up the story of some American fishermen here and there who have not been successful in poaching on our fishing grounds, and they are endorsing those statements and retailing them without any justification. Many of these stories have been proved to be false, and those hon. gentlemen know it, and yet they persist in accusing us, as Nova Scotians or as Canadians, of improper conduct, and they have gone so far as to say that the treatment of the American fishermen was brutal. That statement is unbecoming of them, it is disrespectful to their fellow-countrymen and to the flag under which we live. If those gentlemen desire to be considered as truthful in any respect, they should give up that style of debate. They accuse us of not treating the United States according to national comity. I say that we have treated them far better than we were required to do under the conditions of the treaty, and, when hon. gentlemen present the American side of that treaty to this House, and tell us that we are to be governed by the American view of it, I say they are not speaking in the interests of the people of Canada or of the fishermen of Canada, or in a way that will tend to increase that respect it is our desire we should command as a young nation. Then they talk about reciprocity. The sooner they give up wasting the time of the House in discussing reciprocity, the better. They repeat the old stories which I have heard ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. The hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has repeated the same thing four or five times to my knowledge, and I think he had better devise some new story. It will sound better and will better show that he is honest in this matter. We have heard a great deal about Mr. Hitt's resolution. What is it worth? It is worth just as much as the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was worth in this House yesterday; it is worth about as much as the paper upon which it is written. Who is Mr. Hitt, that we should regulate our legislation here according to his views? Is he the President of the United States, or do his resolutions carry more weight than the views and resolutions of any member of the United States Congress? I can give views which are of some consequence to us, views which are of some consequence in the United States Senate, and, I believe, also with the President of the United States, and those are the views of Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State. He is a man of influence, and, if we take his views into consideration on these commercial matters and on the trade relations between the two countries, we are taking hold of something of weight, something to which we might with some propriety pay attention. Let us see what Mr. Blaine's views are in regard to closer commercial relations with this country. have here his views as he expressed them at a public meeting, either shortly before or just after the election of President Harrison. Mr. Blaine says:

"I am opposed, I am teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag and paying British taxes, and at the same time the actual cash satisfaction of entrance to the American markets."

There can be no doubt that Mr. Blaine holds those views up to this moment. He says:

"They cannot have both at the same time. If they come to us, they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that Mr. FREEMAN.

millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, who have no part or lot with us, but choose to be foreign from us,—it is an absolute wrong for a Democratic Congress to say that they shall have the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have. So far as I can prevent it, I do not mean that they shall be Canadian and American at the same time. They can choose their side of the question and remain there."

Those are his views, and I have no doubt that the President of the United States holds the same While this is the case, talking about reciprocity with the United States, talking about conciliating the Senate of the United States and the American people, talking about regulating our legislation to suit their views, talking about with-holding duties here and there to suit the American people-why, Sir, we are not acting like free men, we are not acting like independent men, we are not acting like those statesmen who have legislated in this Parliament in years not long gone by; I say, we are not looking to our own independence, we are not looking to our own character and to our own position, and to the building up of our own country, if we pay such attention to the people on the other side of the border. I contend, then, that it is to our interest, it is to our dignity, we owe it to ourselves, that we should legislate on the principles that were enunciated an hour or two ago by the Minister of Finance. I was pleased to hear that declaration made by him, and I venture to say, that the great majority of the members of this House were pleased to hear it, the country will be pleased to hear it, and I venture to say, that the electorate of this Dominion will uphold those principles when they next have an opportunity to speak. They will say that our legislation should be guided by the principles enunciated by the Minister of Finance, and, we have every reason to believe, that those principles are held by the right hon. the First Minister and by the other members of the Cabinet. Those are the principles of the party now in power, and if the House consults their own dignity, and the dignity of this young nation, they will adhere to them strictly.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I was rather astonished to hear the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, mention the friends of the American Republic. I hold, Sir, that the strongest friends the American Republic has got in this House, are the Government and their supporters, and they are doing more to create an American sentiment and to kill a national sentiment in Canada, than all other influences combined. We were told that some of us had been up amongst the farmers in the Province of Ontario, talking to them and hearing their reports. I am one of those farmers who live in the Province of Ontario, and have farmed for forty-seven years. I have been up amongst the farmers of that Province, and I know their feeling and sentiments to-day, and I think I will be able to show that the tariff about to be imposed, is not in favor of the Ontario farmers, even in respect to cattle and sheep. I find that last year there were imported of sheep into the Dominion 43,215. Now, let us examine into what parts of Canada these sheep are imported. There was one imported into the Province of Ontario; into Manitoba there were imported 6,742; into British Columbia, 33,816; into the North-West Territories, 2,696. Now, I would ask, what protection the farmers of the older Provinces are getting from the increased duty of 10 per cent. upon sheep, when only one comes into the Province of Ontario, not one into the Province of Quebec, and not one into any of the Lower Provinces. I would ask any of the Lower Provinces. I would ask the representatives from Manitoba, from British Columbia, and from the North-West, whether this increased duty upon sheep is not an injury to the farmers of those Provinces? I would ask if the sheep brought into those Provinces are not for the purpose of stocking their farms, in order that the people may carry on farming? I hold that in this way the Government have retarded the progress of those new countries, by placing enormous duties upon what the farmers really require to stock their farms. Now, we will take cattle. I think I will be able to show, also, that no cattle come into any of the Provinces by which the farmers will be benefited by protection upon them. The total number of cattle imported into the Dominion of Canada from the United States was 748. Of these, 172 came into Manitoba, 551 into British Columbia, and 25 into the North-West Territories. From Great Britain, 59 head of cattle came into the Province of Quebec. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, unless for breeding purposes, not a single head of horned cattle was brought into the older Provinces. Cattle, also, are taken into the new Provinces, where they benefit the farmers and the settlers, and it is imposing an unnecessary tax upon them without benefiting any other class of the community, to place this duty upon cattle, when we take into consideration the great interests that are at stake in Canada, and that the duty that is being imposed upon sheep and cattle is not going to benefit the farmers in any part of Canada, but that there is every prospect that they will be grievously injured. The exports of sheep to Great Britain were 43,477; the exports to the United States were 307,775; and if the United States Government impose 30 per cent. upon sheep in the same manner that the Canadian Government now propose to do, that will destroy our trade in sheep, because I want the Government to understand that this number of sheep going to the States, is composed mostly of lambs, which we cannot export into the British market until they are one or two years old: and that has been one of the most profitable branches of sheep husbandry within these last two or three years, when the farmers could sell their lambs for $4 or $5 a head, as they could do in Ontario this last fall. If that market is destroyed, they must keep their animals, under the present stringent circumstances, and the farmers will labor under a great hardship in that respect. Now, for the 37,360 head of cattle that go into the United States, we have no other market where we could send them, under the present circumstances. They are cattle that it will not pay to fatten and take to the English market; they are the scrubs of all the stock fattened in the Province of Ontario, to a great extent. The United States is the only market we have got, and if that duty is imposed in Canada, in all likelihood the United States will raise their tariff to as high a figure, if not higher. $10 a head on cattle would entirely prevent stock of that description from being exported from the Province of Ontario to the United States. I hold that it is in the true interests of the Canadian farmer to-day to relax the duties as far as we can, if we cannot get them entirely removed from between these two great countries. The interest of the Canadian farmers is to get free trade with the United States, or reciprocity in natural products, at least, but if possible, in all products, both agricultural and manufactured. I can assure the Government that if this present tariff goes into effect it will cause a feeling in the Province of Ontario, at least, that will not be very easily allayed. They feel that the present Government is imposing burden after burden upon the agriculturists and upon the laboring men of this country, whose burdens are already too grievous to be borne, without benefiting to any extent any class of the commu-The item we are discussing will not benefit nity. the farmers in any part of Canada, and in the newer Provinces it will injure them to a great

Mr. LANDERKIN. I sympathise, to some extent, with the Minister of Finance. He had a splendid opportunity of doing something for his country this time. He came before Parliament and boasted he had a surplus; he regretted that the condition of the country was not all that might be desired, and apparently his surplus was not as much as he desired; and, although from one end of the country to the other there was a feeling of hard times sorely felt among almost every class of the community, the Minister, with what some of his friends would call a stroke of statesmanship, endeavored to improve the hard times by adding to the taxes of the people something like half a million dollars. This is one way of making the people better off, and it is the idea of the Minister of Finance that when he has a surplus from the revenue taken out of the pockets of the people, and when the people are complaining of hard times, that, in order to do something for the country and show that he is alive to its wants and necessities, he should come down with a tariff imposing another half million of taxes. The people are more heavily taxed now, I regret to say, than the people of almost any other civilised country in the world; indeed, I know of no country with a population of five millions which has to bear such enormous burdens as those of Canada. We have a land of which we feel proud, we have a land of great possibilities, and of great resources; but we are oppressed by taxation, and by a system of government which is restrictive in its character, tending to delay, retard and interfere with the development of the great resources we possess. We have latterly had considerable trade with our neighbors to the south of us, and it has been a valuable trade to our people. The Americans are our best customers in farm products, in everything we produce in the mines, and they are almost our only customers in everything we produce in the forests. But the Minister of Finance is cheered by his friends behind him, when he tells this House and the country that those articles that go free into the United States and which were made free by the Finance Minister who preceded him, a gentleman who had had large parliamentary experience, and who was imbued with the idea that greater freedom of trade should prevail, should no longer be free. The late Minister of Finance, after members on that side of the House had risen in their places and declared that those articles mentioned in that list should not go free, the then Finance Minister came down the next day and issued a proclamation to place them on the free list. had the courage to do that which was in the best interests of the country at that time. To-day we have the statement of the Finance Minister. He says Canada is going on regardless of what is proceeding in the world around us; and the hon. gentleman appears to fold his arms and close his eves, and not take cognisance of the great events transpiring, and he says, that is the manner in which the country should be governed. We desire en-lightened statesmanship, action which will keep us abreast of the times and in harmony with the trade of the world. The hon. gentleman says that what they do in the United States or any other country is a matter of no consequence to us; we are going to govern Canada for the Canadians. And it appears we are going to limit the trade of Canada if we can, for that would be almost the only result of the tariff, and the further fact that it would impose more taxes on the people. If the hon, gentleman had been in Parliament some years ago, he would have known that the policy at that time was a different one. In 1879 there was placed a statutory offer on the Statute-book, and in that offer the Government pledged themselves that, so soon as the United States should remove the duty from certain articles mentioned, the Dominion Government would do the same. The Finance Minister came down and redeemed the honor of Canada and maintained its statutory offer; for, although the change was long delayed, and it was said the Americans had taken the duty off three years before our action was taken, yet by the strenuous efforts of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the Finance Minister rose in his place, issued a proclanation and had the duties removed. In view of the policy enunciated by the Minister of Finance to-day he should take this statutory offer from the Statute-book, for the standing offer is a standing falsehood, and for the honor of Canada it should be blotted out this Session. The hon. gentleman may, perhaps, not take as deep an interest in Canada as some other hon. members, for perhaps it is not his birthplace and home, and perhaps he does not feel that we regard the statutory offer as a bond of honor and good faith; but, at all events, if it is not taken off, it should be adhered to in so far as the Americans have adhered to it.

An hon. MEMBER. You did not accept it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You accept whatever the Government tell you to accept. That is one of the difficulties that surround this matter; it is one of the difficulties of partyism. The hon. gentlemen on the back benches will accept anything, whether it is against this country or not, so long as it tends to keep the party in power. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House, or any man in this country, who believes that if it was only in the interest of trade that such a tariff should see the light of day, it would have been submitted, if it was not that it would tend to perpetuate the reign of the present party in power? The country was never considered when this tariff was conceived. This is not a policy which should be adopted in this stage of the world. We should have freedom politically and freedom in commerce; we should be free in trade, so far as it is possible in keeping with the revenue for the government of this country. We should possess all those privileges that are desirable in the interests of trade and commerce. Any other policy is calculated to be detrimental to the best interests of the country and should not be tolerated by this House. This policy of tying the hands of the people, of limiting trade, and, of going back to old exploded theories to govern this country, is something in this enlightened age which should not receive the support of the majority of members of this House. It is a standing menace to the progress of this age to think that we keep on the Statute-book a tariff in itself oppressive, cruel and disastrous to the trade and commerce of the country, and it is high time that this Government should awaken to the necessity of removing a tariff so objectionable in nearly all its features. We want in this country—we on this side of the House at least want—to see this country freed from the shackles imposed upon it by this Government. We believe that with our great resources this country is destined to take its place among the nations of the earth, if we only have freedom and liberty to work out our own destiny. The other day when I was travelling up to Toronto, I was studying a map of this country, and I was as convinced, as I am convinced I am standing here, that if we had a more enlightened system of government, if we had a tariff framed in the interest of this Dominion, we would have before long the greatest country on this continent. There is no gentleman who studies the map of Canada but who will see at once, that if we had freedom of trade, Montreal and Toronto are bound to become the most important cities on this continent. It is only this system of restriction of trade which will prevent these cities attaining the growth and dimensions we would like to see them attain. The policy of this Government has had the effect of damming the grain trade back to Chicago, and the distribution of grain which we used to have at Montreal and Toronto has gone from them now. The Minister of Finance knows that the Board of Trade of Montreal does not now publish the report of the business done in the grain business there, as they did for years formerly. I studied these reports from year to year, as I was interested in the trade done by that city, but, recently, when I sent to the library, I found there was no report published after the year 1884. I asked why this was the case? and I was answered that the secretary had died, and they apparently have not had a secretary since, so there is no report of the distribution of grain and supplies from Montreal now. Montreal used to be a great distributing point, but the tariff wall has dammed back that distribution to Chicago, and Chicago is now growing at the expense of both Montreal and Toronto. Now, Sir, about retaliation. The Minister of Finance, and some others, may consider it statesmanship to quarrel with our best customers, to whom we sell more natural products and other produce of our country than we do to any other. The Minister of Finance may have discoveredbut I do not know that the country has yet discovered it—that if we have a good customer we should strike him in the face or offend him in some such way. If the hon. Minister of Finance, with that intuition with which he seems to be eminently endowed, has discovered that this is a way to "foster" trade, and to develop the resources of the country, he has made a very extraordinary discovery indeed. The United States are our best customers generally and it should be the policy of the Government to keep them as such. Let us consider our imports and exports in cattle. sider our imports and exports horses, sheep and swine to the United States and to England. We imported from England these animals to the value of $21,698, and from the United States we imported to the value of $286,861. We exported to England to the value of $5,226,508, and to the United States $3,531,230. Does the hon. Minister of Finance imagine that he is going to increase that trade by increasing the duties; or does he imagine, as he says he does, that this increase of duty will not invite retaliation? He seems to think that, if he raises the tariff against the United States, the Government of that country will not meet him on his own ground. It may be possible that they will not, but if they do, it would be just what would be expected by any man who holds a correct idea of the existing relations between the two countries. If this Government raised the duty, it is but natural to suppose that the United States will follow the same course, and after the warning the hon. Minister of Finance has received, it will be useless for him to say: "When I raised this tariff, nobody in this country conceived that it was done through a spirit of retaliation." The hon. Minister of Finance is not so young in politics as not to know that retaliation from us will provoke retaliation by the United States. He could not delude the youngest child of intelligence in this country with such sophistry as that, for he knows very well that if we raise the tariff, the United States, in all human probability, will retaliate. We are not depending on the United States; we have grand resources of our own; but from a business standpoint, or from a national standpoint either, we do not wish that any policy should be adopted which will provoke a feeling of irritation in the United States. If the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Customs beside him -who, since he got into power, has been rather mild in his temper, rather courteous in his demeanor, and rather statesmanlike to some extentif they have the idea that the people of this country, or that the business men of this country, believe that it is to the best interest of Canada to have quarrels and irritation existing between us and the United States, I say to both hon. gentlemen that they are very much mistaken, and that I, for one, have no sympathy with any such policy. I believe it is best for us, as Canadians, that we should maintain our rights and stand firm for our country, but, at the same time, that we should give no unnecessary offence. I believe it is a mistake for the Government to pursue this policy which they are pursuing, and pursuing it, as I am told, because they are forced to do so by hon. gentlemen who sit behind them, from a monetary consideration. I do not wish that the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Customs should become craven to the United States. I do not want that, and no gentleman on this side of the House wants it; but we have seen the time when some of the hon. gentlemen who sit behind the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of

States and ate humble pie—when the late Finance Minister, Sir Charles Tupper, brought in this enactment. With regard to this tariff, I am under the impression that the best interests of Canada demand that we shall have no tariff except for revenue purposes. I believe the people of this country at present are convinced that this high protective tariff is against the best interests of this country. I believe the most matured minds of this country—always excepting the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Customs-believe that it is detrimental to the best interests of this country to keep up this protective system any longer, and I believe it is the duty of the members of this House to remove the tariff which is pressing so heavily on the people. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), last night spoke of the Reciprocity Treaty under which this country had such good times, and he then uttered something which almost all the people of this country know. The late Minister of Finance was one of those who believed that reciprocity was the best thing for this country; so was the hon. First Minister. My hon, friend the President of the Council, was, at one time, in favor of it also. My hon, friend at one time said that protection was legalised robbery, and uttered some other truths in reference to this system—that the country should understand that the days of protection in this country were doomed, and the members of this House should unite in opposing a system which has done nothing but injure this country ever since it was initiated. Of course, it is a little difficult to convince all our friends of the soundness of our views. One hon, gentleman got up the other night, and if I tell you what he said, it will, perhaps, show you the difficulty we labor under in trying to convert some of them. It was the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). If I remember aright, that hon. gentleman was one of those who last year, to a certain extent, relinquished party. He was led to believe that under the guise of party a great deal of evil was perpetrated in this country, and he thought the time had come when he should withdraw his allegiance from the party with which he had formerly acted. Well, he was a very respectable man, and I did not wonder at that; I gave him credit for high motives. But, the other day, when he was speaking, the old Adam appeared pretty strongly in him again. He was speaking about something my hon. friend from North Norfolk had said in regard to those grangers who had believed the National Policy would give them better prices, and who were so green down below that they had to be hung up awhile to dry. The hon member for Muskoka, speaking of them, told us a story of a Norseman who was ill, and who sent for his missionary and asked him where his ancesters were; the missionary told him that they must be in hell burning, when the Norseman answered, "Well, I prefer to remain and burn with my ancestors, to accepting your doctrine." So the hon, member for Muskoka said, "I prefer to remain with Pluto in his dark dominions with the Tories and protection, rather than enjoy the glory of heaven with the Grits and reciprocity." Well, when we have such material as that to work upon, you can understand what a formidable task we have in trying to convert hon. gentlemen opposite. When they prefer to rule in Customs became craven enough to the United hell, to serving in heaven on this side, the task may well appear hopeless. But we have done it before; we have converted some hard shells before, and we are not going to relinquish the task until we do it again. We believe there is hope for this country, and its brightest hope is in reducing the tariff to a revenue tariff, when these antiques who govern this country will have to give place to enlightened, liberal and progressive statesmen.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is quite clear, from the remarks that fell from the hon. Minister of Finance this afternoon, that the Government are disposed to act in a stand-off manner towards the Government of the United States. With regard to the statement he made that there is no indication on the part of the United States Government of a desire to enter into closer trade relations with Canada, I think the history of this country, and the facts which have come before this House, abundantly show that that statement is not correct. I think it is quite clear that the Government feel that they are so closely and absolutely committed to the maintenance of the National Policy in this country, that they are ready to sink or swim as a Government on that policy. If they fancy that they are going to catch the farmer's vote by imposing a restrictive duty on the cattle coming into this country, I think the farmers of this country will see through the hollowness and the mockery of any such proposition. The statement presented to the House by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) shows clearly that the importation of cattle at the present time is very slight, and the importation of sheep into the older Provinces is virtually nothing. In the face of that fact, the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance that the Government do not wish to be understood as making this change in the tariff in any spirit of retaliation, but simply for the purpose of protecting the interests of this Dominion, is mere mockery. It shows nothing less than a disposition on the part of this country to retaliate, and our Government take this course because they do not desire that a friendly spirit should grow up be-tween this country and the United States, lest they might be placed in the awkward dilemma of having to refuse a proposition from the Government of that country for unrestricted reciprocity. They are exceedingly anxious not to encourage the making any overtures by that country. In every little incident which has transpired in connection with their readjustments of the tariff as regards articles coming from the United States, they have shown the most contemptible desire to act meanly and do all in their power to prevent the United States from being disposed to hold out to us any reasonable offer of trade. The statutory offer which has been referred to by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin), remained on our Statute-books for over two years after the United States had removed from their dutiable list certain articles which we produce. Yet, until the attention of this Government was drawn to the fact by Lord Sackville, the British Minister at Washington, that they had not complied with their statutory offer, they never made a single move to meet the United States in the direction of freer interchange of trade; and it was only when they were placed in such a tight position that they had, either by their own act to rescind that statu-Mr. LANDERKIN.

of the duties, that they consented to take the latter course. Every step these hon. gentlemen have taken has been in the direction of propping up as much as possible their so-called National Policy. Why, Sir, two years ago the Minister of Finance moved an amendment to a motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), which amendment clearly indicated that this Government were not willing to have an interchange of trade with the Americans, should it in any wise interfere with the operation of the National Policy. The following is the amendment:—

"That Canada, in the future as in the past, is desirous of cultivating extended trade relations with the United States, in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various industries of this Dominion, which was adopted in 1879, and which has since received in so marked a manner the approval of the Canadian people." It is clear, therefore, that the existence of the National Policy is, in their view, a consideration supreme over all others. If they could by any possibility maintain that policy, and secure at the same time some little concessions from the Americans which would benefit our farming community, they would be willing to accept these concessions, but the National Policy must be maintained at all hazards and at all cost, whether the farmers suffer by it or not, and it has been clearly proved that they do suffer, and are continually becoming poorer under its baneful influence. Every change made in the tariff has been in the direction of assisting the manufacturer and of making worse the condition of the farmer. But the Government became alive this Session to their danger; they began to scent defeat, and to realise that unless they did something to please the farming community, if possible, they might, when they next sought the suffrages of the people, not meet with those successes which they have met with in the past, and on which they so often pride themselves. In order, therefore, to persuade the farmers that they are at last going to make them rich, they have taken the same course which has been adopted by the protectionists in the United States. The Republican party in the United States gained office, and have been maintained in office, by the American manufacturers and combines; and though, in the last elections, the vote of the people, taken as a whole, went against them, the majority against them was set at naught by manipulations of one kind or another. Warned by this vote, however, and feeling certain that, unless they can make some pretence of showing sympathy with the farming community, the probability is they will not be successful, even by their manipulations, in being returned to office for another term, they are endeavoring to make their tariff in some degree appear to benefit the farmers. I believe the course they have taken is not dietated by any opposition to freer trade relations with Canada, but simply by the fact, that they find themselves in the same position as hon. gentlemen opposite, and feel that, although they owe their office to the combines, they must make some strenuous endeavor to conciliate the farming community. In this view they have adopted a policy which is calculated to have injurious effects on this country, and in the same view hon. gentlemen opposite have imposed a duty on cattle coming into Canada, but the farmers of this country will see through the hollowness of their efforts. see through the hollowness of their efforts.

have been too long deluded and deceived to be any longer led astray. They are intelligent enough to see for themselves that such a policy cannot be of the slightest benefit so far as their interests are concerned, for if they take up the returns, they will find that there are virtually no cattle imported into this country at all. If the Government are really disposed to assist the farmer, let them admit corn free, and thus give our farmers a chance to feed cattle for export to the British market. they do not want to do that. They pretend to want to keep out American cattle, when in reality none come in. They have put a duty on American sheep, when only one sheep was imported from the United States into Ontario last year. I hold that the Government are acting purposely with the object of hoodwinking the farmer, but they will realise when the time comes for the people tomake their voice heard, that the farmers have been hoodwinked too long and are now alive to the situation: I must express my regret that the Government show this determination to act in no reasonable spirit towards the United States. I do not say for a moment that the United States have acted in that generous, high-spirited, honorable manner towards us which would be consistent with the position they occupy, but I hold that a people like ourselves, composed of only 5,000,000, and doing a large business with the Americans, who furnish us with our principal markets for our commodities, cannot afford to do anything which will restrict our trade in these markets. We are driven through necessity to trade with the United States, and in place of taking a course which tends to prevent closer trade relations being had with that country, and which is calculated to strain the kindly feeling that ought to exist between the two peoples, we ought to adopt the opposite course, and in this way help the straitened agriculturists of this country by securing to them free access to the American markets.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I cannot see the reason for the proposed increase in the duties. We have a large surplus, and I cannot see the reason why the Finance Minister thinks proper to increase the taxation which is already weighing upon the country. The other day the Finance Minister rejoiced at the large surplus, and offered it to us as a subject of congratulation, almost as a blessing for which we should thank Divine Providence, as if that money had fallen from Heaven like the manna which fed the Israelites in the desert. But we know the surplus is only the result of the moneys which have been extracted uselessly from the pockets of the people. With that surplus in hand, why is this increase in taxation demanded? Certainly the necessities of the public service do not require it. Does the Minister fear that the receipts from the Customs during the next year will not be sufficient to fill the public exchequer as they have in the past? Does he fear a deficit? That would be evidence that he is not so confident of the prosperity of the country as he professed to be; but the hon, gentleman has told the House this afternoon that the reason for this new increase of duty was to protect the different classes of this country. I can understand that a large portion of this increased duty is intended to foster the interests of the manufacturers who seem to have been, for a series of years, the pets of the Government, as if the prosperity of the country depended principally upon the prosperity of a certain class of manufacturers; but we might infer from the imposition of duties upon cattle and sheep imported in this country, that the Finance Minister pretends to give to the farmers a compensation for the heavy duties which have been imposed upon them in favor of the manufacturers. I regret to say, for the success of the scheme of the hon. gentleman, that the duties he proposes to impose on the importation of cattle and sheep, will do nothing to foster the interests of the farmer. It has already been shown, that we import a very small number of sheep and horned cattle. British Columbia, Manitoba and the North-West Territories are the only parts of the Dominion that import sheep and cattle, and they do so on account of the great distance which lies between them and the Province of Ontario. I venture to say that, notwithstanding the increase in the duty, they will prefer still to import from the States lying along their frontier, than to obtain their cattle and sheep from Ontario. But the other Provinces do not import these animals, and, while these new Provinces import a comparatively small number of them, the other Provinces export a large quantity to the United States. In fact the United States are our only foreign market for horses, sheep, wool, potatoes, poultry, eggs and hay. For the Province of Quebec especially, the exportation of hay is very important. In fact it is the main article of farm produce for the largest portion of that Province. During the Easter recess, like other members, I was at home. I met some farmers, and I find they are very anxious in regard to this matter. In that part of the country, as in most parts of the country, the farmers are in an impecunious condition, because of the small crop which they have raised and the low prices offered for what they have to sell. The only large crop they had was hay. In the southern part of the Province of Quebec, the farmers for many years have adopted the habit of producing as much hay as they can, and the only foreign market in which they can sell it is the New England States. This last year we had an abundance of hay, and very low prices are offered for it, and if this duty of $4 a ton which is proposed in the American Congress is carried, I tell the House, in all sincerity, that it will be very disastrous to our farmers for several years. I have said that the American market is the only market for a large quantity of our farm produce. By the Returns of Trade and Navigation, I see that our whole importation last year, under the head of animals and their products, and of farm produce was for the sum of $37,308,818, of which there was paid by the United States $16,262,713, or nearly 50 per cent. of the value of the whole export. I think that, with these facts before us, we cannot ignore the truth that the American market is the best market we have for the sale of a large quantity of our farm produce. If the Finance Minister persists in imposing these duties, I am afraid it will be taken advantage of by those in the American Congress who are in favor of an increased duty on the produce of the farm; I am afraid it may be used to justify the policy which they advocate, involving a duty of $4 a ton on hay, 30 per cent. on horses, cattle and sheep, 5 cents a dozen upon eggs, 25 cents a bushel upon potatoes, 30 cents a bushel on barley. This would be disastrous to the whole of this country. I believe that the policy of this Gevernment should be conciliatory, and not such as could be quoted by the advocates of increased duties in the States as justifiable ground for retaliation. The duty proposed to be placed on sheep and cattle will produce no revenue. It will afford no protection to the farmers of this country. If we imported sheep and cattle largely from the United States for home consumption, the duty might afford some protection, but these animals are imported in so small a quantity, comparatively, that the duty can have no effect in affording protection to the farmers of this country. Sir, I repeat that I fear that the policy adopted by this Government will provoke retaliatory measures on the other side of the line. I think our policy, on the contrary, should be one of conciliation, and that this Government should already have taken means to prevent the hostile legislation which has been initiated in the American Congress against this country.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I must express my regret at the course the Government seems to think it necessary to pursue in reference to the tariff now before the House, and more especially do I regret the very harsh manner in which the Finance Minister closed his remarks previous to recess. know full well that the Government of the day have entirely changed the views they entertained at the time they were in Opposition, when it was their avowed policy to obtain what was termed reciprocity of trade, or reciprocity of tariffs, and when they avowed their policy to be that, failing in obtaining from the American people a reciprocity of trade, that would be fair and just to the people of Canada, they would raise our tariff in such a manner as to put pressure or coercion upon the American people, and compel them to concede reciprocal trade between the two nations. the Finance Minister charged upon this side of the House, that he held the members almost criminal who would refer to this matter, I say he made a charge that was not justified by anything said on this side of the House. A remark of that kind, falling from a Minister holding the prominent position in the Cabinet, next to that of the First Minister in the Government of this country, and in respect to the tariff before the House, was unjustifiable, and cannot fail to have a bad effect. And if there be no other reason, if the tariff would not have the effect that, perhaps, he desires it to have, the remark that he made, going broadcast to the American people, will have the effect of inducing that hostility towards the people of Canada which, no doubt, his remark was intended to provoke. When the hon, gentlemen were in Opposition they held very different views from those which they entertain now, but still we have heard from them no repudiation of the views they formerly entertained when they moved their famous resolution upon which the tariff has been founded. resolution was couched in the following terms:

resolution was couched in the following terms:—

"That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion, that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will Mr. BÉCHARD.

encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, would greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade."

That was the resolution upon which the First Minister went to the country at the time that he succeeded in misleading the majority of the electors of Canada, and there is no doubt they will sincerely regret to the latest day that they were misled. This was the principle adopted at that time, these were the views entertained, not only by the First Minister, but by all his followers, and no doubt the Minister of Finance at that time entertained very similar views to the First Minister, when we found the First Minister stating that the object of the tariff was, so far as possible, to induce the American people to grant us reciprocity in trade. Well, the First Minister made other speeches, and let us see how far they were consistent with the views entertained by the Finance Minister to-night. We find him stating, in a famous speech made at Park Hill, where he developed a great deal of the future policy that he was going to carry out when he came into power:

"The feeling in 1865, however, was very strong in favor of doing everything in our power in order to induce the Americans to renew the treaty. The Government did everything it could, and while its members were exerting themselves in that direction it would have been a suicidal course—it would have been thwarting the very purpose in view—if they had increased the taxes at that time, even to inaugurate a national policy. Because the Americans could have said: 'How can we give you a reciprocity treaty when you are increasing the duties on our goods?' Therefore, from year to year, so long as there was any hope of a renewal of the treaty, Canada declined to raise a larger revenue than was absolutely necessary to carry on the government."

Is that a correct principle now? Is it necessary to raise a larger amount of revenue at the present time than is required for expenditure? During that time the Opposition contended, and contended, I suppose, correctly, that it was the duty of the Government to raise no more revenue from the people than was absolutely required to defray the expenses of the Government. Yet we find to-day the Finance Minister stating that if we advocate anything like the principle that they advocated at that time, or if we criticise the course that the Government are pursuing, and contend that it is not in the best interest of Canada, we find him saying that we are criminally to blame, that we are inducing a feeling antagonistic to the best interest of Canada, and creating ill-feeling on the part of the people of the United States. I say, if the principle they advocated then was correct, that principle must be correct to-day. I blame the Government that they boast in glowing terms that they have a surplus of nearly two million dollars. With a surplus in the treasury, I would ask: Is there any necessity of placing upon the Statute-book legislation that may possibly have a very injurious effect upon the relations between Canada and the United States, and that at the very time when there is before the American Congress a Bill threatening to increase the duties against the people of Canada? As it has been stated to-night, let there be 5 cents a dozen placed, for instance, upon eggs; let there be 30 cents a bushel put upon barley; let there be an increased duty placed upon every hog that goes from Canada into the United States, upon cattle and upon everything going into that part of the country—I say it will have one of the most injurious effects upon the people of Canada that any action on the part of this Government has ever had. We will be placed in a position that our best customer will be unable to further trade with us. I therefore, feel that the course that is being pursued, and the remarks that have been made. will all tend to injuriously affect the position of Canada, so far as regards our relations with the people of the United States, and I believe that even now it would be in the interests of this country that the Government should recede from the course they have taken, and allow these resolutions to be so amended as to make the tariff a fair one in the interests of both nations. We do not need the revenue. And why should we place legislation on the Statute-book to irritate the people on the other side? There can be no other object; hon, gentlemen opposite must desire to create hostile feelings with the United States. There can be no other motive on the part of the Government than to seek to prevent that reciprocal trade which we desire to see brought about; no better course can be pursued than the one they are now following. They, no doubt, have been stimulated in this course by the resolution of Mr. Hitt, showing that the American people are holding out to us the olive branch and are ready to give us fair terms in any reciprocal arrangement. In to-night's Globe there is a statement of the means by which Mr. Blaine is arranging that any nation on the American continent can have reciprocal trade with the people of the United States without going to Congress for it; and with that offer held out to us, it is in our interest to so legislate as to maintain friendly feelings between these two nations, and I am, therefore, strongly opposed to the resolutions submitted to this Committee.

Mr. MULOCK. Just before six o'clock I ventured to ask the Finance Minister why he proposed to place an increased duty on sheep, and I was more than surprised at the spirit he manifested in his reply, and I was infinitely disappointed also at the tenor of his remarks. I asked a question that was entirely pertinent to his proposal, and the reply we received was a torrent of words, a torrent of abuse upon the party on this side of the House, because I proposed a question, and I did not expect that in endeavoring to discharge what I conceived to be my duty to my constituents, I would be classed among criminals by the Minister of Finance. However, I do not wonder at his having brought forward that argument on that occasion, because it is probably the only reply he was capable of furnishing. He had no meritorious answer, and he fell back on the only remaining one. I ask the hon, gentleman again, as the Finance Minister of Canada, if it is possible for him to turn from the old reply and tell us why he is imposing that duty? There can be but one or two possible reasons. It must be either for protective or for revenue purposes or for both. He has told us before that it is not necessary for revenue purposes. He has told us he has a large surplus this year and anticipates a large one next year, and therefore it is not for revenue purposes. We have shown him that, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the increased duty is not required for protective purposes. Perhaps he has not studied his own Trade and Navigation Returns.

I have gone through them since six o'clock in regard to this question, and I will give him the figures both of the imports and exports of sheep, and he will see that an increased duty is not at all necessary for protective purposes or for what is called the maintenance of the National Policy. During the fiscal year closing in June, 1888, the total importations of sheep into Canada were 43,255, of the value of $81,863. The total exports of sheep for the same period from Canada to the United States were 307,775, of the value of $918,334; and dividing the trade into Provinces it was as follows: -Ontario imported one sheep; Manitoba, 6,742; British Columbia 33,816; North-West Territories, 2,696. The hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) asks, what in regard to New Brunswick? Neither New Brunswick, Quebec, Nova Scotia nor Prince Edward Island imported any sheep last year. So that the Provinces of Canada from Port Arthur to the Atlantic did not import any sheep, with the exception of one into Ontario. The exports during the same period by Provinces was as follows:—Ontario, 218,136, of the value of $686,865.

An hon. MEMBER. Black sheep.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman for East Durham (Mr. Ward) says "black sheep." If so, there would have been a very great many vacant seats in this House on the Government side.

Mr. BOWELL. On that side.

Mr MULOCK. Manitoba, 9, of the value of $40; Quebec, 56,965, of the value of $164,354; Nova Scotia, 249, of the value of $425; New Brunswick, 12,886, of the value of $36,239; Prince Edward Island, 16,527, of the value of $33,413. Takemutton, for the Minister of Finance suggests that there must be a tax on live sheep, otherwise the principle of protection will be evaded by the importation of the carcasses. The figures respecting mutton are as follows: Total importations from the United States during that year to the value of $13,555, exports to the value of $6,064. If we add the value of the mutton imported to the value of the sheep imported, we get $95,418, and by adding the value of the mutton exported to the United States to the value of the sheep exported we get $924,398, or a sum ten times the amount of the imports. So the Minister of Finance cannot defend this measure as one necessary in the interests of protection. Then for what purpose is it intended? It is not intended for protection, and it is not justified and required for purposes of revenue. There is only one other alternative, and it is the alternative that has been suggested; it is for the purpose apparently of preventing the United States doing what they did do a year ago, knock down one bar of the tariff wall and invite us to do the same. A couple of years ago the United States placed a certain number of articles, such as green fruits and trees, upon the free list and we followed suit in consequence of the good example set by the United States. This year, however, we find that that policy of taking down one bar when the United States took down another bar has been repudiated by our Government, and that instead of taking down they have erected a bar, of course expecting the United States to do the same. It is now proposed to increase the Canadian tariff on live stock 10 per cent. over the present tariff of 20 per cent., and of course you must expect the United States to follow suit, which, if they do, $10 will be placed on our exports for every one we place on theirs. This policy of the Government is inviting the States to retaliation, as plainly as if you said it in so many words on the Statute-book. It is well that the supporters of the Government, and the country generally should know, that this policy is bound to plunge our country into financial disaster. I have listened here for some days to hon. gentlemen professing to speak about the trade of the country, and I suppose the Minister of Finance is bound to consider the views of the House in every tariff change he proposes. There can be no doubt whatever that no more inopportune time has occurred for many a year than the present time, for making this change, disturbing our trade and entailing the country in great risks. The Minister of Finance in his great risks. The Minister of Finance in his Budget speech asserted that this country was reasonably prosperous. Where does he get that Where does he get that information? Is it from the comfortable office he occupies that he bases his opinion, or is it from an accurate knowledge of the trade of the country? It may be from an accurate knowledge of a portion of the trade of this country; but has he thought of the great consuming classes and of the agriculturists of this Dominion? Did he consider their position, when he made before this House a statement which I have ventured to think nine-tenths of the people of this country will say is incorrect. That statement of the Finance Minister has convinced me that he has failed to appreciate the true state of affairs existing in Canada and that he is unable to grasp the situation. Several hon. members who backed him up asserted the same thing. We had the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) telling us that happiness and prosperity reigned in every family in Canada; and he would not omit a single family. I wish it were so. I took up a paper to-day, The Canadian Manufacturer, and I found the following:—

"Canada is on the boom. Those who don't love Canada ought to emigrate. The glorious brightness of the sunshine or protection radiates Canada, and her future looks as bright and hopeful as her recent past has been under our glorious National Policy."

Such utterances as these are given forth by the Government as a reason for increasing the burdens of the people. I venture to say that the hon. Minister of Finance is entirely in error in basingif he does base—his justification for increasing the burdens of the people on any assumption that the condition of the country is such as he and his friends think. I would infinitely prefer to think with them that the country is prosperous if I could conscientiously do so; but, knowing the contrary and deploring the condition of the country, I feel I have a painful and unpleasant duty to perform in order to prevent greater disaster to us. The Government have now full warning of the consequences of the policy they are adopting. They know that of the policy they are adopting. They know that their course will, in all probability, provoke re-taliation, and that the products of our farmers will be excluded from the United States' markets. The Administration, it is true, may be turned out of power on account of their foolish policy, but that will be slight compensation to the country as a whole for the loss it will sustain. The Government have been told time and again that their customers in the United States, but the hon. Minister of Finance says: "I have discovered a new principle of political economy; instead of trading with the nearest and most profitable markets I will revolutionise the whole principle upon which trade has heretofore been carried on; I propose that we shall not trade with any of our neighbors within three thousand miles of us, but that we shall pay tribute to the common carriers on land and sea before our produce reaches the consumer." That may be a heaven-born policy, and it may be a wise one, but nobody except the Finance Minister has yet discovered that the best trade is that by which a large portion of the wealth of the people should be expended in transferring their products to remote markets. I would infinitely prefer myself to see the Administration remain in office, if their doing so would only secure the welfare of this country. As I said before, their policy does not tend to this happy result, and although they may be turned out of power, it will be but little consolation, if, before that time arrives, they have sacrificed the best interest of the country. Before it is too late, then, the Government should cry halt, and take a broader view of the situation. The issue is: whether we should have retaliation and trade isolation or friendly feeling and profitable trade with the rest of North America. I do not intend to go into the other items, and I have merely made these remarks in consequence of the manner in which the Finance Minister has answered his question. His whole answer was, that it is criminal for us to point out the dangers he is incurring, instead of what we might have expected, a promise that he would consider the matter in its proper light, and endeavor to show the necessity or the expediency of the measure. Neither of these things has he shown, except in these wide, vague words, which really contain no argument.

Mr. WALDIE. If the hon. Finance Minister is sincere in the statement he has made to the House, that he is only proposing to increase the duty on live stock in the interest of Canada, I cannot see how he can bring that statement into line with the facts as demonstrated by the statistics which have been read by several members of this House. It is not necessary to protect us against an overimportation of meat and cattle in Ontario; and if it is a fact that sheep and cattle are imported into Manitoba and the North-West Territories and British Columbia, it is to the advantage of those outlying Provinces to obtain that live stock from the near parts of the United States; and as we are spending large sums of money to bring settlers into those Provinces, I think it would be a proper policy for this country to favor them in the importation of such articles as will go to develop their resources. I do not think an increase in the tariff on live stock will promote the interest of this country at all; on the contrary, I think it will be a misfortune. If at some future date more friendly relations should exist between this country and the United States, I would like Canadians to be able to say that we were not the first to raise the tariff wall higher between the two countries: and as it has been shown that we benefit largely from this trade, surely, in increasing the tariff against it, we are only, to use policy will isolate the Canadian people from their a humble simile, cutting off our nose to spite our Mr. Mulock.

face. I think it is very undesirable legislation. I think the National Policy will not be injured in the least by leaving the duty on sheep and cattle at 20 per cent. I remember that a few years ago I felt called upon to make some remarks in reference to a proposed increase in the duty on printed cloths to $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in order to build up an industry in that line. I pointed out that if the print works would use the cotton cloths manufactured in other manufactories from looms which were then standing idle, it would be much better for the country; and if due weight had been given to my words, it would have been very much better for the print works and for those who put their money in them. This is not to the point, however, except as an illustration that sometimes we may run the National Policy into the ground, and entail a large sacrifice on the people of this country. I think, by raising the duty on live stock, you are doing an injury to the very class you propose to protect, and benefiting no one. I think it is a mistaken policy, and I trust that the Government will yet withdraw the resolution, and permit the duty to remain at 20 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not desire to prolong the discussion; I only wish to call attention to the statement which has been repeatedly made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, to the effect that we are adopting a policy which is likely to bring about retaliation on the part of the United States. The hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) spoke of that more directly than almost any other hon. gentleman; and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, says that it would be much better if Canadians in the future, could say that they were not the first to increase the duty. Now, it seems to me that the whole object of the hon gentlemen opposite in this discussion, has been to show that we have adopted a policy which is likely to induce the American people to impose heavier duties on goods sent from this country to the United States. That would be well enough if it were not patent to the whole world through published telegrams, and more particularly within the knowledge of the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, that the Committee on Ways and Means have already laid before Congress and published to the world a proposition to increase the duties on all the articles which have been under discussion in this House to-night. The hon. member for North York dissents from that by shaking his head. I hold in my hand the New York Tribune of 21st March just seven days before the Finance Minister made his statement. which contains the whole of the amended tariff as proposed in the United States Congress; and we all know that days and weeks before the particulars were published, announcements were made of the intention of the American people to increase the tariff particularly on agricultural products, and in every way to protect the farmer. I find by this schedule which I hold in my hand that they propose to put a duty of $30 per head on all horses valued at $150, $10 per head on cattle, $1.50 per head on hogs and $1.50 per head on sheep, which on a sheep worth $4 is 30 per cent. or 37½ per cent., on a sheep worth $5 the value given by the hon mamber for worth $5, the value given by the hon. member for South Huron. So that we had before us the fact that long before any proposition was made to this that, his statement might not have been misleading

House, a proposition was laid before Congress to increase the duties much beyond what we have

Mr. MITCHELL. That was merely a proposi-

Mr. BOWELL. I know it is a proposition; I know it is not law; but what I desire to point out is that the Americans had made a proposition to do that which hon. gentlemen are alleging our act will induce them to do.

Mr. MITCHELL. A portion of them wish that done—that is the whole extent of it yet.

Mr. BOWELL. If I have any knowledge of the working of American institutions, I think the American people, whether Democratic or Republican, judging from the results of their late elections, have no more idea of reducing their tariff than we have of reducing ours; and I assure you, so far as the Government of this country is concerned, we have no such intention. If hon. gentlemen opposite speak as free traders, one must pay them every respect, if they entertain their opinions honestly, as I hold my opinions on protection honestly; we have a right to differ. It is not only unpatriotic, but it is not likely to accomplish the objects these gentlemen have in view, if they are honest in their intentions, of having these duties not imposed by Congress. The politicians in the United States, the Congress and the House of Representatives, have been induced by the speeches of these hon. gentlemen, made not only in this House, but throughout the country, to take the course they have adopted. We never heard anything about the imposition of a duty of 5 cents a dozen on eggs until we had Mr. Wiman and the commercial unionists and the unrestricted reciprocityists howling-I use that word advisedly from every stump and platform in the Dominion about what a ruinous thing it would be to us Canadians if a duty were imposed upon eggs. The American people are just as keen and alive to their own interests as are the gentlen en who are constantly announcing this policy and uttering these sentiments. The policy of the Americans has been, from Jefferson's time down to the present, to absorb the whole of this continent, and I firmly believe that the course pursued by the gentlemen who have just spoken and the speeches, such as those we have heard to-night, have, even if not uttered with that object, had the effect of inducing the Americans to do precisely what they indicate by their proposed tariff they will do. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in the speech he made tonight, made three or four statements which are not strictly accurate. He stated that the tonnage dues and the tolls imposed upon vessels going through the Welland Canal were refunded if the vessel landed her cargo at a Canadian port, but that if she went to an American port they were not. I do think that the hon. gentleman, when he made that statement, must have known that a vessel passing through the Welland Canal and discharging her cargo in the city of Kingston, pays just as much tonnage dues and tolls as a vessel that goes to Oswego.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not if she goes to Mont-

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman had stated to the public. What he stated was that if she went to a Canadian port she was refunded the tolls, and I wish to point out that that statement is not correct. If she went to Montreal, that is a different thing.

 $\operatorname{Mr.}$ PATERSON (Brant). Is not Montreal a Canadian port ?

Mr. BOWELL. Are not Toronto, Hamilton, Kingston, Prescott and Brockville Canadian ports, just as much as Montreal? It is these half truths that mislead the people on the other side of the line and incite them to do that which they never otherwise would think of doing. The hon, gentleman never fails to read us a lesson upon our duty with regard to reciprocity. Well, I suppose if reciprocity is good in one thing, it ought to be in another. Yet almost every session, for the last two or three sessions, the hon. gentleman has thrown the weight of his influence and his ability against reciprocity in wrecking. I approve of the course he took in that respect, but it is not strictly consistent with the principles and the doctrine he has laid down to-night. Some people have been uncharitable enough to say—I would not say so that he took this course because he is interested in wrecking tugs. That is unfair, and it would be unparliamentary to say so, but I have heard it said. The hon, gentleman spoke of the hardships suffered by the Americans from our regulations under the fishery treaty, which he termed an antiquated treaty, and his statements in this respect were equally inaccurate. He knows that one of the provisions of that treaty permits any vessel to come in and get a puncheon of water if required; and even if the Canadian Government were so unfeeling as to refuse this, there would be good cause, not only for the American Government, but for the world, to set its face against any such action. But, we never did refuse this privilege, and we had no right to refuse it; and even if we had the right, we When has there been any case in which a vessel has been reported to the Government as being in distress through lack of food or water, or for the want of repairs, or anything else of the kind, to enable her to sail from port in which all the privileges desired have not been conceded? There have been violations of the law, it is true, and it was necessary for the Government to see that the provisions of the law were respected and obeyed; but there is scarcely a week, even at present, in which concessions are not made to American vessels, to which they have no right under the treaty, when it is considered advisable and in the interests of humanity that these concessions should I repeat again that speeches and statements of that kind, emanating from members of this House, have done more to mislead the people of the United States, and to induce them to adopt a policy which may, in some instances, militate against the interests of Canada, than anything else.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I confess I am rather astonished at the speech which has been addressed to this House by the Minister of Customs. The hon. Minister declares that the hostile feeling exhibited by the Congress of the United States in their proposed legislation is due to speeches and to observations made by hon. gentlemen on this side.

Mr. BOWELL. I believe they have incited.
Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I deny that altogether. I maintain that it is the action of the Government which has created that feeling. I maintain that the action of the sub-committee of Congress is entirely due to the course taken by hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches. It is not very long since the Finance Minister informed this House that this country would not suffer even if the United States were to legislate with the view of putting an end to the traffic between Canada and that country, and that the effect of such a measure would be simply to build up our own Atlantic cities; and hon. gentlemen opposite, over and over again, have declared themselves in favor of a policy which would keep, as they said, Canada for the Canadians. These hon. gentlemen have themselves declared that it is in the interests of this country to adopt a policy of retalia-tion. The Finance Minister has told us that it would be little short of criminal to say that the action of the Government has for its object the carrying out of a retaliatory policy. But, what has the Minister of Customsjust now informed us? What justification does he give this House for the proposed legislation of the Government? He tells us that the American people, assuming that the subcommittee of the House of Representatives represents the American people, have taken a certain line, and that the line they have taken is a justification of the course adopted by this Government. Why, the hon, gentleman intimated that the Government are adopting, by way of anticipation, a retaliatory policy, and in making this statement he has committed what the Finance Minister says is little short of a crime. It is not the doing of the act, according to the Finance Minister, which doing the act. That is what is criminal. It is the warning spoken from this side, after the consummation of that act, that is offensive. The Government are at liberty to pursue a policy detrimental to the best interests of the country, a policy little short of ruinous to the agricultural population of the country. In carrying out that principle, the hon. gentlemen ought to be allowed to do so without any protest or any criticism from this side of the House. We would suppose that we had no longer parliamentary government in this country, that hon. gentlemen were to be allowed to carry out any policy they pleased, supported, as they are, by the majority at their back, and that it would be almost criminal to criticise their action or the policy they pursue. Does the hon, gentleman forget the resolution which was proposed by the present First Minister in 1878, and supported by the present Minister of Customs? What was the object of proposing that policy of retaliation? Was it because they said protection was a policy which should be adop-

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it was simply that retaliation should be adopted as a means to an end. Any one who reads the resolution will see that it was stated in that that a reciprocity of tariffs should be adopted in order to bring about a reciprocity of trade. It was not to establish a system of protection in this country, but it was to obtain free trade with the United States, and in order to obtain that, the hon. gentleman was prepared to adopt a system of retaliation, in order to bring the American people to terms. At all events, that is what those hon. gentlemen told the people they proposed to accomplish, and it was on that ground that they deluded the country into supporting them. They were going to convert towns into cities, villages into towns, and they were going to furnish a home market for all the products of this country. It is true they have not said much about They have said that the American reciprocity. people would not agree to that; but the true sentiment came out the other night, when the President of the Council told us that it would be ruinous to the agriculturists of this country if they were to secure reciprocity of trade with the people of the United States. That proves that these gentlemen were not candid, that they were not dealing frankly with the people of Canada, or with the agricultural population in particular, when they said they desired a reciprocity of trade with the United States, but could not get it. It is now obvious that they can get it, that reciprocity between the two countries can be secured, but these hon. gentlemen are seeking to prevent the consummation of this reciprocity by the adoption of a tariff which will effectually prevent any intercourse or communication between the two countries. years ago, the hon. gentlemen came down to this House and undertook to give effect to their standing offer under a threat which had been made by the United States. They passed an Order in Council and telegraphed in haste that the Order in Council was passed, in order to prevent retaliation on the part of the United States. Was that because they did not approve of the policy they had been following, or that they did not desire to impose a tax on certain products? Not at all. It was simply because they knew that the public sentiment of this country was against them on that question, and so they were obliged to yield, not-withstanding the protest made by many of the hon, gentlemen behind them. The hon, gentleman says it was not their action which has produced this irritation in the United States, but it was the speeches made on this side, that we were inviting the United States to make war on this country. Is that true? No; it was the Minister of Finance, when he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who produced this feeling of irritation. When the late Minister of Finance went to Washington he found, as he stated, that a few years before he could not find any one supporting the claims of the New England fishermen, but then he found that their claims were supported by sixty millions of people. What was the cause of that?

Mr. BOWELL. It was your speeches.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it was the arbitrary action of the Minister of Customs, who conducted the business of his office in relation to the United States in a manner as impotent as it was insolent; and the impotence of his action was shown by the course he pursued in several cases. The hon gentleman did not dare to give effect to the policy which he had adopted. He said that, under the treaty, the American fishermen could come into the ports of the Maritime Provinces for wood and water and necessary repairs. There was no doubt about that; but, in addition to what the treaty allows, the comity of nations allows other things which the Minister of Finance, when Minister of Fisheries, denied. He would not permit an American fishing vessel to purchase a dollar's worth of sugar or a bag of potatoes; and, when we were in a condition of dependency on the United States for communication between the west and the east, he would not allow them to tranship fresh fish to be sent to their own markets. Yet he would try to make out that the ill-feeling or irritation which existed was not produced by him or his colleagues, but by the speeches of members on this side of the House. The Minister of Customs dismissed a man for doing a simple act of humanity in the port of Halifax. The hon. gentleman says we have produced this condition of things. He knows that the fabric which has been erected with so much care and at such an enormous cost to the people of this country, which has done yeoman service to hon, gentlemen opposite, is about to fall about their ears. He hopes now to delude the farmers a little longer. He hopes to make the great agricultural Province of Ontario believe that, by keeping out one sheep, enormous advantages will accrue to the farmers of that Province. It it true that he may keep out thousands of sheep from British Columbia, but is that going to assist Ontario, or is he going to impose upon the people of British Columbia the payment of a large amount for the transportation of these animals from Ontario? Does the hon. gentleman suppose that he is going to do anything at all by this tax on domestic animals? The hon. gentleman, after his leader has declared that the policy of the party is to obtain reciprocity of trade by means of what he calls a reciprocity of tariffs, says it was little short of criminal to accuse his party of having any such intention. I have never before heard any one say that it was little short of a crime to accuse any one of endeavoring to fulfil the promises made to the people of this country. The hon, gentleman had better read what is not ancient history, but what his friends and he himself have promised to the people, before he accuses those who assume that he intends to fulfil his obligations of something little short of a crime. Well, Sir, the Minister of Finance has done another thing, he has informed the House that he expects under the existing tariff to have a very large surplus, and, not content with that, he proposes to increase that surplus. Now, I suppose that no one would seriously maintain that the Government had a right to one dollar more from the people of this country than is required for the purposes of state. The money, the capital, the income of the people of this country, are the products of their own industry. That money belongs to them, it does not belong to the state, and the state is only justified, through the representatives of the people, in taking just so much as is required for state pur-poses. The hon gentleman has told us that he has a very much larger sum than is required, and still he proposes to take more. I say he has no right to take more; I say more than that—the hon. gentleman, according to the doctrine laid down by his predecessor in office, and by every Minister of Finance, I believe, in every other country in the world where a financial system is recognised, has no right whatever to a surplus. The hon. gentleman has no justification then, as a matter of revenue, for the increased taxation. What did the Minister of Customs say on a former occasion? If I recollect rightly, the Minister of Customs has maintained that it is not to the advantage of a Government to have a very large surplus—that it tends to extravagance.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think you can find that statement.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman repudiate the doctrine?

Mr. BOWELL. I am not in the witness box.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My impression is that that doctrine was proclaimed on one very important occasion by a very large number, and it was certainly supported by the vote of the hon. gentleman, if it was not supported by his speech.

Mr. BOWELL. I never had an opportunity, while you were in power, to talk of having a surplus.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is thinking of the deficits that existed from 1884 to 1887. I think the hon. gentleman has got the wrong decade in his mind, or he would not have made the observation he has just made. It is perfectly clear that the Finance Minister has given to this House no justification whatever for the proposed increase in the tariff, and the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him and support him would be derelict in their duty if they permitted him to add to the burdens of the people of this country without first clearly establishing the necessity for those burdens. But the hon. gentleman has not done that; he has simply declared that he is going to give certain classes of people protection, and he proposes to do that without any attempt to reduce the taxation of this country, with the view of keeping the amount of revenue within the requirements of the state.

Mr. CHARLTON. I should not have taken the floor again but for one remark made by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. While on my feet, before referring to that matter, I may say that the hon, gentleman has evidently mistaken the purport and significance of the action of the Committee of Ways and Means at Washington. He evidently supposes that in the United States, as here, when a tariff is introduced into the House, it becomes law. That is the case with our tariff, but, in the United States, the practice and mode of doing the thing is entirely different. The Tariff Bill, if I am correctly informed, has not yet been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. The report the hon. gentleman read, and which appeared in the New York Tribune, was merely information furnished by a correspondent as to what he supposed the features of the tariff were, from the best information he could obtain, but I think the Bill itself is not yet circulated, certainly at the time that report was published in the Tribune the details of the tariff were not fixed upon. when that Bill is reported from the Committee to the House of Representatives, it is then acted upon by the House of Representatives, and it may be, and in all probability will be, very materially changed by that House. The next step in the matter is to send that Bill to the Senate, when it goes to the Finance Committee of the Senate, and there the features I think that was unworthy of the Minister of Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

of the Bill may be greatly changed. After the action of the Senate upon the Bill, if material changes have been made in it, there is a conference between the two Houses in order that an agreement may be come to, and a settlement arrived at of the differences of opinion that exist between the two with regard to the Bill. This Bill is, in point of fact, in course of formation, and the course of this Government, whatever it may be, has just as much effect upon the character of that Bill and the form it will assume, as if nothing had yet been done with regard to it. So that the action the Government is taking now is a direct invitation to the retaliation, that the American Congress can, and in all probability will, inflict; and this action is more dangerous at this time than it would be if the tariff measure was not under consideration there, and for that reason the action taken by this Government is in the highest degree injudicious. That Tariff Bill has got to pass through three or four phases; it has got to pass the House of Representatives; it has got to go to the Senate and pass the Senate Finance Committee; then, if there are differences of opinion, they have got to be adjusted by a conference of the two Houses. In the meantime this legislation is producing its natural effect upon the features of that Bill.

But, Sir, what I rose particularly to refer to, was an insinuation made by the Minister of Customs with regard to myself; and I wish to say that if it is to be the policy of that gentleman—and I desire the attention of the Minister of Customs to this matter—and if it is to be the policy of the other members of the Government and of their supporters, that when a member on this side of the House is so unfortunate as to agree with him upon any line of policy, he is to be insulted with insinuations of base motives for having done so, I think, for one, that I will refrain from agreeing with the hon. gentleman on any matter whatever. With regard to my action upon the Bill for reciprocity in wrecking, the hon. gentleman insinuated that I was actuated by personal motives, and that I was opposed to reciprocity in a matter where my own personal interests were opposed to it, while I was in favor of reciprocity on broad general grounds. Now, I think the hon. gentleman, if he reflects for a moment, will be convinced that the position I took upon that matter was a position in favor of a wider reciprocity than the American Government offered to us. They desired reciprocity purely in wrecking. I represented that mere reciprocity in wrecking, without an addition to the offer, was useless to us, that we could not even engage in the business of wrecking upon the American coasts of the great lakes without we had reciprocity in towing as well, because we could not tow a wreck from any point upon the American coast to any dry dock upon the great lakes, without engaging in the business of coasting, as all the dry docks nearly are on the American side, and for that reason my Bill simply provided for reciprocity in wrecking and reciprocity in towing; it simply enlarged the scope and provisions of reciprocity as contained in the American Yet the hon. gentleman, who agreed with me perfectly, makes insinuations to-night, and says: The hon gentleman is reputed to own tugs, and he would not say, but it had been insinuated, that he had a personal motive in this matter. Now

Customs. I may say to the hon. gentleman that the only regular wrecking job I ever engaged in was to take one of my own vessels off. I am not engaged in wrecking as a business. It was merely with reference to my desire to see an important Canadian interestonthe lakes preserved, and not sacrificed, that I took the position I did. I make this statement because I do not wish to allow the insinuation made by the Minister of Customs to go to the country without an answer that I deem it proper to make at this time. I think if the Minister of Customs had reflected for a moment upon the matter, he would not have made the statement that he did make in order to throw discredit upon the position that I had taken with regard to reciprocity.

Mr. SPROULE. You have been wrecking vessels, and now you are trying to wreck the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am trying to wreck a very unworthy Government at the present moment. The Minister of Customs tells us that retaliation has been induced by the speeches on this side of the House. I tell him that he differs widely from his friend the Finance Minister, who told us at an earlier period this evening that the action of this country had nothing whatever to do with the matter, that it was the fixed policy of the American Government to give protection, and that the action of this Government, whatever it might be, would have nothing to do with the action of the American Government. I think the two Ministers had better reconcile their views upon this matter.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to enter into the personal matters to which the hon, gentleman has referred. If I did, perhaps I could show him that he is still further interested in wrecking than he desires to lead this House to believe he is.

Mr. CHARLTON. What if I were?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not find any fault. If such be the case, you should not deny it; that is the only point I desire to make. I now desire to say a few words in reply to the hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He is accustomed to use very strong language, not only when in Opposition but on all other occasions. I challenge that hon. gentleman to find in any correspondence, in any act of the Customs Department, in any other negotiations that have taken place, in which I had anything whatever to do, in connection with reciprocity or with the violation of what is termed "The Fishery Treaty," either directly or indirectly, any language ever used by me or in any document issued, which can be characterised as impudent or insolent. If I hurled back that language as applicable to the hon. gentleman's speech, perhaps it might not be parliamentary, but it would be strictly correct. In all the negotiations, in all the despatches that have been laid before Parliament, there is nothing to justify the statement made by the hon. gentleman; and more than that, there is not a single case in which the detention of a fishing vessel has taken place, and charges had been made of inhumanity on the part of the Canadian Government, but the parties failed to prove it when an investigation took place. The documents, correspondence and the despatches with the United States, together with evidence which are of official record, are now before Parliament, and that record sustains the position I take; and yet with these facts, read by the hon. gentleman himself, I have no doubt—for he is a careful student, and there are very few matters of this kind that pass his scrutiny—he makes such a statement. I repeat there is not a single case in the record in which he can show, that after thorough investigation had taken place, the Canadian Government, while acting strictly within the law, at the same time acted in a manner that was humane to those who desired help, and that the charges which had been made against them were utterly false and fallacious.

Mr. BARNARD. I desire, before a vote is taken upon this item, to say a few words in reference to the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) to-night, in regard to British Columbia. Both those hon. gentlemen appeared to extend their sympathy to that Province; in fact, sympathy seems to be the order of the day for our poor neglected Province. Sympathy was extended to Victoria last Session by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). That hon, gentleman seemed very much exercised over the fact that the China steamers did not call at the port of Victoria. Again this Session we had further sympathy extended to the miners of British Columbia who were handicapped, as it was contended by the hon. gentleman who introduced a resolution on that occasion, I refer to the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt), owing to the serious effects resulting from the fact that mining machinery is not admitted free of duty. I am glad to see that hon, gentlemen opposite are beginning to realise that there is such a Province as British Columbia. During their term of office, from 1874 to 1877, those hon. gentlemen did not seem to sympathise with British Columbia, and in fact they were hardly aware that such a Province existed, and they did everything to prevent its development and nothing to further the interests of that Province. After the elections of 1874 the people of British Columbia returned a solid contingent to support hon, gentlemen opposite, but the people of that Province, during the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, discovered that their ideas were so contracted and their opinion of the country was so small, and they were so ignorant of our resources, that they were unable to do anything for us. They did nothing for us beyond misleading us, and they showed no disposition whatever, to carry out the terms of union and build the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They did not give gold mines to a Yankee speculator.

Mr. BARNARD. I shall be glad to talk with the hon. gentleman about gold mines at any time he wishes to discuss the matter. The result of the attitude of the Government of that day was that after the elections of 1878 no member was returned to support that party.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They support whichever party is in.

Mr. BARNARD. Now the sympathy of hon. gentlemen opposite is extended to British Columbia in the hope that they may thereby catch a few votes at the next election, but the people of that Province are not going to be misled by them. I was surprised at the ignorance shown by those hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) referred to the fact that British Columbia did not desire an increase of duty on fresh meats. A portion of British Columbia will, perhaps, be seriously affected by this increase, but there are the ranching and farming interests, and those interests are as great as those of Ontario. We can raise all the sheep and cattle required to feed the people of British Columbia, and of Ontario as well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many do you import?

Mr. BARNARD. The farmers and ranchemen want protection and some encouragement. They desire an assurance that when they raise sheep and cattle they will not be brought into competition with stock from Oregon and Washington Territory, from which large quantities of cattle and sheep are being shipped into Victoria and Vancouver. British Columbia has enjoyed exceeding prosperity, I am glad to say, since 1878, since the return of the Conservative party, and it will continue to be prosperous; and I do not think that the sympathy extended by hon. gentlemen opposite, who are so thoroughly inconsistent and who showed no disposition to assist the Province when they had an opportunity of doing so, will be accepted with good grace.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House protest against the excessive rate of taxation levied on all parts of the country and of the increase proposed. If, however, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barnard) finds it to be highly desirous to have excessive taxation heaped on the people of British Columbia, why, of course, the Government will endeavor to satisfy the hon. gentleman. They have been able in that respect to satisfy most of the Provinces, and I suppose, if the hon, gentleman makes a strong appeal for a little additional taxation that may bear more particularly on his Province, the Government will be able to accommodate him, for they can accomplish a good deal in the way of levying taxation. respect to the statement of the Minister of Finance, that we had an indication of the feeling of the United States in the introduction of the McKinley Bill prior to the resolutions he submitted, I would ask him if there is not equally as strong reason to say that the feeling in the United States is in favor of reciprocal trade relations? Has there not been a resolution proposed in favor of the appointment of commissioners to confer with commissioners appointed by this Government? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that that is simply a resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and one which has not passed the House. Granting this, is it not also proved that the McKinley Bill is the report of a sub-committee not adopted by the whole committee, and not submitted to the House. It must also be remembered that a tariff measure in the United States is not put through Congress as a tariff measure is put through here. When this Government introduces a set of tariff resolutions, the action is taken by a responsible Government, which takes its stand on those resolutions, and is supported by its friends in the House. With respect to the item Mr. Barnard.

under consideration, I desire to repeat the question asked by the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock), what is the object of increasing the duty on horned cattle, sheep and swine? The object cannot be to secure revenue. If it were to secure revenue the action would be blamable, because he has told us that he expects a surplus of between two and three million dollars. we claim, is taking taxation from the people which is not required, and, therefore, unjustifiable. If it is not on that ground, on what ground is it then? Is it on the ground of protection to the farmers? I am inclined to think that a great many gentlemen opposite intend to plume themselves under that head, and to set this forth as an evidence that this Government is looking after the interests of the farmers and is protecting them. Let us look into that question a little and see if it will bear investigation. Let us see what amount of horned cattle was imported into Canada, and the Provinces into which they were imported, and then we will know whether this duty will have any effect in benefiting the farmer. The total imports of horned cattle for home consumption, last year, were to the value of $21,750. Why were these wanted? Simply because we had not enough horned cattle to supply our own wants? No. We find that our export of horned cattle last year was $5,708,126. If we have that surplus to export and only required to import $21,750, gentlemen opposite will see at once that the imposition of 30 per cent. on horned cattle will fail in any protection to the farmer. Now, where does that little import of $21,750 come in, and how? I find that $3,323 worth came into the Province of Manitoba, and why? Because Manitoba wanted it: $17,907 worth went into the Province of British Columbia, because the people of British Columbia wanted it for food; $520 went into the North-West Terri-tories, and these two Provinces and the Territories monopolise the whole import of foreign cattle into Canada. Now, the hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Barnard), told us that British Columbia was a great ranching country.

Mr. COLBY. I would call the hon, gentleman's attention to the fact that horned cattle could not very well be imported largely into the other Provinces, because the quarantine regulations are such that they are not permitted to come into these Provinces without going into quarantine.

Mr. HESSON. He did not know that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If I did not know it, I have no doubt that the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) did, and if he did not know it, I believe it is possible that measures might be taken by members on his own side of the House to try and force it into his head. Does the hon. the President of the Council seriously mean to argue that that was the reason why cattle were not imported into the other Provinces?

Mr. COLBY. I was reminding the hon. gentleman of the fact.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have not forgotten the fact, but what bearing has it on this question? When you have $5,000,000 more than you want to export, why do you import horned cattle at all? Now the hon. member for British Columbia (Mr. Barnard) has told us that this duty will be a great protection to the farmers and to the ranching men of British Columbia, because they not only grow enough cattle for their own use, but they can export larger quantities. Well, I have given you the imports to British Columbia, and there are some exports from British Columbia as well.

 M_{Γ} . BARNARD. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I will first tell you what was the export of horned cattle from British Columbia. You exported two horned cattle to the value of $30. Now, these facts teach us simply that the cattle that came into British Columbia must of necessity have been imported for the food of the people.

Mr. BARNARD. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the hon. Minister of Finance mean to tell me that he is going to benefit the farmers of Ontario and Quebec, of Nova Scotia or of New Brunswick, to the extent of that $21,750 worth of imports, by the imposition of an extra duty of 10 per cent.? Why are these cattle imported into these Provinces from the United States? Simply because they can import them, and pay the duty, at a cheaper price than they can transport them from this part of the country to those distant Provinces. Therefore, I say the proposition of the hon. Minister, as far as horned cattle is concerned, is but a means to tickle the fancy of the farmers, and to give an opportunity to hon, gentlemen opposite to say to them, on the platform, that they are giving them protection. That statement only needs to be investigated for the farmers to realise that this is but another attempt by hon. gentlemen opposite to pretend to give them a benefit, while in reality they are giving them nothing at all. Now, Sir, let us enquire into the imports and exports of sheep. I find that last year there was a total import of sheep to the extent of $81,863, and there was a total export amounting to $1,263,125. How do the hon, gentlemen propose to protect sheep to the farmer? How will they say that they have benefited the farmer by this extra duty of 10 per cent., when there is a surplus of sheep to export to the amount of $1,263,125, as compared with an import of $81,863. Again let us look at the Provinces into which these sheep were imported, and let us ascertain the reason why they were imported. Ontario imported one sheep, Manitoba imported sheep to the value of $13,355, British Columbia imported to the value of $63,037, and the North-West Territories to the value of $5,456. Why did these Provinces import sheep? Simply because they wanted them?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh, British Columbia could not have wanted sheep.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). British Columbia did not want them; but I find that not one single sheep was exported from British Columbia, while the hon. gentleman has told us that it is a great ranching country, growing a surplus of all kinds of cattle, and that the Province will derive benefits from this tariff. Sir, this proposed policy of the Government is on a line with their general dealing with the farmers, and it is as well that the farmers should understand how the matter stands. The farmers have not forgotten that when, and before, the National Policy was introduced, how hon, gentlemen opposite pitied the farmers; and that it was for that very reason that they in the Maritime Provinces, called the people to the Conservative banner by the statement that the object of protection was to force the Americans to give them the reciprocity in trade which they desired. Actions speak louder than words. Hon. gentle-how they pointed to the low price of wool in those days, and how they pointed out that it was because the Mackenzie Government would not impose a duty that the price of wool had fallen. These hon. gentlemen then said: Put us in power, we will put a duty on wool and we will raise the price of that article. The country took them on the promises they made and returned them to power. They came back to power and they introduced the National Policy. They put a duty on the articles that the farmer had to buy, but, on the articles he had to sell, and of which he produced a surplus, it was impossible for them to protect him. But, there was the article of wool which they did produce enough of-this article about which there was such a cry that the Mackenzie Government did not put a duty on. Did the present Government protect wool when they came into power? No; wool was left on the free list just as it had been before. The next year, pressure was put on the Government, because a number of their supporters waited upon them, and they found that their constituents at home had told them that the Government had deceived them on this matter Their supporters said to the Governof wool. ment that something must be done, and then they hit on this device, which declared in fact, if not in words, that, in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, the farmers of this country are so blindly ignorant that they could not see through so transparent a device. What did they do then, and what is their law to-day? It puts a duty of 3 cents a pound on all these kinds of wool that we do not import, while all the kinds that we do import come in free. While we export only $217,600 worth, we import $1,605,385 worth of free wool and only $607 worth of dutiable wool. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to protect the farmers, this is an article on which they can protect them. I think these things only need the ventilation they have had to-night in order to show the farmer that whatever has been the object of this increase of 10 per cent. it will fail in any way to benefit him, and if it is for revenue it is unjustifiable, because the hon. Minister of Finance says that he will have a surplus of $2,000,000. As protection to the farmer it is worthless, because the imports are only for Manitoba, British Columbia and the North-West Territories, and the increase of the duty does not afford a particle of encouragement to the farmers of the older Provinces, because they cannot ship to those Provinces even with the increase of duty. But, as has been remarked by gentlemen on this side of the House, what is objectionable in these resolutions, introduced at this time and in the spirit in which they are introduced, is this: It is idle, and worse than idle, for hon. gentlemen opposite to attempt to lay any blame upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House for speaking of measures as introduced in a retaliatory spirit, because it has been the boast of the party opposite that Canada could hold her own without the United States; their boast has been that they would bring the United States to terms, and that it was for that very reason that they introduced their National Policy. Sir Charles Tupper, in the Maritime Provinces, called the people to the Conservative banner by the statement that the object of protection was to force the Americans to men have spoken of the introduction of the Mc-Kinley tariff as an indication of the firm intention of the United States Government. It has been pointed out that that may not indicate the real state of feeling on the part of the American people, for it may not pass through Congress as it is. But if hon, gentlemen assume that actions speak the feeling of the American Government, then their actions speak their feelings-that they intend to go on with their policy as a means of forcing the United States to give us reciprocity; and if the United States do not do that, they will give them tit for tat, as they say, and do it at this time when it is not for the interest of the country that the estrangement which unhappily exists to a limited degree between the two countries, should be strengthened. Sir, the objection to all such legislation as this is, that it gives aid and comfort to that element in the United States whose views find expression in the McKinley tariff. We do not desire that that action on the part of this Government or this Parliament should be taken. Nor do we desire a cringing attitude towards the United We do not desire to waive one particle of our rights; but we do desire, when there is to be found in that country a class of men of nobler and broader views, as expressed in the resolution introduced by Mr. Hitt, that the legislation of this House should be actuated by the same broad and liberal spirit.

Mr. BARNARD. The last speaker, I am afraid, displays as much ignorance of British Columbia as those who have preceded him. hon. gentleman is not aware that British Columbia has increased in population from 25,000 to more than 100,000 in the last five years, and that the sheep and cattle have not increased in proportion. Many of the people have come from the States, where the hon. gentleman is afraid people are going to, and the population is increasing so fast that the stock-raisers are not able to keep up with the demand, and they want protection, in order to prevent cattle and sheep from coming in from the other side, where there is a surplus.

Mr. FISHER. The hon, gentleman who has just sat down has not, I am afraid, looked after the interests of his constituents as well as he should have done. From what the hon, gentleman says, the Province from which he comes still does need a supply of cattle to meet the demands of the ever-increasing population.

Mr. BARNARD. What about the North-West? Have they not cattle there?

Not by any means enough for They are asking for them all Mr. FISHER. their own needs. the time, and they have even applied to the hon. Minister of Agriculture for a relaxation of the quarantine arrangements for the people of British Columbia and the North-West, so that they may be able to bring in cattle from the United States. While the hon. gentleman is no doubt looking after the interests of his own constituents, who are cattle dealers and drovers, we have not heard from the other members from British Columbia. I suppose the hon. member for Victoria, and hon. gentlemen representing constituencies where they have not enough cattle to supply their wants, are quite willing to throw a little more money into the hands of the ranchemen who wish the rest of the people of British Columbia to be forced to pay them | you speak for the Cabinet? Mr. Paterson (Brant).

higher prices for cattle than they have been paying in past years. This is the meaning of the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. He tells us that the ranchers in British Columbia have now reached the point when they can supply their own market, and they want to have the duty raised, so that they can enjoy the benefits of protection. This is a very fair specimen of the way in which certain interests in the country are asking the Government to protect them and their particular industry, at the expense of the rest of the community. But I did not rise to say anything about this British Columbia matter.

Mr. BOWELL. You have succeeded admirably.

Mr. FISHER. I think I have succeeded admirably in showing the condition of affairs in British Columbia. The hon. the Minister of Customs laid great stress on the McKinley tariff, and throughout his remarks on that question spoke of the position which the American people had taken. But the American people have not spoken on the question at all; not even the representatives of the American people have spoken. It is only a committee of the Congress which has passed the resolution, and even that committee has not actually reported the measure in its final form. But while the Minister of Customs dwelt so long upon this McKinley tariff measure, he entirely ignored another measure, which has advanced a step further before the American Congress than the McKinley Bill. I refer to the Hitt resolution, which has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, one of the most, if not the most, . important committees of the American Congress, and in this resolution the American Congress declares itself decidedly and distinctly in favor of reciprocity.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). Commercial union.

Mr. FISHER. Hon. gentlemen on that side have a very vague idea apparently of the difference between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FISHER. We have explained it over and over again, and if we cannot make it clear to hon. gentlemen, it is not our fault. There are none so blind as those who will not see. Hon gentlemen opposite have a deep interest in endeavoring to lead the people of this country astray from a proper consideration of this question, for they are aware that, if it was fairly and squarely put before them, they would endorse the proposition which my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has laid before this House and the people. I was not present when the Finance Minister spoke this afternoon, but I am led to understand that he put his foot down squarely against any action with regard to reciprocity. The President of the Council gave voice to this policy on the part of the Cabinet the other day, and I understand that his pronouncement was endorsed by the Finance Minister this afternoon.

Mr. FOSTER. You will have to revise your information.

Which of Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FISHER. So I understand that the Minister of Finance is not opposed to reciprocity?

Mr. FOSTER. I simply remarked that your information is defective.

