canada must share with all other western countries, Mr. Speaker. Since 1975, we have closed our eyes to the fact that Lebanon was bound to be the place where a war between other countries would be fought. Now, everyone is surprised to see that the Israelis and the Syrians are not bombing each other and are waging war on a territory which is not theirs. Not a single Israeli bomb as fallen on Syria and not a single Syrian bomb has fallen on Israel. These bombs fall on the country which is most similar to ours, our greatest friend in the Middle East, namely Lebanon.

• (2225)

In that context, considering that those people are being bombarded and that they are about to lose their homes, their wealth, their children and perhaps even their nationality, are we Canadians along with some of our allies such as the United States helping them today to find a way out of this predicament, or at least helping them to survive? I would ask the parliamentary secretary to further explain what he said this week. What does it mean for the Lebanese who are already here and for the others who are anxious to come to Canada, and what facilities will our government make available to them? I also wish that once and for all Canada would ask that all foreign troops be withdrawn from Lebanon, be they Syrians or Israelis. I also urge our government to support the Lebanese people as a nation and help them survive as a country, either by sending troops to join the UN forces or by voting in favour of maintaining there a military international peacekeeping force. But indeed we should let the Lebanese people be Lebanese, we should let that friendly country survive and be our friend. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me those few minutes to make my point and I look forward to hearing the reply of the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would first commend the honourable member for Lac-Saint-Jean for his contribution this evening and his plea for the Lebanese people. He showed an excellent knowledge of the situation in that country and his involvement in this issue for more than two years. It is true that Lebanon is going through extremely grave and trying times, and for that reason and to reply to all the points raised by the honourable member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) and others across the country, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) last week, on Tuesday June the 15th to be exact, announced the special measures taken by the Canadian government to face that most unfortunate situation now prevailing in Lebanon. I would like to take a few minutes to review those measures and try to bring them in better perspective for the benefit of Canadians. First, Mr. Speaker, the 1,000 visa holding Lebanese visitors now in Canada will be authorized to remain in Canada for one year after their visas have expired, in addition to that extension, a work permit will be granted. At the end of the one-year period, each individual case will be reviewed and a decision taken as to the possibility of applying for permanent resident status.

Second, Mr. Speaker, Lebanese visitors now in Canada and having close relatives in this country can, under the Act, apply for permanent resident status without having to leave the country in order to submit their applications outside of Canada.

Third, Mr. Speaker, Canadians or permanent Canadian residents with relatives facing difficulties in Lebanon will be entitled to sponsor the latter, even though they may not meet the usual criteria under the Immigration Act.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, no person under a deportation order will be deported from Canada and sent back to Lebanon before the situation in that country is back to normal. It should be emphasized that it is difficult if not impossible to tell Beirut residents that for the time being no one can have access to our Canadian embassy. Just this evening, we saw on the newscast the bombing in Lebanon, especially in Beirut, and it is absolutely impossible to ensure that our Canadian embassy in Lebanon can extend usual services.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would emphasize that the Canadian government gave the International Red Cross $1 million to help and support people now in Lebanon. Of course, other steps will be considered in due time, and hopefully the situation in Lebanon will correct itself, and that friendly nation will be able once again to enjoy peace.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Atlantic Canadians have been brutalized by the government's callous non-efforts to recognize their region as a meaningful part of Canada. A spark was struck for them yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House give every encouragement to the Minister of Finance not to let that glimmer of hope be extinguished forever on Monday night.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED TAX EXEMPTION FOR SASKATCHEWAN HOME OWNERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The "Devine" government of Saskatchewan yesterday implemented 13.25 per cent interest rates for home owners in the province of Saskatchewan. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this government do not tax the benefit of the 13.25 per cent interest rate to home owners in the province of Saskatchewan.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA—CZECHOSLOVAKIA AGREEMENT—CALL FOR ELIMINATION OF DUAL CITIZENSHIP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That before finalizing the Canada-Czechoslovakia agreement resolving outstanding issues between our two countries, which the outgoing Czechoslovakian ambassador has indicated is in its final stages, the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a statement on motions to ensure that, at least, the dual citizenship notion in any such agreement is resolved thereby eliminating the current blackmail tactics employed by the Czech authorities against Canadians of Czech origin visiting Czechoslovakia.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY LAY-OFFS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. B.C. Telephone Company recently announced that it will lay off up to 2,000 of its employees for six months due to alleged revenue reductions even though the company has received residential rate inreases totalling 18 per cent from the CRTC for this calendar year alone. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That instead of savaging its own employees this House calls on B.C. Tel to solve its alleged financial problems by altering its policy and practice of buying shoddy over-priced hardware from its big mother company in the United States, the General Telephone and Electronics Corporation of Stamford, Connecticut. Further, that this House instruct the CRTC to roll back the 18 per cent increases given to B.C. Tel this year if it persists in this plan to reduce further the already unacceptable quality of service it provides to its subscribers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

COMMISSION EXPENDITURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. We have all heard of ten-speed Liberals. I would like the House to acknowledge one-speed MacEachen, that is, reverse. We look forward to his Monday night's reversal with the hope that he will roll back the government's negative economic and energy policies, cut government spending and taxes, and offer some stimulus to job creation and productivity. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That, if the minister is looking for areas to cut government spending and at the same time assist small business as well as consumers, he might look to the Metric Commission which this year will spend about $10 million and which will add untold millions of dollars to the overhead costs of retailers, which will result in higher prices to consumers at the check-out counters.

HOLIDAYS ACT

REQUEST FOR DESIGNATION OF CANADA DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In a few days, on the first of July, we shall be celebrating Canada Day, as it is commonly referred to by our news media, commentators, politicians and by the Canadian public. However, the status of Canada Day has yet to be officially sanctioned by law. Consequently, whereas the Constitution was patriated on April 17, 1982, and it would be entirely appropriate to celebrate that event on Canada's birthday, I move, seconded by the hon. members for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold), Roberval (Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet) and Lévis (Mr. Gourde):

That the House consider Bill C-37, to amend the Holidays Act, including the status of Canada Day, and that only one member per party be allowed to speak so that the House can deal with all stages of the bill before July 1, 1982, and we can officially celebrate Canada Day on July 1.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONDUCT OF WITNESSES IN MONCTON MURDER TRIAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an important issue concerning the circumstances surrounding the murder of two city of Moncton policemen in December, 1974. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) is by now familiar with my concerns. Given the importance of a decent and rational policy governing the use of paid informers by our police forces and the need for prevention of abuses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That the Solicitor General inform the justice committee, in camera if necessary, whether certain witnesses at the trial of the above-mentioned murderers, while on the witness stand, failed to disclose their relationship with the accused men.

TRANSFER OF CHAIRMAN'S OFFICE TO EDMONTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Now Canadians who have been told to tighten their belts see that the new chairman is moving his office to Edmonton from the head office in Montreal. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That this House direct the government (a) to table the costs involved to move the CN chairman's office closer to his ranch, and (b), to announce publicly its new policy which allows the chairmen of boards of Crown corporations to move their offices anywhere they desire.

HOUSING

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF MORTGAGE INTEREST TAX DEDUCTIBILITY PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, it is now over two and a half years since the last budget to address truly the needs of home buyers was introduced in the House of Commons. Under that Conservative budget the average Canadian home owner would have saved $125 a month on mortgage payments as a result of the Progressive Conservative interest deductibility plan. Because of the Liberal-NDP coalition defeating that provision, home owners now face mortgage renewal rates of almost 20 per cent, housing starts are down 50 per cent from last year, and 200,000 construction jobs have been lost. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Minister of Finance give his most serious consideration to including a mortgage interest deductibility plan in his latest attempt to formulate a realistic and workable budget, and thereby provide some much-needed relief to the increasingly beleaguered home owners of Canada as well as to the Canadian home construction industry which is currently experiencing its worst year ever.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF BENEFIT PAYMENT PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the Skeena federal riding had, as of June 1, 6,949 workers on unemployment insurance, which is 19 per cent of the work force; since, as of May 1, 2,497 families had been forced onto welfare, which brings the total to 25 per cent of the work force; since native people, particularly on reserves, along with those people who have run out of unemployment insurance and those people who long ago decided that there are no jobs and that there is little point in registering at Manpower—and since none of these Canadians shows up in the monthly statistics, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the ministers responsible for job creation and unemployment insurance quit announcing phony programs and manipulating figures and immediately introduce an unemployment insurance extension period for those workers who will run out of benefits in the coming weeks as a result of Liberal and Conservative policies, and that steps be taken to diversify our regional economy.

Also, the forestry employment program which was reannounced yesterday should be redrafted as only two out of 11 projects in northern British Columbia have received approval, while Skeena is a third of British Columbia and the B.C. forest industry paid $220 million in federal taxes last year alone and we want some back.

FINANCE

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF TAX AFFECTING LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, one of the many tax grab measures contained in the government's November budget was that which affected life insurance policyholders. In light of the fact that the total extra tax value of this measure would contribute a negligible amount to government coffers, yet had a detrimental financial effect on some 9 million policy holders who are still up in arms over the issue, and that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) plans to introduce a new budget in the House on Monday night, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Finance in his new budget announce his intention of withdrawing this punitive tax measure involving life insurance policies.

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—DEMAND FOR HOLDING OF PRODUCER REFERENDUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that the Minister of Transport is proceeding to change the statutory Crowsnest Pass freight rate without the consent of those who live and work in western Canada, and given the fact that 12,000 of these persons are protesting this action through a petitions which will be filed in the House of Commons by myself and other members of the New Democratic Party caucus, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That the Minister of Transport stop all plans to change the Crow rate and immediately place a producer referendum before western grain growers which will decide whether they wish the Crow rate continued and that a parliamentary committee be struck to ascertain the views of all persons in the west who will be affected by a change in the Crow rate.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

IMPORTANCE OF FORTHCOMING BUDGET

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I had intended to put my question today to the Minister of Finance but he is, right this minute, outside the House of Commons giving television interviews when he should be here answering questions.

I will put my question to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows that Canada is suffering from a crisis in confidence. Inflation has increased 2.4 per cent since February, 1980; unemployment has increased by over 350,000 people; interest rates have increased by over 3 percentage points, and the Canadian dollar has fallen almost ten cents since this government came into office.

In view of the fact that economic conditions are the worst in over 40 years, does the Prime Minister realize that this is the most important budget that will have been presented in the House of Commons during his term of office and that it cannot simply be a cosmetic update of last year's November budget?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, it goes without saying that the Minister of Finance is very much aware of the many problems facing our country and other western countries. He does not need the hon. member's rhetoric to make him aware of these problems, and he is equally aware that there is a limit to the resources available to the government to cope with them. With the means at his disposal, the minister will try to deal with these problems as satisfactorily as is possible and help Canadians get through the present difficult period.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: If the Minister of Finance felt so strongly about these economic problems, why does he not have the guts to be here to answer these questions?

POSITION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I will ask my supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Due to the failure of the Minister of Finance to design a budget last year to address the economic problems today, and because that budget, in fact, compounded the economic problems of today, will the Minister of Finance, in the face of this failure, follow the accepted parliamentray tradition and offer his resignation to the Prime Minister before presenting this new budget so that the Prime Minister will have the flexibility to accept a new man to put a fresh face on economic policy in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I do not quite understand the nature of the hon. member's question. He is complaining about the fact the Minister of Finance is not in the House today—the minister is in the House as often as he can be—while the hon. member has previously been fond of complaining that the Minister of Finance does not give press interviews or does not make enough speeches outside the House, and now, when he does, the hon. member has the gall to complain. I would ask him to please be patient on both counts, and to wait until Monday, when he will realize that the Minister of Finance has a very clear grasp of the problems besetting Canadians and that he is more than competent to respond to the present situation.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Possibly the Prime Minister is indicating who his new Minister of Finance will be.

• (1420)

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, let me ask a question which must be answered by the Prime Minister. Yesterday the value of the Canadian dollar dropped following the announcement that there would be a budget speech. There is uncertainty in the market today. There will continue to be uncertainty until Monday night when the budget is brought down. Would the Prime Minister take this opportunity to allay that uncertainty in the marketplace by stating whether or not the government is proposing to continue the monetary policy it has been following and whether or not the stabilization of the Canadian dollar will be a primary objective of this forthcoming budget speech?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is wondering about our fluctuating dollar and trying to see the dollar's fluctuation as a sign. He should have wondered—if his leader would stop talking, perhaps the member for Etobicoke Centre could at least have the courtesy, I would not say to listen but to at least make a pretence of listening to the answers. Respect for Parliament, Madam Speaker, starts here. So instead of starting to wonder during the past few days about the downward pressure on the dollar, the hon. member should look at what has been happening for several months and stop looking for simplistic causes for phenomena that are infinitely complex.

[English]

REQUEST THAT TAX LEGISLATION BE INTRODUCED FOLLOWING BUDGET PRESENTATION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question, too, is directed to the Prime Minister, since the Minister of Finance is chatting up the tourists and taking the air on Parliament Hill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: In light of the fact that there has been very little legislation introduced since the November 12 budget, creating terrible uncertainty in the country, will the Minister of Finance be introducing specific tax legislation immediately, or are we faced with a summer of uncertainty after our winter of discontent?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, as the members of this House know, the Minister of Finance, as far as last November's budget is concerned, has already introduced transitional measures which have removed any uncertainty as to the nature and scope of the measures in question. Regarding the rest of the question and the possibility of further measures, I would ask the hon. member to wait until Monday evening, when the Minister of Finance will make his statement.

[English]

ECONOMIC COUNCIL PROPOSAL TO CREATE JOBS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister of employment following the failure of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance to account to this House. The Economic Council of Canada, which is an advisory body reporting to the Prime Minister, states that the best way to create 100,000 new jobs in the private sector would be to allocate up to $450 million in direct cash wage subsidies. The Council states this would be the best way because it would be a non-inflationary way of creating more jobs. Since the minister has allocated only $36 million, or about one twelfth of the amount suggested by the Council for direct wage subsidies, does he plan to redirect more funds into this kind of program which will produce jobs now when people need them?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, to begin, I would like to say that the Economic Council report, which I was very pleased to receive yesterday, basically endorses the general thrust and direction of the government, including its major emphasis on the training and retraining of workers to meet the skills shortage and, in particular, as the Council stated—

Miss Carney: Answer the question.

Mr. Axworthy: —to ensure that at this time, when there are lay-offs in many industries, we use the time so workers can improve their skills.

Miss Carney: Answer the question.

Mr. Axworthy: As far as job conditions are concerned, the fact is that we are now spending close to $500 million, not $36 million, on a wide variety of job-creation programs for the handicapped, students, young people, and for people in high unemployment areas. Our approach to it has been a balanced, plural approach, so that we can meet each problem and target into it. We do not simply take one-dimensional approaches which would solve only one part of the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REPORTED STATEMENT BY BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On the very day that the Minister of Finance was announcing in the House of Commons that there would be a new budget, and was raising at least the prospect of a change in the financial direction of the government, to which everyone in this country is looking forward, the Governor of the Bank of Canada said in Winnipeg, and I have in my hand today's press report illustrating the point, that there will be no change in the high interest rate policy of the government. My question to the Prime Minister is as follows, and it gets to the root of the responsibility in the parliamentary system of government: who is in charge of the financial policy of the Government of Canada? Is it the government that was elected, or is it the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not seen a copy of the speech, but I am certain that the Governor of the Bank did not say there will be no change in the high interest rate policy of the government.

Mr. Broadbent: I suggest that the Prime Minister get a copy of the speech and read the quotes with care. Mr. Bouey makes it abundantly clear that, in terms of his responsibility, there will not be a change in the interest rate policy. As a senior servant responsible to the people of Canada, that is a sheer derogation of responsibility in advance of anticipated budget changes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT BYELECTIONS BE HELD

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have another question concerning the matter of responsibility. On May 11 I asked the Prime Minister a question with regard to the need for the people in the constituencies of Timiskaming, Broadview-Greenwood and Leeds-Grenville to have their democratic right respected to have members elected to this House by calling by elections. In turning down that appeal, the Prime Minister said:

I think the first step in ascertaining what the people think would be to convey to them clear facts and thoughts—

Will the Prime Minister test the people of Canada? Will he ascertain their response to the forthcoming budget by living up to his democratic responsibility and letting the people in these three constituencies have a member by announcing the date of those byelections?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I suggest we hear the message from the budget first. When the hon. member has heard it, perhaps he will not want a byelection because it is so good.

Mr. Broadbent: I believe in miracles, but I do not believe in what the Prime Minister is suggesting to be a possibility.

RIGHT TO REPRESENTATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, once again the Prime Minister has evaded the democratic right of the people of Canada by not dealing with the issue directly. Does he not think it is his moral responsibility to give to the people in these three constituencies, who have been without a member for more than six months, the right to have someone here to express his or her views on their behalf, and specifically to put his budget proposals to the test by having byelections in those three areas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think there is some posturing in the question. The hon. member talks about a moral responsibility. Is he suggesting that the law passed by this House, which gives the Prime Minister six months to make that decision, is immoral in some way?

Mr. Broadbent: How about the distinction between legality and morality?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member wants to explain to me why it is legal but immoral, I will listen to him.

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, why is the Prime Minister afraid to call the three federal byelections?

Some hon. Members: No answer.

INQUIRY RESPECTING DATE OF BYELECTIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister is also afraid to answer the question. Will he tell the House of Commons when the electors in Broadview-Greenwood, Leeds-Grenville and Timiskaming will have the right to have elected representatives here in this House of Commons so that those thousands of Canadians will not be denied their democratic right? When will those byelections be held?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, how can the Leader of the Opposition talk of denying democratic rights when the law of this country says specifically that the Prime Minister has six months to make that announcement? If I go beyond those six months, I will be both immoral and illegal in denying the people their rights. However, if I am following the law, I do not see why the hon. member should be free to interpret it in some other way.

REASONS FOR PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister can find Liberal candidates in those ridings, they may well content themselves with those academic arguments for denying citizens of Canada the right to be represented here in the Parliament of Canada. We in this party, and it is certainly the case in the New Democratic Party, believe that the people of Canada have a right to be represented here in the House of Commons of Canada. The Prime Minister has the power today to call those byelections. Only a lack of courage can explain his failure to call those byelections. Why will he not call them and, if he has found the courage, when will those byelections be?

• (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member really believes that, he should be introducing a private member's bill suggesting that the six months allowed to call an election should be shortened. Why does he not have the courage to follow his own suggestions?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

FUNDING FOR CO-OPERATIVE AND LOW-COST UNITS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for housing. With housing starts down by 51 per cent, and with mortgage interest rates back up to 20 per cent, the minister must surely realize that the housing industry is teetering on the brink of collapse. Is the minister prepared to take the money for the Canada rental supply plan, which is not being taken up, for reasons which are well known to the minister, and redirect that money into co-operative and low-cost housing?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the reason why the Canada rental supply plan has not been taken up as yet is apparent to most members of the House, but obviously not to the hon. member. The plan, introduced in the budget, had $350 million allocated to it. It was designed to give a $7,500 interest free loan to encourage builders to come in and build new homes. The corporation, after that plan was passed by this Parliament, after a three-month delay—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: —after this government had to use closure to get the bill through the House, advertised it to the building community. Within a very few short weeks, some 2,500 developers who applied will be taking it up, and building will be under way. It will be a successful program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S ADVICE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the minister seems to be out of touch with reality. He is certainly out of touch with what is going on out there. Perhaps, Madam Speaker, he might be able to explain to the House and to the country, as half a million Canadians face mortgage renewals, as mortgage interest rates hover around 20 per cent, why only 883 people have qualified for the deferral of interest payments plan, and only 497 have qualified for the one-time grant of $3,000? These are the people to be protected, the so-called "dire straits" cases. What explanation does he have about that?

While he is on his feet, perhaps he could tell us what hope he has to offer to the 500,000 Canadians who are facing mortgage renewals, many of whom, the minister knows by the advice he gave his colleagues, will be forced to walk away from their homes, their dreams, their life savings, and face foreclosure? What advice does he have to give to them, on the eve of the minister's new budget?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, probably the most welcome point that I could make to the hon. gentleman and to Canadians is to remind them that this government will not accept the advice and the report and the study and the research done for the former minister of housing in the Conservative government. We will not accept the report prepared by the former president of the Conservative Party of Canada, who recommended that the government withdraw from social housing, privatize CMHC, not support non-profit housing and go away directly from the rehabilitation of homes. We will not do those things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN PROGRAM

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance who, rather than come in here to face the music, after agreeing to bring down a new budget, is hiding and running like a titmouse to his corner—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Most observers have said that we have to convince domestic and foreign investors that their investment is needed in Canada—that it will be welcomed and secured and will not be endangered retroactively—if we are going to overcome our economic problems. In fact one observer has said that if we want to correct our unemployment, we have to create an investment climate where people will have confidence in the future.

Is the minister prepared to make changes in the FIRA program so that it will be more streamlined, so that it will facilitate the climate for investment in Canada, for example, by making the limits apply only to large proposed transactions, to give automatic approvals if 90 days have passed without the applicant hearing, and that kind of action. Is the minister prepared to do that, to carry out those principles and help overcome unemployment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we have been carrying out an administrative review of FIRA, as we said we would do in the economic development document last fall. We hope to reach some conclusions on that before too long. I want to remind my hon. friend that most forms of investment in this country are not dealt with in any way by the FIRA process, for example, investment in the form of debt, equity investment of a non-controlling nature, investment by Canadians, as well as any form of investment by the existing foreign-controlled sector, and any way related to what they are already doing. Where the Foreign Investment Review Act applies its basic purpose is to assure benefit for Canadians from the project in question. That is basically a good deal, both for the investor and for the Canadian economy. I do not know why my hon. friend should be in any way opposed to that.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT REVERSE POLICIES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, if the minister looks in the mirror he will see one of the main reasons why there is no confidence, by investors in this country, any longer. The investor, whether he is Canadian or foreign, has been made to feel like a leper here in Canada, due to the statements and hostile attitudes of the minister and his government. Are those hostile attitudes and statements going to be reversed? Will concrete steps be taken to welcome foreign investors into this country, as long as they comply with our laws? Will he do that, in order to give employment in places like the Atlantic provinces and other parts of Canada where employment is no longer being created? Will he take some steps to undo the fantastic damage that has been done in the last 27 months?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I think my friend is totally inaccurate when he suggests that I have made hostile statements of the type he has alleged. My basic approach is that investment is certainly welcome as long as, as he says, it meets our laws. Those laws involve showing significant benefit to Canadians. In fact the latest balance of payment figures show that long-term investment is up $1 billion in the first quarter of this year compared to the last quarter of last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: When it comes to looking in the mirror, he ought to remember what happened when the Canadian people looked at him in the election two years ago. They threw him right out of office—and it will happen again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: You have not learned very much. Wait until they get their chance.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ARRAIGNMENT OF ALBERT RAUCA

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Would he please give the House the details about the alleged deal the minister is reported to have made with Simon Wiesenthal in the arrest of suspected Nazi war criminal Albert Rauca?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, following the arrest and arraignment of Albert Rauca, I received a telephone call from Simon Wiesenthal in which he made some representations to me about it. But I want to inform the House that that was the first time this particular individual had ever been mentioned to me or, from what I can find, to the Government of Canada, by Simon Wiesenthal or anyone on his behalf. I want to inform the House, as well, that there is no such agreement as that referred to in the Ottawa Citizen article this morning.

HOUSING

PLIGHT OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He makes no distinction between legality and morality. It may well be legal to charge 20 per cent interest rates on mortgages, but it is immoral when people lose their homes because they cannot afford to make the payments. I ask the Prime Minister, with this in his mind, is it because he lives in public housing that the government is not prepared to bring in some kind of interest rate relief for mortgage holders? Is it because he is out of touch with reality that he refuses to give the people in those three ridings the opportunity to express their opinion on government policy by holding byelections?

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure of the relevance of the question. The hon. member talks about the immorality of these interest rates which cause people to lose their homes. Is he suggesting that the people who buy Canadian government bonds at 19 per cent are immoral? Is he?

Mr. Deans: You are out of touch.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF OIL TAX INCREASE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. One of the reasons we are having difficulty in our country and industry after industry is closing down is that the Government of Canada offered Canada Savings Bonds at a rate far higher than many companies can make, including companies in the mining industry, to get a return on their investment. If the government refuses to abandon its obscene interest policies, the cost of living inflation will be further compounded by an increase in natural gas and oil taxes, taking another $1.8 billion out of consumer's pockets.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. If Governor Bouey refuses to let the government scrap its high interest rate policy, will the government, through the Prime Minister, at least enter into negotiations with the producing provinces to delay at least for six months the imposition of these added fuel taxes in order to give a modicum of relief to the terribly hard pressed consumers of this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in his preamble, the hon. member referred to an expression that he should remove from his vocabulary.

Regarding the government's high interest policy, the hon. member should remember that high interest rates are the result of a situation that the government is fighting against, namely, high inflation rates, and the hon. member should join the government in its efforts to get rid of high inflation rates, which would indeed bring interest rates down to much lower levels, thereby immensely improving our economic climate, as the hon. member is asking.

INCOME TAX PROCESSING OF RETURNS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue, who will know that one of the items in the November, 1981, budget related to the repeal of provisions of the Income Tax Act granting the right to acquire, for tax advantage, income-averaging annuity contracts. That repeal was to be effective for the 1982 taxation year and not the 1981 taxation year.

A certain Richard Griffith, one of my constituents—as did other Canadian taxpayers—filed his tax return for 1981 on the assumption that his income averaging-annuity contract would be treated under the provisions of the budget of November 12, 1981. However, he has not been so assessed. Canadian taxpayers have not been assessed, and they have not been in receipt of the refunds to which they are entitled under the provisions of that budget, having been advised by Revenue Canada that refunds will not be processed until amendments to the Income Tax Act reflecting budgetary changes have been passed by this House.

Will the minister indicate to those taxpayers and to this House that he will instruct his officials to process those refunds to which taxpayers are entitled as though the enabling legislation in fact had been passed by this House?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, we gave taxpayers a choice. We encouraged them to file their returns according to the provisions in the budget, but we also gave them the choice of having their returns calculated on the present law or the future law. I have read the article in the Sun that the hon. member has read. It is a specific case. It is true that we have to issue refunds according to the statutory limitations as they exist at the present time. If the budget provisions are over and above that, then further refunds will be forthcoming at a later date.

However, I have to point out that this applies to a very, very limited number of people, and in the case of the gentleman in question he is in a pretty high income bracket, I suggest, because I understand he is getting thousands of dollars by way of refund, which is not true for most people, including me.

Miss MacDonald: It is his money.

Mr. Rompkey: There are very few people whose 1981 returns will be affected. Let me give some figures. So far we have received over 14.7 million returns as opposed to 14.4 million returns in 1981. In 1982 we have issued almost ten million refunds as opposed to 9,847,740 in 1981. There are no refunds being held up. No refunds are being stockpiled, but we are processing them according to the present statutory limitations.

REQUEST THAT REFUNDS BE ISSUED

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, regardless of the fact that this gentleman may have a rather substantial income, the issue remains the same. The money belongs to him, and it should be refunded. What the minister has said in this House is in conflict with what the taxpayer has been advised and what officers of the minister's department have said. On the basis of that disclosure, will the minister now instruct his officials to refund, specifically to this gentleman and to all other taxpayers who fall into this category, the moneys to which they are entitled under the provisions of the law as they now stand?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I gave that assurance in my previous answer. We are issuing refunds up to the present statutory limitations. That is what is being done. That is what will be done.

Madam Speaker: I have the honour of drawing the attention of the House to the distinguished presence in our gallery of a delegation of parliamentarians from Sicily, headed by the Hon. VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

TAX PROPOSAL SUBMISSIONS

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Justice in his role as Minister of State for Social Development. He was in the House a moment ago. In his absence I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

On November 3 of last year I asked the Secretary of State whether the give and take tax proposals which have been put forward by the national voluntary agencies would be a part of the budget. He replied that he would see that they would be taken to the cabinet and see that the cabinet had an occasion to examine particular propositions carefully and that the matter would be processed without unreasonable delay. The November 12 budget ignored the voluntary sector and its three million volunteers who provide caring.

Last week in questioning in the House the Minister of Finance said he had no representations whatsoever from the Secretary of State regarding these important proposals put forward by the national voluntary agencies in terms of give and take tax proposals and postal rates. My question—

Madam Speaker: Order. That really is exaggerated. I remind hon. members that they must ask questions.

Mr. McLean: Very simply, Madam Speaker, in light of this time frame and in light of the need that is there in the voluntary sector, will the minister see that these proposals, which have been on the table for this length of time, are discussed before Monday's budget is introduced?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, this question has been raised several times in cabinet by me personally and by some of my colleagues. However, it is a matter for the Minister of Finance, and if any decision is made to that effect, it will be announced in the budget.

MINES AND MINING

ANNOUNCED LAY-OFFS IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Mines. This Friday the Adams mine at Kirkland Lake will lay off 460 workers for five weeks, as will the Sherman mine at Temagami on July 6 for 11 weeks, the Griffith mine at Bruce Lake, and the Algoma mine at Wawa. All told, these lay-offs will affect over 2,100 mine workers in northern Ontario. The minister knows full well that these mines supply their entire iron ore and pellet production to the steel mills of Ontario and to the Canadian manufacturing industry, which has been heavily devastated by the inappropriate November 12 budget, the Alsands collapse, and the National Energy Program.

Will the minister assure the House that she has recommended specific measures to prevent these pending lay-offs in northern Ontario from becoming permanent casualities of the Liberal scheme to "scare hell out of Canadians?" Will there be specific and immediate measures in the budget to be brought down next Monday?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member has finally been able to locate the mines and the ores in the proper places. I compliment him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Erola: I should like to inform the hon. member that through Section 38 we have been able to employ many of those miners who have been laid out—

Mr. Lewis: Laid out?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Erola: —and I welcome this opportunity to inform members of this House, particularly those members in B.C. and other areas of the country affected, that Section 38 is there and should be used. I am very disturbed that there are many parts of this country where Section 38 is not in effect, simply because hon. members have not done their jobs.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—MINISTER'S MEETING WITH VICTIMS—PROGRESS REPORT

Mrs. Éva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Last weekend, the minister had a meeting with the Quebec federation of victims of UFFI. First, I would like to know what the results were of this meeting and second, yesterday and today the media reported that 18 cases of cancer, allegedly due to UFFI, although there was no scientific proof, had been discovered in the province or throughout Canada. Among these 18 cases, there were said to have been eight deaths. I would like to know whether the minister is aware of this, and whether the situation is as serious as it appears?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that on the weekend I met the 13 representatives of associations of owners of homes insulated with UFFI, who sit on the National Advisory Council that was created to assist and advise me in connection with the government assistance program. The association representatives made four major recommendations which would partly modify certain aspects of our assistance program. I gave them the assurance that I would examine the recommendations as soon as possible, and in this connection, I told the chairman of this association that I wanted to meet the Advisory Committee next Saturday morning when I would reply to the suggestions they made on the weekend.

As for the hon. member's second question about articles discussing the possibility that people had died from the effects of this product, I must say that no scientific connection has been established between UFFI and cancer in humans. This was the answer I was given following consultations with the Department of National Health and Welfare and the National Research Council. However, I can inform the House that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has just authorized a grant of more than $200,000 to Dr. Nantel in Quebec City to help him continue his research in this area. We hope to obtain information, not only for the sake of informing the public but also to remove any unwarranted concern.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED AUSTERITY PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister confirm or deny the understanding of the Public Service Alliance of Canada that the Government of Canada, in co-operation with the governments of the United States and Great Britain, has agreed to institute a five-year public service austerity program, the first and second years of which will freeze salaries above $25,000 and result in strict limitations on contract negotiations, and mass reductions in staff and services to the public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must say I had not heard of it, Madam Speaker. It is probably not true.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BENEFITS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has told us today what many of us have always suspected about the nature of Liberal morality. Whatever is legal is moral, and no distinction is to be made between what you can get away with and what is morally right. It is no wonder that our society is disintegrating. While the government has been flying kites on income restraint or controls, Canadians over the age of 65 and those who may be younger but are on disability pensions, some 10 per cent of the population, have had their incomes severely restrained for too long already.

Will the Prime Minister assure retired Canadians that action will be forthcoming on pensions, that the budget will indicate the intention of the government to increase the GIS and CPP disability pensions immediately, and that more comprehensive reform of both private and public pension schemes will soon be on the agenda of this House and not put off? Or does the Prime Minister maintain that because the poverty—

Mr. Cousineau: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blaikie: —of so many senior citizens is legal—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blaikie: —there is therefore nothing wrong with it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I thank the member for his little homily on morality, Madam Speaker, but I am sure he would have helped me to understand his concept of morality better if he had been able to help his colleague sitting in front of him answer the question I asked him.

Mr. Deans: I will gladly answer it. I will answer it after question period.

Mr. Trudeau: If it is—well, Madam Speaker, they are discussing it among themselves. Let that be concluded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDING

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I would have liked to address my question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology or the Minister of Finance, who are both away, and who failed to collaborate in the last budget to produce a single dollar's worth of research funding leading to industrial job creation and regeneration. Therefore I will ask the Prime Minister if he believes that in this budget there will be funds allocated for research and industrial development to create legitimate jobs rather than just spending money funded by increased deficits, which is the fundamental difference between Conservative policy and Liberal policy? Will there be job-creation through industrial research and development funding carried forward in this budget?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should review the funds allotted to the various research councils. This would show him the government is making a serious effort to help research and development in this country. I would also remind him that he probably did not know how to make his colleagues realize the significance of it because to my great surprise, hon. members from his party voted against the medical sciences research estimates earlier this week, Monday night, when estimates were passed.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Another non-answer, Madam Speaker. Will the Prime Minister at least assure the House that there will not be an absence of funding which would stand in the way of legitimate research and job creation in this country? Many of the principles contained in the last budget actually work against the interests of an industrial society in Canada. Would the Prime Minister assure us that his policies will not work against investment and job creation, or be funded by deficits?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the government's commitment to research and development is well known. This government has no intention of changing its policies, and I invite the hon. member to make representations to his colleagues in order that they approve any new government initiative in that area.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY CAR LEASING SECTOR

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance who will remember that on June 18 my colleague, the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk, raised the question of the recent budget changes in the capital cost allowance for daily rental cars as opposed to leased cars. At that time the Minister of Finance said my colleague obviously had his facts wrong and there was not a problem here.

In view of the fact that I have now received exactly the same representations from the industry, can the minister tell the House whether the Department of Finance has received and looked at the representations made by the industry, especially the leasing industry, and are any steps being taken to straighten out this situation because there is an unfair anomaly here?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the department received representations from the car leasing industry; they were reviewed. However, I am not aware of the final recommendations that may have been made to the Minister of Finance.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER SUPPORT REPRESENTATIONS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): I wonder if the minister could assure this House, now that there have been two representations made within a matter of a few days, that he will speak directly to the Minister of Finance and personally make sure that the concerns of the leasing industry are met, and quickly.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of Finance paid close attention to the review of representations made by the automobile dealer association in respect of the capital cost allowance on car leasing. However, before accepting or rejecting the claims in the brief, the hon. member will agree that an assessment of the points made in the representations must be made, to see whether they are justified, and I imagine that, based on that assessment, the Minister of Finance will take a decision and announce it to the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN LEBANON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister about the situation in Lebanon. According to the Red Cross, the invasion of Lebanon by Israel has allegedly resulted so far in more than 10,000 deaths, mosts of them innocent civilians.

[English]

The Lebanese authorities indicate the death toll may be closer to 20,000.

[Translation]

Since Irish General Callaghan, commander of the United Nations peacekeeping force in Lebanon, has revealed that the cease fire in force since July 24, 1981 had been respected by the PLO and that British Prime Minister Thatcher has indicated that the PLO had not been party to the recent attempt against the Israeli ambassador in Great Britain, this would amount to a blatant and wanton aggression on the part of Israel. Is the Government of Canada considering taking concrete steps and imposing trade sanctions as well as recognizing the Palestinian people with a view to exerting pressures on Israel to encourage it to respect the basic principles of international law?

[English]

Is the Prime Minister now prepared to indicate to Israel that if the wanton killing and injury of civilians in Beirut continues, Canada will implement sanctions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I believe this question has been answered before by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Government of Canada is not considering any sanctions at this time. We are, I think, keeping pretty close to a line that was adopted by the United Nations, which has not asked for sanctions and, indeed, a unanimous resolution of this House. On June 8, while I was away, a motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's West was passed. In part it reads:

> That this House support the resolution of the United Nations Security Council calling for an immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all Israeli military forces from Lebanon—

That is a position which the House supported unanimously. I take it the House would still support that today, but we are not envisaging sanctions.

TABLING OF REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petitions presented by hon. members on Tuesday, June 22, 1982, and finds that they meet the requirements of the standing orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to ask the government House leader to give us some indication as to the business of the House for the next week and beyond.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we have had consultations and we have come to an agreement as far as business for Monday afternoon is concerned. It relates to the access to information bill. We have agreed to have completed both the report stage and third reading stage of that bill by 5.45 p.m. Monday. Therefore, I seek unanimous consent for the following motion:

That no later than 5.45 p.m. on Monday, June 28, 1982, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings and put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment all questions necessary for the disposal of the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C-43, an act to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

Madam Speaker: Does the House give its unanimous consent to the motion as read by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as far as today is concerned, the business of the House has been announced. Next week, Monday, as I indicated earlier, we shall complete consideration of the report stage and third reading of the access to information bill, and at 5.45 p.m., the debate will be interrupted in order to put all questions. Monday evening we shall have the budget speech, and Tuesday and Wednesday will be the first two days set aside for debate on the budget.

As far as the rest of the week is concerned, since July 1 is Canada Day for most members, the House will not sit until Monday the following week.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, something has come up since I had an opportunity to speak to the government House leader. I would ask him, if I may, to intervene with the finance minister respecting the normal lockup which takes place for opposition spokesmen and the media concerning the budget on Monday night. The government House leader will realize that in order for opposition spokespersons to do a proper job, to inform themselves and also to ask questions of finance department officials, it is necessary to have some time to consider the presentation on Monday night. We have been trying to reach the Minister of Finance and I would ask the government House leader to use his good office to ensure the normal lockup for the opposition and the media.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if a formula can be found to make sure that we can have the budget speech first rather than those of the critics, I might consider reporting that request to the Minister of Finance. There is no standing order forcing the Minister of Finance to act in any way in that respect. But the remarks of the hon. member are on record and I will probably see that the Minister of Finance has the opportunity to read Hansard.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, on the matter of House business, I would like to support the position taken by the acting House leader for the official opposition with regard to making arrangements for lockup. I think it is vitally important that members who are responsible for dealing with budgetary matters be given the opportunity to be briefed appropriately on those provisions contained in the budget.

I would like to ask two other questions, however. One is with regard to the Small Businesses Loans Act. It has been brought to my attention that the Small Businesses Loans Act requires extension before the end of June in order to ensure that the banks will be able to lend moneys necessary and to receive the guarantees required so that small businesses can continue their business operations. Would the government House leader give some thought during the course of the afternoon as to when we might find the time between now and next Wednesday to accommodate what appears to be an important matter?

My other question is with regard to Wednesday next. Would the government House leader consider again the possibility of the House sitting at other than its normal sitting hours on Wednesday next and without in any way reducing the number of hours that we would normally sit? Perhaps we could sit between ten o'clock in the morning and two o'clock in the afternoon, or between nine o'clock and one o'clock, or between eleven o'clock and three o'clock—whatever is appropriate—so that members who have to travel a far distance, to British Columbia and other points, can go to their constituencies and be there on July 1 to take part in the festivities and to represent properly the federal presence in the July 1 celebrations.

Mr. Crosby: Tell us how interested you are in Canada Day.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as to the hon. member's last request, I heard the hon. member for Halifax West say that he might be interested in Canada Day. It is a surprise to me to know that all Tories think the same way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: I am very serious when I say that Canada Day is most important. I want to assure the Tory party that we are very serious on this side. I make the offer right now. If hon. members want the Canada bill now, we will have it as the first item today, provided we can conclude the debate before six o'clock tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: I am sure the Tories will refuse that offer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Let us solve other problems first.

• (1510)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the question is whether we could sit earlier than at the normal hour next Wednesday to allow members who are interested in celebrating Canada Day more time to travel.

Some hon. Members: Dominion Day.

Mr. Pinard: I want to report to the hon. member that we made the suggestion. I know that he agrees, but it is the Tory Party which has refused, so under the circumstances we will sit during normal hours. I am willing to reconsider the matter and again to put forward the proposal that we sit from nine to one o'clock, ten to two o'clock, or eleven to three o'clock next Wednesday in order to allow the vote to be taken earlier than at six o'clock, so that members can leave to celebrate Canada Day or, for some of them, Dominion Day.

On the second request concerning the Small Businesses Loans Act, it was brought to the attention of the opposition a few weeks ago. We had negotiations on it. Now that it is known that there will be a budget speech, I presume it will be easier to obtain an agreement to get that bill through all stages without debate. I am willing to hear any good suggestions so that it can be done any time before next Wednesday.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order raised by the hon. member for Simcoe North regarding the lockup. I would ask you, Madam Speaker, as protector of the rights of hon. members of the House, to ensure that the budget speech is delivered first in the House, so that all members of the House have the same rights and privileges and so that Canadian people can hear the budget as the minister delivers it, not as some commentator with the CBC or some other outfit decides to interpret it, or not as some critic for the opposition decides to interpret it, before the budget is even delivered.

If the opposition and the press are not smart enough to follow the minister's speech, it seems to me that that is their problem, not the problem of the other members of the House. I want an assurance that the rights of all members of the House will be protected to hear the budget first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, in discussing further the business of the House, I should like to point out that the latest reference to July 1 is a lot more clean-cut than the one the government House leader made at two o'clock on Tuesday morning when there was no one from the official opposition in the House.

Some hon. Members: Why, why?

Mr. Lewis: This one is a lot more straightforward.

Returning to the intervention of the hon. member opposite with respect to budget night, there is absolutely no way the opposition, members of our party or members of the NDP, could properly brief themselves without having some time to review the documents and to question the minister's officials. That is the only fair and appropriate way to do it. It just does not make any sense, as regards the efficient operation of this business and what is coming before the country on Monday evening, to do otherwise. Otherwise, we run a great risk with opposition spokesmen and with the media.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have made their points about the lockup. I am sure they realize that this has nothing to do with the Standing Orders. Those kinds of arrangements are made between departments and members of the opposition. The Speaker has no authority whatsoever to implement such a proposal.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, on this point of the lockup, I am really quite distressed that the government and its supporters are taking the very negative position which they are. I want to ask—

Mr. Gauthier: I am getting fed up.

Mr. Deans: I get fed up with you, but I do not stop you from coming here.

Mr. Cousineau: Address the Chair.

Mr. Deans: I gather I am not the only one fed up with the Liberals, judging from the Gallup poll.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I wonder whether I might ask the government House leader two things with regard to the possible lockup. First, is it true that the Liberal caucus voted not to have one? Second, will the government House leader make a proposal to us at a meeting some time today at which we can look, with the possibility of having that lockup available for members of the opposition and members of the press?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, on the first question, obviously the hon. member knows that what goes on in caucus should stay in caucus. I am certainly not the one who will render those discussions public. I do not know whether or not that subject was discussed. If it was, I cannot mention anything about it. If it was not, it is easier for me not to say anything.

On the second question, in the past when a lockup was held or discussed, it was discussed at the level of the Minister of Finance, his officials and his critics, not at the level of House leaders. In so far as I am concerned, I have preferences. I would not mind a lockup at ten o'clock on Monday, but if it is earlier than that, I would prefer to talk with the Minister of Finance first.

THE BUDGET

ORDER OF THE DAY FOR PRESENTING BUDGET

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, at this stage I should like to request, pursuant to Standing Order 60(2), that an order of the day be designated for consideration of the following, if opposition members still want it, "That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government", to be proposed by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) at 8 p.m. on Monday, June 28, 1982.

PETITIONS

RETENTION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATE

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present some 1,312 signatures from the Dauphin area regarding retention of the Crow rate. These petitioners represent many small towns such as Roblin, Shortdale, San Clara, Inglis, Boggy Creek, Dauphin, Sifton, Ochre River, Makinak, Minitonas, Fork River, Winnipegosis, Ethelbert, Alonsa, McCreary, Kelwood, Kinosota, Swan River, Ste Rose, Laurier, Amaranth, Oak Brae, Bowsman, Gilbert Plains, Grandview, Meadow Portage, Valley River, Cowan, Dropmore, Benito, Rorketon, Glenella, Durban, Birch River, Ashville, Renwer, Russell, Norgate, Pine River, Waldersee, Plumas, Neepawa, The Pas, Rossburn and Angusville.

These petitioners feel that the Crow rate is of important benefit to western Canada and one of the earliest incentives granted to settlers. They are concerned that the changing of the Crow rate will reduce farm incomes, contribute to the breaking up of communities on branch lines, and increase trucking and road costs, and that since three royal commissions have recommended the retention of the Crow rate, they pray that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) will take this into consideration.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of 1,219 Canadians in the provinces of New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia who are calling upon the federal government to reconsider proposed changes in the Crowsnest Pass rates and that the present statutory grain rates, the Crowsnest Pass rates, be retained in perpetuity for grain producers. This petition includes signatures, not only from these provinces, but I might specifically mention in the case of Alberta, the Hutterite Bretheren of Vegreville, grain producers and grain users in the eastern provinces and in British Columbia who use western grain because they can get it on the statutory grain rates; it saves them about $20 per tonne.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of some 3,106 Canadians from the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. These are people who have not been included in the consultation process with Dr. Gilson and wish their views in support of maintaining the Crow rate to farmers to be known to the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased this afternoon to present a petition signed by some 3,001 concerned citizens from northwestern Saskatchewan on the very important subject of the Crow rate. The petitioners believe the Crow rate to be an important benefit to western Canada and that the change in the Crow rate will reduce farm incomes, contribute to the break-up of communities on the branch lines and will increase trucking and road costs. They stress that three royal commissions have recommended the retention of the Crow rate. The petitioners call upon Parliament to maintain the Crow rate in perpetuity as presently guaranteed by statute on their behalf by urging the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and all Members of the House of Commons to heed the message of this timely petition.

• (1520)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition that shows in advance of the Gilson report on grain freight rates that people in western Canada want to retain the Crowsnest Pass freight rate.

I am filing petitions signed by 3,373 Canadians who support the Crow rate. They come from all provinces of Canada. All of these people present the grass roots opinion in western Canada and all parts of Canada, a fact that has been ignored by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and Dr. Gilson. They are people who are deeply concerned about grain producers, small prairie communities and the grain industry which contributes to the economic wellbeing of Canada.

These people state in their petition that three royal commissions have examined freight rates for grain in Canada and all have recommended that the Crow rate be retained. It would be consistent with their wishes to ask the Minister of Transport finally to pay heed to these people and their significant expression of opinion on the Crow rate. They would challenge him to conduct a plebiscite—

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. members should be reminded that they must simply read what the petition is about. They must not read all of the petition.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, democracy rests with the consent of the governed. I challenge the minister to show that the wholehearted consent of those who will bear the brunt of these changes is considered.

MR. DON MARRIOTT

Question No. 2,759—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Don Marriott the director of restaurants and catering of the National Arts Centre and, if so, since his appointment, what was the total amount charged by Mr. Marriott for entertaining persons on the premises or elsewhere with food and beverages at taxpayers' expense?

2. Was this sum charged to promotion?

3. (a) On any occasion did Mr. Marriott entertain members of his family and personal friends at taxpayers' expense and, if so, in each case, on what date and at what cost (b) what was the total cost of the entertainment?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Arts Centre as follows:

1. Mr. Marriott is the director of restaurants and catering at the National Arts Centre. As part of his responsibilities to direct and promote the restaurant and catering operations of the National Arts Centre, Mr. Marriott undertakes duty entertainment on behalf of the centre; the total amount expended on and off the premises over the 27 months that he has been employed (April 1, 1979 to June 30, 1981) is $19,856.88 at regular menu prices. However, the actual cost to the National Arts Centre Corporation is $9,406.88 after deduction of fixed costs and profit margins from "on premises" charges. For "on premises" charges, there is no cash involvement.

2. The expenditures are charged to "duty entertainment" for the promotion of the restaurant and catering services of the National Arts Centre.

3. (a) Over the seven months between April 1, 1979 and October 31, 1979, the initial period of Mr. Marriott's employment when his family remained resident in Stratford, Ontario, on three occasions his wife or one of their two children consumed a meal the costs of which were borne by the centre; the policy of the centre is to cover the expenses to a reasonable limit of members of the families of personnel visiting the National Capital region to find suitable housing when personnel has been recruited from outside the region.

Over the 20 months between November 1, 1979, and June 30, 1981, on six occasions his wife and his two children consumed a meal the costs of which were borne by the centre when, due to extended periods of work during evening hours, Mr. Marriott was absent from home for protracted periods of time.

Over the 27 months between April 1, 1979 and June 30, 1981, a friend known to Mr. Marriott prior to his employment at the centre was among the persons offered meals on two occasions and beverages on two occasions by Mr. Marriott in promoting the restaurant and catering operation as a normal part of his duties. The exact dates and cost of each event cannot be established.

Except as set forth above, to the best of his recollection, on no occasion has Mr. Marriott entertained members of his family and personal friends at taxpayers' expense.

(b) The total cost to the centre of these meals and hospitality is estimated at $139.

DIPLOMATS DECLARED PERSONAE NON GRATAE

Question No. 4,167—Mr. MacKay:

1. Since World War II, how many foreign diplomats were declared personae non gratae, as referred to in the October, 1979 McDonald report, 1, p. 8 and in the August, 1981 McDonald report, 2-1, p. 65 and, in each case (a) what foreign diplomatic missions were involved (b) what was the name of the foreign diplomat and on what date was he/she ordered to leave the country (c) what announcements, if any, were made to the Canadian public?

2. Since World War II, how many foreign diplomats were ordered "less formally", other than being declared personae non gratae, to leave Canada because of their offensive intelligence activities, as referred to in the October, 1979 McDonald report, 1, p. 8 and in the August, 1981 McDonald report, 2-1, p. 65 and, in each case (a) what foreign diplomatic missions were involved (b) what was the name of the foreign diplomat and on what date was he/she ordered to leave the country (c) what announcements, if any, were made to the Canadian public?

3. For each case in parts 1 and 2, were any retaliatory actions taken by the foreign powers involved and, if so, what was the nature of such actions?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. According to records in the Department of External Affairs, 37 foreign officials have been declared personae non gratae since World War II in consequence of their involvement in unacceptable activity in Canada, though not all of them had been accorded diplomatic status. The figure includes trade representatives, journalists, and other embassy support staff.

(a) The foreign diplomatic missions involved in these 37 cases were Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Iraq, People's Republic of China, Poland, U.S.S.R., Socialist Republic of Vietnam (SRV) and Yugoslavia. (b) and (c) Twenty-seven of the 37 officials declared personae non gratae were publicly named and their identities are as follows:

Order Paper Questions

The remaining ten of the 37 were declared personae non gratae without any public announcement. Having reviewed these ten cases the government abides by the earlier decisions not to initiate disclosure of details concerning them.

2. Thirty-one foreign officials have been asked less formally to leave Canada without being declared personae non gratae, according to records in the Department of External Affairs.

(a) The foreign diplomatic missions involved in these 31 cases were Cuba, Hungary, People's Republic of China, Poland and the U.S.S.R. (b) and (c) Seventeen of these 31 officials were publicly named and their identities are as follows:

	Name	Title	Country	Date	Announcements to the Public
1.	Col. N. Zabotin	Military Attaché	U.S.S.R.	July 12, 1946	Royal commission report and statement in the House of Commons

17.	Lt. J.G. Levin(e)	Staff	U.S.S.R.	July 12, 1946	Royal commission report and statement in the House of Commons

At the time of the remaining 14 less formal expulsions the government determined that it would not be in the national interest to initiate publicity concerning them. Having reviewed these 14 additional cases the government abides by the earlier decisions not to disclose details of them.

3. In respect of six of the expulsions from Canada retaliatory action resulted in the expulsion of a Canadian official from our Embassy in the corresponding country.

IT&C—PUBLIC INFORMATION DIRECTORATE

Question No. 4,272—Mr. MacKay:

1. Did the Public Information Directorate of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce make purchases of goods and services from Robert Warren Productions during the fiscal year (a) 1979-80 (b) 1980-81 and, if so, what were all the purchases and service contracts, including the amounts involved?

2. Did Robert Warren Productions subsequently change its name to Calibre Communications Ltd.?

3. Did the directorate make purchases of goods and services from Calibre Communications Ltd. in the fiscal year (a) 1980-81 (b) 1981-82 and, if so, what were all the purchases and service contracts, including the amounts involved?

4. Was Mr. James York, an information officer with the directorate, the person referred to in an internal audit which warned of an "appearance of conflict of interest" in July, 1980, and, if so, was the fact that he is the brother of Mr. Robert Warren York, an executive of the two companies, the basis for this observation?

5. Did the deputy head of the department approve of continuing a commercial relationship with the two companies and, if so, on what date?

6. Did any relative of the director, Mr. Doug Fyfe, work for either company during the periods mentioned in Parts 1 and 3?

7. Was the following observation made in a draft report of an internal audit of the directorate: "The Audio-Visual Capital Assets inventory of PID was checked using an inventory listing provided by professional and administrative services branch (P&AS). Of 134 items listed, 24 could not be located. Another 28 items were found that were not on the inventory list. The missing items included many attractive pieces of equipment such as cameras, projectors, tape recorders and video cassette recorders. The 28 items not listed were missed by P&AS staff during their inventory count (early 1980) which was part of the implementation of the Capital Assets Inventory System. In addition, no items purchased since October, 1979 have been added to the inventory list. The inventory is stored in a haphazard manner located in many rooms, some locked, some not, on shelves, on the floor, etc. Audio-visual equipment is loaned to employees of PID and the department and to private sector contractors. The loan agreement form is often incomplete—serial numbers missing, due date rarely filled in, signature of the borrower often missing. The follow-up of loans is ad hoc, with little written evidence of any systematic follow-up system."?

8. Was the draft report presented to the director, Mr. Doug Fyfe, on July 29, 1980, or thereabouts and, if so (a) was there any criminal investigation (b) was any of the material mentioned in the report recovered?

9. (a) Which firm or firms benefited from the loans of equipment mentioned in the report (b) was this equipment all returned to the directorate (c) who authorized the "loans"?

10. What are the positions now held by Mr. Doug Fyfe and Mr. James York and do their latest appointments represent promotions from the time when the internal audit report was first presented?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Yes.

4. Yes. Mr. James York was the individual cited in the draft internal audit report of September 25, 1980, and the fact that they were brothers was the basis for this observation.

5. Yes, on September 9, 1981.

6. No.

7. This is a quote from the draft internal audit report of September 25, 1980. Subsequently, a thorough internal follow-up was carried out.

8. No, the "Scope of the Audit", outlining the areas the audit would cover, was presented to Mr. Fyfe on July 29, 1980. He received the draft internal audit report on September 25, 1980. (a) The department thoroughly investigated the situation and found no grounds for criminal investigation. (b) Yes.

9. (a) The following firms borrowed the equipment cited in the draft internal audit report:

Robert Warren Productions	HJM Communications

(b) The equipment loaned to these firms was returned.

(c) Mr. York was responsible for the equipment. Authority for authorizing individual loans rested with Mr. York and four subordinates.

10. When the draft internal audit report was presented on September 25, 1980, Mr. Fyfe's substantive level was IS-6. He was however, receiving acting pay for performing duties at a higher level and was confirmed as an SX-1, Director Public Information on February 16, 1981. This represented a promotion. Since that time his title has changed to Director General, and as a result of the Treasury Board senior management conversion program he has become an EX-2. Since March 1, 1982, Mr. York has had an interim assignment as an IS-5, acting manager, visuals and advertising unit, Public Information Directorate. His substantive level (GT-6) remains unchanged from what it was on September 25, 1980, when the draft internal audit report was issued.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the notices of motions for the production of papers stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council could refer to Motions for the Production of Papers Nos. 62, 63 and 64, which have been on the Order Paper since June 19, 1981. The minister responsible for releasing those papers said in an interview this past week that they would be released this week. Since this is the last sitting day of the House this week, could the parliamentary secretary give us an idea as to when these papers will be put before the House, or is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) in error when he said that they would be released this week?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to answer the hon. member's question but I will take the matter up with the minister concerned.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 22, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-92, an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, our purpose today is to resume debate of Bill C-92, which began on June 14, 1982, and continued on June 22. Before I do so, I would like, with your indulgence, to respond to a remark made in the House a few moments ago by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) with respect to the designation of the national holiday as Canada Day. He had occasion to refer specifically to me. I want him and other members on that side of the House to know that what is at stake in the celebration of this national holiday is not the name of the day, be it Canada Day, Dominion Day or Confederation Day, but the spirit Canadians demonstrate on that day, as well as the sense of oneness they have. That sense is not developed or helped by the President of the Privy Council when he makes those kinds of remarks in the House of Commons. Just let me add this warning to him; that if he is to show any maturity and judgment as the conductor of House business, he ought not to make such remarks that are designed and calculated to stir up resentement among people across Canada at a time when we should be bringing those people together in a common purpose.

Let me review some of the remarks I made on June 22 respecting Bill C-92. I said that members of the House ought to examine the new legislation with a critical eye but with an open mind. If the new provisions establish a sensible and sound national ports policy and an efficient and effective organization structure to implement that policy, then the cause of the Canadian maritime transport industry will be substantially advanced. However, the marine transport industry in Canada and internationally will have to bear the burden in the future of any legislative mistakes that are made now. Therefore, we must examine and assess Bill C-92 with great care.

In mentioning the Canadian marine transport industry, allow me for a moment to reflect upon the contributions made by my colleague from Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). In 17 years of service in the Parliament of Canada, the hon. member has continued to advance the cause and interests of the marine transportation industry. That interest is evidenced in this bill and in predecessor bills in the formation of which he had a great hand. On behalf of the people in the port of Halifax, the Province of Nova Scotia and indeed those across Canada who are interested in marine transportation, I want to make it clear that we appreciate the contribution he has made to that industry in the bill which is before us now.

In my remarks on June 22 I reviewed the operation of the National Harbours Board as it functions today. I said that the board has already implemented an internal decentralization program with respect to its personnel and control of operations. The board has been more than aggressive, in some cases regressive, in its cost-recovery program. The result is a net income of $59.8 million in 1981, an increase of $42.5 million over 1980.

However, much of that increase relates to the generous debt forgiveness afforded the National Harbours Board by the Government of Canada, of approximately $500 million. Let us not give too much credit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the National Harbours Board. We know that similar refinancings have bailed out the Canadian National Railways and the St. Lawrence Seaway in the past. Let me underline my comments that the eastern Canadian ports of Halifax, Saint John, Quebec City and Montreal are in severe competition and that the National Harbours Board is perceived to favour the Quebec ports because almost half of that $470 million in debt write-offs, or $231 million, relates to the port of Montreal. Only $30 million was allocated to the port of Halifax, which is only about 8 per cent of that total amount. Therefore, Your Honour can see why suspicions of favouritism in the administration of the National Harbours Board policy are rampant on the east coast. When one considers the allegations of sweetheart deals approved by the National Harbours Board to assist and advance the cause of the Cast group in the port of Montreal and the help given to the Canadian Pacific group to provide facilities in Montreal to lure Dart Container Lines from the port of Halifax, one quickly realizes why Nova Scotians watch this federal government agency with a wary eye. But now the question is, what are the hopes and expectations for the future? Will this new national ports legislation achieve those hopes and fulfil those expectations?

Let me now deal with the port of Halifax and how it may be affected by this legislation. I hasten to add that Halifax, along with Saint John, Quebec, Montreal and Vancouver, is regarded by Charles N. Forward as one of Canada's five great seaports. He described the port of Halifax in an excellent article in the "Urban History Review" as a "magnificent natural harbour." The harbour is immense in size, has a great depth of 50 feet very near the shore, is ice-free and has a very low tidal range of under three feet. The harbour and the adjacent Bedford basin easily accommodated immense convoys during World War II. Therefore, very clearly, the port of Halifax is both Canada's gateway and its guardian.

Let me consider the port of Halifax in the current economic context. I have already indicated that on the one hand, it is in fierce competition with the port of Saint John for cargo destined for the east coast of Canada and, on the other hand, it is in severe and fierce competition with the port of Montreal and the port of Quebec for all eastern Canadian cargo. What has happened as a result of this competition in these depressing economic times is that the port of Halifax suffered a downturn in 1980 and 1981 in the amount of cargo handled over the years. In 1981 it had a gross registered tonnage through the port of 21,417,000, which was a slight increase over the previous year. But, taking into consideration other, more effective aspects of the total cargo, it had a substantial decrease. For example, container traffic was down 8 per cent, to 1,785,000 tonnes.

The downturn in the economy has contributed to the slight increase in traffic compared to the port of Montreal, but what is more important are the difficulties which have been experienced in the port of Halifax because of the existing competition and the favouritism which has been shown toward the port of Montreal. Specifically, let me refer to the loss of Dart Container Lines. Dart Container Lines accounted for approximately one third of the container traffic through the port of Halifax and, in turn, accounted for a substantial amount of the total cargo through the port of Halifax. In 1981, it moved its operations to the port of Montreal as the result of an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific group. The loss of Dart was a tremendous blow and caused a disadvantage to the port of Halifax. It has left the container facilities in the port of Halifax substantially unused.

The Fairview Cove container terminal which came on stream during 1981 is experiencing some difficulties, but the fact that it is utilized by the Polish Ocean Lines leads to some hope for the future. There is also hope that other lines can be attracted to the port of Halifax at both the Halterm container terminal and the Fairview Cove container terminal and that this very important segment of cargo can be substantially increased in the years ahead.

Mr. Speaker, very much a part of the national ports legislation is the capacity and capability of a national port to achieve self-sufficiency. In the last full year, which was 1981, the port of Halifax managed to reduce its deficit by some $4 million, so that with respect to its operation during the year, it has accomplished self-sufficiency. It really deserves the status of a national port on the basis of self-sufficiency, that is to say, return of revenue from its operations. I will deal with the other aspects of the national ports determination later. But let me consider the application of the national ports policy contained in Bill C-92 in more general terms.

I want to deal with that national ports policy in the context of the national transportation policy as that policy is enacted by the National Transportation Act. The national ports policy is contained in Clause 2 of the bill, which would enact a new Section 3 of the act. Clause 2 states:

"3. (1) It is hereby declared that the objective of the national ports policy for Canada is to create a port system that

(a) is an effective instrument of support for the achievement of Canadian international trade objectives and of national, regional and local economic and social objectives;

Also as part of that national ports policy, it will be declared in the new section of the act that the ports be efficient, provide access and equal treatment for the movement of goods and, in addition, that local port corporations have a high degree of autonomy. If one reviews that enunciation of the national ports policy in the context of the total national transportation policy, one will find that the national transportation policy involves:

—an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost . . . to protect the interests of users of transportation—

I put those words on the record simply to demonstrate that there is an element of rhetoric in these statements of policy, whether in the national ports policy or in the national transportation policy. It is very difficult to look at the words as they are enshrined in statutory provisions and determine from those words what will take place in the future, both with respect to the operation of our national ports and with respect to the operation of our national transportation system. Therefore, when we refer to policy in terms of the statutory words used, we must recognize and realize that we are only referring to an academic matter. We are not discussing the reality or what the system will be when it is implemented. Therefore, it is a matter of placing faith in the agencies, in the branches and in the departments of government which administer these policies.

I must say that Canadians have very little basis for placing much faith in the agencies and departments of the Government of Canada from their experiences with those agencies and departments over the past two or three years since this government took office. They have not provided any economic impetus or stimulus to Canadians or to Canadian industry, whether involving the transportation industry, the automobile industry or any other industry. I want to underline that point simply by saying, in conclusion, that while we may establish a statement with respect to a national ports policy, or while we may make a statement with respect to national transportaton policy, that statement is useless and meaningless unless it is given full and proper implementation by a concerned and knowledgeable government department or agency.

The other major thrust of Bill C-92, as I have indicated, is the new corporate structure which will be utilized in the administration of our national ports system. The major features of that structure, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) pointed out in his address during the second reading of Bill C-92, involved a maxi-corporation to replace the current National Harbours Board and a series of mini-corporations which will operate the specific national ports to which the legislation will be applied.

I have already dealt with the National Harbours Board. I want to point out and underline to members of the House and interested persons across Canada that there may be no substantial difference in the establishment of a new Canada Port Corporation if it simply carries on with the same attitudes, policies and philosophies of the National Harbours Board as it now exists.

There is an indication in the legislation that there may be substantial differences between the Canada Ports Corporation and the National Harbours Board. Specifically, the Canada Ports Corporation will have a board of directors. If that board simply functions as the membership of the National Harbours Board has in the past, there will be no real benefit.

This is not the first time the Government of Canada has come forward with legislation in the House which changes the status of an existing service or agency and promotes or changes it into another kind of corporation. We saw that in the Canada postal service which evolved into the Canada Post Corporation. I feel safe in saying that to date users of that service have not noticed any substantial difference in the service they are receiving. People have not noticed any substantial difference in the attitude of the persons involved in that service. Maybe those changes will come. We should give the Canada Post Corporation time to effect those changes. However, it serves to underline the fact that merely changing the name or the corporate structure changes nothing unless you change the personnel involved and their attitude toward the performance of their service.

The Canada Ports Corporation will continue to be operated as a national agency. It will continue to be controlled by the Government of Canada. It will continue to be based in central Canada, and probably will continue to have many of the same personnel and players who were involved before. In that respect, the members may ask whether there will be any susbtantial change.

The Minister of Transport assured us of one thing. The chairman of the National Harbours Board, Pierre Franche, will not be staying in that post. With all due respect to him, that may be the most promising sign of this new legislation, that we will get a new look and a new face on this national organization. I do not have to tell Mr. Franche that he is not the most popular person in eastern Canada. He goes there from time to time and hears complaints, but only rarely does he make those visits.

Mr. Pepin: A very good man.

Mr. Crosby: Let me talk briefly about the mini-corporations. As I understand it, there are 15 ports which will qualify for this mini-corporation status as local port corporations. The requirements are that the ports have regional and national significance, that they demonstrate local interest in the port and that they have the capacity and capability to become self-sufficient. Those are sensible criteria for the establishment of a national port. I have no doubt that the ports in which I have a special interest, the port of Halifax and the port of Saint John in the neighbouring province of New Brunswick, will qualify quite easily.

What really is at the heart of this kind of legislative provision is the people who will operate the corporation. That is where I have great concern for this legislation. First, with respect to the port authorities that are now in place in our national ports, the port of Halifax and the port of Saint John, the minister has never undertaken to permit labour representation on the local port authority. Anybody who is familiar with the operation of a port knows what a vital role labour plays in the operation, and knows that without the co-operation of a capable labour force, the port simply will not function.

How the Minister of Transport, through or with the concurrence of the National Harbours Board, can construct a local port authority that does not have labour representation is beyond my belief. The minister must know that I have requested time and again that organized labour in the form of the International Longshoremen's Association or one of the other unions involved with the waterfront be represented on the port authority for the port of Halifax. My request has gone begging.

I have to say that if there is not going to be any change in that attitude and if there is to be no recognition of the role that labour plays and no change in policy with respect to appointments to the boards of local corporations, I do not anticipate or expect much to flow from this legislation. We have to face the fact that this legislation will simply provide another vehicle to which members and supporters of the Liberal Party can be appointed.

I hate to say it in the presence of the Minister of Transport, who has been so reasonable on other matters, but on our port authority for the port of Halifax we have not one, but two, defeated Liberal candidates. The minister has been broad-minded. He appointed one person who was defeated in a provincial election and one person who was defeated in a national election. In that sense he has both local and national representation. He is not dealing solely with national Liberals or provincial Liberals. He has taken one of each and put them on the port authority.

I hope the minister does not intend to put them on the board of directors of any local corporation that may be established for the port of Halifax. If he does that, that local corporation, as the manager of the port of Halifax, will lose all credibility and this legislation, it if is ever passed, will come crashing to the ground.

With that warning, I say to the minister that basically the concept is good. If he can resist the demands of his supporters and friends in the Liberal Party of Canada, and, in the case of the port of Halifax, of Nova Scotia, and appoint persons who really have the qualifications, the bill can be successful. As I said, it could be a forward step in the marine transportation industry.

I have to say in specific terms that the qualifications listed in this statute for appointment to the board of a local port corporation are in such general terms that I am afraid there will be the same patronage that existed in the past. The directors of local port corporations appointed by governor in council only need to have the experience and capacity required for discharging their function and will be representative of the regional and local populations and interested in management of the port. As I said, if that simply means you have to get Liberal supporters with local interests and Liberals supporters with national interests, the purpose and effect of the legislation may well fail.

Let me deal with one more specific aspect of Bill C-92, the provisions that relate to revenue, both the use of revenue and such matters as borrowing for the ports. There is real concern that the Canada Ports Corporation will utilize those revenue provisions to get total control of the port system and use those revenue provisions to destroy the autonomy that is supposed to be given to national ports under the provisions of Bill C-92. Everybody knows that he or she who controls the purse strings controls the operation. If we simply go through the exercise of having elaborate statutory provisions and give the financial control completely to the central body, we will not have real autonomy. That is a matter we have to look at very carefully.

I want to speak very briefly about the public harbours aspect of Bill C-92. As we know, 500 public harbours across Canada are governed by the provisions of the Government Harbours and Piers Act. Those harbours will be brought within the framework of this Bill C-92 as part of the over-all national ports system.

Again, Mr. Speaker, if you will look at the technicalities of this, you will know that the small public harbours across Canada are really operated by the harbour master, and that the success of that operation depends upon the capacity and capability of that particular officer.

If he or she is knowledgeable and is able to contribute to the management of the harbour, then the harbour will be successful, providing effective and efficient service to the users. But again, if it is simply used as another tool for patronage for the Liberal Party—which it is, and I can document that with thousands of cases—then again the whole purpose of the exercise of this new legislative provision will be lost.

I will not dwell on this point Mr. Speaker. I hate to face the Minister of Transport with these realities of life because I am sure he is not involved in them himself personally. In my province of Nova Scotia, unless you are a member of the Liberal Party, you do not get to be a wharfinger unless you have this political connection. I want to stop that and stop it right now, because it is too dangerous. The ports are too important to the local economy, too important to the fishermen and to others in transport and users who are involved in that port activity, to allow it to be governed in that fashion. I hope that the minister will change that aspect of this operation.

Now I would like to speak for a moment in very general terms about the importance of a national ports system. As a resident of the Province of Nova Scotia and as the Member of Parliament for Halifax West, I fully appreciate the importance of the marine transportation industry. It provides thousands of vital jobs in the Halifax metropolitan area and in other parts of Nova Scotia, like Sydney. In Sydney there is a port that is capable of expansion and extensive growth. There is the Strait of Canso which has tremendous possibilities as a marine transport terminal. We regard marine transportation as vital to the future of Nova Scotia, particularly with respect to offshore development.

We want the system to work. I can speak for myself and I am sure I can speak for my colleague for Dartmouth-Halifax East and my colleague for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), who is also our transportation critic and who is very interested in ports policy. We want to co-operate to ensure that we do have an effective national ports policy, that we have an effective national ports system. We are all willing to work constructively to this end. At the same time, the Minister of Transport and those who deal with him in the Department of Transport and in other aspects and other departments of government interested in transport, all have to work to change their ways. They have to work to implement, once established, an effective national ports policy.

This is one of those many things where, if we all work together—those in Parliament and those who are called upon to administer the legislation that Parliament enacts—if all those elements work together, then we will achieve something for the benefit not only of the people of the port of Halifax, not only for the people of Nova Scotia, but for all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-92, which deals with national harbours and ports. I want to begin by pointing out that there is only one member of the New Democratic Party in the House—and he is only partly in the House. It may give an indication of the level of interest of that party in this legislation. It is fortunate that it is their caucus representative who is on the Transport committee. I would like to begin by referring to the remarks that member made, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), in the House, when he took issue with the speech made by my colleague for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook). The member for Regina West rose in his place to say:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who just concluded his remarks: where was he in the last two years in the Transport committee.

Then he went on to say:

> The guy has never shown up for a bloody meeting; he has never been there!

Those are not my remarks, those are the remarks of the erudite member for Regina West. It is not quite the kind of vocabularly I am used to using. Then he went on to say:

> My point of order was a simple question. Is the hon. gentleman going to start appearing at Transport committee meetings?

I would like to ask the member for Regina West whether you have to be consistently a member of the Transport committee in order to speak on the transport bill in the House. Or do you have to be a member of the health and welfare committee in order to speak on a health and welfare bill in the House? Do we have to pass a credentials layout from the member for Regina West before we have permission to speak in the House? I recall very well that just prior to the speech by my colleague, the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby that his colleague for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) gave us a 40-minute speech in the House. I have just checked the record of the committee membership and I do not find her name on the list of members of the committee. Yet she gave us a 40-minute lecture most of which was a history of ports legislation and had very little to do with the content of the bill. Yet the member for Regina West has the audacity to lecture the rest of us on how and when we can speak in this House. I think that is offensive. It is certainly a little hard to speak to this particular bill because I do not think the minister who is in charge of this legislation has any long-term historical precise interest in this legislation. I do not say he has to design all of his interest to a specific area—except that if he is responsible for the legislation he had better give some attention to it. I think he would rather be reading the latest edition of the Pepin-Robarts report. That is fine.

Mr. Pepin: I am here listening to you now.

Mr. Friesen: Well, I know, but you are here listening to me because it is such a treat, not because you are so interested in the legislation.

Mr. Pepin: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: It would be a help if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) had all of his intuitive attention riveted on transport issues rather than on other issues. It is a little difficult to deal with this legislation knowing full well that it is not the minister who designed the legislation, nor is it going to be the minister who will make the final disposition of the particular provisions within the legislation. It will be the senior bureaucrats in his department who will make or break all of the sections of this particular bill.

I came here almost eight years ago, Mr. Speaker, short of about two weeks. I remember very well my first election campaign because I was very concerned about the major installation in my constituency known as the Fraser River Harbour Commission. Because of my concern about the relationship of that commission port to my municipality—

Now, the minister is leaving. Here is his last chance for an education, and he is walking out.

Mr. Pepin: I will read it in Hansard.

Mr. Friesen: Because of my continuing interest in the relationship of the commission port to the municipality of Surrey, I took interest in it during that campaign. I asked questions, on the convening of the House, as soon as I was elected, regarding the status of that commission port. It has been an eight-year interest of mine regarding this ports legislation. So I would simply point out to the member for Regina West that even though I have not been a member of the Transport committee I do have a major installation in my constituency which is of concern to me, and I think that is enough of a ticket to allow me to speak in this House. So with his permission I will go on and address myself to the concerns I have.

An hon. Member: That is not enough.

Mr. Friesen: That is not enough? Well, I will go ahead anyway, with your indulgence. Mr. Speaker, it bothers me that the legislation before us has gone through several mutations in the past eight or ten years. It began with the Scott report about eight years ago, for which we waited months and literally years. Then we had three of four bills tabled in the House before we could really get a full-fledged debate on this legislation. If a reorganization of the ports administration in Canada was so urgent, we should have done it a long time ago. Now that we have the legislation before us, it seems to me that the latest mutation this legislation has brought about is really not enough of an improvement over the past organization to make it desirable for the country.

• (1600)

I can understand the kind of DREE mentality that exists in the government regarding some of the ports in Canada. There are ports which deserve to function and operate as federal ports because they are a service to their areas. They may not necessarily be profitable in a cash flow situation or on a balance sheet, but they do form a very valuable function for the entire country. For example the port of Churchill can operate only about two months of the year, yet it is an important link in the transportation system in our country. So I understand the DREE mentality the government has about some of the ports of Canada.

However, why, under the design of this legislation, should the government treat all of the harbours in Canada which are presently National Harbours Board ports, the same way? Why should there be a kind of super board in Ottawa which directs or has its fingers in the operations of all of the National Harbours Board ports and then have about 15 local harbour commissions which report and are actually controlled by that super board in Ottawa? If it is necessary because of socioeconomic reasons for the federal government to be involved in the administration of some ports because the economics are not right for a profit-making structure, I will grant that, but why should the federal government be controlling and manipulating those ports which are profit-making ports? Why should the port of Vancouver be subject to the designs, manipulations and directives of the super board in Ottawa? Surely if that is a viable port—and the volume within that port would seem to indicate that it should be—and surely if the expertise in management is there in Vancouver—and I think it is, after all the experience—it should be able to divest itself of the paternalism of the federal government.

The minister has come back in. I have tickled his fancy. He will correct me later on.

Mr. Pepin: The reason is that the port of Vancouver is of interest to other provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and so on. It is in Canada.

Mr. Friesen: The minister says the reason is that the port of Vancouver is of interest to B.C., Alberta and Saskatchewan. Isn't that wonderful?

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

Mr. Friesen: To all of Canada.

Mr. Pepin: That is what I said.

Mr. Friesen: Is it not wonderful to think that those interests will be served only if Ottawa looks after them? Will the managers of the port of Vancouver not look after the interests of Alberta and Saskatchewan? Oh, those poor people in the western provinces! Will the managers of the port of Vancouver not look after the rest of Canada? Only Ottawa thinks of all of Canada; isn't that wonderful? It warms the cockles of my heart—

Mr. Skelly: What heart, Benno?

Mr. Friesen: —to think of the great way the super board in Ottawa will look after all of Canada, but those people in British Columbia who manage that port at Vancouver are not very loyal Canadians and will not look after the rest of Canada! I think those British Columbians have a right to feel insulted by that kind of an inference.

I say to the minister that paternalism may have its place, but only in those areas where ports are not in a position to be independent. Paternalism has its place, but where ports can be independent, why should Ottawa control them, manipulate them and, in effect, strangle them? Why, under the provisions of this legislation, should the Vancouver port have to have its budget and operations ratified by Ottawa? If it makes money, why should it divest itself of its profits by sending them to Ottawa, as the provisions of this bill indicate?

Mr. Pepin: No, you are wrong.

Mr. Friesen: That is a concern I have.

Mr. Pepin: You are wrong.