Mr. FISHER. I will take occasion to read the hon. gentleman's remarks in Hansard, but my information in regard to the President of the Council is not defective, because I read his speech. I am a little surprised at the ground the hon, gentlemen have taken. Formerly they were wont to discourse learnedly about the balance of trade, but the Finance Minister did not refer to it at all this year, because, according to the views of his party and his predecessors, the balance of trade is in a very unfortunate condition as regards this country, it being very much against us. In fact we import more than we export, which, according to the doctrine they formerly enunciated, must be very disastrous to the country, and I fail to understand how it is that the Finance Minister, knowing the balance of trade to be so much against us, should have, in opposition to all the former theories of his party, declared this country to be in the fairly prosperous condition in which he pictured it to be. The hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the other night gave us a long lecture on this question of the balance of trade, but evidently labored under a strange misconception, since he directed his remarks, not against the leaders on the Government benches, as they should have been from their tenor, but against hon. gentlemen on this side. But really what he said, if not levelled against the Ministers, was applicable solely to them, and not at all to us. With regard to the importation of cattle and sheep and swine, we find a most extraordinary condition of affairs exists, and possibly the Finance Minister thinks that condition is so bad that he must put a stop to it at any risk. I take the trade of the United States, because I believe it is almost entirely that trade which will be affected by this duty, and I find that last year we imported into this country $140,000 worth of horned cattle, sheep and swine from the United States, and exported to the United States exactly ten times that amount. I suppose, under the ordinary definition of the balance of trade theory as propounded by hon. gentlemen opposite, that is a very bad state of affairs, and that to be profitable we ought to have imported more than we exported. I venture, however, to assert that that is a very satisfactory condition of affairs, our being able to sell our products to such an extent, and I think it would be most unfortunate that our Government should put a stop to it. This comes home more to the Province of Quebec than to any other section of the country, for we export from that Province a very large number of cattle to the United States, for which we have no other market, as they are young and store cattle, which it would not be profitable at all to export to England. I believe myself that our farmers would find more profit, if the Government would only allow them to do it, in fattening those cattle in this country and sending them to England in a finished condition, but as long as hon. gentlemen opposite will not allow our farmers of the Province of Quebec to enter into this industry, it is adding insult to injury that they should now take away from us the only market we have for the class of cattle we can ship. Enough has been said here to-night from this side of the House with regard to the effects which will follow the imposition of this duty, and I will not discuss that question, but confine myself to endorsing fully the views of the hon member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) and others, with regard to the imposition of this duty upon cattle coming in from the United States, a step which is sure to be followed by the imposition of an increased duty of our cattle going into the United States. I am almost tempted sometimes to think that hon. gentlemen opposite do not know anything of political economy, judging from the speeches they make in this House. It seems almost incredible that gentlemen occupying the positions which the members of the Government do, should give vent to the views they have expressed in this House. I remember the well known expression used by the leader of the Government when he talked about jug-handle reciprocity. Well, if he expected the Americans to take our products, we must be prepared to take up theirs, and must not expect to have jug-handled trade. This is a fact which I think is patent to everybody, and which I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite would attempt to deny. Yet, by their actions, they indicate that they are going to try it or to stop the trade altogether. It is folly to attempt to stop the trade; it is worse than folly, because it will entail a great deal of difficulty in this country and especially in the eastern part of the country from which I come, and which will suffer the most. I represent a constituency on the border which sends a large amount of farm produce to the United States, and, if this tariff is carried through, the result will probably be that the McKinley tariff will be adopted in the United States Congress, and that will be disastrous to our interests. Like other hon. disastrous to our interests. gentlemen, I have been home during Easter recess, and I have met many people in Montreal as well as in my constituency, and the universal opinion is, as far as I could gather, that this proposed tariff will be disastrous in regard to our trade with the United States.

Mr. LANDERKIN. As the trade of British Columbia was referred to by an hon. member, I looked into the matter. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the Government which was in power ten years ago had done nothing for British Columbia. I find that British Columbia, in 1878, imported of animals from the United States, 498 cattle, at a value of $8,532.92; horses, 147, of the value of $7,518; sheep, 8,489, of the value of $15,316; swine, 1,676, of the value of $11,124. I find that by the Trade and Navigation Returns of this year that the following were imported during the last year: Horses, 240, of the value of $37,839; sheep, 33,816, of the value of $63,000; swine, 2,819, at a value of $21,000. The exports from British Columbia of animals and their produce in 1878 amounted to a value of $271,796. Last year that Province exported to the United States, 9 horses, at a value of $930. British Columbia has been famed for its ranches and its pastures, and yet last year of horned cattle it experted two of the value of $30.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). The increased population eat them all up.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They might eat you up, and that would be no loss. I find that they exported no swine and no sheep last year. You can easily see that under the former policy the trade of British Columbia was larger than it is now, and it is a matter of great pain to me to see that, in a Province so favored by nature and by its political connection with the Dominion of Canada, its trade should be hampered by our tariff and should be falling off as it has been doing in the last ten years.

Mr. POPE. I am very sorry that more material has not been furnished for such a new beginner and apprentice as I am to make a short address upon in regard to this question. The hon, member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) states that in British Columbia they must have required these cattle or they would not have imported them. They can get their beef cattle from the North-West into British Columbia, and the cattle that were brought into the North-West have been breeding cattle. It is well known that trainloads of cattle have been shipped from the North-West to the East, a great proportion going to England. Perhaps they do not realise as good prices as they desire for those cattle, and perhaps they could get better prices in British Columbia, and we feel that we have a right to our own markets in preference to any foreign nation. The fact that they do not export the same number of horses and cattle from British Columbia as they did in the past proves the rapid increase of the consuming population of that Province. I believe that it is true that in 1887-88 we did send a large number of small cattle to the United States, and I agree with the member for Brome that these yearlings would be better finished off or made more perfect in our own country than if they were shipped off. But that day has gone by. The Yankee farmer in 1889 cannot afford to buy our cattle. I do not believe an animal went to the United States from the county I represent in 1889. A great many cattle went to the States in 1887, and I have seen those cattle re-sold in 1889 just across the line, and they did not pay for their feed. That was the result of that exportation, and I do not think we will be troubled in the future by any anxiety on their part to get our young cattle. The hon. gentleman speaks about political economy. The knowledge of political economy seems to be confined to the other side of the House. As a farming community, and as representatives of farmers, as we all are on this side of the House, we feel that political economy is a very bad implement to hill up potatoes with, it would be a very poor fork to pitch hay with. As farmers we may be blind to some things, but we believe we do see in the fact that 31 million pounds of meat were imported into this country from the United States last year, that if we can have the privilege of making that ourselves and selling it to our own people, whether that be political economy or any other kind of economy, we fancy we can see flowing from that sale certain practical results which will be appreciated by the farming community. Now, it has often been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House during this debate, that the President of the Council had changed his views; that a few years ago he gave expression to opinions that perhaps he did not entertain to-day. It is another evidence of the progress of this country if such be the fact; it is an evidence that ten years ago we Mr. Landerkin.

were not in the same independent position that we are in to-day. I do not think, after the election that has just taken place in Stanstead county that any man will stand up in this House and say that the President of the Council does not represent that constituency. He represented that constituency ten years ago, he expressed opinions then that he knew were in accord with those of his constituents, and he has, during this debate, given expressions of opinion which he knows are in accord with the views of his constituents and of the people of the neighboring counties. I quite agree with him. So far as I can see, when our beef, when our pork, when our mutton-not lambs, remember, but mutton—when our cheese and butter, when all these articles are worth more money in Canada than they are in the United States, when there is a large export trade of all these products, amounting to thousands and thousands of dollars made from the United States, were we to open the gates and allow the United States to come into this country where there is a better market than she has got, I cannot see by what means the farming community of this country are going to be benefited by allowing them to come in. Not believing in retaliation myself, I do not believe the statesmen of the United States, men who are elected to Congress to represent a great country, will lower themselves down to these considerations of retaliation. I do not believe it. We do not believe it on this side of the House, and I hardly think hon. gentlemen opposite believe it either. give them credit for a higher and a more elevated view of public questions than to suppose they would consider, for instance, that a certain resolution that was introduced the other day with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway and its bonding privileges across the State of Maine, was introduced for the purpose of retaliation, because we have, as they say, prohibited the importation of one sheep into Canada. Well, Sir, I began to say that perhaps the President of the Council may, to some extent, have changed his opinions, and I think the circumstances, the times in which we live, warrant a change of those opinions, if there is a change. We have known a certain administration which existed for four or five years in this country, which had for its Finance Minister a man no doubt of remarkable ability, so considered by the party which he to-day, in part, leads. He was Finance Minister for this country for four or five years, and during that time he was interviewed by hundreds of delegations of all kinds, from all sections of this country, asking him to change his views. Well, he did not change his views, but he changed his side of the House. He went over with his party, and he is there to-day, and judging from the arguments they have advanced in this debate, he is likely to stay there for some years to come. They say that we intended in introducing this resolution to flatter the farming community of this country. Gentlemen, that is just exactly what we intended to do. We intend to give them protection, we believe they are worthy of consideration at the hands of this Government, and if there is any means in our power by which we can benefit the farming community of Canada, from one end of the country to the other, we are prepared to do it, we are going to do it on this occasion, and we shall do it on future occasions. If the farming community to-day enjoy any advantages, if they have any future in this country, they owe it to the Conservative party. They have received from that party every particle of protection they ever received from any party. They have received from us the expansion of their home markets by the introduction of the National Policy, and the establishment of manufactures in various parts of the country, a home market which did not exist before that party came into power. If they have the means of transport of their merchandise and the products of their farms to market at reasonable prices, if they have railroads and canals all over this Canada of ours, they owe it to the Conservative party. The farmers now acknowledge, and the people all acknowledge, that the Conservative party have a mortgage upon their hearts, and every four years they pay us the compliment by returning us to power with as substantial majorities as we have received from time to time in the past. An hon. gentleman opposite, in dealing with agricultural products of the Province of Quebec, has referred to the duties that the United States propose to put upon hay. He says that the great market for hay produced in the valley of the St. Lawrence, is on the other side of line 45. if that is the case, it must be a very poor market, because all the barns in that Province are full of hay, that whole valley is stuffed with hay, and the farmers cannot get a sufficient price to warrant them in shipping it to the United States. If the Americans do put on that duty it will be the best thing that ever happened to the valley of the St. Lawrence, for this reason, that from one end of that valley to the other, for many years back, they have been exporting hay to the United States, along with other products of their farms. In exporting these productions every year they have been exporting the fertility of their soil. It is like a man having a bank account and continually drawing out money and never making a deposit. It is only a certain length of time before that soil becomes exhausted, and that time is fast approaching. So, if the United States in their wisdom see fit to impose such a duty as will prohibit the importation of hay from Canada, it will force the people who live in the St. Lawrence valley to direct their attention to the raising of cattle, to the production of butter, cheese and pork, on all of which we are going to give them protection, and I believe that ten years from to-day the people who live in that valley will see that they have been benefited by the hay duty, the same as the manufacturers and other industries of this country were benefited by the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, which forced us to be more independent and to rely upon our own resources.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not intend to make a speech, but I was reading, to-day, something that Bill Nye, an American humorist, said to the farmers in the West, and I was reminded of it by hearing what our young friend has said about what protection has done for the farmers. Bill Nye's description of a western farmer may possibly be a little exaggerated, but I think it will be interesting to the House. He says:

"What are the prospects for farmers in your State? Well, they are pore. Never was so pore, in fact, sence I've been there. Folks wonder why boys leaves the farm. My boys left so as to get protected, they said, and so they went into a clothing store one of 'em, and one went into hardware, and one is talkin' protection in the Legislature this winter. They said that farmin' was gettin' like fishin' and huntin'; well enough for a man that has means and leisure, but they couldn't make a livin' at it, they said. Another boy is in a drug are, and the man that hires him says he is a royal feller. Gaid. Another boy is in a drug are, and the man that thires him says he is a royal feller. He waited until I had laughed all I wanted to, and then he said. I have always hollered for high tariff in order to hyst the public debt, but now that we've got the national debt coopered, I wish they'd take a little hack at mine. I've put in fifty years farmin'. I never drank licker in any form. I've worked from ten to eighteen hours a day; been economical in cloze, and never went to a show mor' a dozen times in my life. Raised a family, and learned upwards of two hundred calves to drink out of a tin pail without blowing the milk up my sleeve. My wife worked alongside o'me sewin' new seats on the boys pants, skimmin' milk, and even helpin' me load hay. For forty years we toiled along together, and hardly got time to look into each other's faces, or dared to stop and get acquainted with each other. Then her health failed. Ketched cold in the spring house, prob'ly skimmin' milk and washin' pans and scaldin' pails and spankin' butter. Anyhow she took in a long breth one day while the doctor and me was watchin' her. And she says to me, Henry, says she. I've got a chance to rest, and she put one tired, wornout hand on top of the other tired, wornout hand on top of the other tired, wornout hand and I knew she'd gone where they don't work all day and do chores all night. I took time to kiss her then, I'd been too busy for a good while previse to that, and then I called in the boys. After the deep on mother's grave up there in the old berryin' ground. Then both of us looked out of the car window quite a long time without saying anything. I don't blame the boys for goin' into something else, long's other things pays better; but I say—and I say what I know-that the man who holds the prosperity of this country in his hands, t

Mr. FOSTER. After the very vivid description of the state of the American farmers, and the feelings of commiseration which they naturally arouse, I think in consideration of the late hour of adjournment last night, the Committee might rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I move accordCommittee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 10th April, 1890.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock. Prayers.

INDIAN ADVANCEMENT ACT AMEND-MENT.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 132) to amend the Indian Advancement Act. He said: The first clause of this Bill gives power to the Indian Council to pass regulations as to the size and style of sleighs, similar to the power given to the adjoining municipalities. The next clause provides for the disqualification of any councillor who does not attend the meetings, and of any one who refrains from voting when assisting at the same. The third clause is to make provision for the day on which the nomination of candidates to the council shall take place. All these have been asked for by the Indians.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 133) further to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue. He said: The first change proposed in the law is, that we take power to ascertain the quantity of spirits by weight as well as by gauge. We have found that there may be abuses under the provision, that spirits may be bottled in presence of an Excise officer. Spirits are often put up by parties not under the supervision of an officer of the Department, and they are labelled in such a way as to mislead the public.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand, that the Minister intends that any person who wishes to bottle spirits, has to do so under the supervision of an officer of the Inland Revenue?

Mr. COSTIGAN. This has been the law for several years. The intention is to prevent people from putting spirits into bottles and obtaining the apparent assent of the Inland Revenue Department as to the age and purity of the spirits, unless the bottling is done in the presence of an officer of the Department. Another provision has been found necessary in regard to methylated spirits. Under the former system, abuses arose, and it was found necessary to bring the manufacture of methylated spirits under the control of the Department, and to distribute them from this point. We find, however, that some amendment is necessary in reference to this. The next change is a repeal of that section of the excise law which empowers the Department to make a refund of the duty paid on corn which goes into the production of spirits to be exported. There is also a repeal of the clause which gives the De-Mr. Foster.

partment power to refund the duty on malt used in the production of beer for export. Next, there is a change in the duty on tobacco put up in packages. After consultation with the trade in the different parts of the country, it was thought that packages might be put up as small as to contain five pounds each, and that they would better meet the requirements of the retail trade. some manufacturers objected to putting it up in these small packages, on account of the increased cost. Others-for instance, Mr. Mc-Donald, of Montreal-believed that it was inconvenient and injurious to the tobacco to put it up in small packages. Hence that gave rise to seizures of tobacco in many parts of the country, where small packages were illegally opened. Under this change, on all packages of four pounds and less, there will be one cent less duty collected. That will be a sort of indemnity for putting up these small-sized packages. There is another provision to remedy abuses that are complained of in every part of the country with reference to cigars, and it provides for the destruction of empty cigar boxes. This is in the interest of the honest trader and the honest consumer. The law does not allow a manufacturer to use empty boxes, because generally empty boxes are filled with cigars of a grade inferior to that of the cigars which it at first contained, and this is to provide for the destruction of empty boxes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there anything in that Bill about stamping leather?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, that does not come under this Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. But I understand you mix up tobacco and cigars with liquor.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is not the General Inspection Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has the hon. gentleman withdrawn that Bill which was under discussion the other day, for the stamping of leather?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman will see that Bill on the Order paper.

Mr. MITCHELL. You still intend to prosecute that Bill?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is on the Order paper.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the question: Do you intend following up that Bill?—because I have understood that it was to be dropped. Parties interested have asked me to ascertain whether it was really dropped or not.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Representations have been made by gentlemen interested in the Bill; both sides have been heard, and we have promised that their recommendations shall be considered before any further action is taken on the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then it is not settled yet?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No further action has been taken on the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. It seems to me that, Session after Session, the Department of Inland Revenue changes and tinkers with the law, when there is no reason for it. We ought to have some settled policy with reference to the legislation of that Department.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What is the object of the Minister in taking power under this Act to weigh liquor?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is to provide for greater accuracy in cases like this: For instance, there are tanks in large distilleries with a capacity of from 15,000 to 18,000 gallons. They are constructed of copper and set up on foundations made of brick or stone, and, after these tanks are filled, it is possible that through the great weight in them, they may settle on one side or the other, or in the centre, and thus affect the gauging, as we are accustomed to take the measurement by gauge. We have found by experience that the gauging has been affected in some cases by the settling of the tanks. We all know that weight is an exact way of ascertaining quantity, and so we take power to weigh also.

Mr. JONES (Holifax). How could you weigh a tank of liquor that was on a solid foundation?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The weighing machine is set up near the tank and connected, so that a whole tank can be weighed in three or four drafts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

UNITED STATES FISHING VESSELS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON (for Mr. TUPPER) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 134) respecting fishing vessels of the United States of America. He said: It simply continues the modus vivendi in relation to United States fishing vessels for another year, on the same terms.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it simply a repetition of the modus vivendi of two years ago?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. MITCHELL. How long is it to continue? Sir JOHN THOMPSON. One year.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do the Government expect in the meantime that something definite will be arrived at?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They have hopes and expectations that some arrangement will be arrived at.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COLBY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 135) to amend the Seamen's Act, chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes. He said: At present there is no appeal whatever, and no opportunity is afforded to remove by certiorari or question in any way a commitment made for offences under the Seamen's Act. This Bill is to make the law less stringent in this respect, and afford an opportunity to remove the case by certiorari to the Superior Court.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved:

That the first report of the Select Committee ap-pointed to supervise the Official Debates of the present Session, be referred back for further consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman explain the object of this resolution?

Mr. DESJARDINS. When I moved the other day the adoption of the report, a discussion arose lighthouse keeper at Greenly Island?

on the motion and the committee did not appear to agree on the signification of the report, and so it has been deemed advisable to withdraw it for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. WALDIE asked, Whether the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and the Queen's Printer have complied with the provisions of subsection 6 of section 6 of the Act 52 Victoria, chapter 9, amending the Electoral Franchise Act, in respect to those electoral districts where the lists were completed and returned before the 31st December, 1889? Have the provisions of sub-section 7 of section 6 of above-named Act been complied with, and is it the duty of the revising officer to furnish members of this House with the copy of the voters' lists therein mentioned? Or, if not; what officer?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. So far as it is possible to provide, under the provisions of the law, that a copy of the voters' lists shall be sent to each member and defeated candidate at the previous election, I said, the other day, that the Government thought the revising officer was the proper officer to give or send a copy of the list to such person, as he is the first official to complete a list and to receive the list after being finally printed. The copy goes to the Queen's Printer and to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the use of the public, according to law. The revising officer should supply members and defeated candidates with copies of the list.

GREEN COVE BREAKWATER, YARMOUTH COUNTY.

Mr. LOVITT asked, Whether the Government have accepted any tender or made any contract for repairing and rebuilding the destroyed portion of Green Cove Breakwater, County of Yarmouth? If so, what is the name of the contractor, and when is the work to be finished? If not, what is the reason?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To the first part of the question, I reply, no. The lowest tenderer was A. McKinnon, of Cow Bay, N.S. The reason why the contract was not given was that the amount of money voted for the work was not sufficient, and as we are asking for an additional amount in the Supplementary Estimates, I had to wait for that vote. It is our intention to proceed with the work so soon as that vote is obtained. I may take this opportunity of stating that, when I answered the hon. gentleman in regard to this work, I made a mistake. There are two works of a similar name in our books, and I mistook the work in regard to which explanation was asked, and, therefore, I gave an erroneous statement to the hon. gentleman. But as he knew all about it, I do not think I have misled him. At all events, the work will be proceeded with as soon as the small amount of money required for the completion of the work shall be voted.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER AT GREENLY ISLAND.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Why was Louis Couillard de Beaumont deprived of his situation as

Mr. COLBY. He was removed on the report of the Acting Inspector of Lighthouses for Quebec, as being almost useless, and could not be depended on to attend to the duties required at that important station.

THE BANKING BILL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works, in the absence of the Finance Minister, when the Government are likely to take up the second reading of the Banking Bill? I make this request because several communications have been addressed to me, by parties deeply interested, to know when the Government intend to take up this Bill. I think it desirable that reasonable intimation be given.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not likely that it will come up before Wednesday.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 130) to amend the Interpretation Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of this Bill?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is a very short Bill to prevent inferences arising from the repeal or amendment of statutes. We have had cases in which the contention has been made, that, because an amendment to a statute has been passed to remove a doubt or make the meaning of Parliament clear, the inference has been set up, both in the claims against the Departments, and in litigation otherwise, that the law must have been otherwise, or the statute would not have been so adopted. The last sub-section is likewise a common section in the Interpretation Acts, namely, that we do not, by the adoption of a statute, or the re-enactment of a statute, adopt the construction which may have been put upon the same language in a former Act. It has been held that when Parlia-ment adopts legislation on the same subject as existing legislation, and adopts the same phrases, it adopts likewise the construction which these phrases have received.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that the last clause is rather objectionable, and that it is likely to create considerable confusion. When we have rules of construction, which have been adopted for a long time, it appears to me that to change them without some pressing reason, rather creates confusion, and that where judicial constructions have been put on statutory language, it is but reasonable to infer that Parliament, in using that language, should be considered to have adopted the judicial interpretation. Otherwise, different courts would be at liberty to construe the statute in different directions, whereas, if the rule stands as it is now, the courts would all adopt pretty much the same construction. strikes me, from an examination of the Bill, that it introduces some novel principles.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, if a decision which establishes the meaning of certain phrases in an enactment is a sound decision, its soundness will not be in the least degree affected. But what I object to, and what I seek to remove by this section, is the fiction—and it is a pure fiction—that Parliament means something which it really does not mean, and had in view something which it had not in view. In consequence of the supposition that everyone knows the law, and that members of Parliament know the construction which has been put on the language of Parliament, the courts have adopted the theory that members of Parliament know every decision in the country establishing the meaning of every phrase in every statute which has come under review in the courts. That is not a safe rule to act upon, because it would be necessary that we should know, not only the decision of the highest court in the country, but also the decisions of the Superior Courts in each one of the Provinces, and all members of Parliament should be familiar with these, in order to justify a fiction of that kind.

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister of Justice, I am sure, will agree with me that it is not advisable to disturb the existing laws, especially in general principles, unless some grievance, or some injustice, has been alleged because of the decisions of the bench. I would like to enquire from the Minister of Justice if any case has recently arisen, on account of which he thinks it advisable to bring in such legislation; and if he can tell us any particular case in which the law has been found insufficient as it already exists?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The other day, when introducing the Bill, I cited a recent case in regard to one of these matters. I do not want it to be supposed, however, that this was the reason for the introduction of the Bill. The decision to The decision to which I refer is doubtless sound, but it introduces a reasoning in regard to the construction of our law, which, I think, it is not safe to be allowed to be followed. I admit that the decision does not proceed upon new lines at all, and, therefore, the fault rests with those who from time to time have had an opportunity of making the Interpretation Act more clear than it is upon these points. A short time ago there came before the Exchequer Court in the first instance, and the Supreme Court on appeal, litigation with respect to the Customs tariff, on the question of certain tea imported from the United States. The particulars I can hardly relate in detail, as I only speak from memory, but the contention was set up by the claimant against the Customs Department, that the tea which in point of fact, and as regards commercial usage, was clearly imported from the United States and admitted to be so imported, was not to be considered as imported from the United States, because, in order to guard against the abuse and the attempt to defraud, the Customs tariff had been altered so as to make it perfectly clear that an importation of that kind could not be made. Under the provisions of the Customs Act, which says that tea imported from the United States shall be subject to a higher duty than tea imported from the country of growth, certain persons intending to evade the provisions of that section, as their counsel admitted, imported tea into the United States from the country of growth with a view of importing it into Canada and for no other purpose. Having got it into the United States, it was put into the bonding ware-house and there abandoned to the authorities in consequence of non-payment of duty. It was then sold, and bought at a nominal price by the persons who were engaged in the importation, and then sent into Canada as being tea from the country of Surely one would suppose that those engaged in framing the tariff should consider this an importation of tea from the United States and not from the country of growth. When the contention was made, that this could be done, and that the Customs tariff could be so evaded, the Minister of Customs, to remove the doubt and to make the meaning of Parliament clear, brought in an amendment of the Customs tariff, and, in consequence of his having obtained this enactment, the inference was established that the law must have been otherwise before the amendment was passed. Of course, I do not think that the merits of this Bill should be considered on the merits of this case, or by the mere fact of that being a grievance or not being a grievance. It seems to me a clear principle, which has been adopted in other countries, and also, I think, by all the Provinces in their Interpretation Acts; and it is proper, I think, to meet the convenience of Parliament and to avoid fictitious inferences being drawn, that we should pass this Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BLAKE. I would very much like to know, in fuller detail from the hon. Minister of Justice, how far these proposed alterations are in accord with what he understands to be the present practice of interpreting statutes in the same regard in England, and to what extent they are in accord with what has been adopted in the Provinces; because I cannot conceive anything of greater consequence than that we should not without reason create diversities in the principles of interpretation. Our great difficulty, I might almost say our great scandal, at present, is the uncertainty of the law, and if we change the principle of interpretation, we deprive ourselves of the light given by the great body of judicial construction to statutes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As to the rule of interpretation in England, my impression is that no such rule of construction as that which is declared there not to prevail has prevailed by force of any subsequent decisions, although it has been much called in question.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that the repeal of an Act necessarily involves the idea that that Act is in force. I cannot understand how an Act of this Parliament can effect anything unless it alters or does away with something that was previously in force. If an Act is ultra vires, of course it does not require any repeal.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have had instances in our legislation of enactments which existed before Confederation, and which have been practically superseded by legislation on the same subject by this Parliament; and after the lapse of years, when the early legislation has been considered to be entirely obsolete, that legislation has been distinctly repealed. It has been in some cases contended that the repeal implied that the legislation had been in force.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me reasonable that we should not repeal any Act which is not in force. If we perform the unnecessary operation of doing that, we expose ourselves to the judicial view that we are doing something that we think necessary, and that we did suppose that it was in force or we should not have repealed it. Of course, we are just now passing a law for all time-not to meet contingencies which we have already got rid of, or the case of obsolete laws; but we are adopting a canon of construction and interpretation which is to apply to Acts of Parliament which have been passed since Confederation, and which will be passed in the future. Taking it as a general proposition, that as law makers we do not undertake to repeal a law that is not in force, it is a fair inference, from the fact of our repealing it, that we assumed that it was then in force. What we assumed that it was then in force. I dread, from the whole plan of the Bill, is that some of those landmarks of decision, those judicial inferences which have been drawn from time to time, may be got rid of-that everything may be left at large and loose to create fresh uncertainty as to the construction and interpretation of the

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not dispute the correctness of the reasoning, that Parliament should not repeal a statute that is not in force; but we sometimes find that doubts exist as to the continuance of early statutes. Cases have actually arisen, in which we have found it necessary, in order to effectually remove all doubts as to the repeal of a statute, that it should be repealed both by the Provincial Legislature and by this Parliament. One of the Provincial Legislatures, at its last Session, passed a statute repealing an Act which had been repealed by this Parliament many years before. The contention will necessarily arise under the present rule of construction, that in that Province, that Act was in force down to the time the Provincial Legislature repealed it. The question is, whether that inference should attach to our legislation, and whether the fair meaning of a statute should not be left for the court to decide.

Mr. BLAKE. That is just the question, whether it is not a fair inference, from the solemn legislative Act of this Parliament repealing a law, that this Parliament conceived there was a law to repeal.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me the illustration given by the Minister of Justice does not apply. He said that a Local Legislature last year repealed a law which had long ago been repealed by this Parliament. I suppose it had been repealed by this Parliament without authority?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, with authority. Mr. LAURIER. Then the Act of the Local Legislature repealing it was lex non scripta, and the inference sought to be drawn from that does not apply.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not aware of the particular case to which the Minister of Justice has alluded, but I presume it was one which the Provincial Legislature thought came within their jurisdiction, and that the repeal by this Parliament was ultra vires. I cannot see any other ground on which the Provincial Legislature could interfere at all in the matter. We well know there was a certain class of legislation before Confederation—perhaps more than one class—in respect of which there was a somewhat divided authority after Confederation, which rendered it necessary, in order to effect a complete repeal, that there should be legislation both provincial and federal. But no inference can be drawn from such cases to apply to cases which arise after Confederation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am well aware of the class of statutes the hon. gentleman refers to, but it is not with that class this section proposes to deal. I will, however, allow the section to stand.

On section 59,

Mr. LAURIER. This section seems to me to be liable to the same objection. It is contrary to all the views hitherto held, that to amend a law is to change it.

Mr. BLAKE. The action of Parliament with reference to a pre-existing law may be said to consist of two divisions-amendment and declaration. There may be cases in which Parliament may think the courts have not fairly interpreted the meaning which Parliament intended to give to an Act, and Parliament may exercise the somewhat delicate power of declaring what it meant by its former Act, and may thus interpret its own legislation. That would be an Act declaring, not that the legislation in itself was ever different from what Parliament declared it to be, but that such was the meaning of the law ab initio. That is declaration. The other form is that of amendment, and it is with that this sub-section deals. If you amend, you do change. You may change for the better or worse, but an amendment is, or is intended to be, a change, and when we proceed to say, that in performing an act, the very essence of which is change, the presumption is not to be one of an intent to change, we are performing again what is a very extraordinary operation, and once again getting rid of what, upon the whole, has seemed to me to be not an inconvenient view on the part of the judiciary. It is quite true that the construction may be sometimes, as to this and the other instances, a fiction. But with reference to this sub-section, I think it must be plain that when a body of legislators engage in the process of amending a law, they indicate, by that very act, their view that they are changing the law, or, at any rate, it must be presumed that those in that body who are mainly responsible for the legal and formal portions of the legislation, are engaged in such a process. On the whole, it seems to me that the same objection which applies to the first section applies to this one.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the House were engaged in establishing a parliamentary system of government, the hon. gentleman's reasoning would be very difficult to assail. But I do not find it at all difficult to assail in this case, because in our experience, both of Provincial and Dominion Parliaments, we can point to illustrations in every Session of laws being said to be amended without any change being made or intended to be made in them. have passed such amendments this Session by the score, and by the score in every Session this Parliament has sat. We have passed such amendments oftentimes to make a law clear, oftentimes to remove doubts which the decision of an inferior and oftentimes incompetent tribunal has attached to a statute. In such cases, we have the remedy which the hon, gentleman has suggested, of declaring that the meaning of the original Act was otherwise. That is a pretty bold step for Parliament to take, and a step it very rarely takes, of declar- upon the facts as well as upon the law. At present, Mr. BLAKE.

ing the meaning of a law, the meaning of which has come into controversy, because in doing this Parliament assumes, to a certain extent, judicial functions, and declares that which is usually left to the courts to declare. For that reason declara-tory language is generally avoided, and we prefer to pass an Act, some of the sections of which amend the statute and others of which are intended not to amend the statute and do not amend it; but they all pass under the head of an Act to amend a certain statute, and the inference to be drawn, according to the contention just made, and sometimes made in the courts, is that a section which has not changed the law does change it. I do not find fault with the argument of the hon. gentleman, that when Parliament amends a law it designs to make a change, or with his proposition that Parliament ought not to pass an Act amending another Act unless the amending Act really accomplishes that object; but I object to the inference being drawn by a court, not that Parliament thought the law was different from what it was, but that the law was different because Parliament thought so. I am quite willing to allow the clause to stand.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 129) further to amend the Act to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice whether this clause, apart from the enlargement which he now makes clear as to the right of appeal in all classes of cases, makes any other difference in the previous law?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No. The change is simply contained in the first line and the eleventh line, in regard to the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose under this the Crown, as well as the other party, has the right of appeal? Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

There have been some cases in Mr. BLAKE. the hon. gentleman's Department—one with reference, I think, to the construction of some bridge over a canal, in which it was possible that by a limitation of the appeal to a certain point, an objection might be raised by the Crown to the Suppose a party were suing the whole case. Crown, and the Crown were to make an objection to the whole claim, will the same thing be open to the other side?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The present practice is to do that by a cross appeal. In the case related ferred to the claimant appeals on the ground that the award was too small, and the Crown appealed on the ground that it was too large, and was made under mistake.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the Minister of Justice might give some consideration to another feature in connection with the Exchequer Court. As a rule, the claims brought before that court are of great magnitude. I think it is right that such a court, having to deal with such large claims, should have its judgments liable to be reviewed if there is an appeal to the Supreme Court, it is only on the question of law, and we know how appellate judges are circumscribed by rules, and how they refuse to review the findings of the court below in reference to facts. I have heard of some awards made already by the Court of Exchequer, of vast sums, which have somewhat surprised the public, and I think there ought to be a provision made in the law so that the Supreme Court may have original jurisdiction as nearly as may be, considering that the witnesses are not actually examined before the Supreme Court. There is no other court where such large claims come before it for adjudication, as the Exchequer Court. It is unique in that regard, and I think nothing short of the full and unlimited right of appeal, in that way, will meet the interests of the public.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No doubt, what the hon, gentleman says is worthy of consideration. I would remind him, and perhaps he is aware of it, that the claimant is not precluded from asking a review of the decision of the judge on questions of fact. There is now an appeal on questions of fact, and the practice is for the judges above to hear an argument on questions of fact as well as of law, and sometimes to revise the decision of the judge below on questions of fact. All that can be said about it is, that there is an inference in favor of the correctness of the finding of the judge of first instance on the question of fact. It is true, that there is now an appeal of questions of fact as well as of law, but I admit, that it is not as full as if in allowing the appeal we gave the court above the complete revision of the decision of the court below, as is done in some countries.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 65) further to amend the Criminal Law. He said: I will ask the House, when it goes into committee, to take up the latest reprint of this Bill, which has been distributed. It is reprinted as proposed to be amended in Committee of the Whole. The Bill contains a number of amendments to the law, with regard both to the criminal law and the law of procedure. There is a provision in the first section which is slightly more stringent than the existing law, with regard to seduction, in which a criminal assault on a female is punishable. Section 10, which is to be read in connection with section 1, contains a provision and penalties for unlawful and carnal knowledge and abuse of a girl under the age of 13. Sections I and 10 together will give us a more stringent rule than is found in our present statutes, and will adopt the English rule on both those subjects. The second section of the Bill is a provision for the punishment of persons who seduce those who are under their protection, or who are in their employment. It punishes a guardian for seducing his ward, and punishes employers and workmen in factories, and foremen in factories, and foremen in factories, who seduce females who are in their service and in their employment. I have added a sub-section which will enable the defendant to testify in his own behalf, and will

a penalty for acts of gross immorality committed in reference to a male person. We have upon that subject very little law, and we have no remedy for offences which are now notorious in another country, and which have made their appearance in this country. It will, therefore, be necessary, I think, that a clause of that kind, which is in the English Act, shall be adopted here. I propose, however, in committee, to enlarge the maximum term of imprisonment from two years. In this class of offences which, as I have said, have obtained some notoriety in the mother country, and which have made their appearance here in one or two places, the maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment, I think, is entirely inadequate. Section 4 is intended to remove doubts as to whether there is an offence when only one person is present where there is an improper exposure. Section 5 is to remove doubt as to the effect of consent of young persons. I will explain that more fully in committee, and give the authority which makes that seem necessary. The sixth section is materially changed in the reprint of the Bill, and is intended to establish a penalty for the crime of incest, as to which there has been no legislation, although some attempted legislation, in the Parliament of Canada. As a matter of fact, most of the small Provinces had, before the Union, penal legislation for that offence, and very severe legislation. That legislation is still in force, and offenders are occasionally being tried before the courts having criminal jurisdiction in the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia, and, I think, Prince Edward Island, for the crime of incest. We have, in the prisons of those Provinces, now, convicts who are serving long terms for that offence. The anomaly exists that in the two Provinces which formerly constituted the Province of Canada, that which is a highly punishable offence in the other Provinces, is not an offence at all, not involving, even, one hour's imprisonment. The facts go almost without saying that the necessity exists for it in these two Provinces, and that the offence is not an uncommon one. As a matter of fact, some of the prisoners now in the penitentiaries of those two Provinces, who are convicts for the crime of rape, have committed the grosser offence of committing that assault on their own children. In one of those Provinces a case was brought to my notice a few weeks ago, of a person who has cohabited with his own child and had twelve offspring by her, and he continues in that state of cohabitation in spite of any remonstrance either from Church or State. We therefore see the two facts I have represented: First, that this crime is highly punishable in several Provinces of the Dominion and not in others; and second, that in those other Provinces the necessity exists, even to a greater degree. I have restricted the operation of the section very much since the Bill was introduced, in order to remove any possible trouble on the score of interference with the marriage relation, and it is now, therefore, confined to parent and child, brother and sister, grandparent and grand-Section 7 is for the punishment of a parent or guardian who procures the defilement of his child or ward. Section 8 is intended to extend the prohibition of bigamy. It is to make a second marriage punishable during require the evidence of the prosecutrix to be the life of wife or husband, whether the marriage corroborated. The third section of the Bill contains the marriages takes place simultaneously, or on the In case of marrying more than one person on the same day, or both at the same time, the parties were not punishable under the present law. Section 9 deals with the practice of polygamy, which I am not aware yet exists in Canada, but which we are threatened with; and I think it will be much more prudent that legislation should be adopted at once in anticipation of the offence, if there is any probability of its introduction, rather than we should wait until it has become established in Canada. Section 10 I have already explained. Section 11 contains a provision which seems to be very necessary with respect to the hearing of a charge in regard to which it may be important to consider the statement made by a person too young to know the nature of an oath. We have seen very gross offenders escape, on the simple plea of not guilty, in clear cases of assault on children, for the simple reason that there was no possibility of taking the child's statement without the sanction of an oath, and the simple taking of that statement would have been sufficient to have put the prisoner on his defence and procure conviction. Section 12 is to remove doubts as to cases in which there is personation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is such a section absolutely necessary? I do not understand how such an offence can occur. I never heard of such a thing occurring in Canada.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has occurred in England, and it called for a statute of the United Kingdom. Cases of that kind are reported.

Mr. MITCHELL. Such a section seems to me to be unnecessary. If a woman does not know whether her husband or someone else is in bed with her, it is a strange thing.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I now come to section This is one which will require very serious consideration, because it proposes to carry the law with respect to false pretences as to future events. Section 18 is a section which has been asked by persons connected with the labor organisations, for the purpose of removing doubt as to their liability to prosecution for conspiracy where they simply desire to refrain from entering the employment of any person, in consequence of the violation of the rules which have been laid down for their guidance as members of the organisation. In one case there was a conviction in consequence of the determination of members of one of the labor organisations, according to their rules, to refrain from working at a certain place; and they desire to have it enacted that it shall not be a criminal conspiracy to do anything that is not contrary to I understand that now to be the law, and the only hesitation I have in asking the Committee to adopt this section, is that I so understand the law at present. The requests of the labor organisations have gone somewhat further, as I must explain in order to state the whole case to the They desire that persons shall not Committee. be punishable unless they enter into a combination to do something punishable by statute. That would leave out of consideration entirely conspiracies to do that which is prohibited by common law. It is true that the criminal code is so extensive that there are but few offences punishable by law, which are not punishable by statute, but there are some, and boycotting in its most malignant phase, have not been misinformed, very painful cases have Sir John Thompson.

is one of these offences. I am not able to acquiesce in the request of the labor organisation, because it would relieve from punishment persons who conspire against the law in some cases, which are not within the purview or knowledge of those who have requested the more extensive changes to be There is a provision in section 19 to relax the somewhat ancient law with regard to jurors deliberating on their verdict, and to permit that they may, in the discretion of the judge, be allowed to use a fire while deliberating out of court, and to have reasonable refreshment. The law which makes it necessary that a jury, in order to hasten its deliberations, shall both shiver and starve at the same time, is too obsolete for the modern administration of justice, and we propose to have it amended. A request in this respect came from the Government of Ontario, and since then a Bill has been introduced into the British House of Commons to accomplish the same change there. There are various provisions likewise in the Act with reference to the law of summary convictions. These are somewhat complicated, and refer to matters of practice, and I hope the House will allow me to explain them more fully in committee, when I can present authorities and details. There is likewise a provision, adopted in accordance with legislation in Manitoba, in relation to reformatories for boys. Notwithstanding that this Bill is a somewhat long one, I shall have to ask the House to consider, in addition to the provisions I am offering here, some others which have been requested by the Governments of several Provinces, to amend certain other provisions, notably with reference to juvenile offenders. It is desired by the Governments of three Provinces that provision should be made enlarging the present enactments with reference to industrial schools, and juvenile reformatories, so as to increase the number of these institutions to which offenders may be sentenced. I was unable to draft all these provisions in the Bill, even down to this day, because the preparation of these clauses required, not only conference with the provincial authorities as to the nature of the provisions which would be acceptable to them, but likewise concurrent legislation in these Provinces, and that legislation has only just been consummated. The provisions on that subject, I will be able to show the House, have in every case the concurrent action of the Provincial Legisla-tures, and will be introduced at the request of the Provincial Governments. The concurrent legislation was necessary in order to establish these industrial schools and reformatories as places of detention where prisoners can lawfully be detained after they are sentenced under our criminal law, and likewise it was necessary that provision should be made by the municipalities, at the instance of the Provincial Legislatures, for the support of persons who, from time to time, may be sentenced to detention in these institutions.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

I would ask the Minister of Mr. BLAKE. Justice if there is any sufficient reason for the limitation of the age to twenty-one years, because, if I occurred where the age was over twenty-one, and where the impoverished condition of the unfortunate woman, and her state of subordination, was the cause of the seduction?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know that there is any reason why the age should be limited, and I would be willing to extend it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that at the age of twenty-one, a girl is quite able to take care of herself, and I do not see any reason for extending the time. It appears to me that the whole Bill has a very great tendency to giving facilities for blackmailing, and that is a thing which should be carefully guarded against by this House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That may be said with reference to every enactment. Cases have occurred, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has mentioned, calling for this remedy, and they have been brought formally to the notice of this Government by the Labor Commission, in their report, which gives details of the evidence with reference to these cases in factories. cordance with that report, the labor organisations have very properly asked that we shall make it an offence for a person who has a female employed in his factory, to seduce her, or to use the power which his position as employer gives him, to destroy her character. Under this Bill, the defendant has a right to be a witness on his own behalf, and the plaintiff's evidence requires corroboration, so that the provisions of the Act will be surrounded by all necessary safeguards. The defendant can have the benefit of his own testimony, and the incriminating evidence must be corroborated, which is rarely required in the criminal law. I move that the age be thirty years instead of twenty-one years.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not object to the principle of the section, but I object to extending the age to thirty years, because I think that a girl at the age of twenty-one is quite able to take care of herself. I think the whole tenor of this Bill is to give facilities for blackmailing individuals, and we should be extremely careful not to extend those facilities. I think the section was all right as it was before, and I object to the suggestion made by the hon. member for West Durham.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend seems to forget that this legislation has been recommended by a commission which was empowered to investigate the relations between masters and servants in factories. In our civilisation those relations are different from what they are in families, and circumstances have occurred in which the employers of labor have taken advantage of women, who were over twenty-one it is true, but who, in consequence of destitution were, to a great extent, in the power of those men. If a man is base enough to take advantage of any woman who is dependent upon him in his factory, I would not object at all to fixing the age to thirty years.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have never heard of an instance of advantage being taken of a woman who was not pretty willing to accede, and I do not think we should place men in charge of factories at the mercy of the female sex, because that is what this Bill is doing.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not see why a criminal act, committed on a female under twenty-one arts which are developed by experience. We years, should not be a criminal act if committed on a woman of thirty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Better make it fifty.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see no necessity for a limit at all; but I think the age of thirty is a fair compromise between that and the clause of the Rill.

Mr. DAVIN. I have a great deal of sympathy with the view taken by the hon. member for West Durham. I think, from what I have read, that the relationship existing between owners or fore-men of factories, and their female employees, is liable to great abuse, and I certainly think that any man who abuses that relationship, should be punished. But the question is, after all, not thoroughly grasped when we look at it from that point of view alone. You have to take into account the possibility of the owner or foreman of a factory having in his employ others besides such destitute, poor women as the hon. member for West Durham referred to. There have been heartrending cases of authority having been used to drag down, probably virtuous women, into degradation. I grant all that; but suppose, on the other hand, that there is a designing woman in the employ of a master or a foreman. A limit of thirty years of age is suggested, but we read that Ninon de l'Enclos, at the age of eighty, was one of the most fascinating women in Paris.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is she alive yet?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think so. If she were, I would not give her address to my hon. friend from Northumberland. I entirely sympathise with the attitude of the Bill, and with the remarks made by the hon, member for West Durham; but you ought not merely to punish the scoundrel who in the position of employer or foreman takes advantage of his authority over the women under him, but you have also to protect the employer, who might possibly be an innocent man. Amongst the women in his employ there might be a designing woman who would throw herself very much in his way, and who would do what has been done again and again in the history of the world, namely, seduce him. Hon. gentlemen sometimes speak as though seduction was only an offence against women; but any man who knows anything of the history of mankind, or who is acquainted with the world, knows that seduction is just as often effected by the woman as by the man. With the sentimental view of pity for a poor girl who means to be virtuous, but who is exposed to the danger of being dragged down by her employer, I have the fullest sympathy; but we know that there are bad women as well as bad men. The right hon. leader of the Government refers me to the case of Potiphar's wife. Of course, we know that such cases have occur-red. We could refer to cases where women have been sent to act as diplomats even, and sent to men who were known to be of a certain temperament and easily led to lapse from the direct and straight course, in order to influence the minds of such men, even with regard to political affairs. I say, then, that the twenty-one year limit is a proper limit, because I hold that, after twenty-one years of age, women are very well able to take care of themselves, and before twenty-one a woman is not likely to become possessed of those know very well that many a girl has the reputation of a previously chaste character, and that her chastity is, like the phases of the moon, very changeable. If you do not put the limit at twenty-one, where are you going to stop? There have been women, at thirty-five, more fascinating than many at twenty or twenty-one. I think the clause, as it stands, is a good one. We should protect women, but should not pass a clause implying that all the fault was on the one side and none whatever on the other. One of the dangers we have to guard against is the danger of being swayed too much by mere sentimentality. That sort of legislation, with which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has identified himself, looks so good; but you may by it really open the door to blackmailing, and, in fact, almost put a premium on women falling. Women might even find it profitable to fall, who would otherwise have kept themselves straight.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am obliged to my hon. friends from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) for giving such a generous support to the Bill, notwithstanding it has such a good appearance, for that is what the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia amounted to. He said that when a Bill is introduced which has the appearance of aiding morality, we ought to be exceedingly cautious. Perhaps that may be so, but I am glad the hon. gentleman has overcome that sense of prudence by giving my Bill a fair amount of support after all, and I am very grateful indeed. I grant that some of the opposite sex may have the fascinating ways which the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) attribute to them. I yield to the superior knowledge and experience, in that regard, of my hon. friends; but the woman with the fascinating ways, the distinguished courtesan to whom the hon. member for Assiniboia referred, and Potiphar's wife, were not working in factories.

Mr. MITCHELL. You cannot tell that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Nor was Joseph a foreman in a factory. Believing all my hon. friend says, as to the necessity of guarding carefully against abuses under this legislation, I submit to the good judgment of my hon. friends and the House, whether we have not taken exceptional care to protect the person who may be prosecuted? Contrary to the provisions of the criminal law, which have existed from the earliest times in the history of English jurisprudence, we have thrown open the witness-box to the person accused. More than that, we have provided that the judge shall not believe the prosecutrix unless she produces other evidence in support of her story. And in addition to that, before she will be allowed to give evidence at all, she must bring proof to establish her previous good character. We have left no door open, which we have the power to close against black-mailing, and having done that, we have simply to deal with a class of offenders who are not only criminals but oppressors.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has referred to the opinions of the hon. member for Assiniboia and myself, and he has said that he has guarded in every way against improper use being made of the protections he has thrown around the fair sex in connection with factories and workshops. I have taken exception to some of the features of Mr. Davin.

this Bill, and I will tell you why. I believe there is too much sentimentality in legislation of this character. I fear that hon gentlemen who feel as I do have not always the courage to express their opinions, as I have about this and every other matter, and I may call attention to this fact, that when the moral legislation, of which my worthy friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is the promoter, has to be introduced, to whom is he compelled to appeal to second his motion but myself, for there is scarcely any one else in the House to do it. And have I not done it?

Mr. CHARLTON. Always.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think there are two classes to be protected in this world. There is not only the female class. I will go as far to protect them and make life happy to them as any man, but we have the right to protect ourselves; and it is our duty to see, not for ourselves alone, but as representative men, that legislation is not placed upon our statutes which is unfair or unjust, and likely to lead young men into trouble improperly. It is the duty of every man to discuss this question as freely, openly and squarely as any other question. I know that men are not generally inclined to stand up and discuss questions of this kind. I am in favor of legislation, but I am determined that not the female alone shall be protected, and agree with the opinion of the member for Assiniboia, that the men should also be protected in the clauses of this Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. The Minister of Justice, I think, misrepresented a little my position. I was not criticising his Bill adversely. I was discussing the proposals to amend this clause, and I say that twenty-one years is a reasonable age. I expressed my sympathy with the object which this Bill has in view, because I have lived in England, and have heard something of the abuses that occur in factories. But I certainly do not want to see legislation of this kind carried so very far as some hongentlemen would wish to carry it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why does the Minister limit his Bill to factories, mills and workshops? There are a great many women employed in the public offices of various kinds now.

Mr. DICKEY. I would like to draw the attention of the Committee to the peculiar wording of this clause. It reads:

"Everyone who, being a guardian, seduces or has illicit connection with his ward."

Nobody would object to that in a case of a guardian, but I would like to ask the Committee if it is right to punish not only every employer who seduces, but one who has illicit connection with any woman in his employ? I quite admit that any man who takes advantage of his position to seduce a woman in his employment should be punished, but it seems to me to be a very questionable provision which will put a man in the penitentiary for four years for having illicit connection with a woman in his employment. I suppose any connection with a woman, with her free consent, would be an illicit connection. No doubt, that may be very objectionable, but it is not sufficient to make the man liable to four years' imprisonment. In this case, all that would be necessary to prove would be the fact of employment, and then the illicit connection would be sufficient to send the man to the penitentiary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is objectionable on the same ground, as the connection between guardians and wards, and precisely the same argument could be used, that the ward had consented, and that the illicit connection took place without involving any of the elements of seduction. These persons who are employed in factories are under the control, and, as the leader of the Opposition said, to a great extent under the power of their employers, who are able to influence them in various ways, by fear of dismissal, by fear of disgrace, and in other ways. I think that anyone who has women under his control to that extent, and who abuses his power, should be made liable to this penalty. It does not follow that the term of imprisonment should be four years, as the hon. gentleman has stated. The maximum is two years, and it may be made less in the discretion of the judge.

Mr. DAVIN. It appears to me that this Bill does not go far enough. Take the case of theatres. We know that the young women who are employed in subordinate parts in theatres are frequently seduced by the managers, and we know that they are constantly liable to be affected by the temptation placed in their way, that they will get good parts so that they will be able to show their skill as actresses, if they submit to the advances of the manager. I think that is a very serious matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that, if this Bill is to be extended, it should go still further. There is nothing here to prevent your seducing your servant maid, or your cook, or, as an hon. gentleman near me suggests, your typewriter. The typewriter has the most intimate connection with the person who employs her, and the typewriters are generally very fascinating. I desire to know what the Minister of Justice means when he refers to the elements of seduction.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In answering the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), I said that the illicit connection between employers and the employed should be punished, although it was not accompanied by actual seduction.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I should like to know what the hon. gentleman means by the term "seduction?" If it means illicit connection without the consent of the woman, then it means rape; but, if it means connection with the assent of the Woman, it may be seduction or it may not, but in that case will the man be punished?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In either case. Mr. MITCHELL. I was unable to understand the meaning of the hon. gentleman when he spoke of the "elements of seduction."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not object to this Bill. On the contrary, I approve of the Bill; but I cannot see why the line is drawn at factories and workshops. The Ministers know very well that there are many people employed in different positions where they might possibly come under the compelling power of their employers or others associated with them as much as in the case provided for in this Bill. Does the Minister of Justice believe that the female operatives in fac-influence in a way in which others are not? He might take many of those who are employed in offices and departments of trade and commerce, as they now are, and might find it advisable to extend this provision to them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is true that the Bill might be extended, and it was originally drafted to meet the views expressed by the hongentleman, but, hearing the opinions expressed here and outside, I thought it better for the present to confine the Bill to what is known to be a pressing necessity, which calls for an immediate remedy. We have not had any information that it is necessary to extend it further.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have never heard of the abuses to which the hon. gentleman refers, and ${\bf I}$ would like him to state on what he bases his measure in that respect. We have all heard of the abuses which exist in the Civil Service, and this Bill will not apply to them. If we are extending a severe criminal law to one portion of Her Majesty's subjects, I do not see why it should not be extended to the rest.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have never heard of such abuses as those to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have, and many others too.

Amendment to substitute the word "thirty" for the word "twenty-one" agreed to—Yeas, 48, nays, 29.

On section 3,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I move that the word "two" in the last line, be made "five."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I entirely approve of the purport of this Act as regards the offence which, I presume, the Minister has in view, but is it not possible that the words he has used, "gross indecency," are not sufficiently precise, and might lead to consequences that he does not intend? Of course, I am quite aware that the particular crime which he has in mind is one which, I very much fear, has been on the increase in certain sections of society, and can hardly be punished too severely. In my opinion the words are not legal words, and it strikes me that consequences might flow from this phraseology which the hon. gentleman does not contemplate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it is impossible to define the offences any better. The provision is the same as the English provision of chapter 69, 48 and 49 Victoria. It is impossible to define them any better, for the reason that the offences which are aimed at are so various. The notorious cases I mentioned a few moments ago are not the same in their characteristics, and the description which would cover them would not apply to these cases which have been brought to my attention, as occurring in Canada within the last few months. I think it is better to leave it in this form. It is not more vague than the English Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the Minister to say that the words he has used are the same as are used in the English Act?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would ask the Minister, if tories and workshops are subjected to this sort of the offence that is referred to in section 3 is the same offence that is referred to in section 4, for I see exactly the same words-gross indecency-are used in both sections.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are not the same. Section 3 refers to improprieties between two male persons; section 4 refers to indecent exposure.

Mr. BLAKE. I doubt very much whether there is any other class of cases in which there is more danger of brutalising people than in the class of cases dealt with in this clause 3, and I would suggest that the penalty of whipping be added.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would remind the Minister of Justice that the offence referred to in clause 3, in many American States, is specifically named.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to add the words "and to be whipped" to clause 3.

Mr. MITCHELL. I still think that in so serious a matter as one involving an imprisonment for five years the specific act characterised as "gross indecency" should be put in the statute. not think there ought to be any uncertainty about it. If there is a term to apply to it, the Minister ought to put that term in the Act. Suppose a person is charged with an offence of this kind in one of the country districts before a justice of the peace. There are fifty kinds of gross indecency. The term may mean one thing in one case and a much more serious thing in another. I hold, the Minister ought to put the exact name of the crime in the statute, so that there may be no mis-take about it. No false modesty should restrain us from protecting the liberty of the subject in a case like this.

Mr. IVES. I would ask the Minister to what extent he applies these words: "or is a party to."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Any person who is an accessory before the fact, I should say, would come under these words. As to the compulsion to whip, that is left in the discretion of the court.

On section 4,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will amend the section by inserting the words: "every one who commits an indecent exposure of the person in any public place."

On section 6,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I understand this clause aright, women as well as men will be subjected to whipping under it. I have no objection to a man being whipped as soundly as the hon. Minister desires, but I very strongly object to that punishment being inflicted on women, and I hope the section will be amended in this

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no intention to do so. If the section is open to that construction we can amend it. In all the provisions with respect to whipping, there is no distinction made to sex; but there is a distinct provision in the statute relating to punishments, that no woman shall be whipped. I will alter the section to read: "any male person shall also be liable to be whipped."

Mr. CASEY. Quite apart from the whipping, it is unfair that helpless parties connected with such indecency should be liable to the same pun-We have had ishment as the principal offenders. recently reported several cases of incest, I am can statute?

ashamed to say, between father and daughter. These outrages are generally upon very young girls, who are absolutely under the power and control of their parents. I think the clause as it stands would amply apply even to cases where incest is committed forcibly. I hope the Minister will explain the clause.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course whipping of a woman is out of the question. I think, however, we had better leave the provision for punishment in the section. Hon. gentlemen will remember that we are merely providing a maximum of punishment to be awarded, and every circumstance will be taken into consideration by the judge—age, degree of subjection and so forth, and the punishment inflicted on a young girl may be almost nominal. discretion should be left with the court.

Mr. CASEY. That provides, however, that there shall be some punishment. Cases may occur in a family where the more powerful members can compel the others to subject themselves to indecency, and in such cases it is clear that no punishment should be inflicted on the girl.

Mr. BLAKE. I regret to say that we sometimes read of cases of such assaults on daughters of very tender years. What opportunity have we to secure the conviction of the guilty party, under these circumstances, and to procure the necessary evidence? The main thing we have to grapple with is the crime of greatest enormity which can be committed: that of a father taking advantage of his almost absolute power over his young child, and will not the liability of the child to a long imprisonment be an additional obstacle to securing the necessary evidence?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The experience in the Provinces where a similar provision is in force is, that the charge is made and the facts are testified to by the child, not always by a young child, but by a daughter in after years. There is one prisoner in the Dorchester Penitentiary who was convicted of this crime on very clear evidence, the daughter being a child at the time. The discovery did not take place till years afterwards, but conviction was obtained mainly on the evidence of the daughter, corroborated by other persons. We have not found the law to fail in cases of that kind. I think there is no proof of the law having failed for want of testimony given on the part of children.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

House again resolved itself into Committee. On section 8.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The only change this makes in the present law is by the insertion of the

"And every male person who in Canada simultaneously, or on the same day, marries more than one woman,"

Mr. MITCHELL. He cannot marry more than one at the same time very conveniently.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the Mormon

Mr. LAURIER. Is that following the Ameri-

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not. The American statutes on the subject are very numerous, and there is one writer, whose essay I have here, who says that the subject has been dealt with by the various States and by the Federal Government by a great series of enactments for the last twenty-five years. The wording adopted in this Bill was in the Bill introduced, in the earlier part of this Session, by Senator Macdonald, of British Columbia. I have looked through the various statutes on this point, and it seems to me that the Bill drafted by Senator Macdonald was better than any other I could get.

Mr. BLAKE. The question with which we are now dealing is one of considerable importance today, and it may be of still more importance in the I think it is not unfit that we should have what the attitude of the Government is, with reference to the persons whose existence in our midst has given rise to this legislation. have noticed from time to time in the public prints, reference, to visits of persons of high consideration and authority in the Dominion, to the settlement of these persons called Mormons, or Latter-Day Saints, in the North-West, and occasionally encouraging words have been used towards them with the suggestion, I believe, that they have got to obey our laws-but still encouraging words which it would seem to me were, perhaps, rather out of place. There are in the Province of Ontario, in various sections, certain small scattered communities of Mormons of the earlier period under the Joseph Smith dipensation, who remain monogamists, who, I believe, separated from the Church of the Latter-Day Saints on the occasion of the change which was effected at the time of Brigham Young, and which change mainly consisted in the matter which we are now engaged in attempting to meet. With reference to such persons, we, of course, have nothing to say, but it is right to observe that the difficulties which the United States has had to contend with in respect to the Mormons of Utah since the Brigham Young dispensation are serious and growing; and that from time to time earnest efforts have been made to overcome what seems to be an almost insuperable difficulty, owing to the extraordinary solidarity of these people and their determination to persist in and to conceal all legal evidence, at any rate, of their practices. As far as one can judge, there is now a disposition on the part of a considerable number of these people—if not on the part of their authorities themselves-to seek some more congenial place, wherein they hope to be able to carry on these practices, for the sake of which they are prepared to give up their position in Utah. It seems to me, as far as I can judge, that it is in the course of an effort to find a resting-place elsewhere than in Utah that the settlement has been made in the North-West Territories; and being made under such circumstances, and as far as I can see, with such intention, I can only highly approve of the effort which the hon. Minister of Justice is making to provide stringent laws against the practices which are condemned by these clauses of the Bill. But I think it well, also, to say that the question is, in more respects than this, a serious one, and that it calls upon us for some very strong expression of sentiment in discouragement of the settlement of Mormons with these peculiar views and notions in our midst. I happen to have before me a copy of the will of Brigham Young, in which he reign in person. 1003 made careful provision—I do not know how ample, because I do not know what his estate was—for his rather numerous family. They are divided into some twenty-three or twenty-four classes, the earlier of which consists each of a wife and the child or children by that wife, and the latter of a batch of wives who seem to have been childless. In the course of this will he uses language which it may be useful for the hon. gentleman to know. After having made provision for these numerous persons, he says in the 34th clause:

"To avoid any question, the words married or marriage, in this will, shall be taken to have become consummate between man and woman, either by ceremony before a lawful magistrate or according to the order of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or by their cohabitation in conformity to our custom."

Simple cohabitation, therefore, in conformity to the Mormon custom is one of the rules by which Mormon marriage shall be recognised. I find, in the compilation which contains this will, this statement with reference to Mormon marriages:

"Sometimes they have witnesses, sometimes not; if they think any trouble may arise from a marriage, or that a woman is inclined to be a little perverse, they have no witnesses, neither do they give marriage certificates, and if occasion requires it, and it is to shield any of their polygamous brethren from being found out, they will positively swear that they did not perform any marriage at all, so that the women in this church have but a very poor outlook for being considered honorable wives."

The same difficulties with reference to the regulation of the Utah Mormons, as distinguished from those to whom I referred, the old Mormons of the former dispensation, have crept up in another way. In 1889 a judgment of an associate justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Anderson, was delivered, upon an application made by some of these Mormons to be admitted as citizens, upon which application the evidence of a number of persons was taken as to their views and principles. Evidence was given by no less than eleven persons who had been Mormons, some of whom had occupied very high positions in the church or organisation, and a number of details were given, which I will not weary the Committee by reading; I will refer simply to the conclusions of the learned judge, which are sustained by extracts from the evidence and from writings of the people. says:

says:

"During the ten days this investigation lasted not a word of evidence was introduced or offered showing that any preacher or teacher of the church ever, in a single instance, advised obedience to the laws against polygamy. On the contrary, the evidence in this case, and the whole history of the Mormon church in Utah, shows that it has persistently refused obedience to at least a portion of the laws of the Government, has insulted and driven United States officers from the territory, has denied the authority of the United States to pass laws prohibiting polygamy, as an unwarranted interference with their religion, and, generally, has antagonised and denounced the Government in almost every possible way."

Then the learned judge sums up the evidence

Then the learned judge sums up the evidence brought before him as to the teachings of the church:

"First: That it is the actual and veritable Kingdom of God on earth, not in its fullness, because Christ has not yet come to rule in person, but for the present he rules through the priesthood of the church, who are His vice-gerents on earth.

"Third: That this kingdom will overthrow the United States and all other Governments, after which Christ will reign in person.

"Fourth: That the doctrine of 'blood atonement' is of God, and that under it certain sins which the blood of Christ cannot atone for may be remitted by shedding the blood of the transgressor.

"Fifth: That polygamy is a command of God, which if a member obeys he will be exalted in the future life above those who do not.

"Sixth: That the Congress of the United States has no right under the constitution to pass any law in any matter interfering with the practices of the Mormon religion, and that the Acts of Congress against polygamy, and disfranchising those who practice it, are unwarrantable interferences with their religion.

"Can men be made true and loyal citizens by such teachings, or are they likely to remain so surrounded by such influences? Will men become attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States when they hear the Government constantly denounced as tyrannical and oppressive? It would be as unreasonable to expect such a result as it would be to expect to gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles.

"It has always been and still is the policy of this Government to encourage aliens, who in good faith come to reside in this country, to become citizens; but when a man of foreign birth comes here and joins an organisation, although professedly religious, which requires of him an allegiance to be the kingdon of God, to control its members under His immediate direction, and yet teaches and practices a system of morals shocking to christian people everywhere, under which the marriage of a man to two or more sisters, or to a mother and daughter, is as a sanction, an organisation that sanctions blood atonement as a means of grace, and murder as a penalty for revealing the secrets of its ceremonies, and which for nearly half a century has refused to acknowledge the supremacy of the United States, or render obedience to its laws, it is time for the courts to pause and enquire whether such an applicant should be admitted to citizenship.

whether such an applicant should be admitted to citizenship.
"The evidence in this case establishes unquestionably that the teachings, practices and aims of the Mormon church are antagonistic to the Government of the United States, utterly subversive to good morals and the wellbeing of society, and that its members are animated by a feeling of hostility towards the Government and its laws, and, therefore, an alien who is a member of said church is not a fit person to be made a citizen of the United States."

And the applications were refused. I observe that it is stated that the Mormons who have settled in Canada are not now practising polygamy, though some authorities, who appear to have investigated the matter, say there is a suspicious disproportion of the sexes among them. I have a letter from a friend who happens to be temporarily a resident of Utah, and who is cognisant of the course of events there transpiring, with regard to some of those who have come to Canada, and he tells me that in some instances the Mormons who have gone into the North-West Territories have for a time left their old wives behind them, but he learns that they have each taken a fresh young one. How long that will last I do not know, but that is their solace at present for their residence in Canada. Notwithstanding the anxiety the hon members from the North-West have shown during the last few days to promote immigration, I fancy they will not be very anxious to promote immigration of this character, and I do not suppose that any of us feel, under the circumstances, that such immigration is of a useful or wholesome or profitable character. I am not suggesting at this moment that we cannot do more than, by the most careful and comprehensive legislation, provide machinery for the discontinuance \mathbf{or} $_{
m these}$ abominable practices which we know these people engage in under pretence of religion No one who peruses the evidence taken in recent years in the effort to establish the fact of that cohabitation which the hon. gentleman is endeavoring to render criminal here can doubt that this is a matter of extreme difficulty, and that longer experience on the part of those who commit these practices, and the greater precautions they will take to escape detection will render it a matter of still greater difficulty to prevent the continuance of those practices. Therefore it seems to me that we are bound, not merely to support the hon. gentleman in any reasonable effort to stamp as a crime and to render as effective as the circumstances of the case will allow the provisions of any law against the crime, but that also it should be indicated at the earliest hour that it is not words of encouragement but words of discouragement which this Parliament, as the representatives of the people, have for the Mormons and their abuses, and practices, and the views they entertain of civil government and allegiance and on this marriage question, with the intention of carrying out which, I fear, they are coming amongst us.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I may say that a year ago, or a little more, two or three of the principal leaders of the Mormons, now settled in the southern part of Alberta, visited Ottawa for the purpose of asking concessions of different kinds from the Government, and at that time I had one or two interviews The applications they made were not with then. granted, but at the time they stated most distinctly that those coming into the Territories did not propose to practice polygamy. Since they have been in this country, however, rumors have been circulated that they have not been abiding by the promise they gave the Government, and endeavors have been made by the Government to find out whether that is the case or not. But I thought it was proper, in view of these reports, that I should, through my deputy, communicate with the leaders of those people, asking for an explanation. Mr. Card, the leader of the party, was not in the Territories at the time the letter reached them, but another gentleman, whose name 1 forget, answered the letter, and stated most positively that they were not practising polygamy, but that they were keeping to the solemn promise they had made the Government. On the return of Mr. Card to the colony he wrote a second letter. These letters have only been lately received, and I have not yet placed them before my colleagues, but they are now in the Privy Council Office. Mr. Card stated still more ctrongly than the gentleman who had written previously, that these people came here for the purpose of obeying our laws, and were not practising polygamy, and he invited the strictest and closest investigation. I only trust the Bill of the hon. the Minister of Justice will be so strict as to prevent these people practising polygamy, if they have any idea of doing so.

What was the nature of the Mr. BLAKE. concessions they asked?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They wished to be allowed to settle in communities, or the hamlet system-that is, that they could build in villages and cultivate their lands at a distance. They also wanted some concessions with regard to water rights. But no concessions were granted, although we stated there was no reason why we should not bring in some legislation with regard to water rights, which they require for the purpose of irrigation and erecting mills.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE. It is very well understood that the reason the Mormons left the United States is the difficulty they have with the American Government arising out of this question of polygamy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt.

Mr. BLAKE. That is a most serious question; and when they object to remaining in another country where the laws are practically the same as here, only, perhaps, less strict, it is difficult to understand why they should come here to obey our laws.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think the bulk of those leaving are fleeing from justice.

Mr. BLAKE. From this sort of justice?

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a few words in subsection b, of section 9, which are as follows:—

"Any kind of conjugal union with more than one person of the opposite sex at the same time."

I do not see the force of the words "opposite sex." If they are necessary in that connection in section b they are also necessary in section d, where we have the same words, "conjugal union," but not followed by the words "opposite sex." I think these latter words are a surplusage, and might well be left out. I would just call attention to the penal clause, and ask the Government whether they consider the proposed penalty is sufficient to meet the evil? This is not a case of dealing with the evil of bigamy. If it were, the penalty in that case is much more severe than is provided here. But we are here trying to prevent what may become a serious moral and national ulcer, and, I think, we might very well increase the penalty, and instead of rendering the offender liable to punishment by imprisonment to the extent of two years or by fine, extend it further. The present provision, which leaves it in the option of the judge to merely impose a nominal fine, is an illusory punishment, and will develop the hope in the breasts of the Mormons or others who would seek to evade the law that they may escape with a fine; and we will probably find, when too late, that we have not met the case. Under this law, I presume, if a man is once convicted of having married, say a dozen wives, and has paid the penalty, he will be exempt from further liability as regards the marriage, though he may be reached under the subsequent clause, sub-section b, which deals with the crime of continuing to cohabit with two or more women at the same time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no objection to striking out the words the hon. gentleman thinks a surplusage, and I am willing to increase the penalty.

Mr. BLAKE. I think imprisonment ought to be made imperative.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will make it read: "and to a fine."

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to ask the Minister of Interior whether he has received any report from the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, who, I understand, paid a visit, not very long ago, of two days and two nights to the hamlet in which these people live, and who, I am told, expresses the opinion that they are not quite so monogamous now as is represented?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We have received no report yet. I have only seen some accounts of interviews published in the newspapers.

Mr. CHARLTON. I doubt very much whether the Government would be justified, in view of the experience of the United States in reference to the Mormons, in offering any encouragement to the immigration of those people. It has been found in the United States, that they form an element which is opposed to all the existing forms of society, it has been found there to be thoroughly disloyal to the institutions of the country, and it has been necessary to refuse to admit the territory of Utah as a State of the Union, or to allow these people to form their own institutions in any way whatever. If that element of the population in the United States was large enough to resist the constituted authorities, no doubt it would do so, and if we were to permit the introduction into the North-West of a large number of Mormonsand there are many in Idaho and in Utah who would be anxious to come here—we would probably find that we had a great deal of trouble on our hands. I do not believe that this is a desirable class of immigration. I must admit that Utah, which I have visited twice, has been converted by them from a wilderness into a cultivated land, but, notwithstanding this, I think it is not the class of population which we desire, and the history of the United States proves that it forms an element which the American people would be glad to be rid of. The American people would, no doubt, be glad to have these Mormons go either to Mexico or to the Canadian North-West.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is to be regretted that any inducement should have been held out to these people to settle in the North-West, and I am glad to see this law so framed that it will reach the pernicious habits practised by these people. I am afraid, however, that if they get a settlement in the North-West, they will continue secretly to practice those abominations which they are guilty of in other parts of the world, and I think it was exceedingly unwise that the slightest inducement should have been held out to them to come into that country. It would have been better, if possible, to prevent any of them from coming in there, but, if they do come in there, they should be made to understand that the law will be strictly applied, and that it will crush out the improprieties which they have been guilty of.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I would ask the hon. gentleman to state what inducements were offered to these people to come into this country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that there were some communications between the Department of the Interior and these people.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Of course there was some correspondence. Whenever we receive letters we answer them.

Mr. IVES. I should like to know how it is possible to keep these people out?

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that this Mormon settlement has been visited by high officials, who have received addresses from them. If they are allowed to present addresses to these officials without a word of reprobation being uttered in regard to their practices, that is a tacit encouragement of those practices.

Mr. BLAKE. I have understood that the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories received an address from these people, and, I think, specially from Mr. Card, whose wife, I understand, is one of the numerous daughters of Brigham Young.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is not offering inducements to come in there.

Mr. BLAKE. No; but it is inducing them to stay there.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened to the remarks of my hon, friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and my hon. friend here (Mr. Charlton), who is always an authority on moral questions, and, while I commend the Government for taking care to preserve the morals of this country, I must differ with those hon gentlemen who say that we should not allow the Mormons to come into this country. We have a free Government, we are a free people, and any man can come here and can demand permission to occupy any unoccupied lands which are set apart for those people who come into this country to settle here. An hon. member says, we An hon. member says, we ine somewhere. I draw the must draw the line somewhere. line at their obeying the laws of the country, and, if these people give their pledge to obey the laws, if they state that they will give up their polygamous practices and will live in the same way as other people do, I think they deserve consideration when they are coming here in consequence of the severe laws which have been passed by our neighbors to the south of us. It is admitted that they are first-rate settlers, that they are industrious and frugal; and all we should do is to see that they obey the laws which compel them to live as other people do in a Christian community, to let them know that they will have to carry out what they have professed, and to conform to the laws of the land in which they are living. If they do that, I do not think any person should take the ground that they should not be allowed to come into this country because they may have been Mormons formerly, and may have Mormon inclinations now, so long as they do not practise them. I quite approve of the provisions of the Bill to prevent the difficulties that have existed among our neighbors, and I would let these persons understand that if they want the privilege of settling in our country, they will have to obey such laws as this Legislature may enact, and as long as they do that, I think we ought not to discourage them from coming in.

Mr. BLAKE The hon, member has misunderstood me a little. My position was not that we should pass a law to prevent them from coming in.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was not referring to the hon. member for West Durham in respect to that branch of the subject.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish, at any rate, to have it understood that what I said was, that, looking at the whole circumstances, I could not relieve my mind from the impression that these people were coming here in the hope that they would be able to re-establish in our country a condition of things which they had found it difficult to continue in the United States, and that I thought it was important that words of discouragement should fall Mr. LAURIER.

from the representatives of the people in this country against their coming here with any such notion or idea as that, and that they should learn in a very marked manner that we would not permit the scheme to grow and assume proportions more difficult and more dangerous to grapple with than it is now; and that if they do come here they must come here not merely under a pretence of obeying the law, but that they must do so in reality.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite correct, that they ought not to get any encouragement as regards the continuance of that peculiar institution of their religion, which is so objectionable. They certainly have received no acquiescence or encouragement with regard to that; they have received no encouragement even to come to this country at all. They came, as I understand it, from Utah because they were, as they alleged, hardly used, not only with respect to an attempt to enforce monogamy, but that they were harshly used generally, and they thought that in that wild West there was a prejudice against them which they could not overcome. They were oppressed, they were not allowed to sit on juries, and all that kind of thing, and, therefore, they removed to Canada, where they could have the protection of our law. They came in of their own accord. I am personally aware of these circumstances, because I have seen them. Mr. Card and some others came to Ottawa. Some of them are British subjects by birth, one or two are Canadians by birth, and others were born in the United States. They said they wished to settle in Canada. They were informed what our law was, and they were told explicitly and distinctly that we were aware that the great cause of the antipathy towards them in the United States was the practice of polygamy, and they must understand that the people of Canada would be as firmly opposed to that practice as the people of the United States were. They said they were aware of that, but they wanted shelter from what they considered oppression. They were told-told by myself-that in any case where the practice was proved they would be prosecuted and punished with the utmost rigor of the law. They said they were quite willing to submit to the law. They attempted, of course, to argue their case, and they discussed the doctrines of Mormonism generally with me. I said to them: You must understand that there must be no mistake about it; there will be no leniency, there will be no looking over this practice, but as regards your general belief, that is a matter between yourselves and your conscience. We are glad to have you in this country so long as you obey the laws, we are glad to have respectable people. Her Majesty has a good many British subjects who are Mohamme dans, and if they came here we would be obliged to receive them; but whether they are Mohammedans or Mormons, when they come here they must obey the laws of Canada. I told them this, and they professed a sincere desire—I have no reason to doubt their sincerity—to submit themselves to the laws of Canada for the sake of the rest and equity that they thought they would get, instead of being surrounded by a turbulent crowd who were oppressing them in every way.

Mr. MULOCK. It seems clear from what the First Minister states that these people have not abandoned the hope of being able to perpetuate their institutions on Canadian soil.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; that is not the case. I said the reverse.

 $\mbox{Mr. MULOCK.}$ The Minister said they began to argue the merits of their institutions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I said their religion generally.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I think this is one of their cardinal principles. However, if I have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, I do not press that point. But I rather suspect, from what fell from the Minister of the Interior as well, that they had that in their minds. They desire to adopt the hamlet system. I can well understand that they prefer that system to the isolated life, which they find on the prairies. But, at the same time, coupling that circumstance with their own peculiar institutions, we cannot be too astute in trying to frame a law that will prevent their carrying out such a plan. Now, we are going to declare what the law is, but what steps are we going to take to see that that law is obeyed? If a few years are allowed to elapse and this class of settlers become numerous, they will enjoy the full rights of British citizenship and will be entitled to sit as jurymen on trials of people of their own pursuasion, they will be entitled to sit on trials of Mormons, and in this way they may be able to defeat the very law we are enacting. In order, therefore, that this measure should be effectual, if would be necessary for the Government to be alert on every occasion to check this evil at its very inception; otherwise it may become large and impossible to cope with, and may cause us as much difficulty as it has caused our neighbors in the neighboring States.

On section 10,

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Minister the meaning of the words "indecent assault." We have had a good deal of ambiguity already in regard to this Bill, and we have passed some sections the meaning of which I have asked members, but have not received a satisfactory explanation. This is a very serious matter. I want to know if kissing a lady is an indecent assault, because it is very often done. If a young fellow is liable to two years' imprisonment and to be whipped for kissing a girl, it is very serious indeed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is easy to refrain.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Minister will give me this explanation privately, if he does not wish to give it publicly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon, gentleman will refer to the sections of the Act which are amended, he will find we are not adopting any new phrase, and the phrase which is in use is not only a very old one, but it is one very well defined—it is an assault made in pursuance of an attempt to commit a graver offence.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then kissing is not an indecent assault.

On section 11,

Mr. LAURIER. Under this clause, which covers perjury, it is proposed to admit the evidence of a witness who does not understand the nature of an oath. I quite admit the propriety of taking the evidence of a child under the circumstances, even although she may not be fully aware of the nature of an oath; but after the evidence is given, the witness is liable to indictment and punishment for perjury in all respects as if she had been sworn. It may be necessary to have the evidence of a child, but the judge and jury must weigh the evidence and consider how far they can trust it. Although it is proper to receive the statement of a child, yet, if the child is subjected to punishment for perjury subsequently, that is carrying the matter very far.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We must remember we are not inflicting punishment in this clause, but we are entrusting power to those who are capable of exercising a wise discretion in regard to it. We are leaving the power of punishment in the hands of those who will have full regard for the tender years, for the want of knowledge, for the fear of coercion and other circumstances of that kind tending to feebleness of will; but the persons whose testimony is to be received are quite capable of being made to understand the material penalties which the law imposes. A child may not be capable of understanding in a few moments instructions in the court, all that may be meant by the taking of an oath as being an appeal to the Supreme Being, and all that the consequences of a false oath may involve in this respect, but a child can be easily made understand that the penalty for telling a falsehood will be imprisonment or any other punishment connected with perjury. We have, in drawing this section, adopted the words of the English statute.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the English Act provide for the evidence of a child of tender years, just as in the same way you are providing in section 11?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And the clause in the English statute about corroboration of evidence applies to the support of the testimony of a child?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 12,

Mr. MITCHELL. I took exception to this clause when it was before explained by the Minister, as I could not quite understand the possibility of such a thing taking place. I have since learned that there is at least one case in the English criminal law in which this occurred. I withdraw the objection I made to it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There are several cases.

On section 14,

Mr. McMULLEN. I think a penalty of $5 is too small, and that it should be at least $20.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to make the penalty $20.