Mr. Friesen: This is a Vancouver problem, and I know my colleagues who represent the harbour area of Vancouver will look after it. Those colleagues are the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) and the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby. They will look after that matter both here and in committee, but I want to address myself to the concerns I have about the Fraser River Harbour Commission. It happens to be a very well-run operation. It is very well managed. In 1972 it had a net income of $626,836; in 1973 it had a net income of $1,265,005; in 1974, $1,466,616. The profits grew until 1981, when the Fraser River Harbour Commission had a net income of $5,158,755. I take my hat off to the managers of that operation. They are making money, and they are making money because the port is a commission port. That is one of the big reasons. The minister shakes his head. He will not give credit to Chris Brown, his Liberal friend, who operates that port.

Mr. Pepin: That is not what I said.

Mr. Friesen: It happens that Chris Brown is the chairman of the board there. He is a defeated Liberal candidate.

Mr. Siddon: He couldn't get into the Senate.

Mr. Friesen: He happens to be a very sharp businessman and is making money. I would like to give credit to him and the port manager, Mr. Rick Pearson, for doing a good job in spite of the fact that Mr. Brown is a Liberal. He is a very lonely man. However, they are managing the port well. The port is showing a profit because they do not have to have all their actions approved by Ottawa. They can act independently. They can borrow money and invest it. They can buy without having to turn the profits back to Ottawa. These people can plan; that is healthy, and I think the model of the harbour commission ought to be the model for other ports in Canada.

However, there is one aspect of a commission port that bothers me, and that is principally the reason I am speaking today. One of the reasons the profit picture is as good as it is, is that commission ports do not pay taxes or grants in lieu of taxes. That bothers me. I have talked to the chairman about that on numerous occasions. I have written to the minister, and the response I have received is basically bureaucratic. I know that will not change under this type of administration because that is the mentality that exists.

The one reason the administrators within the harbours section of the Ministry of Transport give for not having a commission port pay grants in lieu of taxes or taxes is that there is such a great socio-economic benefit to the community because the port is there. I admit there is. There are jobs for many stevedores. There are warehousing jobs. There are many transport jobs. There is a great socio-economic benefit to the municipality and the municipalities surrounding that commission port. Nobody denies that. Considering the amount of cash flow this commission port is generating, there has to be a lot of residual benefit to the life of that community. However, if that is true for the commission port, is it not true for Bapco Paints which is just a few miles away? Is it not true for Capital Plastics which is just a few miles away? Is it not true for the Hawker Siddeley plant which is just a few miles away? If it is true that a commission port generates socio-economic benefits to the community, surely the owner or manager of every other industry in the area would argue the same thing. Does the manager of the Bapco plant not think that the fact that he is providing jobs and payrolls to the people at his plant is of general benefit to the entire municipality? It is a specious argument on the part of the bureaucrats within the Ministry of Transport. They should not be allowed to get away with it. I object strongly to that.

Furthermore, it bothers me that when a port can make as much as $5 million in net income in one year, that that gives it an unfair competitive advantage over all other modes of transportation in the area. I think it is a truism that marine transport is the cheapest way to transport goods. It is a lot cheaper than rail or truck transport, so they have a competitive edge already. The very fact that the local truck transport depot or the railway has to pay either taxes or grants in lieu of taxes over and above the normal costs of operation puts the commission port at a distinct competitive advantage, and I do not think that is fair. Why should the commission port get a $1-million tax break, or whatever it is, when all other transport facilities have to pay the whole bill? The fact that the marine facility is not paying taxes or grants in lieu of taxes means that the tax burden for all other residents of the community has been increased. I do not think that is right or fair, and furthermore I do not think the bureaucrats within the department understand that particular problem. I do not mind if there is a port which exists only because of the socio-economic benefits it provides to its area. I do not mind if they do not pay taxes or grants in lieu of taxes as long as the federal government will make it up to that particular community. But here we have a kind of double-barrelled offence; here is a port which makes money and does not pay and the government will not pay, and the municipality has to carry the load.

By all that is fair and right I ask the Minister of Transort (Mr. Pepin) to take note of this representation, even though all the others I have made have been ignored, and correct this injustice which is being perpetrated on the residents of Surrey municipality as a result of the installation known as the Fraser River Harbour Commission.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I too appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-92 which would envisage replacing the NHB, established by act of Parliament in 1936, with a super Crown corporation headquartered in Ottawa. In turn, it would be responsible for a number of subsidiary Crown corporations established as the need occurs to manage the financial and business affairs of various ports across Canada. I have to address this matter in light of my experience as a western Canadian, but also as a member representing a riding with rivers on two sides and the ocean on another. Therefore, in my riding there are two harbour commissions with jurisdiction over the north and south arms of the Fraser River, as well as the National Harbours Board being responsible for the major coal port facility of Roberts Bank, just off Tsawwassen. So I have some perception and views on the way in which the commissions have managed their affairs on the north and south arms of the Fraser River, as well as the board's management of the Roberts Bank super port.

Before I get into that, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to deal with the somewhat larger question of the development of west coast ports in general, especially the new coal and grain facilities at Prince Rupert, British Columbia, which come under the jurisdiction of the NHB and which represent a considerable amount of activity and a major investment by the grain consortium and federal and provincial governments. As an example of some of my concerns over Bill C-92 I would like to illustrate some of the problems we have already encountered with the development of Ridley Island. I would suggest that the passage of this bill would not in any way alleviate those problems and it would not have prevented them from occurring. I was in Prince Rupert on Saturday and talked to a number of individuals there. I had a tour of the facilities under development on Ridley Island. For example, I was made aware of a problem with a water line. The new coal port is going ahead great guns; they have cleared the site and are putting in pilings in preparation for the arrival of coal handling equipment from Japan. They have in fact been designing for a year or two a major water supply for the coal terminal. They are doing that, Mr. Speaker, in the usual federal manner, according to goldplated standards devised by government consultants and scrutineered by port officials in Prince Rupert. But ultimately this is subject to a final decision here in Ottawa. All of this goes on, of course, without reference to Parliament or the standing committee, except by hindsight.

We have discovered, Mr. Speaker, that the water line, to be provided at a cost well in excess of $1 million, is to be supplied by surplus water available at a pulp mill nearby. We discovered recently that the mill does not really want to relinquish that water, but the work has advanced to the point that the situation is irreversible. Yet we learn that no one up there had the wisdom to consult the nearby community of Port Edward which, because of the closure of the B.C. Packers fish packing plant, has discovered that their municipal water supply is far in excess of their requirements. In fact, that municipality has proposed the possibility of providing a ten-inch water line which would fully supply the needs of the grain terminal as well as the coal port for a figure of $300,000 or less. It is just astonishing, Mr. Speaker, that there was not the kind of local representation on the board up there to the extent that they might have anticipated an available water supply from a nearby community. In fact, that community provided a ten-inch water line in the last two or three months to Ridley Island to supply the new grain terminal, at a cost of around $300,000. This at a time when we still do not have the other line under construction. It is going to cost more than $1 million. Its capacity will be roughly the same, and the water is to be drawn from a pulp mill that really did not want to give up the water in any event. There is a total lack of appreciation for local realities when we have consultants from Vancouver and officials and administrators in Ottawa who make these final decisions. We then wonder why the cost of the terminal development rises astronomically from an original estimate of $20 million or $30 million to something approaching now $120 million to $150 million in order to develop the Ridley terminal complex. It is because of this kind of stupidity and the lack of local representation from members of local councils, trade unions, the provincial government, and especially experts in the industry there who should have known and anticipated that this problem would develop. We build these things to gold-plated standards, designed by people in Ottawa and their highly paid consultants who are generally good supporters of the Liberal Party, without any regard for the important economy that might be achieved if we used a little common sense and asked the opinion of the people at the ground level. This applies both at Prince Rupert and Vancouver with regard to the development of the waterfront and with respect to the expansion of the Roberts Bank superport.

● (1620)

If we recall what happened a couple of years ago, we would understand how the development of Roberts Bank proceeded. The manager of the port decided he wanted to expand Roberts Bank to five times its original acreage, without considering the other available port capacity along the north shore of Burrard Inlet; a subject upon which my colleague, the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) and my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) had some very strong opinions. The port expansion at Roberts Bank was envisaged and created by bureaucrats, approved by experts here in Ottawa without a full appreciation of the impact it would have on the competitive port situation with regard to other existing port facilities which in some cases might well have been expanded.

Getting back to Ridley Island for a moment, we have to ask ourselves also who in their right mind and what kind of logic leads to a situation where of the some $40 million, which has been allocated to the development of the coal port, $30 million of which has already been spent offshore, and that is money allocated in the present year's estimates to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). This $30 million has been spent offshore in Japan by awarding a bid to a Japanese company which is somehow tied in to Mitsubishi, one of the companies that are purchasing the coal, and to another related Japanese company which is one of the minority shareholders in the coal fields in northeastern British Columbia, for steel piling pipe.

In both cases, we have had extreme difficulty obtaining disclosure from the minister as to the basis on which those bids were let; as to the extent to which competitive Canadian bidders were given fair consideration in the light of the different tax structures in Canada and in Japan; in light of the different tariff situations and the availibility of low interest money in Japan compared to much higher interest capital available to Canadian suppliers such as Stephens-Adamson.

What I am getting at is that under the present structure the NHB is not very accountable to this House in terms of ensuring, in its purchasing policies and in its engineering decisions, that it is getting the best value for money. That is in spite of the fact the National Harbours Board is presently accountable to Parliament through the Minister of Transport. That leads me to ask what will happen when we take that accountability away from the minister. We have heard all kinds of comments in this House in recent times that Crown corporations are there to serve in the national interest, but as they are in competition with private enterprise, they are to operate at arm's length from the minister's control. By allowing that arm's length provision these Crown corporations can often get away with blue murder. We have seen it happen. We are told these Crown corporations operate in the public interest by taking advantage of profits in good times and using them to tide the corporations through the tough times, or taking the profits from one region and using them to help out another region. I would say that all of this has built some abnormal distortions into the system in terms of suppressing the incentive of locally interested Crown corporations to improve their profit picture. Another problem has been that profits have never materialized. In the good years, Crown corporations such as Air Canada, CNR and others, have decided to reflect their profits in what they pay to their employees and what they do in terms of reinvestment and expansion of their systems. The same is true of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. I cannot mention the CBC because it never makes any profits. But these Crown corporations have never had a history of establishing a cushion or a reserve fund to tide them through the difficult periods. Now we learn, as we did a month or so ago, when the president of Air Canada came before the Standing Committee on Transport, that Air Canada—which reported bright, rosy profits last year—is in severe economic trouble. There is a suggestion that Air Canada may well be coming back to the House to get a recharge of its batteries.

We heard to our astonishment the other day, from Mr. LeClair, president of the CNR, that the flagstaff of the Canadian rail transport system is in severe financial difficulty to the tune of several millions of dollars—in fact, approaching hundreds of millions of dollars. Yet, two years ago we heard under the previous presidency that the CNR was a picture, a model, of a government-run Crown corporation that could outcompete the private sector. That president has quit now. The vice-president is now running things at CNR, and he tells us that the corporation is in a shambles. The CNR is in severe financial difficulty because of the impact of the negative economic situation on mining, on forestry, on manufacturing. As a result the railway is not being called upon to ship goods in the same quantities. We are now into the difficult period when surplus funds should be used to provide a cushion. But what did the president of CNR tell us when he came before the standing committee a week or two ago? He said that it looked as it the corporation would have to come back to the Government of Canada for refinancing if the situation does not improve soon.

Crown corporations have never proved their efficiency in terms of delivering value for money to the people of Canada.

I see the minister who was responsible for Canada Post is in the House. He knows full well that the creation of the Canada Post Corporation under the presidency of Michael Warren was just another dodge to get the government off the hook because it did not have the political courage to raise the price of a postage stamp. The government put Canada Post under the jurisdiction of a Crown corporation with the premise—provided monopoly powers were guaranteed, a question upon which we had a considerable debate a year or so ago—that suddenly a whole new streamlined and efficient postal corporation would be created. Whoever decided to increase the price of a postage stamp to 30 cents did not predict the impact that would have on the usage of the system. We might well find that in spite of the increase in revenue for a piece of mail, that Canada Post Corporation cannot possibly eliminate the deficit that Mr. Warren set out to eliminate.

Crown corporations, while they do serve certain national objectives and they have their positive features, have far too often been used by slippery politicians to get rid of a problem they have not had the courage to solve here in the House of Commons.

It is high time that we looked carefully at our record of creating new Crown corporations. We now have close to 500 Crown corporations in this country. I estimate that this bill creating a super parent corporation and all its subsidiary corporations will lead to another dozen or so Crown corporations that will be added to that list. All of these are without regard to certain criteria which would govern and limit the powers and responsibilities of Crown corporations.

• (1630)

I was really interested last night when I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) speak about her party's position in relation to Bill C-92. She suggested that we should get on with this bill, get it to committee, and that it was better than what we had at present. Then she began to reel off all the things she did not like about it, to the extent that one could not decipher from her speech what was positive or constructive about the bill or what improvements in fact would be made.

I for one believe—I do not know what will happen in committee when amendments are brought forward—that the Crown corporation to be created will lead to a situation which is worse than the present one. I should like to give some of the reasons for saying that. We on this side of the House have been arguing for a Crown corporations bill that would set out the terms of reference and the specific conditions under which Crown corporations would be established in future and would apply to existing Crown corporations. One criterion was to ensure that there was accountability to Parliament. This proposed port structure set out in Bill C-92 does not provide for accountability to Parliament any more than any other Crown corporation. The present National Harbours Board is accountable, through the Minister of Transport, as are the harbour commissions. We have to pass their estimates. We can scrutinize their financial records. We have seen how difficult it is to get information on Crown corporations through ministers. Sure, they say that they come annually with a report to the standing committee, but we remember Mr. Ediger, the president of Uranium Canada, who was called before the committee last December to explain why Eldorado Nuclear had decided to shut down Uranium City. I overheard he and the minister at the head table deciding that they should not answer any questions. I heard the minister turn to Mr. Ediger and say, "You do not have to answer those questions". Obviously not, because Crown corporations are at arm's length and they are not accountable to the House. This makes a travesty of the situation in terms of the countless abuses we see.

In the case of Uranium Canada which is being argued before the courts, we have heard the Crown attorneys argue that Crown corporations should be immune from prosecution, that they are above the law. As I understand the decision which was taken, indeed that is the case. They do not have to abide by the same laws and regulations as private sector corporations. Why do we want to create a whole series of new Crown corporations now and make them responsible for the management of our ports? They are not accountable to the law. They are not accountable to Parliament. There are no sunset provisions to ensure that when those Crown corporations have outlived their usefulness, they will be eliminated. There is no initiative taken by government to bring in a Crown corporations bill to ensure that that is the case. There is no clear-cut management structure. There is no requirement that people who are appointed to the boards of Crown corporations by order in council should be properly accredited professional people. No, in fact not. These boards are generally comprised of defeated Liberal candidates and other good friends of the Liberal Party.

In terms of the role of Crown corporations, we have not seen a definition of the different types of Crown corporations. For example, would that corporation be entitled or not to a monopoly in a particular area of trade? Is its role to provide a window on industry? If it is to provide a window on industry, as Petro-Canada was established to do, how do we obtain a record of how that window is being kept and how it is reported to Parliament? What useful things are we learning by that initiative?

What about Crown corporations which are developed to help a small company get ahead, such as in the case of the myriad of subcorporations under the Canada Development Corporation? In the beginning we were told that the initial government interest would be reduced to 10 per cent over a period of time, that the corporation would be used to help companies become profitable and then the government would get out. We all know that once the companies become profitable the government decides to stay in because it has described that that is the only way to help offset the deficits of further Crown corporations which are not particularly efficient in most cases.

What about local autonomy? Should a Crown Corporations bill not decide in which cases Crown corporations should have not merely titular or advisory representation at the local level but at what point they should have decisive authority at the local level? I believe that should be the case with harbour commissions and the harbour board management structure. As the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) pointed out, there is no reason for having this super corporation umbrella structure administered from Ottawa. If these corporations are supposed to operate at arm's length from the minister and from Parliament, then why has the government not had the courage to establish a bunch of regional Crown corporations to manage the ports with a high degree of local autonomy? I would like to hear the minister's answer to that. Of course, he prefers to maintain control, particularly control over budgets and over information which may or may not be passed on to Parliament. There is also the other aspect that Crown corporations have been widely used by the Liberal Party to reward its friends.

I should like to return to the Ridley Island terminal for a moment to illustrate some of my concerns as to why we need a Crown corporations bill. We have a bad enough situation in the way the Ridley terminal corporation was established. The federal government kicked in 90 per cent of the money. Ten per cent was kicked in by Federal Commerce and Navigation which was owned and operated out of Montreal by a fellow named Laddi Pathy, as well as the principals of the company. It is tied in with Paul Martin steamship interests and the like. When it came time to select an operator for the Ridley Island terminal, where one might have considered the people who live in western Canada and understand the importance of Pacific rim trade and the nature of the unique port problems out there, the federal government did not even go out to tender.

Mr. Pepin: We did.

Mr. Siddon: It did not even seek proposals from alternative proponents who might well have wanted to manage the port.

Mr. Pepin: You are wrong. How can you say that?

Mr. Siddon: Well, the minister can challenge me and tell me the truth.

Mr. Pepin: There was a bid.

Mr. Siddon: The information I have is that the National Harbours Board did not invite tenders on the management of the port. It was awarded to Federal Commerce and Navigation.

Mr. Pepin: You are wrong.

Mr. Siddon: The minister can deny it if he wishes, but I want to know why we have to have the port run by principals from Montreal who get a free ride to the tune of 90 per cent of the investment capital and decide to buy equipment from Japan which could have been provided from Canadian sources. I think that makes a very good case for the danger of entrusting such things into the hands of boards of Crown corporations which are not elected and are not representative of local municipalities, local shipping interests or local union interests. They are selected and appointed on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, so that they become an instrument of political influence and little else.

I think all these aspects have to be reflected in a Crown corporations bill which sets out management structure and clear-cut limits to ministerial discretion and to the wide open windows and doors that give the minister untold latitude in the area of ministerial discretion.

What is the government afraid of? Why does it not write these limits into the present bill, unless it appreciates and approves the present situation which lends itself principally to political patronage? Will these corporations pay taxes? Will grants in lieu of taxes, about which the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta talked, for the use of municipal services on property which private businesses have to pay taxes on, be based upon the same formula by which other private businesses have to pay taxes to local authorities?

These are the kinds of things which should be set out in a Crown corporations bill before Parliament approves one more Crown corporation which will not enhance accountability to Parliament, which will not enhance financial management or the professionalism of the conduct of business affairs. In fact, it will reduce it.

For those reasons I find it very difficult to understand the position of the New Democratic party. Maybe it is not too difficult, maybe it is natural, because they are very anxious to get this bill through. The reason is that they and their friends in the Liberal Party love Crown corporations. Perhaps it may be for two different reasons, since the NDP favours Crown corporations because they believe in increased centralization of control and the elimination of opportunities for the private sector in the market, while the Liberal Party favours Crown corporations because it relieves them from making embarrassing political decisions—the price of a postage stamp, for instance—and it provides an opportunity for them to put some of their failed candidates and friends into highly paid positions so they can ride in limousines, which many do, at taxpayers' expense.

• (1640)

Mr. Pepin: Why do you hate them?

Mr. Siddon: I do not hate them. I think there are some corporations that could well operate in the national interest. However, I do hate the kind of Crown corporation that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation represents where one power boss named Peter Moss handles all the international marketing. He travels to Japan, New York and Europe to sell the fish. All the other concerns which were involved in that business have been wiped out. This includes the Co-operative Federation of Saskatchewan, the northern fishing communities and the companies that operate in those communities. Peter Moss is the one who operates the fishing industry. In the productive years he gives the fishermen the higher payment and in the poorer years when he has a hard time selling the inventory he trades it off by giving up fishing rights to foreign fleets. He is one man with a lot of power who rents himself an apartment in Ottawa and has a government expense account and unlimited travel assistance. He has the authority to make decisions that ought to be subject to political scrutiny. I think it is absolutely reprehensible and it is only one example of a political hack who gets into a position of power because he has the right friends.

Liberal members and members of the NDP in particular desire Crown corporations which centralize power, redistribute income and destroy the spirit of the private sector competitors. The NDP especially believes in political control and abhors individual success. Therefore, I suggest that the hon. member for Vancouver East and her colleagues on the left-hand side of the House stop pretending. They cannot have it both ways. She is not for local autonomy and her colleagues have never supported that. They want centralized authority and they want to see private companies being forced out of business so that the federal government can become increasingly involved in business.

Before we give open arms support for this piece of legislation we must carefully examine the structure of Crown corporations and the purpose for which they are being established. We have heard that the city of Vancouver would like to see speedy passage of this legislation. Mayor Mike Harcourt, who is a well-known member of the NDP, has said that he would like to see it pass quickly. Members of the NDP want to proceed quickly with this bill but we have not yet been told of one way in which this piece of legislation will improve upon the present situation. I do not see any identifiable improvements in this bill.

Three main virtues of this legislation have been cited. First, it will provide that officials at the local level can spend more than the $15,000 maximum which is presently provided for under the 1936 act. They will have another ceiling established by regulation. I point out, however, that there is no guarantee that the ceiling will be adequate in terms of the need in the port of Vancouver to purchase a new crane facility or drydock facility that is worth several million dollars. But the minister does not have the courage to include that ceiling in the legislation.

Mr. Pepin: It may change. I will give it to you in committee.

Mr. Siddon: There are always ways to accommodate change in a bill. While it is always possible to return to committee with new recommendations for changes either to the bill or a regulation, this minister has created a hollow shell with no indication as to how the ceilings will be established. Why should we in British Columbia trust the members of the government? They may say that they will bring the ceiling up to a practical limit which reflects the realities of west coast ports. But when we see what the government has done in Prince Rupert, who did it ask in British Columbia about the waterline to which I referred? The government said it would spend millions on that project. Who did it ask about the management of the port? Its friends in Montreal. Who did it ask about the contracts for the stacker-reclaimer and the steel power pipe and the car unloaders which are being purchased from Britain when it could have been purchases in Canada at a time when unemployment is growing? How can we trust the Minister of Transport and his colleagues suddenly to transfer a degree of local autonomy to our local port managers in British Columbia when our track record does not justify that faith? There is no evidence to suggest that the government will, in fact, proceed in good faith in this respect.

How does this bill improve upon the present situation? We have also been told that there will be a banking provision incorporated into the structure in which these new Crown corporations will operate. A Transport Canada brief dated February, 1982, on the Canada ports said:

> Any funds transferred from a local corporation to the parent corporation would be treated as if they were deposited in a bank, to earn interest and to be subject to withdrawal by the local port depositor when they are required.

That statement sounds very positive and someone like the mayor of Vancouver, or groups like the Vancouver board of trade or the shipping interests, might have read that paper and been convinced that the government would look after them because this banking provision would allow the port of Vancouver to utilize some of its surplus earnings to plan for port expansion and major capital investments without intervention by Ottawa in an attempt to seize a major portion or all of that surplus to cross-subsidize a port somewhere else.

Without sounding selfish, western Canadians must look after some of the interests in western Canada which have been neglected by central Canada Liberal rule. We western Canadians have always shared. We shared in two great wars and in the building of this country. However, we must also look after our own interests.

We need a degree of local autonomy. The government has told us that this banking system will be implemented. The mayor of Vancouver believes it and the NDP has probably fallen for it as well as some people active in the shipping industry in British Columbia. However, if it is so, why does

Bill C-92 make no reference to this banking privilege? It certainly does not clarify it when the Transport Canada brief states that these funds would be subject to withdrawal by the local port. It does not clarify who will have the power to override this provision. Who would have that power? The Minister of Transport is sitting in his place smiling but he will not get up to tell us that there will not be an override—because there will be, of course. That is the reason for a centralized Crown corporation, to bear down on all these regional ports that will not have local autonomy. He will not stand up in the House and admit that the money that is earned in Vancouver will stay there until its ports are developed to become fully competitive with the port of Seattle, the port of San Francisco and the port of Los Angeles. I challenge the minister to stand up now and tell the people of western Canada that the total surplus funding which is earned at the port of Vancouver will be available on a first-call basis for the development of the port.

Mr. Pepin: It will.

Mr. Siddon: I am very pleased that that is in the record. The Minister of Transport has pointed out that any surplus revenues earned in the port of Vancouver will stay there.

Mr. Pepin: Sure.

Mr. Siddon: It will stay there until such time as the regional levels of responsibility decide that they have surplus earnings that can be shared with the Receiver General. That has been clarified.

Second, will the Minister of Transport confirm, now that we do not have to worry about the committee and amendments, that the ceilings on purchasing authority will be judged on the basis of the recommendations of the local officials and that their recommendations will be accepted?

Mr. Pepin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The port of Vancouver can be called by the Canada Ports Corporation. It will stay there. It will be stamped "port of Vancouver" and it will be available to the port of Vancouver for development. Is that clear?

Mr. Siddon: Yes, that is clear.

Mr. Pepin: The amount of money for contract purposes will be indicated by me in committee. Is that good enough?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the minister has qualified a second answer. He said that he will tell the committee what that ceiling will be. That is a step forward which I appreciate. That does not satisfy questions as to whether the local authorities will be able to determine what those ceilings will be as autonomous Crown corporations, or will they be subject to an override administered through the central corporation? I gather there will be an override but we can leave that pass for the time being.

The third point is the question whether the local boards which administer these corporations will contain a balanced representation with the majority decision-making authority representing western Canadian interests. Will the balance of power representing western Canadian interests be in the form of professional people, in the form of local, municipally elected people and in the form of union representation, or will the balance of power remain in the central corporation? Is the minister prepared to answer that?

• (1650)

Mr. Pepin: I will answer that question in committee because it needs a little bit of qualification. I will answer that for the hon. member in committee but, under the law, there are some exigencies, some requirements for the people who will sit on the local boards.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I would then like to ask the minister another question for further clarification, although I know this is not Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Ouellet: Go to the committee. You are here to make a speech.

Mr. Siddon: Is he prepared to tell us that representation on the board will be drawn from a list of people who submit their credentials and that the positions will be filled on the basis of ability, not political connections?

Mr. Pepin: "Ability" is in the bill.

Mr. Benjamin: Like Bill Davis in Ontario?

Mr. Siddon: Well, then, I wish the Minister of Transport could answer one final question for me. Why is it that the candidate I defeated in the last two general elections now sits on the North Fraser Harbour Commission and has had no previous experience with port management?

Mr. Pepin: He must be a pretty bright guy.

Mr. Ouellet: He is an intelligent fellow.

Mr. Siddon: Well, I suppose that he is in the same category as the manager of the South Fraser Harbour Commission who was a former defeated Liberal candidate. He wanted to get into the Senate, as pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta. He is much more competent as a manager than he would have been as a senator, but I gather that it was because of a tiff with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he was granted that little plum.

Mr. Pepin: Your colleague paid homage to the man.

Mr. Siddon: I did, too. Sometimes there are people of ability on the other side who would be better off in the private sector than they would be in politics.

Mr. Pepin: On the other side, too.

Mr. Siddon: I think all the points I have made reflect our concern as British Columbians with regard to the major port of Vancouver and the port of Prince Rupert. These ports are absolutely essential to Canada's economic future because our balance of payments depends so heavily on the natural resources which are exported and will be increasingly exported from western Canada, our resources of grain, timber, coal and minerals. The management of those ports should contain a strong ingredient of regional input which is not influenced by political preference but, rather, by common sense and professional ability.

We should be invited to play a role and we should not be subject to major overrides emanating from Ottawa. If that means that there is no need for an overriding umbrella organization, if it means that a Crown corporations bill is necessary to set out the conditions and limits under which all Crown corporations act as a prerequisite to my supporting this bill, then so be it. But in the final analysis I would reserve my support for Bill C-92 until we find out in committee just to what extent the Minister of Transport and the government are prepared to proceed in good faith in terms of representing the concerns of western Canadians. This should not be shown by making more decrees from Ottawa and by making hollow promises but, rather, by their actions. This should be shown not by incorporating into this bill words in hollow shells or words like "subject to regulation such and such" but, rather, by incorporating into this bill the kinds of concerns expressed by our members and, indeed, by the members of the NDP, although I do not know their reason because they said they would support it anyway.

Mr. Benjamin: No, we did not.

Mr. Siddon: I will not support this bill until I can be convinced that it is good for western Canada, that it is good for British Columbia and that it is good for my riding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: We will try hard.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I certainly share some of the comments of the hon. member who just spoke, other than those rather schizophrenic ones that he presented on areas such as patronage, Crown corporations, and the failure to recognize appropriate linkages in the design of any area in the transportation system. I certainly have the greatest respect for the hon. member, but I do not believe some of his remarks really applied to the issue. Anyone who scrutinizes his speech will realize that it probably illustrates the misguided strategy of the Conservative Party which has forced him to co-operate, rather than express his own serious feelings about the welfare of British Columbians whom I know he strongly supports. With those brief remarks, I would like to take up and support some of his remarks.

He stated his serious concern over the nature of the way in which the Crown corporations in this country are operated. Today we have a bill before us under which those Crown corporations will be created in much the same mould as the previous ones. I do not believe the basic problem is with Crown corporations as such, because we do live in a mixed economic environment. I would like to point out that if we review Canadian history, we find that one of the organizations which sired the Crown corporations was the Conservative Party. We have before us the CBC and a number of others.

Mr. Pepin: CN.

Mr. Skelly: These Crown corporations were not created because they wanted to set some evil loose on Canada. They were simply created because it made good sense. Unfortunately, we have lost control over many of them. They are not accountable to the public, which owns them through Parliament or through the government. Unfortunately, I think that people who sit down and read the speeches of the hon. member and others in the Conservative Party will be confused because the Conservative Party is essentially confused. It fails to recognize that it is not so much that Crown corporations are opposed but, rather, their lack of accountability is objected to. I would like to point out that the province of Saskatchewan and a number of other provinces have mechanisms in place to force more accountability by Crown corporations to the people who own them.

When the bill goes to committee, I would urge the minister to consider amendments such as those which work very well with certain other Crown corporations, such as Air Canada and CN. The annual report for the new harbours organizations will come to Parliament but will unfortunately end there, in the hands of the government, with no detailed accountability provisions. If the minister were prepared to extend that one step further, he would certainly improve accountability by allowing that report to be sent to the Transport committee for study.

It is interesting that the hon. member spent a great deal of time representing the misguided policy of his party but spent virtually none on his own sincere interest in the people of British Columbia. He spent a great deal of time saying how he was not supporting this bill until certain amendments were made. But, in reality, the Conservatives have a choice. This bill has dragged on for eons. If enough of their members were to speak, it is clear that they could speak beyond six o'clock and put an end to the bill for another eight years. However, I do not think they would do anything like that because there is a recognition that, flawed or not, it is probably an improvement on the existing legislation. There is concern and need. Ultimately, this bill will go to committee.

Mr. Siddon: What does it improve?

Mr. Skelly: If there are problems later on, we will deal with them at a different stage. Certainly, in defence of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), it is not so much that they were in support of the bill which appears as a flawed document, but that they were meant to illustrate an advance on the existing situation and that it should therefore go to committee. I expect that when all is said and done, the members of the Conservative Party will support that position because that is the only rational approach in handling this matter.

I would like to refer to the question of patronage. I know that the hon. member who just spoke is a man of insight and sincere integrity. He has good instincts and is a capable individual politically. He could not understand why his opponent in the last federal election, the Liberal candidate, now sits on the Fraser River Harbour Commission. I think that must have been said with tongue in cheek.

Mr. Siddon: Times have changed.

Mr. Skelly: There are members in the Conservative Party who ask questions like that seriously and who have difficulty, because of certain performances and tactics that we have seen in this House, in mustering more intellect than a box of rocks. Ultimately, that does not involve the hon. member who spoke before me, because he knows and fears, as we do, that the government is riddled with patronage. The country is riddled with patronage.

I do not want to go much further into the subject. We fear the use of patronage in this legislation and we would urge the minister not to practise it. If one looks at the legal operations conducted by the Government of Canada, whether involving the handling by CMHC of mortgages and other problems, or whether involving prosecution under federal legislation, we see patronage pervading the whole system. It is unfortunate not to realize that it is probably not so important to reward one's political friends in an under-the-table mechanism as it is to win the confidence of the people in this country.

When patronage becomes so blatant and pervasive, it really sickens people. Ultimately that attitude carries over and reflects on all governments and all things that governments try to do in an honest and sincere manner. I would urge the minister that when he has a say over the way individuals are selected, he opt for confidence, opt for an objective manner that will put aside the kind of patronage that already riddles the system of the Liberal government. Unfortunately, many governments are afflicted by this curse. We are presently faced with one piece of legislation in this House and one concern. Enough for patronage.

Crown corporations are useful and valuable in a mixed economy. They can be used as a catalyst to enhance the efforts of private firms and individuals, but they must be accountable. They must pursue the goals which Parliament has laid out for them. They must be accountable to their owners, the people of Canada, through Parliament and effectively in committee.

The last point is the question of linkages. The ports bill is not something in isolation. The previous speaker was beginning to allude to certain kinds of situations. He mentioned Port Edward, Prince Rupert and the pulp mill, and other transportation linkages. He was beginning in his limited time to deal with the problem of linkages.

A port is simply a facility. My colleagues from Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) and Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) have expressed the fact that we are really dealing with transportation as a public utility, something that facilitates other aspects of the economy. It creates economic development and employment. Therefore, we are looking at a public utility. A public utility is put in place in order to make more effective and to bind together linkages to other aspects of the economy.

It might be well for just a moment to pick up from where the previous speaker, the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), left off. He was discussing these very serious concerns. I share those concerns about the development at the port of Prince Rupert. That again is a linkage problem. We are looking at grain linked back to the agriculture industry which creates employment and wealth for Canadians through offshore exports. We are looking at the other purpose of linkage of that port, which is coal development. We are making a tremendous investment in coal development. The port of Prince Rupert will ultimately be the mechanism by which the resources, once developed, and the transportation facilities, the B.C. Railroad and the CNR, eventually wind up at the coal port in Prince Rupert to be shipped to the point where they will be used.

It is incredible that this government continues with its head buried in the sand on the matter of linkages. There was an article on the front page of The Vancouver Sun last weekend which indicated that the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia are interested in having the Japanese invest more money in the project and to share in the enormous costs, projected to be around $1 billion, inflating to $1.3 billion.

Ultimately the people of British Columbia and in the rest of Canada will have been done in. The Quintet group and the other group selling coal appeared in Japan and made a deal with Japanese steel manufacturers. They appeared in Japan and tried to make their own deal. They made a contract which is very difficult for the public to get hold of so that it can determine the value of their resources being sold.

There is a feeling in British Columbia that the coal from that province is being sold below the cost of production. They feel we are not going to obtain a return. Canadian taxpayers will eventually have to pour an enormous amount of money into transportation, townsite development, power development and port development. Ultimately Canadian taxpayers will pay to ship coal to Japan. We will build a large, new port and put in a port authority to take care of that. Where is the linkage? Where is the common sense? I invite the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to stand up, as he was prepared to do with the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta, and tell the people of Canada how they are going to be shafted.

Quintet Coal arrived in Japan and made a deal to sell coal to the Japanese. The contract was not released to the public. We do not know what kind of a deal it was, or what the future arrangements will be if there are problems. They solved the problem by telling the Japanese to invest more money. The Japanese will invest more money if they are given greater equity. They already control a substantial amount of those companies. Where is the common sense? Where is the linkage? We have one corporation in Japan dealing on behalf of nine steel mills involved in the Quintet deal. On the other hand, you have Quintet representing as private holders all the people of Canada, selling the coal too cheaply. Then they expect the Canadian people to invest enormous sums in tunnels, railways systems, car systems and port systems to send the coal to Japan at a price below the cost of production.

The point I am trying to make is that the business of ports is the business of linkages, the business of public utilities that facilitate the selling of Canadian goods offshore and bringing goods into the country. That has to be part of an economic strategy. Those ports are being developed in a vacuum.

Just to carry this linkage problem a little further, one of the most insane things to happen is that we have different companies in Canada selling to a single company in Japan which buys offshore at other locations. They have southeast coal. They are trying to develop coal resources on Vancouver Island and sell it to the Japanese. They are trying to develop coal resources in the northeast. They are trying to develop coal in Australia. There is an overcapacity. That drives down the price. The Japanese through one purchasing corporation has the right to buy anywhere as long as the price is right and there is long-term capability. When you have overcapacity as we have, the Japanese will have their choice on price. If the price is too high and there is an overcapacity and others are willing to sell, the price will drop. Believe me, the Japanese are willing to kiss us goodbye. How is that going to affect us in these economic times? It is absolutely irrational that Canadians allow private firms individually to go to Japan to compete with one single operation, a sophisticated purchasing and marketing organization.

A mechanism was used by another government of the province of British Columbia in years gone by with regard to gas. I refer to the creation of the B.C. Energy Corporation. That corporation bought all the gas produced in British Columbia and then sold it. It never came out of the pipes. There was a big return to British Columbia. If we did the same thing with a Canadian coal corporation which dealt with a sophisticated Japanese marketing firm, that would make economic sense. It would stop the Japanese from coming in and taking equity positions in those firms, the Japanese then owning our resource and selling it to Japanese steel manufacturers. It is absolute stupidity to have the Japanese taking over our resource and then making a deal with a Japanese purchaser to buy it at the lowest price.

It is the problem of linkages. I hope the Minister of Transport can convince his colleagues that it is absolutely futile to build any kind of a port system without looking at the problem of linkages. We must look at where we are going as a country. An industrial strategy is non-existent. Those things exist in a vacuum. As long as that occurs, the Americans in Seattle, San Francisco and down the west coast will draw the business, taking it away from our ports. That will happen unless we have an effective industrial strategy.

That happens with forestry. Our ports on the west coast deal with a number of bulk commodities. Forest products are one of our biggest items. We trust our marketing. Many examples have been given to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to show that we need more effective marketing. Our port facilities are important in terms of our forest industry. We put forward the proposition that there be a national forest products marketing corporation so that we do not have to rely on International Paper to market the products of Gold River. We do not have to rely on Japanese firms who are our actual competitors in eastern Asia. They buy chips and raw materials from our ports and sell them, and they are the ones who represent us. Rayonier still sells the products of Port Alice. It belongs now to Western Forest Products, but we rely on foreign competitors in the United States to sell our products. We have an absolutely irrational marketing strategy for coal and for forest products. It is a strategy designed to lose.

It is much the same in terms of port policy. Port policy is designed in a vacuum and just built in and programmed to lose. I would urge the minister to look at what he is doing in terms of port development and make sure that it fits with an industrial strategy that is designed to enhance the return on coal, on forest products and on those products on which Canadians are going to depend. These are the megaprojects through which the government intends to develop future opportunities for Canadians. But they are being sold down the river very rapidly and our opportunities are being squandered, at enormous cost to the taxpayers.

The minister has heard me speak many times on the linkage to marine industrial development in Canada and the development of a Canadian merchant fleet. In terms of that strategy, where the ships go depends on where the ports are. The competitive nature of Canadian ports versus American ports determines which ships will carry the goods. Unfortunately, the linkage has never been there. Canadian ships will use Canadian ports; but we do not use Canadian ships, we use Japanese ships. If we insisted that 40 per cent of our coal be carried in Canadian carriers, they would not be picking up products in other countries; they would be dealing with Canada. If we developed a strategy that provided that all our products that are exported or imported, or even 40 per cent, were carried in Canadian ships, or even a nominal percentage at this point in time, it would help. But no, that linkage is not made and therefore Canadian ports are vulnerable.

Most other nations have adopted policies which favour retaining and encouraging a deep sea fleet. They encourage a marine industrial strategy. That strategy is enhanced and supported by a logical ports policy. Unfortunately, the minister totally ignores that.

Mr. Benjamin: It is in Panama.

Mr. Skelly: It is in Panama, it is in Britain, and in Canadian Pacific, one of our prides and joys.

Mr. Benjamin: Bermuda.

Mr. Skelly: No, not any more. They registered in Britain, in Hong Kong and in Singapore, I believe. They moved out of Bermuda because things got a little tight there. They did not consider coming back to Canada. They went elsewhere. That is the fault of the Minister of Transport. He has a ports policy in a vacuum. He has a non-existent merchant fleet and ultimately the entire government is operating in a vacuum, with their linkages to the forest industry and the coal industry, and opportunities for Canadians are being squandered.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when we move to committee these are some of the points that we will reinforce and strengthen. I know that my colleagues to the right will bring forward the same proposals that we are putting forward.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, one should not talk about transportation and the minister's policy in any aspect of this sphere of our public interest without extending to the minister the sympathy which some of us have for the position to which he has been appointed, and for him as the individual concerned. There are many facets of this department. It is too much for one minister. The needs of Canada cannot be accommodated by a single Minister of Transport, when we look at the air, water and land requirements of this nation. To have foisted this on one minister and left it there is an irresponsible oversight by government of a national need.

It is not very often that I can agree with much of what the member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) would say, but in principle we have in this instance a great deal in common. First, we have the national interest of shipping, transportation and the delivery of goods to our ports. Second, we do not agree with the historic management of these ports as they have been executed by the policy of the government of the day, nor have they been executed in a national way for many years. So that we have in common. As to how we might establish the specific management and under what aegis we might put it, at that point we might differ, but the concept and the principles are the same for members interested in transport on this side of the House, apparently.

It all hinges on the policy of government. What is to be the policy? Like virtually all legislation that has come into this House in the last ten years, this is enabling legislation.

Mr. Benjamin: Loser pays.

Mr. McCain: The loser, of course, is the shipper and the industry, who would lose by the discombobulated system that we have used. I would have to say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that you have inherited that system and that you have been asked through this bill to correct it.

This bill will correct literally nothing of what is going on today. It puts it under a new umbrella and it gives certain ports and commissions which will be appointed an element of authority which they did not have before. But it does not give to those ports the opportunity to have a free hand to promote the business which might come their way.

We will still be constrained on the Atlantic coast of Canada by the policy of the Government of Canada which insists that there should be an ice-breaking structure leading up to the port of Montreal, without any compensation for the competition which that exerts upon the eastern ports. That will still remain in place. We will still have a system and a policy which has forgiven the debts of individual ports under the National Harbours Board, but which overlooked those commitments made by the province to expand the ports of Saint John and Halifax. Those are not forgiven.

I would draw to the minister's attention that I think those provinces and those municipalities which have put money into port facilities under the administration of the National Harbours Board should, indeed, under this bill be forthwith relieved of their economic responsibility or, as the case may be, repay the loans which have been extended to the National Harbours Board and thus to the Government of Canada. Only in this way can the port of Saint John or the port of Halifax be considered to be in an economically viable and competitive position in relation to other ports, Montreal and east.

It is regrettable that this has happened and that this is an oversight. But for some reason or other the Government of Canada has never had any inclination to recognize the needs in the port of Saint John and finance them as they did in other areas of Canada.

We find ourselves with a new structure now, which I do not think is fair or competitive by world standards inasmuch as any new port facility which must go up, must go up under contract by a user, in such a fashion that that port facility will in fact pay for itself. Other shippers will have inherited the opportunity to ship through port facilities over which there is no longer any debt structure and for which they will be paying maintenance but not for the capital cost of the port. This is not a fair or competitive structure into which shippers have been thrust by this bill.

I am not a lawyer and therefore I cannot attack this bill in the legal sense in which it was attacked by the member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby). I compliment him on the aspects of a legal nature which he first considered as he addressed this subject.

I think we also have to draw attention to the presentation from British Columbia by both the member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) and the member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook). They in their turn face a situation which is comparable to that of the east coast. We are in fact in our east coast ports competitive with American ports. If in fact we do not recognize this and if our transport policy is not adjusted to meet the international competitive structure, this ports bill will do very little for them.

Let me cite an example of the policy of the Government of Canada which permitted, if it did not stimulate, the purchase of Cast by the Canadian National Railways, another Crown corporation, and the immediate decision by the CN participant of Cast that Cast should now move its operations from Halifax to Montreal.

• (1720)

This is one of the things which makes eastern Canada very doubtful about the benefits which can accrue to Canada as a whole from a Crown corporation's managing the ports when only the policy of the Government of Canada is in fact going to govern the ports. As I see these appointments, in view of the authority which has been extended to the minister, they will abide by, first, his policy; second, his congeniality in respect of the sale or lease of property; third, his congeniality in respect of the building of a new structure; and fourth, the congeniality and generosity—if one might also add that word—of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), because all of these ministers will have to give approval to any function of any consequence at any port anywhere in Canada. We do not have an independent port system. We have, instead, a policy of government which insists that it shall in fact exert absolute control over the ports of Canada through ministerial authority.

The minister, for instance, will appoint the commission which will be governing a port, but he has not given that right to the provinces. I hope he will. Perhaps he can give me as quick an answer as he gave the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta. Will the provinces have any right to appoint members to these commissions? I believe the minister has reserved this right for himself.

Mr. Pepin: No, they will not.

Mr. McCain: The minister says no. I submit it certainly is the right of at least two provinces to appoint members to these commissions because both the provinces and the municipalities within those provinces have a vested interest by virtue of financing directly—or loans to the port of Saint John, in the case of the province of New Brunswick—and they certainly should be trustees of their own fates by virtue of their own appointments to harbour commissions at ports.

Mr. Pepin: They will be on the regional council.

Mr. McCain: If it would not be asking too much, I wish the minister would say that just a little louder.

Mr. Pepin: The provinces will be represented on the regional council.

Mr. McCain: Yes, but the regional council does not govern the affairs of the province of New Brunswick except indirectly, and I think they should be directly on that board. I plead with the minister to accept that.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question? Is it the hon. member's objective that every activity in the country should be administered by the three levels of government working on any single activity? If that is so, then the federal government should be represented on boards and committees with respect to road transportation, for example. I believe this would be a duplication of work. Is that not good reasoning?

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I suppose that reasoning might be applied to British Columbia, if British Columbia is prepared to accept it, but I am not prepared to accept it in New Brunswick as long as the province of New Brunswick has a direct financial commitment to the port of Saint John. I believe that does in fact entitle New Brunswick to an appointment on the board in the city of Saint John, as it does the city of Halifax, the city of Dartmouth and the provincial government of Nova Scotia with respect to the Halifax facilities. Because, as I understand it, they are the only harbour commission ports left which have liabilities. All the rest have been forgiven by the Government of Canada.

If the policy of the Government of Canada with respect to ports continues as it is, I wish to cite two examples of what can and has happened in this competitive structure when interfered with by federal policy. For instance, it seemed essential in a province in which one third of the total economy depended upon the forests, and since most of those products were being exported, that there should in fact be a forest products terminal at the port of Saint John. Because of co-operation between federal and provincial interests and users, a forest terminal facility was established. However, after that something else happened. Not only was that facility created, but there was also additional work done on other ports whithin competitive reach in such a fashion that instead of having all the product that was anticipated go over the wharf facility in Saint John, it will now go in at least three other directions as a result of the improvement of facilities in direct competition with the port of Saint John.

I think this is just reason why the province of New Brunswick should have a representative on that commission as well as on the regional council. The port of Saint John has no control over its own future if public ports other than those which have formerly been National Harbours Board facilities are to be brought under severe competition by public expenditures from the federal treasury at other ports of a competitive nature. This will not work because the port of Saint John can no longer function if its trade is to be taken away by improvements at other ports.

If federal policy is to continue as it has been, I think we will find the same diffusion of trade at the port of Saint John as has already occurred, because the policy of the Government of Canada was that we should not keep the frost-free facilities at the port of Saint John in good shape. In response to a request for improvements to facilities, a machine was created. It was supposed to improve the loading capability of the port. However, instead of putting the contract into the hands of people who knew what was required and had studied and tendered on the job, the contract was awarded to a firm which built a conveyor system which could not possibly work from the day it arrived in the city of Saint John. That defeated the objective of putting perishable commodities quickly aboard a vessel in the city of Saint John in all kinds of weather. That was needed, but the National Harbours Board would not do that job well. If we find ourselves again under the thumbscrews of tax by policy through ministers of the Crown in Ottawa, the port of Saint John still cannot function.

The federal government has reserved the right to exert authority over the lease and sale of land within a port. In the last instance of which I am aware—and there may be others—the National Harbours Baord, as a result of federal policy, dilly-dallied for more than three years in relation to a rather urgent project in an effort to try to make a land deal with the developer concerned. We cannot wait for three years for the policy of government and the influence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to clear the title by lease or sale of land for a project, and as long as this remains under the authority of the minister, the situation will not improve.

Another instance of a very serious requirement is the fact that a facility was built in St. Andrews, New Brunswick, in the Champlain industrial park. That facility was built with the sole purpose of serving the tuna processing plant in that location. The plant was built on the site of the wharf—at some inconvenience to itself, I might add—but as a result of the additional application for use of that facility—by the forest industry, again, and by the agricultural industry in the province of New Brunswick—the port is now crowded.

The Government of New Brunswick, the local chambers of commerce, the local mayors and the local industrialists have been approaching the Government of Canada for about a year and a half because the tuna plant is going to expand to the point that it virtually will require the facility for itself if it is to function actively and efficiently. There is no answer to that plant yet, or to those chambers of commerce or to the province of New Brunswick as to if or when any moneys will be spent to improve that facility, which is now used in a three-pronged way. This, of course, will remain under the present structure of this act. There is no improvement as to when a decision can be made to accommodate the trade of a local community.

What have we gained? I am afraid we find ourselves in the same position outlined by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta, inasmuch as when a contract comes up for a terminal operator, it does not go to a firm headquartered in Saint John; it goes instead to an operator in the city of Montreal. I cannot think of anything more conflicting with the best interest of the port of Halifax, the port of Saint John or the port of Prince Rupert than to have an outside base of terminal operation which cannot help but conflict with its parent structure.

When you take a Montreal operator and put him in Saint John, he is going to be mainly interested in his own operation, the port of Montreal. I submit that not only should tenders have been called in Prince Rupert and New Brunswick on a local basis, but they should have been assisted if necessary to become the terminal operators in Saint John, Montreal and Halifax. You cannot have people with a conflict of interest and who are subject to the policies of the government of the day.

I am afraid we have seen a very high-handed approach to transportation by the government. I do not believe this is all the fault of the present minister. I think he inherited much of it and did not have time to give it proper consideration. He was perhaps influenced more by Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance than by the public good, as was expressed to him in terms of VIA Rail. If the same high-handed policies are to be exerted on the ports of Canada, and there is every possibility of that happening, then the ports have very little to look forward to unless there is a major change of policy.

There seems to be inflexibility when the minister rejects the concept that a provincial representative should be on any commission in which it has a vested interest. The minister does not want that. I do not accept his comparison with other situations; I only ask for it in the case where money is involved and has been put up front.

Crown corporations, Mr. Speaker, are only as effective as their mandate. They are only as independent as legislation and policy allows them to be, and there is no independence in this structure. It may appear that there is because local commissions will be appointed, but they will in fact be appointed by the minister and will be well aware of the policy under which they are appointed. Then they will be under the observation and direction of a ten-year appointee of the government who will only get his job under the direction of the minister and government of the day. It cannot be any other way. He goes in there to do a job with the policy guidelines he has been given. So instead of having a three-man or a five-man commission which the National Harbours Board has had in the past, we are going to have really a single czar of port transportation authority under this government's policy. There will be no assurance of local input in a meaningful way, other than that permitted by the policy of the day. So we have local autonomy as a selling point of this bill but in fact it does not exist.

I do not know whether the minister has given up the right to appoint the manager of the port, or whether the local commission will in fact appoint.

Mr. Pepin: The local commission will.

Mr. McCain: That is a step in the right direction. But the other aspect is that the local commission will have passed through the skimmer of political discretion and will certainly have some influence exerted on it as to who should be appointed. I think the local port has to have more authority than is given by this bill.

Let me come back to the international nature of the port structures of Canada. At one point in time we had a very substantial movement, in the early stages of the container business, through the ports of Saint John and Halifax. These movements were carried through to the central and northwestern part of the United States. It was unfortunate that the charges of the Canadian transportation system put us out of the competition for that business. This was accelerated by the United States exerting pressure on their transportation facilities to better the competition offered by Saint John or Halifax.

I think the ports have to have an element of approach to the railroads, the rate structures and the operation of their own ports. I cannot think of any example better than that of Vancouver. Given the rates and service extended by the port of Seattle, Vancouver will not be able to compete under the constraints and regulations which may be imposed by a minister whose policies do not reflect the needs of those ports. They do not have the flexibility and they must get the approval of the minister, the czar of ports administration, the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board before they can make any substantive move or change in their charges. They are bound by regulations, by a constitution so-called, which are approved by the minister and can only be changed with his approval. So they need the autonomy and the freedom to act. The ports need sometimes to say yes on the spot, as in any other business.

It is not improper to mention the policy of this government on applications by shipping lines to enter the ports of Canada. In one instance in particular a line which wanted to enter the port of Saint John was told it was the policy of the government that if you want to do business in this country you shall do it through the port of Montreal. Not only did Saint John not get the business, but neither did the port of Montreal. The policy cost both ports business.

You cannot have political influence and at the same time have the proper management of the ports structure which this nation requires. This bill, which is not accompanied by an element of policy which indicates there is in fact port autonomy, is a useless piece of window dressing which does little more than rephrase the original National Harbours Board Act. It puts a new gown on it with a lot of tinsel which is going to fall off when it gets on the dance floor. The tinsel does not mean that the ports of Atlantic Canada will have any independence unless there is an absolute about-face in government policy. That is what it is all about, policy—industrial policy, transportation policy, transportation viability, the greatest possible productivity, economy and number of jobs. When they become the objective of government policy, then the independence of individual ports will have been created. But as outlined here, that independence is retained in the hands of the minister, his appointees and the employees of his department. It is a façade, not an improvement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION ACT

PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

The House resumed from Monday, May 31, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I shall take advantage of this opportunity to make a few comments on this bill, which should be examined very carefully, considering the impact it will have on UFFI victims and the seriousness of their situation. The subject has not been before the House for quite some time, but the UFFI problem is causing thousands of Canadians to suffer losses that are almost irreparable. Our official critic, the member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) made a very eloquent speech on the subject. He quoted figures, and I feel he was perfectly right in speaking on behalf of 80,000 to 100,000 families, 300,000 Canadians altogether. He was also right in pointing out to the government that if all these people, these families had been located in the same city, the government would immediately have taken special measures and declared a national disaster, and there is no doubt that they would have been assisted by other levels of government, but in any case, the federal government would have moved far more quickly than it has done up to now.

The fact remains however, that the situation cannot be ignored and this legislation cannot be adopted without a number of very stringent recommendations to the government, especially when we know that thousands of Canadians throughout the country are faced with quite exceptional problems and do not have the resources to cope with them, because of the government's failure to provide for adequate economic legislation. What a terrible thing, for people already facing high interest rates and an economic recession, to have to deal with this curse, so to speak, which sooner or later will oblige them to leave their homes if they are not able to do a thorough cleanup. Mr. Speaker, the House will recall, and there is evidence to that effect, that the matter was already being discussed seven or eight years ago. In the U.S., there had already been hints that the product could be dangerous, and I still wonder how Canada and the Canadian authorities could approve this product and allow it to be installed, and I also fail to understand why the government is refusing, or at least it did for some time, to accept a large share of the responsibility in this area.

It is a fact that some departments had warned other departments, especially the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, of the hazards of using this product. It is also a fact that the government not only promoted its use but also subsidized its installation. Mr. Speaker, I realize that today there are those who will try to justify the actions of the government or clear it of this responsibility. I feel that by and large, the government is responsible to a substantial extent, especially regarding this catastrophic situation which is making thousands of Canadians suffer, and I find it most regrettable that the government did not act much sooner to accept its share of the responsibility. Of course, the minister responsible has mentioned the government's generosity in relation to the provisions of this bill under which home owners may receive payments of up to $5,000. Our estimates have proved this amount to be entirely inadequate. I realize that the government must limit its spending, but how can you, as it were, negotiate the problems confronting these people and the suffering the situation is causing all these home owners? I feel that all governments have a social responsibility, and in this case there is also a moral one, and I believe that the government would receive the approval and support of opposition members if it were truly willing to respond with a decent minimum, in direct proportion to the problems facing these people.

The financial assistance provided in the bill is grossly inadequate. Realizing this, the government points out that other government levels could do their share. However, we firmly believe that the federal government has a major responsibility to correct a serious mistake. Of course, I am not accusing the minister of having voluntarily misled the public; that is not the point. The federal government subsidized this product and it must therefore take its responsibilities. Since this is a social problem, I feel the government should be much more generous and humane toward these victims.

We are also aware that people are now trying as best they can to rid their homes of this product. Many questions remain concerning the retroactivity of this legislation. Will those who have had this product removed benefit from the funds allocated under this legislation? We shall have the opportunity to put these questions to the minister in committee and we hope that the program will be retroactive and that the criteria or requirements set in the legislation will not disqualify some of the victims of this product. We also know that since the subsidy available will not be enough for people to remove the product completely, the conditions prescribed will only guarantee that the product already installed will be sealed in. Obviously, it will remain between the walls and experts might prevent it from being as hazardous as it is now. Other experts readily admit that this is certainly not a solution. The answer seems to be to get rid of the product, which entails costs three or four times higher than the maximum amount of the subsidy. It is therefore obvious that the bill cannot correct what is a major problem for thousands of Canadians, and I do not think that any member of this House can be satisfied with a bill which is so completely inadequate.

The government is now devising all kinds of programs to create employment. I would have hoped that the subsidy provided under this legislation would be higher since it will necessarily create employment as the work must be done by specialists, by people who are able to correct the problem. This is what the government should do instead of announcing programs which are too often nothing more than disguised welfare. When the bill is in committee, many members will undoubtedly attempt to suggest solutions, and in any case, they will ask the minister for additional funds. Let me simply remind the members of this House of all the statements we have been reading and hearing for at least a year. The minister may have tried to tell us that we are delaying passage of this bill by our interventions in the House, but I do not think that we can be accused of having wasted the time of the House as some members have said recently, and while we are well aware of the urgent need to refer the bill to committee and to consider it clause by clause, we are also aware of our duty to convince the minister of the need for additional funds.

I submit it is not asking too much, Mr. Speaker, that government members show more compassion and generosity toward those 300,000 people, those 100,000 families who will be unable to meet their obligations and cannot afford to stay much longer in those homes. We know this legislation will pass within the next few weeks but they will be unable to make the changes needed, which means that come winter, most of them will have to relocate. And what does the government do? All it can hand out is a mere pittance if you compare that with the needs and misery resulting from that legislation. This is not good enough. It does not resolve the problem it merely mothballs it, and there is no evidence that the effects of that harmful material will not still be felt despite that minimum correction within the coming months. Evidently those people have to get rid of the stuff, and the problem is compounded two, three times over because they cannot sell those homes and they probably cannot get loans either to partly correct the problem. We know full well that the institutions or individuals that are aware of the dangers of that material will not participate financially in any partial repair. Therefore, it is clear that those home owners will have to arrange for a thorough clean-up job. It is also clear that the grant is altogether inadequate.

I can well imagine the minister is referring to the generosity, to the substantial effort made by the government, but we must remind him that this effort is inadequate, that the grant solves the problem only in part. But how is it possible to negotiate or perhaps be satisfied with partial corrections of the ills of the individuals who have to live in those homes? It is out of the question, Mr. Speaker, and I feel we have a duty to make these representations to the minister, and we will have an opportunity for further discussions in committee. I have the clear impression and I hope that the minister himself will have amendments to make in committee, in order to decently address the plight of those people faced with that plague or hazardous product.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the special opportunity that will be given to us with the budget to be brought forward next Monday. Would the minister exert some sort of a special pressure on the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the Cabinet to have the budget proposal in this legislation multiplied by four at least. Based on the estimates I could get, I can say that to correct a very ordinary home, the cost is apparently in the neighbourhood of $15,000 to $20,000. Therefore, the proposal for a maximum grant of $5,000 represents a mere 25 per cent of the costs of the needed repairs. The situation will absolutely not be corrected. This is a totally inadequate measure and 300,000 Canadians are left with unsafe conditions and the necessity of getting rid of their homes. Humanly speaking, Mr. Speaker, this is unacceptable, and I have every reason to ask the minister to consider this opportunity. For six months we have been urging the minister to come up with a decent budget, a budget that could to some extent revitalize the economy. Finally, too late as always, he took the decision to come up with a budget next Monday. I think that this budget is a God-sent opportunity for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to urge the Minister of Finance to set aside enough of the funds necessary to implement a worth-while suggestion which might correct the predicament in which those three Canadian families find themselves. Failing that, we will be forced to conclude that the minister will always have the option of being charitable toward 300,000 Canadians, but a charitable approach is not what we need under the circumstances.

As Members of Parliament, we must show that we have responsibilities toward those 300,000 Canadians. Someone made a mistake, unknowingly I agree, but it was a mistake by the federal government in the first place and 300,000 Canadians simply cannot be expected to pay for that mistake. They were encouraged and even given grants to buy a hazardous product. Of course, I am not accusing the minister of being responsible for that unhealthy situation, but the work was done by certain people on behalf of the government. Had I been a member of a government responsible for making such a mistake, I would have been the first one to try to correct a mistake which turned out to be an injustice toward 300,000 Canadians. I would have wanted to solve the problem by offering generous grants. We cannot accept and endorse a suggestion which solves only part of the problem and not all of it. We cannot approve of a suggestion which leaves 300,000 Canadians in misery to cope with insuperable difficulties and leave the responsible minister under the impression that we are satisfied with his suggestion. We are not going to praise the minister for a suggestion which falls far short of the objective. The minister has taken concrete steps in the past and we must repeat to him that his suggestion is not good enough because it does not solve the problem of those 300,000 Canadians. We hope that the minister will keep in mind the remarks made on this side of the House as well as those which I am sure he has heard in other circles. He also met personally the victims of that calamity. But what a splendid opportunity with a budget being tabled Monday next! The minister should try to get something out of the Minister of Finance because he knows full well that his proposal is inadequate to allow those 100,000 homes to be repaired. The minister knows it full well and he has made an effort but, as I said, it is inadequate, and I dare hope that the minister will obtain special funds to take corrective action, so that thousands of Canadians may live in a home as safe as that of millions of other Canadians at present. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this issue is not only relevant but also very important, and we hope to make the minister more aware of the problem in committee if he is not already, and we will support the representations he will make to the Minister of Finance to obtain the required estimates. We will then have done our duty and assumed our responsibilities in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE MINISTRY

MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, this evening the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) steps up to the plate for the third time as the designated hitter for a team whose win-loss record is as poor at home as it is on the road. In his two previous appearances, although he has carried a budget instead of a bat, he still managed to strike out. In light of this abysmal batting average which has his other team members and everyone in the ballpark suggesting that he be traded for future considerations, and recognizing that he broke with tradition during his two previous trips to the plate by not purchasing and wearing new shoes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Finance consider buying and wearing a new pair of Canadian-made running shoes, commonly known as sneakers, so he will have the appropriate footwear to make his getaway following the tabling of the budget.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION THREAT TO WINNIPEG WATER SUPPLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the entire water supply of the city of Winnipeg is endangered by the commencement of construction of a sewage lagoon near Shoal Lake, Ontario. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has a responsibility in this matter as it is the action of an Indian band which is at issue.

The provincial minister of environment in Manitoba has repeatedly contacted the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development about this matter but has received no reply. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House demonstrate its concern for the health of the people of Winnipeg and instruct the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to ensure that he takes every step to ensure that the water supply of Winnipeg is never endangered in this way and that he immediately consult with the minister of the environment in Manitoba as to what he should be doing to help in this regard.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY OF PREGNANT WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a very urgent matter. On June 25 a ruling which discriminates against women who are pregnant was upheld in the Federal Court of Appeal. A woman who was critically ill was declared ineligible for unemployment insurance sick benefits because she was six months pregnant. The judge noted that had the provisions in the new Charter of Rights been fully implemented, such a ruling would not have taken place. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That instead of waiting three years until the Charter of Rights automatically makes invalid Section 46 of the Unemployment Insurance Act which prohibits pregnant women from collecting unemployment insurance payments other than maternity benefits, the federal government take immediate steps to delete Section 46 from the act to prevent further discrimination on the basis of pregnancy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF CANAGREX CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, a picture on the front cover of the Alberta Report on May 17, 1982, under the caption "The Food Grab ... Ottawa's Next Big Play", excellently illustrates how thousands of farmers feel about Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex. The huge hand of government is positioned to grab the buildings, the livestock and the land of the farmer. The cartoonist, David Saxby, must have read Clause 14 of the bill which would give this new Crown corporation power to buy, sell, store and process agricultural products, and acquire real and personal property by foreclosure of other proceedings or in any other manner and to "do all such things as are necessary or incidental to the exercise of any of its powers ... " etc. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House agrees to not pass this bill unless these unwarranted powers are removed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

IMPACT OF MICROTECHNOLOGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, this past weekend women from across Canada held a national conference to discuss the devastating impact of microtechnology on women workers. Since most clerical and service jobs will soon be automated, with massive job lay-offs which will put some two thirds of the female work force out of work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the federal government give top priority to developing job opportunities for displaced workers, more relevant retraining programs for women, including apprenticeships, and that mandatory affirmative action be enforced by the federal government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

DAMAGE DONE TO HOLLAND MARSH, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, a devastating hail storm recently struck the Holland Marsh area of Ontario, causing millions of dollars of damage to vegetable crops as well as destroying hundreds of acres of land and completely wiping out many farmers. This 297region is known across Canada for its rich market garden industry and its vegetable storage and processing facilities. The reclamation of this rich farmland is one of the remarkable achievements of this century. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the Minister of Agriculture or his representative personally visit the Holland Marsh to see first hand the damage caused to this vegetable capital of Ontario with a view to working with his provincial counterpart to determine whether or not the region should be declared a disaster area.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MARINE TRANSPORT

HAZARDS TO NAVIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax-East): Madam Speaker, once again I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of some urgency which affects the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). In recent months, incidents of vessel collision and near-collision with standing pier support structures for bridges and other obstacles in navigable waters once again raise the growing urgency for action in Canada with regard to fendering of these support piers. The possibility of collision at high vehicle transit periods across bridges presents the government and the people of Canada with not only a legal but, as well, a definite moral obligation to take those measures immediately which are necessary to put fendering in place so that such incidents will not, in fact, unnecessarily cause the loss of lives at peak traffic periods. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That this government take immediate steps to effect such protection in the seven critical areas known to exist in Canada before an incident occurs resulting in loss of life.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FORESTRY

MEASURES SUGGESTED TO EFFECT IMPROVEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move the following urgent and pressing motion. Whereas the forest industry in the Province of British Columbia is in a state of virtual collapse; whereas the unemployed individuals in the province, as has been indicated, have committed arson in some cases in order to create employment in the forest industry of the province; whereas it is unlikely that the forest industry of British Columbia will recover the previous levels because of protectionism in the American market; and whereas mining has a minister of state in the federal government, and also a very high priority with the federal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the following priorities be established by the federal government: first, an upgrading of the forestry branch, at least to provide a full deputy minister in charge, if not a minister of state; second, that a long term forest policy be developed by the federal government based on stability of the resource and long term employment for the individuals involved; third, the introduction of an international forest products marketing corporation so that Canadians can expect that Canadian institutions will market their products abroad instead of international or foreign competitors, as is the present situation in many cases.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LIFE INSURANCE FOR ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. At a time when the Canadian economy is in critical condition, when the government should be protecting Canadian jobs and, wherever possible, stopping the flow of Canadian dollars to the United States, the life insurance plan endorsed and supported by the Department of National Defence for Canadian troops, involving more than 40,000 participants, and tens of millions of dollars in premiums, is carried by three American-owned insurance companies. Therefore I move:

• (1415)

That this House direct the Minister of National Defence to reopen the contract for life insurance for the troops, and limit bidding to the 33 Canadian-owned life insurance companies operating in this country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTS OF HIRING FREEZE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board who will know of published reports last week quoting Jayne Simms of the Public Service Commission indicating "there is definitely some kind of a push on" with regard to filling vacant positions in the public service in anticipation of a hiring freeze. The minister may also know that senior departmental officials in more than one department are indicating that there is indeed a push on, both to fill vacant positions and to turn temporary employees into permanent employees in advance of an expected hiring freeze to be brought in tonight. Departmental officials are saying it is a done thing already. How did that information about the budget get out? Presumably it got out through Treasury Board. And what is he going to do about it?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be making his statement on the budget tonight at eight o'clock.

QUERY RESPECTING KNOWLEDGE OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the minister appears not to have understood the question. The question comes within his purview. Why are departments today, and why were they last Friday, Thursday and Wednesday, moving to fill vacant positions, with full support apparently of the Public Service Commission? How did they know that a hiring freeze is being brought in tonight in advance of the finance minister's announcement? Did it come from his department? If not, will the minister undertake to find out how the departments know?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I understood the question perfectly well. Apparently the hon. member did not understand my answer. The Minister of Finance is delivering his budget at eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. Bosley: That is the rankest disregard for a budget leak I have ever heard, even from this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT HIRINGS PROCEED NORMALLY

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the minister responsible for the Treasury Board and for all public hiring. How does the President of the Treasury Board condone, (a) a budget leak, and (b) a budget leak which has the effect of making a mockery of the restraint that he personally has been talking about for so long? Will he undertake in this House today to ensure that hirings proceed as normal so that the people of Canada will know that, whatever happens tonight, the public service of this country was not given advance notice so that it can be protected?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I find this whole line of questioning just a lot of rubbish. I suggest that the hon. member for Don Valley West wait until the minister delivers his budget speech at eight o'clock.

Oral Questions

CANADA POST CORPORATION

HIRING OF SUMMER STUDENTS AT MISSISSAUGA, ONT.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Government of Canada is spending thousands of dollars encouraging people to hire students this summer. We received a letter from the Minister of Employment and Immigration urging Members of Parliament to encourage people to hire students. Will the minister explain to the House why Canada Post, a Crown corporation, hired 130 students for summer work at Gateway facilities in Mississauga and then, four days before they were to start, informed 90 of them by letter that there would be no jobs for them?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I will inquire, Madam Speaker, and report to the hon. member.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ASSIST STUDENTS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, the final sentence in the letter reads "I wish you luck in obtaining alternate summer employment". All of these young people need money to continue their education. Does the minister think that these people, who felt they had secure summer jobs, will be able to find summer employment elsewhere? What is the minister prepared to do to help these young people find other employment?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that we turned the postal operation from a department into a Crown corporation. I will bring to the attention of the president of the corporation the view of the hon. member, and I will report the answer to him.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL DEVELOPMENT—TRANSFER OF CONTROL TO JAPANESE CONSORTIUM

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. I cannot help but paraphrase Winston Churchill a little bit on this day, "Never has so much been owed by so many to so few for so little".

• (1420)

The Prime Minister knows that a deal was struck late last week to transfer effective majority control of the northeast coal project in British Columbia to a Japanese consortium of 12 companies led by Tokyo Boeki and Mitsui with 38 per cent, and leaving Denison Mines of Toronto with only 30 per cent. This $900 million deal may have a greater long-term impact on the Canadian economy than will tonight's budget, as the Prime Minister knows.

Has the Prime Minister or any of his ministers referred this matter to the Foreign Investment Review Agency, or is it the Prime Minister's new policy that foreign firms can be both the buyer and the seller of Canadian resources? And, if so, does the Prime Minister not understand that the seller will sell at the lowest possible price, costing Canadian taxpayers several hundred million dollars over the next 15 years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, most of the hon. member's question was by way of representation and argument. As far as the question on FIRA is concerned, I will take notice of it and inquire.

EXPORT PRICE OF COAL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary, Madam Speaker, is direced to the Minister of Transport, who has a great deal of knowledge about the northeast coal deal. As he knows, the taxpayers are subsidizing this deal so far to the tune of about $750 million and have a right to a return on that very sizeable investment. The original contract, as the minister knows, provides for a return from a base rate of $95 per tonne, and all of the government contracts, federal and provincial, have been based backwards from that $95 per tonne figure. If on Friday the federal government allowed the Japanese consortium to take majority control of Quintette, as was agreed last week, what is to stop them, once they control and manage the project, from lowering the base rate per tonne?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the base rate throughput per tonne in the Port of Prince Rupert was the object of intensive negotiation. The price obtained at the time was considered to be the best possible price. Is the price that the coal mines got from the Japanese the best possible price, or is it influenced by negotiations between the coal mines in Canada and the Japanese purchasers—that is another subject. At the time of the discussion of the throughput rate in the Port of Prince Rupert, the impression was that the coal mines had negotitated the best possible price.

RETURN ON PUBLIC INVESTMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): I think both the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker, and the Minister of Transport are missing what happened in Tokyo in the last week, in that all of a sudden we have the buyer and the seller now being the same body.

Over the next 15 years, the owners, controllers and managers of Quintette, which is 80 per cent of northeast coal, will be deciding what kind of investment will occur, and what kind of price loadings there will be. This will make it very difficult for CN, or the National Harbours Board, or even the infrastructure parts of the corporation, to know what is going on, because they will be unable to control it. Where it has historically been the case there is a majority control such as this, has there been a reference to the Foreign Investment Review

Agency? If they take control as is now proposed, and if they decide to lower the per tonne price below $95, with its prorated escalating clause over the next 15 years, does the minister tell this House and tell the people of Canada that we are going to get a return on the $1 billion-odd we have put into this project so far?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think I understand what the hon. member is insinuating. He is saying that because for future advantages the coal mines of Canada—or he is implying that—did not get the best price for their coal some months ago when the deal was put together—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Pepin: Well, I will give my hon. friend the opportunity to clear up the matter. And consequently he is saying these advantages are being paid now by way of allowing the Japanese purchasers of the coal to come in as equity owners in the coal mine itself. That is my understanding of what my hon. friend is saying. What I am going to answer to that is that obviously, if there is foreign ownership in these coal mines, it will be subject to FIRA, and FIRA and the Government of Canada will decide if those acquisitions are to the advantage of Canada as stated in the legislation itself.

Mr. Fulton: A final supplementary—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAEL—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM LEBANON

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister wrote to the Prime Minister of Israel on June 9 asking him to agree to a cease fire and to withdraw immediately and unconditionally from Lebanese territory. Has the Prime Minister received an answer to that request from the Prime Minister of Israel and, if so, what is the answer?

Can the Prime Minister tell us whether it is still the position of the Government of Canada that Israel should withdraw unconditionally from Lebanese territory, and could the Prime Minister outline for us any steps he has taken since to accomplish these objectives?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is the position of the Government of Canada, and I believe it is also the position of this House of Commons, which voted unanimously for a motion, moved by the hon. member himself, asking Israel to withdraw immediately and unconditionally. That motion was supported by the hon. member's party, by the New Democratic Party and by the Liberal Party. It is also a position I have taken in representations to Prime Minister Begin.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister forgot part of the question. I asked the Prime Minister whether he has heard back from the Prime Minister of Israel with respect to his correspondence with him and what steps the government has taken since then to see that these objectives are met. I would like the Prime Minister to address himself to that when he responds to my supplementary question.

REPLY TO CANADIAN REQUEST—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, as a supplementary question I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada is prepared to consider being a member of an international peacekeeping force in that area, if one is set up either under UN auspices or agreed to by the parties. As the Prime Minister knows, it has been stated by Israel that Israel would like a more effective peacekeeping force. Israel has asked the United States to participate. Would Canada be prepared to participate? Would the Prime Minister deal with those points?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will attempt to answer the questions in order. Yes, I did receive an answer from Prime Minister Begin. His attitude was contrary to that which I had expressed and the House of Commons had expressed. He believed Israel should not withdraw immediately and unconditionally.

In so far as a so-called peacekeeping force is concerned, the hon. member will realize that his question is hypothetical in its very form: if a peacekeeping force is set up, what will the Government of Canada do? I do not believe I should attempt to answer a hypothetical question, but as a partial response to that, and to the second question, I will say that I discussed the matter with the Secretary General of the United Nations when I met him on Friday of the week before last. I discussed the matter with him and his officials at some length. The question of such a force was raised, and we exchanged views on it.

THE BUDGET

PRE-PRESENTATION LOCKUP FOR MEDIA AND MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Finance. I am surprised he is not in the House on the day of his budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: He is out buying new shoes, Mike. They are likely imported shoes, too.

Mr. Crosbie: Does he want any mukluks?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: I will address my question to the Prime Minister. Will there be a budgetary lockup for Members of Parliament similar to that which has been held for some 30 or 40 years, which will allow Members of Parliament the opportunity to study the contents of the budget and provide them with the means by which they can responsibly respond to the elements of the budget? If these lockup privileges are not to be extended, would the Prime Minister explain why they will not be extended?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the first point I would make is that as far as I know this practice has not existed for 30 or 40 years as the hon. member alleges.

Mr. Nielsen: It has indeed.

Mr. Trudeau: I believe it is a practice which began much more recently, some ten years ago, during my administration. I would be interested in hearing about the precedents or the historic references the hon. member has, which allow him to suggest glibly that the practice has existed for 30 or 40 years.

In so far as the proposal made by the hon. minister is concerned, perhaps the Minister of State for Finance has more recent knowledge than I, but to my knowledge, the offer of the Minister of Finance to the opposition on Friday was that they have an advance copy of the budget and a briefing on it provided they undertake not to break the embargo until after the minister has finished speaking.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am advised that the practice of budget lockups was undertaken when the Hon. Donald Fleming was the minister of finance. I can go no further back than that, but the practice has been in existence for some while, and I think the Prime Minister knows that.

• (1430)

APPLICATION OF RULES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, may I put a supplementary question. If it is such an important principle for the government to keep Members of Parliament gagged during the time the Minister of Finance is making his speech, why is it that, when the Prime Minister and members of the Liberal Party were in opposition, they left the House of Commons while the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, was making his speech? Why the double standard? Why have we changed these rules now, when the Prime Minister himself was following a different practice as leader of the opposition?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is true that increasingly this practice of the lockup has been abused by—perhaps by members of both parties. I do not recall the circumstances when the hon. member for St. John's West read his budget, but the Minister of Justice, a former minister of finance, reminds me that it was begun by the Conservative opposition when he was minister and that it is a practice that is—

Mr. Wilson: Why the double standard?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is asking why there is a double standard. It is not a double standard if it is practised by both sides.