On section 16,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This section is desirable, because in some of the superior courts doubts have been raised as to whether the provision applies to corporeal rights, such as rights of pasture, fisheries, or rights of way.

Mr. MITCHELL. The penalty of five years' imprisonment seems very high. There may be a very trifling offence covered by this section.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the present penalty. It is true, it covers a very small offence, but it likewise covers serious offences, such as the destruction of houses or other property left vacant.

Mr. MITCHELL. It does not give the court any discretion; it is absolute.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In another chapter it is provided that when any penalty is named, the penalty imposed may be less than the penalty named.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not see why there should not be in this case discretion given to the judge of punishing either by fine or by imprisonment, for, if the offence may be most serious, it may also be most trifling.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know why a fine might not be substituted. I will let the clause stand in order to consider that.

On section 22,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That is taking away the right of trial by jury and putting the power into the hands of a judge. In some of the Provinces that is following the course adopted with regard to civil cases, but in New Brunswick that course is not followed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask to have that stand also. I would call attention to the words at the close, providing that the testimony of witnesses, whose evidence was reduced to writing in the court below, shall be read on appeal, and have the like force and effect as if the witnesses were there examined. In some of the Provinces, where the distances are great, notably in British Columbia, conviction is obtained before a magistrate, sometimes for an offence against the Indian Act, and before the appeal can be heard the witnesses are scattered all over the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think there is great objection to that. I am glad that, in the case of summary convictions, the hon. gentleman has dispensed with trial by jury and allowed the appeal to be decided by the court, because, under the system of trial by jury, in many cases of summary convictions, notably under the Scott Act, proceedings became a farce, as the accused could generally manage to have someone among the jury who would stand out against a unanimous verdict. With regard to using the written evidence of the witnesses taken before a justice of the peace, I think that would give rise to great abuse, as we all know that the evidence is generally taken by these unpaid magistrates, in a most scanty manner, often consisting of a mere memorandum.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I am inclined to agree with the Minister of Justice, but I would suggest that a provison should be added, that the written evidence should only be used when the witnesses cannot be obtained. I am not so clear, however, that we will do right in taking away the trial by jury. The objection to that system stated by the hon member for Prince Edward Island does not apply in our Province, for there five jurymen out of the seven can find a verdict.

Sir John Thompson.

Mr. TISDALE. With regard to the written evidence being taken, I do not think we should adopt that amendment as regards the older Provinces, at any rate, for in the older Provinces we have seldom difficulty in getting the witnesses. In other Provinces, a provision of that sort might be made to apply. I cannot agree with the hon member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) that we should not abolish the trial by jury in these summary cases. The original jurisdiction in summary cases is with a justice of the peace, and I do not think it is logical that we should give a magistrate summary jurisdiction and yet refuse it to the higher court to which the appeal is made.

On sub-section 2, section 24,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am afraid this will hardly work in the case of unpaid magistrates; it may work, so far as stipendiary magistrates are concerned, in cities. Take an ordinary country magistrate, and ask him to state a case; he won't know what you mean. I think the other mode of appeal enables justice to be obtained in a simple and easy way. I am afraid this will be more expensive, even if it works at all, which I very much doubt.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Among the rural magistrates it may be of very little use, as many of them are probably unfit to state a case accurately. But there are many magistrates in the country to whom it would be a very useful provision. It has been specially asked for in the Province of Ontario, for the purpose of enabling the higher class of magistrates to state cases.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would suggest that we might meet the desires of these people in Ontario by limiting the clause to the stipendiary magistrates.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon, gentleman is raising a difficulty that is not likely to occur. Whenever you want a case stated, there will always be solicitors employed, and there will be no difficulty in getting a case stated. In my county, one or two magistrates largely do all the business, and they get fairly well qualified. As a rule, the other magistrates, unless in cases of necessity, will not undertake it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Ithink my hon friends who come from the Maritime Provinces will agree with me that this section will never work. I would like to hear their opinions.

Mr. DICKEY. I think this provision only gives us another remedy. We are not obliged to have the cases stated. I have seen magistrates whom I would not like to ask to state cases. But we still have the recourse to certiorari.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You may apply to a magistrate to state a case, and although he may have the best intentions in the world, he will be unable to do so. Then you apply to the court of appeal, which involves a large amount of cost, and the magistrate will have to pay them. Magistrates will simply refuse to act at all rather than run this risk. If you impose another large contingent liability upon them, that is, to pay costs if they do not state a case properly. I am inclined to think they will not act at all. I see no real object in this clause. Can the hon. gentleman state any case where justice has been frustrated by the ordinary mode of appeal?

Mr. TISDALE. The advantage of this is that you can go to a superior court. Now the County Court is the highest court to which we can go; under this provision we go direct to the Supreme Court. In my experience in my own Province, there is not one case in a hundred where the case will not be properly stated by a magistrate. In all the cases the magistrates get fees; and as to costs, there is a further clause in the Act where the magistrate is protected against paying costs if he does not state the case properly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not like the idea that it should be continued for one Province. In regard to magisterial duties, there are improvements going on in all the Provinces. I know in my own Province that magisterial duties are very largely in the hands of professional men who receive salaries, and are men of very considerable qualifications.

Mr. DALY. In the North-West we find in practice, and, no doubt, it is the same in Ontario, that the greater number of important cases are ried before police magistrates, who have greater knowledge than ordinary justices possess; but there is no trouble in regard to stating cases, because it is well known that if a man has to make an appeal he will have counsel, and his counsel will prepare the case. If the justice is satisfied with the case as stated, he will cite it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) These provisions will have this effect: Under the Scott Act as it now exists no appeal lies from the decision of a stipendiary police magistrate. His judgment, when the case is within his jurisdiction, is final. This seems to be a specious mode of obtaining an appeal in Scott Act cases tried by a stipendiary magistrate. You can require a case to be stated whenever you think there has been an error in point of law. The policy of Parliament has been to prevent appeals in Scott Act cases when tried by a stipendiary magistrate. Now you will have every case under the Scott Act appealed, and all manner of objections will be made and points of law raised, and the Scott Act contest, which has been fought out during ten years, will be re-opened.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume it will be decided rightly, though.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the temperance people will be satisfied.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to have this clause passed, but I shall invite the attention of the Committee again to it, as it may be necessary to add something, if the House adopts the view of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). My reason for asking it to be passed is, that I think, as far as it goes, it is unobjectionable.

On section 27,

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to this, I am not familar with the practical operation of the law; but a representation has been made to me by a gentleman of very considerable experience in one of the largest centres of population in the Province of Ontario, that the operation of the process of election, when it takes place before a magistrate, without the presence of some responsible functionary representing public justice, is sometimes very unsatisfactory, and that the prisoner does not obtain that information and opportunity for consideration which he ought to have, before deciding on the course he shall take, the result of which is not infrequently, as stated to me, that election takes place, and a hurried trial proceeds and conviction is obtained under circumstances on which conviction should not take place. The suggestion made to me was that there should be fewer facilities for procuring the election, unless in cases where the Crown was represented by some functionary who should see that justice is done towards the prisoner. I am not myself practically acquainted with this matter, but the gentleman who made the suggestion has a great amount of experience; and I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice whether any suggestions have been made to him in that respect?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not received any, but I should be glad to consider them.

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. Minister will allow me, I will transmit to him the communication I have received.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I shall be glad to have it.

On section 29,

Mr. BLAKE. Has any provision been made for regulating the method by which intermediate sentences shall be terminated, or by what authority they shall end?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are now terminated only by the Executive of the Dominion. I have some additional clauses which I shall ask the Committee to allow me to add to the Bill. One is an enlargement of the provision with regard to industrial schools.

Mr. BLAKE. Would it not be more convenient if the hon. gentleman would put these additional clauses on the paper, with the notice that he would ask our assent to them at the next sitting of the Committee?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection. Committee rose and reported progress.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

Mr. COLBY moved second reading of Bill (No. 118) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act. He said: The first clause relates to the inspection of safety valves, steam gauges, &c. The provision contained in sections 21 and 22 of the Steamboat Inspection Act are rather cumbrous. Great improvements are being made in boilers and machinery, and it is found inconvenient to have the regulations so rigidly fixed as they are in the Act, and it is thought advisable to give power to the Governor in Council to make regulations in place of those specific and rigid regulations. The second clause adds to the qualifications for the appointment of engineers, that the applicant shall have been a resident in Canada for three years, which is similar to the provision in the law regarding masters and mates. The third clause provides that when the board is not sitting, upon the report of the chairman to the Minister, the Minister may grant a permanent certificate. At present he can only grant a temporary certificate until the next meeting of the board. The fourth section gives the power of suspending a certificate. present the law gives the power of revoking a certificate for reason of negligence and certain other offences, but this gives the power to suspend as well as to revoke. The fifth sub-section does away with the requirement with regard to the exact size of steamboats, of which engineers of a certain class may take charge. The reason for the sixth clause is similar to that given for the first. There was too much rigidity in the operation of the law, and power is given to the Governor in Council to make such regulations as may be necessary.

The hon. gentleman has given Mr. LAURIER. us the changes but not the reasons for them. first alteration is of a somewhat objectionable The hon, gentleman proposes to repeal two sections of the present law, and provides that the Governor in Council shall have the arbitrary power to make such regulations as he deems necessary to replace these sections, and the only reason the hon. gentleman has given for the change is that new inventions are being made which may require alterations in the law. Why not, then, bring the law up to the standard of modern requirements instead of putting the legislative power in the hands of the Government? Then the hon. gentleman provides that engineers who are foreigners shall not be entitled to receive licenses until they have resided for a certain period in the country. What reason has the hon, gentleman to give for that provision?

Mr. COLBY. The reason is this: It is said that an inferior class of engineers come over from the United States. Our citizens have no right to be qualified as engineers in the United States unless they become citizens of that country. It is said that men we know nothing about and of whom we have no opportunity of knowing anything, as they are not residents in our country, are, though unfit for many reasons, entrusted with the custody of the property and the lives of our citizens. We know nothing of their moral character and have no means of knowing anything, and for that reason it may be proper that a certain period of residence in the country should be required of them before they can obtain licenses.

Mr. CHARLTON. Upon what terms do engineers obtain licenses now? Have Americans been allowed to come over here and assume the responsible position of engineers without having any qualifications for the position, or without our having any knowledge of their qualifications?

Mr. COLBY. They have to submit to certain examinations, of course.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is short-sighted policy on the part of the Government to debar from employment here skilful men whose services may be desired, and the adoption of this rule, at this time, may be very inconvenient, as our steam vessels have been fitted out and the engineers engaged. To place, therefore, in the hands of the Governor in Council this power, may cause serious derangement to the marine of this country, and I doubt whether the Governor in Council is entitled to assume the power this Bill grants him.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this is very extraordinary legislation. We are anxious to secure immigration to this country, and yet we are asked to insist on our right of requiring that a person shall reside several years here before he can engage in the only business he understands. Suppose the hon. gentleman were to apply that policy to every Mr. Colby.

other calling? Would he object to a young man being employed as a bank clerk or book. keeper, or in any other position, where property might be endangered and fraud committed who had not lived a certain time in the country? How far is this rule to be carried? One would suppose that the proprietors of property would be the best fitted to decide whom they should employ, but the hon, gentleman proposes to exercise a sort of parental oversight, and say to the proprietors of steamboats and other property, which require an engineer, that they are not competent to judge in You may reside in Toronto, and emthe matter. ploy a man from British Columbia or from Halifax. or from Australia, or South Africa, but you cannot employ a man from the United States. You can put your property in charge of a man from any of these districts, and it will not be in jeopardy, but you cannot put it in charge of a man coming from Michigan or New York without running great danger. The hon, gentleman says that not the proprietor but the Government is entitled to have some security that the person is competent to whom lives and property may be entrusted, and that if he is a British subject that is conclusive evidence of his moral qualifications, but if he is a German or a Belgian or an American, you are to put him down as a rascal until he has resided some time in the country without employment, and has in that way established his fitness and shown he is a person of good character. That is a very extraordinary proposition. The fact is, the hon. gentleman proposes a policy of retaliation, and is prepared to say to the Americans: You can come to Canada if you choose and follow the plough or dig with the spade, but if you choose to engage in any skilled labor you are not to come, and the Government will not permit private parties to employ whom they please. Parliament is called on to exercise a certain control, not only over property but over civil rights, and to say that a party who is not a British subject shall not engage in the industrial employments in this country for which alone he is fitted, this is a monstrous kind of legislation, which the House should not allow.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the policy of delegating to the Departments the powers of legislation is very objectionable. We have already a Steamboat Inspection Act, and the regulations which Parliament has seen fit to lay down are contained in that Act. Any person can refer to the Act and can see what the law requires, but now it is proposed to delegate the power to the Governor in Council to make rules and regulations which shall have the effect of an Act of Parliament. These are to be published in the Canada Gazette, and the result is that anyone who desires to ascertain what the law is on the subject will have to refer to the files of the Gazette. If any alteration is required in the Steamboat Inspection Act it should have been introduced in the form of legislation, so that Parliament might pass upon it. think the other section of this Act is equally objectionable. It provides that a man may come here perfectly qualified, by knowledge, by experience, and with good habits of life, but still, because he may have been born a Norwegian, or a Swede, or in the United States of America, he will not be permitted to exercise his profession. It appears to the control of t pears to me to be preposterous that a man of that kind should be refused a certificate simply because he happens to be born, say, in the State of New York. I do not think that kind of legislation should be endorsed by this House.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in the first place, that we should not delegate our powers to the Government, and allow them at any time to make regulations and change them in a few months. The way in which this Bill is framed is very peculiar. The sections do not agree in principle or in detail. If we are going to prevent anyone who is not a British subject from acting upon a steamboat, I do not see what is the use of expending hundreds of thousands of dollars on immigration. By the third section of this Bill the report will have to be made to the inspectors and then to the chairman, and then it requires the approval of the Minister, and it might occur that this would involve a serious loss of time to any man who was seeking employment. The Act is very carelessly worded. I consider the Bill is objectionable in principle and in form. If the provision for inspection in the present law is insufficient, let the Government bring down a measure to remedy any defect in the working of the Act. This Bill provides that the Government may make regulations from time to time, so that what is right to-day may be wrong to-morrow, and a man may try to qualify himself under the regulations in existence, and may find out that he cannot go on when he is ready to pass his examination. If the provisions of the present law are insufficient in regard to the inspection of boilers and safety-valves, or if they are insufficient in regard to the qualifications of engineers, the amendments should be put on the Statute-book, but I consider that, by adopting this Bill, we are delegating powers to the Government to pass Orders in Council which we should retain in this Parliament, and that we are abrogating our rights in that direction.

Mr. ELLIS. I think it is wrong for this country to shut out skilled labor in any case. Suppose a law of this kind were applied to a person who purchased a steamboat or a tug-boat which he has been running for a number of years. He may know better than any one else how to run that boat, but the provisions of this Act will prevent his running that boat, and that seems an absurdity.

Mr. MITCHELL. This matter is one that affects the whole commerce and trade, not only of our inland waters, but of our foreign going steamships, and I think this legislation ought not to be adopted. I think, moreover, that the proposition giving power to the Governor in Council to make rules and regulations abolishing the statutes, and taking powers into their own hands, is not what it ought to be. I referred, to-day, to the Inland Revenue legislation. They make laws one year, then repeal them the next year, and re-enact something else the following year, and bring in three or four Bills the year after, so that nobody can tell what the law really is. They are doing the same thing with the laws affecting steamboats. If the laws are inefficient, let the hon. gentleman who presides over that Department consolidate the whole statutes relating to steamboats, so that people may understand what the law is upon the subject. I have listened to the remarks of the hon, member from the City of St. John (Mr. Ellis), to be used?

and also of the hon member from the County of St. John (Mr. Weldon), and I entirely agree with them that it is improper to put in a clause preventing us from employing skilled labor, no matter what the nationality of the individual is. The hon member for the City of St. John (Mr. Ellis) has correctly stated that if a person buys a tugboat, or a fishery steamer, or a passenger steamer, or a freight steamer, persons who have been in the habit of running that steamer for two or three years, if they are qualified as engineers, ought not to be debarred from being employed by the purchaser of the boat.

Mr. LOVITT. If we buy a steamboat in the United Kingdom, the builder is obliged to furnish a guaranteed engineer for twelve months. This will do away with the trade of buying boats.

Mr. COLBY. I may say that I have not had the advantage of being put into possession of the views of the Minister of Marine on this subject, and have not before me just now the reasons which induced him to propose the Bill. After hearing the expression of views of hon. gentlemen, I am disposed, under the circumstances, to let the Bill stand over and not ask for the second reading tonight.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think if the Government-would consent to withdraw the Bill they will do the sensible thing.

Mr. COLBY. We will not withdraw it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILISERS.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting Agricultural Fertilisers. He said: The third section reads the same as the old section, and these words are added:

"With a statement setting forth the nature of the materials which enter into its composition, and the certificate of analysis of such fertiliser, together with an affidavit setting forth that such jar contains a fair average sample of such fertiliser so manufactured or imported by him."

Sub-section 2 is new, and is put in in order to meet the expenses of the administration of that branch of the service. In the third sub-section, the words in the last line are new. They provide that when the manufacture of a fertiliser is carried on in a foreign country they may forward a sample from that country, and make affidavit before a British Consul. Section 4 is the same, except that we add the words "Adulteration Act." That clause gives authority to officers in the different branches of the Department to act under this Act. The old Act did not so empower officers employed under the Adulteration Act. In section 5, this is new:

"With a statement showing the relative value of each fertiliser calculated from its contents in fertilising ingredients at their current market value."

Section 6 is re-enacted, except that we omit the word "tags." We provide that the mark shall be branded on the bag or barrel, instead of attaching a tag to them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). For what are the tags to be used?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They are placed on packages by the inspector, and are proof of inspection, which, however, is not compulsory. If a manufacturer or vendor calls for an inspection of fertilisers, and wishes to sell under inspection, he must have the tag attached, because it is the tag of the inspecting officer, and gives a value to the But it is not compulsory. A sample of the fertilisers inspected must be placed in the Department, and the dealer must sell according to that sample for twelve months. An inspection may also be asked by the purchaser, who may say that the fertiliser is not up to the standard which it professes to reach. An inspection would then take place of samples as compared with the sample in the Department, and if the samples were found below the standard they would be condemned. We have no reason to believe that the manufacturer will fail to sell according to sample, but if a farmer or dealer doubts it, and desires an inspection, his wishes are complied with. Besides, a manufacturer or vendor has the opportunity, if he wishes it, of calling in an inspector and having a tag placed on every package he sends out. The 18th, of course, is a new clause, and it provides fees and penalties.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Are the fees provided under this Act new, or were they in the old Act?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They are new. The $3 fee was imposed for the reason I have already given, that, as we expend a considerable sum of money, it was only right that we should get some revenue if that could be reasonably done. At the first glance it was considered that this $3 fee would be a heavy tax, but when it is considered that the manufacturer has only to put in the sample, at the beginning of each year, and pay only $3 upon it, and that he sells all the material he can manufacture during the year according to the sample, the fee is not very unreasonable.

Mr. FISHER. Has he to pay the fee on each brand of the article he manufactures?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not pretend to be very familiar with this question, but I will read, for the information of the hon. Minister, a letter which I received from parties in the business, who take exception to the provisions of the Act, and who say:

"The copy of the proposed 'Fertilisers Act,' came duly to hand this morning, for which please accept our thanks. There are two provisions in the Act which we consider do not in any way protect consumers and are very objectionable to the manufacturers. Sections three and six stipulate, among other conditions, that the statement to be forwarded to the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the certificate to be attached to the packages, shall contain a statement of the nature of the materials entering into the composition of thefertilisers. This condition is not necessary for the protection of the purchaser, because the analysis which is required to accompany all packages covers the same ground, and ample provision is made in the Act for the reliability of such analysis. It is very objectionable to the manufacturer, because it compels him to furnish information which it may have cost him much to obtain, and which is thus made available to rival manufacturers. For instance, we may be obtaining our phosphoric acid or ammonia from some source to which we have access at a much cheaper price than a competing firm are obtaining theirs. Now, why should the law step in and compel us to furnish such competitor with such information as shall enable him to procure his ingredients at an equally low price with ourselves. The other condition to which we object is, that in section thirteen, which stipulates that every person Mr. MILLS.

who sells fertilisers shall register his name and address each year, with an officer to be named by the Minister, and shall at the same time pay a registration fee of one dollar. We object to this condition, because under it every agent appointed by a manufacturer, even supposing that he sells but two or three barrels in a season, has to so register and pay the fee. Fertilisers are largely sold through agents, who, having to pay this fee, will look to the manufacturers to reimburse them, and thus this provision will be a very costly one to the manufacturer. One having a hundred agents will have to pay one hundred dollars, and thus this condition, apparently insignificant, proves to be quite a serious one. We cannot see for what reason the business in fertilisers should be hampered with useless and arbitrary conditions, though we are heartily in sympathy with the main principle of this Act, which we take to be the protection of the farmers against worthless articles, by a system of Government analysis and inspection."

There seems to be considerable force in these objections, and I hope the Minister will consider the points to which my correspondents refer. I think he will see that a manufacturer, who has, perhaps, a hundred agents or more, all over the country, will have a heavy tax imposed upon him if he has to pay $1 for each. There seems to be force also in the objection that the manufacturer who has spent his time, energy and knowledge in the business, will be obliged to expose his details to the public. I think the fee on the sample each year is one that might well be dispensed with. The Government might at least do that in the interest of the farming community; for it will, of course, be a tax on the farmers in the end. I hope the hon. gentleman will give due consideration to these representations in the letter I have read, which are made by very reliable and respectable merchants.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may say that the statement made by the hon, gentleman has been made from several quarters before. With regard to the provision requiring that the nature of the ingredients should be named, exception has been taken to that by some of the dealers in fertilisers. Not being familiar with this, I confess I had to make enquiries to know why the provisions should be insisted upon. The reasons given by the officers in my Department, and by the chief analyst, are: that there is a very great difference in the phosphoric acid and ammonia that is taken from the different elements. One is more soluble and more serviceable than the other. It is not required, however, that a detail should be given, but only the nature of the materials. It is just a question whether we should impose these fees or not, and I think that if a merchant is doing a sufficiently large business to have a hundred agencies, he will be all the better able to pay the fees, because the more agencies he has got the more business he will do. The registration is as much in the interest of the dealer in fertilisers as for the sake of revenue, and most of the dealers agree that there should be a registration, so that all the dealers in the country will be known, and it will be much easier to keep the run of this branch of business.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If a manufacturer has a hundred agents, he may naturally be supposed to be doing a large business, but some of these agents may sell only one or two barrels of fertilisers in a year, and on these persons the registration fee would be a pretty heavy tax. Therefore, I hope the Minister will decide to withdraw that prosion.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether the section with regard to registration would apply to a country storekeeper who, as is frequently the case, obtains for a farmer a few packages of artificial fertilisers in the course of his business. I think it would be a hardship to compel him to register. I do not see my-self how this registration can be a protection to the buyer, because the importer or the manufacturer is the person who is responsible for the purity of the fertiliser, not the man who distributes it retail. I can also fully appreciate the force of the objection made by the hon. member for Halifax, that this registration might be a hardship to a great many agents who frequently only act as agents out of accommodation to the people in the neighborhood where they live, because, being in trade, they can obtain the fertilisers with greater facility, and, perhaps, at lower rates than the farmers themselves. Of course, the hon. gentleman must understand that this fee, in the end, comes out of the purchaser, because the business men who deal in fertilisers are quite sure to charge enough for them to cover the fees.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not like to say that it would not apply to the case the hon. gentleman mentions, although I would prefer that it should not. I think it would be hard if a merchant should be required to register in such a case. I do not think it is the intention that the Act should go that far.

Mr. FISHER. I think the section had better be re-written, to avoid such a possibility.

Mr. BLAKE. Would it not be an additional security if the people allowed to sell these things were restricted to British subjects or persons domiciled in the country for three years, corresponding with the Bill of the President of the Council?

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the hon, gentleman would move an amendment to that effect, I would, perhaps, accept it.

Mr. COLBY. I think the Bill of the hon, member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) the other day regarding civil servants required five years' residence.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You voted that down.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a very much more striking instance than that. On the celebrated Ship Railway which they are building in Nova Scotia, I believe that they have at work a thousand Italians imported for the very purpose of building it. There is not much National Policy in that. As soon as they earn their money they will be out of the country again.

Mr. FISHER. Returning to this section, I do not think there is any doubt that it would apply to any country storekeeper or dealer who sold fertilisers, and before the Bill passes I would like it to be provided that he will be protected from the necessity of registering.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When this subject was under consideration before, in connection with the hon. Minister's former Bill, I expressed the opinion that it was a matter that more appropriately fell within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature than the jurisdiction of this House, and I see no reason to entertain a different opinion now. I do not know on what ground the hon. gentleman assumes to have jurisdiction over this subject. What right have we to say what ingredients manufacturers shall employ in the production of a particular article? Why not make regulations with regard to the dyeing of goods, or provide that the manufacturers of agricultural implements shall employ steel and not iron for certain purposes? We have the same right in the one case as in the other. The matter of the adulteration of food is somewhat different, because in that case we are dealing with a quasi criminal matter.

Mr. SPROULE. Trade and commerce.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is not a matter of trade; it is a matter of property. You might as well say that the sale of groceries is a matter of trade and commerce, and under the jurisdiction of this House. This is a question not merely of the importation, but of the production of a particular article, and you undertake to say that it is under your jurisdiction, although it may only be manufactured in a particular place and sold only to the people in that neighborhood. Why, Sir, if I choose to produce an article that may be utterly worthless, it is not any of the business of this House or the hon. gentleman's Department. That is a matter which concerns me as a member It is a matter of property; it is of the Province. my right to do it unless the Province chooses to take away from me that right; and I say that, whether the hon. gentleman's legislation on this subject be good or bad, it is not the kind of legislation with which this House ought to undertake to deal, and we cannot deal with it except by usurpation. I was of that opinion when the hon. gentleman's Bill was introduced before, and still entertain that view; and, holding that view, I would not support the Bill of the hon. gentleman, whatever might be its merits.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I know that the hon. gentleman when, not this Bill, but a Bill which he evidently thought the same—the Adulteration Act—was up before the House, he took the same ground as he takes now, that this Parliament has no right to deal with this question, although it deals with subjects very similar. The Adulteration Act was passed by his Government, and the legislation I refer to was in amendment of that Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We ought to know what the Minister of Justice thinks of the question raised by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). It appears to me we have on a great many occasions gone very near the line which divides our powers from those of the Local Legislatures, and we ought to know what the legal authority in the Government thinks about it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should have very cheerfully answered the hon. member for Bothwell, out of consideration for the weight of his authority, had it not been for the fact that he and I have been differing on this question ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, and I thought we had discussed it so fully, and know each other's views so well, that there was no further need for discussion. I consider that this measure relates to trade and commerce purely and simply, and we have the right, when dealing in good faith with trade and commerce, of prohibiting even the production of an article the production of which may be detrimental to trade and commerce. I need not go into an elaborate argument, not because the hon. gentleman's authority is not worthy of consideration, but because the House has adopted legislation on this subject in this line ever since it has been established.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on resolution (p. 1402) to make certain provisions in respect of the Bill intitutled: An Act respecting Agricultural Fertilisers.

Resolution reported and concurred in, and referred to Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood that affidavits were abolished, and that statutory declarations now took their place.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The statute under which declarations are taken instead of affidavits is one in reference to extra-judicial oaths, but that does not refer to this Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Some years ago I think it was agreed that the statutory declaration was to be substituted for the affidavit as far as possible, because it was considered that the multiplication of these affidavits was not calculated to advance the cause of morality and the obligation of telling the truth. I remember a Bill which was promoted by the Government of the day some years ago in regard to the Civil Service, in which statutory declarations were substituted for affidavits on this view. My opinion is that the morality of the country is deteriorated by insisting upon such numbers of sworn statements on the ground that the declaration of a man is not sufficient to assure us of its truth unless he makes it under oath.

On section 11,

Mr. FISHER. What fee is to be charged?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No fee is fixed yet. It will be as moderate as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the fee put on for revenue purposes, or is it a kind of regulator?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is to raise a revenue to pay a portion of the cost of administering that branch of the service.

On section 13.

Mr. COSTIGAN. After consulting the Minister of Justice, I will propose a change to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the first line, instead of "every person" it shall read "every manufacturer or importer."

On section 14.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the reason for limiting the price to $10 a ton?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The reason is that we do not interfere with fertilisers under $10 a ton.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed. Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Friday).

Sir John Thompson.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 136) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. He said: The Bill does not contain any very important clauses. It is a recasting of the amendments of last year, with a view to curtail the expense in the manner of printing the lists for the revising officer, in the manner of posting them, and in the manner of distributing them to parties who are authorised to receive them, and there is a clause to allow the appointment of a deputy to the revising officer in the case of sudden illness or temporary inability to perform the duties of the office. At present the revising officer can only be replaced upon his own demand in case of illness, absence or temporary inability. The Act appears to be long, but I have taken all the clauses of the Act of last year for purposes of convenience.

Mr. LAURIER. As I understand, there are other provisions besides those two. Would the hon. gentleman state what they are?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There are some other provisions. For instance, in regard to posting. It has been represented by the revising officers that the posting, which in the aggregate represents a large sum of money, could be well dispensed with, the copies being distributed to a large number of different officers indicated by the law. As I said before, these provisions are only matters of detail in the execution of the Act as it stands.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) About six weeks ago I introduced a short Bill (No. 108) to amend the Electoral Franchise Law. It is now on the Public Bills and Orders, and so far I have been unable to have it read the second time. I think if the hon. Secretary of State would look at that Bill he might possibly incorporate its provisions in the Bill which he has introduced; because I am perfectly satisfied, from the way that business is going now, that unless the Government accept my Bill, we will not be able to get it through at all this Session. It is important not only with respect to one district, but with respect to all districts. I will explain why it was introduced. At the last revision of the lists in my district, the judge, at the or three hundred voters. It was not objected that these men were not good voters; as a matter of fact, the majority of them had been voters for many years, and, I think, with the exception, perhaps, of a dozen or less, all the rest of the three hundred were unquestionably good voters. The only objection taken to them was that they were in the wrong polling district, and that they had not given notice to put themselves in the other polling district. The hon. gentleman knows that the revising officer has the arbitrary power, in cities, to divide and subdivide cities into as many polling districts as he likes, and the bulk of the voters do not know what the subdivisions are. Those who are tenants move in the spring of the year from one part of the city to the other, and they cross from one district to the other. The decision given by the revising officer in my district was that unless each elector who changes his residence or qualification from one polling district to another, applies to have the necessary change made in the list, his name will, on an objection, be struck off the list altogether; in other words, that the Act does not entitle the revising officer to transfer an elector's name from one polling district to another unless special application has been made to have it done. No matter, therefore, what qualification a man possesses, if he happens to change his qualification he runs the risk of being absolutely disqualified. I assume that both sides of the House agree that those names should not be struck off. I ask the hon. Minister if, in view of the fact that it will be hardly possible to reach my Bill in the ordinary course of events, it will not be possible for him to embody it as a clause in his Bill?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have read the hon. gentleman's short Bill, and it appears to exempt certain persons from the notice provided by the Act in certain cases only, and I think the case made out has been represented to me by one of the returning officers. Between now and the second reading I will take the opportunity of ascertaining where I can incorporate it in my Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

General LAURIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and will read a paragraph appearing in a newspaper and will then make a statement. I have here a copy of the Toronto Globe of yesterday. I would say I have been given to understand that a paragraph to the same effect appeared in the Montreal Herald of yesterday. I was informed of that fact in the lobbies of the House early yesterday, and I went to the reading-room in the hope of being able to obtain it, in order, that I might, if I thought it necessary, bring it before the House. Unfortunately, the files of the Herald had been removed and were out the whole of the afternoon, and I was unable to bring the matter up.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will give you a copy of the Herald now.

General LAURIE. I will read the paragraph, and then I will make my statement. The paragraph is as follows:—

"There is a good deal of talk in the lobbies over the case of General Laurie and his sessional mileage. Each member is allowed 10 cents per mile for the round trip by the shortest mail route from his home to Ottawa and back. General Laurie was for years a resident of Oakland, N.S., and is so entered in the official list of members issued this year. For this Session, however, it would appear that he has leaimed, and has been paid, mileage allowance from London, England, a total sum of over $600. To get this he would have to make a declaration that his residence is in England, Some months ago General Laurie went to England, but his friends understood that he was only on a visit simply. If the General has taken up his residence in London he will naturally expect to drop out of the representation of Shelburne after next election, and if there is prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements made, the matter should be brought up in the House, that the hon, and gallant member may have an opportunity to explain."

I have taken the earliest opportunity in my power to bring this matter before the House. I would say, that owing to certain matters, which I do not think it is necessary to go into before the House, for I do not think family matters are of interest to the House, I found it necessary to move my family to England immediately after last Session, or at least as soon as it was possible to leave. made every possible effort to get paired, in order that I need not attend this Session, because the requirements of my return to England were of such a nature that it was almost impossible for me to leave. I was unable to obtain a pair for this Session, and I came out late, as you, Mr. Speaker, are aware, to discharge my parliamentary duties, but desiring to return as early as possible. My home is in England, and I must for the present stay there. When I arrived here I went to the accountant of the House, and asked him for some money on account. He told me it was necessary to sign a declaration stating where I resided. I told him I resided in England, and I him how that would travelling expenses. He replied, that such a case had not occurred, and he would rather that the matter should lie over for a few days in order that he might make enquiries. I did not call again for about a fortnight. When I called again he said: It is all right; the law provides that if you sign a declaration as to where you reside you shall receive mileage from that point. I accordingly signed the declaration last Wednesday, and I received the mileage allowance. I wish to say that distinctly. As to whether I propose retaining the representation of Shelburne County, that I need not enter into. I have simply further to say, that I have nothing to find fault with in the tone of the comments, either in this paper or in the Montreal Herald. Both are framed in courteous terms and in a way I do not think any man need find fault with; but I thought it proper to make this statement to the House, in explanation of the matter as laid before the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to add a word to what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. SPEAKER. There can be no debate on an explanation.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is only a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman does not appear to be mixed up in it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I gave the hon. member notice that I would bring it before the House, and that is the reason he has brought it up.

General LAURIE. I intended to bring it up yesterday, but the files of the paper had been taken away. My word should be taken, and no one has a right to make such a statement as has been made by the hon. gentleman.

 $\mbox{Mr. McMULLEN}.$ The hon, gentleman will not deny that he got the notice.

TERRITORIES REAL PROPERTY ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 131) further to amend chapter 51 of the Revised Statutes, the Territories Real Property Act. He said: This Bill is intended to obviate some slight inconveniences, and to remove some doubts in regard to the administration of the Torrenssystem in the North-West Territories. I will state briefly what the different sections of the Bill refer to, and hon. members will see, that while some are important, some of them are mere matters The first section of detail and administration. changes the designation of real estate in the North-West Territories. It was designated in the original Act as being of the nature of chattels real. think "personal estate" should be substituted, in order to remove doubts that have arisen as to the scope of the first expression. Two of the judges have held that, in consequence of the expression "chattel real" being used, real estate and personal descend differently, whereas, the intention of Parliament was, that real estate should be administered as a personalty for all purposes. second section declares that the various officers, the inspectors, registrars, deputies and clerks shall be under the control of the Department of the Interior. At present the Department is not designated as the Department through which these offices are to be administered. And difficulties have arisen, and slight inconveniences have arisen, in consequence of the officers asking instructions from the Department of Justice, and, in some cases, the Department of the Interior. I think I will have to discontinue, Mr. Speaker, in consequence of the noise in the Chamber.

Mr. BLAKE. It really is impossible to hear what is going on. I cannot hear the hon, gentleman, although I am sitting so near to him. There is a general buzz of conversation all over the House, participated in by hon, gentlemen opposite as well as hon, gentlemen on this side of the House, and it really ought to stop.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As I was saying, inconvenience has arisen on account of some of the officers who are administering the Act in the Territories asking instructions, from time to time, from the Department of Justice, and others from the Department of the Interior; and to prevent any errors of administration, and conflicting instructions being given, we have thought it better to place the Act under the immediate administration of the Department of the Interior, so that enquiries may be focussed, as it were, in that Department, and transmitted, if necessary, to the Department of Justice for advice. By section 3 the definition of the word "surveyor" is restricted. The words "Dominion Lands Surveyor" are substituted for "License Surveyors." The object of section 4 is to make the adoption of the Torrens system compulsory in the North-West Territories—that is, that all lands, when once they are patented, shall be subject to the Torrens system, and that there shall be only one land system in the North-West, instead of leaving it voluntary for the patentees to bring their lands under the system or not. I think there cannot be the slightest doubt that that was the intention of Parliament. The old registry system was abolished, and we have transmitted the patents to the registry offices, thereby bringing newly patented lands under the operation of the Torrens system; but in consequence of that not having been expressly declared as the meaning of Parliament, two of the judges have decided that the system is not compulsory there, and there has been an attempt to create two systems of registry. By section 6 some slight inconvenience is avoided by removing the necessity for the production of a sheriff's certificate, on application to bring lands under the Act. The sheriff's certificate is not Sir John Thompson.

required to be produced, but it is considered sufficient, that under section 94 of the Act it is made compulsory on the sheriff to record his lien, and, therefore, if the lien is recorded, it is considered sufficient for a person to have a certificate from the sheriff that he has a claim. The object of section 7 is to make the reference in questions arising before the registrar to an inspector instead of a judge. I think that is a provision which requires some consideration, and I will not ask the House to adopt it this afternoon. I should like to have the views of those familiar with the working of the Act on this point. In section 8, the new words are intended to have the effect of making the registrar issue a new certificate with each transfer of land. There is no doubt that it is the true Torrens system, that all previous certificates shall be replaced by a new certificate on each transfer, and that the transferee shall hold the certificate relating to the whole title, and having no connection with other transactions on the record. Notwithstanding this, it has been held by Mr. Justice Rouleau that the registrar should not do this, and the result has been that the certificate of title is not of the character that the Torrens system contemplates; it is involved in connection with previous transactions in the land, and a new transferee escapes payment of the registry fees and the contribution to the insurance fund, although the transfer has created a liability in respect to which the insurance fund may be called upon. Section 9 makes merely a verbal change. In section 10 the word "caveat" is omitted, as being unnecessary and giving a meaning to the Act not intended. The section is not, however, otherwise changed. In section 11, "three months" are substituted for "one month," in relation to the period of delay after the receipt of the caveat, unless within that time proceedings have been commenced in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the hon. Minister will allow me to ask him to make a statement upon one point which seems to be not generally understood. I refer to what the meaning of the Torrens system is. I am told that it is an Australian system, and that it reduces real estate to the character of a chattel. More than that, that it simply requires, in case of litigated claims, the production of the last deed of registry as complete proof. I would like to know if there are any other points in connection with it? I believe there are a great many people who do not understand it, and there seems to be a very great uncertainty as to what it means.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think I can put the explanation in a brief way, which will make it familiar to the hon. gentleman, by using the illustration, that it puts real estate as nearly as possible in the condition of a ship. The transactions in respect to a ship are all briefly recorded, but the certificate of registry is all that is used for sailing the ship and is evidence of the title, and that is issued by the registrar. The record is in the registry office; the deeds are deposited there, and the registrar finding that the person claiming the property has a good title, gives a short certificate of title—which is shorter, in fact, than the certificate of registry relating to a ship—and that certificate of title is a good title for every purpose. Any person who holds it has the right under it to sell the property, and the person who purchases the property under that certificate of title goes to the registrar, delivers it up to be examined, and gets a new certificate of title declaring that he is the holder of the property. If any defect has occurred by reason of which the title of the property has been affected—

Mr. MITCHELL. By the act of the officer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It must be by the fault of the officer, because he is charged with the investigation of the title before he gives the certificate. If any defect occurs, the State pays the damages, and in order to make a fund out of which any damages of that kind shall be payable, we charge an insurance fee at every transfer. That creates an insurance fund out of which any damages may be paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know the hon. Minister will excuse me, as I make these remarks for the purpose of eliciting a clear understanding about this system. In the illustration which the hon-gentleman gives I understand that all land is placed, as nearly as possible, in the condition of a ship. The register of this ship being not always evidence of title, because there may be subsequent mortgages against it. I presume nothing like that can occur under the present system?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No. The mortgagee must get the certificate of title, and if he delivers that to the registrar, he gets a certificate that he is the mortgagee.

Mr. MITCHELL. In other words, you cannot mortgage the land.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You can mortgage it, but the mortgagee holds the title and the certificate. Of course, that could not be done in the case of a vessel, because the certificate is wanted for the sailing of the vessel, and must be in the hands of the owner. Section 12 restores the section as originally passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume, then, that all lawyers' fees and lawyers engaged in the transfer of land will be done away with; their occupation will be gone. That will be one great improvement.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are great improvements, but I cannot say that is one of them. It is still necessary that there should be a due conveyance of land, but the expense under the Torrens system should be very much less than it is under the other system. This system has been adopted in Toronto, and I believe that there, as well as in the North West, it has been found to work well; and in Australia it has been found by experience to be a very great success, both reducing expense and rendering titles certain. I think the other changes in the Act are merely verbal.

Mr. DAVIN. This Act contemplates a very sweeping change. The proposals in regard to the examination of titles, may fairly be described as extraordinary. I am not saying that they are proposals which are unwise or which should be rejected, but it is a very great change to give to the inspector of registry offices the position of a judge, although there is an appeal from his decision to the Supreme Court in the Territories, and from the Supreme Court in the Territories to the Supreme Court of Canada. This is the kernel of 101 Justice has shown no cause why it should pass its second reading; if you pass the second reading you adopt that principle. If this is done, what will happen? One may have an appeal to an inspector in Regina or in Calgary, and he may be away in Battleford. I should like very much to have the Bill postponed until we can hear from lawyers in the Territories interested in this matter, and also from the judiciary. I am not aware that any member of Parliament representing the Territories, or any lawyer or judge in the Territories has made any suggestion of this measure or has been consulted in reference to it; but I know that it has come upon us like thunder from a blue sky. In reading it, I do not understand how this arrangement in regard to the inspector is going to work, and, I think, it would be a very improper thing for the House to go into Committee on the Bill now, and, therefore, there can be no object in reading it a second time to-day. The moment the Bill came out I sent it to some of the lawyers in the Territories to ascertain their opinion of it. My friend, Mr. Lougheed, is one of those whom I wished to consult, but he has been in Toronto, and we have not been able to go into it. Therefore, I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice to postpone the second reading until we have time to consider the Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot agree that if the section with reference to the inspector were not adopted, there would be no occasion for this Bill, for if that were left out, there would still be several sections which it would be necessary for me to press. I think my hon. friend approves of the Torrens system being made compulsory, and in some other respects, I think he will find that the Bill is in the direction of economy. I shall be glad, however, to have, even at this early stage, a discussion of the question whether the appeal from the registrar should be to the inspector or to a judge, and I have no intention, in moving the second reading to-day, to ask for a final decision of the House on that point. There are two sides to the question, I admit. The argument of those who have suggested this clause is that the judges of the North-West Territories live in districts widely apart from each other, and never assemble except for the purpose of hearing appeals from each other; that when an appeal is taken from the registrar to one judge, the judge of the district, a decision, it is true, is promptly given, but that the effect has been that the decisions of the judges in the Territories have been widely different from each other, and those conflicting decisions are exceedingly inconvenient when they relate to the titles of real property. The advantage, therefore, of having the appeal to the inspector is this, that all the cases will go through the inspector at least as a channel of communication, which will render the decisions uniform; and it is proposed that there shall be an appeal from him, not to one judge, because that would result in the same diversity of decisions as exists at present, but to all the judges of the Territories, so that uniformity of decision will be maintained. The other side of the case has been presented by my hon. friend, and I will only repeat it in these few words: that the present system, while it admits of diversity of decisions, has promptness and economy in settling the questhe Act, and the hon. and learned Minister of tions of title. I will ask the House to take the second reading to-day, but I will not ask it to go to-day into committee on the Bill, in consequence of the objection of my hon. friend that the members from the North-West have not considered it, and desire to hear from their constituents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that under this Bill any person may take exception to the passage of a title, and if exception is taken under affidavitwe know there are some very queer affidavits made sometimes—a delay of three or four months is involved before the matter can be settled.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of the delay is to permit the question to be settled by judicial decision, if possible, before the registrar acts. In most cases where a protest will be filed, it will be in consequence of some pending action based on disputes in relation to which the title will likely be questioned, and the intention of the delay is to allow a decision to be arrived at, if possible, before the transfer is made.

Mr. MULOCK. It is understood that the Minister does not decide either one way or the other with regard to the proposal for an appeal to the inspector, by taking the second reading to-day?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Because I have received communications from parties in the North-West, setting forth reasons in favor of the proposal transfer the right of appeal to the inspector. have not had opportunity to study out the proposed amendment, and suppose the whole matter will be discussed in committee.

The Torrens system has been Mr. WATSON. in force in Manitoba for some time and gives general satisfaction. The transfer under it is made much easier and cheaper, and a property is placed under the Torrens system on notice being given in the Gazette, so that any person who wishes to appeal against the property being so placed shall have ample opportunity to do so, and the appeal is heard by the registrar general. I would just say that if the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) refers to the lawyers, I believe the system is not at all satisfactory to the lawyers, because it does away with a good deal of fees, as a transfer can be made under this system for $2.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved second reading of Bill (No. 122) to prevent the disclosure of official documents and information. He said: This Bill was introduced at the request of the Imperial Government and is practically the English Act, the only difference being that in the English statute, the maximum penalty is left to the court, whereas it is here fixed by the Bill itself. object is to prevent the disclosure of official documents and information, and is for the protection of the Empire.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is a most arbitrary Bill. While I have great respect for the legislation of Great Britain, I have a great deal more respect for the legislation of this Parliament, which under-stands the wants of our community. The hon. Great Britain, I have a great deal more respect for the legislation of this Parliament, which understands the wants of our community. The hongentleman has stated that he introduced this Bill at the special request of the Imperial Government.

Sir John Thompson.

Sir John Thompson.

I think it would be only right and proper that the instructions or request of the British Government should be laid on the Table, so that the House may understand what necessity there may be for such legislation. The Imperial Government may require such legislation; but I would like to know what interest we can have in placing such an arbitrary Act on our statutes. Therefore, before going further with this Bill, I think the hon. gentleman should bring down these despatches and let us see what the British Government want. If the British Government want what is right and proper and in the interest of the State, I should be in favor of giving it to them, but that does not warrant us in extending to our own officers the same rules which the British Government require in regard to their own naval and other officials.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman. I see nothing very arbitrary in this measure. It simply provides, as is provided in every other country in the world, that in any fortress, or arsenal, or factory, what is stored away for the defence of the country shall be under the protection of the Government. In that case, the Government would naturally take the precautions provided in this Bill. I cannot see that the hon. gentleman or any one else should object to our preventing strangers from entering into our dockyards, or fortresses, or any department of the Government, and obtaining information for the purpose of conveying it outside, and in such a way that the information might be very injurious to the The question, as I understand it, is merely one of penalties. The hon, gentleman has asked whether, within my experience, I have ever been able to find out a case where the clauses of this Act might be applied. I am happy to say that, as far as Canada is concerned, it has not been within my experience to find any such case.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope that will long continue. Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I hope the necessity will never present itself, but it is necessary to be prepared beforehand for such cases. I cannot see anything very arbitrary about this Bill, which I think is a measure for the protection of the whole Empire. The despatches which have been referred to merely contain a request on the part of the Imperial Government to introduce this Bill, which is an exact copy of the Imperial Act except in the particular clause to which I have referred.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has not touched the point to which I called attention. He says that he was asked or ordered-I do not know which—by the Imperial Government to introduce this Bill, and I think he should lay the communication he received from the Imperial Government upon the Table of the House. If the Imperial Government requires provisions of this kind in regard to their forts and their ships and their coaling stations and so on, I have no objection to that. But I have a very strong objection to some features of this Bill, and yet the hon. gentleman does not see anything arbitrary about it. I think it is arbitrary to grant the powers mentioned in this Bill. Take, for instance, this provision:

communicates the same to any person to whom he knows the same ought not, in the interests of the State, to be communicated at that time, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to the same punishment as if he committed an offence under the foregoing provisions of this section."

To that portion I have no objection, but I have a strong objection to the provision introducing the actions of the civil servants of this country. No information has been given to the detriment of the State, as far as I am aware, by an officer of the Civil Service, and yet we have this second section in this Bill:

"Every person who, by means of his holding, or having held an office under Her Majesty, has lawfully or unlawfully, either obtained possession of or control over any document, sketch, plan or model, or acquired any information, and at any time corruptly or contrary to his official duty, communicates or attempts to communicate such document, sketch, plan, model, or information to any person to whom the same ought not, in the interests of the State, or otherwise in the public interest, to be communicated at that time, is guilty of a breach of official trust; etc."

If my hon, friend knows of any case since Confederation in which a civil servant has been guilty of communicating information which has detrimental to the State, he should let us know We should not be asked to enact these arbitrary laws, casting reflections and aspersions upon the character of our civil servants, unless some case has arisen to justify their enactment. I do not think that the fact of the British Government requiring certain provisions in regard to their army and navy, makes it necessary for us to carry those provisions into our Civil Service. Civil Service of this country has been always conducted in a very creditable manner, with a few exceptions, and those have not been in the direction of giving information to outsiders, but rather in the way of retaining information from the public. We remember that one high official of the Government committed a very arbitrary and illegal act in refusing to comply with the election laws, but, if that case is what the hon. Minister of Militia is aiming at, he should say so. That, however, is not affected by this clause. Still, it is within the knowledge of several of us that we were kept under the harrow for a month extra, simply because hon. gentlemen opposite thought they could incite certain people to take action against us. I would like to hear of any civil servant who has given information detrimental to the public service. If the hon, gentleman cannot show that, he has no right to ask for an enactment of this kind simply because the British Government has asked for an enactment in reference to their own service. I think there is something behind this which I cannot see. I want to see these des-I want to see what the British Government asks for. We are the judges, and not the Government, as to whether or not we should pass laws of the character contained in this Bill. It is not because the Minister of Militia has distinguished himself in warlike operations that we should pass this law because he asks us to do so. As to the Civil Service part of this Bill, I think we should put a stopper on that. The Civil Service have conducted the business of the country well, and, if the hon, gentleman can bring any case to warrant this provision, we would be able to judge whether it is desirable to pass such a law or not.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am extremely obliged to my hon. friend for the confidence which he seems 1011 to repose in me. He is quite certain, he says, that I would distinguish myself in times of trouble Well, Sir, I must tell the hon. gentleand war. man that this measure is not at all a warlike measure. It is quite impossible to comprehend how the argument of the hon. gentleman applies to this Act. The hon. gentleman wishes to know, before he assents to this Act being read the second time, if any case has occurred where any secret was divulged by any person, that is to say, any secret that might be injurious to the public interest. Sir, we know that prevention is very much better than cure. The question of whether any case has presented itself is not an argument as to the necessity of passing such an Act as this. The hon. gentleman takes advantage of this Act to go into a defence of the Civil Service, when the Civil Service is in no way attacked by this Act. The Act does not apply to the civil servants alone, but to everybody else. It does not discriminate against the Civil Service; it in no way indicates that we do not have the confidence in the Civil Service which we should have; but the Act simply states clearly and positively the circumstances under which a person belonging to the Civil Service or to any other service, shall be punished if that person divulges or makes known certain secrets which, in the interest of the public, and of the Government, and of the State, should not be divulged. I agree fully with the hon. gentleman as to the merits of our Civil Service, but it is in no way attacked by this Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. Read section 2, and then say if the Civil Service is not attacked.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have read section 2, and it applies to any employé, whether belonging to the Civil Service or any other service; it applies to the Militia Service, and to every other service; it applies to people living in the country, and to people outside who may come into this country for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of facts and of divulging those facts afterwards, the cognisance of which outside may be injurious to the State. Now, if any dispatch has been sent over from England, I am sure it is merely a request. A Bill was transmitted to us, with a suggestion that we should introduce it into the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman says there is some terrible thing behind this Act. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is nothing in the Act which does not appear on the face of it. I have stated to the House what I know about it, and I think the measure is not open to the charges which have been made against it by the hon. gentleman.

 $\begin{array}{ll} \text{Mr. MITCHELL.} & \text{The hon, gentleman has not} \\ \text{answered my point.} & \text{I have asked him to read} \\ \text{section 2:} \end{array}$

"Every person who, by means of his holding, or having held an office under Her Majesty, has lawfully or unlawfully, either obtained possession of, or control over, any document, sketch, plan, or model, or acquired any information, and, at any time, corruptly, or contrary to his official duty, communicates, or attempts to communicate, such document, sketch. plan, model, or information, to any person to whom the same ought not, in the interests of the State, or otherwise in the public interest, to be communicated at that time, is guilty of a breach of official trust."

Now, I do not object to what the British Government may have asked, if they have asked anything, and I do not doubt the hon. gentleman's statement that they have; but I want to see what that request is, and I want to know whether that request covers the points contained in this Bill, because I hold that section 2 goes far beyond what the British Government can have requested. It affects the Civil Service of this country, it casts an insinuation and a slur upon the Civil Service; and before this House is asked to pass this legislation, the hon. gentleman should state whether any occasion has arisen which calls for such an arbitrary measure as this, reflecting upon the Civil Service of this country. If such an occasion has occurred it should be stated to this House, in order that we may judge of the necessity for this Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The section to which the hon. member for Northumberland has called attention has probably less application to the Civil Service than to any other branch of employ-ment in Canada, because it is less likely that an officer of the Civil Service would be in possession of information and have the means of betraying that information, than almost any other class of persons who might be in any way connected with the fortifications of the country. Sub-section 2 is simply directed against breaches of trust by public officers and by persons who have had employment from the Government, and the possibilities of betrayal of trust of that kind are much more likely in connection with persons outside the Civil Service, who may occasionally have had employment in or about the fortifications of the country, than with persons who are connected with the Civil Service. But it is not considered derogatory to any branch of employment to legislate against breaches of trust by persons engaged in that employment. We know that breaches of trust occasionally occur in every employment, public or private, and no stigma is attached to any branch of service, public or private, by declaring that a breach of trust committed in connection with that employment is a crime. The whole gist of the Bill is this: that it is necessary for the purposes of the whole Empire—and no less and no more for any other part of the Empire than Canada—that similar legislation should exist for the preservation of the defences of the country. With that view this legislation has been adopted in England, and she has sent it to her dependency here, in which she has great fortifications, and in which she is erecting other fortifications for our defence, and she judges it expedient that legislation which she has found necessary there, should be placed on our Statute-book. It is more to the interest of this country that this legislation should be adopted than it is to the interest of the mother country. When we are asked what necessity can possibly exist for legislation of this description, I submit that better evidence cannot possibly exist than the fact that this legislation has been thought necessary in the Imperial Parliament and has been adopted there; that is better evidence of its necessity than the production of any solitary instance which has occurred in this country, of the betrayal of an official secret. This country has never been so menaced by any foreign foe as to make it worth while that the defences of the country should be betrayed, or its secrets betrayed, to a foreign power. I do not know myself of an instance in the history of Canada as now constituted, or in the history of British North America, since its fortifications and defences have been constructed, House. He hesitated to do so on that occasion, Mr. MITCHELL.

in which an offence of this kind has occurred; but our conditions are changing all the time. It has been deemed necessary that the fortifications of Great Britain in Canada should be strengthened, from time to time, on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast, and we hear to-day of these fortifications being strengthened in the Maritime Provinces, and, in all probability, in British Columbia; and with the enormous treasure which Great Britain is willing to spend upon these fortifications, it seems to me the least this Parliament can do is to say that the secrets which involve the defence of those fortifications, shall not be betrayed without the betrayer suffering punishment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know that it is trespassing upon the time of the House, but I think it necessary to put myself right after the remarks of the Minister of Justice. The hon, gentleman has omitted to recognise the point I stated at the outset of my remarks, that if the British Government has called for an Act of this kind, in order to protect her arsenals and fortifications in Canada in respect to improper information being furnished to outsiders, then I say, let this Government bring down the document and take the House into their confidence, and we will pass the measure at once. But the hon, gentleman has steadily avoided dealing with the one point which is seriously objectionable. The hon gentleman says that section 2 applies less to the Civil Service than to any other branch of the Government, and asks why should we refuse the British Government the right to punish men employed at arsenals or on board ship, and who give information to the enemy? No one wants to refuse them; everyone is willing to give them that power. No attempt of the Minister of Justice to place me on a false trail will succeed. What I object to in this Bill is, chiefly, that under section 2 it brings in the whole Civil Service, and, if we are seeking to legislate in this way, we ought to know whether any cases have occurred in the Civil Service where information has been furnished. I have very great respect for the Civil Service of this country, and before the Government adopt such legislation, they should state if any necessity exists for it. The hon. Minister states that it is no slur on the Civil Service to pass legislation of this character; but I say it is a reflection on the service, and unless some necessity is pointed out for it, and unless there are grounds for securing it on account of past occurrences, it should not be granted.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Animals living, namely, cattle, sheep and hogs, 30 per cent. $ad\ valorem$.

When we were in Committee Mr. MULOCK. of Ways and Means before, I called the attention of the Minister of Finance to some rather indiscreet or extreme language he had made use of in the course of his remarks, and I expressed the hope that he would see fit to withdraw the remarks he made in regard to members on this side of the

but I trust, having thought the matter over and having slept on it, he has now returned to his equanimity and good judgment, and is prepared to do so. This side of the House has invariably treated the hon. gentleman with marked courtesy, and he has only received that treatment which he properly earned for himself by his treatment of this side of the House. But in connection with debate the other night he, for the time being, forgot himself, and a plain duty now devolves upon him, that of withdrawing the remarks he made and the insinuations he cast out against the bona fides of the criticisms of members of the Opposition, or, at all events, of those who spoke on that particular occasion. His observations followed immediately some remarks I offered, and, therefore, so far as I am concerned, I call on him to withdraw those observations, and if he does not do so, I shall feel quite free on all occasions, if such is parliamentary practice, to suggest that the words and statements of the Finance Minister contain a meaning which is not ordinarily or, perhaps, in a parliamentary sense attributed to them. No doubt the hon. gentleman remembers quite clearly what he said, and knows exactly to what I refer.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is perfectly justified in the course he has taken. There is no evidence that the statements made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would lead to the result which the hon. Minister suggested, and it is only fair on his part, having made use of words imputing serious motives to hon gentlemen on this side of the House, he should withdraw them. I certainly feel, having immediately followed the hon. member for North York, that the Finance Minister having insinuated that it was a crime for the Opposition to speak as they had spoken, he thereby imputed to that hon. gentleman that he was a criminal for having made the remarks he offered. I do not think the Minister of Finance desires the imputation to go abroad that because the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) made use of certain remarks, he is guilty of any wrong or committed a criminal remark.

Mr. MULOCK. He applied it to the whole party.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am well aware of that fact, and I am included in it. The slur was cast upon us that we were not only criminals, but we were pursuing a course injurious to the country at large, and one that was liable to be followed by serious consequences. Unless the Minister can furnish proof, he should withdraw the expressions.

Mr. CURRAN. The observations that have fallen from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House cannot have been made in seriousness. The Minister of Finance stated that it was criminal, in his estimation, to pursue a certain course, and no doubt in using that expression he meant to say that, whatever the intentions of the party might be, the effect would be injurious, and seriously injurious, to the people of Canada. The fact of the matter is, that the more we consider the course pursued by certain hon. gentlemen opposite, and the speeches delivered by them, the more we are convinced, even they do not see it themselves, that they are inflicting very serious injury on the people of the country; and the more we listen to those speeches and see them reported abroad, the more we must be convinced that the people of the United States, reading the reports of the speeches delivered here by hon. gentlemen in high positions, must come to the conclusion that there is something in the charge made that the policy of the Minister of Finance, and those associated with him in the conduct of the Government, is inimical to the people of the neighboring republic. We all know that such is not the case, that there is no such intention.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is inimical to our own interests.

Mr. CURRAN. I will allow the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to speak all the afternoon when I have finished, and I do not intend to occupy more than a few moments. It is most unfortunate that the expressions should have been used that have been used by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is not one single vulnerable point in Canadian affairs that has not been pointed out. We have heard, time and again, statements uttered that, on certain points, it was competent for the people on the other side of the line to strike a blow at our interests; and all those points have been so often indicated that really it looks as though it was an invitation to do so. On the other hand, there had been repeated, the other night, a statement which was refuted on a former occasion in this House. It was stated by one of those hon. gentlemen who spoke that night, that a feeling of antipathy and hostility to the American Union was manifested by the Canadian people during the civil war. That was stated by my hon, friend the leader of the Opposition last year, and replied to by the leader of the Government, who pointed out not only the number of young men from Canada who had been enrolled under the banner of the North in that great war, but who pointed out, moreover, that this Government had received from Secretary Seward the thanks of the American Government for the course they had pursued. But there is something more than that. We have evidence, not merely in official documents, but we have evidence of utterances of public men in Canada during the time that great war was being waged; we have words which, I think, are worthy of being repeated here to-day, showing exactly what were the sentiments of the Canadian people at that time. I shall take the liberty of quoting a brief passage from a speech delivered by a gentleman who occupied a position as Minister of the Crown in Canada, and delivered upon the subject of Canadian interests in the American civil war. I refer to the lamented Hon. Thomas D'Arcy McGee. He said:

"We can afford to speak of the American system in this hour of its agony, in the glowing language of their finest poet:

'Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all ithe hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what Master laid the keel,
What Workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope;
What anvils rang, what hammers beat
Where shaped the anchors of thy hope.'

"We do not—to continue the poet's image—while the ship is driving on the rocks, her signal gun pealing for aid above the din of the tempest, we do not lurk along the shore, gloating over her danger, in hope of enriching ourselves by the wreck. No, God forbid! Such is not the feeling of the people in Canada. On the contrary, so far the public opinion can be heard throughout the British Empire or the United States, their wish would be that the republic, as it was twelve months ago, might live to celebrate in concord, in 1876, the centenary of its independence. We prefer our own institutions to theirs: but our preference is rational, not rancorous; we may think, and we do think, it would have been well for them to have retained more than they did retain of the long-tried wisdom of their ancestors; we may think, and we do think, that their overthrow of ancient precedents and venerable safeguards was too sweeping in 1776; but as between continental peace and chronic civil war, as between natural right and oligarchical oppression; as between the constitutional majority and the lawless minority; as between free intercourse and armed frontiers; as between free intercourse and armed frontiers; as between the golden rule and the cotton crop of 1861; as between the revealed unity of the race and the heartless heresy of African bestiality; as between the North and South in this deplorable contest, I rest firmly in the belief, that all that is most liberal, most intelligent, and most magnanimous in Canada and the Empire, is for the continental peace, for constitutional arbitrament, for universal, if gradual emancipation, for free intercourse, for justice, mercy, civilisation and the North."

Those were the expressions of that gentleman who represented so worthily so large a section of the Canadian people in the councils of the nation of that He spoke the sentiments not only of that section of the people, but he spoke the sentiments of all those who felt that popular institutions were on trial there, and who desired to see the triumph, as he said," of justice, mercy, civilisation and the North," in that dreadful contest. But, Sir, whilst we have that evidence, whilst we have these words received with ringing cheers in one of the great centres of Canada, we have gentlemen upon the floor of this House, during the present debate, attempting to irritate the people of the United States, and to make them feel that there was a malignant sentiment in Canada towards them at that time, and that we were inimical to their institutions and to their consolidation as a nation. Is it supposed that this course can be pursued, that people can be wounded in their tenderest sensibilities, that these things can be hurled broadcast all over the land, and be repeated, and reiterated, and printed and reprinted, and that such ut-terances will be considered as being made in a friendly spirit towards Canada, while we know that we are dealing with a people who are a great commercial nation, a people who are the most sensitive nation in the world; and if these sensibilities are to be offended in this manner, and if it is to be pointed out that we are unfriendly to them, what can we expect but retaliation at their hands. Yet that is the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite; it is the course they announced on the floor of this House the other night and as is recorded in Hansard. We feel, and I believe the people of Canada feel, that we have just one policy to pursue in connection with the present state of affairs. We know that it has been in the past, that it is now, and that it will likely be in the future, the desire of the great majority of the American people to annex this country to the United States. It has been their policy all along. Their poets have sung it, their orators have spoken it, and their statesmen are shaping their policy for it, and all this talk of unrestricted reciprocity has merely the one tendency in that direction. If we wish to be a great people; if we wish to be a nation; if we wish our people to continue on in the path they are treading, and Mr, CURRAN.

to arrive at their national destiny, and not to be engulfed in the neighboring republic, nor to lose their self-governing power, we must carry on a truly national policy for ourselves. The policy adopted on the other side is not one likely to conciliate the people of Canada. The United States have been threatening all kinds of things, not merely on the stump, but in Presidential Messages, as we saw during the last Presidential election, when, through no fault of Canada, Mr. President Cleveland having failed to carry out his object—for mere electioneering purposes, I presume—sought to have retaliation inflicted upon Canada. We have read the recent proposition in the United States, in the resolution introduced a few days ago in Congress, and which has been sought to be explained by my hon. friends on the other side. Now, what is the expression of the Trish Canadian newspaper of Toronto, with regard to that proposed tariff:

"Is it intended, by this latest tariff shuffle, to 'starve Canadians into annexation?' If that be the object, it will fail, as did the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, which was to have brought Canada as a suitor for admission into the Union. That attempt at national bulldozing had a contrary effect; it proved, indeed, a blessing in disguise, for it put Canadians on their mettle, and demonstrated what a people could do when thrown upon their own resources. The attempt made now will inevitably end with the same result."

I am glad to be able to quote these sentiments from a paper such as the Irish Canadian. shows that not merely among one section of the people, but in the entire people of Canada, there is a determination that Canada shall exist as a nation, and a determination to develop it to its greatest extent. While I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, especially the hon. gentleman who some time ago proposed a resolution of which we all approved, expressive of our loyalty to the Sovereign of this Empire, are truly and genuinely patriotic, the course they have been pursuing for the purpose of upsetting this Government is one that is doing us vast and incalculable injury, in the minds of those with whom they say we ought to have more extensive commercial relations. They tell us that the people of the United States will not give us any other treaty than one which is likely to wipe out our industries, and place our farming population in the depressed condition in which the farming population of the United States have been shown on both sides of the House to be at the present time, and in the humorous speech of Bill Nye read the other night by the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick, we had a confirmation of the statement that the condition of the farmers of the United States is infinitely worse than the condition of the farmers of Canada. That has been superabundantly proved. And these hon. gentlemen wish us to go into partnership with people in that condition. But if such would be the condition of our farmers, what would be the condition of the manufacturers of this country? It would be what it was in the days where hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches of this country: Canada would again become a slaughter market for the United States, and every sensible man knows that not one of our industries could exist for twelve months against the flooding of this country with the manufactures of the United States; and after our manufacturing industries would be destroyed and our farmers would be reduced to the condition of the farmers on the other side of the line-after ruin and desolation would be brought to every home in the Dominion—then what would we do? We might then turn to annexation, or if the Americans should lose their hope of bringing us to that, they might say to us, "Now that you have been dragged through this crisis, we will put an end to this treaty and let you shift for yourselves;" and then we would have to begin again and build up those industries which an insane policy of unrestricted reciprocity had destroyed. If hon. gentlemen opposite entertain a desire for annexation, for my part I would like to see them come out boldly and ask for it; if they think that annexation would be for the material and moral benefit of this country, let them come out openly and say so. But I believe there is no desireamong the people of Canada to involve themselves in the problems which are staring the American people in the face, and which will not trouble this country for fifty years to come. I believe there is no desire on the part of the people of Canada to change their present position. They only desire to be left to develop their resources in their own way, whether it benefits one country or the other, or reacts even against the mother country. But it is only just and fair, that those who feel that greater advantages are to be derived from throwing in our lot with the people on the other side of the line, should not attempt to bring that about in any roundabout, sneaking way, but should come out boldly and say just what they mean. But I think I speak the minds of those who have sent me here, when I say that we are satisfied with Canada as it has been governed in the past, believing that there is a great and glorious future for our country, which we may all labor to bring about, but which will be retarded if the enemy is to be placed in possession of every arm that can be used against us, whether wittingly or unwittingly, by gentlemen who pretend to speak here in a patriotic spirit for the people of Canada. I believe that no man who is a patriot should show where the blow can be struck against his country, either agriculturally or industrially; I think the greatest mistake any public man can make is to point out the weaknesses of his own country to those with whom that country may have to deal; and I am satisfied that the patriotic words used by the hon. Finance Minister the other night, expressed the true sentiments of the Canadian people, and struck a cord that reverberated throughout the length and breadth of the land, and found its expression in the cheers that were heard in this House; I believe that he spoke the true feelings of the Canadian people as a whole, when he said that they would stand by Canadian institutions, and stand by the policy that has made those institutions flourish.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on the amount of oil that his supporter has poured on the troubled waters, and it is evident that such speeches as the one we have just listened to are calculated to facilitate the progress of a resolution imposing an increased tax of 10 per cent. on cattle, sheep and hogs. I have one or two words to say to my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). I know something of the history of this country as well as the hon. gentleman. I recollect who were the public men in Canada of any note who ever avowed annexation proclivities, and I can inform the hon. gentleman that he will find one of them to be not the least eminent of the members of the present Government. In fact, although he has not a seat in this House, and therefore was not exposed to the hon. gentleman's criticisms, I think the hon. gentleman would add him to the others who do possess a little brains. From first to last the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that there were no men in Canada who avowed annexation proclivities more than those whom hon. gentlemen opposite delighted to honor; and it ill becomes them to throw such a taunt across the floor of this House, when we know that those who were each and all colleagues of the present Premier were dyed to the heart in annexation sentiment. If they wish to find annexation tendencies, they can find them among their friends without going outside of the walls of this Chamber. But I am surprised to hear a gentleman who represents a great manufacturing city rising and telling us that if the Canadian manufacturers got a fair field and no favor, they would be threshed out of the field in twelve months. If there is an unpatriotic or a degrading sentiment or one which shows, in the opinion of one of the most prominent supporters of the National Policy, what the National Policy has done for Canadian manufactures, it is the statement that after ten or eleven years of the most oppressive taxation for robbing the people of this country by tens and hundreds of millions for the purpose of fostering those manufactures, they are not to-day able to stand for twelve months on their own basis. On behalf of every honest manufacturer in Canada, on behalf of every manufacturer who is not a member of a combine, who is not a subsidiser of the present Government as well as a subsidised agent of it, I wholly repudiate such a statement as an unwarranted attack on the manufacturers of this country. What is this policy from first to last? It is a subservient imitation of the American policy in contradiction to the British policy which my hon. friend and I fought and fell for. We fought and fell for the policy of the British Empire, the policy of a revenue tariff, a policy of just taxation which would take no more out of the poor man than out of the rich. What is the policy of these hon, gentlemen? A servile imitation of the American policy for the classes against the masses, for creating a host of plutocrats to help them through election times, for the impoverishment of 500,000 farmers for the benefit of 500 millionaires. That is the American policy, the policy which the Americans are getting tired of, and which in a few years, I hope to see them utterly repudiate. It is the policy we have good reasons for believing the majority of the American people are prepared to repudiate to-day, in order to return to a common sense. intelligent policy such as we advocate—the policy of not imposing one single tax on the people which the necessities of the country and the revenue do not require. What are we asked to do now? The Minister of Finance tells us that we have a surplus of $2,750,000. What did his predecessor, Sir Charles Tupper, tell me when I had a surplus of half a million? He told me that I had no right to have a surplus; that if a surplus existed, it was the bounden duty of the Government to take immediate steps to restore that surplus to the people by reducing taxation.

That was the policy of Sir Charles Tupper, our present High Commissioner, and the hon. the Minister of Finance, who was not then in the House, will find that recorded in extenso in Sir Charles Tupper's speech in 1875, when he attacked me, from the identical seat I now occupy, because I presumed to think it desirable under the circumstances, to make a surplus of $500,000. Times indeed have changed with a vengeance. But there is one good thing to which I want to call the attention of this House and country. We have had the most extra-ordinary difficulty in getting from these hon. gentlemen the admission, and in explaining to the people, that each and every profession by which they got power, not merely at the last general election, but at the first election which restored them to office, was utterly and entirely at variance with their real sentiments. What was the language used by the Finance Minister in reply to a motion of mine made two years ago, advising that an attempt be made to negotiate with the United States? Did he venture to tell us then, that he was opposed to all reciprocity? Not a bit of it. Let the House look at the hon. gentleman's resolution, and they will find there a declaration that the policy of the Government was to obtain reciprocity, if they could obtain it on reasonable terms. But what did the hon, gentleman tell us the other evening? He told us, following humbly in the wake of the President of the Council, that he was utterly opposed to that policy which he said we had been seeking to obtain for twenty-five years, and that he was now going to discard it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon, gentleman has made a Will he be kind enough to look strong assertion. up the Hansard, which is before him, and substantiate that statement?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will. What the hon. gentleman said was this:

"We have been looking for the last twenty-five years in vain for an offer of a reciprocity treaty between us and the country to the south of us, and when at last the trend of events has gone to show that we will not obtain such a treaty we may se well tread our independent path." treaty, we may as well tread our independent path.

That is to say, that this Government, having been three times over-entreated to make the first, ordinary, common overture, which common sense dictates, to the people of the United States, to commence negotiations with them, with the view of laying the foundation for obtaining a proper treaty of reciprocity, and having each time deliberately refused that proposition and voted it down by their mechanical majority in this House.

An hon. MEMBER. And the country as well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. have thrice made it as clear to the people of the United States as they could, that they had not the slightest disposition or intention, in any shape or form, to negotiate a treaty with the United States, they now turn round and tell us, forsooth, that they are going to tread their own independent path. That is to say, they utterly refuse the proposal made at our instance, to negotiate with the United States, and when they find that the natural, the inevitable result of their insane policy is that the people of the United States-judging in this respect, I believe, unfairly, or at least incorrectly, of the real wish of the great majority of the people of Canada, but judging correctly according to ordinary usage, and accepting the declaration of the hon, gentleman and his to the slight applicability of my speech to the item Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

supporters as fairly representing the minds of the people of Canada—when the United States are proposing a measure like this, then the hon. gentleman turns round and says: We could not How did the Government obtain reciprocity. expect to obtain it? Did they expect to obtain it by proclaiming to the whole world, and notably to the people of the United States, that they would not entertain a proposition looking to negotia-tions with the United States at any price? For that is what they did And now we have the President of the Council declaring that even the most partial and modified interchange of natural products would be a calamity to the people of Canada. I say again, I thank the hon. gentlemen for having dropped the mask and shown to the farmers of Canada how hollow and false were their pretensions, how completely they are in the hands of the combines, their paymasters, how utterly indifferent they are to the great interests of the great bulk of the people, and notably to the interests of the great bulk of the agricultural class, when it comes in contact with any of these pampered manufacturers for whose benefit, and whose benefit alone, this whole tariff is devised. What good are our farmers going to get out of your paltry increase of duty of 10 per cent. on animals or $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound on pork? These are not worth one farthing. The whole duty will not do the farmers a tenth part as much good as would the abolition of the duty on corn, which would go to feed the pork. And, in the same way, this step which the hon. gentleman is taking, and which I tell him is retaliation, and retaliation of a most absurd and suicidal kind, is a direct invitation and incentive to the United States Congress to pass in its entirety the Bill now under their consideration. Sir, it was most impolitic and most unstatesmanlike for the Government of Canada, while that Bill was just in its initiatory stages, to put in the hands of its supporters such a weapon as was done by these resolutions. I say it was a most absurd act, if you look at the enormous volume of trade affected on the one side, and the utterly insignificant results to be attained on the other. It is the most insane act I have ever known the Government to commit. It has but one parallel, and that is the parallel known to this House, when we endangered a lumber trade of some twenty millions of dollars a year for the sake of a paltry export duty, which the Government were obliged to remove some six or twelve months after. But to revert for one momont to the question of annexation. There happen to be a very few men, who were formerly in Canada, and who are fanatic annexationists, and I commend to the attention of this House a fact that has been noticed here before, that the most pronounced annexationist-the gentleman who of all others has made himself most conspicuous of late as an annexationist declared he would infinitely prefer to support the policy of the First Minister than our policy on this Here we have true annexationists at heart, who believe that the policy of the Government is doing more to create annexation sentiments in the country than anything else which has ever occurred.

Mr. CURRAN. When the hon. gentleman stood up and made some observations with regard under consideration, I thought he was going to come back to the subject of discussion, but whilst he has devoted a considerable amount of time to a speech which has so little relation to the subject, I notice that the salient points brought out, or sought to be brought out by me he entirely avoided. He started out with a not very good-humored onslaught upon certain gentlemen, one of whom, he says, is still living, while the others have disappeared from the scene, and he says they were annexationists. I think, if any man deserves respect, it is the man who comes out and says what he means; but, if any one deserves contempt, it is the man who shows to another country the points in which his country can be attacked, and, whenever he opens his lips, gives aid and comfort to the enemy. Will the hon. gentleman deny that he has stated what I have pointed out and have proved to be false, what this country knows to be false—that the people of Canada were unfriendly to the people of the United States during their great civil war; will he deny that that statement was injurious to Canada and that it was likely to injure our relations with them? Can he controvert my authority? Did he not admit that Secretary Seward had congratulated the Canadian Government? Can he deny the words used on the floor of this Parliament by the late Hon. D'Arcy McGee? Can he deny that every suggestion injurious to Canada has been made by his friends in this Parliament, even to suggesting the placing a duty on hens' eggs? Yet he cannot see that in the statements which he and his friends have made they are playing into the hands of the commercial rivals of Canada. He goes on to tell us that I am not a true Canadian and am not patriotic, because, coming from a great manufacturing constituency, I point out that in twelve months of reciprocity the greater part of our manufacturing industries would be wiped out. That is no criterion of their present status. That has nothing to do with the fact of their being on a good basis now; but we can quite understand that, with reciprocity, the Americans would turn in their goods here by the carload and would slaughter them in this country, as we have had experience before. We know what took place in the past, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that, so long as this generation lives, they will not forget the soup kitchen policy which was inaugurated by him at that time.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are running down your country.

Mr. CURRAN. I know you cannot stand it. Mr. LANDERKIN. I cannot stand humbug. Mr. CURRAN. We, who saw these soup kitchens in existence-

Mr. LANDERKIN. And, no doubt, you missed them.