I wish the hon. member would listen to my answer, which is that this practice has been going on for some time. As the Minister of Finance points out, it is certainly not fair to Members of Parliament that the people listening to the electronic media—

Mr. Wilson: Why did you leave?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking supplementary questions. It he wants to ask a supplementary question I will sit down and hear it, but if he wants to hear my answer he should at least be polite and listen while I am answering.

CANADIAN UNITY

AWARDING OF CONTRACTS BY INFORMATION OFFICE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice. The incoming executive director of the Canadian Unity Information Office has said that he has been specifically asked to look into CUIO's practices in awarding contracts. What practices in awarding contracts led the minister to issue that request to the new executive director?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, several questions were raised in committee, and I have asked the new director to ensure that all current practices within the Canadian Unity Information Office are up to standard. That is part of his mandate, and since he was newly appointed, I asked him to make sure that all the usual guidelines were followed under his direction.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, specific questions were not asked in committee as they related to the awarding of contracts by CUIO. Perhaps the minister could elaborate on that.

INVOLVEMENT OF EMPLOYEE IN POLITICAL ACTIVITY

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The new executive director also says that he has been instructed by the minister to review CUIO's guidelines governing the political activities of its employees. Could the minister confirm that he gave three months' notice to Mr. Patrick McDougall, a former employee of CUIO, as a result of his involvement with the Liberal election campaign in the Newfoundland provincial election?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, it is true that Mr. McDougall told me he had taken part in the Newfoundland election campaign, and since he was working under contract and was hired under an exchange with the private sector, he was not aware of all administrative practices. I told him he had been unwise, even though it was after working hours, to take part in the Newfoundland election. Since under his contract, he had to be given three months' notice if we wanted to release him from his duties, that is what we did, and, in fact, he himself offered to leave when he realized he had committed an indiscretion.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

INQUIRY RESPECTING RESULT OF RESEARCH BY NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION

Mrs. Eva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is connected with the question I put to the minister last week on the status of UFFI victims. Could the minister inform the House on the results of work being done with the National Advisory Council on UFFI, since it seems the minister had a meeting with Council representatives over the weekend?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, to answer the hon. member's question, I can report that the National Advisory Council on UFFI has asked me to allow all home owners to remove the foam from their homes, if that was their choice. Saturday, I accepted this recommendation on behalf of the government, which means that during the next few weeks, a task force including representatives of associations of UFFI victims will work in close co-operation with officials from my department to assist home owners who want to remove the product from the walls of their homes this summer. I have therefore decided to change the regulations of the assistance program for UFFI victims to reflect this new aspect. In addition, the courses we are offering contractors will also be offered free to home owners who want to remove the product from their walls themselves.

RAILWAYS

GILSON REPORT ON CROWSNEST PASS RATES—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport about the Gilson report, which I understand he will table today after three o'clock, and which was developed in a sort of Polish government style, behind closed doors, without any public input from grain producers. Will the minister subject the Gilson report to public scrutiny and do as Mr. Justice Emmett Hall did, that is, allow the Standing Committee on Transport and the Standing Committee on Agriculture to hold hearings across western Canada on the Gilson report and its recommendations?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not think it is fair to say that representatives of farmers in the west did not take part in the negotiations that took place under Dr. Gilson. Representations have been extensive. There were 67 different groups represented. The next step will see those who took part in negotiations going back to their associations and defending the Gilson report in part or in total. In coming days other ministers and I will similarly meet with representative groups—wheat pools, railways, and all kinds of associations. In the fall we will present a bill on western grain transportation which will be extensively debated in the House and in committee, so I dare say there will be a lot of participation in the process that will lead to the final legislation.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, 50 of the 67 organizations that the minister referred to do not grow grain or ship grain that is subject to the statutory rates. This is consultation El Salvador style—on land reform they consult with the land owners, not the land users.

REQUEST THAT RECOMMENDATIONS BE SUBJECTED TO REFERENDUM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. If the minister thinks the Gilson and Snavley reports are so good will he submit them to the grain producers, that is, to those who hold wheat board permits, and allow them to vote on whether they want Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations or the Gilson report recommendations? Let us have no more nonsense such as consulting with outfits that do not grow grain or ship grain that is subject to the statutory grain rates. The minister has deliberately saturated his consulting process with people who are opposed to statutory grain rates, opposed to orderly marketing, and opposed to the Canadian Wheat Board. That is what he has built this stacked deck on, with the Gilson report. Will he submit the question to a referendum—Mr. Justice Hall's report or the Gilson report, which one?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, most of the farm leaders who attended the negotiations are elected on an annual basis, so it must be terribly difficult to be the leader of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or the Alberta Wheat Pool and not represent the will of the members of those pools. If anything, they are more in the hands of their members than we are in the hands of the electors.

• (1440)

Be that as it may, I repeat that there will be an extensive process of consultation between representatives of the groups who were at the Gilson exercise and their members in the weeks ahead. I and other members of the cabinet will meet with a good number of these associations. The process of consultation will be really exhaustive by the time we come to debate the bill in the fall. Then there will be parliamentary views expressed on this bill, and if my hon. friend wants to bring other people to committee to discuss the issue, he will have a chance to do that.

I have been involved in this issue for a couple of years now, and almost everywhre I went in the west people would say, "We have discussed this problem now for decades; it is time to act". My hon. friend would like to go back to the past; I suggest he come forward to the present and into the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT REPORT BE REFERRED TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Why is the minister circumventing the parliamentary process at this particular time? We have the Gilson report tabled, and it is very complex with many areas which require clarification. Would the minister not consider referring the report to a standing committee where he, and indeed Dr. Gilson, would avail themselves to clarify some of the very important recommendations made in this report so that Members of Parliament would have a clear understanding of its recommendations before legislation is brought before the House?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, those representatives who were at the Gilson exercise, as I call it, suggested that now they have the report they should go back to their different memberships and discuss the conclusions reached by the federal representative. They are the ones who want to take it up with their members. Again I say that after the federal government has made its decision on this issue, we will have plenty of time in the fall to debate everything in the Gilson report.

Mr. Clark: Just like VIA Rail.

Mr. Pepin: I do not know what will be retained by cabinet from the Gilson report, but I am quite willing to say today that it is a tremendous effort and generally well received.

Mr. Benjamin: By whom?

Mr. Pepin: Well received by people who looked at it this morning. But I will immediately add that it was almost impossible to read what was on the faces of those representatives yesterday or last night because, before expressing their own personal views on the Gilson report, they want to go back and discuss it with members of their associations, which I think is a hell of a good democratic process.

ROLE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, surely the minister should and does realize that he has a responsibility to the members of this House who are elected to serve the interests of their constituents. Fortunately the bulk of those members are situated on this side of the House, but the minister insists on not allowing those members the opportunity of participating in this debate.

Will the minister, before the adjournment of the House, consider referring this report to the standing committee so that members can question the minister and Dr. Gilson to clarify further the recommendations? And since the minister is sold on the report and the consultations, are we to assume that he accepts the recommendations? If not, are there any areas with which the minister does disagree?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, in my understanding of the parliamentary process the role of the opposition is not to comment, favourably or unfavourably, on investigations or reports asked for on our way to legislation. The role of the opposition is to comment, favourably or unfavourably, on propositions that the government intends to put into law.

Mr. Clark: Why did you set up the task forces?

Mr. Pepin: That is what the opposition will have a chance to do in the fall. If every report were brought to the House and to committee for discussion, I suggest there would be no end to it.

MARINE TRANSPORT

HAZARDS TO NAVIGATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my qestion is for the Minister of Transport. I should say to him that the Gilson report, as well as the subject matter which concerns me, is perhaps a little more important to more Canadians than is the ports bill.

In light of incidents, both here, in the U.S., and in certain parts of Europe, involving either direct collisions with bridges carrying vehicular or pedestrian traffic, or near collisions, including Halifax harbour and the St. Lawrence River, I ask the minister whether or not these incidents raise once again in the minister's mind not only the legal obligations which might obtain but also the moral obligation to extend some form of bridge piling structure fendering so as to protect lives in the event of an accidental collision.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act the Government of Canada authorizes the construction of bridges over certain waters, and it has responsibility for maintaining traffic in those waters. When it comes to bridges such as the two in Halifax which my hon. friend has in mind, those are intra-provincial bridges and consequently it is the responsibility of the province to protect the pilings of those bridges. I understand that this is a rather difficult argument to carry to the limit, so we are looking at ways now where, with the co-operation of the provinces, it might be possible to attack this very interesting and important safety matter.

DEPARTMENTAL APPROACH

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, in recent years hundreds and hundreds of lives have been lost in avoidable accidents. Of the 16 existing situations, seven are critical and four are extraordinarily critical. Do I understand the minister to be saying that he and his officials are attempting to develop an approach which will, in effect, result in cost sharing, or total absorption of the cost by the federal government, because it is a multiprovincial problem? Is the minister saying that in fact his department will look at this, and that it is perhaps something we might approach even as early as this summer?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed I was being very cautious because this can be a rather expensive venture. However, in the last number of months, in the maritimes in particular, we have come to some kind of agreement with the provinces under which we are making savings in transportation and allocating those savings to other purposes in the area of transportation. So it is in that limited context that we are looking at it now. It is a question of substantial importance, I am very familiar with and aware of it, and like my hon. friend I think something might be done or could be done, and if something can be done I will try to do it.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

USE OF AGENT WHITE DEFOLIANT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the public concern which has been generated in a number of places in Canada regarding the use of the chemical Tordon 101 and Tordon 10K, by utility companies to control the growth of brush near power lines, can the minister say if this defoliant chemical, sometimes called Agent White, has been adequately tested so that her department can recommend it as being safe to use, and that there are adequate controls on its use to ensure that it does not pose a public health hazard?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, that defoliant includes one element called Picloram which is on the IBT list. Replacement studies are under way in order to permit us to make a proper health assessment as soon as possible, but there is no reason, to our knowledge, for people to worry about Picloram being a residue on food because of its usage which is licensed and controlled by the provinces. In the case to which the hon. member referred, the province of Ontario has approved Picloram for roadside clearing, but only by licensed applicators. This will be in areas where there should be no population. The only warning which appears on the label is with regard to occupational safety, in other words, for those spraying with that pesticide.

STATUS OF WOMEN

IMPACT OF MICROTECHNOLOGY

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women. This past weekend the minister will know that there was a very major national conference which brought women from across Canada to meet here in Ottawa to discuss their concerns about the tremendous impact of high technology particularly on female workers. Of course this revolution is happening now, but it will be worse in the future. Since most clerical and service jobs which employ primarily female workers will soon be automated, what plans does the government have to replace the massive job losses which will put some two thirds of the female work force out of work?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government has already launched a task force which is investigating this very problem. The task force, headed by Dr. Margaret Fulton, has already met in Toronto and will be holding meetings throughout the country. In addition, we, that is, the status of women, as part of the field trials' operations in the Offices of the Future Program which was announced a couple of months ago, are very much aware of this impact on our monitoring and will be devising programs to look into the situation very carefully.

Mrs. Mitchell: I am sure that task forces are fine, but action is needed now. Both short-term and long-term plans by the federal government are needed now. We were told at this conference that retraining programs for displaced female workers are now practically non-existent or, if they do exist, that they are practically obsolete, such as secretarial training, for example, that few women can get into trades training and that women will be pushed into the low-paying, part-time, non-unionized jobs; this is their future.

Oral Questions

TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, in view of this extremely serious situation, does the minister not agree that it is imperative for the federal government to institute mandatory affirmative action, to develop future-oriented job-training programs, including apprenticeship training, and to give major priority to job creation for women? What does she, as the minister responsible for the status of women, intend to do about it?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should be very much aware of what is included in the National Training Act which was passed by the House and is now awaiting royal assent. This particular act addresses many of the problems which she has raised. I suggest that she examine some of the special training programs which are in effect, and the money which has been put into non-traditional training by the government. I urge the women of the country to examine these programs and to take advantage of the programs which are in existence now. I suggest to them that they are not aware of what is available. It is part of my job and of the hon. member's job to ensure that they take advantage of them.

TRADE

IMPORTS OF SPUN ACRYLIC YARNS FROM MALAYSIA

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for International Trade. Imports of spun acrylic sales yarns from Malaysia are increasing rapidly and are resulting in the loss of work, particularly in Perth, Ontario, but in other factories across Ontario and Quebec. Why was a specific restraint with Malaysia not renewed for the 1982-1986 period, similar to the restraints with other countries?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of that specific product being included in the MFA bilateral agreement with Malaysia, but I will check and get back to the hon. member.

REQUEST THAT IMPORTS BE ROLLED BACK TO FORMER LEVELS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, at the same time will the minister check and report back on what action the government will take to roll back imports to the former restraint level and re-establish specific restraint levels through to 1986, which would make them consistent with the recommendations of the textile and clothing board?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, all the bilateral agreements which we have negotiated under the MFA are under discussion right now within the department.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF CANAGREX CORPORATION

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for International Trade. In light of the fact that the minister has not seen fit to go ahead with the national trading corporation, could he explain to the House why he is considering supporting the Canagrex bill which gives the right to buy and sell agricultural products within Canada by the federal government to a Crown Corporation?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, first of all, the request for the national trading corporation was different from the Canagrex legislation. The Canagrex legislation will fill a void which is not at the present time being handled within the private sector.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUERY RESPECTING REPLACEMENT OF NAVAL RESERVE VESSELS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Last week the minister told the House that, despite the $3 billion which has been cut from the capital program of the Department of National Defence, none of the major projects has been delayed or cancelled. Would the minister tell the House whether or not any smaller projects, such as the replacement of five gate vessels for the naval reserves, have been delayed or cancelled?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, following the answer which I gave the hon. member sometime ago on the capital investment or rather the capital expenditures of the Department of National Defence, he should know, as an ex-minister of national defence, that we project our capital expenditures on a 15-year basis. There are, of course, many fluctuations which affect these 15-year projections, such as fluctuations in American inflation, in the rate of Canadian inflation, and also the rate of the Canadian dollar. All these issues are taken into consideration in our capital expenditures. We must re-evaluate and adjust, as years go by, what we can do with the financial resources given by the government to National Defence. It is not a question simply of what we can do this year or next year. We have to project over the long term, and it depends a lot on the economic situation.

MANPOWER LEVEL OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question will be quite short. As a means of finding the money which the minister will be short of, is he contemplating reducing the size of the manpower of the Canadian forces?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): No, Madam Speaker. I think the accepted strength at the moment is 83,400 or 82,800. I can correct that if I am wrong, but I think it is 83,400 people. At the moment we are at full strength. There is no question of cutting the authorized strength approved by the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I am sure he is aware that there are Canadian citizens and other persons who would be ordinarily resident in Canada who are trapped at the moment in Lebanon. To date, Canadian representatives in Lebanon have not been able either to identify them properly or find out where they are. Would the Prime Minister consider making representations, both to the authorities in Beirut and to the authorities in Israel, asking that they assist us in identifying our citizens and residents who are in that war-torn country and in attempting to have them conducted out of the country with safe passage?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will inquire into the matter. I understand that the Department of External Affairs has been in touch and assisting with these cases. The hon. member shakes his head no. I will inquire into it, and if there is any way in which we could help, obviously we would want to do so.

RAILWAYS

GILSON REPORT ON CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the Gilson report. The minister has had the report for some two weeks. Obviously he and his department have studied it and his officials have communicated their feelings about the report to him. Could the minister indicate to the House whether there is any part of the report about which he has any great concern or any serious questions?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I said that I would not comment on it because obviously my colleagues want to be associated with me in the decision-making process. But there is one thing in the report which obviously comes to mind immediately. As my hon. friend remembers, in the statement of last February 8 the government had indicated some parameters, some general principles. One of those principles was that the cost for the next four years to the federal government would be at the level of $3.2 billion. It comes out as $3.5 billion in the Gilson report. If my hon. friend, like me, is rather skeptical about the rate of inflation indicated as an assumption in the report, then he might conclude that it will be more than $3.5 billion. That is one of the difficulties.

• (1500)

Another observation which might be made is about all the predictions, about the terrible things that were to happen. We all remember our NDP friends yelling all across the west that this was going to be the downfall of western agriculture. The fact is that should the government adopt the Gilson report, or something approaching it, the increase of the cost of transportation to the farmers would be rather moderate. Should the government accept the whole thing it would be 50 per cent more than the Crow in four years' time, and after 10 years it will be 220 per cent of Crow, which is far away from what those guys had been predicting all along. This is particularly true considering what the defeated government of Saskatchewan kept announcing all through the campaign which took place there. Therefore, one now realizes the unfairness of these boogies that were built up by the NDP and its Saskatchewan wing.

PETITION

MR. SARGEANT—MAINTENANCE OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, further to the petitions tabled by a number of my colleagues on Wednesday last and on this day, directly following the tabling of the Gilson report on grain freight rates, I am pleased to present petitions of some 834 residents of Manitoba. They are people who were excluded from the consultation process of the Gilson report and who call upon Parliament to maintain the Crow rate. They recognize that changing the Crow rate will reduce farm incomes, contribute to the breaking up of communities on branch lines and increase trucking and road costs. Mindful that three royal commissions have recommended the retention of the Crow rate, they pray that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) will heed the message of this timely petition.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,539, 3,540, 4,059, 4,072, and 4,226.

[Text]

GRAPHIC ARTISTS, STUDIO S & B

Question No. 3,539—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is a complete list of all business done by any department with Graphic Artists, Studio S & B, 400 St. Antoine St. West, Montreal, including the nature of such business, the dates involved, the subjects involved and the money paid both in each case and in total?

2. Did Graphic Artists, Studio S & B perform government work through any advertising agency, including Vickers and Benson and, if so, what are all the details in this regard?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned: 1. Studio S & B supplied CMHC with graphic design services, including typesetting and camera-ready art, for the production of a variety of communications materials. This material is designed for use by the corporation to inform members of the housing industry, lenders, home owners, landlords and the general public of its programs and services.

	Amount Spent
	April 1, 1980 December 31, 1980	January 1, 1981 December 11, 1981
National Housing Act changes	$118,433	—
Energy Conservation	64,183	$ 31,430
Canadian Home Insulation Program	51,714	26,014
Metric Conversion	1,192	—
Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program	29,272	24,662
Real Estate Marketing	—	2,981
Corporate Identity Program	—	90,719
Housing Technology Incentives Program	—	2,970
Canada Mortgage renewal plan	—	9,668
Human Resources Centre	—	2,411
Exhibits	—	363
	$264,794	$191,218

Total 1980/1981—$456,012.

2. CMHC did not purchase services from Studio S & B through Vickers and Benson or any other agent during the period April 1, 1980, to December 11, 1981.

In so far as the Department of Supply and Services is concerned: 1. Since April 1, 1980, there have been no contracts placed with Graphic Artists, Studio S & B.

2. Although Graphic Artists, Studio S & B provide graphic services to most advertising agencies in Montreal and, in the past, have provided services to several of these agencies doing work on government campaigns, the details of such subcontracting services are proprietary to the advertising agencies.

In so far as other Departments are concerned: none.

CMHC—ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Question No. 3,540—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With respect to the advertisement ordered by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation explaining certain housing provisions in the budget and headed "Attention Homeowners", on what date did CMHC request the advertising firm of Vickers and Benson to book space in newspapers across the country?

2. Is the government aware that Linda Santucci, a representative of Vickers and Benson made telephone calls to certain newspapers including the Charlottetown Guardian requesting that the original insertion be not printed?

3. Did the government give Vickers and Benson instructions to "kill" the advertisement and, if so, what are all the reasons that the government would attempt to keep the advertisement from getting into print and specifically, was one of the reasons that someone in government realized that the advertisement was prepared prior to the budget with pre-budget information in the hands of Studio S&B, 400 St. Antoine St. West, Montreal?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am informed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. November 9, 1981. 2. No. 3. No.

CONTRACTS OF TERM EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,059—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Did the Department of Employment and Immigration adopt a new policy for the renewal of the contracts of specified term employees and, if so (a) in what way does the policy differ from the previous policy (b) which other departments use this policy at present?

2. Will the effect of the new policy be to require existing term employees to reapply for their positions at the end of their contract and, if so, what will be the impact of this on service to the public and on employee morale?

3. Are any other departments considering adopting a similar policy?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canada Employment and Immigration Department and the Public Service Commission as follows:

1. No. However, in response to a Public Service Commission directive, national headquarters of this Commission/Department in May of 1981, instructed its regions to take appropriate measures to implement controls on the use of "term" employment. This was done to ensure that "term" employment is not used as a substitute for normal staffing processes, as well as to prevent a recurrence of a situation which existed prior to 1980, whereby a number of "term" employees acquired extensive periods of service without enjoying the rights of indeterminate status.

(a) The Public Service Commission has not altered its policies with respect to the employment of specified period employees. When a specified period (term) employee's period of employment is terminated by virtue of the specified period expiring and a need continues to exist for work of a term nature, the department concerned is required to obtain referrals from the appropriate referral agency (PSC or CEC) and make another specified period appointment on the basis of merit (most qualified available applicant).

With respect to long term specified period employees (at least five years of continuous service) on August 24, 1980, the Public Service Commission advised departments that a procedure had been established to secure indeterminate status for certain specified period employees who had been appointed for terms of five consecutive years. This procedure allowed appointments without competition through the use of an exclusion order to nullify the effects of appeal rights under section 21(b) and priority appointment rights and consideration under sections 29, 30 and 37 of the Public Service Employment Act. The procedure was intended to deal with situations where specified period employees had had at least five years of consecutive employment in the past without having attained indeterminate status. The new procedure was not intended to provide for an alternative to the normal staffing process for filling positions on an indeterminate basis (i.e. a competition). In this regard, the Public Service Commission reminded departments on January 7, 1981, that the normal procedure to be used to fill positions on an indeterminate basis is the competitive process. This process applies equally whether or not the position to be filled has been temporarily staffed with a specified period employee.

(b) The procedure outlined above applied to all appointments to departments under the Public Service Employment Act.

2. Not applicable.

3. In so far as the Public Service Commission is aware, all departments are following existing policies with respect to specified period employment.

STATUS OF LANGUAGE GROUPS

Question No. 4,072—Mr. McKenzie:

1. With reference to the supporting paper No. 1/81 of the Department of Transport Directive, File 2080-1 of January 7, 1982, are Francophones being contacted to relocate to Ontario in order to meet designated quotas of Francophone participation and, if so, in which provinces?

2. Do the Francophones being recruited have to be currently employed in the public service position which is similar to the position in Ontario which is going to be filled?

3. Are other language groups such as Polish, Ukrainian, Italian, Portuguese and English being recruited in the same manner as are Francophones with respect to public service positions in the Department of Transport and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, will the relevant recruitment directives be made available to Members of Parliament?

4. In the Department of (a) Agriculture (b) Communications (c) Consumer and Corporate Affairs (d) Employment and Immigration (e) Energy, Mines and Resources (f) the Environment (g) External Affairs (h) Finance (i) Fisheries and Oceans (j) Indian Affairs and Northern Development (k) Industry, Trade and Commerce (l) Justice (m) Labour (n) National Defence (o) National Health and Welfare (p) Public Works (q) Regional Economic Expansion (r) National Revenue (s) Secretary of State (t) the Solicitor General (u) Supply and Services (v) Veterans Affairs (w) the Treasury Board (x) the Ministry of State for Science and Technology (y) the Canada Post Corporation, are other language groups such as Polish, Ukrainian, Italian, Portuguese or English being recruited in the same manner as are Francophones with respect to public service positions and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, will the relevant recruitment directives be made available to Members of Parliament?

5. With reference to the supporting paper, does the Department of Transport, in its Action Plan, ensure that language groups other than Francophones are explored for availability?

6. Which of the departments and the corporation listed in part 4 ensure that language groups other than Francophones are explored for availability?

7. Does the Department of Transport establish areas of competition to include all geographical areas where Polish-speaking, Ukrainian-speaking, Italian-speaking, Portuguese-speaking, Indian-speaking, English-speaking or any other language groups are available and (a) if so, where are the areas (b) if not, for what reason?

8. For each department and the corporation listed in part 4, are there established areas of competition to include all geographical areas where Polish-speaking, Ukrainian-speaking, Italian-speaking, Portuguese-speaking, Indian-speaking, English-speaking or any other language groups are available and (a) if so, where are the areas (b) if not, for what reason?

9. Does the Department of Transport make personal contact with qualified (a) Polish-speaking (b) Ukrainian-speaking (c) Italian-speaking (d) Portuguese-speaking (e) English-speaking (f) any other language group employees to encourage them to move to Ontario for employment and (i) if so, what means of advertising is used, where is it distributed and at what cost is it produced and distributed (ii) if not, for what reason?

10. For each department and the corporation listed in part 4, is personal contact made with qualified (a) Polish-speaking (b) Ukrainian-speaking (c) Italian-speaking (d) Portuguese-speaking (e) English-speaking (f) any other language group employees to encourage them to move to Ontario for employment and, if so (i) what means of advertising is used, where is it distributed, and at what cost is it produced and distributed (ii) if not, for what reason?

11. (a) With reference to the supporting paper, in which provinces does the Department of Transport promote career opportunities with the department by advertising competition posters for all language groups in all high schools, community colleges and universities (b) does the department meet with potential employees from all language groups before it makes a decision on possible employment of a particular person and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, what process is used to ensure all language groups are given equal access to Department of Transport jobs?

12. In each department and in the corporation listed in part 4, are potential employees from all language groups met with before making a decision on possible employment of a particular person and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what process is used to ensure all language groups are given equal access to all Department of Transport jobs?

13. Does the Department of Transport initiate, maintain or increase contact with educational institutions, professional institutions and other organizations in each province and territory in order to identify (a) Ukrainian-speaking (b) Polish-speaking (c) Portuguese-speaking (d) English-speaking (e) Italian-speaking (f) any other language group sources for specific occupational groups and levels and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, in what manner and how often is this done and what process is used to ensure equal contact with all language groups?

14. For each department and the corporation listed in part 4, is contact initiated, maintained or increased with educational institutions, professional institutions and other organizations in each province and territory in order to identify (a) Ukrainian-speaking (b) Polish-speaking (c) Portuguese-speaking (d) English-speaking (e) Italian-speaking (f) any other language group sources for specific occupational groups and levels and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, in what manner and how often is this done and what process is used to ensure equal contact with all language groups?

15. Does each department and the corporation listed in part 4 develop resource pools for language groups other than Francophones and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, for which language groups?

16. Does each department and the corporation listed in part 4 make full use of other language group resource pools at every opportunity when hiring public servants and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, how many persons from each language group were hired in each year 1970 to 1981?

17. Does each department and the corporation listed in part 4 identify persons in all language groups other than Francophones who are capable of acceding to intermediate and senior level positions and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, how many persons from each language group acceded to an intermediate or senior position in the department in each year 1970 to 1981?

18. In each department and the corporation listed in part 4, by year from 1982 to 1990, what are the projections for each language group's recruitment proportions and how many persons from each group will be hired?

19. What will be the government's over-all employment in the public service, including Crown corporations and the military, in 1990 and what projected proportion will be made up by each language group?

20. For each department and the corporation listed in part 4, are training and development needs determined for all language groups through employee evaluation reports and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, how often and can samples of the evaluations be made available to Members of Parliament?

21. For each department and the corporation listed in part 4, is use made of all language group pools for special assignments and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what are all the types of assignments?

22. For each department and the corporation listed in part 4, does the department encourage all language groups with suitable potential to participate in departmental exchange programs and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Treasury Board Canada and Transport Canada as follows:

The Official Languages Program in the Public Service of Canada is founded on the principle that whether in dealing with the federal government, or in pursuing a career within it, Canadians of each of the two major linguistic communities would have equal opportunities to use their first official language. The equal status of both languages in federal institutions is an explicit objective of both the Official Languages Act of 1969 and of the new Constitution. It is also the objective of the Official Languages Resolution passed in 1973 by Parliament, with the support of all parties, which calls for achieving, within the merit principle, the "full participation in the public service by members of both the Anglophone and the Francophone communities".

It is important to note that where the linguistic composition of the public service is concerned, the terms "Anglophone" and "Francophone" are not limited to people whose mother tongue is English on the one hand, or French on the other. Thus "Francophones" include all Canadians of different ethnic origins and mother tongue (such as Polish, Italian, Portuguese, etc.) who are more at home in French than in English. In terms of the official languages policy, French is their first official language. Clearly then, to contact, recruit or train Francophones or Anglophones is also to do so for the above groups as a matter of course.

One of the means approved by the resolution for achieving the participation objective was "further recruitment efforts . . . ". Where in any federal department or agency, the participation rate is significantly different from either the general population figures or the more specific labour force statistics, the department concerned is expected to review its situation to ensure that its recruitment practices do not discriminate against qualified Anglophones or qualified Francophones, and within the merit principle, progressively eliminate the disparities observed.

In the Department of Transport's Ontario region, as in various parts of some other departments and agencies, it is the Francophone participation rate which is low. Where this is so, departments are expected to build up contacts with French language educational and professional institutions, resource pools and other sources in order to complement existing Anglophone sources upon which the federal public service has traditionally relied and which it continues to use.

Where Francophones are contacted for availability to fill positions, these positions are not closed to Anglophones, who may and do also apply, and are given equal consideration with Francophone applicants. The decision to employ a particular candidate is then based on his or her ability to meet the qualifications of the position.

"Training programs offered in the French language" are another means approved by the parliamentary resolution. Accordingly, training and development are among the measures proposed in the memorandum to which the question refers. Since these measures are also mentioned in the question itself, notably in part 20, it should be particularly remembered that training and development courses in French are open not only to Francophones but also to bilingual Anglophones, and the converse is true of courses in English.

Since, as stated, the policy makes no distinction between Anglophones whose mother tongue is English and those with other mother tongues, or between Francophones of French mother tongue and those with others, further distinctions between the specific language groups on which data are requested in the question are not relevant to the implementation of the official languages policy. Except as provided above, the following numbered parts of the question are therefore not applicable: 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 (b), 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22.

1. No. Although a statement to this effect was mentioned in the supporting paper as a possible recruitment strategy, it has not been implemented.

2. No.

11. (a) As required, the Department of Transport promotes career opportunities in educational institutions in all provinces and these campaigns are directed towards all Canadians.

19. The government has established no such projections for 1990.

SUICIDES IN FEDERAL INSTITUTIONS

Question No. 4,226—Mr. Corbett:

1. In (a) 1981 (b) 1982 to date, in each federal penitentiary, how many persons committed suicide?

2. For the same period, in each federal penitentiary, how many prisoners suffered bodily harm as a result of action by (a) penitentiary staff (b) penitentiary inmates?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned:

1. (a) In 1981, 12 inmates committed suicide. These suicides occurred at the following institutions: Laval Institution—1; Archambault Institution—2; Leclerc Institution—3; Regional Psychiatriac Centre, Ontario—1; Kingston Penitentiary—1; Collins Bay Institution—1; Warkworth Institution—1; Edmonton Institution—1; Kent Institution—1.

(b) In 1982, two inmates committed suicide. The two suicides occurred at Archambault Institution and at the Federal Training Centre.

2. (a) Information not available. Statistical data is not maintained on bodily harm suffered by inmates as a result of action by penitentiary staff.

(b) Between January 1 and December 31, 1981, there was a total of 56 major and 185 minor assaults committed on inmates by other inmates in maximum and medium-security institutions. Between January 1 and March 31, 1982, there was a total of six major and 42 minor assaults committed on inmates by other inmates in maximum and medium-security institutions. For detailed statistics by institution, please see table below.

A minor assault consists of an incident in which no bodily injury is incurred, or the injury is superficial as, for example, abrasions or bruises. A major assault consists of an incident where the injury results in hopsitalization or treatment which prohibits return to normal routine or where it is evident that the perpetrator intended to cause grievous bodily harm.

*INFORMATION ON METRIC SYSTEM IN BRAILLE

Question No. 4,317—Mr. Dinsdale:

Did the Metric Commission provide information on the metric system in braille for the benefit of the blind and, if so, what was such information?

[English]

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes. Conversion charts prepared by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind have been provided by Metric Commission Canada on request. Metric Commission Canada is currently co-operating with the Canadian National Institute for the Blind in the production of additional materials in braille, in large print, and in audio cassette format for the visually impaired.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

[English]

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, last year on June 18, prior to the royal wedding, I put a question on the Order Paper numbered 2,644 in which I inquired whether or not the post office intended to issue a postage stamp commemorating the royal wedding. In view of the fact that a year has come and gone since that time and that the stork has beaten the post office, could the parliamentary secretary indicate when the post office will be supplying an answer to that question?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I do not know the answer to that offhand but I will be happy to make inquiries on behalf of the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

MEASURE TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-43, to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Just before the House enters into debate I would like to indicate the grouping and voting arrangement for the report stage. Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) should be debated and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 in the name of the Minister of Communications and motions Nos. 10, 21 and 22 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) concerning disclosure and access to information should be debated together but voted on separately. Motions Nos. 6, 9 and 18 should be debated together and, if required, voted on separately. Motions Nos. 7, 8, 19 and 20 should be debated together with a vote on motion No. 7 disposing of motion No. 8 and the vote on motion No. 19 disposing of motion No. 20.

Motions Nos. 11 and 12 should be debated separately and voted on separately. Motion No. 15 in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) gives the Chair some misgivings concerning its procedural acceptability. The motion appears to go beyond the scope of the bill. However, there is some doubt in the mind of the Chair in that Clause 3 to Schedule 2 defines personal information as "(c) any identifying number". Because of this doubt, and unless I am persuaded otherwise, it is the Chair's intention to give the hon. member the benefit of this doubt and to put the motion to the House.

Therefore, as motions Nos. 13, 14, 16, 17 and 26 are consequential and related to motion No. 15, it is my intention to group them for debate with a vote on motion No. 15 disposing of motions Nos. 13, 14, 16, 17 and 26.

Motions Nos. 23 and 24 should be debated separately and voted on separately. Motion No. 25 in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe seeks to amend two acts which are not before the House. Therefore, in accordance with Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citations 792 and 773(8)(a), I must rule that motion No. 25 is not acceptable. However, the hon. member, if he so wishes, may present his arguments in favour of the motion when it is called.

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-43, An Act to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be amended by adding immediately after line 4 at page 2 the following

"AMENDMENT TO ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

6. If, during the first session of the thirty-second Parliament, an Act entitled the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act is assented to, Schedule II to the Access to Information Act shall be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the reference to the Canada Pension Plan, a reference to the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act and a corresponding reference in respect of that Act to section 49.

7. If, during the first session of the thirty-second Parliament, an Act entitled the Energy Monitoring Act is assented to, Schedule II to the Access to Information Act shall be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the reference to the Defence Supplies Act, a reference to the Energy Monitoring Act and a corresponding reference in respect of that Act to section 33.

8. If, during the first session of the thirty-second Parliament, an Act entitled the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act is assented to, Schedule II to the Access to Information Act shall be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the reference to the Canada Labour Code, a reference to the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act and a corresponding reference in respect of that Act to subsection 27(1).

9. If, during the first session of the thirty-second Parliament, an Act entitled the Petroleum Incentives Program Act is assented to, Schedule II to the Access to Information Act shall be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the reference to the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act, a reference to the Petroleum Incentives Program Act and a corresponding reference in respect of that Act to section 17."

and by renumbering Clause 6 as Clause 10.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, the House will be asked to vote on an extremely important bill, perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation to appear on the Order Paper of the House during this session. It is important, Mr. Speaker, because it will make changes in our parliamentary institutions, changes which will have long-term consequences for our democracy.

Briefly, Bill C-43 meets three major objectives:

[English]

First, it creates for every Canadian and permanent resident a right of access to the information held by more than 130 federal government institutions. It spells out the necessary limits of that right as well as the conditions under which it can be exercised. It makes this right of access meaningful by providing independent and external review over government decisions to refuse access to information. In short, it sets forth the basic rules for obtaining access to government information, where none existed before.

Second, it significantly extends the protection that is now accorded to personal information under Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act. It establishes a comprehensive code of fair information practices governing the collection, the use, the disclosure and the retention of information concerning individuals. As well, it reinforces the right of Canadians to obtain information held by the government about themselves. It complements this right with a scheme of independent and external review.

Finally, it reforms the rules governing the privileges now vested in the Crown as regards evidence before the courts. Absolute privilege is retained only for cabinet confidences. All other matters which deserve to be protected on the grounds of a public interest are now reviewable by the courts and the courts will decide whether they ought to be produced or not.

As a result of this legislation, Canadians will be better informed of their government's decisions and actions. They will be better equipped to inquire into the reasons for a given course of government action. This bill—imperfect as some may find it—will make for better government in Canada.

The idea of enacting a statutory scheme of public access to government information has been with us for a long time. It is fair to say that it received its main impetus from members of this House of Commons. In the mid-sixties a member of the New Democratic Party, Barry Mather, sponsored a private member's bill on the subject. Later, Mr. Jed Baldwin of the Conservatives became a crusador for freedom of information, and although he is no longer a member of this House I know that he is still actively involved in promoting such legislation.

In 1977, at the initiative of the Hon. Ron Basford, then minister of Justice, Parliament adopted Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act, the present framework for the protection of personal information. At the same time, my colleague, the present Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), authored a green paper on legislating public access to government documents. That document became the focus for the deliberations of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The imprint of the committee's recommendations was to be found in both the Conservatives' Bill C-15 and in this government's Bill C-432. I am referring to the uniquely Canadian approach of having a two-tier review of government decisions on access requests. In 1979, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) sponsored the Conservative government's freedom of information bill. Then this government introduced in July, 1980, its own composite bill on access to information, privacy and public interest immunity.

[Translation]

In July 1980, not quite two years ago, I had the privilege of tabling Bill C-43 in the House. Since then, the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has spent many hours considering this legislation. A host of associations came to express their views on various aspects of the bill. These associations came from every sector of our society and included: ecologists, consumer associations, several media groups, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, historians, archivists, the Civil Liberties Union, a number of education groups and so forth. Although they were not all in agreement on every single clause, and although they wanted certain changes, they did agree that the legislation should be passed by Parliament as soon as possible. In response to their representations, the government has proposed a number of amendments to its bill.

[English]

I would like to note in passing that if the standing committee had been allowed to deal with the bill with the usual dispatch, the access to information bill would be in force today; it would be reality today. We would not be debating it; we would actually be seeing it enforced across the country. That delay can be due to only one party in opposition, and that is the New Democratic Party.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to express my appreciation of the work done by the committee members who examined this legislation. The committee met 35 times, it heard some 27 experts and interest groups and received 57 written submissions. I should like to mention by name the committee members who worked so hard to bring this bill to its final stage. First of all, the chairman, the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois), and I also wish to stress the role played by my parliamentary secretary, the member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) and the contribution made by the members for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), Lévis (Mr. Gourde), Montréal-Mercier (Mrs Hervieux-Payette), Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin), Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan), Jonquières (Mr. Marceau), Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr Robinson) and Bourassa (Mr. Rossi). I know the member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) was with us in spirit, since he sits on a number of House committees that are concerned with many other subjects.

I also wish to express my appreciation for the active participation of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), who brought a very positive attitude to the committee's proceedings. The first component of Bill C-43 constitutes what will be known as the Access to Information Act. As I said earlier, this legislation gives Canadians and permanent residents the right to have access to information held by more than 130 government institutions. This access will be regulated by flexible procedures that will facilitate the communication of government information. A written application is to be sent to the government institution concerned, specifying the document requested. To help citizens exercise their rights in this matter, the bill provides for annual publication of a compendium informing the public of the function and programs of every government institution. It will also include the various kinds of documents that may be found. The compendium will be updated twice a year and be available throughout Canada. In fact, its usefulness goes beyond the immediate purpose for which it is to be published.

• (1520)

[English]

I come now to the exemptions that may be invoked by the government to refuse access to information. The discussion in committee showed that there was unanimous agreement on the need for exemptions; a surprisingly wide consensus on the types of information requiring special protection was also seen. Differences that emerged had more to do with the approach chosen or the precise wording utilized. Our objective in devising the exemptions was to encompass only that information that had to be withheld from disclosure. I am referring to exemptions, not exclusions. Like its Conservative predecessor, Bill C-43 attempts to be precise and detailed. We did not think that adopting the U.S. approach of having very short but general exemptions was the best means of achieving the objectives of the legislation. The exemptions in Bill C-43 give a much better idea of what can be refused than the general and obscure wording used for the exemptions in the U.S. freedom of information act.

[Translation]

I would like to take a few minutes to talk about the independent review system proposed in this bill. Without independent review, the individual has no recourse against government institutions and his right of access will be a right in name only. Bill C-43 provides for a two-tiered independent review process. First, as I said earlier, the Information Commissioner is responsible for receiving and hearing, free of charge, complaints dealing with various aspects of the processing of requests. At the second level, a person who is refused access to a document, even after examination of his complaint by the commissioner, has the right to apply to the Federal Court for review of this refusal. The Information commissioner is not a member of government and is, above all, an agent of Parliament. The legislation gives him extensive powers for examining complaints, and he has access to all information covered by the bill. He may demand that officials explain their reasons for making a given decision. He may recommend that the institution change a decision that has already been made, and in that case, his recommendations are communicated to the complainant.

The commissioner may initiate an investigation without necessarily having received a complaint. He is empowered to go directly to the courts to obtain a review of a refusal to release information. Finally, he reports directly to Parliament and not through a minister. In fact, the commissioner's powers are very extensive and his main role will be to ensure that government departments and agencies abide by both the letter and the intent of the law. He will not act as a neutral ombudsman. I expect the Information Commissioner to take up the cause of persons seeking information and to defend their interests vis-à-vis ministers and officials. I feel that the Information Commissioner will be the linchpin of access to information.

[English]

It may be that the commissioner will not be able to bring a government department to share his view that a document should be released. In that case, the applicant can ask the Federal Court to have the department's denial reviewed. The court will also have extensive powers for the exerrcise of its functions. It will differ from the commissioner mainly in its ability to order the department concerned to release documents if it is determined that these should not be denied.

The court will be deciding on the validity of refusals according to two different sets of rules, depending on the exemption on which a refusal is based. Where a document is refused because its disclosure would prejudice the highest interests of the state—defence, national security, international relations—the court will determine whether the minister had reasonable grounds to come to that conclusion.

The reasonable grounds test review is very similar to the type of review undertaken by the courts under the U.S. freedom of information act when matters of national defence and national security are at stake. In Canada, this kind of review attempts to reconcile the concept of judicial review with the principle of ministerial responsibility.

In all other instances of refusal, the court will be undertaking what is called a de novo review. There was a suggestion made during the consideration of the bill by the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee that the de novo review does not exist under Clause 50 of the access to information portion of the bill. I sought the counsel of the Department of Justice on the matter. Their advice is to the effect that the Federal Court, in hearing an application brought with respect to a refusal to disclose a record based on exemptions on other than those involving the highest state interests conducts the de novo hearing in the traditional sense of the term.

The court is empowered to conduct a new hearing to determine whether or not a document for which an exemption is claimed is in fact an exempt document. If the court disagrees with the decision of the minister, it will substitute its opinion for that of the minister and order the document disclosed.

The American freedom of information act specifically requires that the court hearing a freedom of information case determine the matter by de novo review. The American case law has established that de novo review under the American freedom of information act amounts to the same type of review which exists under Clause 50 of Bill C-43. That is, the court reviews a document for which an exemption is claimed to determine whether or not it qualifies as exempt. The court will not, however, interfere with the discretion of the department or agency involved in deciding whether, once a document has been determined to be exempt, the exemption should be claimed or waived. The American Supreme Court has made it quite clear that it considers judicial interference with such a decision to be inappropriate. I quote the case of E.P.A. v. Mink U.S. 73, at page 80, a court case going back to 1973.

To my knowledge, there has never been any suggestion that the type of review which exists under the U.S. act does not amount to de novo review. Nor can it be legitimately claimed that review under Clause 50 of this bill does not constitute de novo review.

The two-tier review system, which includes the act of participation of a powerful information commissioner and of an independent court, will ensure that no information that should be made available will be denied. It guarantees that the objectives of the legislation will be met, not in some vague and general way but in the day to day operation of the access to information act.

In concluding this description of access to information, I would like to mention two important features that were added in committee. The first has do to with the purpose clause. It will be made clear on the face of the act itself that this legislation is not meant to replace procedures now in place for providing access to government information. Nor is it meant to cut the flow of information currently available to the Canadian public. This clarification was made in response to the fears expressed in certain quarters, especially in the historical research community, that henceforth no access would be provided otherwise than by using the formal mechanism of the legislation.

The second important improvement relates to the requirement that a comprehensive review be undertaken of the access to information act with a view to determining whether it needs amendments. This review is to be conducted by the parliamentary committee that will be designated or set up to oversee on a permanent basis implementation of the legislation. This will ensure that the act we now have before us is but a first text, one that will be improved upon in the light of the experience gained over the years.

The second part of Bill C-43 will enact new privacy legislation. Under this portion of the bill Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act, the existing legislation dealing with the protection of personal information held by the federal government, will be repealed and replaced by more comprehensive legislation protecting government-held personal information.

Before elaborating on the ways in which the rights recognized under Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act will be extended, I would like to take a few moments to discuss the relationship between access to information and privacy legislation. Combining access to information and privacy legislation in one bill has permitted the complete integration of these two complimentary types of legislation.

Parallel rights of access to information held by the government and parallel rights of review of decisions to refuse access have been created. At the same time, however, the principle that the right to privacy takes precedence over the general right of access has been clearly recognized. This is a principle with which I am sure all hon. members agree. Thus the term "personal information" has the same meaning in both the privacy and access to information legislation.

Also the disclosure of information under the access to information portion of the bill is determined by the principles regarding disclosure of personal information to third persons set out in the privacy portion. This approach will ensure complete consistency between the treatment of personal information under both statutes, thus avoiding the situation which has developed in some countries where competing rights to privacy and to access to government-held information have been created.

Returning to the ways in which the rights currently recognized under Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act will be extended by the new privacy legislation, I would point out first, that a comprehensive code of fair information practices will be enacted. This will forbid the collection by government institutions of personal information which is not directly relevant to the operating programs or activities of the institution. It will also require that government institutions collect and retain only accurate, complete and up to date personal information about individuals.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, a comprehensive code regulating the use and disclosure of all personal information by government institutions will be enacted. This code reflects the principle that the right to privacy involves the right to control the use and disclosure of information about oneself. This is a principle which is particularly important in today's age of rapidly developing computer technology.

One member of the opposition in particular criticized this code, suggesting that it is actually a mechanism to authorize unwarranted intrusion into the privacy of individuals, rather than a scheme designed to protect individual privacy. In doing so, I feel that the effect of the code has been misrepresented.

At present, there are two types of controls which exist with respect to the use of disclosure of personal information. The first are the controls of general application set out in Subsection 52(2) of Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act. These controls apply only to the personal information which an individual himself provides to the government and only where the information is to be disclosed for use in a decision-making process relating to the individual. These controls are much more limited in their application than those that are now included in Bill C-43. The second type of controls are those specific prohibitions against disclosure which exist under certain statutory schemes. One can mention Section 241 of the Income Tax Act as an example.

The code in Bill C-43 regarding use and disclosure necessarily recognized that there are some circumstances in which the right to privacy may have to yield to greater public or private interests. However, the situations in which this is the case are both limited and specific. Moreover, it is essential to understand that no right of access by a third party is created under the code. The disclosure of personal information in the circumstances set out is always left to the discretion of the head of the institution. In exercising this discretion, he or she will be expected to weigh the interest in disclosing the information against the resulting invasion of privacy.

The disclosure of personal information by government institutions will be closely monitored by the privacy commissioner. And in instances where disclosure of personal information is most sensitive, such as a disclosure to the police, special controls have been included in the legislation to ensure that the privacy commissioner will scrutinize all disclosures carefully. The privacy commissioner can, of course, report to the head of the institution involved, and to Parliament, where he or she finds that a government institution has not complied with the code.

The second significant way in which the new privacy legislation expands the rights created under Part IV is the creation of a right of judicial review of refusals to provide access to personal information. This right is, of course, parallel to that granted in the access to information legislation and recognizes that the courts, and not the government, should be the final arbiter of disputes over access. In addition, the privacy commissioner has been given the specific responsibility to oversee the use of exempt banks. Where the commissioner finds that personal informatioan has been improperly included in an exempt bank, he or she can refer the issue to the Federal Court. The court, if it agrees, can order the information removed from the bank.

Finally, the number of government institutions to which the legislation applies has been considerably expanded. This paves the way for the next stage in the development of privacy legislation, extension of the principles respecting the protection of personal information to the federally regulated private sector.

[Translation]

Finally, the third component of Bill C-43 consists of new rules that will govern the privileges now vested in the Crown as regards evidence before the courts and also what is known as public interest immunity. These new provisions will supersede Section 41 of the Federal Court Act, according to which the Crown enjoys absolute privilege when a minister certifies that the production of information before the courts would be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, federal-provincial relations, or that it would disclose a cabinet confidence. The new clauses of the Canada Evidence Act will restrict absolute privilege to confidences of the Privy Council. This decision is the result of long and careful consideration by the government. Judgments handed down recently by the highest courts of British Columbia and Alberta have stated that cabinet confidences could, in certain cases, be disclosed in court. Such judgments run counter to a long tradition of legal precedent in Canada. The point is therefore that the position of our common law is still not quite clear on the court's obligation to protect cabinet confidences.

In the circumstances, the government thought it wiser to maintain absolute privilege in this regard and to simply withdraw such documents from the scope of the legislation on access to information and privacy. However, the Crown's absolute privilege has been repealed with respect to all other records. When a minister objects to the disclosure of information in court, he will have to certify that his objection is made on the grounds of a specified public interest. A justice of a superior court may examine or hear the information and order its disclosure, if he considers that the public interest in disclosure outweighs in importance the public interest grounds raised in the minister's objection. This new approach is therefore far more liberal than Section 41 of the Federal Court Act, and I am certain that it serves the interests of justice and the parties concerned.

[English]

Quite apart from the factual contents of the bill, I think it is important for the House to be aware of its broader significance. In a sense, this legislation sets out bottom line rules. It will be more in the nature of an appeal mechanism available to Canadians for the event where their informal requests for information are turned down. It is more than likely that people will continue asking for government information as they always have: outside the scope of this act. This is how it should be. Indeed, I do not anticipate, for instance, that the press will be using the legislation on a regular basis.

The mere fact, however, that the legislation is on the books will lead government officials to be as forthcoming and as responsive as they would be if the requests had been filed under the act. This brings me to my second point. The Access to Information Act will bring about a very major change of thinking within government. Departments and agencies will be far more sensitive to inform the public of what they are doing. At any rate, the bill contains such a wide array of checks against abuse that government will have no choice but to apply the legislation in a reasonable and open fashion. These checks will be embodied in the powers of the information commissioner, in the process of judicial review, in the regular reporting to Parliament by each government institution and the information commissioner and, lastly, in the permanent review of the act's operation that will be carried out by a parliamentary committee.

Finally, this legislation is not cast in stone. It is but a beginning—an important beginning. As I mentioned earlier, a parliamentary committee will undertake a comprehensive review within three years to find out how the legislation can be improved. The committee will be able to question experts and interested parties in order to evaluate how the legislation affects government operations, and to obtain the views of the information and privacy commissioners. It is with the benefit of practical experience that it will be recommending whatever changes are necessary. Canadians will draw maximum benefit from legislation which guarantees its own revision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his kind references. I do so at the beginning of the debate. I want to say to him now that if there are any references which might be deemed to be unkind, I do not want him to accept them as personal references. I believe that when the minister made his statement way back in the spring of 1981, when the announcement of the government's bill was made at the Press building, the minister was speaking not just for the government but for himself, when he put forward and brought to the Order Paper for first reading the freedom of information bill—which was much better than the one we are dealing with today. I have to say that and I want to say it.

That does not in any way forgive the government for the position it has taken on some particular things. Nor do I want to say that I agree completely that Bill C-43 was the last word on freedom of information when it was presented. It was not, but I think it was a good beginning. At that time I thought it was a particularly good beginning for a Liberal government. In fact, it was surprisingly good for a Liberal government. I went home and said to my wife that I could hardly believe my eyes when I read the bill that evening. When I heard Mr. Ged Baldwin give it a B plus, I was prepared to agree with him, until we got into it. Then the mark fell somewhat, but still it was at least a B, in my judgment. However, unfortunately, certain things occurred during the course of the committee hearings which caused me great concern. I think it also caused Canadians great concern.

As the minister has said, this bill is very important, and it is the end of the beginning. That is what we are dealing with in this matter.

At the outset of my speech I want to pay tribute, if I might, to the people who came before our committee and contributed so greatly to the enhancement of the bill in many ways. I must, of course, pay tribute to a group known as Access, which has been a prime motivator behind the rush for freedom of information, joining with Mr. Ged Baldwin in the course of the matter. I think their leadership in the private area brought other people into it, people who had been interested in it for many years but required a focal point. Access provided that.

We heard from the Social Science Federation of Canada, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Library Association, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Centre for Investigative Journalism, La Fédération professionnelle des journalistes du Québec, the Writers Union of Canada and many, many others who were interested on all sides of the issue of freedom of information.

Each one of them should take some pride, and the members of those organizations should take some considerable pride in the fact that, squeezed as we are between last weekend and the momentous events of this evening at eight o'clock, we have been granted, more or less on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, an opportunity to deal with report stage and third reading of a bill which turns a page in the legislative history of the country. For that small mercy, that half day which runs from 3.15 to 5.45, I want to express the grateful thanks of all Canadians who are interested in openness and freedom of information.

There is another tribute I wish to pay. I do not believe we would be dealing today with Bill C-43 or any bill on freedom of information if there had not been some leadership taken in another part of this House. I hope the House will understand and agree with me that when he was the Prime Minister of this country, the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), advanced the cause of freedom of information to a tremendous degree. As Prime Minister and as the head of a government, he took an initiative with respect to freedom of information and the process of openness. I was the minister piloting the bill at that time, and I can attest now—and my colleagues in the then ministry can attest now—to the primacy he gave to the proposition of openness in government and freedom of information.

It is no accident that the bill advanced in the fall of 1979 was called a bill respecting freedom of information rather than a bill respecting access to information. There is just a slight difference in emphasis. I wanted to say that because quite often the contributions public men and women make when in office are forgotten after they leave office. It was the Prime Minister of that day in 1979 who put his personal imprimatur on that piece of legislation and gave leadership within the government with respect to that bill.

What was the result of that? The result was a good one. In the throne speech which began the first session of the Thirty-second Parliament the government under the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made reference to the bringing in of a freedom of information bill. I do not think that would even have appeared in the throne speech but for the fact that there had been a momentum generated in 1979. As a result of that this government brought forward the bill. I remember when the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), who was then also Secretary of State, introduced that bill at a press conference. I had the privilege of being there and speaking about the bill, after the press conference and from the back row of the theatre. I remember the minister patting himself on the back—justifiably, I think, given the traditions of his party—to the extent that he nearly broke his arm! Nonetheless, it was there, and we would not have had that day but for the fact that the government realized that there is in the Canadian public a feeling of suspicion, distrust and cynicism about government. There is a feeling that it is a closed shop and that the people who pay the bills do not have access to it. There is a feeling they do not have a way into it, and freedom of information would provide that way. I think there was a realization by the government. It obviously had done some polling, so we had the bill.

However, what happened in the course of the bill is epitomized in the amendments brought forward at the last moment.

Clause 68 deals with confidences of the Queen's Privy Council, whatever that means. That removed from the bill the idea of cabinet documents being judicially reviewed to see whether there is some reason—some good and valid reason from time to time—that they should not be brought forward. If we take the skin off and get down into the meat, I believe what happened was that suddenly the government was cornered. Having said that this new-found freedom of information devotion was the next best thing to sliced bread, the government moved along and developed a constituency and a momentum for freedom of information. It was finally caught between the hammer and the anvil it had devised. As a political answer it suddenly became a very real legislative possibility.

What did the government do? It said it must take Clause 21 out of the bill. Clause 21 was to provide for the protection of cabinet documents, but subject always to a legitimate review by the courts. The government said: "No, we cannot have that; all these confidences of the Queen's Privy Council must be kept secret and not even subject to the scrutiny of the courts". The government became so paranoid about this that it brought in that clause.

Among other things, the government has left open the opportunity for one of the first initiatives of the next Progressive Conservative government. The Leader of the Opposition has said that it will be one of the first priorities of a Progressive Conservative government after the next election—and I ask the House to note my words—to reopen the whole question of access to information and to go back, hopefully, to the provisions of Bill C-15 so that we can do a number of things. We want to remove Clause 68 and reinstate Clause 21, with appropriate amendments, to reflect the relevant section in Bill C-15. We want to look at each one of the exemptions to see where they can be narrowed to bring them back at least to the position of Bill C-15. We should bear in mind that under Bill C-43 perhaps there will be a short period to gain experience that we can draw on. That is a priority. The Leader of the Opposition said that during the course of the annual meeting in my riding and I was delighted that he did. In other places across the country he has said, as I have, that it will be a priority of this government when it returns to office. If the Minister of Communications is still with us then, he will have an opportunity to use the improved legislation. In some ways the legislation was better. It was different in the broadness of the exemptions.

Having said that Bill C-43 at report stage is not as good as it was when it went to committee, I must say that I think the bill, with all its deficiencies, ought to be supported by the House. We ought to begin a process of openness in the legislative sense. We have talked about it long enough. The bill is a beginning—though not the most perfect beginning. I could say of it as some wives say of their husbands—they are not the most perfect of husbands but they manage to live with them. I think we should say that about the bill.

We must bear two things in mind, however, Mr. Speaker. The first is the commitment I have made on behalf of my party, reiterating the commitment made by the leader of this party with respect to change after a change of government; and, second, the important thing that was mentioned by the minister is the opportunity for parliamentary review. It is a unique thing for any legislation that by statute there will be a provision for review of the freedom of information and matters that relate to it.

The committee accepted an amendment which provides that the annual reports of committees will automatically be referred to a parliamentary committee and that is a good thing. That will allow Parliament to keep the process open.

I regret that I have to join in the statement made by the minister about the effect the delay in bringing the bills forward is going to have. The first meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs was held on March 3, 1981. Thirty-four meetings were held between that time and the time when the government bill was put on ice as a result of the government getting cold feet after consulting with other governments which also got cold feet. It was a complicated bill but there was nothing in it that could account for the delay except, perhaps, a wavering commitment with respect to freedom of information from time to time or a commitment that was not certain. We have taken the position that because of the provision for parliamentary review, the process in committee did not seem to be urgent as there would be the opportunity to deal with it later.

For some reason or other, however, the New Democratic Party decided to debate every point, cross every t and dot every i, to make things perfect. That took time. By itself it is not sinful, although it is regrettable. The by-product of delay was sinful, however. By that delay they allowed the Roy Romanows and the Roy McMurtrys of this world and other levels of government to conspire together to devise a scheme whereby the principle of freedom of information could be "unsold" to this government, which was only politically, and not intellectually, committed to freedom of information and openness in government. That is exactly what happened. They had time to muster their forces and they did. In that period of time, believe it or not, they attempted to say that it was appropriate that we deal with freedom of information in a universal bill and that all 11 governments in Canada would agree on freedom of information. I could not believe what I heard, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister used to say that they fought over the Constitution for 54 years for an amending process which came to nothing. As a matter of fact, the debate on the Constitution went on for 115 and more years and there was never any agreement. How could anyone possibly believe that the two levels of government could get together and agree on a universal bill? That idea fell apart.

I hope that when we review the bill again there will not be this delay. We cannot legislate perfection, especially when there is a danger of losing something that the people mentioned by the minister who have gone before us tried to bring about. We ought not to lose through delay. I do not say that to the New Democratic Party unkindly, but I think the record should be clear that that was the result of what happened. To this day I cannot understand why it occurred, given the fact that the NDP knew, as I did, that there would be a parliamentary review of the matter some time later. That should be remembered, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, this bill means the beginning of a new era. It will challenge various parts of the Government of Canada, and first of all I should like to deal with the cabinet.

Heretofore, Conservative and Liberal cabinets have grown out of the British parliamentary system. There is no more secretive place than the Parliament at Westminster and its traditions, which we have adopted as our own. It is still that way. I gather that there will be impetus for change in the law in the United Kingdom as a result of what happens here. People from the United Kingdom have written to me and talked to me about the process of this bill and a consensus seems to be developing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friends for allowing me time to finish my remarks.

There is a history of secretiveness and closeness in the British parliamentary system and we have adopted it. Ministers will have to realize that for the first time in a broad area of information which comes under their control, the public will be entitled to know the facts. I hope an attitude will develop like that which exists in Sweden which has had freedom of information for 200 years. Unless the answer to a request would harm the state, the information is available. It is important that that occur at the political level.

• (1600)

I suspect it is going to take some time, but it is important that it begin because the most important change is going to be in the day-to-day work of the Public Service of Canada. They have been operating under some doubt as to where or how far they can go, and I hope the working groups in each of the departments, and the government itself, are considering the kind of message which will go to the public service. Just as it will take ministers time to get used to it, so will it take the public service a great deal of time to get used to it.

I suspect that we are likely to see some rather startling cases arising out of refusals to give information. It is because of this fear and worry that there must be in the minds of public servants looking ahead to legislation that there is a part which will protect them in the event they give out information inadvertently in good faith. There must be an educational process because the penalties are going to be quite severe. There will be the possibility of being part of a court action. There is certainly going to be the possibility of being part of an examination by a special commissioner who is now an ombudsman. There will be the possibility of an annual report to Parliament by the commissioner.

As I said earlier, a legislative page will be turned when this bill finally receives royal assent and is proclaimed. I understand from the minister that will take place in approximately six months. We talked about this for years and it had to begin somewhere.

I would like today to have been in the position of the minister to be finishing a bill on third reading. I wish the bill was C-15 and this could be transported back a year and a half. I congratulate him on being the minister bringing it in. I know he feels badly that his colleagues were afraid to do the decent thing and allow him to have Section 21 and the matters that followed stay in the bill. I know it must be a matter of personal regret for a lawyer, as the minister is, to say that we trust the courts with our Constitution, with arbitrations, we trust them to deal with public matters of all kinds, yet we will not trust them to use their heads as to what should be released and what cannot be released. Under this bill we trust them with vital matters of defence and national security, and documents relating to external affairs, but we do not trust them with our cabinet documents. I am sure it must be a matter of regret for the minister to say that everyone is subject to judicial review except that group of 30 ministers. Even though the minister cannot say it—he looked embarrassed in committee when he had to give the reasons, and I sympathize with him because I would be embarrassed too—I am sure that in his heart of hearts one of the first priorities will be to open that legislation and get back to the position he himself put in Section 21 of the original Bill C-43, and he will silently say: "Hear, hear, good for this new Conservative government which is going to do this and I wish I could have joined them in 1982".

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a new beginning, but just a beginning. All of us are going to have to adjust to it. I believe this bill is absolutely vital with respect to parliamentary reform. The fact that it comes so close to the day that the committee dealing with parliamentary reform was established heightens and accentuates the relationship of parliamentary reform to openness.

We in this House are going to have to find ways to handle the tremendous deluge of information which is going to come to us. There will have to be adjustments in government, the public service and in Parliament. So, Mr. Speaker, I want you and members of the House to know that, as much as we regret the form of the bill—and we have proposed some amendments at report stage to clean it up a little bit, which I hope will be acceptable to the government—in the end we want to see the bill go on as a beginning and we pledge to improve it at the first opportunity.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what certainly must be considered an historical occasion, the third reading of Bill C-43, the long-overdue legislation respecting access to information and protection of privacy. The two previous speakers have given us something of the history of the legislation. As we know, the original impetus for this bill came from the U.S. freedom of information legislation passed in 1964. Following that a former member of the New Democratic Party, Barry Mather, the member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta, tabled a private member's bill which was followed in a very outstanding way by the work of Ged Baldwin who for many, many years with Mr. Mather prodded the government into finally bringing forward legislation respecting access to information. As well, the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments examined this question. Indeed, many organizations and individuals have urged the government to enact this legislation which is so important in a democratic society.

Other speakers have referred to a number of the organizations involved, and I want to single out just three of many. First, of course, Access, which has been the primary lobby group in this area, has done an outstanding job in ensuring that finally we do see legislation on the books in this important area. I want to single out particularly the work of Roland Gaudet of Access, who has singlehandedly been involved in extensive lobbying in this area for many years.

Also the Canadian Bar Association, and in particular Murray Rankin, the author of the definitive report on freedom of information in Canada, must in my view take a good deal of the credit for the legislation which was initially tabled in this House.

Finally, from the Civil Liberties Association, Mr. Ken Rubin, who in particular has focused on the privacy sections of the bill.

We know as well that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), as minister in the previous government, brought forward a bill which certainly in many instances paralleled Bill C-43 and must be recognized, I believe, to have provided an impetus to the Liberal government to move forward in this area.

Finally, I should note that at the time of the constitutional discussions I supported, as did members of the official opposition, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada which would have recognized the fundamental right in a democratic society of access to information as the basis of calling our governments to account.

We know, Mr. Speaker, there is still a great deal of work to be done in this area. The Official Secrets Act is still on the books and it must be significantly overhauled. This must be a priority in coming months. I would hope also that this government would look very seriously at the question of sunshine laws which would open up meetings at which fundamental and important decisions are being made.

Once again we have seen a situation where the U.S. is far ahead of us in bringing in legislation in a number of respects to open up all meetings at which important decisions are being made. Rather than just obtaining information after the fact, it is essential that these meetings should indeed be open to the public.

I note in passing that I believe at this time there is a discussion as to whether or not Members of Parliament can take part in the examination of budget documents. How ironic it is, as we discuss freedom of information and access to information today, that there is still a serious question as to whether or not Members of Parliament can have an opportunity to review this important material ahead of time.

The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs spent many, many hours on this legislation. Of course, sometimes it appeared that the bill was dead, but in the end, despite the fact that in my view there had been some very destructive and regressive amendments to the bill, we have it before us today at third reading.

The original bill which was presented to Parliament some two years ago now has been very significantly watered down as a result of the amendments which were brought forward by the government. I intend to touch upon them in a few moments. Also, it is important to recognize that we heard from many witnesses. We received scores of written briefs and, almost without exception, witnesses pointed out that the original legislation presented to the committee, Bill C-43, was a weak bill in many respects. While they supported the broad thrust of openness and accountability, they noted many flaws. In my view, the committee did the right thing in taking its responsibilities seriously and in seeking to improve this legislation. We examined the bill clause by clause in committee.

There has been some reference made both by the minister and by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton to delays and the responsibility for these delays has been placed at the feet of the New Democratic Party. I think the record should be set straight in this area because I do not believe the public should be unintentionally misled as to what actually took place in committee. In fact, members of the committee would be well aware that in late June I made a proposal to the committee, when there was still a good deal of time left to finish the bill before the summer, that we conclude our consideration of the bill in ten hours of debate, in a further ten hours of debate.

What was the response of the Conservative Party and of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton? He said, "No, no, we may need more time. I am not prepared to see any kind of limitation on the debate at this point". At that point as well—and the minister has conceded this—Liberal members of the committee lost interest in the bill and were not able to show up to form a quorum. Meeting after meeting of the justice committee was cancelled because Liberal members of the committee—and I regret to say Conservative members as well, with one or two exceptions—did not even bother showing up for committee meetings in late June and July. I believe the record should be set very clear here. In fact, I proposed on behalf of the New Democratic Party a limitation at that point which was rejected by members of the official opposition.

The second point in this area is that if one looks at the record of amendments to the legislation originally presented to the committee, it must be noted that two very significant amendments which I proposed on behalf of the New Democratic Party were accepted at that late stage in June. I should like to make brief reference to them and to point out that these amendments in these two critical areas were sought by many witnesses. In fact, the amendment in the area of the length of transition period was deemed to be absolutely essential, indeed critical, to passage of the bill by Access, among other witnesses. Those two amendments were in the area of the results of product and environmental safety testing. The original bill was very weak in this area. I proposed an amendment which was accepted by the committee that would make public the results of all product and environmental tests in Canada. This, perhaps more than any other section of the bill, has a very significant impact upon the general public. I was very pleased that the government and the committee moved to accept this amendment which was proposed.

As well, the transition period, the period within which the bill was to come into effect, was very significantly shortened as a result of an amendment upon which I insisted at committee. The bill as originally worded would have meant information would not have been disclosed in some instances, in fact in many instances, until January 1, 1988; that is assuming the bill was proclaimed within six months as the minister indicated. The amendment which I proposed on behalf of the New Democratic Party means that in most instances information will be available as of January 1, 1985; in other words, three years earlier than the bill would have originally made information available. I proposed both of these critical amendments on behalf of the NDP and they were accepted by the committee.

There were other improvements made to the bill in the course of its clause by clause consideration—the power to extend access beyond Canadian citizens and landed immigrants, for example to foreign journalists on a reciprocal basis, and the fact that fees which were originally proposed to be charged for search and review were eliminated. I proposed an amendment to the committee which was accepted that would restrict the absence of disclosure in respect of police investigations to those investigations which were lawful. I proposed another amendment which was accepted by the committee that would basically implement a public interest disclosure test in the key areas of public health, safety and protection of the environment. The three-year review provision was added during the course of committee deliberations. Of course, this provision was sought by all members of the committee and pursued, particularly vigorously, by members of the official opposition and by members of the New Democratic Party. The amendment with respect to the referral of annual reports to the committee was one which I was pleased to be able to propose and was accepted by the committee.

Indeed, the bill was improved in a number of respects, but I think it should be noted—and this is the final point I will make—that with respect to the actual progress of the bill through committee, the record should be examined carefully by those who are interested in legislation respecting freedom of information and respecting the protection of privacy.

I have been gently criticized by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the minister for perhaps taking some time im the committee, but I would point out that many of the amendments in key areas which I proposed on behalf of the New Democratic Party where in fact accepted by the committee. I challenge those members of the Conservative Party and of the government to come forward to the public and indicate a single amendment to which the official opposition is able to point as having been achieved as a result of their work on the committee. I say gently that not one amendment of substance was proposed by the official opposition and accepted by the committee. When we look at the work which was done by the committee to improve the bill, I think the record speaks for itself.

As this point I want to turn to some of the weaknesses of the bill as I see it and as reported by the committee. I suggest that this bill, both in the access part of it and in the privacy section, has been so watered down and is so weak and ineffective that it must be opposed on third reading. I do not believe that government should be allowed to travel from coast to coast and give Canadians the illusion that it has an effective freedom of information bill. I do not believe that the government should be allowed to travel from coast to coast and suggest that it has strengthened the protection of the privacy of Canadians when in fact it has done precisely the opposite.

We know that the United States legislation on freedom of information, particularly as amended and strengthened in the post-Watergate period of 1974, is far stronger than the Canadian legislation in a number of respects. Canadians still have to travel to the United States to obtain a lot of information about Canada—for example, the salaries of top businessmen and other information. We are still in the ludicrous position of Canadians having to travel to the United States to obtain information which the RCMP has given to the CIA. As we have seen in recent weeks, they have a very co-operative working relationship. We in Canada will still have to travel south of the border to obtain that kind of information.

My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), has given me a number of examples of the areas in this bill in which the doors are still slammed shut and that are still far weaker than the legislation in the United States. Unfortunately, I do not have the time to document them. Indeed, as my colleague for Winnipeg North has said, passage of this bill may prove to be another of those hoaxes for which the Liberal Party is so famous.

• (1620)

The access part of the bill contains many flaws. I would like to focus upon three of those flaws. There are three critical areas of this bill which, in my view, are fundamentally defective. They are the sweeping exemptions provisions, the provisions, for judicial review which, in many instances, are a sham and, of course, the last minute amendment which effectively constitutes the Mack Truck clause of this bill. It is the amendment which allows the government to proclaim that any document is a confidence of the Queen's Privy Council and precludes any information in the form of judicial review. I predict that those who expect the floodgates to open to allow a mass of previously confidential information to be made public will be sorely disappointed because that is not the case.

I would like to give an example of that. In September of 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave instructions to all ministers to respond as if the Freedom of Information Act was in effect. They were to respond as if that act was in effect and to answer requests for information from journalists, Members of Parliament or other individuals. It has been two years now. Journalists would be able to attest to the fact that things have not changed very much. How much new information have we had access to in the last two years, supposedly when the government has been operating as if this bill were in effect? It has been a trickle and perhaps nothing at all.

We had one hope that perhaps the offensive Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act might not be invoked, but we have seen that even that section has been invoked on a number of occasions by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan).

I suggest that the exemptions in this bill are so broadly worded that they basically amount to a licence to conceal information whether under federal-provincial affairs, exemptions on subversive and hostile activities which was heavily criticized by the McDonald Commission, the exemption respecting law enforcement investigation which effectively denies any access to information about the activities of the RCMP security service or the new civilian security service, and even fundamental information such as the size of that service and its mandate. As well, there is the clause respecting economic interests and the sweeping provisions on third party information.

There are those provisions in the bill relating to government operations which means that we will, in effect, know nothing more than the government already wants us to know, except perhaps for some information of historical significance.

The judicial review provisions basically amount to a second class form of judicial review and not at all the de novo review on the merits that the minister promised on second reading. The amendments to this legislation which watered down Clauses 50 and 51 that relate to judicial review by changing the word "entitlement" to "authorized" weaken those sections of the bill considerably.

Surely the most offensive amendment of all is the one that was inserted during the dying hours of committee deliberations. That is the amendment respecting Crown privilege. We now have a situation where the government or a minister simply has to stamp a document as being the confidence of the Queen's Privy Council and that is the end of the matter. There is no opportunity for judicial review and no opportunity for the courts to determine that, in fact, there has not been an abuse of this provision. This gaping hole in the bill effectively means that the government is asking us to trust that it will not abuse its right to conceal information.

In my view, the record of this government certainly leaves a great deal to be desired when it asks us to trust it. In my opinion, this amendment has dealt a body blow—a fatal blow—to a bill which was already weak in many areas. The government has bowed to the advocates of secrecy, among them the Prime Minister and the Clerk of the Privy Council, Michael Pitfield, and the doors remain tightly shut.

I noted with interest that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton indicated that his party would be supporting this bill on third reading. I find that rather incongruous in view of the fact he is quoted as saying in the committee that this particular clause gutted judicial review, as indeed it did. He went on to say that judicial review is, in fact, the cornerstone of this bill. If the cornerstone of this bill has been removed, how can any party in the House that genuinely believes in freedom of information support the bill after such a weakening?

In the remaining minutes I have I would like to turn to the privacy act portion and the provisions of this legislation which allegedly protects the privacy of Canadians. In my view, this part of the bill is nothing less than a giant con job on Canadians. Far from protecting the privacy of Canadians, far from protecting intrusion into the private lives of Canadians, this part of the bill amounts to nothing less than an attack on their privacy. If anything, I suggest it should be called an attack on privacy act, instead of protection of privacy act.

This portion of the bill should have been separated, as was urged by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and other witnesses. Instead, we were asked to swallow the entire package. While I do not intend to go into the weaknesses of this privacy act in depth, I would note that there is no doubt whatsoever that this bill gives sweeping new powers to the heads of government institutions and to the RCMP and the new civilian security service in particular to intrude into the most confidential and personal aspects of the lives of Canadians.

The existing provisions that protect the privacy of Canadians which are contained in Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act are being repealed. In their place we have a so-called privacy act which has been severely condemned by the McDonald Commission, which was prepared to concede a great deal in terms of powers to the government, under normal circumstances. The commission said this about Bill C-43:

> The legislation does not provide a clear enough test of necessity for access to personal information for security intelligence purposes. It leaves the prior approval of all access, including access to details of a person's life far beyond what is needed for the purposes of identification, to Ministers, and it provides no role in approving requests for information to the Minister responsible for the security intelligence agency.

The McDonald Commission points out that at the present time the RCMP security service and the criminal investigation side of the force have been denied access to virtually all personal information possessed by other federal government institutions. Of course, I emphasize "denied legal access". We all know the record of abuse of power that has taken place and which was documented by the McDonald Commission. The present commissioner of the RCMP has said that he believes that the RCMP need the right to break the law.

I realize that my time is running out, but perhaps I might seek the indulgence of the House for another few minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That could be granted with unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. The present commissioner of the RCMP said that he could not understand why policemen should not have access to all information gathered by the government. He said that this was because both the government and the police have the best interests of the citizens at heart. Mr. Simmonds said he could not understand why it was wrong for policemen to get information from government computer banks. He said, "It makes absolutely no sense to me, especially when all these data banks are put together at taxpayers' expense". Well, the commissioner of the RCMP will be happy today with the passage of this so-called privacy act. He will have his way because this bill does nothing less than provide carte blanche access for members of the RCMP security service and the civilian security service, and all, of course, in the best interests of the nation.

As I have said, to suggest that since the bill was called a privacy bill it is protecting their privacy constitutes nothing less than a gigantic con and a hoax on the people of Canada.

There are other weaknesses in this legislation. For example, the provision which denies access to the salaries of many of the most senior appointees of the Government of Canada. If we want to know the salary of Mitchell Sharp, the northern pipeline commissioner, do you think, Mr. Speaker, we will have access to that information under the privacy legislation? Of course not. I proposed an amendment which would have made it public but it was defeated.

• (1630)

As well, we see that there is a sweeping provision which grants access for any purpose whatsoever when, in the opinion of the head of the government institution, disclosure in the public interest clearly outweighs any invasion of privacy which could result from the disclosure. That is a purely subjective test. In other words, whenever disclosure in the public interest, whatever that may be, in the opinion of the head of the government institution outweighs the invasion of privacy, that is the end of the matter. Confidential information, whether medical records, taxation records or personal financial records, will all be made available to members of the public or, indeed, to members of the security service.

There are a number of other weaknesses in the privacy section. For example, the increasingly important question of trans-border data flow has not been addressed. Once personal, very confidential, private information crosses the Canadian border, as it does frequently, and goes into data banks in the United States, there is absolutely no control over the use of that information.

As well, the issue of the abuse of social insurance numbers has been totally ignored by this bill. I am pleased to say that we will certainly be supporting amendments to this bill which would include reference to the social insurance number abuse.