Mr. CURRAN. We who saw these soup kitchens, when Joe Beef was giving bread free, and when deputations from every branch of industry were coming here for relief, know that the hon. gentleman opposite turned his back on them, because, as he said, he knew what political economy was and they did not even understand their own business. Now the people of Canada are not likely they have experienced for some years past. They know that, through the instrumentality of the National Policy, they have no such degrading positions to go through as they had when the hon. gentleman was in power. We find the people contending now against adverse interests, it is true, but hoping and believing that, under the enlightened policy of the present Government, there are good days for them in the future. The hon. gentleman may say that the people are wasting under the present tariff hundreds and hundreds of millions. This only shows how careful the hon. gentleman is in his statements to the fraction of a cent. The people may not pay very much attention to his statement, and certainly they will not when they remember the results of his management of finances in the past. He wound up by stating that a certain gentleman on the other side of the border, who had declared himself an annexationist, stated that he would prefer to support the policy of this Government to the policy of the Opposition. Does the hon. gentleman forget that the gentleman to whom he refers was in this House as a supporter of the party now in Opposition? Does he forget that he was so strong a supporter of the hon. gentleman that they were like brothers, that they walked arm in arm and agreed upon everything. I believe that gentleman left his country for his country's good, and I would wish that all annexationists would leave this country as he did, and allow true and loyal Canadians to manage their country in their best interests.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am sorry to say that the general opinion is that the present Cabinet is rather weak in its composition, and especially in regard to matters of trade and commerce. They have not many men in their ranks who understand much of that matter. My hon. friend from South Oxford has pointed out that our manufacturing interests could hold their own with those of the United States if they had a fair field and no favor, but the hon, gentleman opposite says that the Americans would send their goods into Canada and slaughter them here under cost price.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). "Hear, hear," says a gentleman on the back benches, who appears to have as much commercial knowledge as the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). pose that, under reciprocal trade relations, these gentlemen were engaged in the foundry business, and that their stoves were sent in here at 10 per cent. below the price for which they could be made there, and below the price for which they could be sold in the United States. I do not think, if I were in that business, it would ruin me if these stoves were sent in in that way, because if it would close my foundry I would buy those stoves and sell them in the United States where the high price was maintained. Then how long would they continue that business? One transaction would show them their folly, and terminate such a course on their part. But why should it close my foundry? I could do better than allow it to lie idle, for not only could I sell their own make at a profit in their own country, but I could work my own manufactory here harder than ever and sell the products of it in their high market as well. The to accept the political gospel of hon. gentlemen contention of the hon. gentleman is the grossest opposite after the comparative prosperity which ever heard used in this House. If they do not take that ground, they are forced upon the other ground, which is denounced by the hon. member for South Oxford as unworthy ground, that of publishing in trumpet tones, as he did in this House and to the people of the country, that the people of Canada are unable to hold their own with the United States in a free, fair market, with equal competition, no advantage being given to them. Sir, I repudiate it on behalf of the manufacturers, as I believe the manufacturers themselves will repudiate it. Nothing more need be said to a gathering of men who are supposed to be acquainted with the first ordinary principles of trade and commerce, in refutation of what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has evidently been overflowing for some days, and he has been trying to keep down the safety-valve of his political steam, and now that he has let it off, it is to be hoped he will feel better. I would just say that the remarks that have dropped from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), with regard to the remarks of the Finance Minister, were very proper, and I think my hon, friend has very properly taken exception to the language of the Finance Minister. I think it is unfair that the hon. gentleman opposite should have used the language he did towards hon. members on this side of the House. We are discussing a great and important question. The House will remember that when the member for North York drew the attention of the Finance Minister to this question, he reminded the Minister that the latter had previously stated that it is not for the purpose of revenue that he was proposing this dutyat least he led the House to understand that. Now, if it is not for the purpose of revenue that he is imposing this additional duty of 10 per cent. upon cattle and sheep coming into this country from the United States, we would like to know what the purpose is? If he says it is for the purpose of protection, the Trade and Navigation Returns show clearly that cannot be the object, because it was clearly shown upon that occasion that no animals of that kind are imported into the older Provinces of this Dominion. They have been imported into the North-West, but not into the older Provinces. He puts an additional duty of 10 per cent. upon sheep, when it has been shown that only one sheep was brought into the Province of Ontario. Does the hon, gentleman want to convince the Ontario farmers that he is aiding them by putting a duty upon sheep coming from the United States, when, during the last year, they only brought in one? It cannot be for the purpose of procuring a revenue that he is doing it; he is, therefore, thrown upon the other horn of the dilemma, that it is for the purpose of retaliation, and it is evident that such is his purpose. Now, there is another important matter that, I think, should be pointed out. The Committee of Ways and Means of the United States Congress have, undoubtedly, been deliberating upon a Bill to increase the duty upon products coming from Canada to the United States. That Bill has not yet become law, although it has been before that committee, and although they have, to some extent, adopted some of its provisions. But, after all, it Mr. Paterson (Brant).

our Government here has taken a step in advance of what has been done in the United States in the direction of retaliation, because they are coming before this House with a Bill, backed by their supporters, declaring retaliation in regard to cattle and sheep. It is exceedingly imprudent on the part of the Government to ask the consent of this House to a measure of that kind, until such time as it is clearly proved by the action of the United States Congress that they are legislating in the direction of retaliation. I say that their action shows, on the face of it, that hon. gentlemen opposite are determined, by every item of legislation that they can pass, to show the Americans that they do not want any closer trade relations with them. The President of the Council has said so, the Finance Minister has virtually sanctioned that statement by the language that has been read by the hon. member for South Oxford, and the Government are evidently committed to that course. They have made up their minds that whatever may become of the farming community of this country, however much they may require closer trade relations with the United States, however hampered their financial condition may be, the Government are determined that, sink or swim, they will stick to the National Policy and That is the dethe manufacturers of the country. cision they have come to, that is the course they are bound to carry out. I contend that, in the discussion of this question, the Finance Minister used language that was not at all courteous to this side of the House, and I say that the hon. member for North York, in demanding a retraction of that language, is doing what is just to every member of this House, in a parliamentary sense. Let me read what the hon, gentleman said. He will find it on page 3193 of the Hansard:

"We have been looking for the last 25 years in vain for we have been looking for the last 25 years in vain for an offer of a reciprocity treaty between us and the country to the south of us, and when at last the trend of events has gone to show that we will not obtain such a treaty, we may as well tread our independent path; we may as well be a country now, and do what we honestly consider to be best for the country through and through, and if we meet difficulties we will meet them like men, but not act the part of cravens, and simply fall down and but not act the part of cravens, and simply fall down and do nothing."

Now these are the words we take exception to:

"I will go one step further. I hold it to be criminal almost—I may say without that restriction 'almost' that I hold it to be criminal for any party to endeavor to create the idea in this country, and in the country to the south of us, that we are animated with a malicious motive of retaliating against them."

Now, I hold that the hon. Finance Minister had no right to use these words as regard the hon. members on this side of the House. We have simply been saying that the Government, by the course they are taking, have proved that they are adopting a policy of retaliation. If they have not said so in words, they have said so by the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before this House, and by forcing them through before the Americans have given the Americans have given the Americans have given the said so by the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Americans have given the said so by the Acts which they have given the said so by the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before this they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring before the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Acts which they have been prompted to bring the Act Americans have given effect to their retaliation policy, if they have any. I say this Government are taking a step in advance of the American Government; they are going one better. It shows clearly that they are not disposed to conciliation: they are disposed to irritate, provoke and en courage retaliation on the other side, by acts of retaliation on this side. That is the long and retaliation on this side. has got to pass through several more stages before retaliation on this side. That is the long and it becomes the law of the United States. Now, short of it, and the hon. Finance Minister, in applying those words to hon. members on this side of the House, committed an injustice; had he applied them to his own acts, and to the course he has taken, the application would have been entirely proper.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) should have been a little more moderate in his assertions as to the ignorance of members on this side of the House. He has accused one hon, member after another of the grossest ignorance, of want of knowledge of commercial business. Well, Sir, I suppose that his knowledge of commercial business is in the line of joining combines in trade in order to rob the people of this country. That is one of his conceptions of the proper method of conducting commercial business in this country. His solution of the difficulty is this: He tells us that if a stove can be imported 10 per cent. cheaper, he, as a stove dealer, would be glad to buy those stoves at 10 per cent. under cost and sell them to the people of this country. that case, what becomes of the laborers of this country? What becomes of the foundries of this country? Their employment would be gone, they would be forced to seek for occupation in some other country outside of Canada. I think we, as Canadians, prefer the policy we have adopted, of protecting our own industry, and of giving employment to our own people, as the one best adapted for making the people of this country prosperous and contented at home. With regard to the statements made and reiterated by hon. gentlemen opposite, they have asked us, why put this duty on live stock? Why impose this duty, when the hon member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and another hon, member told us that only one sheep came into Ontario last year, and yet it is proposed to impose an additional 10 per cent. to keep that one sheep out. Is that a fair statement to place before the country? Do not hon, gentlemen know that 43,225 sheep were imported into Canada during last year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Into what part?

Mr. WALLACE. Into every part of Canada. We are here legislating for the great Dominion of Canada, not for one Province exclusively. But, if they had been imported into only one Province, the case stands on precisely the same footing. For this reason: If the people of one particular Province required 43,000 sheep and could not get them from the other Provinces, they must import them. Why should not the surplus in the other Provinces have been sent to them—

Mr. LANDERKIN. The freight would have eaten them up before they reached there.

Mr. WALLACE—and thus have encouraged the farmers of the other Provinces? Hon. gentlemen opposite also lose sight of the fact that not only 43,000 sheep were imported last year, but also 4,000 horses, 3,900 swine and 748 horned cattle. If a single live animal had not been imported into Canada the argument for increasing the duty still remains, for, in order to be consistent, the duties on live stock must be made equal with the duties on dead meat. If we look at the Trade and Navigation Returns of last year, what do we find? Of butter and cheese, we imported last year more than half a million pounds; of bacon, ham, beef, mutton and pork and canned meats over thirty-two million pounds. These are products of the farm which our Canadian farmers can as well raise and produce as can the farmers of other countries. And what does that mean? It means occupation, profitable employment to thousands of our farmers and our people.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I rise to a point of order. Are we discussing the item of pork?

Mr. WALLACE. We are discussing it in this way: duties on dead meats have a close relation to live stock, one depending on the other.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is an axiom no one will deny.

Mr. WALLACE. The increase in the imports of dead meats and in beef alone is most astonishing. A few years ago scarcely any of these products were imported from the United States; but now they are increasing steadily yearly, and no doubt if the increased duty had not been imposed there would have been an enormously increased importation of beef next year. The Government are to be congratulated on increasing the duties on farm products, in order to meet the wishes of the people, and I hold that we should go forward and make a tariff to suit the Canadian people and the interests of Canada.

Mr. LANDERKIN. After the oratorical effortof the patriot for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words. That hon, gentleman told us he would not say anything to decry the country, neither in its present nor in its past history. He told us how the policy that prevailed previous to protection had depreciated and destroyed our industries. Trade and Navigation Returns I have prepared a statement which shows our exportation of manufactured goods for several years, and if the hon. gentleman had been present I should like to have shown it to him and pointed out that at the very time when he says our industries were standing still we were exporting more manufactured goods than we are exporting now. In 1876 we exported manufactured goods to the value of $5,972,913, in 1877 to the value of $4,105,422, or a total for the two years of $10,078,335. The hon, member for Montreal Centre said that our industries had all gone to the dogs at that time, that our people had left the country and that everything was standiag still. We will take three years under the policy instituted by this Government. In 1886, when this beneficent policy was in all its glory, we exported manufactures to the value of $2,834,137; in 1887, to the value of $3,079,972; in 1888, $4,616,282; making in the three years exports to the value of $10,529,-

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to a question of order, and I raise the same point as was brought forward by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon, gentleman is perfectly right to ask the question as to whether I am in order; but I will speak to the hon, gentleman in a moment. I want to show the House and the country that during the three years our manufactories were in full headway under the National Policy, we did not export so many manufactured goods as we did in two years before protection. A few words now with respect to the hon, member for West York (Mr. Wallace). The hon, gentleman has reason to rejoice in this policy, because it has given him a stand in this country which he would not otherwise have attained. We would never have required an anti-Combines Bill but for this policy; and if this Bill had not been required, the hon. gentleman would never have been heard of. of the reasons, therefore, why the hon. gentleman favors this policy is because it has served as a little stepping-stone for him, and enabled him to move against the combines system, which we predicted years ago must result from a policy of protection. The system throughout is simply one of combines and monopolies. No one who ever gave any attention to political economy will believe that it is anything except a system of combines. Protection is a system ruinous to this country and opposed to its best interests. I will now address a few remarks to the President of the Council, who is a gentleman possessing a great deal of skill and ability; but it appears that he is not gifted with a spirit of prophecy, because he told us, at the time of the introduction of this policy, that it would be impossible for combines to be formed here. He said:

"I know something about the Americans. I have lived among them a good deal. I was educated among them."

That is where the great trouble is with members Nearly all of them have got of this Government. That is their education from the United States. where the trouble is with the whole thing. They are trying to introduce Yankee systems and Yankee customs into this British country of ours. That is what the matter is with the Government. They have got their education and training in the United States, and they try to introduce those Yankee customs. We, on this side of the House, stand for glorious old England; we stand for her system of trade and her system of commerce, we are British to the backbone. The gentlemen on the other side of the House have got their educa-tion and their tariff in the United States, and they have got to try to show that they are loyal, but their loyalty don't materialise; it scarcely ever does, and they cannot make the people believe they are loyal unless they get up and declare in everything against the United States. It is not necessary for us on this side of the House to tell the people that we are loyal. We received our education in Canada and in Great Britain, and everybody knows that it is not necessary for us to boast of our loyalty every time we speak in this House or in the country, because the people know well that Now, the hon. the President of the we are. Council says:

"I know something about the Americans; have lived among them a good deal; was educated among them, and have always lived near them. I, at that time, expressed my settled belief, though it had not then the weight with the leader of the Government that I hoped it would have, that just so long as we were prepared to permit this unequal system, by which we were excluded from the American markets, while the Americans had access to ours, they would consider it better than reciprocity, and would not give us reciprocity. That was the view I then took and still hold, and I then made use of the expression which had been so much lauded, and so much abused—'reciprocity of tariffs, if not reciprocity in trade.' I believe the reasons I then urged were sound."

Again, the hon. gentleman says:

profitable one, would embark their capital therein; thus, competition would regulate prices. In this way, rings could not be formed."

If "rings" could not be formed, what was the use of the Combine Bill introduced by my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace)? The hon. the President of the Council was educated in the United States, and I have no doubt it was a very good school; but he and his friends have told us about the depressed condition of agriculture in the United States. We tell those hon, gentlemen that it is protection that has depressed agriculture there as well as here. I think, perhaps, we had better come to the item under discussion now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentlemen on the other side will, no doubt, agree with me in that, and I wish to call the attention of the Government to this item for several reasons. Government say they are going to do a grand thing for the agriculturists of the country by this tariff. It is very gratifying to find they are not allowing those animals to be slaughtered in the country, so as to enter into competition with the products of the farmers. They pretend to be the friends of the farmers, but they have never shown it, and in this very proposition which they now make, I do not think they have gone far enough to benefit the farmers. Now, we did not import, last year, into the Province of Ontario, one single cow from the United States, or from anywhere else, and we imported but one sheep and two hogs. I notice that while the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance are going to protect the farmer from this incursion into the country of one sheep and two swine, they have neglected altogether the breeders of horses in this country. There were actually two horses imported into Ontario last year, yet the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance have not raised the duty on horses. Are they going to discriminate in favor of those who raise cattle, sheep and swine against those who raise horses? While they are doing this great stroke of benefit to the farmers of this country, they should not forget the farmers who raise horses. I have said, there were only two horses imported into Ontario last year.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. You had better read the blue-books. There were more than two.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read the blue-books your-You have evidently taken your figures from self. the Minister of Finance.

There were two WHITE (Renfrew). horses imported from England, but if you look you will find that there were a great many more imported from the United States.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, I see that I was a little astray, and my hon. friends have discovered I find there were two horses ima mare's nest. ported from Great Britain, and that there were 258 imported from the United States, but that Although we only strengthens my argument. have only imported a few pigs and sheep, and although we have only imported two horses from Great Britain and 258 from the United States, "We who entertain protectionist principles, hold that the ordinary effect of protection would not ultimately enhance the price of goods to the consumer. And why? Because, when an industry is protected, those engaged in that industry had an opportunity of making money, and the result was, that others finding an industry to be a superscript of the consumer. The constraint is a superscript of the consumer of the consumer. The constraint is a superscript of the consumer of the consumer. The constraint is a superscript of the consumer of the consumer. The constraint is a constraint of the consumer of the consumer of the consumer. The constraint is a constraint of the consumer of the consumer of the consumer. The constraint is a constraint of the consumer of the consumer of the consumer. The consumer of the consumer of the consumer of the consumer of the consumer. The consumer of the consumer. The consumer of the consumer. The consumer of the consume floor of this House, and I am always willing to apologise for it, but I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for this information, because it makes my argument stronger.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). If you got a little more information from this side of the House, your argument would be very much stronger.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, it is at least two hundred and fifty times stronger than when I began. The Minister of Customs no doubt feels more than any man in this House for the political condition of the farmers of this country, and if there is any man who feels more for the farmer's vote next to him, it is the Minister of Finance; and, no doubt, both hon. gentlemen did not come into the House yesterday at all, because they were devising ways and means to capture the farmer's vote.

 $\ensuremath{\mathrm{Mr}}.$ MITCHELL. That was not the reason they did not come here yesterday.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no, it was not.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, why?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was because we were discussing the Thompson Bill.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I don't think that would keep either of them out of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; both of them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I presume the hon, gentleman knows more about that than I do; but I think it is the duty of the Minister of Finance to see that something should be done for the horses. I hope the Thompson Bill will not exclude any gentleman from the Government, and I trust they will all be allowed to remain in the House.

Feathers of all kinds, N.E.S., 25 per cent. ad valorem

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot understand how it is that 'the Government should admit artificial flowers at 25 per cent., and charge 32½ per cent. upon the cotton goods used by the poor farmers. Artificial flowers are, as a rule, used by the richer classes, and yet you charge less duty on them than you do upon goods which are absolutely necessary for clothing poor people. I would like the hon. Finance Minister to explain that. Is it because he wants a revenue? If he does, he should charge more than 25 per cent. His tariff is arranged to encourage the importation of commodities which are not a necessity, and to compel poor people to pay a high duty on the commodities which they use. I would like him to explain why he makes this change.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change. If my hon. friend would study the items of the tariff more closely, he would not make that mistake. The rate mentioned here is the old rate, but the two kinds are disjoined for obvious reasons.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I think this is a proper time to make a change. I think it is unfair to make such a discrimination.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would ask the hon. Minister if he does not allow any feathers to be imported into Canada free of duty, as was the case a few years ago?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think you will find any feathers on the free list in schedule C.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Then the hon. Minister must have changed the tariff on feathers, and I will call his attention to the fact that there are feather-bone factories in Canada where various useful articles are manufactured; and on representations being made to Sir Charles Tupper when he was Finance Minister, he granted a concession permitting the importation of certain kinds of feathers free of duty. If I am to understand the hon. Minister correctly, although this industry was established to a certain extent on account of that concession, yet, after it has been in operation for a short time, he comes down without any notification and imposes 25 per cent. duty on those feathers. If he persists in this duty, it will have an injurious effect on that industry.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps I could save a little time if I inform the hon. gentleman that he will find the item to which he refers on page 54 of the Customs Act—quills in their natural state or unplumed. That is the article out of which those things to which the hon. gentleman refers to have been manufactured, and it still remains on the free list.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Well, it is evident that the hon. Finance Minister is more efficient at hurling epithets at the Opposition than he is in acquainting himself with the tariff.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman asked about feathers, and then he gave us a dissertation about manufacturing from goose quills.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Well, it is a nice playing with words to say that a quill is not a feather. The hon. gentleman will certainly admit that the hon. Finance Minister did not understand the item; but I am now satisfied, if the hon. Minister of Customs states that those articles are to be admitted free, that the industry to which I have referred will continue as it has been in previous years.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to ask if this item includes all kinds of feathers?

Mr. FOSTER. All except those which are not elsewhere enumerated.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that the hon. gentleman intends to reduce the duty on ostrich feathers to 15 per cent., while he charges 25 per cent. on all feathers which are used by the poorer classes.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that it would be better to take the discussion on each item as it comes. It is not intended to change this item. When we come to the item of ostrich feathers, if my hon. friend thinks it is wrong, he can move to change it.

Mr. McMULLEN. All I want to do is, to impress on the hon gentleman the propriety of arranging his tariff to bear on the poorer classes fairly and honestly, and I ask him why he allows a duty of 25 per cent. to remain on common feathers, and reduces the duty on ostrich feathers to 15 per cent?

The CHAIRMAN. I think it would be well for the Committee to confine their attention to the items as they are reached. We cannot avoid going back to items sometimes; but I think the Committee will agree with me that we ought not to anticipate the discussion of any item in ad-

Mr. McMULLEN. In order to properly discuss the items, we must compare them with each other, and we cannot do that if we are confined to discuss each item by itself.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 98) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of George T. Smith; and the motion of Mr. Wallace in amendment.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The preamble states the circumstances which necessitate the passage of this measure. I would move to amend it by striking out, in the ninth line, the word "accident," and substituting the word "circumstances," and to add the following words :-

"And whereas, it has been made to appear that the expiration of the patent was due to fraud on the part of persons who were not under the control of the patentee and his agents" and his agents.

This should be adopted in order to prevent a precedent being created with regard to the renewal of patents by statute. I substitute the word "circumstances" for "accident" because the expiration of the patent was not quite accidental, though not due to any circumstances under the control of the patentee or his solicitor.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Would it not be better to prevent the establishment of a precedent by not allowing the Bill to pass? From its tenor, the Minister of Justice has not evidently fully established that the lapsing of the patent was owing to fraud. If it were, there ought to be action taken against the guilty parties. Although the evidence before the Committee was in the direction stated in the Bill, that ought not to justify this House in allowing a patent to be revived after it is virtually dead, and after people have obtained a right from the neglect, either accidental or otherwise, of the patentee. I think the principle of this Bill is a dangerous one, and that the Minister of Justice will regret the action he is taking. The whole responsibility will be on the Government for this legislation, and I, for my part, protest against it.

Bill reported and amendments concurred in.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 125) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Curran.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 8,

Mr. CURRAN. The Railway Committee altered the eighth clause from what it previously was, to make it correspond with the sixth clause of a Bill passed in favor of the Canadian Pacific Railway, making the terms of this section agree with the Bill already passed with respect to the other company. The words were:

"The company may enter into working arrangements with, or may lease or acquire running powers over, or the right to work the line of any other company in Canada which has been duly empowered to make or grant the same."

This alteration was satisfactory to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which merely required to lease lines that are under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada. But the Grand Trunk Railway Company are desirous of leasing roads that have been chartered by the Provincial Government of the Province of Quebec, amongst others, and the ground on which objection to this clause was raised, was that the Bill, as it stood, might empower the Grand Trunk Railway Company to lease, hire or amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The solicitor of the Grand Trunk Railway Company gave the views of the company as follows:

"In looking over clause 8 again, I am a little surprised at the position taken against it. You will notice it could not by any possibility include the Canadian Pacific Railnot by any possibility include the Canadian Pacific Railway, because there are express enactments put on the Statute-book by Sir Charles Tupper. You will remember the discussion at the time which prohibits any agreement, or lease or amalgamation between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and any of its branches. The clause in our Bill simply enables the Grand Trunk Railway to enter into working arrangements with, to lease or acquire running power over, or the right to work the line of any other company that has been duly empowered to make or grant the same to the Grand Trunk Railway. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway are not so duly empowered, but, on the contrary, are expressly prohibited by the statutes I have mentioned from making any such arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway. The clause, as we put it, is to enable us to complete arrangements with our little side lines and small roads, and that is all that is aimed at. The clause would prevent us from having anything to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other line that is not duly empowered, as I have stated, and there can be no other construction put upon it."

I want to add a few words in section 8. after the

I want to add a few words in section 8, after the word "Canada." I will read the clause and state where the words come in:

"The company may enter into working arrangements with, or may lease or acquire running powers over, or the right to work the line of, any other company in Canada under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, which has been empowered to make or grant the same."

Leaving out the words "by the Parliament of Canada."

"Which has been empowered to make or grant the same to or with the Grand Trunk Railway Company."
That is the amendment I would like to suggest.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand that the hon, gentleman is departing from what was fully discussed and arranged before the Committee, after due deliberation, because, if he does, we shall have to enquire into and discuss the matter very fully. I think it was understood, that exactly the same powers that were given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be given to the Grand Trunk, and a paragraph in the Bill was altered to agree with a paragraph in the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill, passed this Session. It was done with the approval of the First Minister, who was present, and agreed to by the Committee, and the words were altered to meet the general approval of the Committee. It would be very unwise to attempt to reopen that discussion. If it is done, however, I shall feel it necessary in the public interest to propose an amendment, which I do not care about doing, unless it is absolutely necessary, and I think the hon, gentleman who is moving this measure will best consult the interests of his clients if he does not seek to depart from what the Committee solemnly agreed upon after due deliberation and consideration of the different interests involved. I do not desire to oppose the Bill; I think we should give the Grand Trunk exactly the same powers as the Canadian Pacific Railway. this country has to dread, and we look forward with a good deal of fear to the time when these two great corporations might unite, for, if they did unite, they would control this Legislature and control this country from one end to the other. We ought to have a section inserted in the Bill, and I intended to move such a paragraph if there had not been such a unanimous feeling in the Committee that under no consideration should those two great companies, which control an enormous power politically, amalgamate; and if they did amalgamate, there would be no more use for Parliament, for these companies would elect the members, they would dictate who should form the Government, they would make a recommendation as to who should be Governor General, and they would practically rule this country, and it is of the utmost interest to the public to see that no such amalgamating powers shall be given to them. The hon, gentleman says there is a small corporation chartered by the Province of Quebec which has not the authority to unite with the Grand Trunk. Why did he not mention that company by name in the Bill, and if this had been done I do think any one would have raised an objection, but I object to the words in the eighth paragraph being altered as the hon. gentleman suggests. If he wants a discussion he can have one, but he had better take the Bill as the Committee decided it, and not raise a discussion under the circumstances.

Mr. BLAKE. I think, in so far as my memory serves me, the extract which the hon. gentleman read, correctly states the effect of the law, and there is on the Statute-book a provision, inserted during a somewhat animated discussion which took place here, which would prevent amalgamation or working arrangements between the two great corporations of which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has spoken. It is not, therefore, with respect to that difficulty that anything I have to say is brought forward. If that question were raised, I agree with the hon. member that it would be a vital question, a question which certainly could not be disposed of, under any proper reading of our rules, without a proper notice and without a reference back to the Committee. But a suggestion which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has made, may, perhaps, solve the immediate difficulty, and enable us to deal with this measure upon what I conceive to be sound principles. I feel, perhaps, a special responsibility with respect to the present position of this Bill, because it happens that, upon looking over the earlier measure to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, it appeared to me, as then framed, objectionable. It seemed to me that the Parliament of Canada ought to lay down this rule: that it would not grant the power of amalgamation or working arrangements without having passed once, at all events, upon the proposition that it was expedient that such powers should be given. And, therefore, I suggested to those who were promoting the other Bill, that they should alter the Bill and limit their powers to cases in which the Parliament of Canada had once spoken affirm-atively. I said, if Parliament has given to any railway company either a general authority to make working arrangements with any other company, or a special authority to make working arrangements with a particular railway company, then there is no objection to Parliament saying to another company: You can make working arrangements with any company so authorised; because Parliament in that case has already said there is no objection to such an amalgamation being effected. And it was upon that suggestion as to the expediency, on general principles, of retaining the power to the Parliament of Canada to that extent, that the other Bill was altered, with, I believe, the unanimous consent of the Railway Committee. seems to me the principle is as good and sound to-day, and with respect to this Bill, as it was with respect to the other Bill, and, therefore, I object, upon the same grounds on which I objected to the other Bill comprehending that wide authority, to this Bill comprehending as wide an authority as the hon. gentleman proposes. If there be, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has said, some specific case, which it is wanted to meet in a hurry this Session, for the amalgamation or the making of working arrangements with some particular railway, we can still preserve the general principle, which I deem to be of importance, by allowing the general clause to be retained in its revised form, and by inserting a clause giving special authority to deal with the specified company, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, and thus we shall have met the case fully.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that is the solution of the difficulty. One can quite understand that the Grand Trunk is in a different position to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Grand Trunk has connections in the settled parts of the Dominion, and has running arrangements and leases with smaller railways. I quite agree with the line of argument pursued by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that we should adhere to the principle settled and to the clause as decided on by the Railway Committee to-day, but that in order to meet this special case of the Grand Trunk, there should be a separate clause added to this Bill, setting out the railways over which they desire to make running arrangements. If that suggestion meets the views of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), he might postpone the Bill until next Monday, by which time he could have procured the list of railways and inserted them in the Bill.

Mr. CURRAN. I feel that the suggestion having come from both sides of the House, the best policy is to acquiesce in it as gracefully as possible. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has spoken of this company as my clients.

Mr. MITCHELL. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. CURRAN. They are constituents of mine, but not clients, unfortunately.

Mr MITCHELL. If I said clients, it must have been that they were your clients as one of the representatives of a city where they possess great power and influence; and, no doubt, in order to have them in that position, the hon. gentleman is willing to attend to their official business here. I wish to say, in addition, that I am not opposed to this Bill; I supported it in Committee, and I shall be glad to see the Grand Trunk obtain exactly the same powers as the Canadian Pacific Railway possess, and nothing more; but the suggestion made by the hon, member for West Durham, and approved by the Premier, entirely meets my approval as a fair and reasonable arrangement.

Committee rose and reported progress.

H. H. VIVIAN & CO.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 124) respecting H. H. Vivian & Co., Limited. -(Mr. Dawson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I think the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this Bill should explain to the Committee what the object is in coming here for the incorporation of a company to work mines and carry on mining operations. I could understand why that should be done if the mining operations were to be in the North-West Territories, but that is not proposed; they are only to be carried on in the Provinces of Canada, and I think the hon. gentleman should tell us why he comes here, and not to the Legislature of the Province in which those operations are to be carried on.

Mr. DAWSON. The company is an English company, which is said to be possessed of a good deal of capital. It has acquired lands in Algoma, especially at Sudbury, where it proposes to carry on operations. There can be no clashing of interests with other companies, because its work will be simply to sink shafts in the ground, and every Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

additional mining company is an assistance to the others. This company is already incorporated under an English Act, and it comes here to ask power to work mines in Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. The difficulty is, that the object of the company is to acquire and work properties in the Province of Ontario, and is, therefore, a Provincial object; and it would certainly seem more appropriate to apply to the Provincial Legislature for any corporate power that might be desired. It seems to me that it is a very great stretch of our jurisdiction and an evasion of the limitation of our rights, to incorporate a company here simply for Ontario operations.

Mr. DAWSON. The company asks power to work mines and establish smelting works in any part of Canada. Though it proposes in the meantime to begin operations at Sudbury, it does not wish its operations to be confined to the Province of Ontario, otherwise it would have gone to the Provincial Government. I may say, from information which I have, that the company is possessed of sufficient capital to carry out its objects. I believe it is one of the largest mining companies in the world, having mines in every part of the world, and it now proposes to come into Canada with its great capital to carry on mining opera-

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the observations of the hon. gentleman at all remove the objection. We have to consider, not merely where their operations are to be carried on, but the nature of the franchises which the company seek. They are franchises which this Parliament has not power to bestow, except in the North-West Territories. Once the company is incorporated it is an artificial person, and has the same rights to carry on its operations within the powers conferred on it as any other person. It proposes to establish smelting works not in any part of Canada, not in the North-West Territories, which are under our jurisdiction for all legislative purposes, but in the Provinces of Canada. The power of a company to carry on mining operations must depend on the good-will and authority of each Province where those operations are to be carried on. It is true, if this company were incorporated in Ontario it could not carry on mining operations in Quebec, but it cannot carry on mining operations in either Ontario or Quebec if is incorporated here. The fact is that our incorporation confers on it in this respect no power, and the hon. gentleman purposes to create a corporation without in reality giving it any franchise. The Legislature of Ontario might refuse to recognise any corporation incorporated by the Parliament of Canada for such a purpose, and it does seems to me that it is altogether an abuse of our power to create a corporation on which we are bestowing no franchise at all in any proper sense.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not prepared to assent to the proposition that this Parliament might not confer these powers on a company, but, I think, we ought not to do so unless sufficient reasons are given why we should. As the time for private Bills is up, I would suggest that the hongentleman allow the Bill to stand until Monday.

WAYS AND MEANS-THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Axle grease, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the same duty as before. The only change is that the words "similar compounds" are omitted, and the reason of the omission is that all sorts of things were attempted to be brought in as "a similar compound," and thus a great deal of trouble was caused.

Barrels containing petroleum or its products, or any mixtures of which petroleum forms a part, when such contents is chargeable with a specific duty, 40 cents each.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the same duty. The only change is, that, whereas formerly every barrel containing petroleum was taxed 40 cents. whether the contents were chargeable with a specific or ad valorem duty, now the barrel is taxed 40 cents only, when the contents are charged a specific duty.

Surgical belts or trusses and suspensory bandages of all kinds, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The change in this consists in adding the words, "and suspensory bandages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that both the duty on trusses and the duty on suspensory bandages are equally objectionable. It does appear to me that a community of Hottentots would know better than to legislate for the purpose of increasing the cost of articles required for the use of persons suffering from injury. Of all the vicious practices that have crept in under this tariff, that of taxing surgical appliances or medicines of genuine value, appears to me the most utterly barbarous that ever entered into the minds, even of protectionists, to conceive. I cannot imagine how any human being, who really considers for one moment the results of a tax of this kind and the fact that these taxes operate directly as a penalty inflicted on any unfortunate individual who may happen to sustain severe injury, requiring the use of a truss or bandage, can defend such a tax as this. I hope the hon gentleman, who is not responsible for putting this in originally, will make these things free, in the interests of suffering humanity.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I endorse every word the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has uttered. This is a tax on people who are very ill able to bear it. There is a very large profit at present in the manufacture of trusses, belts and bandages. There is no other industry in this country whose product pays better and sells at higher rates. Again, when we consider it is largely the working people who require these articles, we cannot fail to admit that this is another attempt to impose a heavy charge upon those who are unable to bear it. From my own practical experience, I find that nearly nine out of every ten people who require bandages and trusses are found among the working people; and that is only natural, because those troubles are occasioned by hard work and heavy lifting. The cost of these articles is at present high enough. We have to pay $2 to $20 for a truss, although any one who examines a truss will see that $2, $3, or workmanship it contains and when a duty of 25 per cent. on that article, is imposed, you are inflicting a heavy tax on the laboring people. Trusses, belts and surgical instruments are too dear altogether in this country; and if we had a little more competition in the Canadian market in these articles it would be much better for the I can purchase an article in the city people. of New York for 60 cents for which I have to pay in this country $2.60, and I can purchase an article in New York at $7 which costs $13 in

Mr. FOSTER. The duty would not keep that

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). No; but there appears to be an understanding or a combine among these manufacturers to impose these very high prices. If the Government would reduce the duty on these articles, they would be doing an action which would redound to their credit and would benefit the people. The greater number of the people who require these are men and women working on farms and at other heavy labor. This tax does not come out of the pockets of the medical men, who have only to prescribe those helps and supports, but comes out of the pockets of these

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the appeal which has been made to the Minister of Finance has been sufficient to induce him to make up his mind that this is a duty which ought not to be placed upon the unfortunate. It is only the unfortunate who require these articles, and why should the hon. gentleman inflict more misery upon them. are generally a class of people who are ill able to bear the burdens imposed upon them? Minister knows that he does not require this revenue; he has a large surplus and is going to have a still larger one. Why, then, should he impose this tax upon those who are already afflicted? If a man loses an arm or a leg, he is often compelled to go to the United States to get an artificial limb. I know a case in which an honest, industrious young man in poor circumstances lost an arm in the discharge of his work, and had to go to New York to get an artificial Being poor, he could not York while they made the arm and hand. remain in New York while they made the arm and hand for him, and so he came home. The artificial arm was sent to him at St. Thomas, and he was charged a customs duty of $7.50 on it. The collector of Customs there said he thought it was a hardship for this man to have to pay that duty. If he had been in good circum-stances, he could have remained in New York until the arm was completed, and then probably no duty would have been collected on it. The collector forwarded an application for the remission of the duty to the Minister of Customs, and the reply came back that it was a dutiable article and must pay the duty. Representations were made that the man was in such circumstances that he was practically unable to pay, but the Department, true to its instincts, compelled him to pay $7.50 for this article. This case shows that there is a wrong being done to these unfortunates in compelling them to pay this extra amount of duty. I think the Minister should allow this item to stand or withdraw it. I think, if he knew the people who $4 at the outside will cover all the material and require to use such instruments as these, he would reconsider this. It may be said to doctors that, if we are so anxious that these men should get along, we ought not to charge them for our attendance. Well, we do not charge them in cases of this kind. Professional men who are here may call to mind circumstances which have come under their attention in which these unfortunate men have been injured when doing hard work in lifting or other work in connection with railroads. They know that generally these people have large families to support, and that they cannot be expected to bear these burdens easily. If you go into a drug store, they will charge you for one of these articles $2, $4 or $6, and you will wonder how such an article comes to so high a price. But the Government add 25 per cent. more duty, which will come upon these men who wear these instruments. hope the Finance Minister will have heart and conscience enough to feel that this is a case in which he should relieve the burden on the afflicted. I do not place very much confidence in the Government of the day, but still I have hope that, in the interest of the suffering, they will allow this item to be struck out, and will lay the tax upon those who can afford it better. Let the hon, gentleman place an additional tax on the silks and satins and the wines of the rich. hon, gentleman say the Government do not want champagne taxed extra, but, if the Finance Minister entertains the same views now as he did formerly, he would increase the duties on brandies and champagnes and other articles of that kind; but sometimes positions change people, and I am afraid that the hon. gentleman has changed. you must have this additional revenue, impose it in such a way that it will be borne by those persons who are able to pay.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the Committee should pause before they confirm this duty, and I think the Minister should give us some information of the reason for maintaining such a duty at all. The cases which have been mentioned by my hon, friend are not singular. I know of a case in which an unfortunate child had lost its leg and had an artificial leg. As the child grew, the leg was found to be too short, and it was sent to New York—the only place on the continent, I believe, where this sort of thing can be done—to have it lengthened. When this leg, which had already been worn, but was simply mended and lengthened, came back, this paternal Government charged a considerable amount of duty upon it. think it is not only unfair but degrading that such a course should be pursued. I do not think there is any nation in the world so barbarous, except perhaps our neighbors, the United States, as to put a duty on such articles as trusses and bandages. However, if Ministers are not disposed to strike out this item, we can only divide upon it on concurrence.

Mr. MULOCK. I see that the Minister is surrounded by three or four, or perhaps five or six medical advisers. These instruments may be very necessary to them to lift themselves over the next election with, and I think they should give the Minister some advice.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the professional gentlemen opposite who display their intelligence, or rather want of intelligence, with reference to this line of goods, have been talking in a way that is not appeal to all the medical men on the other side of consistent. I understand the hon, member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) stated that he bought an instrument on the other side for 60 cents, that he would have had to pay $2 for here. There is only 15 cents duty; that would make it 75 cents. Why should he pay $2? I can say with reference to this particular item, that it only applies to trusses and bandages, not to surgical instruments or artificial limbs; and in this particular line we have makers in Canada that, I think, are quite equal to any on the other side. In my experience I find that Canadian-made instruments or appliances are quite as effective for what they are intended, as any that can be got on the other side, and I think at as reasonable a price. The member for North York (Mr. Mulock) knows that Cluthe's establishment in Toronto is one of the best on the continent, and supplies the finest instruments in the world. When we have them made so plentifully at home there is no great hardship in putting on a duty. In this case there is no increase of duty, it is only making the item a little plainer.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The hon. gentleman says that instruments manufactured in Toronto are superior to those manufactured in other places.

Mr. SPROULE. Of this class they are quite equal.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I have had a good opportunity of ascertaining the character of the instru-ments manufactured in Toronto, and I have compared them with those manufactured in the old country. Surgical instruments and all other instruments manufactured in the old country are far superior to those manufactured in Toronto. Very few instruments at all are manufactured in Toronto. The hon, gentleman says it is only to make the item plainer, but that has nothing to do with imposing heavy burdens upon these unfortunate Am I to understand that the Gevernment have sought out these unfortunate afflicted people and are going to increase their burdens and afflict them still more? Is the hon, member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) going to let the people understand, that, although they are already afflicted, he is going, for the sake of the Government, to impose extra burdens upon them? I, for one, would not feel justified in imposing heavier burdens upon We cannot get much these unfortunate people. revenue from these instruments, and it must fall upon a class of people who are least able to bear it.

Mr. SPROULE. It falls upon the wealthy as well as the poor.

Mr. MITCHELL. For one wealthy person afflicted there are twenty poor people, for the reason that it is by hard labor, by straining and toiling. and lifting, that these accidents occur. Wealthy people do not do that kind of labor.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the usual experience of medical men.

The poorer classes are not Mr. MITCHELL. able to pay the exorbitant fees that medical men charge, therefore you do not know how many poor people are suffering.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My professional brother, the member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), must know that all these articles are sold at prices three times greater than it costs to produce them. I the House if that is not a fact; therefore this industry should not be protected so as to exclude from our market a reasonable competition, in order to reduce the expense of these articles to parties who need them. Now, the 25 per cent duty has succeeded in keeping these articles out, with the exception of $22,164 worth of trusses and belts. Would it not be better if there were larger competition from other countries, so as to reduce the price for those individuals who use them? I am astonished that the hon. member for Grey should get up and attempt to justify the imposition of a duty upon that particular article, when he knows very well that a truss which costs $5 never cost $1.50 to produce it. It only lasts about one year, and then the party, who is usually a workingman, has to get another. It is usually a laborer in the woods or on the railways who suffers an injury through bending and twisting his body; also the wives of farmers and of artisans, who are seeking to help their husbands to make a living, frequently have to perform labor which should be performed by the men themselves, and suffer such injury as to necessitate the use of belts and trusses. The hon. member for Grey knows that is the case, yet he stands up and supports the Finance Minister in imposing a duty upon these poor individuals. is it that the Government succeed so well in picking out the classes who are the least able to bear these heavy duties? The laborers have been sought out and duties have been put upon articles they require; farmers have been selected to bear heavier burdens, and now the Government has found a class of invalids on which they are determined to impose a burden by putting a duty upon articles which they require in order to enable them to labor at all, and to earn sufficient money, as an hon. gentleman beside me says, to pay the rest of the taxes. Now, I would appeal to the hon. gentleman with the big heart inside that coat—I mean the hon. gentleman who wears the fine silk hat—and I would ask him, in the interest of that class of people, either to remove or reduce the duty, and I am sure he will have their gratitude for all time to

Mr. FOSTER. In the first place, the duty on these articles has not been raised; it is exactly the same as it has been for two years. In the second place, it is not the most expensive of surgical appliances that pay this duty; the item does not include any surgical instrument; it is the cheapest and least expensive class—belts, trusses and bandages. Again, as has been stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), who has had medical and surgical experience, these articles are made in Toronto and Montreal, and other cities, and, as I am informed, are made just as cheaply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you do not want protection for them?

Mr. FOSTER. The duty is not large. If the duty were 35 per cent., or a higher specific duty, there might be something in what the hon. gentlemen say. The hop gentleman appropriate is promen say. The hon, gentleman opposite is profuse in his sympathy for the poor and afflicted upon whom the duty is placed; if he will carry out the same line of argument, he will see there is scarcely anything that pays a duty at all that is not used by the poor and afflicted. The sugar which they use in their tea, for example; all the articles that are taxed in this country for purposes articles that are taxed in this country for purposes of revenue, are used by the poor as well as by the The line of articles upon which this duty is placed are used by the rich as well as by the poor, though it may be quite true that they are more generally used by people who have to labor with their hands.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Finance said that the Canadian manufacturers manufactured these articles just as cheaply as they are manufactured abroad. If that is the case, why enhance the value to the consumer, by imposing a tariff which enables the manufacturer to raise the price. The Finance Minister told us that the Canadian manufacturer does not require protection in order to carry out this particular industry.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon, gentleman said they could manufacture as cheaply as foreign manufac-If he did state that, he said what I say he said, namely, that the Canadian manufacturers do not require for the purpose of what is called the National Policy, namely, the development of that industry, this particular protection. This, then, is a sample of the infant industries the Government are always protecting, and which never arrive at maturity. If it is the case that the Canadian manufacturer can manufacture as cheaply and manufacture as good an instrument as is manufactured abroad, how comes it that the Trade and Navigation Returns show a very considerable importation of these particular articles every year? Last year the duty collected on belts and trusses was $5,542, which, at 25 per cent. ad valorem, would give a value of over$21,000. Here we have seen, as is usual, doctors differing. I regret that an hon. member, who is so well informed on the question, and who comes in daily contact with suffering, as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) must do, should be the one to stand up in Parliament and ask to have additional burdens imposed upon those unfortunate members of society. Why, the Government are boasting that they are doing their best for the poor man, for the benefit of society generally, and yet here they have been unmasked by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who has shown that, for the sake of protecting one or two manufacturers in Toronto or other parts of the Dominion, it is proposed to tax the halt and the lame throughout the length and breadth of the country. It is an inhuman proposition. It is a disgraceful proposition. I cannot find language sufficiently strong to express my abhorrence of this proposition. It is a bit of downright cruelty, and I suppose it could only be proposed by the Government on the well-founded theory that they are not free agents. They are simply instruments in the hands of the manufacturers of those instruments, and I trust that those instruments which they are taxing will become instruments of torture to the Government when they come to give an account of their administration to the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. Men of wealth, who can afford to go to Boston and New York, or Buffalo, are treated in those cities, and the necessary appliances are put on, and they come back to this country without paying duty on those appliances. But the poor man has to be treated at home, and has to pay the duty on the appliances.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The Minister of Finance must remember that the price on which the duty is paid is double or treble what the article is really worth. Add to that 25 per cent. and the result is a very heavy duty indeed. It is said by the Finance Minister that all duties must bear more or less heavily on poor people. I do not think that is an argument to offer in the present case, and the hon gentleman should consent to the item being struck out. It is well known that a much larger number of the poor, in proportion to population, are afflicted with these troubles, than the rich; and these cases are principally confined to those who perform heavy work. These people are, moreover, compelled almost every year to supply themselves with new articles of this kind, and a sufferer will have to pay an extra duty almost every year or cease working altogether and go to the poorhouse. In the interests of humanity the Finance Minister should strike out this item. The hon gentleman said that this is not an increase of duty. Even if it is not, it is no argument that it should be retained if it imposes hardship and is wrong in principle. There are other items that are nearly as unjust as this. Take, for example, oranges, which are necessary to the sick room. The Government impose burdens on every class, and yet they say they are a paternal Government; but, if so, they are cruel, harsh and unjust.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I submit that the Finance Minister has not touched the merits of the question. He has stated that this duty is only on the cheaper kinds of appliances used, and that the costly instruments used by a surgeon are not included. have no objection to the more costly instruments being highly taxed, because we know that medical men, although they are compelled to work hard, are about as well paid as any class in the community, and are well able to pay the duty on the high-priced instruments they use. He says the poor people must pay a share of the taxes as well as the rich. We do not object to that principle, for the Government cannot levy taxation without including the poor as well as the rich, but unfortunately the Government has so arranged the tariff that in the articles of consumption the poor man uses he has to pay the heavy share of the burden. As regards this item, what we complain of, is not so much that the poor have to bear the heavy share of the tax, but that the Government have singled out for taxation a class that is not only generally poor, but which is also afflicted and unfortunate. I submit that the Minister of Finance has given no satisfactory reason for continuing this tax, and that it is a duty we owe to these afflicted people that this extra tax should be struck out.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The Minister of Finance has said that we were paying a duty now on surgical instruments, but I do not complain of that, as the surgeons themselves pay that particular tax. This is a different thing altogether. Surgeons have nothing whatever to do with paying the expense of trusses and belts, and other articles included in this particular item. The expenses entirely fall upon the party purchasing, and I believe it is largely in the interests of those invalids to have these articles placed on the free list. I, therefore, move, seconded by the member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson), "that trusses, surgical Mr. McMullex.

belts and suspensory bandages be placed upon the free list."

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I think the hon gentlemen on the other side entirely magnify the importance of a duty on these articles. Trusses and such appliances are largely in the hands of patentees; their sale is limited, and the price is comparatively high or the manufacturers could not keep in the business. In speaking about bandages, I venture to say that nine-tenths of those in use are worn by the wealthy people of this country.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I know something about this as well as hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I know that these articles are largely used in this country by wealthy people and that they are sold and peddled all over the country by women. The poorer people have very little to do with paying the duty on these articles.

Mr. PLATT. The remarks made by the hon member for Leeds (Mr. Ferguson) would tend to show that the duty on these articles is entirely unnecessary. He has said that these instruments are generally in the hands of patentees, and the sale being limited, it was necessary that the articles should be placed at a very high price. Nobody will dispute that the prices of these surgical appliances, no matter how simple their construction, are far beyond their intrinsic value and the cost of their production. That, I think, is a sufficient reason why their price should not be increased by a duty. If we have to pay the present high prices, it is due to the fact that these articles are in the hands of specialists or patentees, and that they are distributed to druggists or other vendors who generally expect pretty high profit on their wares. That is a very good reason why no duty should be placed on these articles. I have listened to this debate to ascertain the reason why the Government propose to continue this duty. They have not told us whether it is for revenue purposes or for the sake of protecting the manufacturers of the country. It must be for the one or the other, or for both. The Government has told us, time and again, since this debate commenced, that these duties were not for the sake of revenue, and I can tell them that the placing of duties on these articles does not protect the manufacturers in this country in the least. The manufacturers need no protection. The highpriced articles which they produce are used by them to advertise their professional standingfor many of them are professed surgeons—and they use the trusses they manufacture to advertise themselves before the country, so that when they advertise their wares they are advertising their professional skill. They pretend in their advertising to advise their patients free of charge, and to charge moderate prices for their trusses. Aside entirely from the representations from this side of the House regarding the condition of the people who mostly suffer from these accidents which require such appliances, there is a very good reason why no duty should be imposed, or rather why the duty should be removed, because of the high prices which are charged upon these articles. If the neonle already have the results the the people already have to pay three times the cost of an article, it seems to me that it should not be enhanced in seems to me that it should duty. not be enhanced in price by imposing a duty.

revenue, I do not see what reason they can have for continuing these articles on the dutiable list, and I trust they will not wait for a division of the House to place them on the free list.

Mr. BOWELL. Before you put that motion to the House, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I scarcely think the hon. gentleman who proposed it understands what the effect would be. Does not the hon. gentleman know that, even though the article be struck off the list, it still remains the law?

Mr. PLATT. He moved to have these articles placed on the free list.

Mr. BOWELL. I have to inform the hon. gentleman that the striking out of this item would mentioned. The only reason for asking the consideration of the House upon this item, was simply to declare by statute that which we have had to rule in the Customs Department as being dutiable at 25 per cent.; and in order to avoid the trouble and annoyance which occurs at the different ports of the Dominion. For instance, some officials would interpret the word "belts" to include everything -even a belt for a saw-mill-and as the word "surgical" was not in the old law, nor the words "suspensory bandages," they are inserted here now to make the matter clear. This is a mere explanatory clause, inserted to enable the different officers to administer the law as it stands upon the Statute book. If you strike this out, you leave the law precisely as it was, and under which so many difficulties have arisen. If the House deems it advisable that there should be no duty imposed on trusses and belts, then it would be necessary to introduce a Bill to repeal that clause of the tariff as it now stands on the Statute-book. I may mention that a majority of the resolutions now before the House are of the same character; they are rather explanatory than an interference with the duty as it exists to-day; so that the House will understand that if it is desirable to repeal this clause, some other procedure must be followed than merely to strike it out. The manufacture of these articles is an industry that exists in different parts of the Dominion, and if it is worthy of a protection of 25 per cent., then, like all other industries, it should be protected. That is the only reason why this duty is on the Statute-book at all. It is not for purpose of revenue. The arguments used, as my hon. friend the Finance Minister very aptly said for striking out this item, will apply to every single item in the tariff, with the exception of those which refer to what may be termed luxuries. I hope the House will not strike the item out, but will allow the amendment to be made in order to enable the Department to nnforce the law as it ought to be administered.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say that it is trifling with the intelligence of this House to say that a tax of this kind stands on the same footing as all others except taxes on luxuries. Here you have a tax on an article known to be required by people suffering from a particular disease, and I can conceive of no possible article on which common humanity should more induce the Government to require that there should be no tax, than trusses and suspensory bandages. The hon. gentleman knows that it is the sheerest folly to talk to us of these articles being made here as cheaply and as well as they are made elsewhere. If they are, of what earthly use is a protective duty on them at all? Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that $21,000 worth of trusses would be imported into this country and a duty of 25 per cent. paid on them if they could be manufactured here as cheaply as they are in the United States, England or elsewhere? The thing is absurd on the face of it. This is an article that every principle of humanity requires you should make free. With the solitary exception of a tax on quinine, which, to the everlasting dis-grace of the United States and to our own disgrace, was maintained for a considerable time, I know of none so utterly indefensible, so inhuman or so repugnant to every sense of political morality, as a tax on articles of this description. I remember on one occasion, when my hon friend from North Brant and myself called attention to a similar enormity, the hon. First Minister had it struck off. In conformity with, I was going to say, the barbarous instinct of the protectionist mind, Sir Leonard Tilley, when Finance Minister, had actually imposed a duty on books printed for the use of the blind, and it was not until the hon. member for North Brant and myself appealed to the hon. First Minister that we got that duty struck off. I will appeal to him again, as a man of sense and humanity, whatever else he may be, to throw off this duty on trusses.

Mr. PLATT. I think we may as well know now as at any time what our powers are. If we can, by no action we take here, remove any of these duties, I do not see the use of discussing them any further. The hon. Minister of Customs has told us that it is impossible, by anything that this Committee can do, to affect the duty on this particular class of articles, and it will certainly tend to shorten the discussion, if it is true what he tells us, that in the case of a majority of these resolutions, we are here only for the sake of discussing them, without the possibility of preventing their effect. It seems to me we have before us the very clauses, by carrying one of which and voting down the other, we can repeal the duty on these articles. If the Committee fail to pass the section now before us and repeal section 2, this article will be placed on the free

Mr. BOWELL. It is scarcely fair for the hon. gentleman to say that I attempted to mislead the Committee, for I pointed out a mode in which the repeal of any of these duties could be effected. I did not expect to convince the hon. member for South Oxford. I expected him to meet the question exactly in the manner in which he has met it, for he hardly ever rises to address the House without using such adjectives as absurd, barbarous, heinous, with regard to propositions from this side of the House. He is very desirous of annexing this country, commercially, to the United States, and he wants us to adopt the American tariff, which imposes on these very articles, the moderate duty of 45 per cent. If we are barbarous in imposing 25 per cent., I leave it to the hon. gentleman, with his power over the English language, and particularly his knowledge of adjectives, to properly designate this conduct on the part of the friends with whom he so much desires to be allied commercially. I am really inclined to think that the hon. gentleman must be politically ruptured, or he would not attempt to impose on this country such a barbarous and outrageous tax as 45 per cent. on trusses and articles of a similar character.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I regard the American tariff as a degree more barbarous than our own, which is saying a good deal. As to the introduction of the American tariff, I and my friends here always maintained the English system; it was the hon. gentleman and his friends who introduced the cast-off relics of American protection here. They are the parties who are responsible for discarding the English system, under which we had lived practically until 1878, and who introduced the American system, which has worked its legitimate fruits. But I recall the hon. gentleman to the question before the Chair. I say no friend of humanity can read this item which proposes to inflict a duty of 25 per cent. on surgical belts, trusses and suspensory bandages, which are largely used by the poorer classes, without feeling ashamed of the Parliament of his country, which allows such things to remain on the Statute-book.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Blacking, shoe and shoemakers' ink, and shoe, harness and leather dressing, and harness soap, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change in the duty. Shoe, harness and leather dressing had formerly been ruled under this clause.

Advertising pamphlets, pictures and pictorial show cards, illustrated advertising periodicals, illustrated price lists, advertising calendars, advertising almanacs, tailors' and mantle-makers' fashion plates, and all chromos, chromotypes, oleographs, photographs and other cards, pictures or artistic work of similar kinds, produced by any process other than hand-painting or drawing, whether for business or advertising purposes or not, printed or stamped on paper, cardboard or other material, N.E.S., 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Advertising pamphlets, not illustrated, were formerly charged at the rate of 1 cent each, and these are now included under this item.

Geographical, topographical and astronomical maps, charts and globes, N.E.S., 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Formerly the item read, "Maps and charts, 20 per cent." Globes have been added. They were ruled here formerly.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Have we any establishment for the manufacture of globes in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. I understand they are manufactured in Toronto.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The Toronto Globe?

Newspapers or supplemental editions or parts thereof, partly printed, and intended to be completed and published in Canada, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The words, "Newspapers or parts thereof," appeared formerly, and now the item reads: "Newspapers or supplemental editions or parts thereof." If the newspaper should be rated at this rate, supplemental editions should come under the same rate. They were formerly ruled under this.

Bank notes, bonds, bills of exchange, cheques, promissory notes, drafts, and all similar work unsigned, and bill-heads, envelopes, receipts, cards, and other commercial blank forms printed, or lithographed, or printed from steel or copper or other plates, and other printed matter, N.E.S., 35 per cent., ad valorem.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a new item. These articles were not before enumerated, but were ruled generally, I think, under the item of manufactured paper, at 35 per cent., and some of them were rated under the still higher duty of 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent. It was thought best to make a new item, and put them at 35 per cent, which would be less than the average before.

Bookbinders' tools and implements, including ruling machines and bookbinders' cloth, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The only change in this item is adding "book" before "binders." Bookbinders' cloth is a special cloth used for the binding of books. This will prevent every kind of cloth alleged to be for the binding of books, but not actually bookbinders' cloth, being attempted to be brought in under this item.

Mr. MULOCK. This brings up the question of our copyright. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if the proclamation is issued yet bringing our Copyright Act into force?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has not. The despatch in relation to the Order in Council which was sent by the Imperial Government is on its way to the Privy Council, and has not reached that body yet.

Fancy work boxes, writing desks, glove boxes, hand-kerchief boxes, manicure cases, perfume cases, toilet cases and fancy cases for smokers' sets, and all similar fancy articles made of bone, shell, horn, ivory, wood, leather, plush, satin, silk, satinette or paper; dolls and toys of all kinds including sewing machines when of not more than two dollars in value, and toy whips: ornaments of alabaster, spar, terra-cotta or composition; and statuettes, beads and bead ornaments N.E.S., 35 per cent. ad volorem

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the permission of the House to insert the word "amber" after the word "spar" in the line next to the last. I propose also to strike out the word "beads," and to make a separate item for beads at 20 per cent. This is in consequence of representations made, especially from some bands of Indians, who use these beads largely for their ornamental work.

Brass in strips, for printers' rules, not finished, and brass in strips or sheets of less than four inches in width, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Formerly brass in sheets, not finished, was on the free list, but it was found that an attempt was made to bring in the brass in narrow strips almost ready for manufacture, and it was found necessary to make a definition as to what a strip should be. Consequently, the arbitrary limit of four inches has been made here. Anything less than four inches is still on the free list

Braces or suspenders, and parts thereof, 35 per cent advalorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The only addition is the words "and parts thereof".

Mr. McMULLEN. It seems to me that this is a very large increase on the article of suspenders.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no increase.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, it is a very large duty to continue on such an article.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the rate is so very high, considering the competition. Very strong pressure has been brought upon us to make the duty higher, but I have withstood that, and I hope the hon. gentleman will be satisfied.

Mr. MITCHELL. You did not withstand it very much.

Mr. BOWELL. The duty is not increased.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am surprised at the assurance of the hon. gentlemen when they say that the duty is not increased, as if it was not twice too much before. The duty which they imposed before has left them a surplus of two million dollars, as they claim; but, whenever a high rate of duty is complained of, the answer is that they have not increased it.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) objected to the high duty on braces and suspenders, and my hon. friend said the duty was not increased, and that he had resisted the attempts which were made to induce the Government to increase it. Then the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said: "You did not resist it much," and I said the duty was not increased, showing that we had resisted the appeal which was made to us to increase the duty. I will be very cautious in future to suggest anything to the hon. gentleman which may ruffle his sweet temper, which is very much like my own.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish the hon, gentleman had shown as much caution during the last fifteen years, and then we would not have had such large duties imposed. These are due very much to the accumulating tendencies of the Minister of Customs. It is not due to the Finance Minister, but to the grasping tendency of the Department over which the Minister of Customs presides, and his desire always to draw blood out of the poor people. Time and again the hon, gentleman has said, as the Minister of Finance said just now, we have not increased the duties, as if they were not too high before.

Mr. ELLIS. I understand that there is quite a large industry in bringing parts of suspenders into this country and putting them together here. Will not this added provision crush that industry out altogether?

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Minister says the duty is not increased. It is 35 per cent. What industry is there, I should like to know, that should have a duty of more than 35 per cent. The maximum duty should be 25 per cent., and, if an industry cannot exist with a protection of 25 per cent., the money should be devoted to something that can exist under that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find that pressed goods are admitted on a duty of 25 per cent., nickel and other goods of that kind at 25 per cent., jewelry at 25 per cent., gold and silver articles at 25 per cent., silk hats at 25 per cent., diamonds, set, at 20 per cent., and yet 35 per cent. is charged on braces and suspenders. Is there any necessity to make the poor man pay 35 per cent. on a pair of braces, while the rich man only pays 20 per cent. on diamonds?

Rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The only change here is leaving out the words "when imported direct from the country of production."

Mr. MULOCK. Why is the Minister imposing a duty on rice?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not imposing it.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, does the Minister approve of imposing a duty on rice?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, or it would not be here.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose the Minister imposes these duties either for the purposes of revenue or for the purpose of protection. In which respect does he suppose this duty will operate?

Mr. BOWELL. This is not to protect the rice, but the change is made for the purpose of enabling parties to bring into this country uncleaned, unhulled or paddy rice from any part of the world at the rate of 17½ per cent. The old tariff reads as follows:—

"Rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy, when imported direct from the country of growth, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent."

Rice, cleaned, bears a duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The object in making this change, as I said a moment ago, was this: A line of steamers is running in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Vancouver and Hong Kong. If that rice is bought at Hong Kong, although it has been brought there from some other part of the world, if imported in that way, it would pay a duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. a pound, not being a direct importation. This enables a large quantity of uncleaned rice to be brought into the country and cleaned in Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. If the duty is excessive, let it be repealed or reduced. Here you are imposing a tax of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. ad valorem on a food used by a large portion of our people. Last year we imported 18,000,000 lbs. of unhulled rice, which paid a duty of some \$30,000. Everybody knows that rice is one of the staple foods, and not only of the wealthier classes, but of the poor, and it can never be protected sufficiently, to be grown in this country. It is certainly not necessary to impose this tax for revenue purposes. I would ask the Finance Minister why this tax is imposed. On what principle is it that you tax rice, an article that can never be grown in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. There are many things that are not grown in Canada, that are taxed. Rice must have been originally taxed for revenue purposes. I suppose we need a revenue yet.

Mr. MULOCK. But it is not required for revenue purposes, because the Minister told us a month ago, that he had a surplus of last year and was going to have a larger one this year, and he says he is shortly going to commence to reduce the national debt. It is quite clear he has made out no case for taxing rice, a staple article, that enters into the consumption of all classes of the people, more particularly that class which the Government loves so much on election days, the poorer classes. Why is it that now, in this quiet nook of the Dominion, they tax this food?

Mr. FOSTER. I have given the only reason.

Mr. MULOCK. The only reason is no reason at all. He supposes it is for revenue purposes, and he tells us that he has a surplus. So it is a burden wantonly placed upon the shoulders of those friends of the Administration, the poor people.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend would not, of course, argue that because we had a surplus last year of $1,800,000, and because we expect a surplus of over two millions next year, therefore we must repeal all the items from which a revenue is collected. We have a surplus, and we need a revenue It is my opinion we need both.

Mr. MULOCK. If you will collect more than is necessary, you should reduce the taxation. Look through the items that are taxed and see which ones can be best dispensed with, and you will find that rice is an article upon which there is no justification for imposing a tax for revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we need all the surplus we have over and above consolidated revenue, to meet the capital expenditure of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad my hon. friend has raised this question, because it brings us down to the food of the people. It is a question that will have to be threshed out thoroughly before hon. gentlemen get through all these items of increase. The answer these gentlemen always give is: We have not increased the duty on rice. The Finance Minister says that by fixing the rice tariff on uncleaned rice as it was before, at 171 per cent., it increases the traffic between Japan and China and Vancouver, and leads to the importation of large quantities of unhulled rice, for the purpose of giving employment, I presume, to a single rice mill over there. The hon, gentleman admits that he had $1,800,000 of a surplus last year, and he expects two millions this year. My impression is that there will be a good deal more than two millions, with the tariff we are now dealing with. The hon, gentleman says that he does not think that because the tariff has brought him in a surplus, therefore he should take the duty off. recollect that when one of the hon. gentleman's predecessors had a surplus, he felt it necessary to give relief to the poor people, and he took the duty off tea altogether, and it was to the credit of that hon, gentleman that he did so. It would be well for the present Finance Minister to follow his example, and according as his surplus grows, and he finds there is more revenue collected than he needs, let him commence by taking the duties off the food of the people, off the staple articles upon which the people live, and there is none of them that, while not a luxury, is a more desirable article of food than Let him commence by taking the tax off the food of the poor people, take it off rice, take it off flour, take it off pork, take it off molasses, take it off everything that enters into the daily food of the working classes of this community. his Government would pursue that policy, they would earn the gratitude of the country more than they do by heaping up surpluses and trying wherever they can to put on heavier duties. I think the hon. gentleman should take that duty off rice altogether. He will lose $30,000 of revenue, it is true, but that money would remain in the pockets of the people, particularly of the poorer classes. Hon. gentlemen say they may require it. they will require it, and a good deal more. You will require it for subsidising and purchasing constituencies, in making useless railways and useless public works, in spending three-quarters of a million pounds, for instance, upon the Chignecto Ship Railway, which is as well as thrown into the sea. It was done for what purpose? To please Sir Charles Tupper and his constituents, and for no other reason under Heaven. He held you by the throat and made you vote the money. And how are you building it? You are carrying out that order to make your protective system consistent, Mr. Foster part of the National Policy in what way—how are the contractors building it? They have imported a thousand Italians, who dig holes in the sides of the banks, put in a few poles as for Indian wigwams, put on a covering of brush, and live in them like hogs. Let the Finance Minister ask the member for that section of the country, and he will get the information that I have got from him in regard to this condition of affairs. These laborers do not spend the money in the country. The Government has squandered three and a quarter millions to bring a thousand Italians into the country.

We did not bring them in. Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your tools have brought them in, men for whom the money for this useless work is voted; this work which, when it is finished, will be a standing disgrace and ridicule in this country to the whole world. Then it is completed at a useless expenditure of three and a quarter millions. Hon, gentlemen go on accumulating taxation when it is useless and unnecessary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) in regard to duty on rice, I most cheerfully endorse them. I cannot see on what ground the hon. Minister continues the duty on this article. If it was absolutely necessary to raise money to carry on the business of the country, he might possibly include such an article of food as rice, which is a cheap and nutritious article used by the poor people, on the same ground as he would include other breadstuffs; but, I think, it should be one of the last of the articles placed upon the taxable list. But when the hon, gentleman concedes that last year he had a respectable surplus, that this year he has a very large surplus, and that he expects a large surplus next year, every possible ground on which he could demand an exaction of from seventy to eighty thousand dollars a year in the shape of a tax on rice is gone from him. My hon. friend mentioned $30,000 as the amount collected in duty, and he was perfectly correct if he confined his remarks to uncleaned and unhulled rice. We imported last year a very large quantity, 19,951,897 pounds, of the value of $193,000, on which a duty was paid of $30,289. But we also imported rice, on which a duty was paid of $43,683, making a total of about $74,000. This is an article not consumed by the rich but by the poor, and the duty strikes at a class which the Finance Minister should seek to relieve. Moreover, he does not re-This is one of a quire $70,000 more revenue. class of articles which should be first removed from the taxable list. Further, this is an article not raised in the country, the duty is not required for protection purposes, and, therefore, the tax is totally indefensible.

Mr. GILLMOR. The Finance Minister, in reply to the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), said they did not bring in the Italians to work on the Chignecto Ship Railway, and they had nothing to do with it. They had a great deal to do with it. On one thousand dollars worth of the products of labor which come in, our workingmen have to pay $300 taxes before they can use them; but the Government allow the Italians to come in without paying any taxes, and they come in to compete with our own laborers. In when you tax the product of labor, you should tax the foreign laborer coming in to compete with our own workingman.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that your policy?

Mr. GILLMOR. If I were a protectionist, and wanted to do the fair thing, I would do that. If I wanted to protect all classes alike, I would do that; and I would say that a workingman, twenty-one years of age, had cost somebody $1,000 to raise him to that condition, and I would tax the $1,000 in labor $300, just as I would tax $1,000 in products of labor. Then manufacturers would products of labor. understand what protection means all round. When the workingmen are taxed to support railway works, manufacturing and other interests, the Government should impose taxes on foreign workingmen who come in to compete with our home laborers. That would be a consistent policy. It is an imposition on the workingmen of this country that taxes are imposed on everything they eat, drink and wear, and yet they are compelled to contribute towards the annual subsidy of $150,000 to build that marine railway in order to make work, as you say, for the people; and yet you let Italians come in to do that work, and to build that nuisance and swindle the Chignecto Ship Railway. I say the workingmen ought to awaken to their position. saw how the workingmen were protected in Albert street in this city. I remember this Session a banquet was given to the Premier by the Conservative Workingmen's Association of Ottawa. No doubt the workingmen thought the Government were promoting their interests. I talked with some of those workingmen on Albert street. I there saw men digging through a foot of frozen ground and throwing up frozen earth from a sewer-if any of you want to know what work is, go and try it. These men received for this work a dollar a day of ten hours. Now, you are protecting all the industries of the country and all the monopolies and all the wealthy concerns; but when that workingman with his dollar a day expended it on sugar, he had to pay 65 per cent. additional for duty. Let that workingman take his dollar and spend it in a retail store, and he would have to give 30 cents of it for duties, and so he would receive only 70 cents for ten hours' toil. I hope the workingmen will see they, as a class, are not protected, and I think they are awakening to the fact that they have been humbugged by this so-called National Policy. The Government have tried this National Policy for eleven years, and what has it done for Canada? Look at the question fairly and honestly. You have got a lot of interested parties to combine to cheat the people. But you found that there was a large class that bore the public burdens, the farming class, and they saw they were not being treated rightly, and you had, therefore, to come to their assistance. Why did you not do that eleven years ago? If your system was a sound and correct one, why did you leave that large class to struggle with the evils of protection until they have become pauperised in this country? Hon. gentlemen coposite were very much pleased when I read, the other night, an extract from Bill Nye's description of the western farmers. They thought that supported their view and showed that the Western farmers were in distressed circumstances, and mortgaged for millions and billions of dollars. Why, it is just what you have done here. Across the lines they have had protection for 25 years, and that was an honest description of the condition of the farmers of the United States to-day. Protection is having the same result in Canada, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it, and the Government are now coming to the relief of our farmers. They would not do it if they were not compelled in order to maintain themselves in power. That is the secret. There is no other reason. The farmers have been carrying the load and bearing the burden. I once read a story of an Irishman and a few of his associates who took a contract to clean out a well. As they had no ladder to get down, it was proposed that one should take hold of the spindle, and the next should hold on to the feet of the first, and so on with the rest of them, and that they should get down to the bottom of the well in that way. After they had got into position, the first man said he could not hold on longer just then, and exclaimed: "Hold on below till I spit on my hands." And he suited the action to the word, and down they went to the bottom of the well. And if the farmers who are now holding on, have to rest to spit on their hands, down they go, and down the Government goes with them, and down the manufacturers godown where you ought to go, and down where you will go, if you hold on to the National Policy. I am delighted that now we are beginning to understand that question in Canada, and I am as sure that your National Policy and your protective system will come to naught, as I am sure I am standing here. I know that that system is based upon injustice, I know that it is a false policy, I know that it will fail eventually; but it will hold on a good while no doubt, because the fallacies which you can bring to bear upon it will succeed as long as you can warp somebody into these unholy combinations to cheat somebody else by entering into this recipro-cal rascality. Who are you going to rob when you get through with the farmers? The workingmen and the industrial classes are the only ones left for you to prey upon. The statements in regard to farm mortgages may be exaggerated, but there is no doubt that the National Policy has depressed Canada in later years to an enormous extent. You cannot point to one industry, you cannot point to a locality in the Dominion, which has benefited by your policy, with the exception of a few monopolies in Montreal and Toronto, or one or two other places. Your protective system is calculated to make paupers of the many and millionaires of a few. That is what it has done in Canada, and it can never do anything else. When I was a boy in England forty years ago, I never dreamt that I would have to stand up in Canada, to oppose a tax upon bread and food. I saw the workingmen in England, and I saw the anti-corn law bazaars going on, and I became a convert then to free trade. Thirty years ago, when I embarked in public life, and when I started out as a representative of the people, my principles were free education, manhood suffrage and free trade, and in all these years I have never given a vote, or expressed a sentiment contrary to these principles. I have lived to see two of them adopted, and I hope to live to see free trade. am ashamed that Canada should have adopted this exploded system of protection.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are ashamed of her politicians.

Mr. GILLMOR. I saw workingmen in England, I talked with them, and I asked them about the wages they received and their habits generally, and scores of them told me that they were able to buy meat, and that only of the poorest kind, once a week for their families. Yet they were working just as your workingmen are working, digging these sewers on Albert street to-day. I gave my mite to uphold the anti-corn law movement in England then, and we have got this question fairly before us in Canada now. The Government has thrown off the mask, and we want the right kind of people to fight them in this policy. All I want to know is that we have got men of the right stamp here to oppose the Government and I am sure we will succeed. I don't want any half protection, I want free trade. I do not want any half-hearted men to fight the battle of free trade for the people, I want whole-soul men like John Bright and Cobden, who will go into this work honestly and sincerely, and attack this protective system root and branch. I have great faith that the people of this country will overthrow the protective system when they understand the question. What have you, gentlemen on the Treasury benches, done in Canada for eleven years with your protective policy? Where is your prosperity? You say that the railroads of the country are evidences of prosperity. Is the Intercolonial Railway an evidence of prosperity? Is the Canadian Pacific Railway an evidence of prosperity? Are your canals an evidence of prosperity?

Some hon. MEMBERS.

Mr. GILLMOR. I say they are not. They are of course facilities for trade, but they are not evidences of prosperity, because you are in debt for every dollar you put into those enterprises. It is no evidence of prosperity that you have borrowed money and that you owe that money, and that you have to pay your annual interest on these $237,-000,000 of Government debt. In addition to that Canada has to pay every year the interest on about $650,000,000 of British capital. England before the corn laws were repealed was not in a position to make money or to lend money, but England has made her money since she repealed the corn laws. England has astonished the world by her increased wealth under free trade. Mr. Chairman, I am not afraid of the United States. I am not afraid of anything that any natior can do against Canada, if Canada is true to herself. Let them put on their tax of 5 cents a dozen on eggs, or 25 cents a dozen if they wish; we do not want any favor from them. Of course, I believe it is better that these two nations should be amicable, friendly, and brotherly, and that there should be free trade between them, but I appeal to this country and this Government, not to follow the pernicious practices the United States have followed. If we want to be a great nation, let us throw down our tariff walls and let them build theirs as high as they like. Let them build a Chinese wall if they wish, and let them receive what China has received from her policy. Two thousand years before your ancestors had emerged from barbarism, China was civilised; but China had a wall which kept all the rest of the world out, and there she is to-day far behind other civilised countries. Let the United States have their tariff wall if they will. I am sorry for it, because to some extent it injures us, but it injures free traders, let them stand together and they will Mr. GILLMOR.

them ten times more than we are injured. I would make Canada a place so cheap to live in that the Americans would be glad to get over that wall and to come into our fertile fields in the North-West, I would make Canada so cheap a place to mine in that their wealthy men would come here where they would get their mining machinery cheaper than any where else. I am proud of Canada. Everything that Almighty God has done for us is good. He has given us broad fields and fertile lands, and rivers, and water powers and a climate that is good. All that He has done for us is good, for which we thank Him, but all that you the Government have done for us, for twenty-two years, is a curse to Canada. I did not intend when I rose, to speak at such length, but now the issue is properly before us, and, I tell you my friends of the Liberal party, that we do not want any half-hearted protectionists here. We want free traders, if we are going to fight out successfully this battle for the people. We want free traders here if we are going to fight on this platform, and I am satisfied that my hon. friends here have had experience enough in twelve years to know that the policy of protection is a bad one. Nothing now escapes taxation. The coal men of Nova Scotia howl for protection, the agricultural implement makers and the millers of Ontario howl for protection on their machinery and their flour, the manufacturers of Quebec howl for protection on boots, and in Sherbrooke or Stanstead they are howling for protection on knickerbockers and Why, one would think that the tender associations which linger about such articles would spare them from the piracies of the tariff. But nothing escapes. Talk about these instruments and bandages for the sick and poor. Why, it would be a mercy to let them die and get out of the toil, and oppression, and hardship which come upon them from protection. I can see the picture of the people in England, in the days of protection, without meat, or food, or clothing; I remember the riots for bread. But those things happen no longer. Look at England to-day, spending million dollars a week in the United States. The people of England, with their superabundant wealth, will buy up all the paying industries in the United States and Canada in twenty years if they keep up their protection. They are teeming in wealth. We have to export $25,000,000 yearly to pay the interest on the money which the English people have invested in Canada, I mean the obligations of railway companies, loan companies and the Government; all combined we owe to the English people $650,000,000, and all the exports of lumber from this country are required to pay the interest every year. You talk about prosperity in Canada. Point to anything that is prosperous in Canada We have not poverty, it is true; it is hard to bring people down to starvation in Canada; it is a broad country, and there are many means of keeping the body and soul together; but anything like prosperity does not exist; you cannot find it anywhere, except in the favored monopolies which are making millions a year out of the poor people of this country. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry for Canada; but we know now what we have to do. There is no use of bothering with this cheeseparing process of getting a few cents off this and a Attack the system squarely few cents off that.

succeed eventually, because free trade is right, and you need not be afraid when you are right. Protection is a child of the Devil, and it never can succeed. It is always a matter of humbug and deception. You have only to look at the way in which this tariff is made up. Here are the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Customs; they are both friends of mine; but they begin with ad ralorem and specific-how can we deceive the people most; here is a little specific thing, so much, two or three cents a pound, or a little ad radorem, and when you come to figure it out it will amount to about 60 per cent. That is the way you are trying to deceive the people; and the Devil is never so well pleased as when he sees the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Customs sitting down and putting their heads together to see how they can fix up their specific and their ad valorem. Now, I will tell you what I think of specific and ad valorem: I think they are two thieves that you are licensing to go out to plunder everybody right and left. At the introduction of this policy hon. gentlemen did not know how to manage it. Sir Leonard Tilley, though always as cunning as a fox, could not do it, much as he had to do with his Satanic Majesty, and he had to send down to Washington for an expert to show him how to suck the blood out of the people without letting them know it. Now, I am really sincere. I am satisfied that the Devil dresses up in his Sunday best when these two gentlemen sit down to fix up their taxes. Mr. Chairman, Canada has just come to the condition to which I thought she would come when we went into Confederashe would come when we went into Comederation. My hon, friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and I, perhaps, do not agree. He got deceived, but I did not. I never wanted to come into Confederation. Not that I did not regard kindly my fellow British subjects in all the colonies, but we in New Brunswick were afferial of a protective to iff afraid of a protective tariff, we were afraid of excessive taxation. We knew that our trade was with England and the United States, we were afraid of a high tariff, and we fought it out on that line. But we were assured by Sir Leonard Tilley and others that for twenty years we would not spend over $13,000,000 a year. We ran an election on that question and the anti-confederates carried the day; but down came their emissaries, and they met at Charlottetown; I was member of the Government, and the late George Brown talked to me. I said: "We were elected in opposition to Confederation." He said: "Greater men than you have changed their principles when necessary." "Well," I said, "you may get other members to deceive their constituents, but you will not get me; I have no desire to go into Confederation." He said: "We will put the tariff down to 15 per cent., and it will never be any higher." But now where is it? How have we been deceived? In the second session after Confederation you began your National Policy by putting 50 cents a barrel on flour and something on corn; but when the representatives of the people came down to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, there was such a howl of indignation from all parties that they hurried back as fast as the Lord would let them, and the next spring took it off. But protection has done its work, and in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they will bow their necks now and take the load without a murmur. Party has cursed Canada. It has robbed us of our manhood, and independence, and self-reliance, and convictions, and we will sit here, and swallow, and vote things we know we ought to oppose. speak of party, not particularly with regard to one side or the other; but I say that party has cursed Canada, and that political morality and honesty have become a reproach and a by-word, and the best men will tell you: Oh, well, one party is as good or as bad as another. We are robbed by party, and we are being robbed by protection. However, hon, gentlemen opposite are consistent; they have nailed their flag to the mast. They have told us that they are going to protect every industry, and put on taxes without mercy-without regard for the hungry or the poor. They will tax everything, from the swaddling clothes of the infant to the shroud you wrap around the corpse. But I have great faith in the honesty, in the great heart, the great mind and the intelli-gence of the people of this country, and I have no fear for the result. I do not know if I shall ever live to see it, but events come rapidly in our day. The people have become enlightened; they are beginning to think; and my friends opposite are beginning to tremble. They are beginning now to do what? To try and bring in the farmers. But you cannot help the farmers by protection. You may double the duty on beef and on pork. What will that do for them? The poor laborer, the hardworking people, have to do without beef, for they have no money to buy it. You are trying to keep the good things out of Canada--the beef, the pork, the flour, everything the people desire; and poverty and hunger, instead of plenty to eat and drink, and plenty to wear, and a cheap country to live in, are the rule to-day. You are keeping that which is good out. You are keeping immigrants out; you are keeping prosperity out; you are keeping out of Canada everything you can by your vicious, false legislation. I admit there may be very different ideas about what constitutes prosperity, and, perhaps, we would come nearer together if we could define really what prosperity is; but I would like to see you point out what prosperity you have created. Have you got it in the North-West? You have within fourteen years expended $3,000,000 for the sake of getting immigrants into that splendid country, which, I daresay, is pretty nearly as good as some of you describe it. You have succeeded in getting a few immigrants in there, and they are howling for greater taxation on the older Provinces to help them to get in more settlers. What has been a successin this country except a few industries fostered by the National Policy in the centres of population? The fishermen are distressed. It cannot be otherwise, for you are taxing enormously everything they consume; you are taxing those industries that ought to be fostered, because, when the fishermen and the farmers and the lumbermen are depressed, that class of people are suffering who furnish our exports. There is no better test of prosperity than the exports of a country. Do our exports show any prosperity within the last ten years? Why, we exported $9,000,000 worth more nine years ago than we did last year, and we then had less people. You must have 500,000 or 600,-000 more people who can produce in Canada to-day than we had then, and yet we exported $9,000,000 less last year than we did nine years ago, and on an average we have exported less and less from year to year. The agriculturists and the fishermen produce a good deal more than half our exports, and the lumbermen some $25,000,000 worth besides. Are they prosperous? Are you helping them? No; you are helping a few manufacturers in Canada, and I say any manufacturers who are not self-sustaining you might as well have in the poor-house as take from industries that pay to support those which do not pay. I suppose all the people on that side think the duty on flour is not going to increase the price, and no doubt some on this side would say so too, I am afraid; but it takes 5,000,000 barrels of flour to feed the Canadian people, and 75 cents a barrel on that means $3,750,000 tax, which must come out of their pockets. If we did not make any Canadian flour, that certainly would go into the Treasury. I say that the tariff means taxation, and that the millers would not ask for that increase of 25 cents a barrel if it did not go into their own pockets, and it will go into their pockets. The men within a mile of the mill will pay it just as much as the people in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. This is a tax upon the food of the people which gives somebody $3,750,000. I am astonished that this country should support anything of the kind. That is what we got by joining Confederation, and adopting a protective policy. There is no necessity for such a policy. We can be, and ought to be, united under a free trade policy, and we would then have a national sentiment, which we have not to-day, as we would not be playing off one industry and one Province against another. We would not be warring and jarring as we are now. There is no national sentiment in Canada. I do not mean to say that we are disloyal. I do not think there are many annexationists; but the loyalty I heard to-day from the member for Montreal (Mr. Curran), is about as much loyalty as there would be in a bladder blown up with a straw, and the speech was just as harmonious as the wind would be coming out. I had not intended, when I rose, to make a speech on the general condition of the country, but if my friend the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will hand my notes from my desk, I can now proceed to do so; however, I think I will postpone it to another occasion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to hear some statement from the Finance Minister in reference to this. One of his colleagues laughs, but we find that $70,000 has been paid by way of duty upon rice, and this is a matter of serious consideration. If the Minister of Finance cannot defend this, perhaps the hon. gentleman who laughs at it will be able to do so. It appears that this is not required for protection or for revenue, and we want to know for what reason that amount is taken out of the pockets of the people. Perhaps the Finance Minister may have some line of policy on which to defend this tax, but if he has not, he should withdraw it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the request which is made is a reasonable one. Surely the Government must have some motive for imposing this tax, and it cannot be because rice is produced in this country.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends must have been out somewhere, because the explanation has been already given. The question was asked by my my hon, friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and I made the statement in reply to Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I never heard it, and I have not left the House.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), takes as one premise that the money is not wanted, and as another premise that this is not imposed for the purposes of protection, he can easily arrive at the conclusion that it is not required. I have never stated that the revenue was not required. I said that it did not follow, because the revenue was larger than the expenditure by a million or a million and a half, that this revenue was not necessary. On the contrary, I have stated that although we may have a surplus of a million and a half or two millions of dollars, as I have shown in my financial statement, all will be needed for Canada in the succeeding year. I have never stated that revenue was not required, and this is one of many things which are not produced in this country which are taxed for revenue purposes.