In closing, I say again that this government should not be allowed to perpetrate this kind of hoax on Canadians at a time when, perhaps more than ever, Canadians should be granted access to information and should be given a genuine freedom of information bill. At a time when there should be strong and effective protection of the private lives of Canadians, a bill has been presented to Parliament which is an illusion. This government will no doubt be travelling coast to coast, waving copies of the legislation, proclaming that nirvana has arrived and that Canadians now have a strong and effective freedom of information bill, and that their privacy is being enhanced. We in this party do not intend to take part in that fraud. We do not intend to support a bill which does not enact genuine freedom of information legislation and genuine protection of privacy. I say in closing that that will only be the case when we form a government after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Only then will we have genuine freedom of information legislation and legislation which will really protect the privacy of Canadians on the books. Not until that day will we see that legislation because we know, and it is very clear, that Bill C-43 was patterned after Bill C-15 and that many of the weaknesses in Bill C-15 were contained in Bill C-43. So naturally, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has a certain proprietary interest in Bill C-43. We know as well that the privacy act was largely modelled after the bill of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), an hon. member for whom I have a great deal of respect but who was unfortunately taken in by the siren song of the RCMP security service. We certainly do not intend to emulate that bill.

I say again that, on a day which should have been a proud day for Canadians, we must only express our sadness and disappointment that the kind of effective legislation which should have been brought before Parliament is indeed not being voted on today.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I think one can see, from the words of the hon. member, why we almost did not have an access to information bill at all. His is typical of the approach which was taken throughout the committee hearings—that if we do not get it our way we will delay and delay; we will cross t's and dot i's and then, at the last minute, have the gall to come before the committee and say, "If you adopt our procedure, if you will do it all in ten hours, if you will deal with all our amendments, then we are prepared to let this bill go ahead."

I frankly do not blame the opposition for saying, at that particular stage, "We are sorry, but we will not play that particular game. We will debate this bill as it should have been debated, but we will not participate in the game-playing which is going on here". Hour after hour of the time of the committee was taken up with much discussion and many questions which really did not go to the meat of the bill but, rather, were calculated, I gather, to tire out members of the committee so that they would get to the stage where they were sick of saying, "Well, we will not sit here for another two and a half hours tonight; our constituents expect us to be doing a little more than that".

I say thank God for the political, moral and intellectual commitment of the minister to this particular bill, or it would not be seeing the light of day today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I was frankly surprised that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) made the suggestion that the minister was not intellectually committed to this particular bill.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I said that he was.

Mr. Cullen: I think, in fact, that the party, and particularly this minister, were intellectually committed to it. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, having been a minister, will know of the difficulty facing a minister dealing with a piece of legislation which is controversial, when he is endeavouring to get time in the House of Commons so that his particular bill can be debated, a bill as important as this one, only to find that hour after hour is spent at the committee stage. When the amendments of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) were not allowed, we then heard the threat: "We will bring them all back in at the report stage and go through them again".

What kind of commitment could the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) bring to his House leader at that time? We have held a long, thorough debate. God knows, we have been here for a year or a year and a half. We have had lots of time. But the minister had no guarantee that the hon. member for Burnaby would not raise all the amendments that were considered by the committee and not accepted.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton had the role of a House leader, but what House leader in his right mind would say to the minister: "Go ahead, we will take our chances; we will use up all our time in the House on your bill while we listen to the hon. member for Burnaby come out with his pet theories as to how this particular bill should be passed"?

I say thank God not only for the minister but also for the media, because if there was a role played by the media on this issue, it was a positive one, and that was to highlight the fact that the bill might be dropped and that there might be difficulties in getting parliamentary time for the bill. They attacked the attorneys general for the provinces when they came up with what I believe has been called an omnibus bill by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, but who are suggesting almost an impossibility if we are ever to get an access to information bill through the House. The media highlighted the difficulties, the stupidity and the manner by which this could never be made to work.

There is another hurdle for the minister to overcome, because now we hear the opposition parties saying: "Forget the provinces; act unilaterally". It is all right when they are in favour of the piece of legislation, but it was not so hot when we were dealing with the Constitution. But they wanted us to go ahead unilaterally. So the minister, to his credit, when back to the fight and said; "This bill is important; we are committed to it".

Many meetings were held with the Liberal caucus where we discussed some of the amendments. We quite candidly said that we would allow a few of the amendments, for which the hon. member for Burnaby is prepared to take credit, and maybe we could get on with the bill. They could just as easily have been moved by the minister or by someone picked from this caucus as they had already been thoroughly discussed and debated by the caucus. But rather than do that, we said let us give the hon. member some credit, let us give him some kudos, if that is what he wants; but for heaven's sake, let us get this bill passed.

I recently had the privilege of speaking with Ged Baldwin, whose name has been mentioned here, and he indicated that this bill is not perfect. Nobody suggests that it is perfect. The minister himself has said that it is not cast in stone. There are some changes which can be made, and there will be a review; but we need this bill and we are not just taking a timid, tender step at this particular stage. We have, in effect, two bills in one. We have the access to information section and we have the privacy section initiated, I believe, by the hon. member, who will probably be speaking next on that particular subject. So I say full marks to the minister and full marks to the government for bringing this particular bill forward.

I was a little surprised to hear the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton say, "we will form the government after the next election". First and foremost, he is making a big mistake. Once again, the Conservatives are underestimating the strength and resilience of the Liberal Party. So I do not think he should prejudge. I was also surprised that the hon. member for Burnaby had the gall to suggest that his party would form the government. They will be lucky if they have a rosy blue rump down here in the Tories if they ever get to be in power, because that is not the party which will win the election.

I heard the hon. member say: "My leader when in my riding said that when we come back we will have this judicial review". Well, that is a nice promise to make during the election, but let us judge it by the facts. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the former Prime Minister, said the same sort of thing: "We will move the embassy, we will dismantle Petro-Canada, we will fire 20,000 civil servants".

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Sixty thousand.

Mr. Cullen: Sixty thousand, or 20,000 a year I am sorry. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton would like to think it is only 20,000, but I thank him for correcting me. It was 60,000 civil servants.

Then there was mortgage insurance protection. Mr. Leonard Shifrin has gone over the figures as to what that would have cost. It is now up to $6 billion on an annual cost basis.

• (1640)

These are all promises made during the election campaign. I suggest with respect that if the Conservatives were elected, and I do not think they will be because I think they are underestimating the opposition they would be facing, none of those four promises would be kept. Why should we think that this one about a judicial review will be kept so that it will be there to the advantage, as has been said, of the Minister of Communications?

I have dealt at some length, maybe too much length, with the time available aspect. However, it is rather ironic that if it had not been delayed in the committee, this bill might very well have seen the light of day in July. There might have been a judicial review today, the sort of thing that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was talking about.

Because it had to go back, because compromises had to be made, because other ministers had to be convinced, because attorneys general have brought forward their opposition, because police forces in some instances have brought in objections, we have what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton called a watered down bill. I say thank God for this bill and thank God for the fact that it can be reviewed in three years. We will be able to make changes at that time when we once again form the government.

If this is a hoax on the Canadian people, it is not something that at long last the NDP can say we are using our majority to force on the Canadian public. This bill is going to be supported by the vast majority of the members of the House of Commons, people very knowledgeable in this field. Some people initiated part of this legislation when they were the governing party. Therefore, there is no hoax here. It is all out there for the people to read, to use and take advantage of to see how well it works. Where there are flaws, the flaws can be picked up and corrected.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is a good beginning.

Mr. Cullen: It is not a good beginning, it is an excellent beginning. It is a beginning. It is an important piece of legislation.

With regard to the aspect of privacy, I was surprised at the hon. member for Burnaby cataloguing and heaping abuse on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In my opinion, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have one of the finest commissioners it has been my privilege to know in the time that I have been in the House of Commons. In attending committees and answering questions, never has there been any fuzzing of answers on the part of that individual. His answers have always been straightforward. If he believes that the police need a particular power, he is not only prepared to come forward but to explain why they need that particular power, what job they have to do and what sorts of things must be done. A general blanket condemnation of the RCMP is inappropriate at this time. Certainly there should be no attack on this commissioner who is doing an excellent job. He has a very difficult role at the present time.

The privacy bill will repeal and replace the existing privacy legislation, Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act. This is something the Canadian public wants to know. It is not that there is no privacy legislation. The fact is it will create a comprehensive code of fair information practices with respect to personal information held by the federal government. This code will deal with the way in which personal information is collected, used, disclosed, retained and disposed of by institutions of the federal government.

It will extend and reinforce the right of access to information about oneself held in federal files. The right of access will now apply to all personal information held by the government. The exemptions to the right of access will be more specific and, in many cases, narrower than under Part IV. A right of judicial review of refusals to provide access will be created. That part of the bill is something that warrants commendation rather than criticism.

Much of the strength of the privacy bill lies in the greatly expanded role of the privacy commissioner. The commissioner will not only be empowered to investigate and make recommendations with respet to refusals to provide access, but she will also be responsible for overseeing the way in which government institutions collect, handle, use and disclose personal information to ensure they comply with the code of fair information practices.

I do not think I have to elaborate much more on the privacy legislation. It is good legislation. I am sure the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), who initiated a lot of what is the privacy legislation, will speak in much more glowing terms than I could ever hope to do because of his background and research on this part of the bill.

Rather than knocking, let us praise this bill. When we go across the country, let us talk about access to information. Let us also tell the Canadian public to try it out to see how it works. They can tell us where the flaws are and where we can improve it. We have the commitment that in three years those changes will be made.

I do not say we will go across the land screaming, yelling, jumping and praising this piece of legislation, but by God we should certainly get this information to the Canadian public so that they will know it is there and that they have access to it. If there are some roadblocks, they can be removed in three years.

I once again compliment the minister for having the intellectual integrity to press forward with this bill, unilaterally as it turns out, notwithstanding a lot of the criticism from the attorneys general from across the country.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, there is a timeliness about this bill. This evening the House of Commons will be entertained by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) as he introduces his second budget in less than a year. We understand from leaks that at that time the government will be announcing what it intends to do about job creation.

I suggest that the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) has already done his part. He has brought with him some 16 officials to sit in the gallery and grace us with their presence. One wonders what they will be doing once the legislation is passed and how we will be able to function without their assistance in the gallery.

I must say that in a time of restraint the Minister of Communications has shown a far greater example of restraint than his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). The Minister of Communications brought only 16 officials with him. If we look at page 52E of the government telephone directory for May of this year, under Employment and Immigration it lists this Privacy and Access to Information Bill, C-43. There are some 27 names listed under this bill. It has already helped to create jobs in the country. If we have done something constructive here already in terms of putting Canadians to work, I am sure the minister will want to take his fair share of praise for that.

I listened with particular interest to the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) who was very flattering. He said that usually he has a very high regard for me. I must thank him for that. I must say that I usually have a very high regard for his remarks as well. However, this was perplexing. It was a surprise. I think every Member of Parliament was surprised by the hon. member's speech today because he is normally extremely sensible. The positions he takes are usually well-reasoned and sound. He often has a very significant contribution to make. However, I think each of us in the House of Commons was a little bit shocked to discover the reason the leader of the New Democratic Party on May 18 got up in the House of Commons to demand that the government bring this legislation back.

Let me read what the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the leader of the NDP, said as reported at page 17527 of Hansard. My colleague from Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) had called upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to agree to bring the bill back for an expeditious debate. The leader of the NDP said:

> Madam Speaker, first of all, in response to the question raised by the Prime Minister I should like to say that we join completely with the Official Opposition in offering assurances that there would be most speedy debate on the freedom of information bill if the government would only bring it forward.
> AN HON. MEMBER: One day?
> MR. BROADBENT: There would be a one-day debate if the government would produce that bill.

I suppose members of the public who are interested in freedom of information and privacy could be forgiven if they thought that this commitment to a one-day debate, this pleading by the leader of the New Democratic Party to bring this bill back for speedy passage, was a sign that the NDP thought it was a good bill, that it was better to have privacy legislation and freedom of information legislation than not to. One would have thought they would have given their enthusiastic support. Now we know the reason for the pleading by the leader of the NDP on the floor of the House of Commons to bring the bill back. They wanted it brought back so that they could vote against it. That was their goal. They wanted to be sure that when the history of freedom of information and privacy legislation is written, they will be recorded as saying they are opposed to the legislation.

The hon. member for Burnaby went on at some length heaping praise on himself and, as I say, often the praise that he would pour on to his own head would be merited. He went on at considerable length to say that he had on behalf of his party secured significant amendments which vastly improved the legislation, that it was much better than it otherwise would have been. He thought that this was very significant, that members of the House should be appreciative and that the Canadian people should be appreciative of this achievement which he had won on behalf of the NDP.

If these improvements were so significant, if the efforts of the NDP were so successful in committee, in terms of making improvements to the bill, in terms of winning a significant victory for Canadians, then why are they going out of their way this afternoon at 5.45 to vote against the bill? What is their purpose? Can he have been serious when he said that they made substantial improvements, that the bill is much better? By voting against the bill, the NDP will be recorded for all time as saying that they believe that the status quo is better than the legislation which is being brought in. They will be saying that they believe that having no freedom of information legislation is better than what will happen after this bill comes to a vote. They will be saying that they believe that Part IV of the Human Rights Act, which is seriously flawed, which has done nothing to protect the privacy of Canadians, is better than having the provisions in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, it may very well be that members of the NDP will be called away, that they will not be able to be in the House at 5.45 when the voice vote is taken. I want to indicate to my friend from Burnaby that members of our party, the Progressive Conservative Party, will be able and be very willing to assist in assuring that he can get his five members to have a recorded vote, to ensure that the NDP position on freedom of information and privacy is recorded as voting against the legislation, and as saying that they believe that the status quo is better than the improvements which a parliamentary committee and Parliament itself laboured itself to bring in on behalf of Canadians.

Let us have no confusion about it, Mr. Speaker. We believe, as my friend from Nepean-Carleton said, that there are flaws in the bill. We are disappointed that the minister chose to water down the bill, as related in particular to cabinet documents. We believe that the bill must be amended and improved. But we believe one other thing as well, and that is that this is a significant step forward. It is a step in the right direction. It does not go as far as we would like to see it go. It does not go as far as legislation will go when we have the opportunity to make amendments. But it is a vast improvement over what we have today.

How can anyone seriously say that having no freedom of information legislation is better than what is before us today?

How can any Member of Parliament or any Canadian say that Part IV of the Human Rights Act is better than what we will have after the passage of this bill?

Surely what we should be doing as Members of Parliament is applauding the fact that through consistent pressure which started back with Mr. Barry Mather of the NDP and Mr. Ged Baldwin of this party, we have been able to put pressure on the government to move in the right direction and begin to open government up, begin to give Canadians some control over information about their now lives. Surely that is the step we should be taking at 5.45, rather than grandstanding and saying "Record me as against it; it does not meet my standards that I have set, so I am going to vote against it. I would rather have nothing; I would rather go back to the status quo." That is what they are saying, rather than have these improvements made.

Members of this side, Mr. Speaker, feel that improvements can be made. We feel that improvements should be made. We are committed to the intention that improvements will be made when we have the opportunity as a government to do that. But we believe that what is before the House today is better than nothing, and we believe it is significantly better than nothing.

What is significant here, Mr. Speaker, perhaps more than anything else, is that this bill may do something about the climate of secrecy in bureaucracy. What we are saying is that for the first time there is a change in the philosophy on information. As things stand today, if a citizen wants to know about how a decision was made which affects his life or how his tax dollars were spent, if he wants to have access to that information or if he wants to withhold from the government information about his personal life, today the government says that it has control over information, that it has the right to decide in all instances whether an individual should be entitled to see information which he asks to see. The government says that it has the right to compel, under pain of penalty, from Canadian citizens information which they might otherwise choose to withhold.

What this legislation does for the first time is to turn that onus around, to say that information is the property of the people of Canada and not of the government. It says that the burden of proof in most instances must be put upon the government. If the government wants to withhold information about its activities, the burden of proof has to be on the government to justify that withholding. Or if the government wants to compel the giving of personal information about individuals, the burden of proof has to be on the government to demonstrate that that information should be provided and that the individual should not have the right to withhold it or to change it. That is a significant change.

It is important that we may start finding more openness in government, that we may start finding more respect on the part of government for the rights of Canadian citizens. If that is all that is achieved, if we begin to move that climate of bureaucracy, that culture that exists within the public service, toward more openness, toward more respect for the rights of Canadian citizens, then we can be reported as having taken a very significant step today. Then Parliament's time today and Parliament's time over the course of this debate will have been well spent.

The hon. member for Burnaby made reference to the fact that in large part the privacy portion of this bill is patterned after legislation that was drawn up when the Conservative administration was in office. That is completely correct. Senator Flynn and I jointly introduced private members' bills, one in the House and one in the Senate, which included the draft of the legislation which was prepared by the Conservative government when in office. If you compare that with what is before us today, it is substantially the same.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the most significant change that has been made between that draft bill and the bill that has been put before us by the Minister of Communications is that the Minister of Communications has simply ripped out the portion of the bill which deals with the abuse of social insurance numbers. You will remember that it was the intention of the Conservative government to act to roll back the use of social insurance numbers to a limited number of uses where an individual would be required to produce a social insurance number. In any other instance the onus would be on the government first of all to indicate to the individual whether or not any law of the land required that he supply his social insurance number; and if it was not mandated by law, and if he refused to supply it, the government would be stripped of its right to deny services to an individual who had not produced a social insurance number or to penalize him in any way.

We asked that the privacy commissioner conduct a study as to the use of the social insurance number in the private sector and in the provinces and to make recommendations as to what action could be taken there. We felt that we did not have the information at that time. We did not know how extensively social insurance numbers were being used. We did not have the information and we felt it would be prudent to regulate the federal government's use of it first and then to act to restrict their use in the private sector and at the provincial government level. My colleague from Perth (Mr. Jarvis), however, as minister of state for intergovernmental affairs, did write to each of the provincial governments to ask them to restrict the use of the social insurance number at the provincial level, and by and large that request was met with considerable enthusiasm at the provincial level.

When this government came into office, what they did was simply to rip out the rest of the provisions dealing with the social insurance number that would restrict it at the federal level and simply throw it in the lap of the privacy commissioner and say: "Make a report; we are not prepared to take a position." Ultimately the privacy commissioner reported. Frankly, it was a disappointing report. It did not address many of the issues which were of concern to people worried about the abuse of social insurance numbers. It went so far as to include in the back in a little pocket a brochure about how to apply for social insurance numbers. It was not very reassuring for Canadians who felt that the social insurance number was being abused.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: What those of us who talked to constituents about social insurance numbers have found is that there is a profound concern among Canadians about the potential abuses which can be made of them. We found concern about the threat to privacy, about infringement upon religious freedom that results from excessive use of social insurance numbers. Just this past week, Mr. Speaker, I had a call from a constituent, an old age pensioner, who said that when her pension cheque comes through, the government has so programmed its computers that it writes her name and address on the cheque, and because there is a see-through portion of the envelope, you can see the individual's social insurance number. That is how they respect the privacy of information. That is how they deal with senior citizens' social insurance numbers. They are visible from outside of the envelope.

The social insurance number is increasingly being used as a means of filing. Increasingly, both in the private sector and in the public sector, organizations are using the social insurance number as a way of filing information about individuals. To abuse social insurance numbers in this way, to give out an individual's confidential information, his social insurance number, is tantamount to having a row of houses each of which has the same lock on the front door, each of which has the one master key to open the door. It does not mean that if you changed the locks, it would be impossible to break into the house. What it does mean is that they all have the same key, they all use the same key, and once you get your hand on that key it makes it that easier to get into all of the houses. That is precisely the great danger that there is in abuse of the social insurance numbers. What the government is doing is to ignore that problem.

That is why I have moved a series of motions which would attempt to restore that portion of the bill which would restrict the use of the social insurance number and respect people's rights to privacy.

There has been an ominus development which I think should be of concern to Canadians. The government has said that even if we were to abolish the social insurance number, that would not guarantee privacy. That is absolutely right. No one has ever made the claim that invasions of privacy would go away if we were to do away with the social insurance number entirely. However, the real issue is whether the government should be encouraging the proliferation of single identifying numbers and their use in both the private and public sectors, considering the consequences it has for personal privacy.

One issue which has not been dealt with in the House of Commons which seems to have escaped public attention was an announcement by the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) that he was spending $15,000 to commission a survey of the acceptability of wallet-sized citizenship papers for Canadians. If anyone has attended a citizenship ceremony for new Canadians, he or she would be aware that each new Canadian citizen is given a wallet-sized Canadian citizenship paper to carry around. Most Canadians do not realize this, but these are also available to Canadian citizens born in this country. I believe the cost to get one at the present time is $8.

What information does it contain? First, it gives an individual's full name; second, it says he is a Canadian citizen; third, it includes a photograph of the individual; fourth, it gives any other names, if there are any others not included on the front; fifth, it gives the date of birth of the individual; sixth, it gives the individual's sex; and seventh, it gives the individual's height, weight and eye colour. According to the Secretary of State, each of these citizenship cards is individually numbered to make it discrete from others.

One's mind goes back to 1971 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was questioned in Saskatoon. According to The Globe and Mail of October 25, 1971, under the headline "Use of ID cards forecast by PM":

> Saskatoon—Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau yesterday indicated his personal belief that at some point in the future compulsory identity cards will be required by all Canadians.
> "But I don't look forward to it, if for no other reason than the sheer mechanics involved in issuing and maintaining the cards. I hope we can retard the day as long as possible."
>
> A system of compulsory personal identity cards would inevitably entail, he suggested, special powers for the police to permit them to stop people to check their identity. People would also inevitably be required to produce them whenever they checked into a hotel, applied for a job and so on.
>
> For all these reasons, he said, he finds such an infringement of the personal rights of Canadians repulsive and would prefer to see individuals continue free to walk about unhampered by such a requirement.
>
> The Prime Minister made his remarks on the eventual need for the cards at a student question-and-answer period on the campus of the University of Saskatchewan. A student had asked Mr. Trudeau for his personal views on the desirability and necessity of such a system.
> The Prime Minister did not expand on why he felt ID cards would be required by Canadians in the future.

The government will respond by saying that these ID cards are voluntary, that there is nothing mandatory about them and that we need not produce them as identification if we are going to cash cheques, if we are going to check into hotels or if we are going to apply for some service. However, that is precisely the same argument we have heard time and time again about the use of the social insurance number. If a person wants simply to do without services, he can do without them. He could simply choose not to produce his card and drop out of society. If this government is allowed to go forward unhindered and if the government goes ahead encouraging Canadians to take out such numbered cards and encourages their proliferation, we will find ourselves—not by plan, not by design, but by default—backing into the sort of citizen identification papers the Prime Minister said he saw as inevitable in 1971.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are about to indicate that my time is up. Let me simply conclude by saying that the government had the opportunity in this legislation to do something about invasions of privacy as they relate to the social insurance number. The government had the ability to act with this legislation to prevent this sort of development from taking place. It chose not to act. The bill is mute. As a result, while the bill is a significant forward in a number of areas, I think there is a serious deficiency in it. I think Parliament should be called upon to improve the bill and to do away with the deficiency without further delay.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to make a few comments on Bill C-43 at the third reading stage. I want first of all to congratulate all those who have been responsible for bringing this bill before the House with the intent of passing it during this session.

I particularly want to congratulate a person who is not in the House today and has not been for a couple of years. In the fall of 1967 I returned from Arizona to Edmonton with some interest in political matters. A political meeting was advertised to be held at the MacDonald Hotel in the latter part of September, 1967. It was stated that a fellow by the name of Ged Baldwin would be speaking at this meeting and that someone by the strange name of Dalton Camp would also be there. I decided to attend that meeting because I was interested particularly in what one of those people had to say, that person being a Member of Parliament from northern Alberta representing the region of Peace River. I went to that meeting and heard a very eloquent speech given by the Hon. Ged Baldwin on the need for open government and access to information in government.

Having worked for some time in the United States and having experienced the difficulty a person in the engineering world experiences in getting information from government, that speech impressed me very much and, indeed, helped me in my subsequent years in politics to a very great degree.

I should say that the other fellow who spoke at that meeting did not overly impress me with what he said because he did not say very much at that time. However, Mr. Baldwin impressed upon me the need for open government and access to information to such a degree that when I became minister of the environment in the province of Alberta, which was a whole new area, we declared as a policy that all environmental information was public information. We followed that policy implicitly for the four years I was minister. We brought information into the legislature by the wheelbarrow load. Everything was public, and that had several effects. The first was that suddenly the news media and the people trusted the government fully in that area. They knew we were not hiding anything and that we would table everything. Whether it was derogatory to a company or a government, we simply put it on the table. As a government, we became trusted in that area.

The second strange thing was the effect on the news media. Up until that time, if there was a rumour that a document was being held secret, that became the issue. The issue was that something was being held secret and away from the eyes of the public. An interesting development happened in environmental matters. When we started to table everything and bring everything forward, it was not "newsy" any more. It was news only when there was a suspicion that something was being held under the table or confidential, and the news media would play it up to the nth degree. Indeed, information was brought forward without any difficulty. It served a very useful purpose. There was demand for this information from companies and from local levels of government, and it was provided without any difficulty whatsoever. It was a pity the same policy was not followed in other departments in the province of Alberta or that we did not bring forward a freedom of information act, because we should have, seeing it was an Albertan who worked so hard at the national level to get such a bill into the House of Commons. I might also say that I was very impressed with Mr. Baldwin's role.

• (1710)

Personally, I feel very strongly that the correspondence of ministers should also be made public, although I know that is a very sensitive issue. I spent seven years as a minister in the provincial government of Alberta and when I quit I gave all my correspondence to the archives of Alberta to be made public when they felt it was appropriate or when I gave permission to do so. I believe that cabinet documents and ministerial correspondence should be made public soon after a government is defeated or a minister leaves office. Such correspondence is pertinent to the political life and the growth of a nation.

I believe that this bill, although it is important and an excellent start, should go further. I fully support it. This is a good, sound initiative. In closing, again I wish to give credit to Mr. Ged Baldwin for all the work he did on this subject during the years.

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I too rise in this House with a feeling of pride today. This has been a very busy Parliament and it has handled some very important pieces of legislation, but this is one of the most important. I am proud to have had some small part in it through my membership on the committee.

This work is rather new to me, Mr. Speaker, but I have enjoyed it. As a Canadian citizen I have always been interested in access to information and seeing that the rights of the individual are protected at the same time. As a former member of the media, I know how important it is that information be available and I applaud the government and all members of the House for their part in bringing forth this important piece of legislation.

The bill tries to put in place a mechanism that will ensure access to information which should be properly available to us. Obviously some information, for one reason or another, cannot be accessible. In this electronic age it is most important that privacy be assured as well. This bill incorporates accessibility to information and ensures the right of the individual to privacy without impeding law enforcement or jeopardizing the common good.

As a non-legal member of the committee, I was intrigued by the intricacies of the bill. Access to information and right to privacy are matters that have been discussed for a long time. I think it is quite proper that it has taken so long for the bill to appear in its present form because the matter is complex. The federal and provincial jurisdictions were involved and this is a complicating factor.

Sometimes the right to privacy gets in the way of competition and this is a difficulty for the commercial sector where people must be free to do business without giving aid and comfort to their competition.

The whole process seems simple until you get into it. It has involved a great deal of consultation over the years. There have been other attempts to bring forward an access to information and right to privacy bill and we have benefited from earlier studies in the private and public sectors. As well, we have the advantage of seeing how such legislation has worked in some provinces and in other countries.

It would be a great thing if we could pass this bill unanimously this afternoon. Much has been said about the fact that it is not perfect, and there is no doubt that it has its limitations and could be improved. It is important to get it through so we can see it in operation, however. We will be able to see whether the judicial reviews work and whether the commissioner is doing a good job, whether information is as accessible as it should be and if privacy is being protected. The subject has been examined thoroughly by many sectors in the country over the years. Its strength lies in the fact that a parliamentary committee must review the bill in three years' time. By then we will have had a chance to see how it works.

This review is an absolute necessity, Mr. Speaker. It ensures that we will not just forget about the whole subject but will monitor and observe the process and make corrections where necessary. We have to start somewhere, Mr. Speaker, and I feel that we have made a grand beginning.

I am very proud to have had some small part in this process along with an excellent group of parliamentarians. I compliment the government for bringing to fruition something that has been desired by so many people for so long and for recognizing the very good work that preceded the work of the committee. I wish the bill could be approved this afternoon by unanimous consent.

So, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that, while I know it will not go through by unanimous consent, unfortunately, I am proud that most of us at least have recognized the need for the bill and the fact that it is really a magnificent beginning.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on Bill C-43, particularly as it pertains to social insurance numbers. I want to relate to the House, the minister, and to his officials in the gallery, an incident where a citizen of Canada, a constituent of mine, was terribly abused because of misuse of his social insurance number by someone else. I think it would be worth while for the minister to listen to this and realize that sometimes these numbers and government documentation can work against the individual.

One Sunday morning, Mr. Speaker, a university student—studying, coincidentally, computer sciences—came to my door. My family and I were just on our way to church, but I stayed behind to talk to him because I perceived that he was in difficulty. In fact, sir, as I spoke to him I found that he was contemplating suicide. We sat down and spent the rest of the day together. My wife came back from church with the children and he had lunch and dinner with us.

What happened was that he had attended a circus and someone stole his wallet containing his social insurance number, driver's licence and birth certificate. The thief began to use this young man's identity and used it for a number of years. He took employment in this university student's name so that come income tax time my constituent had the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) telling him that he had not remitted all his taxes because he had worked for this company, that company and the other company. Of course, the young man said "I did not work there at all". "It does not matter, we have your T4 slips with your social insurance number, therefore you must pay." So he paid tax for four years on income that he did not earn.

In addition to that, the thief used this man's identity all across Canada. He bounced cheques in every province so that the RCMP had a file on him and were looking for him. This individual also went down to the United States, committed a crime in Texas, and the FBI had a file on him. The province of Ontario suspended the student's driver's licence because this individual had committed so many traffic offences that he had used up all his points.

The student came to me because he had graduated from university and had applied for a job where confidentiality was required. The prospective employer had made the usual check and found out that the applicant had a criminal record. This individual who was using the young man's identification had stolen a car, been caught and gone to jail in my constituent's name, using his social insurance number. How shocking for the young man to find out that he had just graduated from university and had a criminal record, was wanted by police for bouncing cheques, and could not drive a car, all because of this individual using his identification and social insurance number.

I wrote all this down in a statement, the young man swore to it, and we began our investigation. I went to the police in Hamilton and found that indeed he had reported his wallet stolen, so we began to look from there. I came back to Ottawa and said that we must give this man a new social insurance number so that we can separate him from the individual who is using his number fraudulently. I went to the central records of the department which produced the social insurance number, and what do you think they told me? They said: "We cannot issue another number to your constituent; the computer is not programmed that way". "Well, what are we supposed to do", I said. They said they would seek legal advice from the legal officers within the department. They then called me back and said the only way they can issue a new social insurance number to my constituent is if he legally changed his name. Can you imagine anything more ridiculous than a citizen being asked to change his name so that the computer can issue him a new number? What a ludicrous situation! Can you imagine this young man at a family gathering where his mother says: "This is Bill Smith, Tom Smith, Joe Smith and Mary Smith, but this is Bobby Brown because he cannot get along with the computer program and they cannot issue two social insurance numbers"!

We had quite a little time with that, Mr. Speaker. I checked with the official several times, made notes on his comments, and finally, through a stroke of luck, we found that the chap who was fraudulently using my constituent's name was in jail in Woodstock. Why was he there? He had been working in a gas station and when a customer came in for gasoline, say $10 worth, if the customer paid by credit card this man would carefully tear off the customer's copy, leaving the carbon in place, then he would change the zero to a five so that it now read $15. He would then take $5 out of the till, the till would balance, and he would be $5 in pocket. Well, eventually the police caught up with him and threw him in jail. We found him by running his name through the RCMP computer and up came a set of fingerprints. We then ran those through the computer and up came a different name. That is how we found out who he was.

I then went up to the jail and interviewed this individual. He was fantastic as far as numbers were concerned; I never met a man like him. He repeated my constituent's social insurance number, which he was using, backward and forward. He did the same with his driver's licence number. He had an unbelievable memory for numbers. I asked him what he was going to do when he got out of jail. He said he was just going to go down to the post office and order another social number, go to the records department in Toronto and get another driver's licence, and go to the necessary department and get another birth certificate and start all over again. So he was going to continue to use this young man's identification.

I came back to Ottawa and spoke to the minister in charge. He said there was nothing he could do. I spoke to the Minister of National Revenue, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), and they said there was nothing they could do. Finally I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if a citizen had to comply with this computer program in order to get this matter sorted out, and he said of course not. It was only the pressure of editorial writers across the country that really got this thing out in the open. Every major newspaper in Canada ran an editorial on it and the pressure was really on. Jokingly I said to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) one day in the House, when we were awaiting a vote, that if he ever had trouble with his social insurance number, he should come to me and I would sort it out. He said that they had talked about it in cabinet and that instructions went out to get that matter settled.

Here is what happened. I had a meeting with the minister and his officials. They wanted me to attend the minister's office. I am a fledgling Member of Parliament, so I said that I would not go to the minister's office because I would be standing in front of the minister and all his officials. I told them that if they wanted to settle this matter, they could come to my office. I wanted to sit behind the desk and have them stand out in front. The parliamentary secretary, who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), said that the minister would not come to my office. I said that he did not have to come, that his officials could appear. This is exactly what happened. They all appeared. They brought a secretary, their legal advisers and the deputy minister. I was sitting behind the desk and they were out in front.

I want to say that it was quite a difference because I was more or less sitting in the driver's seat, so to speak. First of all, the chap at central records denied outright that he had even told me that my constituent would have legally to change his name. But I had made various notations as to the date, the times, the questions I had asked and so forth. I folded them up, gave them to him and said, "Put them in your scrapbook; I realize that what you have to do now is to save your job, and that you will not admit anything". Finally the deputy minister said that the only way this could be solved would be to change the act. They expected that I would say that I did not want them to go to all that trouble, but I said, "That is the very least I will accept; you must change the act".

So it began, and 18 months later, with an election in between, I finally received a new social insurance number for this young man and gave it to him as a Christmas present. It was the beginning of a new year and a new life for him, but he had gone through hell for five years because of the intransigence of the bureaucracy of government. People were saying that this could not be done, and the ministers were saying that they did not want to become involved. No one would move, but thank God for the police, for the RCMP and others who helped me. We finally got the job done.

Let me conclude by saying that after we had agreed to all this, the minister's executive assistant wrote a letter to The Globe and Mail trying to take credit for it. Can you imagine that? We replied to it, and I think he was let go shortly after that because it was a shabby trick. He even said that the minister's officials had found this dastardly individual who was fraudulently using my constituent's social insurance number, name and identity, in jail in Woodstoock, when in fact they had not. I went so far as to check the visitors' record of the jail to be sure that I was right on that point. Certainly no one had been there from the government, from the RCMP or anyone else, until I had visited the individual and raised the matter on the floor of the House of Commons.

I thought this would be a worth-while contribution to Bill C-43. I know my colleagues on this side have laboured hard and long on the bill. It is not everything that we want, but it is a beginning. We will certainly support it, and we hope that at some later date we will have an opportunity to amend it and see that it is improved further. I wanted to put on the record what can go wrong when bureaucrats become insensitive to citizens and the difficulties they have with simple matters such as assigning a number to an individual. It is a tragedy. This man suffered for five years out of his life. We finally got back his income tax; National Revenue gave him back the money. The province of Ontario gave him back the money they had taken for the fines and returned his driver's licence. Finally, we got his wallet back with his original documents from the FBI, believe it or not. He went back into the work force and now he is gainfully employed with a new social insurance number. He is a very happy young man today. I thought it would be worthwhile to put those few remarks on the record for the benefit of my colleauges who were not here at the time and for the benefit of the officials of the minister who are sitting in the gallery.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the parliamentary secretary expressed a wish that this bill would pass unanimously. I want to take just five minutes to indicate a few examples of what is wrong with the bill and to show why we cannot vote for it.

Members will know that under the provisions of the United States freedom of information act, FBI and CIA files from the 1950s and the 1960s have been made available to people and to organizations. In a recent autobiography which John Kenneth Galbraith published, it is obvious that he had access to the FBI files on his own records. We know from the McDonald Commission that the RCMP has 700,000 files on individuals. Also we know from experience that some Members of Parliament, many trade union leaders and many farm leaders are among the people in those files. On one occasion I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) privately whether after this bill was passed people could obtain access and see what was in the files about them. He told me that they could not. I am talking about after this bill is enacted.

Professor Jim Penton of the University of Lethbridge was writing a book about religion a couple of years ago. He wanted to report in the book about the Doukhobors and about the assassination of Peter Veregin, the then leader of the Freedomite Doukhobors. Peter Veregin was assassinated in the early 1920s, more than 60 years ago. Professor Penton went to the RCMP asked for and was refused access to their files. Professor David Bercuson of the University of Calgary, a well-known labour historian in this country, told me this morning that one of his M.A. students was working on the history of the communist party in Alberta in the 1920s. It is common knowledge that the RCMP at that time had infiltrated and was keeping a very close tab on radical organizations in those days, on the communist party, on trade unions and on farm organizations. I am not questioning what they did, but we are talking about a period more than 50 years ago. When this student asked the RCMP whether she could look at the files concerning what was done in the 1920s, she was given access to only 15 or 20 pages of material. Professor Bercuson said that what amazed him and his colleagues was that she obtained that much. We can compare that with the tens of thousands of pages of recent FBI and CIA files from the 1950's and 1960's which were made public; people who felt rightly or wrongly that they had been mistreated by government agencies were given access to the files. One of the reasons we considered this bill not to be a good beginning was that it does not give Canadians these same rights.

We consider the bill to be largely a hoax. The Liberal government is doing as it so frequently does—it is giving the appearance of giving people what they want or giving people what there is a broad consensus on, when in fact it is doing nothing of the kind. We are not prepared to vote for a bill which we believe to a large extent to be a hoax. The Conservative Party opposed important provisions of this bill when it was in government and in opposition. We are surprised that members of that party will now vote for it.

I should like to refer for a moment or two to a committee report of this year wherein the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) referred to this bill. He said, "You have gutted judicial review and you should know that." He ended by saying, "You have poisoned it. It is a body blow to access of information." If I had more time I could go into greater detail about what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said. However, having said all that, and having shown how inadequate the bill is, the member for Nepean-Carleton, as well as other members of the official opposition, are prepared to vote for the bill.

• (1740)

We in our party are not prepared to vote for a bill which will not accomplish anything. It will only give the ministers of the government and the senior bureaucrats about as much power as they have always had to keep from the public whatever information they desire secret. We are not prepared to cooperate with the government or the official opposition to allow them to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some discussions, albeit inconclusive, between myself, the government House leader and the acting House leader for the New Democratic Party. We discussed deferring the votes at report stage and third reading on this measure until next Monday, and, in addition, that we defer the vote on the NDP amendment on the budget, which is ordinarily to arise on Wednesday next, also until next Monday.

I would hope that that proposal could find some responsiveness in the spirit of co-operation with the government House leader. We made that proposal because if we get into a long voting procedure tonight—by my calculation there are some 17 votes that are possible—it would manifestly eat into the time available to us, thus delaying the eight o'clock commencement of the budget statement by the minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). We do not want to do that. We want to hear that statement at eight o'clock. If we commence the voting procedure now, I do not know how many votes the NDP will be standing us on.

To me, it would seem that the reasonable and logical course to follow would be to defer all votes until next Monday, in the hope as well that the vote next Wednesday could also be deferred until a week today, the latter in order to enable western members to be in their ridings by July 1. I understand that it is somewhat easier to do for Atlantic members but it is absolutely impossible for western members to be home if we vote at the usual time next Wednesday on the New Democratic Party amendments.