Mr. LAURIER. Than we are to understand that this country is so reduced in regard to its revenue that a tax must be levied on rice to add to the revenue of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman says: that revenue is required. In that case, why does he allow catgut strings for musical instruments to come in free, or bamboo reeds to come in free? If revenue is required, why does he not put the tax on these articles, and take it off rice? Why should he take $70,000 in duties out of the people in order to keep one rice mill going, while he allows diamonds and other luxuries to come in under so small a taxation?

Mr. FOSTER. What taxation would you put on diamonds?

Mr. McMULLEN. Why do you not put more on those articles? Why do you allow raw silk to come into this country free and tax rice?

Mr. FOSTER. It would be a pity if my hon. friend did not understand the answer which has already been made to the question which he has asked, and I should be sorry to insult his intelligence, or that of any other hon. member, by repeating my answer to the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I suppose it simply means that the hon. gentleman wants to encourage the manufacture of silk in this country.

Mr. FOSTER. You are getting pretty close

Mr. McMULLEN. But you can do better for the revenue by taxing raw silk than by taxing the rice, which is used by the operatives who manufacture the silk.

Mr. MULOCK. Is not this unhulled rice the raw material from which the ordinary rice of commerce is produced?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the reason why it comes in cheaper.

Mr. MULOCK. If you admit the raw material for the manufacture of silk, why do you not apply the same principle and admit the unhulled rice free, as it is an unfinished article, from which the article of rice which is commonly used is prohon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) and duced? Will the Minister answer the question? Mr. FOSTER. I think you have already received the answer.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister refuses to rise to the occasion. The explanation which he gave of allowing raw silk to come in free would be also a proper reason for allowing unhulled rice to come in free, but he is willing to tax the food of the poor and to allow the clothing of the rich to go untaxed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For the information of the Finance Minister, I may state that a former Minister of Finance once said this:

"The Minister of Finance says we have a surplus of half a million. I say the Government have no right to have a surplus. If they have, they should endeavor to get rid of it, and the best way to do so is that pursued by us and by the Government of Great Britain,—by lightening the taxes on the people."

 $\operatorname{Mr.}$ FOSTER. He must have been in Opposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That statement was made by Sir Charles Tupper when he was expounding the policy which has been adopted by the Prime Minister of Public Works and the That was the doctrine President of the Council. which he preached at that time, when we expected a surplus of half a million in that year, and when, owing to the mismanagement of my predecessors, I had to raise between thirty and forty mlllions to meet the engagements they had entered into. Even then, Sir Charles Tupper begrudged me a surplus of half a million, and said we were bound to reduce the taxes on articles of food, which, he said, would be received as a boon by the poorer classes of the country. That was the doctrine preached at that time by Sir Charles Tupper, now the High Commissioner, and that is a fair sample of the way in which those hon, gentlemen acted at that time.

Mr. HICKEY. Did you take the advice?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; because, I had ample occasion to use the money then raised in order to meet the extravagant engagements entered into by Ministers, before I came into office.

Mr. BOWELL. That is why you raised the tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; the tariff was raised before that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I find that the duty on rice, when reduced to its specific value, amounts to $62\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which is a very excessive rate of taxation.

Mr. MULOCK. If the Government were to abolish that useless institution, the Franchise Act, they could save ten times as much as is levied on unhulled rice.

 $\operatorname{Mr.}$ TISDALE. Don't you think you have gone over the "hull" question ?

Mr. MULOCK. It may be, but I am helping the Minister out of his difficulty. He said, he may require this money for the purposes of revenue to carry on the affairs of the country. Now, I am showing him how he can reduce the expenditure by ten times the amount collected on rice, and, at the same time, remove from the Statute-book that which is of no mortal use to the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman says he does not require this tax for the purpose of revenue, he has more than is sufficient, he has a surplus. Supposing this to form part of the surplus, he requires it for expenditure on capital account, so that it is for that purpose the public will pay the tax of $75,000 a year upon rice. They want the money to build canals with, to expend in the construction of the Chigneeto Railway, and other capital expenditures of that kind. It is well we understand at last. He does not require this for the purpose of revenue or for carrying on the Government of the country, but he proposes to expend it on capital account.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is still a pitiful sight to see gentlemen representing the people in this Parliament sitting upon their benches dumb as ducks when they begin to cackle a little, and unable to give to the people's representatives a reason for the increased tax put upon this article. I think it is much to be regretted, both from the brute force of the majority vote which they possess, and the unvarying support which their devoted supporters give to them. They will put it on, no matter how it may affect any or all the classes of Canada. Sir, we are at the commencement of this tariff, which is going to increase, in all probability, the taxes upon the people, to the extent of some two million dollars a year. I hold it to be the duty of every member of this House who possesses freedom of thought, and freedom of action, to resist, stage by stage, that increase of the tariff, from the first to the last of the book. I tell the hon. gentlemen that they will best secure and promote the termination of this debate, which has commenced, but which is far from being terminated, by answering the questions which are put to them from this side of the House, and giving sufficient reasons for the increases they put upon food, upon clothing, and upon the necessaries of life which are included in that list. I refer now to the Finance Minister, and to the hon. gentleman who aided him in inspiring this tariff, whom I look upon as the chief Mogul in connection with it-I mean the Minister of Customs. I say it is not to their credit that they sit there and refuse to give any satisfactory reason for the increase of taxation which they ask this House to impose upon the people who sent them here. The argument they use in almost every case is: "Oh, we have not increased that item of tariff, it was there before." With the surplus they have this year, with the two millions that they expect next year, and with this additional two millions a year they are going to get by reason of this increase, they tell us they may need the money. Now, is it possible that gentlemen occupying their position refuse to tell the Parliament of Canada what they are going to do with that money? The information the hon. gentleman has given increases the implication that it is going either to consolidate the debt of the country, or to the fixed charges of the country for improvements. Now, what is there in this country that warrants them in spending money and raising an increased revenue by taxation? Is it such a scheme as the Chignecto Ship Railway? Is it such a scheme as that New Glasgow Railway, under which, I am informed, an award of over one hundred thousand dollars for damages has been given within a few days? Is it for subsidies for such a railway as the Caraquet Railway, for the Sorel Railway? Is it some of those other railways that have created such discredit to the name of Canada in England, of late years? Is it to subsidise the Meat Company at Three Rivers?—for that is what is coming next. Is it for any one of these schemes that they will require the money next year, or the year after? Do they propose to tell the people: "We are taxing you, but we will give you a railway that will never be run; we will build you a ship canal that will be the laughing stock and the disgrace of the country and bring upon us the contumely of the world at large?" Hon. gentlemen may, if they like, continue the duty of 171 per cent. upon a raw article of food which ought to be one of the first items to be put into the free list. If they take off the duty, would not that cheapen the article to the people, and would not there be more imports? What reason can they give for taxing an article of food that cannot be raised in this country because of climatic difficulties? outrageous that such a course should be pursued. Can they justify themselves to the people of the country by going on and increasing the debt by millions, while the people are suffering and starving? Look at the condition of the laboring classes throughout this country. Look at the exodus that has taken place. I venture to predict that, when the census is taken next year, as it must be under the Constitution, it will be found that, in place of having a legitimate ratio of increase of the population, we will have very few people more than we had ten years ago. Notwithstanding all the money that has been spent on immigration; notwithstanding the natural increase of a people living in a healthy climate, and notwithstanding that we have a population of a million and a-half of the most prolific race in the world—the French Canadians—in face of all these facts, I venture to prediet that the population of our country will not show a very considerable ratio of increase over what it was ten years ago. My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) has feelingly described the condition of Canada. I have known him for years, and I know him to be a man who would not express an opinion that he did not honestly be-lieve. I believe his views are founded upon I believe his views are founded upon a sound judgment, and that he is honest in his expressions, in his intentions, and in his acts. I think the warning that has been given to this House ought to be taken to heart by the gentlemen who are responsible for the administration of public affairs, and I ask hon. members sitting behind the Government this question: Whatever course you may take in endeavoring to impose on the people of the Maritime Provinces duties on the flour which they do not grow, in order to place an amount in the pockets of the west, whatever course you may take in regard to duties imposed on pork, which the lumbermen requires, and which is imported largely from Chicago and Kansas, this imposition being to put money in the pockets of the farmers; whatever justification you may have for the imposition of duties on lard and beef, I ask every hon. member if he can find the slightest justification for imposing a duty of 17½ per cent. on rice, one of the articles of food which is most desired, which is most useful and nutritious for the poorer classes of the community? I do not believe any hon, member will say there is any Mr. MITCHELL.

pressed my opinion on public acts. I remember when three and a quarter million dollars, which capitalised means an annual grant of $180,000 a year for twenty years, was given to that infamous Chignecto Marine Railway; I stood up almost alone in opposing it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Not alone.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said "almost alone." For, unfortunately, very few of my hon. friends behind me understood the question; they did not know the locality or understand the nature of the work proposed, or know the iniquity involved in it. I am proud to say this, that after the vote was over everything that followed justified my opposition to it, and I found more than a dozen hon. gentlemen opposite, who said: "Mitchell, I am proud of you, although I could not sustain you in your opposition to the Government." I have no doubt some of these hon. gentlemen will recollect that even to-day. I have no doubt, moreover, there are many hon. gentlemen opposite who in their hearts endorse everything I have said in regard to this duty on rice, and everything that has been said by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), and others, that if there is an item in the whole list which should be wiped off, it is the duty of 17½ per cent. on rice, an article which we cannot grow in this country, upon which a tax was imposed in the first instance for revenue only, and to-day is retained for no other purpose. If that be so, surely there is sufficient honesty and independence among hon. gentlemen opposite to tell the Government that they are not able to vote for that tax, and if they are not able to tell the Government that openly, lest they should lose improvements in their counties, let them wait on the Ministers at their offices, and say to them: Whatever we may do in the way of voting bindly for you, for God's sake give us some ground on which to go before the people and justify this vote, for we have no justification in this case.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). Hon. gentlemen opposite do not appear to agree as to the amount that will be furnished by this duty. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) said there would be half a million dollars additional, the hon. member for Richmond gave the amount of one million, and the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us it would be two millions. I find, on looking over the tariff of 1878, that rice was taxed one cent per pound, and that under what we were told was a liberal policy and a free trade tariff. I find also that a large number of articles under that tariff were taxed at about the same rate as now. For instance, take the duty on kerosene oil. The duty per wine gallon was 6 cents, now it is 71 cents per Imperial gallon. If it was necessary under a free tariff for hon. members opposite to tax rice I cent per pound, the difference is not very much between that and 17½ per cent. It appears to be almost impossible to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to any portion of the tariff. When it is proposed to tax anything that is not grown in this country, they tell us we are taxing the food of the people, and the poor man's food in particular, and that we are taxing the farmer. Every year a large number of resolutions are justification. This is not the first time I have ex- brought forward to assist the farmers, and the way it is proposed to assist them is by taking the duty off such articles as they grow and which are largely imported from the United States. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) made reference to the duty on flour. I think he should take the statement of his own leader, delivered in 1878, just on the eve of going to the people, particularly when that statement was made in a Province where it would most affect the

Mr. MITCHELL. To whom do you refer as my leader? I was not aware that I had any leader in 1878, and certainly I have not any one now--I never had a leader since 1873.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). I would say the leader of the party with whom the hon. gentleman is very closely associated, and with whom he has worked very smoothly since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. That genteman declared in Halifax that a duty on flour would not affect the price to the extent of 1 cent a bushel.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you say that was my declaration?

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). I say it was the declaration of the leader of the Government in 1878, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) and it would have been to his interest to have made a different statement then, but I believe he stated what was correct at the time. The hon. gentleman who had charge of the Government in 1876 and 1877 largely increased the duty on kero-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We reduced it enormously.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). I think it had reached its highest rate in 1876 or 1877.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen opposite had increased it, and we reduced it.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). Next, I take te item of molasses. The duty at that time was the item of molasses. 25 per cent., whereas now it is only 7 or 8 per cent. The people of Nova Scotia demanded at that time that there should be an increased duty imposed The members of the Government, even those from the Province of Nova Scotia, opposed it, and the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) said the proposition was so iniquitous, he would not even ask the Government to impose the duty. If that duty had not been imposed on the coal of Nova Scotia, that Province would not to-day have sufficient revenue to carry on the Government, within $160,000 or thereabouts. In 1879 the revenue received from coal royalties amounted to $49,132, whereas in 1889 it reached $166,846, or an increase of $117,700. In addition to giving employment to a large number of people, it would have been impossible to carry on the Government of Nova Scotia without increased royalties, which altogether arose from the duty on Again, when a duty is proposed to be imposed on articles which it is not necessary to import, and of which we have plenty, then we are told we are taking this action to annoy the people of the United States. The people of the United States, however, pay very little attention to what we do here. The McKinley tariff was brought in before the resolutions of this Government were introduced, and it would be better if the members of this country, rather than to crying it down, and making very unfair comparisons between it and the United States. There is nothing at which I was more surprised than the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other evening, that all they require in the United States was 65 cents per capita to meet the interest on the debt. He forgot to tell the House that in 1887 $71,000,000 were raised directly upon real and personal property to carry on the State Governments, instead of raising it by indirect taxation. I have the figures here to show that the taxes in the United States are levied directly upon the real and personal property. We find that in the State of Alabama, was 1,468,727, or 55 cents the amount upon every dollar of real and personal property. In the State of New York they raised the sum of $9,075,046 directly on real and personal property, and we find that the debt of all the States in the American Union is more than that of the United States itself, and that the debts of the cities of the United States is over $1,500,000,000. I think what when making comparisons of this kind hon. gentlemen on the other side should at least be honest in giving us the facts. I may say that I was surprised, and so were a large number of members on this side of the House, to hear that the tax was so small in the United States, and on enquiry we discovered that instead of the Federal Government giving large grants to public works, as we do in Canada, these were altogether left in the hands of the State Governments. I think it will be a long time before the people of this country will be willing to be governed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who seem to have no policy except to oppose every measure that is brought forward by the Government in the interest of the farmers and all other classes of the community.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. Minister of Finance is so fond of following American precedent, that I would recommend him to imitate them with regard to the duty on rice. The evident tendency of American legislation at the present time is to reduce the duty upon all articles that cannot be raised in the country. Following out that policy, the duty on tea and coffee was abolished, and it was now proposed to reduce the duty on sugar by one-half. I would recommend that policy from a protectionist standpoint, and if I were a protectionist I should follow the policy the American Government have adopted, that is, I would reduce the duty, or abolish it in fact, upon all articles which cannot be raised in my own country, and keep up the duties on other classes of goods which I desired to protect. This is the policy which the Americans have pursued, and which the latest proposals before Congress indicate they intend to pursue in future. The Minister of Finance will, I think, admit that we cannot raise rice in this country, and there are no indications that we require a duty on rice for revenue purposes. The Minister told us that he had a surplus for last year, and that he anticipated a larger surplus for the current year, which would indicate that the time is opportune to remove the duty on this article which enters so largely into consumption among all classes. The hon. Minister of Finance has an answer from his own the Opposition devoted themselves to assisting predecessor in office, who told the hon. gentleman in front of me (Sir Richard Cartwright) when, as Minister of Finance, he had a small surplus, that it was almost a crime to have a surplus, and that the duty should be reduced upon all articles the people consumed, mentioning at the same time the While the duty on article of sugar especially. sugar at that time was about 45 per cent., it is 65 per cent. to-day. The hon. gentleman may call this statesmanship to levy duties on articles of general consumption when revenue is not required. He and the Minister of Customs may meet to-gether and discuss those tariff changes, which I do not think they understand themselves. believe that half of those changes are made up for them in their Departments, and that whenever a question comes up that they think a few cents more can be screwed out of the taxpayers of the country, they make a note of it, and discuss whether or not they can take more taxes out of the people at the end of the year.

Mr. BOWELL. Is that the way you used to do?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That may by called statesmanship, but it is about the kind of statesmanship that would qualify a man to run a peanut shop at a corner. These resolutions as brought down to the House indicate that the Government has given no thought to the matter at all. indicate that the Government has just the one purpose of getting more money out of the people and that they can show no ground for this increased taxation. From a hasty observation I calculated that these taxations would give half a million more to the Government, but those who had time to make a more deliberate investigation find that three-quarters of a million at least will be added to the taxes of the people, which already are very onerous. If the Minister of Finance could show that there was any necessity in the public interest for this, I would be willing to discuss the question on that basis, but, as he said himself, he merely wants to pour out this money like water for useless enterprises, such as were mentioned by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), namely, for such a huge folly as the Chignecto Ship Railway, in which three and a half million dollars are buried, and which never will be of any use to mortal man, either now or in future time. never has been in this House a man with any knowledge of business, or with any idea of the working of such an undertaking, who would ven-ture to offer an opinion that that money was profitably expended. We know very well, and everyone knows, that the idea of carrying a ship fourteen or fifteen miles across a belt of land like that, and then disbarking it, is an expenditure which is of no value whatever to the country. Still, as the hon. Minister of Finance says, we poured out our treasure like water for that and other enterprises; and now in order to meet these expenses he asks us to continue this duty on rice. It is no excuse for the hon. gentleman to say that he is not increasing the duty. He has reached the point when the country expects him to reduce every tax he can reduce, and this is one above all others which in my judgment he should deal with. Now, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald) was good enough to refer to the action of the Mackenzie Administration, and he quoted in the line of the policy hon. gentlemen opposite Mr. Jones (Halifax).

Mr. Mackenzie's speech in Halifax as going to show that the increased duty on flour would not affect the price. If the hon, gentleman had been in the House the other day when I read what Mr. Mackenzie did say, he would not have made the statement which he has made, I believe, in ignor. ance, because what Mr. Mackenzie did say was entirely different, when his remarks are read together, from what the hon. gentleman desired the House to understand. Mr. Mackenzie stated distinctly that the increase of the duty on flour was disturbing the trade we had with the United States, where we could procure our flour at a very much lower price. The hon, gentleman says that we would not put a duty on coal for the benefit of the coal owners of Cape Breton. That is quite true, because it involved a duty on flour, and I never could and cannot now understand why the whole people of the Maritime Provinces should pay a duty of 50 to 75 cents a barrel on flour simply to obtain a duty on coal for the benefit of a few coal owners in the Island of Cape Breton, who, by their own showing at that very time, were making fair returns on their capital; and if required, I would to-day repeat the vote I gave on that occa-The Government of which I was a member, attempted to carry out a British policy, a policy which we believed was in the interest of the great masses of the people. The country was experiencing a time of extreme depression; we had expended large sums of money; the American war was just over, and the huge expenditure of money on that war had been followed as a natural result by extreme depression which extended to Canada. The articles which we had to sell, our lumber, our fish, and our agricultural produce, were of very little value, comparatively speaking, and owing to that depression the Government labored under the difficulty of being unable to meet the public expectations with regard to what was considered the policy that should be pursued. Some people thought that if we kept our own manufactures, it would give this country better times at once; but the policy the Government pursued was to tell the people that it was much better for them to wait quietly for a year or two, when the United States were sure to recover naturally from their extreme depression, and when their returning prosperity would react on Canada; and our predictions were verified to the letter. 1879 or 1880 had not passed when we saw a great revulsion of trade in that country, and it reached within a few years perhaps as great a height of prosperity as it had ever reached before. It was then that the products of Canada found a market across the border and the condition of affairs in this country improved. Since then the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has for a time built up a certain amount of fictitious prosperity, which is already beginning to show signs of decay. They find themselves in this position, that when they protect one thing they must protect another. Every day they find some hungry manufacturer or combinist coming into their offices, and saying that the hat, or bonnet, or corset, or some other twopenny-halfpenny article that he manufactures is not sufficiently protected; they are driven from one position to another; and the result is the tariff we have before us, which I think will be regarded very unfavorably by the business men of this country. But the whole tenor of it is have announced their determination to carry out. If we wanted a different condition of affairs it is within our grasp. If we wanted to trade with our natural customers across the border, it is in prospect. We have an offer which although not a legal offer as yet, is an indication of the public mind in the United States, and we know that whether that offer is adopted by Congress or not, there are a large number of people across the border who are anxious for closer trade relations with this country; and it is of the highest possible importance that this Parliament should not at this moment show such a feeling of hostility towards the American people and towards closer trade relations with them, as is indicated by this tariff. Several hon, gentlemen have spoken of members on this side of the House as uttering sentiments likely to create hostile feelings among Americans towards this country. The hon. Minister of Finance was not in this Parliament in 1879, at the time of the inception of the National Policy; had he been there, he would remember that his leader, his predecessor, the present High Commissioner, the Minister of Customs, the President of the Council and the Minister of Public Works, and all who led the Conservative party at that time, advocated the National Policy from the standpoint of opposition to the United States. Their whole doctrine, then, was that we were going to teach the United States that we could be independent of them, that Canada could stand alone and that we would build a wall against their products. On every hustings throughout the Dominion they proclaimed this doctrine of hostility to the United States, and it is owing to the stand they took, more than to anything else, that the Americans conceived the idea that our people were hostile to them. What did we see in regard to their fishing operations? We saw that the their fishing operations? We saw that the Minister of Customs, by his petty enactments and annoyances, drove us almost to the verge of actual war; and it is to the credit of the United States that they did not take stronger measures in resisting the petty insults and inconveniences to which their vessels were subjected by us. the Minister of Customs dismissed the collector at Halifax for having done an act of courtesy to an American fisherman, by allowing him to transship his cargo, the news was telegraphed to every newspaper in the United States, and the action of the Minister was looked upon as an act of hostility towards the American people. Every act of administration from 1878 to the present has tended to create a feeling of hostility in the United States against us, and it is no wonder that the American people, annoyed as they have been by the attempts of 5,000,000 people to dictate to them, have at last come forward with a tariff which, if passed, is going to be very injurious to us. The hon. gentleman knows there is a large quantity of the agricultural results of the agricultural results find tural products of this country which can only find a market in the United States, no matter how high the duty must be. We had a discussion over the duty on cattle last night, and the effect of that proposition was shown by the fact that members of Parliament and the Senate to-day waited on the leader of the Government to ask that cattle be allowed to come in in bond from Chicago, to be slaughtered at the dead meat establishment at Three Rivers, of which the Min-103

ister of Public Works is one of the directors. I do not know if he was one of the deputation that waited on his leader to urge this concession.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a point of order. The question of rice has nothing to do with the dead meat establishment.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite do not care to hear about the dead meat establishment, or the Chignecto canal, but the discussion took such a wide range that I thought I might discuss the whole question at The reduction on rice is defensible on other grounds, apart from the policy the hon. gentleman I do not say that the protectionist grounds are sound; they are very unsound; but if the hon, gentleman draws his inspiration from American sources, when he has an opportunity of taking the duty off an article of food, he should take it off on this rice. If he does not, that will prove that the hon. gentleman is not actuated by a desire to meet the wants of the country, but by a desire to procure a surplus next year that he may have more money to pour out like water for purposes not consistent with the public interest.

Mr. FOSTER. We have been talking for a large portion of two or three hours upon this rice question. Hon. gentlemen opposite endeavor to prove to the people that they are very heavily burdened, but in this item we have made a large reduction.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Take it all off.

Mr. FOSTER. The former item was that rice unhulled, which came direct from the place of production, should pay $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; if not, it paid $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. This item has been framed for the express purpose of allowing the unhulled rice, which is produced in Siam, and carried from there to Hong Kong, and is transshipped there upon steamers and brought to Vancouver, to come as a direct shipment. Formerly that was not considered direct shipment. Rice was food in 1878 as it is now, and at that time and before, when hon. gentlemen held the reins of power, not only was the duty 1 cent per pound on rice, but it was 1 cent per pound, whether hulled or unhulled, while now it will be on unhulled rice 13 mills per pound. What does this crushing $1\frac{3}{4}$ mills per pound. What does this crushing burden come to upon the poor man? One would imagine that every farmer was so borne down under the burden, like the old Scripture personage, that he is unable to live or to crawl under this burden. Last year twenty million pounds of rice were imported. We have, I suppose, about five million people in Canada, which would give a consumption of four pounds of rice on an average for each person, and the result of this taxation would be that each person would have to pay 7 mills towards the cost of this importation. That certainly is a terrible burden on the people of this country, and the attack is made by those gentlemen who taxed this same article 1 cent a pound, in comparison with my rate of 13 mills per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is aware that the tax was imposed by our predecessors, and it is very disingenuous, to say the least, for him to try to make it appear that the tax was imposed by us and reduced by him. He well knows that what we are contending for is that, when there is a surplus of two and a half millions, these petty taxes affecting the food of the people, and therefore being very objectionable, should not be imposed.

Mr. BOWELL. Did you not re-enact that tax in 1874?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No more than we did the whole tariff, and if we had not been so hampered and burdened down by the degrading extravagance to which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken was a party, by the infamous bribery to which he and his party were accessories in order to corrupt the people of Canada, if we had not been so burdened after the people kicked them out of office for accepting the bribes of Sir Hugh Allan, we would have had a better opportunity to reduce the taxation.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It seems to me that this dis-assion has gone far enough. We have travelled cussion has gone far enough. from the Chignecto Canal to the Dead Meat Company, and now we have reached the Pacific Scandal. If, for my sins, I were to occupy the position of Finance Minister, according to the principle of the National Policy, of which I am a strong sup-porter, I should strike this tax off altogether. I am glad to hear from the Finance Minister that the burden is to be so light, because it seems to me that this tax upon rice is one which, according to the principles of the National Policy, ought to be taken off our Statute-book. It is not a tax for revenue purposes, and rice is almost as prime a necessity of life as tea and sugar. It is very proper that the duty should be taken off, and I should be glad if the Finance Minister could see his way to do that, strictly in accordance with the principles of the National Policy, which admits raw material and articles of prime necessity which this country does not produce free. I think rice should belong to that category, and on these principles of the National Policy, I think the Minister would be more than justified in taking off the small duty now placed upon this article.

Mr. HESSON. It is well that the fact in regard to this matter should be properly understood. I find that, in the year 1878, 8,366,903 lbs. of rice were imported, on which a duty was paid of $83,669, or I cent per pound. In 1887, 23,000,000 lbs. were imported, and the duty paid was $113,729. In 1889, the amount of the import was 21,500,000 lbs. and the duty paid was $73,973. Either the people in the former period were too poor to have rice in their soup, or the article was taxed too high.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are slandering your country.

Mr. HESSON. Hon. gentlemen opposite have wasted two hours of the time of this House in discussing a matter which they do not understand. I think that some of those gentlemen have not looked into this question. About 3,000,000 lbs. of this rice has come into this country cleaned for use and had to pay a duty of 1½ cents per lb. What has been the effect of the policy of the Government? We have now 21,500,000 lbs. imported at $10,000 less duty than 8,000,000 lbs. were imported for in 1878. I defy hon. gentlemen to contradict those figures. The duty is very small. In fact it is reduced from 1 cent a pound to less than half a cent, and we are giving employment to men and machinery to clean that rice here, and it is supplied to the consumers at a very much reduced rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have to explain, if it is possible to explain to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Hesson), the effect of this tariff. The Government have not reduced the price of rice at all, but, for the benefit no doubt of some friend of theirs who desired to make a dishonest profit, they have reduced the duty on uncleaned rice, but have kept the duty on the clean rice the same as it was before, so that the consumer all over the country has to pay the duty of 12 cents a pound while some friend of the Government, probably some subscriber to their election funds, is enabled to get the unhulled rice at the small rate referred to. Thus, the difference is paid by the consumer and it does not go into the Treasury. That is the result of the policy. Some parties, some friend of the hon. gentleman, succeeds in getting the benefit of it. I say that twenty million pounds uncleaned would yield something like a duty of $250,000, of which $220,000 is taken out of the pockets of the people under this system.

Mr. BOWELL. You can beat Bill Nye all "holler."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you import 20,000,000 lbs. of rice with a duty of 1½ cents alb. you have a tax of $250,000, of which $30,000 goes into the Treasury and the balance is taken out of the pockets of the people. $170,000 is abstracted fraudulently from the pockets of the people for the benefit of some of those Philistines who are cleaning that rice—a sevenfold loss to the consumer for the sake of about $30,000 that goes into the Treasury; $170,000 wasted for maintaining one or two miserable factories to hull rice—that appears to be the result of the policy. I suppose of that $170,000, when these gentlemen, with their colleagues similarly circumstanced, meet together in the Red Parlor to be assessed for funds for the purpose of defrauding the public, $10,000 or $15,000 will find its way into the pockets of the Finance Minister, or the Minister of Customs, or the Minister of Public Works, or whoever devised the robbery, for the development of the election fund.

Mr. BOWELL. You don't mean that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I mean every word of it. I know how you do it.

Mr. BOWELL. If it is necessary to deny the insinuation made by the hon. gentleman, I have no hesitation in doing so in the most emphatic terms. If he means to insinuate that either directly or indirectly I ever received any of that money, he is stating what is positively and utterly false.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What?—that the Prime Minister called together eighty or ninety manufacturers and assessed them for election purposes?

Mr. BOWELL. You said the money went into the pockets of my colleagues and myself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I said it went into the corruption fund by means of which the hon, gentlemen keep their places.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman made a statement which was unworthy of any man, either in this House or anywhere else.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say that this whole business of protection is robbery, legalised robbery; that you subsidise the manufacturers, and that the manufacturers in return subsidise you. That is what I say.

Mr. BOWELL. It is untrue.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you explain it away by saying that we do not profit by it personally.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He obtains it for corrupt purposes. Through the medium of these protected manufacturers he obtains the means of corrupting the people of this country, and of succeeding in carrying the elections.

Mr. FOSTER. That is circumlocution.

Mr. BOWELL. You are judging now from your own personal experience.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am judging from what I have seen and know of you.

Wheat flour, 75 cents per barrel,

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If we have had a long discussion on such an important article as rice, we are going, I suppose, to have a longer discussion on breadstuffs. The increase of duty on flour is 50 per cent. Now, it appears to me that if the Government had desired to benefit the farming interest, they might have accomplished it in another way, without putting the duty on the consumers in the Maritime Provinces. They might have reduced or abolished the duty on wheat, and in that way they would have enabled the millers to pro-The Minister of duce flour at a cheaper rate. Finance should be aware that this duty on flour will bear especially upon the people of his Province, and he had better take that fact into account. The hon. gentleman's position, he must know, is precarious. He does not know how soon some other gentleman may occupy that position. He may be cast adrift again, and be compelled to rely upon the good-will of his fellow-countrymen in New Bruuswick. When he goes to them and says: "It is true that I put a duty of 50 cents on flour, and that increased it by 50 per cent., but you have had to pay that much more for flour every year,"—what will be the answer? Now, it is utter nonsense for any man to say that the price of flour will not be increased. Flour has already advanced about that difference.

Mr. BOWELL. Where?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In the Maritime Provinces, and here as well. I have that statement from one of the largest shippers of flour in the Maritime Provinces, and he told me yesterday that flour had advanced 20 cents per barrel. Naturally enough they say that the Maritime Provinces are to be entirely dependent upon them, and they are going to take a million or a million and a quarter barrels down there, and by arrangement among themselves, they will put up the price so much. They send it down and hold it. The Government sent flour down there and they held it in their cars for 20 days, and they took advantage of the market. Now, this duty may not all be paid direct. There is something in the contention that where a country produces a surplus of an article, the price will be regulated by their markets. But we could bring our flour from the States at the difference between 60 cents and 15 cents, that is to say, that we can get our flour from Boston for 10 cents and from New York for 15 cents. Therefore, whether you put it that way | $103\frac{1}{3}$ or on the basis of the duty, they will pay at least 45 to 50 cents in consequence of the imposition of this duty. If the Government want to benefit the farmers, let them reduce the duty on wheat. That, I believe, would have been acceptable to the millers, and would have put them in as good a position as they will be under this tariff. The people of the Maritime Provinces will not regard with any favor this last attempt to take more money out of them. We cannot raise our breadstuffs there, as the hon. gentleman is aware. From our climate, and the habits of our people, for some reason or other, in the Maritime Provinces we do not raise wheat, we do not raise flour, and we must go to the United States or to Western Canada for it. Even if this duty were out of the way, we would not come to Canada; we are only driven here by the imposition of this duty. If we did not come to Canada when the duty was on, we would not come here again if the duty was off. Under these circumstances it is nonsense for any hon. member to try to impose on the consumers of this country the idea that this increase of duty does not increase the price. Our people understand that very well, and no matter what the views of the Government may be, I can assure them that this increase will be regarded very unfavorably by their own friends, as well as by their political opponents.

Mr. BORDEN. I cannot imagine why the duty was imposed if it was not for the purpose of increasing the price. The market is controlled already by Canadian flour, and very little American flour is imported into Canada. As I understand the question, this duty was imposed especially for the relief of the millers, who are not doing a profitable business in this country. As a matter of fact, I was assured by a flour dealer in the Maritime Provinces when I was there the other day, that the price of flour had already increased about twenty cents a barrel. I have here a report of a meeting of the millers of Ontario held recently at Toronto, and in that report I find the following:

"The question of railway discrimination was then taken up. Vice-President J. Brown then read a paper on the subject of railway discriminations which was very well received.

"Mr. Charles Macdonell said that if Mr. Brown had quoted the prices at the different points in the United States the question would have been even more apparent.

"Mr. Brown said that he did not know exactly the figures, but there was one thing he was sure of, viz., that he could buy flour in the United States, ship it through Canada, pay the duty of 75 cents per barrel, and then make more money than by manufacturing flour himself. The only remedy he could suggest would be to appoint a strong Government commission."

If that statement be correct, it is clear that the duty was imposed expressly for the purpose of increasing the price of flour. Look at the state of things in Newfoundland. Where do the people of that Island purchase their flour, having the markets of the world open to them? No less than 220,000 barrels of flour were purchased last year from the United States, while about 10,000 were purchased from Canada. I think no more conclusive argument can be used to show that American flour is cheaper than Canadian flour, and that this duty is being imposed for the purpose of forcing the consumers, particularly those in the Manitime Provinces, to pay more for their flour by keeping them from going to the American market, the natural market to which they would look if this duty were not imposed. This is a most unjust tax. It is well known that, at least, 1,000,000 barrels are consumed every year in the Maritime Provinces, where wheat is not grown, and where, consequently, those people who are largely interested in agriculture are directly taxed in order to support an industry in another section of this Dominion. But I contend that this tax does not really add anything to the prices which the farmers of Ontario receive for their wheat, for the duty on wheat has not been changed. I repeat that this duty on flour is imposed simply for the purpose of giving to the millers of Ontario 25 cents a barrel more for their flour.

Mr. FREEMAN. The bread tax or the duty on flour is a very unpopular one all the world over, and it is an unpopular one in the part of the Dominion from which I come. I would certainly oppose it if I thought it would increase the price of the loaf of the Nova Scotia fisherman or the laboring man. But even if they were required to pay this 25 cents per barrel, they would have a compensation in the reduction of duties on molasses and the rebate on corn. There is, however, no better evidence of a bad cause than when you find its advocates resort to untruths to support it. I believe that is the doctrine firmly held by every one. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) told us the other day that the people of Nova Scotia paid one dollar more for their flour than they would have to pay if they were permitted to bring it in from the United States, and in order to prove that he read a letter from a mercantile firm in St. Johns, Newfoundland. This is a new mode of proof, which has never heretofore been discovered. The hon, gentleman read the letter from the firm and stated it was a highly respectable firm, and he gave the name, and I do not think they will thank him very much for having given the name. In that letter he told the House and the country, that only 10,000 barrels of Canadian flour were imported into Newfoundland last year. turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that 48,687 barrels were sent to Newfoundland from Canada. Are Harvey & Co. or the blue-books correct? That is a question that the senior member for Halifax will probably answer. The only proof given that the people of Nova Scotia had to pay one dollar more for their flour than if they obtained it from the United States, is this letter from a St. Johns' merchant. A more ridiculous statement was never uttered. Then the senior member said that he would place Nova Scotia in Newfoundland, and then they would get their flour from New York and save a dollar a barrel. All this is, no doubt, exceedingly interesting. Let us examine the prices of American and Canadian flour. I find the following prices in the Halifax Critic, the prices being for the 4th instant :—High grade patents, $5 to $5.15; good 90 per cent. patents, $4.65 to $4.70; straight grades, $4.40 to $4.45. I find by the Boston Herald of the 8th April, instant—and I presume that authority will not be contradicted—Spring patents, $5 to $5.50; winter patents, $4.65 to $5.20; clean and straight, $3.50 to $4.75, while Canadian patents were selling at Halifax at $5.15, and you will remember that the Canadian patents had to pay the 60 cents a barrel that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) said they would have to pay coming into Halifax. If that hon, gentleman Mr. Borden.

will inform us where the extra dollar a barrel comes in we would be very much interested to ascertain it. We find that while winter patents were selling in Boston at $5.20, and straight flour was selling at $4.75, the straight grades were selling in Halifax for $4.45. These are the quotations, and if they are incorrect. I wish hon. gentlemen to point out where they are incorrect. We find, therefore, that flour in Boston is quoted in the Boston Herald at about the same rates as the same qualities of flour are quoted at Halifax, and when hon, gentlemen opposite tell us we are paying a dollar a barrel more for flour in Nova Scotia, than we would have to pay if we were getting it from Boston, they are telling us something in which there is not a scintilla of rruth. Let me tell the hon, member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), who seemed to have a good laugh when I spoke on this question, that in the town I live in we buy flour at about the same rates they are selling it for in Halifax, and there is not a part of this continent where they can buy flour cheaper, if you will calculate the small sum we pay for freight. The hon, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) assumes that, in every part of Nova Scotia, we pay the 60 cents he talks about. We get this Canadian flour in bond from Boston, and we pay not 10 cents for freight-for there is very little flour comes at 10 cents, except where some vessels want freight for ballast—but 15 cents is about the ruling freight into Liverpool, and we get as cheap a loaf as you can get in any part of the American continent. Now, Sir, the question may be very properly asked: What is the motive of hon. gentlemen opposite in trying to make the people of the country believe that they are paying more for their flour than they actually are paying? Is it an honest motive? Is there a desire to benefit the people in any way, or to give correct information to the people? There is not, Sir. The desire is to make balls for supporters of gentlemen opposite, with less care for their character than they should have, to throw about during election time. We had these people going around the country during the last election, trying to make the people believe that we paid a duty on Canadian flour in some way. I was met face to face by an intelligent gentleman on the platform, who told me that the flour which came in my own house cost me 60 cents a barrel duty. I said to him: What do you mean? I get my flour in bond from Boston, and I pay no duty at the Customs, and how do you make out where the 60 cents duty comes in? And he replied:
"Oh, you don't see it. There is some way in which the Ontario miller gets it into his pocket and you have to pay it." It is for the purpose of deceiving the electors that these false stories are told. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us in Nova Scotia that we are paying $1 a barrel on flour in order to benefit the Canadian farmers, and they tell us at the same time that something ought to be done to relieve the poor Ontario farmer, who is dying for the want of some help from the Government. And yet when the 25 cents duty is put on flour to benefit the Ontario farmer, these gentlemen turn around and say to the Nova Scotians: There are these Ontario farmers down on you again and taking the money out of your pockets. These gentlemen preach one doctrine in Nova Scotia, and another up here. Is this honest? Is this a consistent course? If you want to help the farmers in Ontario by taxing us in Nova Scotia, say so: but tell the same story down there that you do up here. The style of procedure adopted by these gentlemen opposite is unworthy of a great party, and unworthy of gentlemen who have a regard for themselves. I might quote to the House additional statistics to show that the prices of different grades of flour in Boston, New York, and Halifax differ very little indeed. Canadian flour in Halifax is not dearer than American flour of the same grades in the markets of New York and Boston. I say, Sir, that it is unfair to mislead the people, and it is something which hon. gentlemen opposite should not be guilty of. If I thought that this increased duty gave us a dearer loaf, or taxed the bread of the people, I would oppose it, but I firmly believe that the price of flour will not be increased. As I said before, if the price is in any way increased we have a compensation in the reduction of the duty on molasses which is an article of very general use with us. Then we have also a rebate upon the duty on cornmeal, and if we get any assistance from this rebate on corn it will be so much advantage to us. It is very well for hon, gentlemen to get up a feeling between the different Provinces—to say that one Province is imposed upon, in order to relieve the necessities of some other Province. the Provinces of the Dominion are to be held together, or if there is to be a kindly feeling between them, the sooner we learn and the sooner hon. gentlemen opposite seek to indoctrinate the people with the idea that we must bear and forbear, the better—that if we are taxed a little in one Province, the other Provinces must be willing to bear a little burden to assist us. In this way the taxation can be regulated, and the people will learn not to weigh one Province against another. Holding these views, which I believe cannot be successfully combatted, I have no opposition to give to this increased duty of 25 cents a barrel on American flour.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The spectacle of a venerable representative of the people making the statement he has done to night, and telling the House that he makes it conscientiously, fully bears out the remark made by hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) to-night, that party has degraded and disgraced the representatives of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman, coming from Nova Scotia, has stated to night his honest belief that while the remission of the duties on corn and molasses would decrease the price of these articles just to the extent of the remission, and that he, therefore, accepted those remissions from the Government very gratefully, the advance in the flour duty of 25 cents a barrel would not increase the price of flour at all. If the hon, gentleman were so ignorant that he could not understand it, people might pardon him, but when he states that he conscientiously believes that, I think he will find it very difficult to make the majority of the people of Queen's, N. S., believe it. The hon. gentleman knows that he is playing with his constituents, trying to make them believe that which his conscience tells him is false.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think I am perfectly in order. I am delivering a little moral lecture, which I think the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) may take to himself as well as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman). I am pointing out that the intelligence of the hon. member for Queen's is such that he does know, and cannot help but know, that the increased duty placed on flour will increase the price of flour just by the amount of that duty. He stated further that the increased duty on flour was very unpopular in his own district and throughout the Maritime Provinces, because the people believed it would increase the price of their bread, so that I cannot acquit the hon. gentleman of political dishonesty, I am sorry to say it. In times past he declared that the imposition of a duty on flour would increase the price of that article, and he was opposed to it, but now he gets up and states as his honest opinion that doing the same thing today will not increase the price. May I ask him why he thinks the increased duty was put on? May I ask him further if flour has not gone up since this duty was put on?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know that the hon. member for Selkirk is an authority, but I have had that from one of the best authorities in Canada.

Mr. DALY. Who is the authority?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Never mind who. The hon, gentleman can give his authority afterwards if he says it has not.

Mr. CAMERON. It has gone up in the United States a few cents, but not here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not referring to the United States. I am asking why the duty is put on—if it is not to increase the price to the consumer, and if it must not have that effect? The hon. member for Queen's said he did not believe it would have that effect, but he showed by his argument that he knew it would.

Mr. FREEMAN. I do not say that the duty of 25 cents a barrel on American flour increased the price of Canadian flour. I said distinctly that it did not, and the hon. member for Prince Edward Island knows that he was misquoting me. But he has the habit of misquoting people, and I forgive him, because I was going to say he does not know any better. He does know better, but his profession does not allow him to practice any better. He gets off all his speeches by misquoting and misrepresenting people, and he thinks that passes cur-The American flour that comes to Halifax would probably be 25 cents higher, but our Canadian flour, I believe, will remain at the same price; the 25 cents additional duty will not increase the price. When he tells me that I know better, I tell him that I know as well what I am talking about as he does. The hon, senior member for (Halifax) (Mr. Jones), said that it would increase the price of Canadian flour a dollar a barrel. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that. That hon. gentleman opposite told us, on the strength of the letter from St. Johns that the importations to St. Johns were only 10,000 barrels, whereas according to our own returns they were 48,000 barrels. But here is something about the importation of flour into Newfoundland. In 1887, according to the Newfoundland returns, there were 309,000 barrels imported from Canada, and 131,000 from the United States, and in 1888 the importation from Canada was 111,493. The falling off was due to some local cause which is not given, but I have no idea that it was on account of the cost of the article. Now, I tell the hon member from Prince Edward Island that he has no proof that flour has increased in price in the markets of Nova Scotia since this duty was imposed, and I challenge him to bring his proofs or to stand convicted of stating what is not correct.

Mr. McKEEN. I do not propose to predict what effect this duty on flour may have in Nova Scotia, but I think some of the hon. gentlemen who have stated that the price has already risen have been misinformed. I may state that last week, I bought some flour from merchants in Halifax at a price as low as it ever has been sold at during the past winter, and I know the price of flour last week was as low as at any time during the last twelve There is some misapprehension in the months. minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, as to the increase which they allege will take place in the price of flour owing to the additional duty. I am not going to say what effect the duty will have; but I know the flour we use is of the best kind, which does not come in competition with American flour, because we could always buy it at much more favorable prices. The same gentleman who sold me this flour offered me cornmeal at 20 cents a barrel less than before the reduction was made on that article. Cornmeal which sold at $2.50 has been quoted recently at $2.30. This is plain evidence that if we have to pay any increase owing to the duty on flour, it will be more than compensated by the decrease in meal, for last year we paid about $7,000 duty on American flour and some $40,000 on corn meal, and a reduction of 20 cents on 111,000 barrels which we used in 1887, is a reduction of over $20,000. Therefore, though I do not say I am in favor of increasing the duty on flour. I think we are not going to lose as much perhaps as those who are not very well informed may seem to think.

Mr. TISDALE. I can answer the two propositions of the hon. member for Queen's. In the first place he says: Why is the duty put on, if it is not to increase the cost of flour? It is put on to allow so much more Canadian wheat to be ground into flour to supply the Canadian people, and, in my opinion, a year or two will serve to show whether what I am about to state is well founded or not. I do not believe it will increase the cost of flour in the Maritime Provinces one cent. Why? Because we are large exporters of wheat, as we grow more than we consume, and so do the United States. We have a milling capacity more than double what is necessary to grind and supply all the flour needed in the Dominion, and the object of a protective policy is that we should supply as much as possible our own needs which we can well do in this respect as we are large exporters of wheat. If we protect the flour trade here and allow the control of the trade to be taken by our milling industries, which have more than twice the capacity to supply our wants, the result will be that the competition created by the millers in that way and the large-Mr. FREEMAN.

ness of the trade thus secured will result in our getting flour as cheap as we can get it now, and have it supplied by our own millers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with some little attention to the arguments of those gentlemen who pretend to say that an increase of 50 per cent. to the duty on flour is not going to increase the price of food to the people who are consumers and not purchasers. I have always great respect for the opinions of the last gentleman who spoke, but unfortunately he speaks from an interested standpoint. He comes from a community which is a wheat-growing community, and he tells us that the increased duty of 25 cents per barrel is not going to increase the cost of flour to the consumer, and he gives as a reason that Canada produces more wheat than she can sell, and as the United States is also an exporter it must necessarily follow that the price of flour produced from Canadian wheat cannot possibly be any greater than if the duty were only 25 cents a barrel. Does my hon. friend pretend to tell me that if there were no duty on flour, flour would be as dear to the consumers of the Maritime Provinces as it is? He says it can make no difference, because there is twice the milling capacity that is required for the consumption of the people.

Mr. CAMERON. Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; twenty of them.

Mr. CAMERON. There is a duty of $1 a barrel on flour imported into the United States. Does that increase the price of flour in the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL. We are not exporters of flour to the United States.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman knows there is a duty of $1 on flour going into that country. Does that increase its price?

Mr. MITCHELL. They do not import flour from Canada; and I will tell my hon. friend that the value of the flour in the United States is regulated by the markets in Liverpool.

Mr. CAMERON. He cannot answer the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have answered it.

Mr. CAMERON. Does it increase the price of

Mr. MITCHELL. I will tell you what it does. If we exported Canadian flour into the United States—

Mr. CAMERON. Say yes or no.

Mr. MITCHELL. If we exported flour to the United States—

Mr. CAMERON. That is no answer.

Mr. MITCHELL. And if the United States require to import that flour and there was a dollar duty per barrel on it, that would increase the price. I will not say a dollar a barrel, because the price is regulated by the markets abroad to some extent. If the millers of this country choose to do what the sugar manufacturers have done, if they choose to do as the "combiners," who are fostered by this enormous tariff imposed by this Government, if they choose to combine in order to raise the price of flour, it would make a difference of at least 75 cents a barrel. Does my hon. friend who last spoke pretend to tell me that we will not have a combination among the millers of this country? Why, there is a combination to-day. What is the reason why this Government has been besieged by the millers for the last twelve months? Is it not that they have combined to force their requirements upon the Government in view of the coming elections? There was an attempt to conciliate the people of the Maritime Provinces who claim that they were discriminated against in regard to this duty, but the millers said that the duty imposed was against flour and in favor of wheat. Does my hon, friend who last spoke—not the person who is interrupting me, for he is not worth answeringdoes my hon. friend who last addressed this House in a calm and dispassionate manner, speaking in the interests of his constituents, say that I am not right? I do not blame gentlemen from western Ontario for protecting the interests of those who sent them here, except in this respect that they know that, in an assembly representing all parts of this Dominion, representing Provinces which were induced to come into this Dominion to build up a nation, they should give and take. The people of the Province from which I come and from which other hon, gentlemen come—I do not refer to the renegades who speak in this House and elsewhere against the interests of their Province-expect that fair play will be given to every part of the Dominion of Canada. It is well known why this duty has been placed upon the people of the Maritime Provinces, because it is we who pay it. It is not the people of Ontario who pay this tax, but it is the people of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. These are the people who pay this iniquitous increase in the duty on flour, and that is imposed for the benefit of the millers of Ontario. They themselves fixed the relative duty on wheat and flour; but, because the Ontario millers made a mistake at the time the tariff was fixed, they have come again to agitate the country and to compel the Government to put an additional duty on the flour which we consume and which they want to compel us in the Maritime Provinces to obtain from them. The proper thing would be for the Government to take off the duty on wheat as well as on flour, and to allow the people of the Maritime Provinces to buy their goods where they can get them cheapest. That would be the true policy; but, if the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, by the brute force of the majority they possess, commit an act of injustice against the people of the Maritime Provinces, they will find that they are mistaken.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton). Withdraw.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the hon. gentleman who asks me to withdraw any statement I have made has the courage to come down to the front, I will answer him. I say that you cannot carry on the affairs of a country by performing such acts of injustice as these. This is not going to create kindly feeling between one part of the country and another. Legislation here has to be based on principles of justice and fair play. I speak thus freely because, unfortunately for myself and the people I represent, I did a great deal to induce my Province to come into Confederation. Probably there is no one in this House who did more than I did in that regard, because I depended upon the pledges of Canadian statesmen, pledges which have been violated, sentiments and principles which have been thrown to the winds. If there is a man in this country who is more responsible than another for bringing my Province into this Confederation, it is the humble individual who now addresses you. In 1878, how could I go back to my constituents when it was said that the Americans will not give us reciprocity because of the sentiments which we had in favor of the south after, the war and the old reciprocity treaty was abrogated; but the leader of the Government then led me to believe that a National Policy was the only means to obtain reciprocity. In order to do that we were to keep Canada for the Canadians, or, in the old Scotch phrase, we were to keep our "ain sea guts for our ain sea maws." I was led to believe that a maximum of duty of 25 per cent. would be sufficient. Unfortunately for myself, and for my country I believed it, but, while the elections were going on, when the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government went to the west of Ontario, he found that the farmers wanted protection and the millers wanted protection, and then it came out that a duty was to be placed on flour; and that lost me my election. If the hon. gentlemen were anxious to carry out the measure which they said they believed was to bring about reciprocity with the people to the south of us, I was willing to take the chances. But now those hon. gentlemen with professions of that kind on their lips and with an outrage of public sentiment in their hearts, have thrown off the mask, and this Session they have declared that they do not desire reciprocity in any shape. Is that just, or honest, or right? It is an outrage upon the people of my Province. What is the position in my county, which is representative of the northern counties bordering upon the Gulf? The resources of that county are almost entirely derived from lumber and fish. The farmers raise nothing to speak of for export, but mainly for their home consumption, and for the consumption of the lumbermen and fishermen, who alone raise the articles which are exported from that country, which constitute the wealth of that part of the Dominion. I might speak of the fishermen. These people are threatened to-day because the Gevernment who control this country with a servile majority at their back-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Take it back.

You may call "order" if Mr. MITCHELL. vou like. I refer to the records, to the Votes and Proceedings, to the divisions in this House, as proof of my statement. I say these men care nothing for the question of justice for the people I have the honor to represent; they do not care for the fishermen who risk their lives in earning a subsistence for their family—these fishermen for whom pork, and flour, and beans, and molasses, and rice, form the chief elements of life. Every single thing that I have named is taxed. The Government have raised the price of pork to $6 a barrel upon all kinds except the mess pork. They have prevented the people getting commeal at all, except at an enormous duty. They talk about the concession made by allowing corn to be introduced for human food. There is not a mill in one of the five counties that grinds corn. They would have to carry their corn to the one or two isolated mills that exist in Nova Scotia, or to one on the southern shore of New Brunswick, which will cost more in the transport than it will cost to bring corn from Chicago. Under these circumstances, how can the fishermen of my county live with these increased taxes? How can they live in the face of the outrageous opposition which the Government is arousing in the United State when that McKinley Bill passes, which puts one cent a pound upon fish which used to come in free? If that McKinley Bill passes our people will pay the tax of one cent upon every pound of fish that goes into the American markets, which would practically exclude our fish from that country. Can you suppose these people will be satisfied with the representations which have been made to them, or with the conduct of the Government towards them? It will be ruination to them. I was told the other day, by a gentleman from that section of the country, that it would completely ruin the fishermen of my county. Now, we will come to the lumbermen. I read a telegram the other day from all the leading lumbermen in my county, save one who happened to be out of the county at the time, in which they denounced this tax upon pork, and flour, and cornmeal, and the other items that they named. In the lumber camps the sole food of the lumberman is flour, pork, and beans, lard, molasses, rice and beef. Is it possible that we can justify to these men the increase from $2 to $3 a barrel upon flour, the increase upon mess pork from $2 to $3? Beef, and all other pork but mess, is increased in the same proportion to $6 a barrel. Is it possible that we can justify to these men the fact that all this is done, not because a revenue is wanted, because those gentlemen admit that they do not want a revenue, but it is done for the purpose of protecting some other portion of the Dominion as against the people who have to purchase and live upon these articles. Now, what do these people get from the National Policy? Not one single industry among them is benefited I challenge hon. gentlemen around me from it. to deny that that group of counties derive one cent of benefit from the National Policy. There is not one single manufacturer in them who is protected. Their sole export is lumber and fish, and both these things will be excluded from the markets of the United States by the McKinley Bill if it passes, and I regret to say that I fear it will. I do not appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite in the hope that they will change the policy they have announced. They have sat there to-night, in my opinion, degrading the positions they occupy, unable to justify the means which they are taking to increase the taxation of this country. it to be an outrage. I have extracted some figures from the blue books, of which I have only time to give you the totals. The people in my Province consumed last year, of flour 279,371 barrels, valued at $1,093,718, paying a duty of $129,047. Of lard they consumed 8,295,996 lbs., valued at $636,078, paying a duty of $165,705. They consumed 8,295,996 lbs., valued at $636,078, paying a duty of $165,705. $636,078, paying a duty of $165,705. They consumed of pork and meats 25,899,805 lbs., valued at $1,634,062, paying a duty of $293,357. They raid in duty on meats and breadstuff, that is flour, lard and pork, $588,109. Now, this is the amount which our people have to pay in taxation upon articles which are of absolute necessity, and it is paid by two industries mainly, that is, lumber and fisheries, both of which are suffering in the heaviest degree. Sir, we have not got in our country the valuable pine lumber that they have in the Ottawa district, and it realises nothing like Mr. MITCHELL.

the same price. Here they have the market of the United States open to them for every thing they cut, every thing that passes through their mills. But we have got to send our cheap spruce, the only wood we have for marketable purposes, to Europe. to find a market in Great Britain or on the continent, as against the cheap labor and the cheap wood of the Baltic, which is of a similar character to our spruce. Our lumber industries have ceased to be profitable, and are suffering severely. Is it possible, then, that you are going to increase flour by 25 cents a barrel, and pork and beef in like manner, articles of prime necessity. which are required in that industry? It is the same with the fishermen. I feel it is useless to appeal to men who have shown so much hardness at heart as the hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches have shown. I made an appeal to some of the gentlemen who are sitting behind them. I made an appeal a short time ago in relation to rice. Whatever principle you may allege in sustaining your National Policy, there is no principle whatever in sustaining it upon rice. I will say this, that if hon. gentlemen opposite pursue the course they are pursuing they will find themselves, when they come to give an account to the people, minus some of the support they are now receiving from the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. CAMERON. When the hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) commenced his speech, I asked him what I supposed to be a civil question, and he condescended to permit me to ask not only one but twenty questions. If I had known that the only one I asked would have so disturbed his equilibrium, I would not have asked it, and the very fact that it did disturb him to such an extent prevented my asking the nineteen other questions he promised to answer. I asked him that question because I knew there was only one answer to it, and if he answered honestly and truthfully, as an hon. gentleman suggests he ought to do, he would have answered that the duty of one dollar a barrel on flour imported into the United States did not increase the price of the flour there to the extent of one cent. of answering my question he wriggled around in a peculiar manner, and he said a great many things which should not have been said in Parliament.

 $\mbox{Mr. MITCHELL.}$ I am ready to answer for them outside.

Mr. CAMERON. No doubt you are answerable for them; and if the hon. gentleman will only keep cool until I have said the little I intended to say, we may go home and stay outside. The reason I asked the hon. gentleman that question was that I knew that if he reflected a little he would find the reason why the imposition of 75 cents a barrel on flour in Canada will not increase the price of flour here. He argued that the reason why it did not increase the price of flour in the United States was, first, they did not import any breadstuffs. In that statement the hon. gentleman was not correct, because they did import breadstuffs, and they imported breadstuffs from Canada to the value of $8,971,000. The true reason is that the price of flour in the United States, as well as in Canada, is regulated by the foreign markets. Another reason is that the inter-state trade in the United States, enables them to have American flour free of duty in the United States, and the products of flour being in excess of the demand, they are able to procure it at the lowest possible figure consistent with the markets abroad. The same reasoning applies to Canada. We produce more flour in Canada than is necessary for home consumption. The price of flour is regulated here, as in the United States, by the foreign market, and it does not make any difference what duty was imposed on American flour coming into Canada so long as we produce more flour than is necessary for home consumption. The leader of the party (Mr. Mackenzie), in my presence repeatedly stated that fact, and there is no intelligent person in the Dominion who does not know it, but there are a great many who know it, but refuse to acknowledge it because they appeal to the prejudices of the people and mislead them into the belief that they are paying the tax on flour. The hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who spoke in very strong language not only against hon. members of this House generally, but against myself particularly, will find on some fine day a foeman worthy of his steel when he arouses a Highlander from the backwoods of Cape Breton. He appeals for the poor fishermen of Northumberland—and I am sorry if they are as poor as he represents them to be—for the poor farmers, and poor mechanics, and poor lumbermen.

An hon. MEMBER. And poor doctors.

Mr. CAMERON. And there may be some poor doctors, because, when all the other people are poor the doctors must be poor also. I want the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) to understand this: that the poor fishermen of Northumberland get their flour free, get their tea free under the National Policy; they get their flour free because Canada produces more flour than she requires for home consumption, and they get their tea free because the National Policy has taken the duty off tea. I do not know whether it was done especially for the poor fishermen of Northumberland or not, but the fishermen all over the Dominion have received the advantage. They receive also their coffee free, their molasses free, except the duty of one cent and a-half a gallon, and that was done in their interest. They have their pork free, the senior member for Queen's will supply them with all the pork they require and of excel-lent quality, and the hon. gentleman did not stir while the pork duty was under consideration. The members from Prince Edward Island do not have a great deal to say against the tariff on this occasion. They may come to the front by-and-bye, when some articles of minor importance are under consideration, but they are very particular not to touch that which is in their own interests. In addition to all these articles I have enumerated, the fishermen and other classes obtain cornmeal free of duty. If the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) had kept cool and had answered the simple question I asked, I will not say dishonestly, because that is not a parliamentary term, I would not have addressed the House at this hour of the night, and I have done so only because the hon. member provoked this discussion.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). A statement has been made frequently, in the first instance by the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman), that the duty was imposed in order to relieve the straitened circumstances of the poor farmers of Ontario.

It has been repeated by the hon. member for Cumberland, that the farmers of Ontario would derive a benefit. I am one of the farmers, and I deny the proposition, and in doing so I voice the sentiments of the farmers' conventions in Ontario. There were seventy farmers institutes held. Arrangements were made by the millers associations to send their representatives to those institutes and urge the farmers the necessity of giving the millers this protection. What was the result? At the first institute they carried the resolution to ask the Government to increase the duty on flour. But the farmers are becoming alive to their own interests, and they find that during the last year they did not receive the quantity of flour they had been formerly receiving when they took their wheat to the mills. The statement made by the millers in their own association that they could no longer grind the farmers' wheat, as they had been accustomed to do, and give him his own flour, but now they bought the wheat at the market price, and gave him the flour at the market price. Therefore, the farmer has got to pay the duty on the flour made from his own wheat. I hold that if the millers did not find that the increased duty on flour was going to benefit themselves, they would never have put themselves to the trouble of attending the farmers' institutes in the Province of Ontario, or they would not have waited upon the Government in the large numbers in which they came here. The great complaint of the millers was that in putting 15 cents duty on wheat, it cost them 70 cents duty for sufficient wheat to make a barrel of flour, and they held that it was the duty of the Government to equalise the tariff on wheat and flour. In the second farmers' meeting which the millers attended, a motion was made by the secretary of the millers' association, but an amendment that the duty should be removed upon both wheat and flour was carried unanimously, showing conclusively that the farmers of the Province of Ontario know their own condition and know that under the present circumstances they have got to pay the duty upon flour. I have been astonished at the ignorance of the hon, member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) and also of the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) both of whom stated that we raise a larger amount of flour and wheat than we require. If these gentlemen had examined the records they would have found that up to the year 1888 we were exporters of wheat and flour; but I find that in 1888, we imported of wheat 15,617 bushels and of flour 25,813 barrels, which when turned into wheat at four and three quarter bushels to the barrel, gives 1,229,381 bushels. In that year we only exported of wheat 490,905 bushels and of flour 131,181 barrels which, turned into wheat, makes 623,110, so that when the subtraction is made, we find that Canada, after the harvest of 1888, was short 130,500 bushels of wheat. Therefore the statements made by these hon, gentlemen are not borne out by facts. Now, Sir, let me examine into the question how much wheat Canada really required for consumption during the year and see what amount of taxation is imposed upon the consumer by this 75 cents duty upon flour. There is a statement in a document which has been put into the hands of members which shows that 31,139,981 bushels of wheat were retained for consumption in Canada after the export, and the amount used for seed was deducted. That would give us 6,610,000 barrels of flour, which at 75 cents a barrel, would amount to the nice little sum of $4,957,600 of taxation imposed upon the people of this country through the duty on flour. When this country through the duty on flour. the Minister of Finance made his financial statement last year, he told us that the farmers of this country paid no duty on the goods they consumed, but he need not tell the farmers of Ontario that any longer, because they know that they now have to pay a duty upon the produce of their own farm before they can put it on their table in the shape of flour. Now Sir, how much of this taxation do the farmers pay? Being three-fifths of the population the farmers will pay for the privilege of using their own flour $2,974,000, and I hold that the farmer pays a duty on flour just as well as the workman or any other. I have great sympathy for the laboring men of the Province of Ontario at the present time. I find that the farm laborers who board themselves have an annual income of $38 less than they had in 1882, and this reduction in the wages of the workingmen corresponds to the reduction of the income of the farmer on account of the small crop and reduced prices. I find that the workingmen with five of a family, is taxed for $4.50, because according to this statement, five of a family will consume six barrels of flour, and we find, therefore, that the burdens of the workingmen are increased while their income is being steadily reduced. The artisans of this country will also suffer severely by this taxation. From a report I looked over to-day, I find that out of 1,860 workingmen there were 1,140 who had a small surplus, 302 whose receipts and expenditure just balanced, and that there were 418 out of the 1,860 who had a deficit during the year. I hold that it is a gross injustice to the workingmen of the country to impose such duties upon the articles they require for the use of their families. Their income has been decreasing during the last few years, while their burdens have been largely increased. Is there any wonder why there is a cry among the workmen? I have had communications from one or two workmen to advocate their claims along with those of the farmers, and I believe the one is nearly if not altogether as bad as the other. I hold that the farmers have to bear this duty on flour as well as the people in the Maritime Provinces have, so that the duty is not for the benefit of the Ontario farmers, and the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they go back for re-election will find that the farmers understand that. I would just say to those who represent farming constituencies in the Province of Ontario that it is well for them to sit dumb and not lift their voices during this discussion on the imposition of taxes on the farmers and workingmen of their ridings. You may depend upon it that if they defend this duty, a day of reckoning will shortly come in a general election, and they will then find what the result will be.

Mr. KENNY. The hon gentleman who has just taken his seat has given us in his concluding remarks the key note of the spirit which seems to animate hon gentlemen opposite. He has referred to the elections which must take place in this Dominion. I have listened most attentively to this interesting discussion, because all that relates to this tax on flour concerns us in the Maritime Provinces in an especial manner, and I have learned from the discussion that when hon, gentlemen onposite tells us of the terrible taxation which is now to be imposed on the people of the Maritime Provinces by this duty on flour-one hon. gentleman said, that we should be completely ruined by this duty-they are simply preparing for the coming elections in the Maritime Provinces. Let us examine and see exactly what amount of duty the people in the Maritime Provinces have paid on flour during the last twelve months. The Province of Nova Scotia paid $6,961; the Province of New Brunswick, $1,735.25, and the Province of Prince Edward Island, $694.56, making a total of $9,391,31. That duty has been increased 50 per cent., amounting to about $5,000. Now, if I estimate the population of the Maritime Provinces at 1,000,000 for the sake of calculation—the increased tax will amount to about one half of one cent per capita of the population of the Maritime Provinces. Representing, as I do, a fishing constituency, and representing the working classes of the community in which I reside, whilst I should be very glad to see less taxes on breadstuffs, yet I do say that the increase of the taxation one half of one cent per capita is not going completely to ruin the people of the Maritime Provinces. I confine myself simply to this item of breadstuffs. I will not follow the example of hon. gentlemen opposite by wandering over all manner of subjects; and I desire to point out that while this increased duty involves an increase of something like $5,000 per annum, assuming that we shall import next year the same quantity as we did last year, there has been a reduction in the duty on cornmeal of from $30,000 to $35,000.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman is ingenious if not ingenuous in the opinion he presents; but he knows very well that the contention in the Maritime Provinces—and I believe it is well founded is that the tax on flour increases the cost of the flour used. It is not simply the amount of duty paid upon American flour, but the cost of the flour is raised all over the country. I have been in the Maritime Provinces since the duty was increased, and I find everywhere the opinion of the people is that there is to be an additional tax upon trade. If there was to be no additional tax, why did the Government not assent to the proposition of the millers, and make the duty $1 a barrel? But they knew well that they dared not face public opinion with such an addition as that; and so they split the difference, and made it 75 cents. Further than that, this whole tax is a restraint upon trade. is an endeavor to force trade in a direction in which it will not naturally go. With reference to the whole business of flour in the Maritime Provinces, we could take our goods to Boston or New York, and bring back to our people flour cheaper than they can buy it in Ontario. The hon gentlemen who support the Government entirely overlook the political effect of such a tax as this. They pay no attention to the fact that in imposing such a tax as this upon the bread of the people, they are doing great injury to the union which now exists among these Provinces, making it more difficult every day to maintain the Union, and making the arthur the arthur these whose and making the path more easy for those who believe the best interests of the Maritime Provinces would be served by severance from the

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was not surprised at the enquiry of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) relating to the importation of flour by the United States, because that gentlemen has not that familiarity with business which would enable him to deal with that question.

 $\ensuremath{\mathrm{Mr}}.$ CAMERON. I have not had so much to do with sugar as you.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If he had, he would know that if the duty in the United States was $5 a barrel on flour, it would not raise the price of Canadian flour if it went there.

Mr. CAMERON. Would it increase the price of American flour?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Not one cent.

Mr. CAMERON. That gives up the whole case.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If a son of mine six years old were to ask me a question of that kind, I would give him a spanking and send him to school, and tell him to learn the principles that govern commerce.

Mr. CAMERON. And when he had learned them you would not understand them from him.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon, gentleman asked whether the price of American flour would be raised. He put us in the position of the United States. But we do not raise any breadstuffs in Nova Scotia at all, and, therefore, the cases are not parallel.

Mr. CAMERON. Why not?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Simply for the reason that we do not raise any breadstuffs in Nova Scotia at all.

Mr. CAMERON. Do they raise breadstuffs in the city of New York? Does a school boy know that?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman does not understand a business argument, there is no use appealing to him. I was surprised to hear my colleague argue that because we only imported a certain quantity of flour from the United States, we do not pay more than the duty on it. The hon. gentleman is too good a business man not to know the contrary. He knows that the duty will apply to every barrel of flour consumed in the Province and not only to the few barrels that come from the United States. The hon, gentleman charged me with having stated that the increase of duty was going to make our flour $1 per barrel dearer. I did not make any statement of the kind. I said that but for this duty, we would import our flour from the United States; and but for the difference in freight, our flour would be a dollar cheaper than it is under the present arrangement. I maintain that still. The hon. members for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) and Queen's (Mr. Freeman) and my worthy colleague have given their views about this matter, but we have a good many other nembers from Nova Scotia, supporters of the Government, who have been dumb dogs on this subject. this subject. The hon, members for Shelburne, Digby, Annapolis, Hants, Colchester, Pictou and Cumberland have been very careful not to say a word. No doubt they look on at their more energetic, if not more devoted, members of the party, and say to themselves: Let them go forward into the breach if they like, and be slaughtered, we will stand behind the wall. With regard to the duty on flour, I may give the House the opinion of the Chamber of Commerce in Halifax, for the benefit of my worthy colleage, who was in possession of a copy of the resolution I am about to read when he made his observations. This resolution was first introduced by one of the warm supporters of my hon. colleague, Mr. D. F. Power, who said:

"In reference to the bread tax clause in the report, he hoped the Chamber, in view of the matter soon coming up in Parliament, would emphatically condemn the proposal to increase the duty on flour. He moved to that effect, and Mr. Mitchell seconded the motion."

Then Mr. Curran, another active supporter of my worthy colleague, moved this resolution, seconded by Mr. Chipman, a third Tory:

"Whereas it is learned that the Government of Canada proposes to increase the duties on American flour; and whereas, such proposal is, in the opinion of this Chamber of Commerce, not in the interest of the people of this Province; therefore resolved, that our representatives at Ottawa be advised that should such legislation referring to flour duties be proposed, the chamber would protest against any such increase, but would urge the necessity of having the duties removed on American corn."

My hon, friend had this resolution in his desk when he was speaking, and the House will see how well he has carried out the desires of the mer-chants of Halifax. Neither of their requests has been complied with. American corn has not been admitted free for all purposes. It has been, or will be practically, when used for human food, but a large portion of it is not used for human food, but for feeding cattle, and the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) will find that if he feeds the commeal to which he refers to his cattle, the drawback will not apply. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman) referred to the great reduction which was going to be made in molasses to compensate the increase in flour. I observe my colleague (Mr. Kenny) made no reference to this subject. Probably he has been in Halifax and found out, what I knew some time ago, that instead of the proposal of the Government reducing the duty on molasses, it actually makes the duty heavier.

Mr. BOWELL. No; it does not.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). So that the hon. member for Queen's will not be able to draw the consolation that this change will have the effect he says it will, and will be a gain to the people. It must be evident to any business man that so long as an increased duty exists on flour, so long will our people have to pay more for that article. If not, why increase the duty? Or, if the increase does not add anything to the price, why not have the duty $1, and have met the views of the millers? But the Government knew better than to do this. They thought that by taking only an additional quarter out of the people of the Maritime Provinces, they would find supporters like my worthy colleague, who are more loyal to the party than to the people they represent, but they would not venture to test them to the full extent of $1 per barrel. The people of Halifax will know how to appreciate the regard my hon. colleague has for them, when, in speaking of a subject in which our people take so much interest, he did not deem it worth while to submit to the House the resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, and sent to him in order to have it presented to the House.

Mr. FREEMAN. How do you explain the fact that Canadian flour is as cheap in Halifax as the same brand of American flour in Boston, if there is an increased price put on Canadian flour, because of the duty on American flour?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that the brand does not indicate the quality of the flour?

Mr. FREEMAN. I stated the same brand identically.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Their brands are not the same as Canadian brands, and the hon. gentleman is talking nonsense in that respect. The American and Canadian brands do not correspond in quality.

Mr. FREEMAN. I beg to correct the hon. gentleman. He knows what I am talking about, but is misrepresenting the facts. I am speaking of brands that represent the same grades of flour, and the same grades which sell in Halifax at $5.15 are selling in Boston at $5.15.

General LAURIE. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has expressed surprise that several members from the Lower Provinces have not spoken on this resolution, and affirms that they have not done so because they are afraid to endorse the action of the Government. I have already spoken on the subject. I spoke on it at the time the Tariff Bill was introduced, and I then endorsed the action of the Government. I therefore did not conceive it was necessary I should do so again, but as my not having done so has been pointedly referred to, I rose with the intention of saying exactly what the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman) has pointed out and anticipated me in saying, that flour of the same quality can be bought in Boston, either Canadian or American—the Canadian in bond, and the American of course in the open market-at the same price. It is open to our people to purchase Canadian flour there in bond and take it to our markets, and they buy it at the same price as the American flour. It is, therefore, open to our people to buy Canadian flour at the same price as the Americans do, without paying any duty whatever. I think here we should speak only for the information of the House.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). As the hon, member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) has told us that he is not a resident of the Dominion, I think he is not interested in this question at all.

General LAURIE. Residence in any particular place has nothing to do with this question. I probably know Boston quite as well as the hon. member for Halifax, and certainly know Shelburne better, and I am speaking from personal knowledge and quoting the experience of Shelburne merchants.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is one point to which I take exception in the remarks of my hon. friend. He says we are speaking for the information of the House. I want him to understand that we are not speaking for the information of the House, but we are speaking to empty benches and for the information of the country. We all know what the votes of the House will be.

General LAURIE. I think our arguments should be addressed to our fellow members, and not to the country.

Mr. Jones (Halifax).

Mr. MITCHELL. That might be true if the arguments we advanced here had any effect on the votes of members.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I think, when the supporters of the Government from Western Ontario go home, and produce the speeches which have been made by my hon. friends from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) and Queen's (Mr. Freeman) their constituents will hardly appreciate the statements which have been made by them as to the effects of the National Policy. If their statements are correct, the effect on the duty of wheat and flour amounts to nothing either on the American or the Canadian side. That is what we have maintained on this side of the House all the time, that these duties were of no benefit to the farmer, that they were simply a make-believe all the time, and that the National Policy was a delusion and a snare, as far as the farmers are concerned. I think, when the Conservative farmers read the speeches of the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred, they will be inclined to say: deliver us from our friends. I believe these gentlemen are speaking on correct principles; I believe they are coming over to our view, that the National Policy has been of no use to the farmer, but that he should be allowed to enter the markets of the world and to buy as well as to sell against all comers. But this proposal will be found rather hard to swallow. We know that when a duty on coal was imposed as an offset to the duty imposed upon flour, it was pretended that the people of the Maritime Provinces were by that means to get square, because of the duty imposed on flour in the interest of the Ontario farmer; and we know that for a long time the Ontario manufacturer paid a duty on anthracite coal as well as upon soft coal for that reason. Now, it appears from the statements of the hon. gentleman, that the Ontario farmer had no benefit from that at all. The Finance Minister did not arrive at the decision to increase this duty on flour without a great deal of fear and trembling. It has been urged upon him and the First Minister, by the millers for three or four years, that our Canadian duties should balance the American duties, on the principles of the National Policy, which were that, if we could not have reciprocity in trade we should have reciprocity in tariffs. The millers urged the Government not to increase the duty to 75 cents only, but to make it the same as the American duty and put on the amount of one dollar. If the argument of my hon, friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is correct, why do not the Government make the duty the square dollar in order to balance the American duty? It seems to me that hon, gentlemen opposite are trembling in their knees as to the result of this when they get home to their constituents and that, like the little boy in the graveyard, they are whistling to keep their courage up. But, if there was one statement required to show the fallacy of the argument, it was the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech, that, in conse quence of the increase of the duty on flour, he had reduced the duty upon molasses and corn imported for the purpose of being made into cornmeal for human consumption, in order to compensate the Maritime Provinces for the increase in the duty on four. The provinces that the duty on the corner that the duty of the provinces to the duty of th flour. That proves that the hon. gentleman thought it was necessary to make some concessions to the Maritime Provinces, and it proves that the increased duty on flour would increase the price of bread. The Government did not yield to the demand of the millers at first, and I believe that, if it were not for the different rates on freight between the North West, which is to be the great wheat-raising area of this continent, and Minneapolis and the western States, this duty would not now have been imposed. Do the millers desire this increased duty on flour in order to pay higher prices to the farmers for their grain. Not a bit of it. Their argument is that the price of grain was too high and they had to get this protection in order to shut out American flour and to enable them to successfully carry on their business. I believe that the Finance Minister, in making this concession to the Maritime Provinces in regard to molasses, was taking the same view as my hon. friend who spoke here a few minutes ago, and who said that the result would be that the millers would be able to charge everybody a little more than before by shutting out American competition and depending on the fact which my hon. friend from Inverness stated, that, as we have a surplus to sell, our farmers could get no increased price for their products. If the millers want to raise the price of flour all around and make it higher than before, no doubt this will have the effect of making them succeed. We have the evidence of my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) and of the hon. member for Queen's and of the junior member for Halifax, that under existing circumstances the farmers cannot get any better price for their wheat. I say it is cold comfort to western Conservatives when they go home to meet the farmers whom they have been telling ever since the National Policy was inaugurated that this wheat and flour duty was their salvation, and that the prices were better for the farmers in consequence of this duty. I can understand that my hon. friend for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and others in a similar position, will inwardly bless us for the admonition we have furnished them when they go to their constituents and defend this blessed National Policy from the agricultural standpoint. These gentlemen are getting down to hardpan principles, they begin to realize that it is impossible in the position in which we are placed to protect the farmer under any system of the National Policy. I think we have reason to congratulate our friends from the east when they are called on to do a little hard swallowing, and to come down to hardpan princi-

Mr. CAMERON. My hon. friend may speak to others, but he cannot apply his reasoning to me. In 1882 I declared to my constituents that as long as Canada would produce more wheat than was necessary for home consumption, so long would I be infavor of imposing $1 a barrel on flour, because it would not affect the price in the Maritime Provinces to the extent of one cent. I had the high authority of the leader of the Government from 1874 to 1878 in making that assertion, and my majority, after making that declaration on every hustings in the county, was only 850. I now ask my hon. friend: Is he in favor of taking the duty off American flour altogether?

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I will say my catechism when I get a chance to speak.

Mr. CAMERON. I think you can now go on to the same stool of repentance with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). If you will take my record in the House you will find that I stood by that principle time and again, and you did not dare to do it by your vote.

Mr. CAMERON. My hon. friend from North Wentworth thinks he has all the wisdom of this House resting upon his own broad shoulders, but it is not true, all the same. My hon. friend may mislead his constituents, and I have a great deal of sympathy for them, because free schools and high education could not have done much for them if they cannot realise that a duty of 75 cents a barrel on flour is an advantage to the farmers of the great Province of Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER. Who pays it?

Mr. CAMERON. My friend ought to know that the very best market any man can have for his products, is the home market, and if the farmers of Ontario will allow American flour to come into the Canadian market by hundreds of thousands of barrels, instead of having the home market to themselves, which is the most profitable one, they will be driven abroad to participate in whatever prices they can get for their products; and if my hon friend's constituents are so blindly ignorant, being misled by his sophistry, I am only sorry for the humiliating position which they occupy as electors of this Dominion.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon, gentleman has chosen to go out of his way to make a personal attack on myself.

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. It has been a favorite system of the right hon, gentleman who leads this Government, to set up certain characters, to answer gentlemen who have reasons to put forward to the country. He has done it in this case, although not present himself, and the men who represent him here ought to have been ashamed to do it in this instance.

Mr. CAMERON. That statement is not correct.
Mr. FOSTER moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 2.50 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GAS INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) to amend the Gas Inspection Act, chapter 101 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The changes are very simple. The first change is to bring under the operation of the Inspection Act, natural gas, the utilising of this gas not having been contemplated when the Act was passed. The second change is to provide for more frequent and efficient inspection of gas meters. The third change is a trifling one, it being one more of construction than anything else, and it is to remove doubts with respect to connections between gas manufacturing establishments and the testing houses. These are the three changes proposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE AMERICAN TUG E. K. ROBERTS.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. Cook) asked, 1. Whether the Government is aware that the American tug E. K. Roberts, during the season 1889, was engaged in carrying fish from one Canadian port to another and calling at different Canadian ports, and taking on fish at these various ports, in the Canadian waters of Georgian Bay, during the same voyage en route to Detroit, U.S.? 2. If so, has such action been sanctioned by the Government, and why? 3. What entries has said tug made, and what duties has she paid during the year 1889? 4. Have any penalties been imposed by reason of said tug having infringed the provisions of the Act respecting the "Coasting Trade of Canada," chapter 83 of the Revised Statutes of Canada?

Mr. BOWELL. 1st. The Government is not aware that the American tug E. K. Roberts has during the season of 1889 violated the provisions of the coasting laws, as indicated in the Application was made on the question asked. 28th March, 1889, for permission for the steamer E. K. Roberts to carry supplies for men and out-fits from Windsor, Ont., to the Duck Islands during the season of navigation, which application was refused by letter dated 1st April, 1889. 2nd. Subsequently, about the 20th of the same month, on further representations—that no Canadian steamer was available—permission was given for the vessel to make one trip only, to carry Canadian supplies to the Duck Islands. 3rd. The Department has no information as to what entries said tug has made or what duties she has paid. 4th. No penalties have been imposed, as no report has reached the Department of any infringement of the provisions of the coasting regulations or laws.

GRAIN ELEVATOR AT HALIFAX.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) (for Mr. Weldon, St. John) asked, What amount of grain, in each year since its erection, has been passed through the elevator at Halifax, N.S.?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In 1883-4, 73,387 bushels; 1884-5, 244,933 bushels; 1885-6, 378,739 bushels; 1886-7, 575,880 bushels; 1887-8, 71,373 bushels; 1888-9, 129,725 bushels.

QUEBEC CAVALRY SCHOOL.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, Whether the Government intend, according to their promise of last year, to promote the officers of the Quebec Cavalry School? If yes, when? Also, why have the officers of the Quebec Cavalry School not been granted promotion in accordance with the Militia Regulations, as promised last year by the hon. the Minister of Militia?

Mr. Costigan.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the officers of the Quebec Cavalry School have been granted promotion in accordance with the Militia Regulations. I am not aware of any promise made by the Government to any of those officers.

OUTLAY FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES.

Mr. DOYON asked, What sums of money have been paid by the Government, from the 30th of June, 1889, up to date, to Messrs. Charles Darveau, Isidore N. Belleau, Thomas Chase Casgrain, F. H. Drouin and Jean Blanchet, advocates, for professional services? What sums have been paid by the Government, during the same period, to the following law firms: Casgrain, Angers & Lavery; Belleau, Stafford & Belleau; Blanchet, Drouin & Dionne?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to this question and to the following one, I would ask my hon. friend to make a motion, and the accounts will be brought down.

Mr. DOYON. (Translation.) According to the suggestion of the hon. the First Minister, I move for:

Return showing what sums of money have been paid by the Government, from the 30th June, 1889, to date, to Charles Isaïe Labrie, Notary Public, of St. Joseph de Lévis, for professional or other services, and also what sums have been paid, during the same period, to Messrs. L. N. Asselin, P. V. Taché and J. M. Pouliot, for professional services.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES' RESIDENCES.

Mr. CIMON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to compel the Honorable Jean Alfred Gagné, Judge of the Superior Court for the District of Saguenay, to establish his domicile in that district, in accordance with the terms of the law?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no information that the judge has not complied with the law. In the case of any judge not complying with the law as to his place of residence, he will be requested to comply.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. In rising to move:

That it is expedient that the Government should direct earnest attention to the establishment of a system of irrigation in the Territories,

I will speak, not only on this motion, but, unless the House objects, I will speak generally, in order to economise time, on the subsequent motions which I have on the paper, and then move them without further comment. I hold that the Government and the Minister of the Interior are in a very happy position in regard to the North-West, a position that is capable of redounding to the great advantage of the Territories if properly used. The people of the North-West at present are a free community, with great privileges. I have no sympathy whatever with those persons who talk about the North-West as though it was a community in which the people are suffering from any great disability. We are, I say, a free, prosperous and happy community. Some friends of mine here say that we have not got the ballot. Well, the ballot has never seemed to me to be an evangel of political or other prosperity. I am very glad, however, that my hon friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) and another hon. friend have interrupted me in this jocose manner, because their interruption gives me an opportunity of telling the House that I am about to place considerations before it than which few considerations have been placed before it this Session, or any other Session, to which it ought to give more attention. I should like to remind this Parliament, that it is in a certain sense an Imperial Parliament, governing vast territories; and if it forgets its high functions and the demands these territories make upon it, it forgets the importance of its position and the great duties that devolve upon it. What I wish to place before the Government is this: that in the North-West they can have for the next five or six years-aye, for the next ten years-all the advantages of a centralised government, all the advantages of a paternal government, and at the same time all the advantages of a free government. Now, Sir, for two or three years, I have tried to impress on the mind of this House and on the mind of the Government the necessity of giving the people of the North-West Territories responsible government; but among the motions which I have placed upon the paper this year, carrying out the policy which I have carried out each year, of expressing the opinion of the Territories as evinced in the North-West Council or Assembly, I have omitted to place a motion for responsible government, and I will tell you why. I went through my constituency, and I found that the great mass of opinion among the people there was against having responsible government at the present time; in fact, I only found a single farmer who to have responsible government. My duty as a representative is, of course, not merely to express my views as to what is right, but to give expression to the opinion that I find in the territory; and therefore I do not urge on the House what I did in previous years, to grant responsible government, although I am myself still in favor of it. Now, Sir, I hold that the Government is in this happy position: that the money that would be given to the Territories in case they had responsible government, can be used now for the material development of the Territories. The history of Manitoba in this connection weighs upon the minds of our We have a large number of settlers from Manitoba, who of course to a great extent leaven the settlers around them. These men say: "We have lived in Manitoba, and we have seen no good come from the money which came to Manitoba, because it was organised into an autonomous Province; on the contrary, we see that that money has been spent uselessly;" and everyone knows, that without spending money in a corrupt manner directly, the Provincial Government is tempted to allow leakages to prey upon the fund which it has at command. I do not know anything about it myself, but I know that I have seen in Manitoba a large amount of money placed under the control of the Government there, and now, after sometwenty years of responsible government, if you ask what has been the result of all that expenditure, there is very little answer for it; there is no material, tangible evidence of what has been done with the money. Now, the Government of Canada, to-day, can give the Territories—whether you call them the North-West Territories or, as somebody has suggested, the British Canadian Western Territories—you have a vast territory there to-day, immensely rich, valuable, and full of resources, whether you regard them from an agricultural, a mining or any other point of view; there it stands, a country stamped by nature to become one of the richest, most fertile, most abounding countries in the world. You have that country, and what is the Government's opportunity in regard to it? The Government have this opportunity, that they can apply to that country all the advantages of a centralised paternal government, without denuding it of a single valuable element that inheres in a free government. The House will probably have seen, the Government will most certainly have seen, in the petitions which have been sent to the Governor General, to this House, and to the Government, that the Assembly of the North-West Territories states, and states truly, that if you take the same ground as you took in giving the subsidies to the Provinces, our population entitles us to at least $200,000 a year more than we get at present. It would be nearer to say $250,000 a year. is the opportunity the Government has in respect of that? Let them capitalise that sum, and use the money right off in the material development of the country. If we were to give responsible government to that country and give them $200,000 or $250,000 a year, which is due to them, I am afraid, looking at the characters, all records of all Governments which have ever existed, that much of the $200,000 or $250,000 would be frittered away; and at the end of the ten years, I doubt whether we would find, on looking over the decade, such tangible results as my suggestion would secure. What I would suggest to the Government is that they should capitalise that $200,000 or $250,000 a year, and use it at once, with energy and foresight and a clear grasp of the needs of the country, -- and the needs of that country are the needs of the Domininion—in developing that country rapidly. I sometimes hear it said, especially on the Opposition side of the House, and you read it sometimes in the newspapers: Oh, there are sixty millions below the line, and here we are but five million. Suppose you multiply—to talk a little algebraically—five thousand by X, you get one result; if you multiply it by X2 you will get another result; and if you multiply it by X3 you will get another result; so if you add to that 5,000,000 people energy, rapidity of movement, and rapidity of development, and if you multiply that people by a rapid power you will discount the great advantage which the 60,000,000, by their numbers, enjoy. I have put on the paper a mo-tion declaring that it is desirable to attract earnest attention to irrigation in the North-West. I have put that motion in the same words that were used by the Legislative Assembly, but if I had the choice of words myself, I should have talked about the necessity of digging wells in certain places which require them, because there is very little of our North-West-but a mere fraction which needs irrigation. If you will go below the line and travel, as I have travelled, along the Union Pacific and the Northern Pacific, you will find vast tracts of territory utterly barren, given up to alkali. It almost blinds you to travel over those plains so alkaline are they, they are stamped by nature with barrenness, but there is not a spot in the North-West similar to those. You can go over any part of the Canadian North-West without finding a single spot where any man who knows anything about agriculture will say: This is a place that cannot be successfully cultivated; but there are parts where it is difficult to find water. instance, it is a very peculiar thing that north of what is called the Waskooni, or, if you like, Pile o' Bones Creek, we can get water anywhere, at any depth, from forty to eighty feet. But go south of the creek, and for twenty miles there has been no successful well-digging, although we have gone 120 feet below the surface to get water. When a farmer goes 120 feet down, he goes to the utmost that any settler can be expected When he goes that depth, he has exhausted his resources, but I need hardly tell you there may be water at 200 feet, 250 feet, or 300 feet; and you have only to go south and witness experiments made in Dakota and other parts of the United States, to know that water can be obtained at 300 and 400 feet, bubbling up and flowing the whole year. I saw, myself, in the States, an artesian well, which made a great lake and supplied water enough for two or three farms and for a whole lot of cattle. As I approached the farm, I saw what seemed to be a lake, and three hundred of cattle, or more, coming down to drink. I drove up to the farm house and said to the inmates: You have a very fine lake here. They answered: No; that is not a lake, it is a well; and they brought me to an artesian well flowing into a great tank, and this tank overflowing, the water took the trend of the country and flowed down to a little valley, making a lake. The Government might take the country south of Regina or the country north of Pense or the country in the vicinity of Moose Jaw, into which I am happy to say an immense immigration is coming this year, and than which finer land is not to be found in the world. What the Government should do is this: Let them have artesian wells dug in the centre, say of four sections, which would put it within a mile of each farmer on each section, or if the farms were only 160 acres each, you would have sixteen farmers within a mile of it, instead of their having to go, as at present, eight, nine and ten miles to get water. I do not know exactly what the cost would be, but supposing the cost would be $1,000 or $2,000 for sinking a well, you could put the charge upon the farmers contiguous, and I am sure the Canadian Pacific Railway would be ready to fall into line and pay part of the expense of digging those wells, which would add to the value of the sections they possess. I know this, that the farmers coming in will be very glad indeed to pay the amount of tax which would fall upon each one of them in order to pay for the well. I say that there you have an opportunity of doing a great good for the territory. You should spend in one year the whole $200,000 or $250,000, because my idea is that you should strike a hard, strong and effective blow at each spot. My idea is, not that you should distribute your expenditure in little dribblets and let it be lost; but that the money should be concentrated in one year for one purpose, in another year Mr. DAVIN.

will be attained. I hope my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, on whose attention this has been pressed for more than a year, has given some attention to me now. I hope that the view I suggest will find favor with him and with the Government. Then comes a question of great importance to the territory, namely, the position of the North. West Half-breeds. I will put the argument in a nutshell, and then leave it to the House to consider-You cannot expect the Half-breeds of the North-West who were no party to the contract which took place between the Government and the Halfbreeds in Manitoba, in 1870, to go in on the conditions and within the four walls of that engagement. You cannot expect these men to come in on the conditions and within the four walls of that engagement. It would be irrational, it would be unjust to them. They are in a position to say: We were no party to that arrangement. There is not a man of prominence in the North-West who does not contend for the same thing, that you should deal with the Half-breeds in the North-West precisely on the same conditions as prevailed in 1870. That is to say, do not hark back to 1870. Deal with them on the basis of the date when you make the contract; abolish the Indian title in them there and then. It is such a small and such a contemptible matter in the way of means and scrip, that I am surprised that the Government have failed to see the reason, the justice, the policy of the course which I advocate. Then comes the question, that we should at once mark out and set apart the land for a university for the North-West. I think that is very desirable, although I may say that, for my own part, I am guilty of the heresy of thinking that this country and nearly all modern civilised countries have made a great mistake in taking care of what is called superior education. My own opinion is—whether you call it a Tory opinion or a Radical opinion—that the Government, properly speaking, has nothing whatever to do with the higher education of a people, but should leave that to private individuals and private benevolence, and should only attend to the elementary education of a people. I think, when a Government does that, it has enough to do, and, if it were my cue, I could show some evils which have arisen in Canada, in the United States, and in England, also, in consequence of the facility for higher education, which has been given where there was no capacity, no calling for it, and no proper encouragement in the individual to suggest that that higher education would not be thrown away. However, I think it is desirable that land for a university for the Territories should be set aside. There would be this advantage about it: If land were set aside for such a university, it would probably prevent, when these Territories are separated into Provinces, the erection of a university for each Province. The educational course in Canada has already been such that we have so many universities that we find the universities are competing for the students, instead of the students competing for the universities. I remember a distinguished gentleman in Toronto showing me, at dinner one day, a letter which had been written to him by an "honors" man in one of the universities, in which there were grammatical mistakes for which a sixth-form boy would be degraded. The next point is for another purpose—and so something effective as to the necessity of guarding against prairie

I have here a resolution in which I fires. move:

That in order to the prevention of prairie fires, the Railway Act be amended to enable railway companies in the Territories to enter upon uncultivated lands 200 feet on each side of their track, and that such railway companies be compelled, at proper times in each year, to plough, as a fire-guard, a continuous strip of not less than 6 feet in width on the outer part of such 200 feet and parallel with the line of railroad, and burn the prairie grass between such ploughing and their tracks; provided such fire-guard need not be constructed within the limits of any rown or city, nor along the line of railway running through the mountains or over lands where ploughing would be impossible or unnecessary; and that any railroad corporation operating its line of road, or any part thereof, shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating any such line of road, or any part thereof, when such railroad company has failed to plough a fire-guard as above provided; and any such damages may be recovered by the party damaged in any court of competent jurisdiction.

If you have directed your attention to the condi-

If you have directed your attention to the condition of affairs in the North-West, you will have known that last year and in other years we have suffered very largely from fires, and you cannot get it out of the people's mind that the railway is wholly responsible. I know very well that the railway is not wholly responsible for those fires. I have tried to disabuse the minds of the people of that view, but that the railway is in part responsible I have no doubt whatever; and, therefore, if it be responsible, it ought to be made liable. At the present minute, owing to the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a railway chartered by this Parliament, we cannot quite get at it. There have been some decisions unfavorable to that view, and neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor any other road, except for a consideration which I will point out by and bye, need be afraid of such a clause as this if it is not liable, because the costs of the action, in that case, will fall back upon the party bringing it. It will have to be proved to the satisfaction of a judge and a jury, and I think, under those circumstances, the railway is pretty well protected. I grant you that, where the evidence was doubtful and was not conclusive as to the innocence of the railway company, the company might be imperilled owing to the prejudices of the people, but I think the Government can provide a clause which will be at once just to the railway company, and just to the people of the Territories. I am confident that a great many of the fires have been caused by boneseekers. They make a fire in order that when it has cleared the ground, they can get up on the mound and see the bones at a great distance. know also that many of these fires have been caused by eastern men going up there and making a camp fire, and, unaware of the danger, abandoning their fire and allowing it to smoulder. ever, I think it is necessary that some clause—I do not say this clause—should be inserted in the Railway Bill which is about to be brought down by the Government in order to provide for these cases and to give confidence to the people of the Territories. It would be hard to exaggerate the language of praise that the Canadian Pacific Railway deserves for its own watchfulness in regard to this very matter, and for the interest it shows in the Territories generally. I have no want of confidence whatever in its interest in the Territories and its desire to do everything possible in the interest of the Territories, but it will be necessary to have some legitimate needs of the people, and provide proper safeguards. Then comes a much more important resolution.

SECOND HOMESTEADS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That it is just and expedient that clause 43 of the Dominion Lands Act be amended by extending its provisions from the 2nd day of June, A.D. 1887, to the 2nd day of June, A.D. 1889.

He said: Now, that is a question that I have brought before the House every year since I have had the honor of a seat in this Parliament. The first year, in 1887, I got the Hon. Mr. White, the predecessor of the present Minister of the Interior, to extend the time from the 2nd June, 1886, to the 2nd June, 1887. Of course, he had to bring it before his colleagues, and his colleagues agreed to it, and I hold, that the fact of his colleagues agreeing to extend the time from the 2nd June, 1886, to the 2nd June, 1887—remember they passed an Act in 1886, doing away with the second homestead—shows that they acknowledged the principle for which I contend. In fact, it is not possible that any human being with the least sense of justice could rise up and assail the principle for which I contend. Now, Sir, what are the facts? In 1883, on the 25th May, assent was given to an Act which provided that any person coming here and homesteading, pre-empting if he liked, and who got a patent for his homestead and pre-emption, or for his homestead alone, should have a right to a second homestead. The language is "may," I grant you that; but nobody has ever dared, in this House or elsewhere, to rise up and say, that because that language was permissive, on that ground the Government might hark back from the promise, from the lure, from the temptation, from the advantage held out to people in the old country and elsewhere, who went up to the North-West. Nobody has ever attempted to do it, in fact it would be useless to do it, because, in the Act of 1886, there is a clause which acknowledges it as a right. The clause, by a curious confusion in the language, says that the right of homesteading shall be abolished after a certain time. right to a homestead, the right given in 1883, a right that only accrued after three years working on the farm, after three years of settlement that right is declared to be non-existent, although during that whole three years the law, the lure, the temptation, the advantage, was held before the intending settlers of Europe. If anybody supposes that it was not held out as a lure, I have in my possession one of those hand-books issued by the Department of Agriculture in 1885, two years after this Act was passed, a hand-book that Mr. Dyke told me was circulated by hundreds and by thousands in England, in which it is stated that one of the advantages the settler in Canada has over the settler in the United States, is that if he homesteads and pre-empts, he can, after having had his patent for the homestead, go and get a second homestead.

An hon. MEMBER. Read the Act.

Mr. DAVIN. Why, everybody knows it. What is the use of tiring the House with that sort of thing? The usual way in this House, if a man clause such as this adopted in order to meet the wants to bring before you the opinion of Mr.

Wiman or anybody else's opinion, instead of saying what Mr. Wiman said and passing on, he comes to you with a column of stuff and reads it out, and so occupies three hours when he might have said everything in an hour. If anybody disputes what I say, I have got the Act here. As I have said, in 1887 I got Mr. White to extend the time from 1886 to 1887, that is, I got for the people that came in in one year their second homestead, which was not contemplated in the abolition of 1886. But there are a great number of people who came in there, not merely in 1883 and 1884, but in 1885 and 1886, and those people contend that they have as good a right to a second homestead as the people that got it, and can anybody deny it? Will the hon. the Minister of Interior, will the hon. the leader of the Government, will the hon. the Minister of Justice, will either one of them stand up, and with the Act of 1883 in their hand, an Act sanctioned May 25, 1883, and reading the clause—will they say that, on grounds of justice, they can possibly stand by what seems to have been a decision of the Government? Last year the Minister of the Interior came up and visited the North-West, and we were very glad to welcome a member of the Government in that country, and a number of gentlemen and farmers waited on him, some from one quarter and some from another, on this very subject of the second homestead. They told him what they wanted; they told him that they wanted a second homestead; and I think, myself, it was made pretty clear to my hon. friend that what was needed was a change in the law. Well, I sent down some petitions to the Minister of the Interior. I have the petitions here, one was from the Crofters; another was from settlers in the Bluffs, signed by Messrs. Shearer and Holden and a number of others, asking and insisting that they were entitled to a second homestead, seeing that they came in before the law that was passed on the 25th May, 1883. Well, I had some corres-pondence with my hon. friend, but after seven months of correspondence, and after these petitions went in, it was somewhat amusing to me to get a letter saying that the question had been referred to the Department of Justice, and that the Department of Justice declared that those gentlemen were not entitled to a second homestead. Sir, you might as well refer the question to the author of the differential calculus, whether two and two make four, as to refer to the Department of Justice, the question whether those men were entitled, under the law, to a second homestead, or to tell them under the law they were not entitled to a second homestead. There was not a farmer in the Territories who did not know they were not entitled to a second homestead, except morally, and it seems to me something like a farce—I tell you frankly, it seems to me like a mockerysending to the Department of Justice to know what was the meaning of the Act that my hon. friend had to administer. Why, a child of seven years of age, who had read the Act of 1887 and had read the claims of these men, would know that, under that law, they were not entitled to a second homestead. The question that we pressed was this: Whether they were not morally entitled to a second homestead, and whether the law should not be changed; and we have the Minister of Justice, I suppose, and his deputy, sitting in incubation on the question whether two and two would Mr. DAVIN.

make four. An hon. gentleman says, the Minister of Justice is a very poor Minister of Justice. I have seen many Ministers of Justice and Attorneys General, and I will say, that having seen the hon. gentleman in this House, there is no free assembly in which he would not do honor to it, and to the Government he represented. I say this, that we are morally entitled under the law of 1883. Our people who came in between 1883 and 2nd June, 1886, are morally entitled to a second homestead. It is unjust to take it away from them. It is an act that could not possibly be done to any powerful or rich corporation; and I am here to represent the poor and the weak, and I will press the cause of the poor and the weak just as strongly as others will press the cause of rich and strong corporations. I say that those men are entitled to their second homestead, and that they should get it. I expected, and so did the people of the Territories, that when the present incumbent of the office became Minister of the Interior-for he is a North-Westman, and he has spent a good many years in the North-West Territories, at all events—we should have more sympathy shown for the people of the Territories than before. I have been having communication with the Department of the Interior with regard to settlers for eight years, and the tendency of the regular officers of that Department, and I suppose it will be the tendency of all bureaucrats, is to decide everything for the Government and against the people. That is the tendency. When this law was passed on 2nd June, That is the tendency. 1886, they actually would not give a second homestead to a man who had fulfilled every duty and was simply kept by a flood or by some other cause from getting to the office in time, and was, perhaps, an hour late. I had a long correspondence with the Department of the Interior, first writing to Mr. Smith in Winnipeg. After some time I received a letter from Mr. Burgess, the Deputy Minister, stating that the Department had come to the conclusion that my reading of the law was the correct one-my reading being that any person, whether he had applied at the time or not, who was entitled to a recommendation of his patent, that person should get a second homestead. An hon. friend near me asks, if the Government decided the question? They decided one or two cases; but the thing was swept away after a month's correspondence. This is my argument, that if the Department in that case was wrong and I was right, why should not the Department in these other cases be wrong and I right? But I appeal to the good sense of the House, to the legal knowledge in the House, to the hon. and learned Minister of Justice, to look into that Act of 1883; and ! want him or any one else to stand up here and state an argument, that cannot be torn to shreds, on the policy of depriving those men who claimed the second homestead of their rights. I can speak with some authority on the subject, because I have been attending to these matters for a very long time. At the very moment the second homstead policy was announced by the Department, that I said it was very moment I condemned it. a bad policy. I wrote, that it was a bad policy, and I denounced it in the paper I was editing. The moment they saw that somebody who knew something about the Territories' denounced it, why did they not change the policy? If they had done so, they would have had only one year's settlers to deal with it. It took three years of criticism of the second homestead policy to get the law changed. But, when a change in the law was adopted, the Government should not have adopted that monstrous proposition of depriving those men who came here under the law of 1883, from the rights they acquired under that law. I have the records of a number of cases where men were actually in the country in 1882 and 1881, where they had done everything that could be done, where in some cases they had got permission from Mr. H.H. Smith, the commissioner, to go east for a year to buy cattle; but the result of their going was that, although they had fulfilled up to the handle all the requirements of the law, and although in some cases they had 60 or 70 acres in crop, they were deprived of their right to a second homestead. You can never make those people contented unless you restore to them the rights that belong to them. It will prove an irritating sore in the North-West the whole time. But I do not care about the policy of it; what I look for is justice. What I look to, for them and for the Half-breeds, is justice; and what I want to see in the North-West is a large, just, vigorous, far-seeing and broad policy, and as part of that policy I want to see the people who are entitled to second homesteads, dealt with properly. It is simple justice, the commonest justice, that it should be done. Such questions as these are not interesting questions to this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. They are.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad of it, because I remember in 1887, when I first commenced to speak of North-West affairs, the House showed a little impatience. I am glad to see that the House now realises that it is the real government of the North-West Territories. All these questions come home to them; they should also come home to the bosoms of all of us, because you cannot go into a single settlement in the North-West where you do not find sons of Canadians farmers and of Canadian tradesmen among the best settlers, men who have come to us from Ontario and who have all the sense of justice, of fair play, and of freedom that belongs to men born in this great Dominion. I move the first reso-

That it is expedient that the Government should direct earnest attention to the establishment of a system of irrigation in the Territories.

While I should like to have special attention directed to digging wells in places where it is difficult to procure water, and while the North-West Council have covered that subject in their resolution, I have gone over the Territories and there is no portion of the Territories where, in my opinion, there is not absolute need of irrigation.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think I shall have to find fault with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) for two reasons. In the first place, hon. members will remember that a few nights ago the hon. gentleman pledged his word to this House that he did not propose to piddle brains into the Government of this country; and yet he has proceeded ceeded to endeavor to do so during the last two hours. The second grievance I have with the hon. gentleman is this: During the first portion of the Session he placed on the Order paper a large number of very important motions, all referring to the North-West Territories. He really took advantage 1041 strongly on the subject; and yet, although the hon. gentleman had placed those motions on the Order paper, he was not in his seat when day after day they were called, and he was obliged to answer to them or to take that action which it was his duty to take.

Mr. DAVIN. That is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. The statement made by my hon. friend is not true.

Mr. DEWDNEY. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is, that I have been in the House every day during the Session, and I think hon. gentlemen will bear me out in the statement, that on several occasions these questions have been called, and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has not been in his seat to attend to them. I think it is very unfair to members from the North-West in this House, that these matters are brought forward at this late period of the Session.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. There is not a single word of truth in what he states.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. If he makes a misstatement I must rise to correct him.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon, member will not interrupt in this way any more.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, the interruption is disorderly in its matter and in its manner.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The resolution of the hon. member states that it is "Expedient that the Government should direct their earnest attention to the establishment of a system of irrigation in the Territories."

That I consider to be a matter of very great importance, and one which might have been debated in this House to great advantage by the hon. gentlemen who are interested in the North-West Territories. We might have had a discussion, not only on the matter of irrigation, but also on the Had this motion supply of water there generally. been made at an earlier stage of the Session, many hon, members would have taken the opportunity of speaking on the question, and it is one which I believe requires the very gravest consideration. The hon. gentleman states that our country does not necessarily require irrigation. I perfectly agree with him in that, because we have only a very small area in the Territories which necessarily requires irrigation, and every year we are improving in that respect. There are sections of the country in which, if we could get water on to some of our prairies, I have no doubt, it would be a great advantage, but we have yet an immense area of unsettled land which does not require irrigation, and, therefore, I think it is premature to go into this question at present. There are sections of the ranche country where water can be brought easily from the mountains to the plains, and, to some extent, that has already been done by parties engaged in operations there. The time is coming, I am quite sure, when the ranchers of our country will require to utilise the water of these mountains to raise hay for their That country is now being stocked-not over-stocked-but the time will come when the of his hon. colleagues, who, I know, felt very ranchemen will not be able to allow their cattle to roam, day after day, and month after month, the year round all over the country, without providing food for them. In the near future these ranges will be eaten down, and then they will be very much in the same state as the people to the south of us. I recollect, some years ago, in talking this matter over with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), he told me that he recollected in days gone by in western Ontario when the vegetation was rank and the country not fenced in, and that cattle and horses then found their own food for the greater part of the winter. I can understand perfectly that this was the case, and it is the same with us now in our western country; but a time will come when that rank vegetation will be consumed, when the country is thickly settled and fences put up, and our ranchemen will have to bring the water down from the mountains in order to grow hay and food for their cattle. There are many questions in regard to this irrigation matter on which I should very much like to have heard the opinions of the gentlemen interested. The time is short, and I shall not detain the House much longer, except to say that in regard to water generally, and to provide water in some of our dry districts, the Government do intend, I believe, to use their endeavors to find out whether we have not some large artesian basins in the Territories which will be able to supply some of those very dry districts. I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was rather selfish when he asked that the boring should be confined to Regina, Pense and Moose Jaw, three points which are in his own district. He might have been a little more liberal and mentioned some other districts which suffer just as much for the want of water. The hon, gentleman spoke of borings being made to a depth of 150 feet and no water being found. He must be aware, I fancy, that at the jail at Regina, we sunk four or five hundred feet, and the man who was drilling struck a substance which he knew would compel him to go several hundred feet further before he was likely to get water if he continued boring in that strata. He moved his boring operations about 300 feet away, and he struck a copious supply of water at 60 feet, which water is now supplying the jail at Regina. The hon. gentle-man must know that the Geological Branch propose to deal with this water question, and I am very glad to be able to say, from informa-tion I received from the Director of the Geological Survey, that a very important discovery has been made in reference to this matter. Mr. Lowe, who has a very large farm in southern Manitoba, had sunk several wells to a very great depth and he did strike water, but the water is so salt that it was impossible to use it. Dr. Selwyn, who had some experience in Australia, remarked to him that he knew that by filtering salt water through a layer of sand they were able to secure very fair water in that country. Mr. Lowe, when he visited his farm took up with him some five or six iron pipes twelve feet long, and he tried the experiment that had been suggested by Dr. Selwyn and found it to be very successful. I may say that the Canadian Pacific Railway have also sunk wells and tried the experi-ment, with the same result. The following is the letter which Mr. Lowe sent me on the subject :-

toba, including the whole of the section of country between that line and the American frontier, wherever boring takes place, salt water is found in very great abundance, at a depth of from 200 to probably 800 or even 1,000 feet, and when the water is struck the supply is very great, sometimes overflowing and sometimes rushing very nearly to the surface with great force. I had an analysis of this water made by the chemist of the Experimental Farm some months ago, and the results of this analysis were published in the proceedings of last year of the Experimental Farm.

"The difficulty in procuring fresh water for the greater part of the area I have indicated, during the last few dry years, have been so great that settlers have given up their land right and left, notwithstanding the fact that, so far as relates to the quality and depth of the soil, these lands are of exceptional value, having in view a comparison of the whole of the North-West.

"I contemplated deep boring in the County of Morris, having for object to get below the salt water, but on consulting with Doctor Selwyn in relation to the strata, I obtained from him such information as dissuaded me from any attempt of that kind. The question then came, of alternatives, and I am sure that even condensation would be cheaper than the interest of the cost of very deep boring, even if we were sure by such to obtain fresh water. Doctor Selwyn told me that he was personally aware that fresh water had been obtained in Australia by filtration through sand, and he lent me an English publication, giving an account of a meeting or conference of English Civil Engineers, on the subject of deep borings in France and England. At this meeting, a Mr. Normandy stated, that salt water filtered through fifty feet of sand became fresh. This statement, coupled with personal information Doctor Selwyn had given me, appeared to me to be important. Accordingly, I went to Manitoba, at the beginning of December last, having in view for one reason, to test this information by experi these pipes and putting them in a perpendicular position, it became very easy to pour water into them and let it percolate throught the sand. The result of my experiment was as follows:

"The water which percolated through the first pipe was evidently less salt than that poured in from the spring. "The water poured through the second pipe had again a much less salt taste, but there was a verylittle taste of bitterness.

"The same water put through the third pipe produced the same water put through the third pipe products the same kind of result, with, however, the effect of there being very little taste of salt at all, only the bitter taste to which I have referred, which I thought at that time might be alkaline, but since I have consulted the analysis made for me by Mr. Shutt, I am convinced that it was owing to the presence of megnesium.

"The same water put through the fourth pipe had no taste of salt at all, but only the taste of bitterness; and "The same water put through the fifth pipe had no taste of salt whatever, and that taste of bitterness was gone. It was, in fact, fairly fresh water."

I may say that I have two bottles of that water in my office, one containing the original water from the well, and the other containing the water which was subjected to the test and put through this process. This appears to me to be perfectly pure water, and I understand that it can be used in locomotives as well as for household purposes. That is a result, which I consider will be of very great advantage to the country, as there are many sections where the boring has only resulted in the finding of salt water, and, by this simple process of filtration, it can be made pure enough for cattle and for household purposes. Then there is another method which, if made generally known, would, I am sure, be resorted to by many farmers, that is, to impound the waters that come from the melting snows in the coulées and valleys of the mountains in the spring. That was done to some extent when I was Lieutenant Governor of the Territories, and I encouraged it as much as I could. know that at several points where formerly the people had to travel miles for water, they have never since been without water. Therefore, so far as the water question is concerned, I think we may hope that the absence of it is not going to be as great in some quarters as we had anticipated.

 $\rm Mr.$ WATSON. I am sorry that the hon. $\rm Inember$ for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has seen fit to bring such a motion as this before the House, for I think it is not advisable to advertise that the North-West is a country where irrigation is necessary. There are large parts of that country which are, no doubt, dry, as is the case south of the boundary line; but I think it would be a mistake to spend any money on irrigation at the present time, because there are millions of acres in our North-West which are fit for settlement without irrigation. If the people in any part of the far west cannot get water, there are millions of acres in Manitoba which are fit for settlement, and where good water can be got fifteen or twenty feet below the surface. That being the case, I think it would be a great mistake to pass this resolution. I would approve of the Government putting down test wells in the North-West at points where it would be difficult for settlers to dig them to any great extent, Two or three Sessions ago the hon. member for West Assiniboia strongly advocated responsible government for the North-West; but now, after three years' experience, he thinks he was entirely wrong, as he found only one elector in his whole constituency who was in favor of it. Under these circumstances, I think the measures which the hon gentleman advocates in this House should hereafter be taken with a grain of salt. I was rather surprised to hear the hon, gentleman make that admission. What he says with regard to responsible government in Manitoba is entirely incorrect. The people of Manitoba would be recombined to the property of the says with regard to responsible government in Manitoba would be recombined to the property of the says with the sa very loath to go back to the position which the people of the North-West Territories occupy today. It might have been true a few years ago that there was but little benefit derived from the money the Province received from the Federal Government, but of late years we have had a change in the Province, and we are now deriving great benefits from the subsidy. During the last few years we have built some 250 miles of railway in the Province, entirely independent of the lines assisted by this Parliament. I think that is a good evidence that we are satisfied with our present position. We believe that our Local Legislature brings greater benefits to the Province than it would if it were in the position of the North-West Assembly, which is not a responsible body, and which can do nothing except what is permitted by this Parliament. The people of the North-West Territories have had a rather sad experience in that respect. I think at the last session of the Council there was almost a deadlock; there were practically two Governments defeated during that session. I do not think that is a very satisfactory state of affairs. If the people of the North-West Territories had responsible governhent, I think they would be in a better position to obtain redress for any grievances they may have than they are to-day. They have their representatives on the floor of this Parliament, but as have made in the second of the parliament, but as exercise very little influence on the Government. If they would occasionally make a break, such as was done by the hon. member for West Assiniboia a few evenings ago, and talk plainly to hon. gentle-man on the Treasury benches, and threaten what they would do if the Government did not properly attend to the interests of the North-West, their presence here would have some effect; but we find members from the North-West Territories here speaking in one way and voting in another, and the Government always receive their support. So long as the Government are certain of their party allegiance, I have no doubt they will treat the people of the North-West Territories in the same manner as they have done hitherto.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I desire to say a few words on the question before the House. With regard to responsible government in the North-West Territories, I still adhere to the opinion I expressed when that question was first discussed. I believe I represent the feeling of the people of my district, and I believe now, from what my hon. friend from West Assinboia (Mr. Davin) has said, that I also represent the feelings of the people throughout the country. I think it would be unfortunate if we were to be placed in the position in which the people of Manitoba were placed. It would be unfortunate if we were taxed, and the money taken out of the pockets of our people spent in the manner in which it was expended in Manitoba. We have heard a great many stories about the expenditure of money in that Province which ought to warn the people of the North-West, that their public policy is safer in the hands of the Dominion Government at present. When the country is more settled, I hope, and have no doubt, we will obtain responsible government; but at present, with so few people there, the affairs of that country are perfectly safe where they are. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) says, it would be a good thing if the North-West Territories were to threaten the Government occasionally, but he says they speak one way and vote another. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman. I do not think he can apply that remark to the North-West members generally. They speak one way perhaps, but if they do, he will find their votes go in the same direction. If he will take up the reports of the proceedings in this House during this Session, he will find that on almost every occasion on which the members for the North-West spoke, their utterances were directed towards furthering the development of the North-West, and he will not find a single vote recorded by any of them in the opposite direction. With regard to the first motion brought by the hon. member for Assiniboia, that it is expedient the Government should establish a system of irrigation in the Territories, in the northern district, which I represent, irrigation is unnecessary, because we have the large stream of the Saskatchewan, which is navigable for some fifteen hundred miles, and the country is also well watered by creeks and lakes, but I have no doubt that on the plains along which the Canadian Pacific Railway passes, irrigation would be very advantageous indeed. With regard to the next motion of the hon. gentleman, which refers to the claims of the North-West Half-breeds, I should feel inclined to detain the House a long hey number only four in an Assembly of 215, they | time on this question, which I consider a most grave one in the North-West, were it not for the fact that I have not been idle in the interests of the Half-breeds in my constituency. My constituency is the one in the North-West which, above all others, contains a large Half-breed population, and I am happy in being able to state to the House, that the claims of the Half-breed are in such a very satisfactory position before the Government just now that it will not be necessary for me to dwell on this resolution to any great extent. I would simply say to the House that it is absolutely necessary this question should be settled on a permanent basis—not only the Half-breed claims for compensation for losses during the rebellion, but those claims which are, perhaps, more moral than legal, for scrip, and such treatment as will ensure a permanent; settlement of the Half-breed question throughout the Territories. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the Half-breeds. I believe we have simply to go back for precedents to the British Parliament in its dealings with Ireland, to find out the good old rule laid down by Lord Palmerston, that in every constitutionally governed country, it is the duty of the Government to satisfy any section of the people which may have become seriously discontented, even though it be at the expenditure of money. I believe this good old rule would apply to the Half-breed question in the North-West, which, if not settled, will become an Irish question for the Dominion House to settle. With regard to the next motion of the hon. gentleman, he may have forgotten that some years ago a Bill was introduced by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and became law, constituting a university for the North-West under the name of the University of Saskatchewan; and although there has not been much use as yet for that university, it will in time become a very useful institution; and if the Government would give it additional aid by means of a land grant, they would be making a step in the right direction, as, when the Hudson Railway is built, this district will prove the most central in the whole North-West Territories. With regard to the resolution on prairie fires, I think something should be done to restrain the ravages of these fires. But in this connection, there is one matter I would bring more directly to the attention of the Minister of Interior, and that is, that where the Long Lake Railway is being built from Regina to Prince Albert, it passes through a forest of pine trees in the neighborhood of Duck Lake and Willoughby, which are being cut down by the railway contractors to make railway ties, so that this extent of country, fifteen miles long by twenty wide, is covered with the debris of those pines. If the debris is left lying there until the locomotive passes, the ravages by fire will in all probability be immense, as there are good farming settlements on each side, and if fires spread through at the opening of the railway in the month of June they will extend on all sides. I would impress on the hon. Minister the necessity of at once telegraphing to the bush ranger to take measures in order to have the debris off the ground before the snow leaves. With regard to the last resolution of the hon. member, I have always entertained a different opinion to his, and have always been opposed to a second homestead. I believe the principle of the Homestead Act is to give a home I dare say he thought it was; so, subjectively he Mr. Macdowall.

at as little cost as possible to every deserving settler, and to this end a hundred and sixty acres are granted him, and one hundred and sixty in reserve, in case he should need it. Many of the most successful farmers have told me that if they did not need to borrow or mortgage on their homesteads, there was no use of their getting out patents so long as they knew they were secure in their homesteads. And if any one desires to keep a settler in the country, it is the worst thing possible to make him become a roving settler. I do not think we should urge upon the Government the adoption of means to scatter settlers when they have once formed settlements. At the same time, I think it is unfortunate, if lands, which have been settled thickly around towns in the North-West, should be allowed to become vacant, as they would, if this policy of giving a second homestead were continued.

Mr. TROW. I do not think the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) can be sincere in advocating the expenditure of money in North-West irrigation, because if there is any country under the sun in which irrigation could not be properly conducted, it is the North-West. Where irrigation is requisite is where the waters can be conducted from mountain slopes all over the adjoining lands. I do not know any portion of our North-West where irrigation could possibly be carried on. First of all, we have not the streams necessary; then we have not the elevation. The land is undulating, but there are no mountains. I fancy the hon. gentleman was drawing on his imagination, and was just about as sincere as when he had the presumption to call the Minister of the Interior a liar. I do not think he meant that at the time, nor do I think he intends that the Government should spend money in the North-West for the purposes of irrigation.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon, the Minister of the Interior seemed to think it was a very grave matter that at this late period of the Session those important questions should be brought forward, and he stated that the North-West members could now have no opportunity of discussing them. What is there to prevent the North-West members from discussing them? One North-West member has, with great intelligence and clear grasp of the questions, from the point of view of his district, discussed them. As a fact, there are just three days in the early part of the Session, and after that there are two days, and then one day, in which private members can bring forward any subject. On every day when these questions could be brought forward, I was in my place, and on one day I asked to have these questions stand, because, by the time they came up it was five o'clock, and there was no opportunity to have them properly discussed. It seems to me one of the most absurd things I ever heard of—I do not know exactly how to characterise it. My hon friend the member for North Perth (Mr. Trow) said I was as sincere in moving this resolution as I was in saying that the Minister of the Interior was mistaken. He used a very strong word. I dare say he is under that impression. Subjectively the Minister of the Interior may have been speak. ing the truth, but objectively he was not speaking the truth. The fact was not what he stated, but was speaking the truth, but objectively he was not. The Minister of the Interior was rather satirical on me, and it is rather hard to have one satirical on me, and he seemed to think I had nade an effort to put brains into him. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not undertake an impossibility.

An hon. MEMBER. You have none to spare. Mr. DAVIN. I dare say I have not, therefore I do not want to give them away. My hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), the Minister of the Interior, the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), and my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Trow) seem to think that there is something inconsistent in my putting this motion on the paper, when I state that, in my constituency, for which I speak principally, what we want is wells and not irrigation; but one of the most trusted officers of the Department of the Interior, Mr. Pearce, a gentleman who has had great control in that Department, has written an elaborate essay advocating the introduction of a system of irrigation in Alberta, and my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Trow) is mistaken if he thinks that irrigation is not required in Alberta. The Minister of the Interior found fault with me because I specified certain places, such as Pense, Moose Jaw and south of Regina, and he thought it was very selfish on my part to specify these places in my own constituency; but I would ask, are not all the other districts in the North-West represented here? Is not the district of Alberta represented here? Is not the Saskatchewan represented here? Is not Eastern Assiniboia represented here in the person of the Minister of the Interior? If they have any places which need irrigation or wells, surely they can advocate them, but I am not to put forward claims of places in my own constituency. My hon, friend the member for the Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) very properly states that in the Saskatchewan they do not need irrigation. From what I know of that district, they do not, but in Assiniboia we do need it, and we are entitled to have consideration granted to us in that way; we are entitled to more money, and, if you have simply a policy of putting in from year to year what is immediately required, we will have those Territories formed in o Provinces before we know where we are, and the opportunity of doing what I contend could be done—that is, applying to the Territories all the advantages of a centralised Government, almost a parental Government, while at the same time they have a system of free government-will have passed away. I, therefore, do not see any inconsistency on my part. In putting this motion on the paper, I was guided by the fact that the North-West Assembly, composed of 22 men elected by manhood suffrage, desired to have this placed before the House. I could not talk only for my own constituency, I could not talk only in favor of wells, but I felt bound to bring before the House the view of the North-West Assembly.

HALF-BREEDS' CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That it is desirable that the claims of the North-West Half-breeds to be dealt with in the same manner as the Manitoba Half-breeds were, should be examined, and, if found just, should be satisfied.

Mr. DEWDNEY. As far as I know, the claims of the Half-breeds of the North-West have been dealt with in exactly the same manner as the claims of the Manitoba Half-breeds were dealt with. Not only so, but, by an Order in Council passed on the 14th June, 1889, all the land agents of the Dominion were empowered to take evidence from any Half-breeds who had claims on the Government, and to report the same to Ottawa, for the reason that the Half-breed Commissioners proper were disbanded, and only one, Mr. Roger Goulet, had taken up his headquarters at Winnipeg. In reference to any of these claims made upon us by the Half-breeds, every attention has been given to them. I know it is a very important question, and there are some claims which some people consider are not settled yet. Appeals have been made to us to pay the Half-breed children who were born between 1870 and 1885, and to give them scrip similar to that given to the children born in Manitoba previous to 1870. Everyone must admit that that is a very important and serious matter for consideration. In the first place, it is a question of policy. I contend that they have no right, and it is really a question whether we should give them any further consideration or not. If we do, I, for one, should object in the strongest way to scrip being given to these children, or to any half-breeds in the future. We know what has been the result of scrip being given to the half-breeds. It has been that the Commissioners have been followed by a lot of harpies, who bought out the scrip of the half-breeds for a mere song. Those who lived in the wilds sold for what they could get; and those who lived in the settlements sold for about 50 cents on the dollar to merchants, and sometimes had sold their scrip simply for whiskey. My deputy, Mr. Burgess, made a visit, last year, to the North-West Territories, and one of his duties was to investigate this matter and to get all the information he could in regard to it. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have read his report, but it is published in the Report of the Department of this year, and I do not know that it is worth my while to delay the House by reading it. I agree almost entirely with what that gentleman reports. Even in the northern country, where the Half-breeds live, there is a great difference of opinion as to how the Half-breed children should be dealt with in the future, but certainly their best friends, those who know them well and have interested themselves in them, unanimously object to the issue of scrip. As to the other question, the majority of those white people and traders very naturally press upon the Government the necessity of giving scrip. That is the position of the Government with reference to those who have claims. The hon. member from Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) says that he found matters in a satisfactory position, having brought the matter before the Government, and he did not propose to enter at length into that. I may state, that some of the claims are still before the Government for consideration, especially in regard to some of those who lost their property during the rebellion. Every consideration will be given to those, or to any other claims of that nature, which may be presented to the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me of the greatest importance, as everybody will admit, that those claims of the Half-breeds should be settled at the very earliest possible moment. A prompt settlement will contribute to alleviate whatever discontent may still remain amongst the Half-breeds, and there is this further important consideration, that as time goes on and these difficulties are not settled, it is manifest that the pretensions of those people will be increasing all the time. Take, for instance, the resolution that was passed in 1889 by the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories. No doubt we must assume that the Legislative Assembly were giving voice to what were the claims of the Half-breeds in this respect. The first resolution that was adopted by the Assembly reads as follows:

"That the Assembly recommends that the granting of scrip to the Half-breeds of Manitoba and the North-West Territories be extended to such Half-breeds, heads of families and their children, who, on the 15th day of June, 1870, were residents of non-ceded territory, and who have since moved to either Manitoba or the North-West Territories."

1 do not understand exactly what is the precise meaning of this resolution. If my understanding of it is right, it would mean that the Half-breeds were not residents of either Manitoba or the North-West Territories at the time of the acquisition of the Territories in 1870, who did not belong to the ceded territories, but who afterwards removed to Manitoba and the North-West Territories, should be put exactly on the same footing as the Half-breeds who were residents of Manitoba and the Territories at that time. I would be prepared to favor such a construction. The only claim upon which the Half-breeds could rest any pretension to any grant by this Government, was the extinguishment of those titles. The extinguishment of those titles can apply only to the Indians who were residents of Canada at the time the Territories were ceded to Canada. We cannot admit the principle to any Indians who have removed from the other side of the line to our own territory, and the same principle applies equally to the Half-breeds. The Half-breeds' title cannot be extinguished in the same manner as that of the Indians, because of the moved out cededterritory. In my judgment, this individual compensation could apply only to such Half-breeds as were residents of our territory at the time it became the possession of Canada, that is to say, in July, 1870. Therefore, for my part, with all due respect to the wishes of the Legislature of the Territories, which certainly are entitled to respect, because those gentlemen are supposed to have a more intimate knowledge of all these questions than we can have ourselves—but with all respect to their opinion-I cannot for my part, endorse the resolution which I have read. In my judgment, justice would be fully met if this question was settled absolutely as it was settled in Manitoba, and if a distribution of scrip was made now just as if it had been made on the 15th July, 1870, no more and no less, to the father of the family and to the minors then living. If that could have been done on the day the Territories came into our possession, a good deal of the bad feeling which has arisen, would have been avoided. But it is not too late now to do it, and if it were done in that manner, and if the agents received instructions all over the Territories to settle

July, 1870, and if this policy be adhered to and well known and proclaimed throughout the Territories, in my judgment, a good deal of this agitation which has arisen, will disappear. I have always been of the opinion that the manner which was adopted to settle the claims of the Half-breeds, has not proved to be the most judicious nor the most beneficial to the Half-breeds. They squander, in most cases, whatever means they have received from Canada. If, at that time we had adopted a policy, such as was recommended by some of those who were consulted, so as to make the gift by Canada to the Half-breeds permanent in its nature, and such as they could not divest themselves of, it is probable that the half-breeds would have been benefited to a greater extent. But, right or wrong, the policy then adopted has been adhered to, and serious complaints have been made by the Half-breeds, that the promises that have been made to them have not been kept. The moment that the promises which have been made to them by the Government have been carried out, that moment any serious cause of complaint will have disappeared. I now pass to the second resolution, which was adopted by the Legislative Assembly:

"That this Assembly would further recommend, that Half-breeds residing in the North-West Territories on the 20th April, 1885, who were otherwise entitled to scrip, but who failed to comply with the conditions of the Order in Council of 20th April, 1885, be granted scrip notwithstanding such Order in Council."

This seems to me a very reasonable demand, and if scrip be granted to all those who did not receive it on the 20th April, 1885, another serious cause of grievance will disappear. Then the third resolution reads as follows :-

"That, as under the Half-breeds' Commission of the 20th March, 1885, the Indian title, in as far as Half-breeds are concerned, only extends to those born prior to the 15th July, 1870, and as a number have been born to parents coming under the said Commission of 1835, who, in the opinion of this Assembly, have equal rights to those already dealt with, this Assembly would therefore draw the attention of the Dominion Government to the fact, and urge that such steps be taken to finally end all Half-breed claims." Well, that step should be taken also. The inference is that the scrip should be given, yet not in the manner contemplated by the law, that is, to heads of families and to children born before 1870, and also to children born since. Now, I am not quite sure that this would be judicious, because, unless you draw the line somewhere, these claims will continually arise, and the children who are born next year will have the same claim as those that were born last year, and who have been settled with. I think, on the whole, if we adhered to the policy prescribed in 1870, that no cause of discontent would remain.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with most, if not all, my hon. friend has just said. The settlement of the Half-breed claims has always been a matter of great difficulty, both in Manitoba and the North-West. The proper way, perhaps, would have been to have considered the Halfbreeds as occupying the same position as white people. Most of them are the sons of white parents; but it was found, as the hon gentleman knows, that the Half-breed retained in his blood and habits and way of life so much of the Indian received instructions all over the Territories to settle still pending claims in that manner, that is to say, to settle them as if they had been settled on the 15th Mr. LAURIER.

was of no use, I cannot work it and perform settlement duties such as are imposed on settlers obtaining homesteads. And so, in order to settle with the Half-breeds in some way or other, scrip was given to them in lieu of land. That satisfied their claims in Manitoba; but it was most unfortunate for the people, because they sold their scrip for almost nothing, and the money they did receive for the scrip was, in a great measure, spent, if not in intoxicants, at all events wasted foolishly. Still that was done. There was no other way of settling the difficulty, although it proved injurious rather than beneficial to the Half-breeds. Then a question arose in regard to the treatment of the Half-breeds in the North-West, and a Commission was appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rightful claimants and settling their claims in the same way as Half-breed claims had been settled in Manitoba. That Commission acted with great care, and the vast majority of the claims were settled by that Commission. Some of the Half-breeds, however, did not come before that Commission, for they were in distant parts of the country and their claims stood over. The Commission could not, of course, sit forever, but it sat at various places and it received, as I have said, the vast majority of the claims and settled them. Then it was decided—as it is an expensive matter to keep up a Commission—that the agents of the Minister of the Interior all over the North-West should be instructed to receive the claim of every Half-breed who had not been settled with, and send it to the Department, for the purpose of being satisfied. I do not think there was any other way of dealing with this question. The House must understand that a great many fraudulent claims were set up by the Halfbreeds. A good many of those who had received their scrip in Manitoba and moved afterwards to the North-West Territories, set up fresh claims, and no doubt many of those men were paid, the fraud not having been discovered. So the case stands. Every claim is taken up when it is presented, and of course it is in the interest of the Government and the North-West to have these claims presented and settled. But if all honest claims were settled, that fact would not prevent persons setting up dishonest claims, and to a very considerable extent. We must deal with the circumstances as they arise, we must settle all honest claims supported with anything like reasonable evidence, and we must put up with the row, to use a familiar expression, which men will raise who have really no honest claims to present.

Mr. BLAKE. No Riel claims.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the success of the plan in Manitoba was such as to justify the Government in undertaking to deal with the Half-breeds in the North-West in exactly the same way. It did seem to me that the result of the negotiations and the plan of settlement adopted there was such a complete failure, it was not in the public interest that a similar settlement should be made with the Half-breeds in the North-West. We know that so far as lands were granted to the Half-breeds in extinguishment of what the hon. gentleman called, their Indian title in the North-West, it was a failure, and the only effect of the appropriation of lands to them was to lock up a very large extent of territory that was of no advantage whatever to the Half-breed population, against actual settlement by those who would have been willing to take possession of it and cultivate. Lands passed into the hands of speculators, and I believe a very considerable portion of the land is not even filled up at this day, to the very great detriment of the Province of Manitoba. I have no doubt that the long delay which has occurred in the extinguishment of the claims of the Half-breeds of the North-West Territories may render the proceeding of dealing with their case somewhat different from that which might have been adopted if the claims had been dealt with at an earlier period; but it is very clear that the Government ought not to undertake to simply estop the Half-breeds from making further claims by granting scrip to them, or dealing in any way with them, conferring no benefit on them but perhaps imposing a serious obstacle to settlement in different parts of the country, by transferring lands to parties who will make no immediate use of them, but hold them against settlement, thus doing mischief to the progress of colonisation in the Territories without doing any benefit whatever to the Half-breeds. It seemed to me ten years ago—of course I have not followed closely the condition of things since—that if the Government should undertake to confer some substantial advantage upon the Half-breed population for the extinguishment of the Indian title, which the right hon. gentleman recognised in the case of Manitoba, and which seemed to make it impossible to adopt a different policy in the North-West, it would be very much better than conferring on them a very large tract of land for the extinguishment of their individual claims. I think there is no reason why every Half-breed should not be as free to take possession of 160 acres in the North-West as any other settler, and I do not think it would be in the interests of the Half-breeds or of the country, that any attempt should be made to encourage them to locate as a tribal organisation, that individual ownership is of far greater consequence, even though they settle contiguous to each other, rather than make a grant en bloc to a considerable number of Halfbreeds. If the Government had, at an early day, dealt with the Half-breeds in one respect, as we deal with the Indian population, granted them agricultural implements, a certain number of stock, instead of giving them lands which they could dispose of; if they had established schools among them and given them a large amount of pecuniary aid, they would have done a great deal towards converting Half-breeds into ordinary settlers; and this aid would have gone a long way to benefit the Half-breed population, without in any way placing them at the mercy of speculators. How far the Half-breeds are yet to be dealt with in that country I cannot say, but I do not think the Government is discharging its duty by simply making a grant of land, which they know will pass into the hands of speculators for a mere trifle, within a few months after it is placed at the dis-posal of the Half-breed, and thus stopping him from making any further claim on the Government. A very great number of the grants made to the Half-breeds of Manitoba were of no material benefit to them whatever. They have left the Province; they have gone to the North-West and settled at Batoche, St. Laurent and other points, and the Government permitted them to take up lands, precisely the same way as if no grant had been made them in Manitoba. I think that was right and proper under the circumstances; I do not think a different policy in that respect could be adopted, but our experience in Manitoba ought to have prevented us from adopting a similar policy in dealing with the Half-breeds of the North-West. It is a bad policy; it conferred no advantages upon the Half-breeds; it imposed serious impediments on the settlement of the country, and, in my opinion, the Half-breeds might have been largely benefited by a different policy, without any detriment to the public interest and without any very serious burden upon the public treasury.

UNIVERSITY FOR THE N. W. T.

Mr. DAVIN moved the following resolution: That land for a University for the Territories should be selected and set apart at an early day.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think that the hon. member (Mr. Davin) is, in this respect, a little too previous. I do not believe that those who would be disposed to grant an endowment of this kind, think that this is the proper time to discuss that matter. When the grant was given for the University in Manitoba there were some reasons which brought it about. In Manitoba, as in the North-West Territories, as hon. gentlemen know, the school property was one-eighteenth of the whole, and it was found that in the settlement belt in Manitoba, there were some 30,000 acres of land which should have belonged to the school lands, but which had not been provided for out of the settlement belt. At that time the lands in the belt were worth $5 an acre, and those which were outside the belt were valued at $1 an acre. When the Government of Manitoba came to Ottawa for the purpose of asking, amongst other things, an appropriation of land for a university, the situation of these lands in the settlement belt being worth $5 an acre, while these on the outside were worth only $1, it was conceded that they should get 150,000 acres towards endowing the University of Manitoba. In the North-West Territories, on the other hand, wherever land has been taken for any purpose, the appropriation of school lands has been provided for, and conse-quently the school lands in the Territories are oneeighteenth of all the lands. This, I think, is a very liberal appropriation, and when the time comes that we are formed into Provinces there, I have no doubt but that the several Provinces will be able, out of that liberal appropriation, to endow universities if they think proper.

RAILWAYS IN THE N. W. T.

Mr. DAVIN moved the following resolution: Mr. DAVIN moved the following resolution:—
That in order to the prevention of prairie fires, the Railway Act be amended to enable railway companies in the Territories to enter upon uncultivated lands 200 feet on each side of their track, and that such railway companies be compelled, at proper times in each year, to plough, as a fire-guard, a continuous strip of not less than 6 feet in width on the outer part of such 200 feet and parallel with the line of railroad, and burn the prairie grass between such ploughing and their tracks: provided such fire-guard need not be constructed within the limits of any town or city, nor along the line of railway running through the mountains or over lands where ploughing would be impossible or unnecessary;

Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

And that any railroad corporation operating its line of road, or any part thereof, shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating any such line of road, or any part thereof, when such railroad company has failed to plough a fire-guard as above provided; and any such damages may be recovered by the party damaged in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I may state that this matter has been brought before the attention of the Government, and they have given it serious considera-tion. Before the close of the Session I believe it is the intention of the Minister of Railways to propose some amendment to the Railway Act which will provide to some extent for this. I shall not say anything further on the matter, as it will come before the House on a future day.

Mr. DAVIN. I have had a conversation with the Minister of Justice, and I have had some communication also with the head of the Government on this subject, and I understand that the matter is in shape to be placed in a satisfactory condition. Therefore, with the consent of my seconder, I will withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved the following resolution:-

That it is just and expedient that clause 43 of the Dominion Lands Act be amended by extending its provisions from the 2nd day of June, A.D. 1887, to the 2nd day of June, A.D. 1889.

He said: I have already described what is required by this motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. Explain the change.

Mr. DAVIN. The 37th clause of the Dominion Lands Act of 1883, reads as follows :-

"Any person who has obtained a homestead patent after three years' residence, or a certificate signed by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, as in the next preceding clause mentioned, with the additional statement that there has been three years' residence, may obtain another homestead and pre-emption entry."

At the end of the three years, within of course which time alone, the condition of that clause could be fulfilled, the Act was repealed. What I want is that the persons who obtained rights under this Act should have their rights acknowledged, and I want the law amended accordingly. I may say in regard to this, that I would not of malice prepense have moved that resolution earlier in the Session, because I have been waiting to see if the Minister of Interior would bring down an Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In reference to this matter, it will be within the recollection of the House, that I expressed my opinion very freely in regard to it last Session, when the matter was brought up by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I have not changed my views with regard to that question; I consider it, as I said then, a mistake that the second homestead regulation was granted, and I have not felt inclined to relax in any particular, the position in which I found myself when I took charge of the Depart-The few individuals who have brought this matter before the member for West Assin-boia—and they are not, I believe, a very great number-claim, that this change should be made in the law, on account of representations made to them before they left the old country, and although they were not able to carry out their cultivation conditions, they think, that having come out here with that understanding, they are entitled to have a second homestead. I think that the late Minister of the Interior, after a great deal of pressure, consented to an extension of the time from the 2nd of June, 1887, to the 2nd of June, 1889; and I am not at all sure, if a further extension were given, that we should not still have pressure brought from the hon. member for West Assiniboia for a still further extension. I may tell him that every man who has been entitled to a second homestead, so far as I recollect, has received it, and those who have carried out the conditions are still receiving them. I do not intend to retreat from the position I have taken on this subject, but I will bring the matter before my colleagues again, and if they feel inclined to change the policy and to extend the provisions of this amended Act for another year, I will not stand in the way, although at the same time I will express my opinion in a diametrically opposite sense.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am at a loss to know what the meaning of this extraordinary motion is. Does my hon friend from West Assiniboia desire that people who have had one homestead granted to them for three years should have another granted?

Mr. DAVIN. It only applies to people who went in between 1883 and 1886.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is still more objectionable, that it should only apply to people going there in certain years. The people of the older Provinces bought and paid for that territory, and we were led to expect, according to the statement of the Ministry of the day, that the proceeds of the land would be used for the purpose of extinguishing the debt created for its purchase and for the improvements made on it; and why we should give away the property of the whole Dominion in the way of second homesteads to people who go in there, I cannot understand. I hope the hon. Minister of Interior will not consent to adopt such a principle. I have heard no reasons whatever given by the hon, member for West Assiniboia in favor of his proposition; perhaps, there are some, but I have not heard any. After we have given a homestead to a man to induce him to go in and settle there, I do not see any reason why we should give him a second one.

Mr. BLAKE. The principle of a second homestead having been very much pressed on the House, it was conceded; but, according to the views of those who have the best knowledge of the subject, it proved unsuccessful and was discontinued. I must say that I think the balance of the evidence indicated that it was discontinued too peremptorily—that a longer day of grace ought to have been given than was given. Although the Minister of the Interior thinks it was a mistake to extend that day, my view was that it was a just and reasonable thing to make that extension—having regard to the position of the existing interests, undefined as they might be—of those who went in on the expectation raised by the adoption of that principle: but I must say, since the House having decided that the experiment was a failure, and having determined to discontinue it, gave that extension out of regard to certain so-called vested interests, I think the extension given was a liberal one and ought to be a final one. I was glad to hear the earlier part of the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior, when he announced such a firm conviction as to what the policy of the Government and the House ought to be, but I was sorry when he declared in the end that he would waive and relinquish his policy if the rest of his colleagues differed from him. I do not think that is the way to win a battle in the Council. If the hon. gentleman, with all the experience he has, with the special qualifications for his office which caused him to be chosen for it, and with his added experience in the office, is quite decided, I would advise him to remain quite decided, and to tell the Council that the proposition shall stay where it is, or that he will not stay where he is.

Mr. DAVIN. I have listened with the greatest possible interest to the speech of the hon. member for West Durham, because we know what a high authority he is inside and outside of this House; but I confess that, when I sought to gather reason out of that speech, I utterly failed. What is the position of the hon. member? He says it was a right thing to extend the privilege of a second homestead from the 2nd of June, 1886, to the 2nd of June, 1887. Why was it? It must have been solely because the persons who came in between the 25th of May, 1883, and the 2nd of June, 1886, under the law passed in 1883 had a right to a second homestead—a moral right, if you like. These persons had that allurement placed before them in England, Germany, Ireland and Scotland, and they came here with that promise held out to them; and what do you do? You break it in the The hon, member says it was right to extend it to 1887. In the name of all that is rational, if it was, why was it not right to extend it to 1888 or 1889? If it was right to give a second homestead to a settler who came in 1884, because the Act of 1883 was in force, why was it not right to give a second homestead to the settler who came in 1885 and up to the 2nd of June, 1886, under the Act which remained unrepealed? The hon. member for West Durham stands up, and with his great authority tells us that it was a liberal arrangement, and he always speaks so solemnly and looks so solemn that, whether he does say anything profound or not, you expect that something profound will drop from him, and occasionally one is not wholly disappointed. But to-day, I came over here in order that I might listen to the honied words that would drop from those eloquent lips; I listened carefully, and I could see no cogency in his argument. My hon. friend from Northin his argument. My hon friend from North-umberland (Mr. Mitchell) came in on a sudden, without having, I think, heard the argument. I do not care if the hon. leaders of the Opposition and the whole Government denounce the position, the argument still stands on a rock of justice. If the same position were taken on behalf of a great railway corporation or any great company, what would be the attitude of the hon. membes of this House? You would have them getting up and in the blandest accents and sweetest tones, declaring that the company had the right, and the company would get what it wanted. But in the case of these poor settlers, who are without means of making their voices felt in the country, when a humble member in this House brings forward their claims, we have a great man using his power against their position. I say you may vote on this how you like, their claim stands rooted in justice; as it stands there it ought to be strong against the whole world.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have just one word to say in reply to the hon. gentleman, who has referred to me as having just come in and not having heard the argument. I came in when the motion was called, and I must say that I heard no argument whatever. I am glad that my slight introduction of a few remarks, speaking in the interest of the whole Dominion, has elicited such an outburst of enthusiasm and eloquence from the hon. member from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It always affords me pleasure to listen to the hon. gentleman. Everybody knows he is talented, clever, and able: and when he takes hold of any case, he generally looks to see it through, when he is in the humor. It is much to my surprise and my gratification that for once he has plucked up courage enough to attack the Government, assail their policy, denounce their unjust acts, and endeavor to persuade this House to pursue a course which will lead to a different state of things from that pursued by the Administration which the hon. gentleman has supported in the past, and no doubt will continue to support in the future.

Motion negatived on a division.

RELIEF OF GEO. T. SMITH.

Mr. SMALL moved third reading of Bill (No. 98) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of George T. Smith.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. HICKEY. I understand that the effect of this Bill will be to renew the privileges which existed in regard to the old midlings purifier, and that there are other usages among millers which will be mischievously affected by this Bill. Millers who have communicated with me feel that this will create a considerable amount of difficulty, as it has already caused a large lawsuit. I, therefore, move:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months.

Mr. SMALL. The hon member (Mr. Hickey) is entirely in error. The patent to which he refers expired some time ago. This is a different patent altogether.

Mr. WALLACE. This is really a proposal to renew the old patent. If Parliament gives power to the Commissioner to grant this patent, these people will continue to work under the old patent, and there will be endless litigation in regard to it, and there will be practically, as has before been stated, blackmail brought to bear on every miller in this country. I have no doubt that the millers of this country are a unit in opposing this Bill.

Mr. TROW. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wallace) is entirely in error. If there is any litigation as a consequence of this Bill, I will guarantee that I will defray all the expenses. The Committee passed the Bill almost unanimously, the Minister of Justice gave his opinion in favor of it, and the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) also gave his opinion in the same direction. It is very unusual at the third reading of a Bill to bring it in question in this way.

Mr. HESSON. I am deeply interested in this matter. It relates to a business which is carried on in the city where I reside, and in the county which I represent. There is not the slightest ground for the statement which has been made by the gentlemen who have spoken. This Bill does not ask for a renewal of the patent which existed some years ago, and has recently expired. That patent was renewed on two occasions. It is true that the millers had a great deal of difficulty with the gentlemen who held that patent, but that patent has expired and has become public property. This is an entirely new patent, and if this Bill is not passed, it will crush out an important industry in my county. The whole Bill has been already explained by the Minister of Justice, and to adopt the amendment would do a great deal of injustice not only to the legal firm in Toronto which should have sent the money on and saved the patent, but also to the gentlemen who are carrying on this industry in the city of Stratford. There is not the slightest ground for the charge made by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken that there is any disagreement whatever between the millers and the Smith Purifier Company as to this patent.

Mr. WATSON. I think it is a question for the House whether, after patents lapse, we should renew them in any case. I have a knowledge of some patents, and I think the House should not renew them in this way, but should carry the amendment.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Hickey:

SASKATCHEWAN COLONISATION RAIL-WAY COMPANY.

Order called for House in Committee on Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Saskatchewan Colonisation Railway Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to this, and the following Bill, the Government think they should be re-committed to the Standing Committee on Railways and Canals. Both these bills involve questions of policy with respect to that the Bill be referred back to the Standing the general construction of railways in the North-West. There is this further fact, that there are, at least, five railways running in nearly the same region of country, and all running northward, and they will simply kill each other if they are all passed. I will ask my hon. friend the mover of this Bill (Mr. Watson) to allow this to stand over and be referred again to the Committee on Railways, where I will be able to lay before the Committee the considerations I have mentioned, which are of importance, as I can assure the House. As the rush of railway Bills has now ceased, the Committee will have every opportunity to consider them, and the considerations which I shall lay be-fore the Committee. I shall, therefore, move that this Bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways and Canals. If it be asked why these considerations were not laid before the Committee, I will mention that it was by accident, if I may use the expression. I intended to be present at the Railway Committee, but just before the hour of meeting of the Committee, I was summoned to Government House in a matter concerning despatches from Washington. I went down, hoping to get back in time, but I did not.

Mr. WATSON. I am sorry the First Minister has seen fit to adopt this course. This Bill was carefully considered, along with the other Bill he mentions, by a sub-committee appointed by the Railway Committee. They were reported on by that sub-committee to the Railway Committee, and reported by the Railway Committee, after careful consideration, to this House. I do not know whether anything new has arisen; it is simply a question as between the companies. The promoters of the Bill, which I have charge of and which is now before the House, were satisfied to take their chances along with the other companies. There might be some objections to the Bill on the part of some of the other companies, but the company which I represent have no objection to any other Bill, because they feel strong enough to go on and construct that road independent of the others. There is another Bill which was sent to the sub-committee, and was reported, and which has passed its third reading, and been assented to by His Excellency, and if there was any objection at all, it should have been raised in connection with that Bill. The promoters of this Bill did not expect there would be any opposition, or any more objections raised after it had been reported by the Railway Committee. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has taken this course, although I do not know what his reasons are.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Committee will consider the Bill after the observations I shall make, and I can assure the hon. gentleman there will be every opportunity to have the Bill reported and brought before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. But you do not intend that the Bills shall be reported.

Motion agreed to.

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE AND DUCK MOUN-TAIN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Order for House in Committee on Bill (No. 78) to incorporate the Portage la Prairie and Duck Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

BANKERS' SAFE DEPOSIT WAREHOUSING AND LOAN COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the Bankers' Safe Deposit Warehousing and Loan Company.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

(In the Committee.) On section 3,

Mr. DICKEY. I wish to propose an amendment to this section, the object of which is really to make the Bill clearer. Hon, gentlemen will see that by section three the company are authorised to lend money upon property of every kind and description, including stocks and shares in com-panies, and the last three lines of the section authorises the company to deal by purchase and sale, in all this property, that is to say, it authorises the company to buy and sell shares in companies and stocks of all kinds. I scarcely think that is the object of the promoters of the Bill. think what is intended is the ordinary power that companies take of buying in their securities when they are foreclosed, and I conceive that to be all that the section means. I do not think it will commend itself to the judgment of the House that we should incorporate a company and give them authority to take other peoples' money with which to speculate in stocks, buy and sell stocks in the market, buy and sell grain on a margin, and all that sort of thing-I do not think that will commend itself to the judgment of the House. regard to what took place before the Private Bills Committee, I may say that I myself understood this to mean simply the power to buy in their own securities for the purpose of protecting themselves, and I voted for that third section under that supposition, and I think hon. gentlemen in that Committee voted on the same supposition. the last meeting of the Committee, near the close, it was proposed to test the Committee on this question. But the promoters of the Bill begged that the matter might lie over, because the Committee was so much reduced in numbers, and the Committee decided to leave the matter for the House to deal with. The last three lines of the first sub-section read:

"And may acquire by purchase or otherwise any security upon which the company is authorised to lend or advance money, and may re-sell the same as the company deems advisable."

The amendment I propose to make simply limits the right given to all companies of buying property on which they have advanced money. It is:

They may acquire by purchase or otherwise any of the aforesaid property or assets which may have been pledged, mortgaged or hypotheated to the company as security for any such property, and may re-sell the same.

I think that was really what was meant when the Bill was drawn, and that it was not intended to take the wider power. As the Bill should not leave the hands of the House in its present form, I submit this amendment.

Mr. COCKBURN. I had not the pleasure of being present when the Bill passed the Committee. No doubt the Committee will make the matter clear by carrying out the terms of the amendment.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. COCKBURN. I move that the Bill be now passed, and that the title of the Bill be "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Safe Deposit, and Warehousing, and Loan Company, Limited."