I make that proposal in the spirit of co-operation and in the hope that the government will find it acceptable and agree to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed in the attitude of the Progressive Conservative House Leader, because he has decided to negotiate publicly, in the House, instead of privately as is our custom. He knows perfectly well that we cannot agree with suggestions he made earlier, for the simple reason that when we decided to consider the Access to Information Bill today, there was a tacit agreement with his party critic to have this evening's votes dealt with quickly and sensibly.

Some moments earlier today, when the hon. member was absent from the House, I had an opportunity to talk to his party critic who is here in the House, the member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and with representatives of the New Democratic Party. We reached an agreement whereby the entire body of amendments and third reading would be disposed of very quickly in not more than three votes. And now, just because I did not agree right away—I was not in a position to do so—to have Wednesday's vote, the first no-confidence vote on the budget, deferred to next week—I told him I was not in a position to give him an answer at this time, perhaps this evening or tomorrow morning—now he is trying to use this kind of pressure to destroy the tacit agreement reached with his party critic and the New Democratic Party critic, to obstruct the proceedings of Parliament once more and deliberately delay this evening's budget speech. His attitude is: All the government has to do is to agree to have the votes on the Access to Information Bill deferred until Monday evening, which happens to suit the hon. member a bit better.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but this is no way to run Parliament, and I deplore the destructive attitude of the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who does not even have the decency to keep our discussions private. If we do reach an agreement, fine, that will be raised on the floor of the House in any case, but when we do not, in that case, we simply agree to deal with the motions before the House, as provided under the rules of Parliament. However, the major spokesmen for each party on this bill have made a tacit agreement. I would never have proceeded with this bill today if I had not obtained this tacit agreement from the assistant of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who is the official critic of his party for this bill, last Friday when the hon. member was absent, and from the hon. member himself today. I hope that the hon. member for Yukon will reconsider the questionable tactic he has used today.

Moreover, I hope that he will change his mind in the next few minutes and abide by the gentlemen's agreement made by the critics for his party and the New Democratic party so that we may dispose quickly of the Freedom of Information Act in the next few minutes. This will have no bearing on my decision concerning his other suggestion to dispose of the vote at another time next Wednesday. This is a totally separate question to which I shall be able to reply later today or tomorrow morning, as I have indicated. If the hon. member is determined to paralyse Parliament and to delay the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) which is scheduled for this evening at eight o'clock, if this is his tactic or his plan and if he is acting in good faith, the best way to put this good faith to the test, if he refuses to stand by the agreement made with the official critic for his party, he can simply as a last resort, so as not to delay the speech of the Minister, accept that the votes be deferred to a time which is considered appropriate by all House leaders.

This would be much more in agreement with our rules than setting the date in advance for next Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. However, I still find it repugnant to give my consent, but perhaps he will not leave me any choice if I am to see to it that the Minister of Finance can make his speech at eight o'clock. I may be forced very inappropriately to give my consent. I shall perhaps be forced to agree to defer these votes to a mutually acceptable date within a reasonable time, but I am not able to agree immediately to deferring the votes to Monday evening, and I would much prefer that he stand by the gentlemen's agreement made by the critics for his own party and the New Democratic party and by his own deputy House leader in his absence last Friday and confirmed today.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the government House leader has taken that belligerent attitude to what I considered to be a very reasonable suggestion. I did so on the basis that we do not want to delay at all the statement of the minister at eight o'clock tonight. We are not going to do that. He does not appear to want to accept that reassurance, but I give it to him again. I based my suggestions to him also on the assurance given to me by our critic for this bill, the member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that no agreement was made that there would be only three votes. That is what the government House leader said. I asked a direct question of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, our critic, and he said that was not an agreement whatsoever.

I make that appeal to the government House leader in all reason. The members of the New Democratic Party are prepared to go along with it. I cannot see any reason for its not being acceptable to him. We could defer all votes until Monday and also defer next Wednesday's vote to Monday, without any intention of putting any pressure on the government House leader whatsoever. It is simply made to him in the best possible faith. If any member over there can find any motive for my making this reasonable suggestion, I would like to hear it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I hear all sorts of laughter. However, no hon. member is courageous enough to stand in his place to make an accusation as to my motivation.

I make the offer in good faith and I make the suggestion in good faith. We can be out of here, vote on all the votes that are necessary to clear the matter up next Monday, and also defer next Wednesday's vote until next Monday. I put that to the government House leader in the best possible faith.

• (1750)

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make clear where we on this side stand. I understand from speaking with my critic, and I understood half an hour ago, that some work had been done to narrow the number of votes down to a maximum of two. We are of course prepared to vote since the House already called for it. I am always interested in accommodating what common sense would dictate. Your Honour may, in fact, recall that last Monday evening at about two o'clock in the morning I was still begging for common sense. However, without choosing sides on this matter, we are ready to vote. But if it were to be decided to defer the votes, then that will not cause us any great pain.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is in the House. A few minutes ago I spoke to him, along with the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) who is here in the House. Very clearly he told us that his party would not request any recorded division on any vote and that, in fact, he did not want any vote to be recorded at this time. He is here. That is what he told me and that is what he told the Minsiter of Communications. I ask him to confirm that, if he is an honest man.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just so the air will be cleared, it was not our intention to call votes on the report stage amendments. That was the discussion. But in the intervening debate, the New Democratic Party critic indicated to me that his party intended to call one vote at report stage, and during the course of the debate, the party indicated it would vote against the bill. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) clearly stated the position of our party in discussions with me, confirming what I had said in the course of our own speech that if a vote were called, we intended to suppport the bill. Therefore, it looks as though we are faced with two votes. That is the situation, as I understand the matter, which is well within the three votes which have been mentioned by the House leader for the official opposition. That is the position as it stands.

I have just one observation. There is a House order that calls for a vote at 5.45 p.m. It is now 5.50 p.m. and I presume that we should get on with the voting. If there can be no arrangement to dispense, then we must get on with the voting. If an arrangement cannot be made to dispense, I will naturally have no difficulty in that respect, but that is the situation. We are bound by order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has acknowledged that what he has in mind, as he had in mind when we reached the understanding, is that there will be two to three votes as a maximum. He even mentioned two votes. That is fine. We should just put the questions as we are ready to vote now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to an order made Wednesday, June 23, 1982, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forth every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House.

Accordingly, the question is on Motion No. 1. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

It being 6.30 p.m., I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. when the business before the House will be a ways and means motion in the name of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

At 6.32 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

INTRODUCTION

He said: Canadians want to know how we can get our economy growing again, how we can get industry to invest, expand and provide the jobs our people need. A million two hundred thousand among us are unemployed. Still more are struggling to make ends meet in the face of high inflation and high interest rates. We are all suffering, one way or another, from the recession that is battering our economy. We are all searching for a way out of it.

It is no comfort to know that the United States is a victim of the same recession. So are all the industrial countries of Europe and, even more cruelly, the developing world. The recession is international. Some of our problems are of our own making, but a large part comes from abroad. That is why the speed of our move towards recovery cannot be determined by Canada alone.

My purpose tonight is to offer Canadians a way to end the recession, and to speed our progress towards recovery through immediate action.

First, I will ask Canadians to participate in a strategy to make Canada a tougher, more resilient society. The way out of the recession is to bring down inflation and increase productivity. We must all share the burden and responsibility.

The government will take a leading role in this strategy. It will limit pay increases in the federal public sector. It will act to lower inflation-related increases in other spheres of government responsibility.

If all of us—governments, business, labour and individual Canadians—rally to greater discipline in our income demands and other inflationary behaviour, prices will at long last go down, and so will interest rates. The economy will start growing again. Industry will be able to make a decent profit and to increase production. Laid-off workers will be recalled. New jobs will become available

Second, a dynamic, confident business sector is essential to our economic recovery. Confidence depends on real economic opportunity. It also depends on effective interaction between governments and the private sector.

I will table tax proposals that would reduce significantly interest rates for home buyers and small business, and create new incentives for investment in Canadian corporations. I will propose the resolution of outstanding taxation issues from the November 1981 budget. I will address issues of concern to international investors.

Third, many Canadians and specific sectors of the economy need additional support and assistance in this time of recession. I will announce this evening initiatives totalling $2.3 billion for that purpose. Major actions will be targetted to employment creation, housing, small business, farming and fishing.

● (2010)

Fourth, these actions will be taken within the very limited room for manoeuvre imposed by the deficit. Recession has resulted in a serious worsening of the government's financial position. Tax revenues have fallen, while expenditures have risen. This has imposed severe limits on new spending. The government cannot responsibly add to the deficit. It has to reallocate resources. The action plan will therefore be carried out within the framework of current monetary and fiscal policy.

THE ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL SITUATION

The recession has been abrupt and severe. Unemployment has reached record levels. Business profits have fallen dramatically. Bankruptcies have increased. Demand for goods has shrunk, both at home and in our markets abroad.

The economic woes of the United States and all the industrialized countries of Europe have caused additional hardship for Canadians. Unemployment in all those nations has reached record levels. Their industries and their consumers are suffering from high interest rates and lower output, just as ours are. They cannot afford to buy as much of our natural resources and manufactured products as before. Their governments are unable or have not chosen to design their economic policies to help us get out of the recession.

The persistence of the U.S. recession and of high interest rates in that country are the foremost international obstacles to a resumption of growth in Canada and the rest of the world. There are signs that the recession in the United States may soon bottom out and that a modest recovery may begin shortly, but production for all of 1982 is still expected to be 1½ to 2 per cent below the 1981 level. Moreover, high real interest rates in the United States remain a barrier to strong recovery. They are also keeping interest rates higher than domestic circumstances require in other countries, including Canada. In recent months, money has flowed toward high U.S. interest rates in such magnitude that the U.S. dollar has risen strongly against every major currency. Its rise against the Canadian dollar has been less than against other major currencies.

Though our economy has been seriously affected by these international forces, its fundamental strengths remain. Canada's resource wealth is undiminished. Canadians are as trained and capable as ever. Our corporate sector has to cope with depressed markets, falling profits and serious cash problems, but it has the capacity to weather the storm. Our financial institutions are well managed and prudently regulated. Our small business and housing sectors are facing greater difficulties, but the actions I am announcing tonight will provide them with substantial assistance. The stabilizers built into our tax and public expenditure systems help sustain incomes in the face of the decline in economic activity.

However, there is a major risk that we will let our competitive position slip. We are now doing much worse on inflation than our key trading partners. Our productivity performance has also been very disappointing. That imposes costs on all of us right now. But the consequences for the future are even more menacing if our performance does not improve. We would be priced out of foreign markets. That would cost us dearly in jobs and growth.

We should all be concerned about our slow progress in bringing down inflation. The increase in the consumer price index was 11.8 per cent in May. If present trends continue, our rate of inflation will not fall much below 11 per cent for 1982 as a whole. This would be 4 to 5 percentage points higher than in the United States, and about 6 points higher than increases in Germany and Japan. Clearly this is not good enough. Wage settlements in Canada also increased by 12¾ per cent in the first quarter of this year. Our wage settlements are therefore running about 5 percentage points higher than the trend in the United States. How can we expect to compete if this persists?

The recession also has caused a serious worsening of the government's fiscal position. The sharp fall in federal revenues is the inevitable consequence of the decline in production, employment and income. I estimate the revenue loss attributable to the recession to be about $4.5 billion in 1982-83. Lower international oil prices, and the lowering of energy taxes recently announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), have also reduced federal revenues by another $1.5 billion in the current fiscal year. I now expect total budgetary revenues of $58.6 billion in 1982-83, $6.4 billion less than my November forecast of $65 billion.

Federal spending has also been affected by the recession. Higher interest rates add to the costs of governments as well as firms and individuals. Public debt charges are expected to be $1.1 billion higher than originally forecast. The deferral of some energy expenditures to the current fiscal year have reduced our outlays by $1.1 billion in 1981-82 and raised them by a similar amount in 1982-83. Over and above that, the government has approved few additional expenditures, and most are also related to the recession. Earlier this year $400 million were allocated to direct employment support and the extension of variable entrance requirements under the unemployment insurance program. The higher payments to provinces to which I agreed during negotiations on the fiscal arrangements will add $200 million to our outlays this year. The net effect of these and other minor changes has been to raise total budgetary expenditures to $78.1 billion in 1982-83. This is $2.6 billion higher than my November forecast of $75.5 billion. In addition, the rise in unemployment insurance payments will add an estimated $2.0 billion to our financial requirements.

The result is that the projected budgetary deficit for the current fiscal year is very much higher than that forecast in the November budget: $19.6 billion, compared to the $10.5 billion initially projected and to the $12.9 billion estimate for 1981-82. Our financial requirements are now projected at $17.1 billion, instead of the November budget forecast of $6.6 billion.

These increases reflect mainly the automatic response of our tax and expenditure systems to the recession. These automatic stabilizers must be allowed to operate to avoid making the recession worse. This is not the time to do away with these stabilizers, not the time to cut unemployment insurance or slash expenditures that provide income to Canadians.

• (2020)

The last budget put in place a structure of revenues and expenditures that should, when recovery gets fully under way, gradually lower the deficit and avoid putting excessive pressures on capital markets as private borrowing picks up to finance investment. I am introducing new tax and expenditure initiatives to respond to pressing needs, but I am not adding further to the deficit already facing us in 1982-83. The cost of new measures will be more than offset by reductions in planned expenditures and a modest tax increase.

The onslaught of recession has triggered demands for a fundamental reappraisal of our economic policies. The government has examined very carefully alternative policy options. The actions we have decided to take reflect the broad consensus emerging from suggestions made by various groups, individuals and Members of Parliament. In this regard, I am particularly grateful to the Member of Parliament for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) and her committee who have contributed so much to the elaboration of current policy. Any departure from our broad policy approach has been rejected.

[Translation]

We have rejected massive fiscal stimulus and the abandonment of monetary restraint because this would only worsen inflation and aggravate unemployment. We have rejected broad mandatory controls of prices and incomes. Broad controls are opposed almost unanimously by business and labour. On no other issue have I received stronger representations from the private sector. Controls would merely postpone the basic shift in economic behaviour that is needed—a shift to discipline and restraint, self-willed and self-imposed. It is to that basic change, rather than to massive government intervention, that the government has decided to devote its energies.

[English]

A STRATEGY TO BRING DOWN INFLATION

Moving toward recovery requires that we take immediate action to bring down inflation. The central difficulty in reducing inflation is to break expectations that inflation will remain high indefinitely. Such expectations tend to be self-fulfilling: incomes chase prices, which in turn chase incomes in a vicious spiral. No one wants to be the first to accept a lower increase in pay than the next person. Unions are busy catching up with the ones that just settled for 12 or 14 per cent a year. Businesses and firms are busy raising their prices to catch up with or anticipate cost increases. Governments are also busy raising their taxes to catch up with the inflation of their expenditures. So the spiral goes on.

It is critical that we break that vicious circle. And when I say "we", I mean all Canadians, not just wage-earners and not just unions. I stress that our efforts to bring down inflation are not directed against labour or any other group in society. We are all caught in the spiral and, more often than not, against our will or our better judgment.

It is within our power, through deliberate and concerted action, to bring down price inflation much more quickly. We can do this by accepting, for the time being, income increases that are lower than the current rate of inflation. A reduction of income demands will lower cost and price increases. In this way we can stop feeding the spiral of inflation.

This strategy will lead in the short run to a lowering of our real income. But it will soon slow the process that is eroding our pay cheques. It will stop the rise of unemployment. And it will establish a firm basis for resumption of real income growth throughout the economy.

That is the first immediate action that I am proposing.

I am urging Canadians to lower their demands for income increases to 6 per cent during the 12 months ending in July 1983, and to 5 per cent in the following 12-month period. I am also urging businesses to lower price increases as costs go down and profit margins are restored over this two-year period. I am calling on everyone to help Canada make the difficult change-over from the 12 per cent world that has mired us in recession to the 6 per cent world that will bring recovery.

Solidarity and sharing built Canada. That sharing is what the unemployed, the many firms in trouble, and the thousands threatened by lay-offs now need. I count on the willingness of all Canadians to bear their share of the collective effort to bring down inflation. Commitment to restraint and discipline in our income demands is the price we must pay to get the economy growing again and to make it possible for all eventually to benefit from rising employment and real income.

The government will seek consultations with business and labour to determine the best ways of implementing this strategy. We will also examine with the provinces how the efforts of all might best be co-ordinated.

PAY RESTRAINT IN THE FEDERAL PUBLIC SECTOR

The private sector and the provinces could not be expected to accept income restraint unless the Government of Canada showed leadership in the conduct of its own affairs. The government has therefore decided to lead the way by implementing the proposed strategy in the federal public sector for a period of two years.

First, legislation will be introduced this week in Parliament to cut pay increases for ministers of the Crown, Members of the House of Commons and Members of the Senate from 11 to 6 per cent for the rest of this year. The limit will be 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent the year after.

Second, increases in the rates of pay of all deputy ministers, heads of Crown corporations and senior executives of the public service will be limited to the same targets of 6 per cent and 5 per cent for the next two years. The advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service recently recommended that the rates of pay of deputy ministers and senior executives be raised by 9½ per cent as of April 1 of this year. Instead, they will be limited to 6 per cent effective July 1.

Third, increases in the rates of pay of other employees in the federal public sector will be constrained to no more than 6 per cent in the first year of the application of the program to them and 5 per cent in the second year.

• (2030)

The coverage of the program will be broad. In addition to the ministry, Members of Parliament, the judiciary and the public service, the program will apply to the Canadian Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and Crown corporations.

It will cover more than 500,000 federal employees. However, only ministers, MPs and Senators will be subject to actual cuts in pay.

The details of the public sector compensation restraint program will be announced shortly by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), who will be responsible for its administration.

In addition to the leadership it will provide in our collective effort to bring down inflation, the pay restraint program will lower federal expenditures by some $250 million this year, and $550 million next year, relative to the provision in our fiscal plan. This will provide financial resources for reallocation to the high priority needs for direct assistance to other Canadians.

I would like to emphasize that in the government's view federal public sector employees are no more responsible for inflation than any other group in the society. They too have been trying to catch up with rising prices, but their incomes have risen no more, and often rather less, than those of employees in other sectors. This is not a punitive program. If other sectors follow our leadership, federal employees will fare as well as others. The government believes that it is reasonable to impose a limited measure of pay restraint in the federal public sector at a time when others are bearing a severe burden arising from unemployment, pay cuts and business losses.

Pay restraint is also needed in the provincial and local public sectors. Several provinces have already announced measures to limit the pay increases of some categories of public sector employees under their jurisdiction. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will meet with the Premiers on Wednesday to urge that all provinces take similar actions.

[Translation]

LIMITING GOVERNMENT INDEXATION

The actions I am now about to announce are being taken only after the most careful consideration. The government is deeply committed to lifting the burden of inflation from those least able to protect themselves. But it is calling upon all Canadians to share in a determined effort to bring inflation down. It is calling upon all to reduce their income demands well below the present rate of inflation. It would be inconsistent with the government's determination to see income demands reduced to 6 per cent and 5 per cent not to ask taxpayers and recipients of some transfer payments also to carry part of the burden.

With regard to the income tax system, the indexing factor applicable to personal exemptions and tax brackets will therefore be limited to 6 per cent for the 1983 taxation year and to 5 per cent for the 1984 taxation year.

[English]

Effective January 1, 1983, indexation of the pensions paid to former Members of Parliament and public servants will be limited to 6 per cent. The indexing factor will be lowered to 5 per cent as of January 1, 1984.

Effective the same dates, the indexing factor applicable to family allowances and old age security will also be limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent. To ensure that the limitation of the indexing factor does not hurt families with modest incomes, the child tax credit will be increased by $50 for the 1982 taxation year and will continue to be fully indexed. The increase will raise the credit from $293 to $343 for each child.

Pensioners most in need must also be fully protected from the limitation on the indexing factor. The guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens with lower incomes will continue to be fully indexed. In addition, everyone receiving the GIS will get a supplement to the GIS payment offsetting fully the limitation on indexation of old age security payments.

Veterans' pensions will continue to be fully indexed.

ADMINISTERED PRICES

The government, while asking that a measure of protection against inflation be temporarily sacrificed by public servants, taxpayers and many recipients of transfer payments, is obligated to do all it can to ensure that prices established under federal jurisdiction are similarly restrained.

Accordingly, I am asking that federal agencies which regulate the prices for such vital goods and services as public transportation, public communications and foodstuffs, adhere to the objectives established tonight and depart from them only in exceptional circumstances.

The government will monitor the price decisions of the regulatory agencies within its jurisdiction and take appropriate actions where exceptional increases cannot be justified.

As well, the government will ask the provinces to take similar action in those areas of regulation within their jurisdiction.

Through these actions on earnings, on indexing, on administered prices, the government is providing leadership in a two-year national effort to break inflation. These are exceptional actions required by exceptional circumstances.

ACTIONS TO SHORE UP INVESTMENT AND CONFIDENCE

I now move to the second thrust of the government's action plan, which is the shoring-up of investment and confidence. Idle capacity, falling profits, heavy interest costs and expanding debt have combined to make businesses reluctant to expand. Consumers also hesitate to commit themselves to major purchases, particularly for housing. The government is therefore taking action to reduce uncertainty and boost confidence.

PROPOSALS TO REDUCE THE TAXATION OF INVESTMENT INCOME AND INTEREST RATES TO BORROWERS

Tonight, I am tabling a consultative document containing proposals which, if implemented, would have the following major effects:

—Canadians investing funds in a new form of term deposit would not be taxed on that part of interest that only reflects the rate of inflation.

—Canadians investing funds in new plans for purchase of common shares of Canadian corporations would not be taxed on that part of the capital gain on such shares that only reflects inflation.

• (2040)

—Buyers of new homes would be able to secure mortgages at significantly reduced interest rates—3 to 6 percentage points lower than prevailing rates.

—Small businesses, farmers and fishermen would be able to secure loans for new capital investment at similarly reduced interest rates.

—Canadian corporations would have improved access to risk capital.

These proposals would introduce major innovations in our tax system as well as in financial markets. The government intends to implement them quickly once their feasibility has been confirmed.

I am creating immediately a committee of prominent Canadians from the financial, legal, accounting and economic communities to examine the proposals and advise me on their feasibility not later than September 30. I also invite interested Canadians to forward their comments to me directly. I want to make it clear that this consultative process reflects the more open process on major tax initiatives which I advocated in my green paper on the budget process. I regard this kind of major tax initiative with far-reaching consequences explored by a prominent group of Canadians from the financial, legal, accounting and economic communities.

NOVEMBER 1981 BUDGET MEASURES

I am tabling today a comprehensive notice of Ways and Means motions relating to the November 1981 budget. The notice contains the income tax legislation in draft form to allow for a review of the draft amendments by those affected before the final tax bill is introduced.

The proposed legislation will go a long way to improve our tax system. The November measures have been far-reaching and controversial. Since November, I have attempted, after extensive consultations, to accommodate legitimate concerns that have been raised. I have already announced a number of changes to my original proposals. The notice I am tabling reflects these changes. I am also making further modifications, including the following:

—The 12½-per-cent corporate distributions tax applicable to small business will be postponed for one year to January 1, 1983.

—The proposals related to the deduction of interest expense will be reviewed, and their effective date will not be before 1983.

—The proposed automobile standby charge has been reduced from 2½ per cent to 2 per cent.

—The rules on the restriction of interest expense will not apply to commitments relating to employee share-purchase loans undertaken prior to November 12, 1981.

—Modifications have been made to the proposals relating to forward-averaging for artists and athletes.

—Other changes have been made relating to corporate reorganizations and loans to non-resident corporations.

The draft legislation does not contain provisions affecting life insurance or charitable foundations. The precise drafting of these income tax amendments has been delayed because of extensive and successful discussions with representatives of these groups. I have already announced a mutually satisfactory solution on the taxation of charitable foundations. I am also making public today a revised approach which preserves the objectives of the November measure relating to life insurance which is acceptable to the life insurance companies.

This disposes of tax issues arising from the November budget. With these uncertainties removed, it will be more evident that the taxation of business and investment income in Canada compares favourably with that of any other country in the world.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Last November, I made public a budget paper in which the government outlined its approach to economic development. The directions set out in that paper continue to guide government policy. As was stated in the budget paper, the objective the government is pursuing through the Foreign Investment Review Act is to ensure that foreign-controlled corporations serve the Canadian interest by contributing fully to the development of an innovative and internationally competitive industrial structure. This is a reasonable goal to which the government remains fully committed.

At the same time, the Foreign Investment Review Act must be administered to adhere to the objectives established by Parliament. Its procedures must be timely and efficient. In particular, efforts must be made to avoid red tape and extended delays.

With this in mind, the government has decided the following:

First, the threshold for review under the small business procedures will be raised from $2 million and 100 employees to $5 million and 200 employees for new investment or direct acquisitions in Canada.

Second, where a foreign-controlled Canadian company is acquired in the course of the acquisition of its parent or another foreign-controlled company, the small business procedures threshold will be $15 million and 600 employees.

Third, small business investments will not be subject to the full review procedure except in exceptional circumstances, where the investment appears to raise important policy issues.

For applications which are subject to a full review, other administrative measures will be introduced to provide greater clarity about the interpretation of the Act and to simplify the internal decision-making procedures. The agency will confine its examination of undertakings to the key elements of an investment proposal.

On a related subject, the government is aware that international investors are concerned about the capacity of the Canadian balance of payments to absorb the pace of Canadianization in the energy sector under the National Energy Program. I would like to note, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did in his recent NEP update, that we are ahead of our Canadianization goals. The 50 per cent target for 1990 remains, but we do not need, and do not intend, to press the pace of Canadianization of foreign energy holdings in the years immediately ahead.

I also wish to announce our intention to extend for three years the exemption from the non-resident withholding tax on interest paid abroad. This removes an element of uncertainty that might have impeded capital inflows.

ACTIONS TO CREATE JOBS AND SUSTAIN ACTIVITY

The third thrust of this budget is action to reduce unemployment and to provide support to sectors hard hit by the recession and by high interest rates. Unemployment is imposing high costs in human, social, and economic terms. Sectors such as small business, housing, farming and fishing are deeply affected by weak demand and by the high cost of borrowing. The government is responding to these needs.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMIC PROGRAMS

The government will use direct employment and economic programs to provide jobs this year and next.

—I am announcing a $200 million allocation to direct employment programs.

—I am announcing $150 million, which was allocated earlier, for increased spending on localized, employment-intensive projects under existing government construction and other programs.

Together with more than $100 million available from existing Employment and Immigration allocations, this will provide more than $450 million for direct job creation.

• (2050)

—I am also announcing the allocation of a further $300 million to economic development programs that create permanent private sector jobs through levered investment incentives.

This expenditure of more than $750 million will ensure that additional jobs are created quickly, and targetted especially to areas which have been particularly hard hit by the recession or by longer-run adjustment problems.

HOUSING

I am announcing a five-point package of new and expanded housing programs. These programs will stimulate residential construction and job creation.

First, the government will provide grants of $3,000 to all purchasers of new houses on which construction starts before December 31, 1982, and to first-time buyers who purchase an existing house before that date. It is estimated that 100,000 purchasers will be eligible for this grant. The total cost of this new program is $300 million.

Second, the initial $30 million allocation to the home renovation plan will be doubled to $60 million.

Third, I announce that the annual allocation for non-profit and co-operative housing will be increased from 25,000 units to 27,500 units in 1982. This is in recognition of the fact that the housing needs of low-income Canadians deserve special attention.

These initiatives are expected to generate some 65,000 jobs over the next two years.

Fourth, 54,000 additional jobs are expected to result from the Canada Rental Support Plan for the construction of new rental units in tight markets. This program was introduced last November and doubled in size to 30,000 units in March. It has been suggested that the $7,500 interest-free loans offered under this program may not be high enough in some markets. The government is prepared to show some flexibility on this matter. Project commitments under this program will soon be announced.

Finally, I announce that the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan introduced last November will be extended to December 31, 1983. All home owners having to spend more than 30 per cent of their gross income as a result of renewals taking place after tonight will be eligible for a grant of up to $3,000. It will no longer be necessary to defer interest before becoming eligible for a grant.

The Minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will shortly provide the details of these housing initiatives.

INTEREST ASSISTANCE FOR SMALL BUSINESSES, FARMERS AND FISHERMEN

I am announcing an important new program to reduce interest costs for small businesses undertaking new investment. $400 million are being allocated to this program.

The expansion of many small businesses has been halted by high interest rates. Grants will therefore be made to cover 4 percentage points of interest charges, over a period of two years, on loans extended by financial institutions to both incorporated and unincorporated small businesses. The eligibility rules will be similar to those for the Small Business Development Bond.

The Small Business Development Bond program that expired at the end of last year exempted financial institutions from tax on interest on loans for new investment or financial difficulty. In order to target available tax benefits to those small businesses most in need of assistance, the November 1981 budget confined the tax exemption to loans made to small businesses in financial difficulty. Eligibility was also extended to farmers, fishermen and other unincorporated businesses.

This small business bond tax provision continues. The program now being introduced is a new direct expenditure program. It will supplement the financing available under the small business bond program to firms in financial difficulty. It will not be constrained by the tax position of financial institutions. Farmers and fishermen, whether incorporated or not, will be eligible for the new small business investment grants.

In addition, the government is providing $100 million more for assistance to farmers in financial difficulty. This allocation from the government will permit the Farm Credit Corporation to make loans totalling $200 million over and above those provided for in the November budget. The loans will carry the regular rate of interest of the FCC, but a rebate amounting to 4 percentage points will be extended for a period of two years.

The details of these programs will be announced shortly by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Lapointe), and the Minister of Agriculture, (Mr. Whelan).

CONTAINING THE DEFICIT

As I indicated at the outset, I was determined to find ways of creating jobs and sustaining economic activity without adding to the deficit. This goal has been achieved. The actions I just announced will be costly, but they will be more than fully covered by reallocations of expenditures and tax changes.

[Translation]

Let me sum up by listing the items on both sides of the balance, We are providing:

—an additional $200 million for direct job creation programs,

—an additional $300 million for job creation through economic development programs,

—$400 million for housing stimulus and mortgage assistance,

—$500 million for interest assistance to small businesses, farmers, and fishermen.

In addition:

—the increase in the Child Tax Credit will reduce revenues by $250 million,

—the adjustments to the November budget will reduce revenues by some $325 million,

—$350 million should be allowed for the first-year revenue reduction from the proposals on taxation of investment income.

These additional expenditure initiatives and revenue reductions total $2.3 billion over this year and next.

Offsetting these costs are:

—the $800 million savings from the public sector compensation restraint program,

—the $360 million savings from limiting indexing on expenditure programs,

—the $580 million in savings from other expenditure reductions and deferrals, and —the $1.3 billion from limiting indexation of the personal income tax system.

[English]

Together, these savings and revenue measures provide $3 billion. In 1982-83, the costs of new initiatives and the funds made available are both about $800 million. In 1983-84, funds made available exceed the costs of new initiatives by almost $800 million. These savings will be taken into account when we reassess the economic and fiscal situation next fall.

• (2100)

This method of financing the government's actions is a concrete application of the principles of solidarity and sharing. Some Canadians are being asked to give up certain benefits to help the unemployed and troubled sectors of the economy.

I would like now to table the comprehensive notice of Ways and Means motion related to the November, 1981 budget as well as a notice of ways and means motion related to the measures announced this evening. I would ask for the consent of the House to table the budget papers and paper for consultation entitled "Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income". I also ask for the consent of the House to include in Hansard the standard table which provides the projections of the government's fiscal position.

Madam Speaker: Does the House give its unanimous consent to the tabling of the documents mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ROAD TO RECOVERY

Mr. MacEachen: To break inflation, to boost confidence, to create jobs, to hold the line on the deficit: these are the goals of the action plan the government is proposing to Canadians.

The recession compels us to face reality. Too many of us, one way or another, have been taking too much out of the economic system for too long. This is hurting all of us. Now we must take less so that the economy may grow again.

Even in the best of circumstances, recovery will take time. And the government alone cannot do the job.

Some say the government should print more money. Others say it should let the deficit rip.

But that would fail miserably. Inflation and unemployment would get worse. Interest rates would rise even more. Canada would price itself out of world markets. Recovery would be postponed.

Still others say the government should order every detail of everyone's economic life, fix every price and set every wage bargain.

But is that what Canadians want?

The choice is ours. On the one hand, the road to recovery; on the other, a further slide into recession or a controlled economy.

The government has pointed the way to recovery, but it alone cannot get Canada on the move. We must tackle this task together.

That is why the Prime Minister has proposed to meet with the Premiers later this week to seek their support and participation in the action plan I have announced tonight.

That is why the government will seek consultations with business and labour on implementation of the strategy to break inflation and get the economy growing again.

That is why ministers and Members of Parliament will be enlisting the support and participation of all Canadians in moving from the 12 per cent world of recession to the 6 per cent world of recovery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, this is not a budget. It is another update of a budget which failed last November, and this one is going to fail again. We have a patchwork quilt of certain changes in the November budget plus a few other things the minister has brought in to try to address the very serious problems of the economy, but the solution is just not there. There is a crisis of confidence in this country, and this is not an action plan, as the minister has said. It does not address the crisis of confidence which is so serious in this country today.

Let me address some of the changes in the budget. The minister has brought in this budget eight or ten more changes in the November budget. I believe that totals somewhere between 35 and 40 changes the minister has brought in since the November budget. He has acknowledged the fact that that budget was a mistake and a failure, but he has not withdrawn the balance of the budget. That balance should have been withdrawn in total.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: This budget does not address the most important problem facing the country today. The minister has shown no understanding of the very serious nature of our economic problems. The budget deficit is $20 billion, and the minister says this budget is brought in to address the problem of the size of the budget deficit. That means no more to Canadians than the fact that the minister has said that the November budget was a budget of restraint, and then went on to increase public spending by 22 per cent.

There were major mistakes in the 1980 budget and in the 1981 budget, and there are still mistakes in the 1982 budget. The problems have not been solved, but the damage which has been done to the economy by the changes brought in in the National Energy Program in 1980 and in 1981 by tax reform has been absolutely immense, but still the minister does not have the courage to say to Canadians: "I made a mistake—the last time around, and there are things in that budget I have had to change". Canadians were looking for that. They were looking for an opportunity to feel some sense of kinship with the minister. People do make mistakes, but the minister has not acknowledged that he has understood where he went wrong in that last budget, so he has robbed Canadians today of the hope they were looking for that there will be some turn around and some recongition by the government that there are policies which will bring us to the recovery the minister says is possible. Unfortunately, that recovery is a long way away.

The size of the budget deficit in itself will have a great impact on the confidence of people in the Canadian economy. The $17 billion of cash requirements means that there will be $17 billion worth of competition by the federal government for the very limited sources of capital available for small businessmen, home owners, fishermen, farmers and so forth. That is an immense problem. It will lead to higher interest rates. There is no doubt about that. There is also no doubt, as even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will acknowledge, that high levels of government spending and large government deficits lead to inflation.

Let us look at the saddest element of this budget, and that is the heartless impact it has on the average Canadian. Canadians are being asked to pay for the mistakes of this government in a very major way. There will be a personal tax increase next year of $1.3 billion. There will be a 6 per cent personal tax increase through the loss of half of the indexation Canadians would have expected next year. In addition to that, through the change in the indexation factor in government spending, those who are on spouses' allowances and those who have disability pensions are being asked to pay for the mistakes of this government. That is a shocking answer the minister has given to Canadians. Less than two years ago the minister said to me, in answer to a question in this House: "I will not fight my battles against inflation on the backs of those who cannot afford it and on the backs of those who cannot fend for themselves". That is the type of minister that we have today. The minister has put forward a few job-creation programs, a number of which are a rehash of programs already announced. The fundamental message is that these are short-term programs, although there are not too many details so it is difficult to tell whether they will be effective. They have no relationship to training or to research and development in the ways that we know from work that has been done which show that they will provide lasting answers to job creation in this country. We need long-term job-creation programs directed at the long-term problems of the economy, but they were not in the budget.

Much damage has been done by the delays that this minister has allowed to take place since his 1981 budget. For instance, 224,000 people have lost their jobs. In the six months since the last budget about 6,000 businesses have gone bankrupt and about 11,500 people have gone into personal bankruptcy. Behind those statistics are people who, in effect, have been excommunicated from our system because there is no new employment in the country. That is the cost of the delay and lack of understanding by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) of the basic problems of the country today.

Let me comment now on some of the positive elements of the minister's speech, Madam Speaker. Since last November we have been asking the minister to bring in these positive measures. The Small Business Development Bond comes back in a new form. The mortgage tax credit program, which would have cost Canadians $125 less per month on their mortgage payments, was defeated in the last election but now it is proposed to bring it back in an amended form. It will have basically the same impact. A proposal that was defeated in the 1979 budget would have helped Canadian companies broaden their ownership base in this country without having to go to foreign markets for their investment money. That appears again.

Many of the tax reforms proposed in this budget which are changes from the 1981 budget, appear basically because of pressure from the Conservative opposition, day in and day out, over the last seven months. The proposal to withdraw the small business dividend of 12½ per cent, for instance, is one. Interest deductibility is now in limbo because the minister knows it is not workable, although he has tried ways to make it work. He has tried to find ways of doing it but he knows that it will just not work. The standby charge on automobiles, the employee share purchase plan and the forward-averaging program as well as five or six other changes in the budget that we have been pressing for now appear. We knew they would not work but much damage has been done by the hiatus that resulted from the inactivity when instead, jobs could have been created in the country. Many parts of that budget still stand. We say that the previous budget should have been withdrawn in total when the minister made his statement tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Wilson: Canadians have lost faith in their government. Because of the government's policies the economic situation in Canada has deteriorated to such a degree that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has had to put forward a new budget. We said that the November budget was wrong; it was disastrous for the economy because the approach and the policies were wrong. We were right because tonight, just eight months later the Minister of Finance is presenting a new budget. In fact, the Minister went to great length to embellish the horrors in his November budget.

Now, this budget does not solve all our problems. The deficit will reach $20 billion, and with personal income tax indexing, next year taxes will go up 6 per cent. There is no program for economic growth. In fact, this budget is long in words and short on ideas. The government must resign and give Canadians an opportunity to make their wills known through the electoral process.

[English]

In closing may I just comment on the fact that in 1980 the government began to move this country in a different direction, toward more regulation, more intervention and more involvement in the lives of Canadians and individual Canadian companies. That direction still stands in this budget. In fact, certain parts of this budget move us toward more and more involvement of the government in the lives of Canadians. That must be reversed, Madam Speaker. The only way the Minister of Finance can expect to regain the confidence of individual Canadians and businessmen in the policies of the government will be if he puts more reliance, more understanding and creates more confidence in individual Canadians through their own initiative and desire to create a better life for themselves. If the minister cannot understand that and continues to bring in budgets which ask individual Canadians to pay for the mistakes he is making, then he must resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: There is only one answer, Madam Speaker. The minister laughs. The fact that he is asking Canadians to pay six per cent more in taxes, is asking people on spouses' allowance and those who are disabled to pay more through the loss of indexation, and is asking Canadians who cannot afford it to pay for his mistakes—that is why the minister must resign.

Madam Speaker could I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, under the Standing Orders I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

On motion of Mr. Pinard, the House adjourned at 9.19 p.m.