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS—ON DIVISION.

Bill (No. 120) for the relief of Christiana Filman Glover.—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 119) for the relief of Hugh Forbes Keefer. —(Mr. Weldon, Albert.)

Mr. MITCHELL. I think some order should be maintained in regard to Divorce Bills. I believe the evidence has been taken and printed for some time; but, so far as I know, it has not been generally distributed, although some hon. members have received the evidence in one case. Bills of this nature should not be taken up until the evidence has been submitted to members, and hongentlemen in charge of these Bills should see that this is done, in order that we may be able to discuss the Bills intelligently.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The introduction of a Bill is a mere matter of form; but the evidence must be generally distributed, and should be carefully considered by hon. members before the second reading.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION IN EASTERN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. KIRK. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to draw the attention of the First Minister, who is also the Minister of Railways, to the disadvantage under which the people of eastern Nova Scotia are laboring, in consequence of the connections made at Truro by the Quebec express from Quebec going east with the Halifax express at that point going east. If the hon. gentleman will look at the time table he will find that the Quebec express on the Intercolonial is due at Truro at 12 noon. The Halifax express, in the meantime, has gone east by two hours. It is due at Truro at 10 o'clock, and the consequence is that passengers and mails are obliged to lie over at Truro for twenty-two hours before they can proceed on their journey eastward. That, I consider, is a grievance, and it ought to be removed immediately; I believe it has been in existence all winter, and, I think, it is time that the Minister of Railways should facilitate traffic there. There are seven counties interested in this matter, represented by nine members, two of whom happen to be Ministers of the Crown, and yet the interests of the people they represent are ignored in this way. I think it is only necessary to draw the attention of the Government to this inconvenience to have it removed at once. I also wish to say that when changes are made, the people of the Eastern Extension should be notified of the change. Last fall when a change was made, not even the postmasters or couriers who had to do with the mail knew of it, and in consequence there was a great deal of inconvenience.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree that notice should be given whenever a change in time is made. I would be exceedingly obliged to my hon. friend if he would write me a note, telling me exactly what the difficulty and delay at Truro are, and I shall make enquiries.

SAFETY OF FISHERMEN.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 96) for better securing the safety of certain fishermen.

Mr. COLBY. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would be kind enough to let this Bill stand now. He will have another opportunity of bringing it up.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This Bill has been allowed to stand several times, and as my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) has pointed out, it is rather important, if it should pass this Session, that it become law at an early date, as the "bankers" are about leaving for the season's fishing. I regret the circumstance which has caused the delay which the hon. gentleman could not avoid, but if this Bill is postponed, I trust I will have an opportunity of bringing it up again.

Mr. COLBY. That opportunity will be given. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Although I regret that the Bill is not made law at once, I will allow it to stand over on the understanding that I will have an opportunity to bring it up.

Mr. COLBY. You will have that opportunity. Bill allowed to stand.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. SHANLY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 104) to amend the Railway Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, I move as an amendment:

That the House do not go into Committee on the Bill, but that it go into Committee this day six months.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that in accordance with the recommendation of the Railway Committee?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. This is a very important Bill, and one which is specially in the interests of the farmers of the country. It is a Bill in the interests of all who own farm lands, through which railways pass, and it is to be regretted that the First Minister wishes in this sudden way to terminate the measure. The Bill received the approval of the Senate last year, and also during the present session. Last year's Bill was in somewhat different form, but not materially different in principle from the Bill now before the House, and in view of the fact of its having passed the Senate, I think the First Minister should have given some argument in support of the amendment he has moved. As I understand under the present Railway Act, a private individual, whose lands are affected by the construction of a railway, and which are not capable of being drained by the reason of the railway having obstructed the natural escape of water, is without a remedy. This Bill proposes that a private individual may, under such circumstances, apply to the municipality in which the lands are situate, and if the municipality sees fit to do so, it may set the machinery of this Bill in motion, so that the rights of the individual may be brought before the Privy Council in an inexpensive manner and the grievance, if any, dealt with. We were told before the Railway Committee that the existing law dealt with the case of an individual, but I do not believe that this was seriously argued, or that such is the law. There is certainly sufficient doubt in regard to the law at present to justify the Bill passing in its present form, or in a declaratory form, stating that the law is sufficient to meet the case of an individual. I think it is to be regretted that this amendment is the action of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the action of the Committee.

Mr. MULOCK. This amendment now is the action of the Government, because I presume the mover yet occupies the position of Premier and leader of the Government. We may assume that the Government is promoting this motion. It is a question now before this House whether the railway interest is going to override the interest of the farming community, and whether, when these two classes meet, the railway interest is to be predominant. That is the simple issue, because there is no doubt that where the farmer, or any man owning farm lands, finds it impossible to enjoy the full benefit of his land, by reasons of obstruction made by railways; if this Legislature does not provide him with means whereby he can compel such a corporation under an equitable scheme to have his lands properly drained, to that extent his interests are sacrificed and handed over to the railway com-When the case was before the Committee. I felt, with all respect to the Committee, that the individual farmer was not powerful enough there, and if the hon. First Minister presses this motion, I shall feel that that unfortunate position of the farmer extends beyond the Committee to this House. I hope, however, that he will not press the motion, but will either allow the Bill to pass in its present form, or, if he thinks the present law meets the case, let the Bill be amended to protect the rights of the individual. The hon. First Minister, before the Railway Committee, argued in this way, in his mind, if not with his lips: "I am the First Minister, and as long as I am the First Minister there is a cheap and inexpensive way through me to get justice; I am sure I render justice to each individual, and, therefore, there is no need of getting legislation." He thinks there will be time enough to amend the Railway Act in this respect when he ceases to be First Minister. In the meantime, however, a certain part of the community suffers. An individual owner of land in a remote part of this Dominion, at present must appear before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in order to have a water-course opened through the lands of a railway company, whilst this scheme provides that in-stead of the facts being ascertained at Ottawa, they shall be ascertained on the spot itself. To compel the individual to make his application at Ottawa amounts to a denial of justice, for the whole value of his land may not equal the expense of applying to the Government here for redress. Therefore, how can he be said to have equal rights with others? You are offering him a remedy which he cannot avail himself of, and the very knowledge of the fact that he has to appeal to Ottawa, and have the whole examination made here, where he cannot appear in person and must have some one to act for him, makes him despair of getting relief, and so he suffers. With the principle of this Bill made law, you will find a vast number of cases brought under it immediately by people who have been suffering for years by reason of circumstances such as those to which I have referred. Therefore, I hope the hon. First Minister will try to look on this Bill as the ordinary public would look on it, and not as one who believes the administration of the law in his own hands is perfect. While I concede to him every desire to administer the law in the interests of all, and with due regard to the interests of the humblest subject, yet I must also look upon the question as the humblest subject would look upon it, who, I think, would say: "If I have to appeal to a court situated a thousand or two thousand miles away from where I live, to have the condition of my farm investigated, it will be wholly impossible to have the case properly and cheaply examined into, and, therefore, I will suffer in silence." The hon. Minister must look at it from all sides.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This measure came before Parliament last year, and was referred to the Railway Committee of the House. There it was discussed fully and was considered carefully, and the Committee by a very large majority rejected the Bill; it was reported to the House, and the House agreed to the report. This year the same measure came again before the House, and was again referred to the Railway Committee, where it was fully considered and by a very large majority rejected the second time, the Committee reporting to the House in these terms:

"The Committee have had under consideration Bill (No. 104) from the Senate, intituled: 'An Act to amend The Railway Act,' and recommend the measure be not passed; because, in the opinion of the Committee, the Bill is unnecessary, as section fourteen of 'The Railway Act' provides fully for drainage through and across the works and lands of railway companies."

The objection was made, in exactly the same terms as the hon. gentleman has used, that a farmer at a distance from Ottawa could hardly be expected to come here and lay his case before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and have it decided here, but that he should have a chance of having his case tried at his own door; in his own town. That argument was well considered by the Committee, and it was shown there that cases of that kind had come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for the last eight or ten years, and that at no time had one man complained of failure of justice, of being inconvenienced, or of having to appear before the Railway Committee, for the reason given by the hon. First Minister, that the party was not bound to come, and did not come, before the Committee. He sends his complaints to the Railway Committee, and whether he is present or not, his case is taken up and is decided, and justice is done to him as well as it would have been if he had been represented by two or three lawyers. I do not think there is any special reason why we should change the law, and adopt the Bill now before us. Supreme Court sits here; cases are brought and decided here by it, and it is not called on to sit in every parish or in every Province. The hon. gentleman may say that it would be better that the cases should be decided where they arise by this court. That may be, but it is not the law, and if we were to divide the court in that way, we would have as many courts as Provinces. Mr. Mulock.

Mr. MULOCK. Are the cases brought into the Supreme Court first?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course not. The cases are argued in the local courts, and are brought here on appeal. The farmer who has had his case decided in the superior court of his Province is obliged to come here on appeal. Why should he not, in another case, be obliged to come also before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, which is by law a court. There is the high court We do not sit in every of Parliament also. Province, and a man from Prince Edward Island or British Columbia is obliged to come here with his petition. He does not come here personally to argue his case, but sends his petition, and his petition is taken up and decided by Parliament. I do not think there is any reason why this Bill should be adopted. On the contrary there are many reasons why it should not be adopted. We have the Railway Act, which provides fully for matters of this kind, and we should be content with that.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister of Public Works stated, if I heard him correctly, that for ten years cases of private individuals have been dealt with by the Privy Council. I was present in the Railway Committee, and do not remember hearing it stated that private applications were ever made at the Privy Council.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated that cases come there in large number, and are decided by the Privy Council. Often these cases are brought before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council without the plaintiff or any one appearing for him, but the Committee deal with his case on its merits.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that the cases which have come before the Privy Council have been cases of municipalities and not of individuals. Does the hon, gentleman say that individual cases have been brought before the Council for these ten years?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; not only of municipalities but of private individuals. I cannot remember the names. I remember the case of one farmer who complained of a railway, and he had no one to take his case, but the Railway Committee took it up as if he had been defended by lawyers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The illustration of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat seems to me to be rather unfortunate, and not analogous at all to the question the House is discussing. suitor who brings his suit to enforce any civil rights in any Province brings his suit before the court in that Province in the first instance, and he has a right to appeal to the Supreme Court at Ottawa. When the Government constituted a court for the trial of claims in the different Provinces which parties have against the Crown, they determined that the Exchequer Court should not sit in Ottawa, and that the suitors in Nova Scotia and British Columbia should not be obliged to travel here with there cases, but that the judge should go to each locality and try the cases there. Let us see what this Bill really does. There is a great deal in it which commends itself to my judgment. Two or three of the leading railway companies opposed the Bill in the Committee, and some very able arguments were advanced by counsel who took the Committee rather on the jump. contended chiefly that the Bill should be thrown out because section six made all railways in the Dominion subject to the general municipal regulations of the different municipalities. There doubtless was a good deal in that argument, but the argument only went against section six, and that section could have been very well amended, and the better part of the Bill remains. The Bill simply means this: that when any municipality, either on its own motion or on the application of individual farmers, determines that it is right and proper a drain or ditch should be built across a railway crossing through the municipality, the railway company should construct that ditch, but if when the municipality has submitted a plan of the proposed ditch or drain, the cost is under $800, or if the company does not dispute the estimate or propriety of the proposed work, in that case the company shall construct the work; but if the company dispute the estimate or propriety, and the estimate exceeds $800, the order of the municipality to construct the drains can be appealed from to the Privy Council. In other words the onus which now lies upon the municipality and the individual of appealing in the first instance to the Privy Council to have an order passed for the construction of a drain which may cost only $100 and the propriety of which is not even disputed, is done away with, on the ground that there is no necessity of coming to Ottawa when both parties are agreed, and that being compelled to do so only leads to useless expense. The hon, gentleman argued that any farmer can come before the Privy Council and receive as much fair play as any company. I do not challenge that. No doubt if the farmer or municipality is wealthy enough to provide counsel to present their case, they will get justice; but is it not absurd when a small ditch has to be constructed, which will cost about $100, and neither the propriety of constructing nor the estimate is disputed, the party should be compelled to come to Ottawa before they can obtain an order to compel the company to do the work? It is only the extreme power which the railway companies have in the Railway Committee, that has influenced the Government against this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No doubt there are good grounds for the rejection of a sixth section, but the promoters of the Bill have made out an unanswerable case in support of its main feature.

Mr. MITCHELL. This matter was very fully discussed before the Railway Committee, and every point that could be made for or against the Bill was made. But there is one very important point from a constitutional standpoint which has not been referred to in this House, and it is this: That if the power asked for by this Bill are given to the municipality, the municipality is only answerable to the Provincial Government of the Province in which it is, and we would be consequently delegating powers, which should be exercised in connection with the railways of a county, to municipalities entirely under the control of the Provincial Government. I simply rise to make this statement. It appeared to me that the safety of the public should be considered through whose properties the railways pass. know very well that, if municipalities or individuals through municipalities, can get drains made through the country and all over the country, the safety of the travelling public will be seriously impaired, and where railways pass through that country there will be an endless amount of trouble in employing solicitors to attend and conduct and contest these cases before the tribunal provided for by this Bill. I do not know what course the Government may pursue, but, judging from what the First Minister has said, I have no doubt they will oppose its passage, and I think very properly so. The railways of the country should be under the control of the central power, the Parliament of Canada, and should not pass under the control of the Provincial Governments through the municipal authorities. For these reasons, I shall oppose the passage of this Bill.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). This is a very intportant measure, and I think it ought not to be disposed of without due consideration. I have received two communications in reference to it. I received one from Seaforth asking me to do everything in my power to get the Bill passed, and stating that now it is almost impossible for a private individual to obtain redress in these matters. No farmer will come before the Railway Committee or employ counsel, and, if he does not, he is bound to Municipalities also find great difficulty in getting their water-courses made across railways, though there may be an actual necessity for that being done. I think some legislation of this kind is necessary, and I hope this Bill will not be thrown aside without due consideration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course this can only apply to railways which are under the control of the Dominion Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What other railways are there?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are the Provincial railways. We must consider the case as it was presented to the Committee on Railways, which is a large Committee and was very fully represented on the day when this Bill was discussed, and the Bill was disapproved of by a very large majority after hearing, as my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has stated, both sides of the question. We must consider the case of the railways to some extent. The railway companies have a very great responsibility upon them; they have been put to great cost oc-casionally, and it is their interest to see that the country through which the railway passes is properly drained. It is necessary for their own business, and, as a matter of fact, the different railway companies do settle their matters. The vast majority of applications for drainage are granted by the railway company for their own comfort, or in order to prevent litigation; but this measure provides that, where the claims are not over $800, the municipality, either of its own accord or at the instance of any single individual, can force an arbitration; that the railway must choose one arbitrator, and the individual or the municipality whose interests are effected shall choose another. There is a solemn provision for costs also. At this moment, if any individual or corporation desires to have a drain constructed, an in this matter as well as the interests of the people application can be made to the railway company, and, if the railway refuses to do that, all that is necessary is to apply to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But it is said the Privy Council sits in Ottawa, and that may be a thousand miles away from the residence of the individual who desires the drain, and he must have an agent or a counsel here. That is not the case. All that any individual who has a claim for the construction of a drain or anything else has to do is to write a letter, put a stamp upon it, and send it through the mail. It is not necessary for the party to be present or to have an agent or counsel, and I think the Privy Council is the only tribunal in my knowledge where there is no cost of any kind. The Railway Committee certainly sit judicially, but they look at the cases as they are presented as matters of policy as well as of strict right. It has happened since I have been looking at these matters that parties have applied in this way and their cases have been taken charge of by the Railway Committee. It has all been done by correspondence. The evidence and the correspondence can be sent from British Columbia or from Cape Breton, and it is considered and will be considered, and the party will get a decision without any cost or any trouble beyond that. You will see the enormous inconvenience, amounting to injustice, if every railway were made to suffer from such provisions as these. Every ill conditioned man, every one who thinks he would like to have his land drained at the expense of the railway goes to the municipality. The municipal council in Ontario consists of five men. They say: You want an arbitration, it will cost us nothing, and so we will grant it to you. Consequently, every individual who wants his farm drained at the cost of the railway will apply in that way. the party has a good case, without any doubt the railway company will grant it, and, in case the railway company should refuse, a simple applica-tion by letter to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council will be sufficient to induce them to call upon the company to say why they refuse. If they fight it out, the answer of the company is sent to the individual or to the municipality, and the party can send the reply by post. There need not be any travelling expenses or costs incurred. Last Session, Parliament considered this matter fully, as the Railway Committee has considered it now, and for that reason I ask the House to follow the course adopted last Session and reject the Bill.

Amendment agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. FISHER. I did not hear the motion put.

COMMISSIONER HERCHMER.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Davin, for the appointment of a Select Commission of Enquiry respecting the management of the North-West Mounted Police, under conduct of Lawrence W. Herchmer, Commissioner, and the motion of Mr. Watson in amendment thereto.

Mr. DAVIN. After my motion had been discussed the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) moved an amendment to it. My seconder takes the same view of the amendment that I do, and we quite agree with it. I may say that the construction put upon my motion, that it showed desire to enquire generally into the management of the Department, never entered my head. My desire was to enquire into the management of the police force by Commissioner Herchmer, and as for a desire to enquire into the general management of the force, and still less, as to a desire to attack the Department, as semebody has suggested, such a thing never entered my head. The right hon. Prime Minister replied to me with his usual power, and with a convincing force that never deserts him, whether his case is a strong one or is not so strong. My hon. friend, the member for Frontenac

(Mr. Kirkpatrick), and the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) came into the debate; and I am bound to say that I was somewhat disappointed, because I know what an able man the member for Frontenac is, I know that he has been a long time in Parliament, he has been Speaker of this House, and he is a man of great experience; but he contributed nothing to the argument against my position for the best reason argument against my properties in the world: he knew nothing whatever about the subject on which he spoke. Then came the the subject on which he spoke. hon, member for Selkirk, who is an able man, and who, as we know in this House, can make a good speech on any subject about which he knows anything. But it so happened that on this subject he knew nothing whatever; his argument was what I would call a sugar candy argument. He told us that he found Commissioner Herchmer a very nice fellow wherever he met him, that he was all that was admirable in a man. He told us that whenever he asked anything from Commissioner Herchmer, Commissioner Herchmer did it for him, therefore Commissioner Herchmer was exactly what a commander should be. Of course, the force of that reasoning nobody can resist. It is logical, it is strong, it is powerful, nobody can resist a reason of that sort, and the House of Commons ought to be proud that my hon. friend condescends to address arguments of that sort to it. But, Sir, my hon, friend, knowing nothing whatever about the subject, had to invent some sort of argument, and as he had no real arguments to give, he gave us surmises.

Some hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. Order! Who calls out order? Now, Sir, my hon. friend from Selkirk said:

"It has been said that the North-West Assembly passed a certain resolution. It may be that nearly every member of the North-West Council has come into contact with Colonel Herchmer, and that probably they have asked him to do what Commissioner Herchmer did not see fit to do."

Why, Sir, was anything more monstrous ever addressed to an assembly like this about another assembly? In order to support the position that he takes up, that Commissioner Herchmer is a fit commander of men, he tells us that the Assembly, any member of which is capable of standing up to any member of any Provincial Assembly you have—I hold that the members of the North-West Council, man for man, will compare with the members of any Assembly in Canada—my hon. friend, in order to support his position, declared that these men asked something from Colonel Hondon Herchmer that Colonel Herchmer did not give; therefore, they improperly, according to his construction, solemnly passed a resolution that was sent down to the Government of Canada against this Well, Sir, I think myself that my hon. friend from Selkirk was put very hardly to it when he had to resort to such a surmise, and to palm off such a surmise in this House by way of argument. Now, I rather complain of my hon friend for this reason. After all he is, in a sense, a North-West member. I am here advocating the interest of the North-West Territories, I am here advocating the interest of the people of those Territories. I know what I am talking about, I know all about the police, I know all about the needs of the Territories, and my hon, friend from Selkirk, who is in a sense a 1051 about it, comes forward to try and discount the efforts of a North-West man who represents the North-West. I do not think it was a very brotherly thing, I do not think it was a very correct thing; it was a thing, certainly, that I would not do to him if he came forward, knowing something about Manitoba, and made a motion about Manitoba, even if I did not know the question, I would come to the conclusion that my colleague knew all about it, and I would stand up to vote shoulder to shoulder with him in this House. Now, the hon. member suggests that these gentlemen asked something from Colonel Herchmer. Why, Sir, what could Colonel Herchmer have to give them?

Some hon. MEMBERS. A permit.

Mr. DAVIN. He has no power to give them a permit.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. A canteen.

Mr. DAVIN. We will come to the canteen byand-bye. He has no power whatever to give a permit. I do not know what he could give these gentlemen that they could be refused. But I do know that these gentlemen are men of the highest respectability, they are representative men, and knowing the opinion of the Territories they came to the conclusion they did. Now, there is only one point in the speech of the right hon. gentleman to which I wish to refer. He thought—I dare say that he had, probably, some reason for thinking so—that I showed some personal feeling; he did not question my motives, but he thought I showed some personal feeling. Now, Sir, I heard afterwards, that some people thought that Commissioner Herchmer and myself have had some personal difference. There has never been an iota of personal difference between Commissioner Herchmer and myself. The whole North-West was attacking Commissioner Herchmer for twelve months before I ever said a word about him. Prominent men came to me again and again and said: "Why, everybody throughout the Territories is attacking this man. Why don't you do something?" I did not lift a hand against him, I did not say a word against him during those twelve months, when the whole North-West Territory was up in arms against him. I did not do it for this reason, that we had been friends, we were friendly, and not one word did I say against him. The very first time anything was said against him in any place where I could control was when he did a most high-handed act. There was a young man in the police force engaged to a young woman, and on the very eve of the marriage he was ordered off because Commissioner Herchmer disapproved of marriages in the force. I at once telegraphed down to the authorities here, and ultimately we had that settled, and the marriage took place. But that was not the only case, for there was another case of the same sort. A sergeant wrote to the Commissioner that he wanted to get married, and the moment he did so the Commissioner said he would take his stripes off if he married. He does not make any bones about the fact that he is opposed to marriages in the force. That is all right, but he has no right to act in such a high-handed manner as he did in these cases. That was the a North-West man, without knowing at all thing was said against him, and it was last year. first time in any quarter that I could influence, any-

I was rather surprised at the strong attitude taken by the right hon. the First Minister, because there is a member of the Government who could tell him all about the feeling in the North-West. The Minister of the Interior could tell him all about the feeling in the Territories in regard to Commissioner Herchmer. The hon. Minister was up there last summer, and he did not find any difficulty in declaring that he thought Commissioner Herchmer unfit for his position.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. If he refers to me, I say I made no such remark.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon, gentleman made no such remark while he was up there, and if he has made no such remark since he came back here, all I can say is that men, who are prominent men and as truthful men as any men in this House, must have dreamed he said so. Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. But according to the word of men, who, up to the present statement of the hon. gentleman, I have believed to be men of veracity, the hon. gentleman had stated that he recommended Commissioner Herchmer for his position, that he was sorry he did so, and that he believed he had made a mistake.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I would like the hon. gentleman to name the party who stated that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name; name.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly that is a very easy thing to say. It would not be desirable that I should name the party. Any one who is acquainted with the debates in this House is aware that it is not the thing to name people

An hon. MEMBER. Then, why did you say so if you will not name him?

Mr. DAVIN. I will challenge the hon. gentleman to deny it.

Mr. DAVIN,-that the hon. gentleman, when he was up there last summer, suggested that there should be a round-robbin signed by all the officers of the police to the First Minister, to complain of Commissioner Herchmer. I will put a witness in the box that will swear it, and I will swear that since he came back here he said so. I will put the witness in the box.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Then, both the hon, gentleman and his witness will tell a falsehood.

Mr. DAVIN. Let us have an enquiry, and I will put him in the box. I say that it was not to one party, but to more than one that the hon. gentleman, when he was up there last summer, stated his opinion about Commissioner Herchmer's interesting to hear the hon gentleman rise and express his opinion in this House in regard to Commissioner Herchmer. He can now express his opinion. He can state if he thinks the Commissioner is a proper man for the position, and he can openly, in this House, contradict the statement made to me, not by one but by several parties, as to what he said. Those persons may have invented it, may have dreamed it, I may have been misinformed, but the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of stating the facts. I stated specifically, when I addressed the House before on this subject, the charges against Commissioner Herchmer.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; I did. I do not think the hon. gentleman was in the House then; I think he was away. If he is exercising himself at the catcalling business, he might as well exercise it somewhere else than in this House. The member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) thought that I did not act on strict parliamentary principles in making a motion for an enquiry and not stating in the motion the charges against Commissioner Herchmer. I think that in the annals of the British Parliament he will find that some of the first parliamentarians England ever produced have made motions of this kind, and have stated their charges in the speeches they made to support the motions. If that were not so, there was a reason why it was not necessary on my part to do it. And the reason was this: These charges had been published in the newspapers for months and months before this House met. Commissioner Herchmer was, therefore, familiar with them, and when the motion was put on the paper for an enquiry, he and his friends could have been easily informed as to what the charges would be. It was not, therefore, necessary that I should specify the charges. But I was, of course, very grateful for the powerful support given to the general attitude I took on that occasion by so great a man in Parliament as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and also by the distinguished leader of the Opposition. The distinguished leader of the Opposition dwelt on a point in respect of which I will say a word. I confess that if I showed feeling I do not regret it. I am not so constituted that I can know gross injustice has been done, that gross oppression has been exercised without feeling in regard to it. If I have shown indignation I am not sorry, because the circumstances were calculated to excite indignation in the breast of any man who feels as he ought to feel. There were some matters I did not mention when the subject was up before. One of the subjects I should have dealt with, but I thought I had made a sufficiently strong case, was this, that Commissioner Herchmer has established, in Regina, a boycott. The Board of Trade of Regina sent to the First Minister, within the last few days a netition in accordance to the First Minister, within the last few days a netition in accordance to the first Minister. days, a petition in regard to this officer, in which it states what is true, because the leading men in the Board of Trade know well it is so, that the first time I moved in the matter against Commissioner Herchmer I did it at their pressure and at their suggestion; and the moment the Board of Mr. DAVIN. Of course, I will accept the hon. gentleman's denial; but if there be an enquiry I will prove that. Anyway, it will be very Mr. Davin.

what did he do? He boycotted every one of them, except one—it will please hon, gentleman of the Opposition to know that the exception is a prominent Reformer, who had not taken any part in the proceedings—and the Commissioner would not allow any of his men or offi-cers to go to any of the stores to buy anything, and a regular boycott was established. Now, Sir, if the House will remember, when that canteen, which my friends are anxious to know so much about, was established, I protested against it. We had a meeting with the gentleman who occupies the position of Deputy Minister in regard to the Mounted Police Force, and I wish to say that he is an able man, and I believe that his management is probably the most effective of the management of any of the Departments. At that meeting there were present leading merchants who are members of this House, and some of whom had been up in Regina, and they proved to the satisfaction of every one of us, that the prices at which things were sold at the canteen, were higher than the prices charged in the stores in Regina, which shows that from the point of view of price or quality, there was no reason for the course taken. I have in my hands the Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Army, and one of these regulations in reference to canteens is:

"When canteens are established in barracks it is to be clearly understood that soldiers are in no way to be prevented from resorting to markets and establishments in the neighborhood."

Well, Sir, if you are going to establish a canteen on regimental lines, you ought to have acted upon that principle, but we can prove that the moment that canteen was established, a boycott was placed upon the stores at Regina, and the men and officers were prevented from frequenting it. Another of these regulations for the army is:

"The commanding officer is not to be on the committee if there is one captain available for it. Presidents of canteen committees are, when practical, to be exempt of serving on boards of survey, &c."

It is, of course, very important that the commander of a force should not take a very close interest in the canteen, but we can show that this man has been taking as deep an interest in the canteen as if he had in fact some share in the profits. I do not say he has, because I know nothing about it. Another regulation in this book is:

"No officer of the regimental staff is to be appointed a member of the regimental committee, and the canteen shall be managed by a committee of sergeants."

Now, when this canteen was first established, a man from the outside, in no way connected with the Police Force, was brought in to run the canteen and to make a profit upon it; whereas in the regimental canteens of the British army, all the profit goes to providing newspapers, books and what not, for the reading room. Again a regulation of the army says:

"The canteen sergeant is to be under the orders of the committee of officers. His position will be that of steward or salesman, not of contractor, and he is not to be permitted to have any interest whatever in the profits of the canteen. The proceeds of the sale will be handed over daily, by the canteen sergeant, to the committee of officers, and a rent for the canteen will also be charged to cover the cost of maintenance of the building."

Now, one of the things mentioned in the memorial that has been sent to the right hon. gentleman, is that the tradesmen of Regina are discounted in their business by reason of this man having a low rent, or having no rent to pay for the premises. That being the case, he is, of course, in a position to fight on velvet, while other traders have to fight as best they may. I object entirely to the system of giving tickets in the canteens. A man. whether he has money or not, gets his beer on giving a ticket, and the result of this is that many of the men, when the end of the month comes, have no money to draw. It is all gone to the canteen. And when the men go to the payofficer to draw their pay, he brings forward these tickets and deducts their amount, so that the officers of the Government are collectors for the canteen. I entirely object to that system. right hon. gentleman stated what is perfectly true: that a large percentage of the men whose time is up, wish to rejoin the force, but I know whereof I speak when I say that some of these very men rejoin it because of the fact that when their time has expired they have not a cent to bless themselves with, because this system has drawn every cent from them. They have nothing to go out on the world with, and they are very glad to re-enlist. We know very well that when a man can get beer on aredit when a man can get beer on credit there is not the check to prudence nor the check to caution which there would be if they had to pay ready money; and there is a strong temptation for these men to go beyond their income. Now, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman very properly dwelt upon the appearance of the corps; and it was very hard to have my own strong admission as to the ability of the corps, and as to their fine appearance; used as a point against the position I take. Of course, if the reasoning is correct, which was also made by some hon. gentleman, that if a corps has a good appearance and has good form, and if that proves that the man is fit to command, why, of course, if the corps was in a bad state you would have to argue that the man was unfit. But, Mr. Speaker, as a fact, I rather think that the right hon, gentleman a little over-stated the condition of the force before the time Colonel Herchmer took charge of it. Certainly we, in the North-West, never saw any evidence of demoralisation in that corps at all. When there were three or four hundred men in the Territories, without a railway; when the Indians were warriors, when they had not been subjected, and cabbined, cribbed and confined on their reserves, I need hardly say that that force of a few hundred men-not the thousand men we have now-must have been in magnificent condition to do the great work they then did. Of course, I do not contradict the right hon. gentleman, because he is in a position to know, but so far as we have known in the Territories that force has never been in a demoralised condition. If there was any little laxity in 1883, the brother of Commissioner Herchmer, who has really done great things for the force, came down to Regina and very soon set it right. We know, from the example of the British army, that you may have a magnificent force under a very indifferent commander. Take, for instance, the Six Hundred. The man who was torturing the life out of Macaulay to defend him, when Macaulay was Minister of War, the man whom Kinglake, and every writer who has written about war, has utterly condemned as a commander, was the commander of that magnificent regiment, which made that charge of imperishable memory. Every one now admits that Cardigan, the commander of the men who rushed against death and fate in that charge, was unfit. I cannot certainly think that the reasoning of the right hon. gentleman was conclusive, in the respect that a good force is evidence of a fit commander.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. DAVIN. I will come to the question when it is time. Mr. Speaker, I could reiterate the charges that I made against Colonel Herchmer, and give the names of the persons who are ready to prove them. But I do not think that is desirable; I think it would be unwise to do it; and I do not think it is necessary to add definiteness to the case which I have made. I have made definite charges; I have risked my position before the North-West in making them; but I tell you, Sir, in making these charges I have expressed the opinion of the North-West. There is not a newspaper in the North-West that has not supported me in doing so, and my hon. friend the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) has seconded the motion, which was to have been seconded by my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Davis), who was not in the House at the time I made it. fact is, no member from the North-West can vote against the motion, and have a fair chance of reelection. Some hon, gentlemen think they know more about the North-West than I do; but I make these charges with a full sense of the responsibility that attaches to making them. I make them here in a House where these things ought to be dealt with. This House is the supreme inquest in this Dominion, and if it can possibly happen that such oppression, such Russian tyranny, as has taken place in the North-West Mounted Police under Commissioner Herchmer can be maintained in Canada, it is of evil omen for the future of this great Dominion.

Mr. MACDOWALL. As I was the seconder of this motion, I think it is only right that I should say something on this occasion. At the time I seconded it, I explained my position. I did so, as the hon. member has explained, because the At the same time, I stated seconder was absent. the reasons why I advocated the granting of a commission of enquiry into the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer, were that the press of the North-West brought certain charges against him, that the North-West Assembly had reiterated those charges, and that they had been made here by a member of this House on his own responsibility. For my part, I do not know anything about the specific charges which the hon. member brought; but I listened to the debate throughout, and I thought the idea of the hon. leader of the Opposition, that the motion should be cut down. was a good one, because for my part I could not imagine any one desiring to have an enquiry made into the management of the North-West Mounted Police, for every one throughout the North-West, as my hon. friend from Assiniboia has himself said, must acknowledge that the management of that force is most excellent in every way. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) said that in bringing this motion before the House, we were bringing a direct charge against the Prime Minister, as he was the Minister in charge of that force. On that point I take direct issue with him, and Mr. DAVIN.

there are precedents in the English Parliament to support my view. Some years ago certain charges were brought against one of the responsible permanent officers in the War Office, and an enquiry was made into them. The charges were found proven, but the Minister in charge of the Department was in no way affected; and I do not think that this motion implies any reflection whatever either on the Prime Minister or on his very able Deputy. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in the course of his remarks on this question, said:

"I do not see any cause for enquiry into the management of the North-West Mounted Police at large, but if the resolution had been confined to asking an investigation into the conduct of Colonel Herchmer, I would be disposed to favor it."

I myself thought that the easiest way to secure this object was to strike out of the motion the words "into the management of the North-West Mounted Police;" but later on the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) more fully explained the meaning of the words of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He suggested that upon the whole the best disposition that could be made of the matter this Session would be to have a departmental enquiry, and I think myself that that would be the best disposition to make of it. For my part, I have no personal charge to bring against Colonel Herchmer; but I do not take back one word which I said in the previous debate. I believe that Commissioner Herchmer, perhaps from his temperament, or for some other reason, is not the best man possible for the command of that force. I believe, if he is continued in the command of that force, it will become demoralised. At the same time, I believe it is one of the finest forces in the world, and one that every man in Canada may be proud of. I do not know of any serious charge to bring against the character of Commissioner Herchmer, further than this, that I think his appointment was not a very good one, and I think the sooner it is changed the better it will be for the force. Therefore, I am inclined to support the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham, that a departmental enquiry be made into these charges, and that the Government deal with the Commissioner as they think right.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I should not have made any remarks on this subject had not the hon. member from Western Assiniboia singled me out particularly as a member of the Government who should know something of the circumstances connected with his attacks on Commissioner Herchmer. may say that Commissioner Herchmer was an old officer of mine, having for several years occupied the position of Indian agent in one of our most important agencies. I found him to be a hardworking, ambitious, reliable and honest official, and I am certain he is not guilty of many of the accusations brought against him by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia. As the hon, gentleman has stated, I was one of those who recommended his appointment to his present position, when I understood that it was to become vacant, and I did it because of the experience I had had of him, and, also, because of the experience I had had of the force for several years, during the time I oc cupied the positions of Indian Superintendent and Lieutenant Governor. I came to the conclusion that the force required a first-class business man; and, knowing that Commissioner Herchmer had had considerable military experience, and believing, from what I knew of him, that he would make a satisfactory officer for the position, I recommended him. He had been in charge of the commissariat department on the boundary commission, which I understood he had conducted with great ability. The force, which, when Col. Herchmer took charge, consisted only of 500 men, was as capable and as active, and composed of as good men as it is to-The work in the older days was very differ-rom the work to-day. There was more ent from the work to-day. responsibility, then, thrown on the men. were oftener thrown on their own resources. They had to deal with the Indians as they met them, wild from the plains in very large bodies, and on several occasions I had opportunities of seeing what those men and their officers were made of. At the same time, it was well known that there was a certain amount of looseness and want of discipline in the force, and it was thought that Col. Herchmer would make a good man to remedy that. From my knowledge of the force since he has had charge of it, I believe that not only has the discipline been greatly improved, but the business altogether, of the force, has been carried on in a much more satisfactory state than heretofore. As I stated the other night, the cost per day of the men is a great deal less than it was a few years ago. I know that Col. Herchmer, when he took charge, was in this position, that he had to deal with parties in different parts of the Territories who had been doing business with the different officers in those localities, away from headquarters, and where, as the reports only come in at very long dates, a proper, strict supervision could not be kept, such as is exercised to-day; and those men, when they had to do business on business principles, felt—a number of them—very much aggrieved at the action taken by the Commis-That is one of the principal reasons which has led to the strong feeling against the Commissioner, and which, I own, does exist to a very great extent in the North-West Territories. The hon. member has made some very serious accusations against the Commissioner, not only with regard to tyrannical action, but also against his honesty. I believe he has insinuated that he was interested in a canteen started at Regina. That, I believe, is utterly destitute of foundation. I assert that Colonel Herchmer was never interested one single iota in that canteen, and I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that he was. I know Colonel Herchmer too well to believe for a moment that he could be guilty of anything of the kind. One of the hon. gentleman's charges was that while Col. Herchmer has passes, he charged his railway fares to the Government. Well, I have seen a great number of those officers of the police, travelling from one end of the country to the other, and I have seen them, with passes in their pokets, pay their fares, and they have stated that the passes given to them, were given to them as private individuals, and they did not consider they could be expected to travel on those passes. They paid their fares, and I believe that was the proper system to adopt. I believe any man who has received a pass from a railway company and who is a public officer has no business to use that in his public capacity and then charge his fare. If I am not mistaken, the hon. gentleman himself, who made this accusation, travels on a pass, and I personal matter between him and Colonel Herch-should like to know whether he charges his mileage here and gets paid it every year. He has no more business to do that than has any officer of the Dominion a right to travel on a pass and then charge the amount to the Government. The hon, gentleman has stated that he never had any personal feeling against the Commissioner of police. I am quite sure he ought not to have any personal feeling against him, because I am satisfied that on many occasions the Commissioner of Police has treated him, certainly as a friend, and not as an enemy. If I recollect rightly, when the Governor General was up there, and a review took place in the barracks, it was doubtful whether Colonel Herchmer reviewed those troops or the hon, member for West Assiniboia; for I understand he not only reviewed those troops, but also the Governor General and his party, in a buckboard driven by a cayuse, a spotted old horse. So much was the hon. gentleman in the way that he had to be led out of the yard with the sergeant at each side of the pony. If the Commissioner had carried out what was requested of him by the sergeants, the hon, gentleman would have found himself in the guard room, and, therefore, I think he has something to be grateful to Colonel Herchmer for. The hon. gentleman has stated that Colonel Herchmer has prevented his officers from buying at some of these stores at Regina, the proprietors of which objected to his keeping a canteen. Does the hon. gentleman want to make this House believe that the Commissioner has power over his officers to prevent their trading wherever they please in Regina?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Nonsense. Colonel Herchmer has no more power in that respect than the hon. member for West Assiniboia; and I am sure his officers would snap their fingers at him if he attempted to give such an order. I do not propose to take up the time of the House longer, having given my views in regard to the Commissioner. I believe he is an able man. He may, as some gentlemen say, have a little fault with regard to his temper. I dare say he has. I have reason to know that myself, but at the same time I do not believe the accusations made against him. I have no doubt that the hon, gentleman has not been very particular as to the way in which he obtained his information, but I do not believe the Commissioner is guilty, and I for one would be very sorry to see an investigation or a commission granted, such as the hon. gentleman asks for.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Before this question is put, I wish to say a few words. I do not think that the attack which has been made on the hon, member for Assiniboia was a fair attack. I think he has been endeavoring to discharge his duty, and I am satisfied that the opinion of the North West is in accord with his in regard to Colonel Herchmer's conduct in the management of the police force. It is not only the Regina Leader which has taken Colonel Herchmer to task, but every newspaper published in the North-West has been teeming with criticisms, for more than a year, of Colonel Herchmer's conduct. When the hon. member for Assiniboia brought this matter before the House last Session a great many members were under the impression that it was a mer; but where there is so much smoke there must be some fire, and every newspaper in the North-West has been criticising adversely and condemning the conduct of this officer for the last year. The charges, therefore, must be in some respect correct, and the Government ought not, therefore, to resist the appointment of a commission to enquire into the conduct of this officer. I have had sent to me extracts from nearly every newspaper in the North-West. This in itself shows that the action of the hon. member for West Assiniboia is not of a personal character, and that he is not actuated by personal motives, and is not endeavoring to persecute this officer. I will read the quotations I have before me, which I think will show that the hon, member for Assiniboia is discharging a public duty in seeking to obtain redress, not only for the police force of the North-West, but for the people who reside there. There is not a single newspaper in the whole of the North-West Territories which supports Col. Herchmer in his conduct towards the force. Here is an extract from the Saskatchewan Herald:

" COMMISSIONER HERCHMER.

"For a long time complaints have been made against Commissioner Herchmer and his management of the Mounted Police force under his command. In the North they generally took the form of connection with the management of public contracts, but in the South they embrace charges of wrong-doing and tyranny over his officers and men. So serious are some charges that it seems incredible they should have been allowed to go unchallenged so long. But they are so specific and numerous that they establish his unfitness for the position he occupies, and demand investigation. In fact we cannot see how Mr. Herchmer has allowed them to be so often repeated without taking steps to vindicate his character by asking for a commission of enquiry or in some other way.

"The matter has been taken up by the House of Assembly, and their petition for a court of enquiry will in all probability be granted. Messrs. Ross and Secord, who move and second the resolution, know there are grounds for their action; and it is a serious reflection upon Mr. Herchmer that the resolution was carried unanimously.

"The Leader gives the specimen 'justice,' as administrated in Regina."

"The Leader gives the specimen 'justice,' as administered in Regina. In one case, Sergeant Mahony, said to be one of the most efficient men in the force, was fined $30 for saying he would drink no more beer in the canteen; in another, a favored policeman was fined $10 for breaking into the Commissioner's cellar and stealing a quantity of beer; so it would appear that where a man a quantity of beer; so it would appear that where a man drinks beer he can command immunity for the crime of stealing it. The resolution reads:

"Whereas certain very serious statements have been made on the floor of the House, reflecting on the conduct of the Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police; be it resolved, that an humble address be presented through His Honor the Lieutenant Governor to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that the matter be enquired into. Carried unanimously."

That is the opinion of the Saskatchewan Herald.

Mr. MULOCK. A Government organ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I suppose all these papers in the North-West are Government organs. here is the MacLeod Gazette, which is edited by Mr. Wood, a strong supporter of the Government:

Mr. Wood, a strong supporter of the Government:

"Mr. Commissioner Herchmer cannot look back upon the visit of the Governor General to these Territories, and the part that he played in connection with it throughout, with very much pleasure or satisfaction. Commencing at Regina and ending at Banff, he seems to have behaved more like an irresponsible lunatic, unfit to be at large, than in a manner becoming the dignified and cool-beaded commander of a thousand men. On occasions when one might have expected to see a display of cool judgment,
Mr. Herchmer seems to have lost all control of himself, and to have raved like an overgrown school boy. Few of his officers, with whom he came in contact during the Governor's visit, seem to have escaped without feeling
Mr. Somerville.

some of the effects of his ill-temper; and not satisfied with bullying and tyrannising over those who were not in a position to resent it, he even had the impudence attempt to interfere with civilians. If these absurd outbursts of temper had only occurred during the Governor's visit, we might understand them, but they are of constant visit, we might understand them, but they are of constant recurrence.

"The following account of Mr. Hechmer's unpardonable behavior at Banff, published in the Leader, we can vouch for as being absolutely true: 'He (Mr. Herchmer) went up to Banff, and at the ball, behaved as if he was the host. He was insolent to everybody, most insolent to the man he was bound to respect. After the ball, Mr. Mathews (manager of the C.P.R. hotel) had a few friends in a private room, amongst them Mr. Goschen, son of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Pocklington, an English gentleman in the employ of the Government, Capts. Cuthbert, Allen, Burnett and Macoherson, Mr. Baker, General Manager of the North-Western, Mr. Buchanan and one or two others. They heard some furious individual rush at the door, try to open it, then kiek Buchanan and one or two others. They heard some furious individual rush at the door, try to open it, then kick violently at it. It was opened. Herchmer enters in a towering passion, and abuses and insults his officers in the presence of civilians, threatens to get Mr. Pocklington dismissed, threatens even his host, Mr. Mathews, and orders the officers out—ordered, it is said, Macpherson to put them under arrest. His orders were not obeyed. "The latter part of the story we can slightly correct. When Mr. Herchmer first appeared at the supper which Mr. Mathews gave to a few friends after the ball he complained that the Governor General was being disturbed. Mr. Mathews promptly told him that, if the Governor was disturbed, he would no doubt send down word to that effect. Mr. Herchmer had before this ordered his officers to leave the table. He then went away, and returned later on more furious than ever. This time he ordered his officers to either leave the table or send in their resignations, stating that he did not care a d—n which they did, and that at all events they were under which they did, and that at all events they were under which they did, and that at all events they were under arrest.

"It is difficult to find language in which to express disapproval, not only of Mr. Herchmer's action at Banff, but of his whole management of the police force. Both in and out of the force he is the most thoroughly hated and detested man in the North-West Territories. His men hate him; almost every civilian with whom he has ever come in contact hates and despises him. Where he could have made a friend he seems to have preferred to make an enemy. Men who never speak ill of any one find that they cannot control themselves when Mr. Herchmer is spoken of. He has proved himself capable of the most petty meanness; he will listen to tales about his officers brought to him by a constable, and encourages as neaking underhand system of spying and reporting among all ranks. He talks about his officers to outsiders, and discusses his future plans regarding the force with nigger Pullman car porters. He is a man as wretchedly unfit to command the Mounted Police force as could be found in the whole Dominion. He has not the necessary military command the Mounted Police force as could be found in the whole Dominion. He has not the necessary military experience: he has not the ability, and he has not the right temperament to occupy so responsible a position. A commander may be severe, and still retain the respect and esteem of his men. Mr. Herchmer's severity amounts to tyranny and brutality, with no redeeming features, and inspire only loathing, hatred and contempt."

This is not an extract from the Regina Leader, but from the MacLeod Gazette, edited by a gentleman who supports this Government, and who, therefore, ought to have some weight with the First Minister in inducing him to grant this enquiry. Here is another extract from the Calgary Tribune.

An hon. MEMBER. Is that a Government paper?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not know what stripe of politics this paper has, but it expresses the opinion of the North-West, and I venture to say that all the papers up there are supporters of the Gov; ernment of the day, just as the members they send to this House are.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I do not know what the hon, gentleman means by the allusion which he makes to the repressentatives of the North-West in this House, when he says they are always supporters of the Government. The newspapers in the North-West, I believe, are independent, and the members from the North-West are equally independent.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am glad to hear that the hon, member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) is going to turn over a new leaf. I did not know before that he was an independent member of this House. Certainly he has always voted for the Government. Here is the extract from the Calgary Tribune to which I was about to refer:

Tribune to which I was about to reter:

"If the charges brought against Col. Laurence Herchmer, Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police, by the Regina Leader are true, and if Commissioner Herchmer held a commission in the Imperial Service—were he Commander-in-Chief or subaltern—a court-martial would be held, and he would find himself cashiered forthwith. We do not, however, know what penalty is visited upon an officer in the N. W. M. P. for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.' The Leader, in its issue of Thursday last, makes assertions which, if proved, make this officer no more fit to hold the position he does, than the most pronounced hoodlum. But in that paper's issue of Tuesday the charges are more definite, and assume a far more serious aspect. Nine charges are brought, as follows:—

"1. We say he does not know his business, and cannot put the men through their facings without having a slip

"9. With illegally awarding punishment on evidence "9. With illegally awarding punishment on evidence not taken before him, imprisoning men he has never seen contrary to the statute.

"If proved, any of these charges renders Commissioner Herchmer unfit to be in command of any body of men—and if proved several of them are such that Commander Herchmer is not only unfit to hold the position he does, but he is unfit to be an associate of gentlemen. Charges 2.4.8 and 9 are too serious to be believed, and yet it appears almost incredible to believe that a respectable newspaper would bring such charges against a public man, knowing the severity of the penalties that would be entailed, were the charges to prove without foundation, whether they are true or whether they are false, these charges should be made the subject of a most searching enquiry, for the present state of things is a crying scandal to the whole of the Dominion.

If the charges are true, Commissioner Herchmer should be dismissed from the force; if the charges are false and malicious, then should the writer of the articles be punished to the utmost limit of the law. It will be seen that the matter has been brought before the notice of the members of the Legislative Assembly, and one member has made a motion with reference to Com. Herchmer forcing police officers to act contrary to their consciences—a crime of the deepest dye. These charges the member in question, Mr. Haultain, says he is in a position to prove. We sincerely trust he is not. What a state of things to hold up to the world—a commanding officer so base as to force his officers to act against their consciences—subordinates so weak and backboneless that they could allow themselves to be influenced by their superior officer, however blustering or overbearing. The whole affair is very discreditable and requires a strong light to be thrown upon it. We doubt much if Com. Herchmer should continue to hold his position until he has taken steps to clear himself, or the Dominion Government have ordered

Here is another extract from the MacLeod Gazette. I am sorry to weary the House, but I think it is important that the evidence from the Territories where this man presides over the police force, should be out on record in this House, to show that the Government ought to grant this commission which has been asked for by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I will read what the MacLeod

Gazette says:

"The feeling that Mr. Commissioner Herchmer must go is practically an unanimous one throughout the North-West. The Government are fully aware that every charge made against him by the Regina Leader and the Gazette are absolutely true. A strict investigation will prove that such is the case, and it would be a public disgrace to retain him in his present position without such an investigation. It is not altogether improbable that the Government will get rid of him quietly, and so avoid the very unpleasant alternative. An investigation would completely prove the truth of everything that has been charged against him—of interference with police justices of the peace, of overbearing and tyrannical conduct toward both his officers and men, of encouraging a system of underhand spying throughout the force, of incompetency in handling a large parade, of trying and sentencing policemen who have never appeared before him, and upon evidence not taken by himself, of insolence to those with whom he has had business relations, of unfairness and worse in letting contracts, and of generally behaving in a way which shows him to possess an ungovernable temper, worse in letting contracts, and of generally behaving in a way which shows him to possess an ungovernable temper, and to be entirely unfit to occupy his present responsible position. All these things can be proved, and the Government know it. An investigation before a proper tribunal, or prompt dismissal, is what is demanded, not only in the North-West, but in the east. In this demand eastern newspapers of all shades of opinion have joined."

I may say with regard to this sentence, it is a fact that not only the newspapers of the North-West, but the newspapers in the Province of Ontario and other Provinces, after perusing the evidence which has been furnished by their contemporaries in the North-West, with regard to the conduct of this man, have come to the conclusion, that the charges are well founded, and that an investigation ought to be had in regard to his conduct. Here is what another newspaper says, the Lethbridge News:

" THE CHARGE AGAINST COMMISSIONER HERCHMER

"We have no desire to circulate in the columns of the "We have no desire to circulate in the columns of the News scandalous stories in regard to persons occupying official positions, nor do we wish to kick a man when he is down; but in regard to Commissioner Herchmer we think we owe a duty to the public to be silent no longer. Very grave and serious charges have been formulated against the Commissioner, which cannot be allowed to rest without the most searching investigation, unless the Government are prepared to see the discipline and efficiency of the Police Force impaired, if not ruined; unless they are willing to allow the administration of justice in the Territories to become a subject of contempt and disgust.

they are willing to allow the administration of justice in the Territories to become a subject of contempt and disgust.

It has been charged against the Commissioner in the North-West Assembly that he has grossly interfered with the judicial functions of those of his subordinate officers who are justices of the peace, dictating to them the nature of the decisions they were to arrive at, and the sentence to be imposed, and the Assembly has petitioned the Dominion Government to investigate the charge by a Royal Commission.

Nothing that could be charged against a man in Mr. Herchmer's position could well be more serious than this; the justices of the peace in the Territories are called upon to decide summarily in many cases of great importance, and have power to inflict very large penalties and long terms of imprisonment. It goes without saying that unless the people in the country have the most complete confidence in the integrity and independence of the magistrates, the administration of the criminal law in the Territories must be brought into contempt. With even a suspicion that police officers sitting as J. P.'s are not judging of the merits of the case conscientiously and independently, but are biassed by stringent instructions, or what amounts to nearly the same thing, pressing advice from the Commissioner, how can there be any confidence in the honesty or justice in the tribunal?

"Whether these charges are true or not, there should not be a moment's unnecessary delay in the most strict investigation of them. They must be proved true or false; the people must be satisfied that the fountains of justice are clean and pure, and if the Commissioner is guilty of the charges laid against him he must be removed.

Scarcely less serious are the charges made by the "Scarcely less serious are the charges made by the MacLeod Gazette and Regina Leader against the Commissioner of gross misconduct in connection with the late visit of the Governor General to the Territories, and of habitual tyranny and injustice in his administration of the force. The air has been full of rumors and scandals about Mr. Herchmer, but we have not seen fit to notice them before; but now that the public press of the Territories has deliberately accused the Commissioner of gross misconduct, tyranny and injustice, giving instances and details, the matter cannot be allowed to rest without an investigation. It would be a public scandal and disgrace to allow a man to occupy the position of Commismissioner of the Police Force with such charges hanging over him. The Commissioner himself should be the first person to demand an investigation. No honorable man should allow such charges to be made without calling upon the authors of them to substantiate them, or without the territory of the completent tribunal.

upon the authors of them to substantiate them, or without proving their falsity before some competent tribunal.

"We have no wish to prejudge Mr. Herchmer; all we say is that with such serious charges formulated against him, the Government cannot retain him in the position, nor can he, as a man of honor, continue to fill it, without a strict and impartial investigation of their truth or falsity. By all means let us have a Royal Commission, and let it get to work as soon as possible, and we can only hope that Mr. Herchmer can clear himself of the accusations made against him."

tions made against him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what stronger evidence could be placed before this House and before the country, that this man is unfit to hold the position he occupies? The public press of any country is supposed to reflect the opinion of the people, and the opinions of the people are expressed in these extracts which I have read from many of the leading journals of the North-West. I may say that I have scores of other extracts which I could read to this House, giving testimony in the same direction, proving that this man is entirely unfit for the position he occupies, and that the Government ought to grant a commission to enquire into his conduct so as to give confidence to the people of the North-West Territories, that not only the administration of the law will be carried out with justice and with effect, but that the control of this police force will be placed in the hands of a man who is fit to manage a force of men, and who is not carried away by outbursts of passion on every occasion, and who will not allow his personal feelings and spleen to influence him in the administration of his position as head of the police force. Now with regard to the charge made by the member from West Assiniboia with regard to the canteen. I have a letter here written by one of the members of the police force which appeared in one of the papers out there. The Minister of the Interior, I believe, disputes the correctness of the statement made by the member from West Assiniboia with regard to the conduct of this officer in the management of the canteen. is the letter from one of the members of the force. He says:

"An outrageous case which has occurred shows Herchmer as forcing men to pay liquor bills. The canteen has been a curse. That 4 per cent. beer is poisoned with drugs." drugs.

I am not prepared to give evidence with respect to this, but no doubt the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), might give evidence with respect to the 4 per cent. beer. He-continues :

"It knocks a man all out as the worst Montana whiskey "It knocks a man all out as the worst Montana whiskey will not do. It creates a thirst for it as no other liquor will do. No matter how cold, it foams right up, not, I need not say, with the proper head of beer. A man named Henry Vincent Davis joined the force September 26, 1887. He had a staff appointment the whole time. No previous misconduct was against him. Captain Deane once fined him $2 for a little horse play—splashing a brother constable with water. In August he was admonished for an Mr. Somephylle Mr. Somerville.

alleged false statement about a sirloin of meat. It has since turned out his statement was perfectly true. The whole of August this man was boozy, more or less, uded the influence of this 4 per cent. beer. He drew his savings out of the bank and must have spent $100. He was drunk on the last day of August and given two months by Major Cotton. As soon as the Commissioner came to Reginal it was read out in orders that he was dismissed the force, On the 9th of September he was marched to the orderly read out in orders that he was dismissed the force. On the 9th of September he was marched to the orderly room to receive the pay for August. His pay was $21.70, $18.66 was read out for canteen stoppage. Now we have to give orders to the canteen on printed tickets when we go on tick, and the ostensible rule is that the canteen man shall not give more than $5 tick. Davis said he would not pay $18.66 unless his tickets were produced. Captain Gagnon looked for tickets and could find tickets for only $9; so Captain Gagnon closed the book. Next day Herchmer had the man before him and said: 'So you won't pay $18.66? I wouldn't trust you across the room. I'll stop it.' Davis could say nothing. If he said a word he would get extra imprisonment. There was $2.25 stoppage for a pair of overalls by the Quartermaster. So that when this man, whose fault was caused by temptation placed in his way by Herchmer, was turned out of barracks, he had 69 cents. He had to go from man to man begging a few clothes—and this man, if there was any difficulty, would be ready to risk life and limb for Queen and country, for he is a fine strapping young Englishman. "Another case showing Herchmer's interest in collecting beer money: A. Campbell, regimental shoemaker, always had plenty of money. Gagnon read out to him $1.80 for canteen money. He said he did not owe it. He was brought before Herchmer and asked if he was willing to pay it. He said not. He knew that Herchmer would be down on him and he deserted. He was brought before the Commissioner, who gave him twelve months. At the same time Greenway was brought before him for the same offence, and got only thirty days. Eleven months extra for disputing a beer account with Herchmer. The canteen, Mr. Editor, has been a curse, a temptation and a snare.

"When men are in prison look at the way they are

"When men are in prison look at the way they are treated. In the summer, when a batch was sent to water the tyrant's garden, he said to them: 'If you don't do it well I will put you on bread and water.' And even on Sunday they are not allowed to rest, but are made to pipe the head ropes."

I might go on reading extracts without number with regard to the conduct of this man and the management of the North-West Mounted Police. When the opinion of the newspapers of the North-West is so decided, when there is an unanimous opinion with respect to the conduct of this man, there should be no hesitation on the part of the Government to grant the enquiry asked by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It is in in the interests of Commissioner Herehmer himself, in the interests of the people of the North-West Territories, and in the interests of this House and the country generally that an investigation should be made, and that this man should be proved guilty or innocent of the charges brought against him by almost every newspaper in the North-West. The attempt made by some members of the Government, and by some hon. gentlemen opposite, to impute wrong motives to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) with respect to his conduct in this matter, is not creditable, knowing that the opinion in the North-West is solidly against the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer, and that the people in the North-West Territories and the newspaper press of the country demand at the hands of this Government a proper investigation into his conduct. I cannot see how the Government can refuse to grant the request made to have a proper investigation held. It has been stated that the Government should enquire into the matter. It is all very well for the Government to enquire into the conduct of one of their own officers, but such an investigation would not be as effective and satisfactory as an investigation conducted with open doors by a Committee of this House or by a Royal Commission, and, therefore, the amendment proposed by the hon member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) should be supported by every member of this House, I do not care what his political opinions may be, who desires to do justice in the premises and see that justice is done to the people residing in the North-West Territories.

Mr. FISHER. There is a phase of this question that has not yet been touched upon, although some of the facts read by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) had a bearing on it. I find a petition from the Board of Trade of Regina in which there are a number of paragraphs relating to the canteen at that place, and in one of those paragraphs I find a statement in regard to a matter which this House has more or less under charge. Paragraph 8 reads as follows:—

"We regret that the canteen is upheld by the authorities on the plea of discipline. It is instead a standing disgrace to say that in a country almost prohibitory our Government should encourage and foster a beer saloon, right in midst of a body of men whose duty it is to confiscate spirituous liquors, to say nothing of the temptation it is to those young men, many of whom are sent to this country by parents thinking they are sending their sons out of the reach of liquor."

This is a petition sent not by a temperance body setting forth the evils of the liquor traffic, but by a body of gentlemen organised as a board of trade and organised to regulate commerce, and this body declares that this is a standing disgrace to the country. Knowing what I know by correspondence and what I have seen in the public press, it is important that a public enquiry should be held into the conduct of the Mounted Police. I know nothing of Commissioner Herchmer, and I know nothing about any personal controversies regarding him or as to his dealings with the force; but when I find such a statement as this made by the Regina Board of Trade, and which I regret to say is borne out by other statements and letters received from the North-West Territories in regard to the manner in which the liquor traffic is carried on, it is really necessary an enquiry should be made. In this connection it has been suggested that a departmental enquiry would be sufficient to meet the case. It is evident, however, from the statements made by the Minister of the Interior this evening that a departmental enquiry would not be a satisfactory one, for the Minister seems to be quite satisfied with the actions of Commissioner Herchmer, quite satisfied with the conduct of the officers and the manage ment of the force. We can quite understand that a departmental enquiry conducted by gentlemen appointed by the Minister, who is apparently completely satisfied with the position of affairs, would not be one satisfactory to the people of the North-West or the people of Canada at large. But I have confirmation in other ways of the necessity of an enquiry, and it is a confirmation which leads me to believe that the Government are not wholly blameless in regard to the liquor traffic, and, therefore, I would suggest that an enquiry should be conducted either by a Committee of the House or by a Royal Commission. I will read an extract from a letter I have received in regard to this question. The writer says:

"The present state of the liquor laws is most deplorable. Royal (Lieutenant Governor of the Territories) grants permits to all applicants irrespective of what use may be made of same, and hotels are selling right along under the nose of the officials. I enclose a clipping from a correspondence in a Winnipeg paper referring to this point. I can vouch that the report is true not only of this place, but all along the line, and the general impression is that the Government favor the introduction of license, and that Royal is working up the license sentiment for them. As regards 4 per cent, there is none of it sold. There were a few consignments at first, but the wash was a bastard beverage pleasant to no one, and anything further sold has been nearer 40 per cent, than 4 per cent."

This, Sir, is the evidence of a gentleman who was well acquainted with the country, and who was in business, not in Regina, but in a neighboring place, and who knows the position of affairs with regard to the liquor traffic in the North-West Territories. The newspaper clipping which he enclosed to me is the following, and it goes even further than his own words:—

"The prohibitory law supposed to be in force in the Territories is, under the administration of the present Governor, the veriest farce. He has laid down the principle that he has no right to grant a permit to one man and refuse one to another, so he grants them to all applicants. The proprietors of both hotels in this town are now selling liquor with scarcely any attempt at concealment. The modus operandi is to get all the boarders and barroom loafers to apply for permits. The proprietor supplies the permit fee and imports the liquor under the permit. Should the police make a search and find liquor (as was done here not long since), he produces enough of these permits to cover the liquor found, and the police, I understand, are instructed to accept such as satisfactory. Such, certainly, was never the intention of the Act, but the officials, allowing the law to be made a farce of, are designedly, some think, working up a feeling among the people that even straight license is better than the present system (as administered)."

Now Sir, that is a pretty state of affairs to be heard

Now Sir, that is a pretty state of affairs to be heard of in regard to the administration of what is supposed to be, and what has on various occasions been boasted to be, a prohibitory liquor law in the North-West Territories. It is evident from this statement, and from the statement which my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville) read a few minutes ago, that the way in which this law is administered and is enforced by the Mounted Police, is not carrying out the full intention of the law when it was passed. It is true that you can hardly expect the officials there to carry out this law when such encouragement is given them, as that they have a canteen established, as I understand, for selling liquor, right in their barracks at Regina. If a gentleman who controls that force, so far forgets himself as to be concerned in the management of that canteen and the selling of liquor there, as he apparently is, to his own force and to those men who are entrusted with the carrying out of this prohibitory law, it is no wonder that we have the evidence that that law is a farce, and that the carrying out of it is a disgrace to the community, and a disgrace which reflects not only on the people of the Territories, but upon the whole people of Canada, and upon this Parliament, for this Parliament is responsible for the law. I can tell the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, that they are responsible for the fact that this law is evaded in the way it has been.

Mr. DALY. I move the adjournment of the House.

General LAURIE. I cannot conceive what bearing the remarks of the hon. gentleman who spoke last has upon this question which relates to Colonel Herchmer's conduct in the command of his copus.

Mr. DALY. There is a motion before the Chair. I moved the adjournment of the House.

An hon. MEMBER. He is speaking on the motion.

General LAURIE. I would wish to offer one or two remarks on this question. It does appear to me that it is going rather far, that the House should be asked to appoint a committee to enquire into a dispute between a commanding officer and some of his men It is going far beyond the usual practice of the service, and I presume the Mounted Police are dealt with and handled as an ordinary military body. I can quite understand that a complaint of the commanding officer's unfitness to command should be brought up in this House, and that it should be dealt with by the Department. It is right that the head of the Department should make enquiries and report to this House the result of his enquiries; but to press that a parliamentary committee should be appointed is, I think, going further than is necessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a Royal Commission that is asked for.

General LAURIE. I understood that it was a parliamentary committee, but surely this is a matter for departmental enquiry? That, I think, would be sufficient to deal with the case. I certainly think that Commissioner Herchmer, after the way his name has been bandied about, might justly ask that his conduct be enquired into by the Department, but, certainly, a Royal Commission is beyond the needs of the case.

I hope that my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly), who takes such a deep interest in this question, will not press his motion for an adjournment of the debate. I think it is not desirable that the question should be evaded in this way, and I would rather see the amend-ment of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) voted down, than evaded in that style. Now, in reference to what the Minister of the Interior said about myself and the visit of the Governor General, I took some interest of the visit of His Excellency. I accompanied him next morning on to the ground, where he shot, and where he made a bull's eye. I had the honor of dining in his company, and I sat by the side of His Excellency. Of course, Sir, I grant that I drove in a buckboard, and I drove a small broncho, which the hon. gentleman describes as a cayuse, with some contempt. I am not at all surprised that he should regard a cayuse and a buckboard with contempt. I cannot afford to flaunt in a carriage and pair as he can; I did not have his advantages, and if I had had his advantages I might not have made the use of these advantages that he has made. I was not for ten years trying to pick the eyes out of the country; I was not for ten years occupying a high position, and the whole time, with my eyes open, watching how I could fatten my own purse. I was not doing that, and so I can only afford to keep a cayuse, and I can only afford to drive in a buckboard; but, Sir, I would rather drive that cayuse and sit in a buck-board than drive in a carriage and pair, and to feel that the money that bought the carriage and pair had been got in an improper

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. gentleman to go unchallenged. I must ask that they be withdrawn. I think they are most uncalled for. I will not allow any man, par-Mr. Daly.

ticularly the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), to make that accusation against me, without asking him to withdraw it. If he does not withdraw it, I will take means to make him withdraw it.

Mr. DAVIN. That part of my remarks which is unparliamentary, I withdraw. I said——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; withdraw.

Mr. DAVIN. I will withdraw any part of my remarks that is unparliamentary. I said——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentlemen charged the hon. Minister of the Interior with having obtained money to buy a carriage and pair improperly.

Mr. DAVIN. I have not.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That was the direct charge.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, if I——Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. Won't hon. members allow me to withdraw? Mr. Speaker, I state that I did not make that charge. I withdraw that remark, if it is understood so. What I stated was, that I had not made money in a certain way, but if that is considered in any way as a charge against the Minister of the Interior, I withdraw it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I had hoped that after the discussion the other night, on this motion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) might have been satisfied with what I said on the matter, and I am especially sorry to hear that he has followed this up, certainly, in a very hostile spirit towards Commissioner Herchmer. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) has quoted a number of newspapers generally adverse to Commissioner Herchmer, and has used very strong language in respect to him. If you read them carefully, however, you will see that they are exceedingly vague in their statements, and that two or three of them apparently are entirely ignorant of the charges themselves, but quote from the Regina Leader, and say that it is worthy of all credence. I do not say that the Regina Leader is not worthy of credence when it knows the facts which it professes to state; but I am afraid that all these papers have allowed themselves to be carried away by the unpopularity of an officer who strictly performs his duties, especially when those duties are of an exceedingly unpopular nature. To show the animus which pervades these newspapers, you find the statement made which I refuted the other day, that Commissioner Herchmer was utterly unable to put a body of soldiers through their drill, that he had to get a sergeant to help him to do it, that he could not ride, and all that sort of thing? I stated that Commissioner Herchmer was a soldier, who had had four years' service in the regular army, that he had been noted as a good drill at once; that in the first year of his service, when he was hardly note than a require her as a prince of the service when he was hardly note than a require her as a prince of the service when he was hardly as a prince of the service more than a recruit, he was employed as an instructor of musketry at the depot of his regiment, and that he had held subsequently positions in the army showing that his soldier-like qualities were recognised by his commanding officer; therefore, the charge that he could not control a force was absurd in itself. So with the other charges. Now, the amendment of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) is a limitation of the motion of the hon, member for Assiniboia. His motion was that there should be an enquiry into the management of the force as well as into the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer; the amendment is that there should be an investigation into Commissioner Herchmer's con-Well, it is a very serious matter to issue a Royal Commission for the purpose of investigating the character of any officer holding a responsible office. It presupposes that there is a very strong case made out, somewhat in the nature of the finding of a grand jury, before such a commission should be issued. Now, I have the charge of the Mounted Police force in my Department, and I would be unworthy of my position if I allowed an officer in my Department to be run down because he happens to be unpopular, for causes which are not laid before the head of his Department. It has been said that he is such an oppressor that his officers dare not make complaints. that is a charge against the officers as bad as any that could be made against their commanding officer-that they are such a parcel of cravens, such cowards, so unworthy of the name of gentlemen, that they would submit to be treated as no gentleman ought to be treated, and would be afraid to make complaints. They have not made complaints, and, therefore, we must hold that these men, who are holding commissions and worthily performing their duties, have no real complaints to So it is said the soldiers and the noncommissioned officers have been afraid to make complaints. Well, a great number of them have left the force, and they have not yet made complaints against Commissioner Herchmer. So that there has not been any real or substantial com-plaint laid before the Government or the head of the Department from any reliable source whatever. As I stated the other day, I have heard a good deal of Commissioner Herchmer's infirmities of temper. Well, we are not all angels, and his particular failing is, perhaps, an impulsiveness, a too great desire to be a disciplinarian without perhaps the tact of managing and at the same time acting so as not to cause unpopularity. But, with all that, as I stated before, and as my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has stated to-night, he has brought the force into a high state of discipline. They have never been more efficient, I may say have never been so efficient, as they have been since he has been in command. The hon. gentleman says that there was not anything in the statement I made, which I think was a conclusive answer as to the popularity of the force. I stated the other night as a fact that during the last few months out of something like 120 constables and non-commissioned officers, who had served their five years, 75 had re-enlisted for five years more or three years more, I am not sure which, and that a number who had got their discharge and went away had come back after a while and re-enlisted. The hon, gentleman belittled that, and said that it was because they had spent all their money at the canteen. How absurd is that! Those men, while in the force, had looked out for their homesteads and had acquired them; they are not all drunkards; the vast majority of them are respectable, sober men; and even those men who might have been improvident and spent their money during the time they were in the force, every one knows are strong-handed fellows, and that in the North-West they could get employment at once, on the very day they left the force—and my hon. friend behind me says that a great many of them have money in the savings banks, showing that they had been laying up so that after they served their time in the corps they would have a little money to start with on their homesteads. regards the canteen, and the arrangements about it, Commissioner Herchmer is perfectly free from any charge of impropriety, because the canteen was authorised from headquarters by myself, and I approved of it as the best means of keeping the men sober and regular in their habits, for the same reason that canteens are established in every regiment in Her Majesty's service, for the purpose of keeping the soldiery from straying about and getting into low haunts of dissipation, and destroying their morale. The canteen is strictly managed. It is managed by a committee of staff sergeants, men of approved good character and conduct, and who see that everything sold there is, in the first place, of good quality. It is like a co-operative establishment. There is only beer kept there, and that can be only got on a permit from the Lieutenant Governor. So that the canteen is a means of keeping the men sober and regular, and preventing their straying off to all the shops and inns where forty-rod whiskey and every other abomination are sold. With respect to the Board of Trade at Regina, the petition, though professing to come from the Board of Trade, comes from the Council of the Board of Trade. There were, I think, nine present, of whom five voted for the resolution, and four against; and the object of the petition may be gathered from the letter addressed to myself by the secretary of the Board of Trade, enclosing the petition. He gives the following reasons for it :-

"I have the honor, by direction of the Council of the Regina Board of Trade, to forward you a copy of the petition praying that the canteen at the Regina barracks may be closed up at once, as it is very detrimental to the merchants of this town. Some of them are almost dependent upon the barrack trade for their living."

The merchants want to sell the beer and the whiskey, and object very much to these sales being made in the canteen, managed by the men themselves, and where they obtain goods of good quality at reasonable prices—at wholesale prices, I take it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that the meaning of this petition? Or, rather, does it not mean that the men can spend their money in that way, which otherwise would go in the purchase of other goods?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do they not sell

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do they not se groceries at the canteen?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, they have a right to sell groceries. They have the right to buy as cheaply as they can.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not under the National Policy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to that. I would be quite unworthy of my position were I to allow this investigation into the conduct of Colonel Herchmer who, I believe, to be a good officer and a good man, although he has considerable infirmities of temper. The charge is made against him of dealing improperly with contracts. I do not believe a word of that.

I believe all contracts with respect to the supplies for the Mounted Police are sent to the Comptroller, Mr. Frederick White, by whom they are passed, and without the assent of whom not a contract can be given. I was going to say that I would oppose this motion altogether, although I felt there was a good deal to be said for the suggestion of my hon. friend from the West Riding (Mr. Blake) who said that there should be a departmental enquiry; I would not even consent to that, because there is no prima facie case made out for a departmental enquiry, had it not been that Commissioner Herchmer has asked for such an investigation; and it is my intention to order a departmental enquiry. consent only because Colonel Herchmer asks for it, otherwise I would not agree, unless ordered by the House, to have even that enquiry. I oppose both the amendment and the original proposition, and I state it is my intention to have a departmental investigation, at the request of the Commissioner, into all the charges made heretofore or which may be presented against him when that departmental enquiry is undertaken.

Mr. FISHER. I was very much surprised——Mr. DALY. I withdraw my motion to adjourn. Some hon. MEMBERS. You cannot do it now. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He can, for he had no right to make it in the first place.

Mr. FISHER. It is too late now for the leader of the House to make that exception. I must say I was very much surprised at some remarks which fell from the leader of the Government on the subject of the canteen, to which he alluded in such feeling terms. The right hon, gentleman has, on several occasions, spoken about that matter, but has never come out boldly in expressing his views, and those of his Government, on this question of the liquor traffic. A more damaging exposure of mismanagement in the North-West, as regards the liquor traffic, I have never heard. The First Minister told us that he authorised the establishment of the canteen in the barracks at Regina, in order to save the Mounted Police from coming out and getting liquor in the town. But the hon. gentleman must know perfectly well that in the Territories liquor is not allowed to be sold, and these men, to whom he gives this license, are the very men who are the instruments of seeing that liquor is not sold in the Territories. These men are setting the example, by the authority of the hon. gentleman, to the inhabitants, of drinking their beer whenever they think fit to buy it and everything else as much as they like. In that territory in which the hon. gentleman knows it is his duty to Parliament and the country to see that liquor is not sold and to see that the laws of the land are maintained, he gives his authority to have these laws violated, and the very men who ought to see that the law is carried out are encouraged in breaking them.

Mr. LAURIER. It is with some degree of disappointment that I have listened to the remarks of the First Minister on this occasion. I hoped the last time this question was before the House, that, when it came before the House again, the hon. gentleman would be disposed to deal with it in a manner totally different from the spirit he exhibited on this occasion. True, he has consented to a departmental enquiry into the charges made against Sir John A. Macdonald.

Commissioner Herchmer, but he has given his consent, not because these charges have been brought up by a member of this House, not because they are supported by the press and Legislature of the North-West Territories, but simply because the Commissioner has agreed to it. This is the very worst of all reasons that could be given. The best and the only reason for granting the enquiry, is that charges have been made, which are not frivolous. I hope that the enquiry will satisfactorily disprove the charge; but when charges of the kind are made by a member of Parliament, speaking on his responsibility and under a sense of his reputation as a member of this House, and when they are supported by the whole press of the North-West Territories, without distinction of politics, and by the unanimous voice of the Local Legislature, he is entitled to better treatment than the hon. gentleman proposes giving him. If the hon. gentleman had stated, on the charges being made, that he would have a departmental enquiry, I, for one, although the investigation would not have altogether satisfied me, would have been disposed to accede to it. But, under the circumstances, I think the hon, member for Marquette ought to stick to his motion, and have a vote taken. What is the only answer given to-night to the charges which have been brought against Commissioner Herchmer? I say now that I have not the slightest prejudice against Commissioner Herchmer; I do not know him; but he is a public officer; he is not privileged, and he cannot be privileged any more than any other public officer. If charges are brought against him, it is the duty of the Government to have them investigated, and it is the right of that officer, as well as it is the right of the country, to have those charges properly investigated. The only answer which has been made is that the hon. member who brought the charges is animated by some prejudice against Mr. Herchmer. It seems to me that as much animus was displayed in the reply as in the attack; it seems to me that there was as much passion displayed in the reply of the Minister of the Interior as there was in anything said by the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The Minister of the Interior, in one part of his answer, said that all the charges brought by the member for West Assiniboia were untrue, and he specified one of these charges, and defied the hon member to prove it; but, at the same time, he refused him the enquiry. At the same time that he made the challenge, he tied the hands of the hon. member. That is not the way for this House to deal with charges which are made against a public officer. These charges may be untrue. I hope they are untrue; but how are we to decide upon that question? there is no reason to-day for an enquiry into the conduct of this public officer who is charged with these offences, not only by one member of this House, but by the whole voice of the North-West Territories in which he is now serving, if there is no occasion now for enquiry, when shall there be an occasion for enquiry into the conduct of any public officer who is charged with malfeasance of office? I say that, if there is no occasion for such an enquiry now, there never can be any occasion for such an enquiry. The Minister says that no member of the force has complained. That may be a reason more or less good, but if no member of the force has complained, if no officer of the police force has complained, is not the voice of the people as represented in Parliament and in the Local Legislature as powerful as any complaint of an officer or member of the police force? I hope my hon. friend will persist in his motion and will divide the House upon it.

Mr. WATSON. I have no intention of withdrawing my amendment. I am rather surprised that the Minister of the Interior should try to shield his officer in the way he has done. I supposed he would endeavor to shield him, but I thought that, after these charges had been brought by a supporter of his own, he would be willing to grant a commission. As far as a departmental commission is concerned I am satisfied that it would simply amount to a whitewashing of this officer in regard to these charges, whether they are true or false. I do not believe they would ever be properly investigated. We find now that the Minister under whose direction this man is acting says that everything he does is right. find that the Minister who says he appointed him to his present office declares that he does everything that is right. He says that since Mr. Herchmer has been appointed, the cost per man of the police force has been much less than it was before. These arguments are most absurd. It was absurd to use such an argument as that, when we know that all the stores are now taken in by rail instead of by cart, as they were previously. As to the efficiency of the force, which the hon. gentleman has increased under Mr. Herchmer, I contend that the North-West Police force never did better work than they did when there were only 300 men there, when the country was practically a wilderness, when there was no railway communication, and when they were commanded by Major Walsh and Colonel Macleod. I do not think that hon. gentlemen will state that the 300 men who were there at that time did not perform as good or better service than the 1,000 men are doing to-day. The fact that Commissioner Herchmer was a soldier before his appointment to this office has very little weight, in view of the evidence we have had produced before committees of this House within the last few weeks in regard to other military officers, and should not be accepted as proving that he has been doing nothing wrong. that, as we appointed a commission to investigate the charges against another officer high in the military ranks and not without results, which will probably be reported to this House within a few days, we should also have a commission to investigate the charges against Mr. Herchmer. The First Minister says that Mr. Herchmer has asked for an enquiry, and that, if he had not asked for it, he would not grant it, but Mr. Herchmer has asked for a departmental commission of enquiry, knowing very well that it would prove nothing. am satisfied that the country will not accept simply a departmental commission. I must say that I was surprised at the course taken by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), who backed up the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) when he made his motion. That hon, gentleman has evidently been consulting some members of the Government since then, and now he is quite satisfied with a departmental commission. We know that made by many members of this House, and by the North-West Assembly, who voted unanimously that a commission should be appointed to investigate these charges, will be accepted. I have recently seen men high in position in the North-West Territories who have told me that nearly every one of these charges could be proved if a commission were granted. I, therefore, hope that this resolution will be adopted.

Mr. DALY. It was not my intention to take up any of the time of this House,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. A great deal of this debate has been irregular, but the hon. gentleman has already spoken in moving his amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DALY. It was not my intention to take up the time of the House if the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had not referred to myself. He said I should have stood shoulder to shoulder with him. If I stood shoulder to shoulder with the hon. gentleman, in matters which he brought up in this House appertaining to the North-West Territories, I think I should be like our friend McGinty, down at the bottom of the sea. I think this House, from the exhibition that has been made by the hon. gentleman here to-day, will come to the conclusion that so far as the North-West Territories are concerned, they might well say: "Save us from our friends, if we are to be represented as the hon. gentleman has done to-day.' Now, I have no more interest in Colonel Herchmer than any other gentleman in this House. I have told the House upon a former occasion that the only reason I had for saying something on his behalf was to see that justice should be done to him, and that a proper course should be taken in this The right hon. the Premier who is at the head of this Department, in a former debate, stated that he had investigated every one of these charges made against Commissioner Herchmer and found they had not been proven. I would refer to page 2764 of the Debates, where the hon. gentleman spoke as follows, referring to the hon. member for West Assiniboia:—

"All the cases he has mentioned, or almost all, have been enquired into, and in most of them his conduct has been supported; in some of them he has been told that he has been a little too severe, and it would appear that his decisions have been reversed; but on the whole he has proved himself a good officer, his whole soul is in the efficiency of his force, and he has secured that object thoroughly well."

for it, he would not grant it, but Mr. Herchmer has asked for a departmental commission of enquiry, knowing very well that it would prove nothing. I must say that I was surprised at the country will not accept simply a departmental commission. I must say that I was surprised at the course taken by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), who backed up the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) when he made his motion. That hon. gentleman has evidently been consulting some members of the Government since then, and now he is quite satisfied with a departmental commission. We know that it takes a very little to satisfy that hon. gentleman. I hope that the recommendation which has been

Manitoba from attaching any weight to it, and when that hon gentleman says that this investiga-tion will be a farce he is insulting this House, because when the Premier, who is at the head of that Department, says that a departmental investigation will be held, we have a right to believe that, at all events, it will be a thorough investigation, more especially when it is held at the solicitation of Mr. Herchmer himself, who will be called upon to disprove these charges, and I think we may rest satisfied that justice will be done. Now, what are these charges? Is there a single statement that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has made here to-night, or is there a single charge in the paragraphs from newspapers that have been read by one hon. member, that is specific? The charges are general throughout, they are mere assertions. Every paper which has made the charges quotes from the Regina Leader, that is edited by the hon, member for Assiniboia. that there is an animus running through this whole thing from one end to the other. This is a matter of personal spite and spleen upon the part of the hon, member for West Assiniboia. He has been the sewer-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DALY. If I have said anything out of order, I withdraw it. I was going on to say that he has been the conductor gas pipe through which this stuff has been poured throughout the length and breadth of the North-West Territories. He has listened to every little petty charge and has repeated it, to revenge himself against this gentleman, and has spread it broadcast in the Regina Leader, and the press throughout the country has taken up the charges that have been reiterated, one after the other, by the hon. gentlemen and by his newspapers, who have been making a mountain out of a mole hill. We know that the hon. gentleman, with the character of his nation, is only too glad to have a sweet morsel to roll under his tongue, and he rolls it until it grows into, you might say, a large mud ball, which he flings at his opponents. So far as these charges are concerned that have been brought against Commissioner Herchmer, I have not the slightest doubt that since the right gentlemen has stated hon, to-night they will be investigated by the Department, the investigation will take place and that it will be thorough. I am perfectly satisfied, also, that when that report is laid before Parliament, as it will be, we will see that every one of these charges, or at all events, the greater part of them, will melt away into smoke. We will find it made will melt away into smoke. evident, then, that the hon. member for West There is Assiniboia has merely fanned the flame. no doubt in the world, from the manner in which he has addressed the House to-night and from the manner in which he addressed this House on a previous occasion, he has a personal feeling against Commissioner Herchmer. I only ask that hon. gentleman to show towards Commissioner Herchmer the same charity as that gentleman has shown towards him upon several occasions. I am satisfied that if he will extend that liberality to the Commissioner that the Commissioner has extended towards him, and if he will let the Commissioner alone, that gentleman will do his full duty to the satisfaction of the head of his Department. I think that the sole reason for a great many of these Mr. Daly.

charges that have been made against him is that he has done his whole duty only too well. I am not going to take up any more time of the House except to refer to a statement made by the hon, member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). He took occasion to refer to His Honor Lieutenant Governor Royal, and to charge him with granting permits indiscriminately, I am not here to defend Mr. Royal, but I know sufficient about the manner in which those permits are granted to say that neither Mr. Royal nor his predecessor ever granted permits indiscriminately. They are only granted on investigation to the party who makes application for them. Possibly a great deal of the ill-feeling that has been created against the present Minister of the Interior, who was then Lieutenant Governor of the Province, was occasioned in connection with the granting of We know that there are numerous cases of men who have gone to that country for the purpose of avoiding the contaminating influences of liquor. They would write to the Lieutenant Gov. ernor, who would make an investigation, and, upon finding that these men were respectable people, he would send them a permit. When that permit was given, their wives and their friends would write to the Lieutenant Governor to say that these men had come to that country for the purpose of avoiding the temptation to get liquor, upon which he would refuse to continue them the permits, and every man whom he so refused would become his There are now a great many instances of men in the North-West Territories who are hostile to the present Licutenant Governor for that No doubt the gentleman who penned that letter which was read by the hon. member for Brome is one of them. At all events, I was quite amused at the criticism the hon. gentleman made upon the Lieutenant Governor, saying that he was encouraging people to sell liquor in a prohibitory territory. Neither that gentleman nor many more with him could watch every policeman and every individual in the North-West Territories, to keep them from drinking liquor. The hon gentleman said they were selling this 4 per cent. beer in the canteen for the purpose of giving the men a whole-I do not know whether it is some beverage. some beverage or not. Mr. WATSON. Did you ever drink it?

Mr. DALY. I do not drink it. I have no doubt you have. I have no doubt the hon. member is more familiar with red ink, Perry Davis' Pain Killer and other drinks of that kind. I may say that so far as the temperance question is concerned in the North-West, liquor is not prohibited there, and it would take five and ten times the present number of Mounted Police to keep liquor out of that country. When the Lieutenant Governor stated that these men were able to get this liquor in Regina, he was stating what the member for West Assiniboia will not deny, he cannot, that liquor can be got in Regina, it can be got anywhere in the North-West Territories, notwithstanding the very great fines that have been inflicted upon men for bringing it in and selling it there. I will say to that hon, gentleman that it will be well for him to go up and see that country and to investigate these matters, before he comes here to take the position of being the only temperance man in this House. We have the hon, member for Lanark (Mr. Jam ieson), and the hon. member for Queen's, N. S.

(Mr. Freman) who are probably as great temperance men as he is; they have heard the debate here to-night, but we have not seen them getting up and taking exception to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman and the Minister of the Interior. We know that in times past, in this House, they have taken a position on the temperance question in opposition to that of the right hon. gentleman, but they do not feel called to do so in this instance. In reference to this investigation which the hon. gentleman has promised, I am satisfied that it will be thorough. It is in the interest of the right hon. gentleman himself as the head of the Department, it is in the interest of the Department, it is in the interest of Commissioner Herchmer himself, to have the investigation. As I have said before, my only interest is in seeing justice done to Commissioner Herchmer and justice done to the force. It has been stated by the hon, member for West Assiniboia and by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) and not been denied, that this force is in an efficient condition; that being so, the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer cannot be subversive of discipline, but it is subversive of the discipline of that force that these charges should be published throughout the length and breadth of that country and upon the floor of this House. I say it is in the interest of the force itself and in the interest of Commissioner Herchmer, that an investigation should be held at once, that it should be thorough, and I have no doubt, after the promise made by the right hon. gentleman, that it will be so held, and that it will be thorough.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Before the debate closes I wish to say a few words following the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly). He says that both the hon, member for West Assiniboia and myself have spoken of the efficiency of the force, and that the fact of my having spoken of the efficiency of the force was evidence that the charges of the North-West Assembly and of the member for West Assiniboia were untrue. Now, Sir, I think that he was illogical in that statement. What we meant to say was that the material of the Mounted Police force could not be excelled anywhere. I believe at the same time that some of the officers in the Mounted Police are as good officers as can be found anywhere. The right hon, gentleman has promised us a departmental enquiry into the conduct of the Commissioner and into the charges brought against him. For my part, I am perfectly satisfied with that course. I believe it is a proper course to take, and I am perfectly certain that such an enquiry will be carried out in a proper spirit, and that the right hon. gentleman will be guided by the results of that enquiry. I will, therefore, vote for the motion for the adjournment.

Mr. MULOCK. During the course of this debate hon. gentlemen opposite at one time during the speech of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made a demand upon him that I think was not a fair one. The hon. gentleman was speaking of certain information he had received, and hon. gentlemen opposite demanded from him that he should give the name. Now, I do not understand a member of Parliament is compelled or expected or under any obligation to give the name of an informer if he choose to rely upon the information, take the responsibility of giving that explana-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no such rule as that.

Mr. MULOCK, I say that a communication so given to a member is to this extent privileged, that you have no right to ask him to give the name, or, if he refuses, to comment on his refusal; otherwise, it will be impossible for grievances to be made known by persons who would shrink perhaps from having their names published. The hon member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) has boasted here of his independence, and I think we have on former occasions within very recent time had an opportunity of judging how far he is independent. believe we were told by him a short time ago, just as we have been to-night, that, in regard to a certain transaction, there was no foundation for it whatever; and yet when, by force I may say, this House issued a proper tribunal to make an enquiry, it came out that the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) was entirely in error.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I think the hon. gentleman has made a mistake. What tribunal has been issued, and what decision has been made by that ${f tribunal}\ ?$

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman desires me to refer to the matter I will do so. When the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) made charges against a certain officer, the hon. gentleman for Saskatchewan stood up and declared there was no foundation for those charges.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I think I was perfectly justified in the course I adopted.

Mr. MULOCK. I cite that as an illustration of what an unsafe adviser the hon. gentleman is, when we see him to-night declaring that he will be satisfied with such an enquiry as the Department proposes to make, an enquiry that will be, according to the admission of the First Min-ister himself, an enquiry to defend itself. I was pleased at the chivalrous words that fell from the right hon. the First Minister. He said that the officer accused was in his Department, and that he would be unworthy of the high position he occupied if he did not rise to defend him. think it was his duty to defend his officer, and I am glad the right hon. gentleman has acquired so much chivalry, because a year ago I remember another hon, gentlemen spent two hours, an hon, member behind me says two days, in attacking an officer under the Government. But the First Minister never rose to defend him. He allowed him to be attacked during two hours, to be within the mark, and although I asked the First Minister if he had nothing to say, or if the Minister of Public Works had nothing to say, not one of the whole baker's dozen of the Cabinet rose and said a word in his defence. I will now state why I am not satisfied with the proposed enquiry of the Minister of the Interior, irrespective of what I have already stated. The hon member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), when the matter was up before, said this was an attack on the head of the Government and upon the Government, and he would vote against it, as it amounted to a declaration of want of confidence in the Government. That is an unfair position in which to place the question, but if hon. and if he pleases from his place in the House to gentlemen opposite say that is the proper light in which to construe this proposed enquiry, it is perfectly clear we cannot have a Government enquiry by the Government in regard to their own conduct. Then the Minister of the Interior has pre-judged the case, and he has disqualified himself from giving an unbiassed decision. He has stated that these charges are wholly foundationless; and if he has disqualified himself, how much more has the First Minister done so, for in the most unqualified way he declared that this gentleman whose conduct is criticised is incapable of having committed the acts with which he is charged, and that he has not done so. The First Minister is not going to have an enquiry to show that his whole opinion of this man's character is wrong, that he is entirely mistaken, that he at his age is so poor a judge of human character as to have been mistaken. No. The First Minister is going into this enquiry for the express purpose of whitewashing his own officer, feeling that he himself is charged. I say, then, it is due to the officer in question that his conduct should be tried by an independent tribunal. Let no person misunderstand my position in voting for this enquiry. I have not allowed my mind to be in the slightest degree prejudiced against the Commissioner by any of these circumstances. I do not attach any importance to these ex parte statements, but I repeat that his usefulness as a public man is gone unless his conduct is investigated by an independent tribunal that will conduct this enquiry openly and publicly and allow all parties to appear and prove the charges if they can, and, if they fail to do so, to have this officer reinstated in the good opinion of the people, which is his due. fore, say that inasmuch as the hon. First Minister and the Administration generally have by their action displayed prejudice, they are not to be considered as disinterested persons, and it is, therefore, necessary that an enquiry should be conducted by disinterested persons under such sufficient guarantee as will entitle the witnesses to be examined under oath, and in order that the public generally may tender evidence. A departmental enquiry is an enquiry of a friendly character, it is one in which no evidence is taken under oath; and how, therefore, can it be an enquiry in regard to facts which are in issue? These charges are not going to be admitted. There will be a conflict of testimony. How, therefore, can an effectual enquiry be carried out by the Department? Such a proposition is not a satisfactory one to the country or to the cause or to the officer in question, and I deplore, for that reason, that when an hon. member of this House, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), chooses to take upon himself the odium and the onus of pressing for such an investigation as the hon, gentleman proposes, he should be made the party accused. Some hon, gentlemen have sought to turn the whole debate against him. Just as we know the counsel in a case turns against his fellow counsel, when there is no other defence. I think that the conduct of those who have criticised the conduct of the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is not worthy of the occasion. is not just to the hon. gentleman, it is not just to this Parliament, it is not fair that when any hon. gentleman, in a sense of duty, wishes to take upon himself in the interest of the country, an unpleasant task that he should be attacked, and that hon. members of this House should feel, that what the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) Mr. MULOCK.

in discharging their duties to their country, they render themselves liable to be ungenerously treated in this House, and, doubtless, by those opposite, outside this House.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It think it is important that the House should be put in possession of the time when Commissioner Herchmer made application to the First Minister for an investigation in regard to these charges. I would ask the First Minister if he will state to the House the date of the letter which was sent by Commissioner Herchmer to him, asking that an enquiry should be made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not got the letter here. I do not remember the date.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Was it previous to this debate in the House or since?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has long ago been said that he would be quite willing to have the matter investigated.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The First Minister stated that he had long ago received a request from Commissioner Herchmer that an investigation should be made in this matter. His memory must enable him to say whether that has been sent before the commencement of the debate in this House, or

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will be able to tell the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon, member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) in opposing the amendment of my hon. friend for Marquette (Mr. Watson) has made a speech, which I think, when he reflects on it, he will be ashamel of. It was an ungenerous attack without the least provocation, because when I commented on his argument, I dealt with his argument, and in analysing his argument, I spoke as one gentleman might speak of the argument of another, and I spoke as a friend. The hon. member however gets up, and without a shadow of foundation, he makes the suggestion that, in some way or other, I had received some favor of some kind from Commissioner Herchmer. I state, Mr. Speaker, from my place in Parliament, that there is not a tittle of foundation for any such statement. It is a statement for which he has not the least justification, and it is made with the same recklessness in which he vented his surmises against the legislative assembly in the North-West, in his previous speech. Sir, the hon. gentleman from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) is a man of humor, I do not know that I can call him a man of wit; his repartees nearly always take the form of some personal fling, and when my hon. friend the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) interrupted him during this debate, and told him there was no foundation whatever for saying that the members for this House had been refused anything by Commissioner Herchmer, he at once said that, "I did not say that, but if the cap fits you, you can wear it,"—a most refined, a most delicate sally. It stamps the cap fits you want to the cap man hon, member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) as a man of quick wit and ready repartee and as one capable of being an ornament to any assembly, And, Sir, to-night, what does this hon gentleman do, who I thought was a personal friend of mime? The hon. gentleman finds it necessary to get up, not to defend Mr. Herchmer, but to attack me for doing properly describes as a most unpleasant duty. Does any man suppose that it is a pleasant thing for me to be opposed to the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government? What can I gain by taking a course which the right hon. gentleman is opposed to, and when he is opposed to it, it means his whole party.

An hon. MEMBER. Not all of them.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; because he has great influence, and properly great influence over his party.

Mr. McMULLEN. With one exception.

Mr. DAVIN. No; there is no exception. The right hon. the Premier has as much influence over the man who is speaking now as he has over any of his party. I may tell you that if the frowns of the right hon. gentleman have any terror for me, it is only because of my affection for him. It is that alone which arms that frown with terror for me. But, Sir, I say that nobody can have influence over me to the extent of preventing me doing my duty in this House. I have a duty to perform and I do not care how it may result to myself. I can parody the words of Edmund Burke and say:—

"I know the map of Canada as well as any man, and I know that the course I take does not lead to preferment." But, Sir, I am taking a course to do my duty, and when I do this, my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) who, in a sense, comes from the West, and who shows to-night, as he has shown before, that he knows nothing about this question, comes forward to throw unworthy and foundationless flings at a man that he ought to consider and regard as a colleague. The other day I treated him very differently. The other day he came to me and to other North-West members; he wanted to organise a deputation of remonstrance to the Minister of the Interior. I and others agreed to go with him; I agreed to make that remonstrance, and what did the hon. member do? He funked and fled like a coward.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DALY. I wish to make a personal explanation.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DALY. I rise to the question.

An hon. MEMBER. Don't interrupt him. Wait till he is finished.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was quite ready to go with the hon. member, but as I say he went to Montreal, and we heard no more about the deputation.

Mr. MULOCK. What was it about?

Mr. DAVIN. It does not matter now, but I want to show the way I dealt with him. The hon. member for Selkirk said that there is nothing specific in the charges I made. Why, Sir, any one who followed my statement knows that I did make specific charges, and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) who was a little defiant, said, notwithstanding, that while there were some general charges, some of them were so specific that they ought to be taken into account. Yet the hon member for Selkirk gets up and he has summoned audacity enough—I do not think that is too strong a word to use—he has summoned audacity enough to stand up and say there were no specific charges, when the evidence to the con-India.

trary is recorded in Hansard. The hon. member also quotes the right hon. the Premier, who said that some of the charges had been investigated. and some had been found not to be true. Of course, it is implied by that that some were found to be true, and I believe that it is a fact that some of the decisions of Mr. Herchmer have been condemned by the Department and have not been allowed to be carried out. Now, Sir, I repeat that I have no personal end or aim in this course I am pursuing. I am expressing the opinion of the Territories. That is my sole object in doing this unpleasant duty, and when I, so to speak, find myself like Ajax defying the lightning, I think it pretty hard to see the issue abandoned, another issue sought to be raised, a red herring to be drawn across the scent and the mind of the House diverted from what is really before us.

Mr. DALY. I desire to make an explanation. The hon. member says he agreed to come with me on a deputation to the Minister of the Interior, and that I funked it by going to Montreal. I desire to say to the House that such is not the fact. It was on Saturday, I think, that I saw the hon. gentleman, and on Sunday I received a telegram at 9 in the morning, asking me to go to Montreal. I went there expecting to get back on the Tuesday, but, unfortunately, I was detained and did not get back until Wednesday. When I was in a position to go with the other members, the hon. gentleman was not to be found, and that is the reason the hon. gentleman did not come with me.

Mr. DAVIN. That is not so. When the hon. member came back from Montreal, I asked him what about the deputation, and he never said a word whether he would have the deputation or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. It would be very interesting to some of us on this side of the House who have listened to this discussion if these hon. gentlemen would tell us what all these troubles were about, and what this remonstrance with the Minister of the Interior was for. Were they refused a favor? Was my hon. friend opposite ambitious for a position in the Department of the Interior? It has been said they were both ambitious for it, and thought the hon. Minister ought to have stepped down and out and given them the place. I think they would gratify some gentlemen on this side of the House if they would take us into their confidence and tell us what all these troubles are about.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 15th April, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAVERS.

ALIEN LABOR BILL.

Mr. TAYLOR moved:

That the Select Committee to whom was referred Bill (No. 8) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract of agreement to perform labor in Canada, have leave to make a special report.
Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. BLAKE. When the proposal was made for a Select Committee with the object which the First Minister stated, I then suggested that it would be necessary to give special instructions to the Committee. I am glad to observe that that proposition is now recognised ex post facto, although I think it should have been accepted in the first instance. I agree that this is the best way to remedy the defect in the instructions, and that the motion ought to pass.

Motion agreed to

Mr. TAYLOR. I now beg leave to present the report of the Committee.

OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS presented the first report of the Select Committee to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House.

CRIMINAL LAW.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 65) further to amend the Criminal Law. (Sir John Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This section was allowed to stand, in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), in order that it might be redrafted. But on comparing it with the original Act, I think, it will answer all purposes and had better remain as it is.

On section 6.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask the Committee to reconsider section 6, for the purpose of adding a sub-section. The object of the amendment is to prevent cases, which may possibly occur, of penalties being inflicted on females who have committed the offence under constraint or fear; and the way in which I propose to deal with this, is by providing that it shall be discretionary with the court or judge, to inflict punishment or not in such cases. These are the words I propose to add:

Provided that if the court or judge is of opinion that the female accused was a party to such intercourse only by reason of constraint, fear, or dures of the other party, the court or judge shall not be bound to impose any punishment on such persons under this section.

Mr. BLAKE. I must confess I have some apprehension that this is hardly likely to efficiently serve the purpose which I suggested for the consideration of the hon. Minister. I suggested the case in which a female of tender years—and it is upon such that this offence is committed—who had succumbed under the influence of fear, would be exposed to the penalties of the criminal law. I am not, however, at the moment, prepared to propose any more adequate remedy than the one proposed by the hon. gentleman, but I confess my objections are not completely removed.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice whether it would not be better that the female offender should not be punished. As a rule, she is always a person who is more or less under the control of the male offender. Such cases as have come to light, are cases of assault of the father upon the child; and under such circumstances, if you make her liable to punishment, she might be advised not to give evidence which would incriminate herself. The end of justice, which is to punish for any infamous crime, would be best served if the male offender were alone punished.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.. No doubt, in most cases, the rule proposed would be a just one, but, not by any means, in all. There have been some cases in which the female has been guilty in as high a degree as the other party to the offence, and of perfect competence as regards freedom from restraint or duress. I had, when introducing the Bill, a letter from a very high authority stating there was one notorious case—and I mentioned it in moving the second reading of the Bill-in which the father lived in this condition with his daughter, and they had a number of children. They defied all remonstrances and threats on the part of the In such cases, the only possible anthorities. means of preventing the continuance of the offence would be to punish both.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me the example does not at all justify the theory, because it is evident that the father must have obtained authority over the child when of tender years, and have kept that authority.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But if she is now of age and the mother of a large family of children, she is responsible.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, but she must have been debauched and demoralised at an early day. It is impossible to suppose this offence was committed except on one of tender years, who was unable to resist, or unaware of the gravity of the offence. remember a case in Montreal, some twenty years ago, in which the father had taken advantage of his daughter, some twelve or thirteen years of age. His children were brought up in such a state of immorality and degradation that it would be hard to visit any criminal intent on the child.

Mr. BLAKE. I would submit for the consideration of the Committee, and especially of the Minister, that we have to deal with the balance of conveniences and inconveniences, and with the balance of difficulties on one side or the other. the great bulk of cases, I think it will be admitted, that you have but one criminal, and, if the chance of bringing that criminal to justice in the great bulk of the cases is going to be diminished by a law which makes the other party, who is not substantially criminal, liable to fourteen years' imprisonment, are we not, for the sake of the exceptional case to which the hon gentleman has alluded, and in regard to which the observation of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is of cogency, that this must have commenced by the criminality of the male, taking away our chances of punishing the criminals in the vast majority of cases?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that the danger of a suppression of the evidence is removed by the penalty which is provided. This seems to he the only way by which to stop the offence, to let both the offenders know that they are liable to punishment. I think that is safer than it would be to declare that the female shall not be punishable under any circumstances.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to join my protest to that of my hon, friend from making the female offender subject to a penalty in this matter. I followed carefully the remarks of the Minister of Justice, but it did appear to me that the one point upon which he laid most stress was that, where these parties were defying public opinion and defying State and Church together, by continuing to live together, there was no way of preventing it except by making both parties liable to penal servitude for a term of years. If the male offender is subject to this punishment, it seems to me that there is no necessity for inflicting the penalty on the female offender. If, in addition to the natural reluctance which such parties would have to bear testimony, you add the punishment, even in the modified form which has been suggested for the female, you will, I think, interfere with the ends of justice. I know that the Minister of Justice is anxious, as we are, that this horrible brutality, which has, I am sorry to say, occurred too frequently of late years, should be stopped, and I go with him so far as to think that imprisonment and flogging should be inflicted on the guilty party; but I believe the guilty party to be, not in nine cases out of ten, but in 999 cases out of 1,000, the masculine offender.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When this takes place under the form of marriage, both parties can be convicted by evidence apart from themselves; but, when the crime is committed without the form of marriage, the only evidence which would be conclusive would be that of one of the criminal parties; so that, if you shut the mouths of both, you will rather defeat the ends of justice than assist them. I would suggest whether, in that case, it would not be better to let the woman go free, so that you will ensure the right to obtain her evidence.

Mr. CURRAN. I think the very fact that the woman would give evidence would be a guarantee to the court and jury that she was not guilty, and would ensure her acquittal. I sympathise entirely in the views of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and his colleagues. I am sure we are all of the same opinion. To my mind, we are making a big step if we adopt the views of the Minister of Justice; but I should like very much to see that in all cases where the offence has not been committed under the form of marriage, the female should be considered innocent.

Mr. BLAKE. It is possible that we may be drawing an Act here which will defeat itself in the What is going to be done great bulk of cases. when you are indicting one or other of these two persons? First, you indict the man, who is generally the principal offender. The woman will not be bound to criminate herself; it would be extremely unlikely that she would run the risk of doing so. My hon, friend says she would be held not guilty.

Mr. CURRAN. The presumption of the court would be that she is not guilty.

But we are dealing with the Mr. BLAKE. probability of advancing justice, of securing the condemnation of the really guilty party, and when the woman is liable to be placed in the dock on account of the commission of this outrage on herself, by her own relative, it may be, you cannot impress upon her a calculation of chances that by giving her evidence, though proving herself Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), as to the inexpediency of guilty, she may yet be making a door of escape.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will let that clause stand.

Mr. BERGIN. I would like to recall the attention of the Minister to section number 2, of his amended Bill. If it is at all like the original Bill, it is likely to do very serious damage in the country. Now, if this becomes law, as it appears here in the original Bill, no man will be safe to take employment in any mill or factory in this country, where females are employed, because, at any moment he would be liable to blackmail; in any quarrel, or any ill-feeling, or any spite on account of his refusal to raise the wages, or to give them holidays, he will be liable to be victimised by a bad girl, or two or three bad girls, who may associate together for that purpose. I think the Minister would do well to reconsider this clause, I think the and to make it less broad than it is. It is not confined alone to the superintendent of a factory, but it extends to any one who is employed with females, who has anything to do with the control or the direction of a female in the factory in which she is employed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to find that my hon. friend has taken exception to this clause. I pointed out this very objection when the Bill was under discussion in its original shape, and I have not altered my views at all. I think the Bill is very severe upon the proprietors of mills, upon the managers of factories, and the workmen employed in them. If the Bill is a necessity at all, it should go a great deal further, and include all females who are employed by men, whether as housemaids, or cooks, or servants, or typewriters, or shop girls-or any class of that kind. I think it is unfair to place a certain class at the mercy of what my hon, friend has described as loose women, and leave another certain class perfectly free. must again reiterate the objection to the second section of the Bill in its present form. Either there should be less of it, or a great deal more.

Mr. BERGIN. I must correct the statement of my hon. friend, who describes as loose women those employed in factories. Of course, where there are a large number of women, five or six hundred, or a thousand, it would be very extraordinary if there were not some impure women amongst them. But I do not think any one ought to characterise the girls employed in factories as loose women. As a fact, I believe they are as virtuous a body of women as there is in the community. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Northumberland, that if this Bill is to apply only to factories, it is a reflection upon the character of girls employed in labor, to their very great disadvantage. I quite agree with my hon. friend, that this Bill, if it becomes law, ought to be applied to other classes of women who, as he says, are employed as housemaids, or cooks, or shop girls, or typewriters, and Government clerks as well.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to put my hon. friend right. I certainly did not class the girls employed in factories as loose women. I meant to say, that there is in every community certain loose women, and my hon. friend referred to the fact that there ought to be protection against loose women. I did not for a moment pretend to convey the imputation that the class of girls employed in workshops or factories are of loose character. As my hon. friend says, there are in all communities women of that class. I think, with him, that this section either goes too far or it does not go far enough. Either protection should be given to all women in the employ of any person, or the section should be struck out altogether. It is my belief, that we would best conduce to the morality of the country and to the prevention of what, I fear, will be a very serious ground of trouble, by striking out the Bill altogether, for there is an element of blackmail contained in that section of the Bill that this House ought not to legalise.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject was fully considered the other day, and the Committee divided upon it. I am not able to modify my views in regard to it, but hon. gentlemen will see, from the reprint of the Bill, that the section has been modified since its introduction, by allowing the testimony of the accused person to be given in all cases and requiring corroboration on the part of the prosecution. If hon. gentlemen desire the Bill to be more stringent and to apply to a larger class of female employees, let them draw a clause to meet the case and I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If women thirty years of age require protection where they are employed, either in factories or mills, girls and women employed in domestic service, in the Civil Service, or in any kind of employment equally require protection. Under these circumstances, I contend that either the Bill should go further and be made applicable for the protection of all women as against their employers, or else this clause should be struck out. I move that section 2 be struck out.

Mr. BLAKE. I suggest to the hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), that his motion would be inconclusive; but he should wait until the Committee report, and move his motion with the Speaker in the Chair. We have already divided once on this provision in the Committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to allowing the matter to stand over until Mr. Speaker is in the Chair.

On section 16,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose the addition of the words "or a fine of $500."

On section 18,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On moving the second reading of the Bill I explained the object of this provision. I stated that it had been asked for by various labor organisations, who understood that the law at present was not sufficient to exempt them from punishment in the simple case of refusing to work. The present law with respect to trade combinations is this:

"No prosecution shall be maintainable against any person for conspiracy to do any act, or to cause any act to be done, for the purpose of a trade combination, unless such act is an offence punishable by statute."

The amendment I propose is simply this:

No prosecution shall be maintainable against any person for conspiracy in refusing to work with or for any employer or workingman, or for doing any act or causing any act to be done for the purpose of a trade combination, unless such act is an offence punishable by statute.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it considered to be the law at the present time, that a combination among workingmen, agreeing not to work in any particular capacity or in any particular employment, is an offence against the law? It seems to be a new offence against the law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Members of trade organisations have been so advised, but that is not my impression as to what the law is. My impression is that they were not indictable for a conspiracy unless the combination was for something beyond that, and included, something in the nature of intimidation, coercion, or the boycotting of a person who does work. But if there is a simply agreement among the men, in accordance with their rules, that they will not work for an employer, it does not render them liable to punishment. They have been advised accordingly, and they have also been advised to the contrary; and, under these circumstances, I think it is well to say that they are not liable for a simple refusal to

Mr. MITCHELL. Under these circumstances, I think there can be no great objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. Minister. I have never understood that workingmen were liable for a refusal to work, and I am glad the Minister agrees with me, although a different opinion has been given. I think it is quite proper that workmen may combine and agree among themselves that they will not work at any particular rate of wages for any particular set of individuals, if they confine the combination to that. I do not think there should be any penalty for that, and I am glad to find from the hon. Minister that under the law there is no offence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am keeping words which are in the statute and which in the Bill I had omitted, namely:

" For the purposes of a trade combination."

What I called attention to, in moving the second reading, was, that the Bill as asked for would have the effect of rendering non-punishable certain conspiracies to commit offences against the common law, although the words of the first and second lines:

-"member of a trade combination," as I thought, went far in restricting offences to those punishable by statute. We have confined the wording to:

-"does any act or cause any act to be done for the purpose of combination."

Mr. BLAKE. My opinion is, that the revision of the statutes has effected a very serious and prejudicial alteration of the law, in respect to the particular class of transactions to which this law was devoted. For my part, I was apprehensive, when I saw the clause in the shape in which the hon. gentleman proposed it, and heard the reasons which he gave, that the diminished efficiency which the law has, under the Revised Statutes, would be altogether removed. I am, therefore, very glad to see that, whatever be the prefatory changes, the hon. gentleman has, at any rate, resolved to leave that diminished efficiency intact. My own impression is that the original efficiency, ought not to have been impaired; that the reference to that particular class of offences with which the Revised Statutes deal, and which was originally dealt with by prior legislation, to which I shall refer, should remain, and that the whole and entire vigor of the exception which was made as to statutable crimes should be preserved. In order that the position which I take on this subject may be apprehended, I will have to trouble the House with a brief statute which we have on this subject is 35 Victoria, chapter 31, passed in 1872, which was a law with reference to threats, violence and molestations. It provided as to certain defined acts, which were the acts it was thought expedient to make punishable specifically--certain defined acts arising in the connection of workingmen with one another, and maybe, of employers with one another—and it made these acts punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for not more than three months. There were provisions in that statute for the prosecution, under the procedure for summary prosecutions, by justices of the peace out of sessions; and a power to appeal was given. There was, also, a very proper provision that the master, or the relative, or connection of the master, should not sit as a justice of the peace in such prosecutions. That Act was not found satisfactory, and in 1875, by 38 Victoria, chapter 39, that law was repealed and other specific provision was made, which, however, in itself was unsatisfactory. In the following year, 39 Victoria, chapter 37 (1876) was passed, for which, being at that time Minister of Justice, I happen to be responsible. Now, by the first section of that Act, the Act of the previous year was repealed, and by its second section the repeal of the first section of the original Act, 35 Victoria, was continued, and for it was substituted a more satisfactory section, as I conceived, and as Parliament approved. That new section dealt with the matter as affecting the relations of men generally, and not of particular classes of men, and it applied to these relations certain conditions which were constituted into crimes. Certain particular kinds of offences, now often called boycotting, and particular cases of a marked and defined offensive character, relating to intimidation by threat or otherwise, were specified. They were made offences, and it was provided that they should be punishable by the alternative of fine or imprisonment, summarily; but that, instead of there being an appeal, if the accused party objected to being tried before the summary tribunal, the case should forthwith be treated as an indictable offence and prosecuted as such accordingly. Then the fourth section established for the first time the law as it stood until the Revised Statutes, with reference to this particular subject of conspiracy, and its provision is that to which I particularly wish to draw the attention of the Committee and the Minister of Justice. The fourth section provided:

"That no prosecution shall be maintainable against a person for conspiracy to do any act, or to cause any act to be done, for the purpose of a trade combination, unless such act is an offence indictable by statute, or is punishable under the provisions of the Act hereby amended; nor shall any person who is convicted under any such prosecution, be liable to any greater punishment than is provided by such statute, or by the said Act as hereby amended, for the act of which he may have been convicted as aforesaid."

Is that the original efficiency, ought not to have been impaired; that the reference to that particular class of offences with which the Revised Statutes the deal, and which was originally dealt with by prior legislation, to which I shall refer, should remain, and that the whole and entire vigor of the exception which was made as to statutable crimes should be preserved. In order that the position which I take on this subject may be apprehended, I will have to trouble the House with a brief reference to the statutes as they stood. The earliest

Therefore, the law of conspiracy was abrogated, as to trade combinations, except in this particular class of offences defined, and in all cases of such graver offences, as are offences indictable by statute. Any conspiracy, then, for purposes of a trade combination, to do an act punishable only at common law, or punishable by statute under summary procedure, was no longer criminal and remained no longer capable of being prosecuted under the law of conspiracy. If it were one of these minor offences, not raised to the gravity of an offence indictable by statute, if it were a minor offence punishable summarily, it was swept out of the law of conspiracy altogether, if done in concert for the purpose of a trade combination. Such was the law, and so it stood and gave satisfaction until the Revised Statute passed; but in the Revised Statute, I find, an alteration was made, and it reads thus:

"No prosecution shall be maintainable against any person for conspiracy to do any act, or to cause any act to be done, for the purposes of a trade combination, unless such act is an offence punishable by statute."

So that you no longer have the protection, as to the gravity of the excepted offence, which existed up to that moment. All offences which are punishable by statute, even though of the most trivial character, and punishable in the lightest way and by the most summary procedure, are once more, by the Revised Statute, drawn within the wide net of conspiracy, even though they are things done for the purposes of a trade combination. This is a distinct enlargement of the exception, certainly not contemplated by me when I proposed the legislation, or by the Houses of Parliament which passed it at that day; and you will readily perceive that, having had a special interest in this legislation, I was surprised when I found that that diminished protection which was still awarded by the Revised Statute it was proposed further to impair by substituting offences punishable by law "for offences punishable by statute." I am glad we are going back thus far, but I hope we shall go back still further; I hope that all the protection which was given, and advisedly given, against the effects of this obnoxious law of conspiracy by the Act of 1876, will be restored by Parliament, and that the attempt—I do not know with what design-for all I know, it may not be a designed attempt—to diminish that protection and to enlarge the exception, will not, now that the attention of Parliament is called to it, be persisted in, but that we shall find Parliament disposed to restore in its full vigor and efficiency the Act of 1876. Now, Sir, this law of conspiracy is a very wide law. I declare that the alteration which has taken place renders it impossible to say how small a matter may not now be punishable as a criminal conspiracy, and introduces lamentable uncertainty into the operations of trade com-I have extracted a statement made by a very eminent legal authority, an ex-Lord Chancellor of England, in one of the very latest debates in the House of Lords, upon the subject of the law of conspiracy, and I will trouble the House by a perusal of it, inasmuch as it shows how wide is that net which the law of conspiracy spreads in order to catch the subject. Lord Herschell said this:

"I think exaggerated importance has been attached to the expression criminal conspiracy." Many most excellent people have been guilty of criminal conspiracy without Mr. Blake.

being deserving censure. The law of conspiracy is a wide net spread by the law of our country. An agreement between two people to commit a trespass is a criminal conspiracy, for it is to do an unlawful act. An agreement between husband and wife to smuggle goods into this country would make them guilty of criminal conspiracy, for it would be an agreement to do an illegal act. When I come to this subject, I get a little uncomfortable, for I am not sure that when I visited the United States I was not guilty of criminal conspiracy myself. It has been held that any combination to avoid the Maine Prohibitory Liquor Law is criminal conspiracy. I have a recollection of going to a watering place where the prohibitory law was enforced. The landlord of the hotel was not allowed to supply spirits for payment, but promised to obtain them for his customers. There was an item in my bill under the head of 'sundries' which covered the cost of the spirits, and I am afraid the innkeeper and I were guilty of criminal conspiracy. Any noble lord who has had experience of the criminal courts will know the length to which the law of criminal conspiracy has been carried. I am not prepared to say that any agreement to do an illegal act, or to do a legal act by illegal means, is not a criminal conspiracy. There is a case which is an apt illustration of my contention that there may be criminal conspiracy, even to boycotting, without much moral blame. There is a case now pending  in which it has been held that an agreement to boycott was an illegal conspiracy; and I apprehend that every illegal conspiracy by highly respectable steamship companies to treat people in a certain manner and so effect their trade. Although these companies may be guilty of criminal conspiracy. I am sure they will not feel themselves morally to blame."

Now, Sir, what I want to press is this: that, as the

Now, Sir, what I want to press is this: that, as the law stood as the Parliament of 1876 passed it, we abstracted altogether from the operation of the law of conspiracy, all acts done in pursuance of trade combinations, which did not fall within one of these two categories: first, that the act was indictable by statute, and so in its nature a grave offence, and, second, that the act was one of the offences specified in the statute itself, and which were particularly germane to the question of trade combinations. For anything outside of these, that the parties combined to do, they were free from being prosecuted for conspiracy. The revision of the law has changed that, to the detriment of the efficiency of that protection, by substituting the phrase "punishable by statute" for the phrase "indictable by statute," and has, therefore, permitted the application of the law of criminal conspiracy to acts, trivial and minor acts, done in pursuance of a trade combination, though those acts be not either indictable by statute or within the range of the specified crimes enumerated in the What I ask the Committee and the Act itself. Minister is that the efficiency of the protection which was given in 1876 shall be restored, and that a form of words shall be adopted which will accomplish that result.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are dealing with a class of offences in respect of which labor organisations, or, as they are known by statute, trade combinations, feel apprehensive of inefficient protection under the laws which allow them to be formed. The legislation is restricted entirely to such trade combinations. The particular case in respect of which the apprehensions of these trade combinations exist, as I stated to the Committee a few moments ago, is the indictment for refusing to work with or for any employer or workman. In respect of that, the amendment which I propose completely covers the case. It declares that they shall not be liable for refusing to work with or for any employer or workman. On reviewing the clause which I had drafted for that purpose, but which was not as wide as the one I propose, the labor organisations passed resolutions and memorialised privately, by circular, members of the House, asking that the Bill should be amended in the direction in which I have framed this amendment. They were willing to accept the provision in the Bill, provided I substituted the word "statute" for the word "law" in the last line of section 18. But I have gone a step further, and, in order that their request be satisfied, I propose to declare that in no case shall they be prosecuted for refusing to work with or for any employer or workman. It seems to me that in doing that I meet the practical difficulty which has arisen, and I comply with the request of those who have considered this question fully for the last few years, and who are most concerned in it, the trade organisations themselves; and I may say to the House that they have not merely considered it from their own point of view and their own knowledge of the law, but they have been carefully advised as to every question which might arise out of it. Under these circumstances, I hope the hon member for West Durham, after having stated the views he has expressed, and having explained what his view is as to the distinction in the law prior to the revision of the statutes and now, will not press the Committee to widen the provision which I state to the House; and the House will be already aware, from the requests they have had from the labor organisations, meets every practical emergency which has been suggested, and meets to the fullest extent the requests made.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I retain my very strong opinion that a very important protection to the labor organisations in the exercise of their power of combination has been removed, and that their position is extremely impaired; but after the hon. gentleman's statement that he has had communications from the labor organisations, and that they have informed him that they are perfectly satisfied with this legislation, I shall not now be wiser for them than they are for themselves.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the labor organisations scarcely apprehend the distinction which has just been proposed by my hon. friend from West Durham. It is certainly a very important difference, though technical, and probably on that account overlooked by the organisation; and if the attention of the organisation had been called to it, they would have only been too glad to avail themselves of the more stringent protection suggested by my hon. friend.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The very section which is now proposed—and I ought to have mentioned it sooner, out of deference to the hon member for West Elgin—is the proposition he submitted to the House last year. I think he did so at the request of the labor organisation. I know, that after the Bill was introduced by him, delegates from the labor organisation waited upon almost every member of the House and requested their support for the Bill. But the Bill was not introduced early enough to reach all its stages. Delegaces from a number of these labor organisations met members at the beginning of this Session, and requested that some such clause should be adopted. I proposed the clause which is in the for all their purposes. Since the Bill was introduced, they have issued a circular, to which the hon, member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) drew my attention yesterday, and a copy of which I received this morning. That circular contains the following resolution:

"Be it resolved, that we ask that Sir John Thompson's Bill to further amend the criminal law be amended by inserting the word 'statute' in place of 'law.'"

In addition to that, some eight or ten delegates, representing all the trade and labor organisations, waited upon the First Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Marine and myself, the other day, and made the request that the simple change should be made in my Bill of inserting the word "statute" for "law." I think the section I have proposed will be an improvement, and gives them further protection even than that; but considering, as the hon. member for West Durham has said, that it meets the request put forward by these organisations, and, as far as I can see, meets all the practical difficulties, it would be well to rest content with that much for the present, at any rate, unless a practical case is put forward calling for a change.

Mr. CURRAN. Judging by the observations of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), it would appear as if there will not be as much protection as formerly. What we must also take into consideration is the fact that these organisations are advised by legal gentlemen outside, whose views are very different to those expressed by hon. gentlemen here. I have often myself, when conversing with these people, found that points which appeared very clear to me, were taken exception to by them, under advice given them elsewhere. The hon, the Minister of Justice has met the request of these people on their own ground, and, perhaps, to some extent improved upon it. It is probably well to give them what they ask.

Mr. BLAKE. When I was called upon to legislate on this subject, I gave what I thought was right.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have given, not only what I thought was right, but more than they asked, and do not propose to give any more.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am to a certain extent satisfied with the clause introduced by the Minister of Justice, for I feel it is going in the direction of granting the relief which the labor organisations require; but I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that in the report, Mr. Elliott, the president of that organisation, in referring to the clause introduced by me last Session, stated that clause was introduced so late and the clause was so crudely drawn that it would not meet the acceptance of the labor organisations. The Minister of Justice, however, has accepted the clause, as I introduced it last Session, which the president of the organisation said would not suit their purpose, and he ought to remove the crudity with which it is encumbered. I would further recommend him to have communication with Mr. Elliott, so that he may get the approval and endorsation of Mr. Elliott. If the clause was so crude and unsatisfactory when it emanated from my hands and appeared upon the Order paper in my name, I cannot understand how it could have improved so very much by emanating from the hands of the Minister of Jus-Bill, and they distinctly agreed to that as sufficient | tice. I suppose the organisations of trade and labor are very honest and sincere and candid, and I should judge the Minister would do well to reconsider the matter, and see whether the clause merits the approval of Mr. Elliott.

Mr. BLAKE. I read that correspondence, and I must say I formed the conclusion that the real opinion of Mr. Elliott was that it was not the clause that was crude, but the hon. member for Elgin.

On section 21,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose merely to make a verbal amendment, by adding to line 10 the words "by the defendant." This is necessary for the meaning of the clause.

On section 22,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This embraces two important provisions. In the first place, it provides that the appeal from summary convictions shall be to a judge alone, and not to a judge and jury. The hon member for Queen's, P.E.I., called attention, the other night, to the fate of appeals made against convictions under statutes, concerning which public sentiment is strong. Revenue cases form a very remarkable class in which convictions are continually defeated, by the effect of public sympathy. The principle upon which, I think, appeals of this kind should be regulated is that, as there is no jury permitted in the court of first instance, it is illogical that there should be a jury in the more efficient court to which the appeal is taken. The other clause is intended to meet the difficulty of obtaining the presence of witnesses on appeal, when the original conviction has taken place on their testimony. I have mentioned cases which have occurred in British Columbia and elsewhere, where convictions have taken place under the Indian Act, for selling liquors to Indians, for bringing liquor on the Indian reserve, and others; also cases under the license laws and under the Canada Temperance Act, where the conviction before the magistrate has very frequently taken place on the testimony of witnesses whom it is almost impossible to keep in the country without imprisoning them. It is, therefore, provided here that, when the testimony has been taken in writing and signed by the witness and certified by the justice of the peace, that evidence may be taken on the appeal. In answer to the observation of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), as to the obvious danger of the evidence being taken by the justice of the peace in a very crude form, I have endeavored to provide against that by stating that it shall be taken in writing and signed. It seems to me that, in that way, we remove as far as possible the danger of the evidence being taken loosely or carelessly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I retain my original opinion. I thoroughly approve of the change which the Minister has made in taking away the right of trial by jury on an appeal. One or two magistrates might try the case, but when it was appealed, either party was allowed to have a jury, though the tribunal was supposed to be more efficient. I am not satisfied, however, that the hon. gentleman is wise in introducing the proviso at the end of the section. There may be individual cases in which it might be desirable, but, when you pass general legislation to meet individual cases, you are apt to go wrong. In the vast which enables prisoners to be transferred from one Mr. Wilson (Elgin).

majority of cases tried before the unpaid magistracy, the evidence is taken in the most imperfect form, and the magistrates are not bound to take it in writing at all. My experience is that, even where the evidence is taken in writing, it is merely transcribed as a memorandum. I would suggest to the Minister that he should insert the proviso:

Provided that the court appealed to is satisfied that the personal appearance of the witnesses cannot be obtained.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the word "cannot" is rather strong, but I will agree to I think the word this amendment:

Provided that the court appealed to is satisfied, by affidavit or otherwise, that the personal attendance of the witness cannot be obtained by any reasonable efforts.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do you propose to allow testimony as to the credibility of the witness in the court below?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The courts have held the contrary. I know of cases where an unscru-pulous party has left the country, so that his evidence could not be obtained in the appeal court, and the court would not permit any evidence as to his credibility.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps, before the Bill goes through, the hon. gentleman will call my attention to any such case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have raised the question myself.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills), that two cases have come within his own experience, should be a sufficient reason for guarding against that danger.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. After the word "not," in the 33rd line, I propose to add the words, "either as to the credibility of any witness or as to any other fact material to the enquiry."

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I now call the attention of the Committee to section 25, which introduces the practice of taking a statement for the opinion of the court, and I propose to add the following as sub-section 14:-

Where, by any special Act, it is provided that there shall be no appeal from any conviction or order, no proceeding shall be taken under this section in any case in which such provision of such special Act applies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand now, after reading this section more carefully, that it will not come into effect at all unless rules are made by the court of appeal under Act 2 Victoria, chap. 40. I understand that if no other rules are made by the court, the section will be practically dead. That being the case, the opposition I intended to offer, I will withdraw.

It is dependent on Sir JOHN THOMPSON. the judges. I now ask the Committee to return to the notices of amendments that I gave, and I may explain briefly, first as to section 30. to assist the Committee, that the first two are the sections which are introduced at the request of the Provincial Governments of Ontario and Nova Scotia, and are in accordance with Provincial legislation on the same subject. Section 30 is an extension of the provision in the Revised Statutes.

prison to another; and this will provide that when an offender has been sentenced, he may, by order of the Governor General, be transferred for the remainder of his term of imprisonment to any industrial school of the Province. The next section provides that he may be directly sentenced to an industrial school, subject, of course, to the control of the Provincial authorities who may find, at any time, that a school is overcrowded. We propose to act with their consent. In the case of a transfer from a prison to an industrial school, the consent of the Provincial Government In regard to the 31st section, I may state that the Halifax Industrial School is a Protestant institution to which the Police Court in the city of Halifax has power to send offenders. This will extend the power to the whole Province: boys may be sentenced there from any part of the Province. The Provincial Legislature is making arrangements with the municipalities to provide for the maintenance of the boys after they go there. Everything will be conditional on the municipalities making arrangements for their support.

On section 33,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. St. Patrick's Home in Halifax is a Catholic institution. It is proposed to extend the provisions with respect to it from the Halifax Police Court to the whole Province.

On section 37.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This provision is to amend a provision in regard to St. Patrick's Home. In 1887, an Act of this Parliament was passed allowing the ticket of leave system with respect to boys in St. Patrick's Home in Halifax. passed at the instance of the manager of the institution, and, to a large extent, was an experiment, and the experiment has been found to succeed very well. The provision of the statute with respect to ticket of leave is simply this: that when a boy has been sentenced to the institution for a certain length of time, he may receive a ticket, signed by the superintendent of the home, the magistrate who committed him, and the Minister of Justice, authorising him to go at large; and it contains a provision that it is subject to revocation at any time when the boy commits an offence. The managers of the institution, however, think it necessary that a further amendment should be made in this direction: that when a boy who is allowed to go at large, is found to be incorrigible, he shall be subject to serve the rest of his sentence without being formally convicted again. We propose, therefore, to amend it in the direction of allowing the magistrate to issue his warrant immediately on the application of the superintendent of the home; but I propose to leave it discretionary with the magistrate as to whether he will issue his warrant or not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This section is giving excessive powers, and might be liable to abuse. There is no limit as to time. A boy may have been out of the home for years, and there is nothing the manager of the home is called upon to do, except to declare that he has reason to believe that the boy has misconducted himself. The boy may have left Halifax and gone to St. John, or Montreal, and the superintendent may have received application, and yet the information may be exaggerated and wrong. Great injustice may be done, and some check should be provided. If the superintendent of the home lays his information, declaring he has reason to believe that a boy who has a ticket of leave has misconducted himself, that boy should be brought before the magistrate, who should hear and determine on the information, and not commit the boy back to the home unless he is satisfied that the information laid is correct.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a provision in the Revised Statutes on the subject, which meets the hon, gentleman's objection to some extent. It must be remembered, however, that the boy is out on a ticket of leave; and moreover, the institution is conducted by a religious order, on the most humane principles. The statute contains a provision limiting the age at which boys can be placed there, and limiting the term to five years. The provisions with respect to tickets of leave, may be found in chapter 183.

I may call the hon-Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) gentleman's attention to the fact that section 70, sub-section 2, to which he has referred, does in a certain sense make provision for the contingency I anticipated might arise. But the section he introduces now eliminates all these checks. Of course, no Minister would arbitrarily withdraw a license; he would make proper regulations to see that justice would be done to the boy, but errors might arise.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the Minister whether he makes any provision for the period of time over which the Minister and the magistrate may excise control of a boy? Is the time limited, or is this power to continue during the whole life of the boy? It seems to me that if there is no reason for cancelling the license within a specified period, there ought to be no right to continue the punishment. Suppose a boy has served out half of his time, and more than half the remaining period has expired. I do not think the Minister and the magistrate should have power to order the boy again back to prison.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it is quite clear, that under these circumstances they cannot send him back at all, because the sentence would have expired, and there is a provision which says that the sentence shall run from the day it is imposed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there should be some provision for a judicial enquiry upon the second representation of wrong-doing, before he is Suppose the sent back to the reformatory. parents, or the relatives, of a boy think he is badly treated, there is no provision to meet that case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We can make that discretionary with the magistrate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the rights of the parties ought be determined by law, and not left merely as matters of discretion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the Minister should provide, that before a boy is re-committed, there should be some investigation to show that the information laid by the superintendent of the home is well founded. There may be the utmost good faith in the party laying the information, information on which he may make a bond fide but he is speaking of a boy not under his immediate control, and such extraordinary powers are liable to abuse. The boy should have an opportunity before being re-committed, of excusing or explaining the charges made by the superintendent, and showing grounds why he should not be re-committed. The hon. Minister has sufficient knowledge of humanity to know that facts are exaggerated and distorted, and sometimes assume a different shape after a person has made an explanation. I think there should be some enquiry before a boy is re-committed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will ask that this clause should stand over until I have an opportunity of considering the hon, gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. LAURIER. I notice that the ticket of leave can be put an end to on the information of the superintendent that the holder of the certificate is "misconducting" himself. That is a very general term and very undefined. Is there anything which explains what this "misconduct" would be?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is not, but I will look into the matter carefully. The next clause provides for escapes from industrial schools, and for misconduct in these schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that this clause is scarcely consistent with the recent judgment of the Court of Appeals; that where there is any violation of a statute, the Provincial Legislature shall state what the punishment shall be. Now, the Minister not only provides that those who escape shall be punished under the authority of an Act of Parliament of Canada, but also under the Act of the Legislature of any of the Provinces.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not see anything unreasonable about that. The violation of any statute is punishable by the Legislature which passes it; but it seems to me not unreasonable, when the Local Legislature has provided a place of detention, for this Parliament to step in and provide that it shall be a misdemeanor to escape from that place.

On section 18,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The addition which I propose to add to this clause is intended to define what constitutes valuable security. Section 2 of chapter 164 in the old statutes gives a definition of valuable securities, which includes receipts. That definition, before the revision of the statutes, extended to all the statutes; but in consequence of the transposition of the statutes and their separation in the revision, that definition no longer applies to the Act relating to threats by which money or valuable securities are extorted. In a recent conviction in the Province of Quebec, the article extorted by threats was a receipt, the point was reserved, and the court decided that a receipt was not a valuable security in the meaning of this Act, although it was in the meaning of the Larceny Act.

Mr. TISDALE. In the first part of the section, the valuable securities consist of securities whether in Canada or other British possession, or any foreign state, but in the latter part of the section, dealing with titles to lands or goods, nothing is defined as to where they may be situated. In Ontario, some years ago, a question was raised by Mr. Davies (P.E.I.)

way of demurrer, whether the land being in the United States, the title deed came under the Larceny Act, as there was nothing in the Act to show where the land was to be.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would add the words: "wheresoever the lands or goods may be situated."

On section 19,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The section I propose to add to this is a provision for the taking of evidence in a foreign country in a criminal case, and it is proposed that the judge of any superior or county court having criminal jurisdiction, may, on information being given him that any person who resides out of Canada is able to give material information relating to the pending case. appoint a commission to take the evidence upon oath of such person. The procedure will be as nearly as possible the same as that which prevails in civil

Mr. TISDALE. The evidence should be presented before the jury as nearly as possible as it is given. Question and answer should be taken and fully transcribed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Should this not be made applicable to Canada also, so that a person residing in British Columbia, for instance, could be examined by a commission in a criminal case pending in Nova Scotia?

Committee rose and reported progress.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In view of the strong expression of opinion in the House this afternoon in regard to section 6, I propose to exempt from punishment the female, and have remodelled the section in that sense. I also propose to drop section 37.

Bill, as amended, reported.

Mr. BERGIN. I give notice to the Minister of Justice that I shall move an amendment on the third reading.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Buttons of vegetable ivory, horn, hoof, rubber, vulcanite or composition, 10 cents per gross, and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BECHARD. When the Committee rose Saturday morning, I thought it was understood and agreed by the House that when the Committee sat again, those hon. members who did not secure an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon the imposition of a duty on imported flour, would be allowed to do so. Therefore, with your permission, I wish to make a few observations on that part of the tariff. During the debate which has taken place, it has been said by some hon. members who sit on the ministerial benches, that the increased duty upon imported flour does not increase the price as long as we produce in this country a surplus of wheat. I must confess frankly that for many years I, myself, adhered to that theory as being sound, and I considered it a safe rule whereby a man could be guided in his appreciation of questions of this kind. But experientia docet, and facts on several occasions have demonstrated that that rule, like many other rules, although pretty good in its general application, is not without exception, and is not infallible. Now, Sir, we import into this country a large quantity of flour for home consumption. During the last year ending 30th June, according to the official documents placed in our hands, we imported for home consumption, 258,813 barrels of flour, for which we paid the sum of $1,000,301, and we paid in Customs duty, besides, the sum of S129,407.15. Now, Sir, who paid that duty? Surely it must be the consumer or the producer. That flour was imported from the United States, and I think the opinion which is entertained by hon gentlemen opposite, that that duty was paid by the American producer to the Canadian Government, is inadmissible. The price of flour in the markets of the United States is not determined by the demand for the article in the Canadian market, but is determined by the demand on the markets of the world, and principally in the British market. Therefore, when a Canadian importer wants to buy flour in Chicago, for instance, he has to pay for that flour the price which it is worth there, and when he enters that flour in Canada, he is obliged to pay to the Customs the duty imposed on that flour by the Canadian Government. But he does not lose that duty; that duty is refunded to him by the retail merchant to whom he sells the flour, and who, in his turn, is refunded that duty by the Canadian consumer. If, in this case, the duty was not paid by the Canadian consumer, how could it be pretended that the imposition of such a duty promotes the interest of the wheat producer in the western part of this country? Perhaps I may receive the answer which I have often heard given in this House before when questions of this nature were discussed, that the benefit to the Canadian producer comes from the fact that the duty secures to him a larger control of the home market. But, Sir, that control of the home market is secured to the home producer by restraining foreign importation by means of a Customs Now, I ask, what advantage, what benefit could the home producer receive from the imposition of a Customs duty, intended to secure to him the control of the home market, if it does not at the same time increase the price of the articles consumed in the home market? Sir, I believe that this duty is paid entirely by the consumer, and that the opinion that the producer pays the duty, is in this case, at least, an absurdity. Sir, I protest against the increase of the duty upon flour, and in fact against any duty imposed upon that article which is a prime necessary of life. Flour should be admitted into this country duty free, but when a specific duty like this is imposed upon flour, the duty becomes unjust and oppressive, as it taxes the bread of the poor as much as it does the bread of the rich; it taxes the bread of the poor workingman who earns it by hard daily labor, as much as it taxes the fine wheat bread of the rich man who has the means of enjoying the delights of life and of the far niente. But why is this duty imposed? Certainly it is not for the purpose of revenue. We have a large surplus of nearly two millions of dollars; the necessities of the revenue do not, therefore, require an increase of that duty upon that necessary of life. That duty is a blow dealt at the Province of Quebec in particular. It is well known that Quebec is not a wheat-producing country. A large number of farmers do not sow wheat at all and prefer to buy their flour. Spring season is late there; the farmers cannot sow wheat sufficiently early to ensure a safe crop, and the wheat crop is a very uncertain one. Hence a very large number, probably the great majority of the farmers of that Province, do not sow wheat at all, because they find it more profitable to purchase flour. In some localities it is sown in small quantities, and sometimes there is not sufficient raised to produce the flour required for the farmers' consumption. The whole importation of flour in the Dominion last year for home consumption was 258,813 barrels. Of that quantity Quebec imported for home consumption 199,816 barrels, or about four-fifths of the whole impor-For that flour the Province of Quebec paid $749,138, on which a duty was imposed of $99,908. Supposing the importation to reach the same quantity during the present year, the duty paid at the increased rate proposed would reach $149,862. I repeat that this duty weighs more heavily upon the people of Quebec than upon the people of any other Province in the Dominion, and this duty, instead of being increased, should be entirely removed. During the Session, we have been informed that the hon. the Finance Minister received deputations from the millowners of the country, who presented their claims and submitted that their profits were so small that the duty on flour should be increased. The hon. Finance Minister agreed to their representations, and he now proposes to impose heavy sacrifices upon the people for the benefit of that class of manufactur-If the farmers of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces also should choose to send delegates to interview the Finance Minister, and ask him to do something in the direction of giving them protection in compensation for the many sacrifices imposed upon them by this Government, I wonder what the Finance Minister would answer to them. Doubtless, he would tell them that they receive protection in the home markets for the sale of their horses, cattle, sheep, hay, potatoes, and many other articles of farm produce. He would add that the Government had imposed an increased duty on imported meats, and thereby granted them a high degree of protection. But the farmers would not fail to reply to him: "Sir, you come very late with your duty on meats; the protective system has been in operation 10 or 12 years, and up to this time you never thought of imposing such a duty in order to stimulate the production of meat in Canada. But when you pretend that you give us protection in horses, cattle, sheep and other farm products, you are mistaken. We of the Eastern Provinces do not import them, because we do not want them; on the contrary, we export them in large quantities. You cannot give us protection in respect to those articles. With respect to horses, sheep and cattle, only British Columbia, the North-West Territories and Manitoba import any quantity of them, and they do so because it is cheaper to import them from the United States, lying on the frontier, than to buy them from Ontario." They frontier, than to buy them from Ontario." They would no doubt add: "You cannot give the farmers of this country any protection whatever, to compensate them for the heavy burdens imposed upon them; that is beyond your power; and the only thing you could do would be to secure the farmers good foreign markets where they could sell their produce with advantage. That is the only thing we ask, and we have a right to expect it from you." But of all the foreign markets where Canadian farmers can sell with advantage their produce, certainly the most advantageous is the market of the United The official documents prove that nearly one-half of the produce of the farms of Canada is exported to the United States; and that nearly fifty per cent of our whole commerce is done with that country, notwithstanding the double barriers which have been erected on both sides of the line to impede that trade. But hon, gentlemen opposite do not want that market opened. To-day they are opposed to reciprocal free trade with the United States. During two or three previous Sessions when we were discussing this question, those hon. gentlemen agreed that they were in favor of reciprocity, but they limited it to the exchange of natural products. But this year they told us very frankly that they do not want reciprocity even to that extent. In former years, and in 1878, those gentlemen preached the National Policy as a means of securing reciprocity. Now they maintain protection with a view of preventing reciprocity with the United States. I am glad to see that the question will be placed squarely before the people at the next election. Hon. gentlemen opposite will go before the country maintaining the National Policy, whilst the Liberals will go to the people upholding the flag of reciprocal free trade between Canada and the United States. That will be the battle ground where the forces of both parties will meet. I have reason to believe that the Liberals may have full and complete confidence in the result of the conflict.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the Minister of Customs state why this specific duty is imposed?

Mr. BOWELL. There is a specific duty at present on buttons. If the hon. gentleman will turn to section 71 of the Tariff Act, he will find that buttons, vegetable ivory and horn, are dutiable at 10 cents per gross and 25 per cent. ad valorem. Buttons made from other materials have been added to this list, making all bear the same rate of duty, and the reason why these qualities or kinds have been added is because they are now manufactured in Berlin, or in the County of Waterloo, very extensively. The protection which was formerly given to the other class of buttons has induced the manufacture of the class added to the item, and they have been placed on the same rate of duty, purely for protective purposes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am out and out opposed to a specific duty. You cannot impose a specific duty without doing an injustice to the cheaper quality of goods of the same kind. Now the common button to go on an ordinary coat will pay a specific duty, the very same as a button worth ten times as much, and consequently, I object to a specific duty on the ground that it strikes at the goods which are used by the poorer classes, and relieves to an extent, the wealthier Mr. Bechard.

portion of the community, who buy a better class of goods. It is the same in all lines of goods; specific duties are unjust. I may say this, and I hope I will be permitted to add to what my hon. friend behind me said; that, in my humble opinion, the Opposition in this House, in the face of the statement of the Government that they had a sur. plus last year and that they expect a surplus next year, will not be discharging their duty if they do not oppose at every stage, every single increase that is proposed by these resolutions. I contend that the Government have no right whatever to ask the sanction of this House, and particularly the sanction of the Opposition, to increases of duties, in the face of their declaration that they had a surplus last year and will have a surplus next year. By what right do you ask us to consent to this increase of duties imposing additional taxation on the people? I repeat that, in my humble opinion, the Opposition are not dis-charging their duty to their constituents, or to their country, or to the principles to the principles they hold that burdens upon the people shall be sufficient only to meet the annual demands upon the Dominion treasury, if they permit these resolu-tions to pass which increase the drain upon the resources of the people. Although it has been shown that when the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches were in Opposition they declared that the Government of the day had no right to a surplus, and that my hon. friend in front of me (Sir Richard Cartwright) was worried night after night by declarations that he had no right to ask the House to grant him a surplus, yet these hon. gentlemen now in power ask us to consent to the passage of items which inflict additional taxation on the people in the face of their declaration that they anticipate a surplus next year. If that is protection, it is protection gone wild and gone mad. If this is the legitimate outcome of the National Policy, then, Sir, I contend that it is time that the people of this country should study what the National Policy means. I am not going to further detain the House. I presume it is the desire of the Committee to pass these items; but so far as I am personally concerned, I shall lose no opportunity of expressing my views and offering every legitimate opposition to the passage of increased taxation on the people of this country, in face of the statement of the Government that they have a surplus. I feel that I would not be discharging my duty to the people who sent me here, if I did not offer opposition to every item of taxation the Government proposes.

Clocks and clock cases of all kinds, 35 per cent. ad

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like the Minister to explain why he charges for clocks and clock cases 25 per cent. ad valorem, while he charges for gold watch cases only 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BOWELL. Where do you find that?

Mr. McMULLEN. It is in your tariff, you ought to know.

Mr. BOWELL. I think the hon, gentleman has been reading some other item. Under the old tariff watch cases were 25 per cent. ad valorem and the works were admitted at 10 per cent. It has been discovered that the cases and works are imported separately and that they are simply put together by a pin. The original tariff was for the purpose of protecting the manufacturers of watch cases in Canada; and watch movements not being manufactured in Canada, they were allowed to come in at 10 per cent. We have increased the duty so as to make it more equitable. The duty on clock cases is increased to 35 per cent., while the movements, except for tower clocks, which are largely manufactured in Canada, are 10 per cent. I have no knowledge of any such item as that to which the hon member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) refers.

Mr. MULOCK. Are there any factories for the manufacture of clocks in Canada now?

Mr. BOWELL. I think not.

Mr. MULOCK. What became of the clock factory that used to be in Hamilton? Did it flourish?

Mr. BOWELL. It flourished out, some years ago.

Mr. MULOCK. It failed, notwithstanding the fostering care of the tariff.

Mr. BLAKE. I remember very well when the duty was put on to help that flourishing industry.

Mr. MULOCK. Inasmuch as the last duty of 25 per cent. wiped out that industry, is this new duty of 35 per cent. to make that dead industry deader still, or what is the object of it? Poor people are particularly affected by this duty. know that the poorest classes of clocks, which are found in every household, are manufactured in enormous quantities in the United States and in England, as are also certain classes of watches, like the Waterbury watch and the Waltham watch. is it expected that any possible tariff can be in the interest of the people while we have so limited a

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman's recollection will carry him back far enough, he will remember that the clock industry never has been in a healthy state, either under the present tariff or any other, owing to the extent to which these articles are manufactured in the United States and in Europe, and the large markets they have to supply. The duty of 35 per cent. on clocks has existed for eight or nine years past; I suppose it was imposed in the hope that it would enable this industry to continue; but as the industry did not continue, the tariff was changed, and the duty on watch cases which are manufactured in the country, was fixed at 25 per cent., and on the movements at 10 per cent., the latter not being manufactured in the country. For the reason I have already explained we have raised the duty on cases to 35 per cent., as well as on the complete article, allowing the works to be brought in at 10 per cent. The cases are manufactured very extensively both in Toronto and in Montreal.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman expect that 35 per cent. duty on clocks will cause that industry to exist even in a feeble state?

Mr. BOWELL. I am not prepared to say that it will, but I think it will induce a much more extensive manufacture of the cases.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that my quotation was an error, taken from an old tariff instead of from this one. But, in my opinion, it is unfair to impose a duty of 35 per cent. on clocks, while you thing that every man must have in his house, but a watch is not of the same necessity.

We are not proposing an in-on clocks. It has been the Mr. BOWELL. crease in the duty on clocks. same for some years.

Mr. McMULLEN. But I say you should reduce the duty, as you have too much money now.

Cocoa paste and chocolate, not sweetened, one cent per pound.

Mr. BOWELL. This is an error; it should be 4 cents a pound, making the duty equal to the 25 per cent. duty which exists at present, the article being valued at 18 to 20 cents a pound. The duty is made specific in order to prevent the numerous frauds that occur in its importation. I also wish to add, "and other preparations of cocoa."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason for taxing that at all when you admit tea and coffee free. Cocoa is a very useful and desirable article of food or drink for many people, and it appears to me that on the principle on which you make tea and coffee free, you should make

Mr. BOWELL. It is more of a luxury than tea and coffee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know that. Many people use it as a substitute for tea or coffee.

Collars of cotton, linen or celluloid, 24 cents per dozen, and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This appears to me to be a most outrageous imposition. Here is a tax of considerably over 60 per cent., taking the average value of these collars, put on-for what reason under heaven? I suppose for the purpose of encouraging some trumpery manufacturer, and for that purpose every person in Canada has to pay this enormous tax. This is out of all reason and proportion. The average value of collars imported is considerably under a dollar a dozen, in the case, at any rate, of one or two of these articles, and you tax them two-thirds of 100 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Apropos of this item, I may state what a leading importer told me about a year ago in relation to the duty on ladies' collars. He told me he had made a Customs entry a few days before, and in estimating the tax, first specific and then ad valorem, he found it actually amounted to 145 per cent. of the value of the goods. My hon. friends put this at 60 to 70, but I should not wonder if it was over 100 per cent. This system can be called nothing less than a system of legalised fraud. Why not make the tax at once so much ad valorem, and let the people know what they are really paying? I believe that when this system was first adopted the Government had to send to the United States for an expert, a man named Young, for the purpose of inducting them into this method of taxing the people, without their knowing what they had to pay. This is a most outrageous system. The Government should say honestly and squarely: We will tax you on collars, 50, 60 or 70 per cent., and then people will know what they are paying; but by this system of so much per dozen and 30 per cent. ad valorem, the people do not know what they are paying, and that admit watches at 25 per cent. A clock is some feature of taxation runs through the whole tariff.

Mr. McMULLEN. These collars cost from 3 to 5 cents apiece, or 40 to 60 cents a dozen, as ladies' collars will, wholesale; you put on 2 cents a collar, which makes a tax in itself of from 30 to 40 per cent., and then add 30 per cent, ad valorem, and the total tax comes to 65 and 70 per cent., and on the cheapest kinds of collars, 100 per cent. This specific duty strikes heavily at the poorer article, while the more expensive article is not taxed in anything like the same ratio. Collars costing 30 cents a dozen will have to pay the same Collars specific duty of 24 cents as collars which cost 60 cents a dozen. In all these specific duties you strike at the poorer article, used by the poorer classes, while the better article, used by the higher classes, is taxed a comparatively light duty.

Mr. BOWELL. No doubt the tariff works precisely as the hon. gentleman says, but he forgot to mention that the dearer collars are met by the ad valorem duty. The specific duty was adopted for the purpose of meeting the undervaluation upon a very inferior quality of goods brought into the country, and the ad valorem duty was intended to catch, if I may use that word, the more valuable article.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was that the only reason for adopting that system?

Mr. BOWELL. That was the only reason I know of, and to give, of course, a good high protection. This is the old tariff, with the addition of the word "celluloid."

Mr. MULOCK. A cotton collar which will cost one-third the value of a linen collar will have to pay the same specific duty. In other words, you charge 6 cents on a cotton collar as against 2 cents on the linen collar. You are acting on the principle: "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." Is it fair that he should press to the wall the poor man, as he is now doing by making him pay three times more than the more fortunate man?

Mr. BOWELL. There are no cotton collars made.

Mr. MULOCK. Then why are you taxing cotton collars?

Mr. BOWELL. There are collars made with cotton inside and linen outside.

Mr. GILLMOR. I see that this duty on collars amounts in some cases to 33 per cent. specific, and 30 per cent. ad valorem, on collars costing $1.50 a dozen. Another class of collars, worth $1 a dozen, is charged 50 per cent. specific duty, and 30 per cent. ad valorem, so that you are taxing a large proportion of these collars of that class 80 per cent. There are many of those articles at that price which, notwithstanding that you are protecting them here, are imported and sold to the poor people all over the Dominion, and these you are taxing 80 per cent. The idea of taxing a poor girl, who wants to make herself agreeable, 80 per cent. for a little ornament! Should a maid or a bride be compelled to forego her ornaments? I think the last thing you should tax is one of this kind, which young women enjoy so much. On many of these articles you are charging 100 per cent., and I say it is an outrageous tariff.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend from North are used by the fishermen and others, is sumply York (Mr. Mulock) says that by this tax you are shameful, it is simply scandalous. It is poor Mr. MITCHELL.

pressing the poor man to the wall. 1 think, by what my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) says, the Minister of Customs must be pressing the poor woman to the wall, and I am not sure that he would not come within the terms of the Criminal Law Amendment Act.

Mr. BOWELL. I repudiate the insinuation of the hon. member for Northumberland, but if I ever come within the provisions of the law, I will retain the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to defend me, as he is best fitted for such Cotton cordage and cotton braided cords, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must again put in my plea on behalf of the poor unfortunate fishermen. I think this is very unfair. There is no cotton cordage that I know of made in this country. There is some hemp cordage made, but this cotton cordage is used largely in the fishing boats on the coast of the Province from which I come. I do not suppose the Ministry have any bowels of compassion for the fishermen, though they have one Bowell who has no compassion.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman may be right to complain on behalf of the fishermen, but, if he were a farmer and found he was charged 35 per cent. on binding twine, he would have a great deal to complain of. The fishermen are allowed to import seines and nets free of duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are you sure of that?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; look at the old tariff. Mr. MITCHELL. We are dealing with the new tariff.

Mr. McMULLEN. My impression is that there is no increase in the tariff in that matter. I wish the Government would reduce the tax on binding

Mr. BOWELL. We have not come to that. The reason for this duty is that the thread now bears a duty of 2 cents a pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem, and this cotton cordage and cotton braided cords is made very extensively in Ontario and in some other parts of the country. The item in the free list in regard to lines and twines is not interfered with.

Mr. GILLMOR. That does not make the cordage free to the fishermen. I received a letter from a fisherman, who is a friend of mine, the other day in reference to this duty. He says:

"To talk about the bounty we get, it is a bag of wind. Why, the extra duty each man pays on manilla that was free to fishermen until the Tory party got in power, is more than double the bounty. It makes no difference if we use home-made manila, it costs more per fathom than the American, for it is not so nicely made, it weighs more per fathom. We get more fathoms for the dollar and pay the duty, than to purchase the home-made manila. Yes, we will have to quit. Am completely ruined since the Tory party got in power. I want you to get a place for me in British Columbia; get a chance for me to work at any business, me in British Columbia; get a chance for me to work any business,

"I can sell goods if you can get a chance for me with some of the men who come to Ottawa; you speak to them for me; I must quit here. Our fishermen can't live; they have cut me up; they can't pay their debts, and that means ruin to us, and it is getting worse and worse every year."

I know that this protective duty on the ropes that are used by the fishermen and others, is simply material, and it will weigh so much more a fathom, no matter how much duty you put on, and they will have to buy American ropes for their fishing business, and American boots. Talk about the bounty! Why, the difference between one pair of boots they are compelled to buy in Canada and those they can buy abroad, is more than the bounty you give the fishermen. What they pay extra in fitting out one boat for a few months' work, or the extra duty they have to pay on the rope they use in fishing, is more than all the bounty you give the fishermen. It is simply shameful.

Mr. BLAKE. The fact of the matter is, these poor fishermen would go and hang themselves if it were not that the tariff makes the rope too dear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did I understand the Minister to say just now that cordage for fishermen was free?

Mr. BOWELL. No; lines and twines.

Mr. MITCHELL. Lines and twines are a comparatively small matter compared with the cordage for fishermen. In the existing tariff, cordage of all kinds is 1½ cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. I was wrong in supposing that the hon. gentleman said it was free, but I want the hon. gentleman to take into consideration the condition of things amongst the fishermen, and make it free for them.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a re-arrangement of the tariff, without any increase of duty upon lines and twines, to which the hon. gentleman refers. I know that lines and twines are cheaper to-day than they were when this high tariff, as the hon. gentleman terms it, was placed upon the Statute-book. There may be reasons for that; the hon. gentleman may give other reasons. But I am not prepared to admit that it would be in the interest either of the fishermen or the manufacturing industries of this country, to put the articles on the free list, for the reason that they are extensively manufactured in Canada. From my knowledge of the invoices and of the importations, they are sold much cheaper now than they were five or ten years ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend talks about lines and twines—I never mentioned them. I said the cordage the fishermen require for outfits for their boats, ought to be upon the free list. It is a most dangerous occupation, and one that is followed entirely by poor men who have hard work to make a living for themselves and families. If you want to encourage the fishermen, you ought to put upon the free list, not only lines and twines, but the far more important article of cordage, which is required for outfitting.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The statement just made by the Minister of Customs is one, I think, that will create some astonishment, namely, that this duty on cordage is in the interests of the fishermen, as well as in the interests of the manufacturers. I would like very well if the hon gentleman could explain to me how it can be in the interest of the fishermen that the duty on cordage should be placed at such a very high rate. I remember when the Liberal Government were in power there was, in the commencement, no duty on cordage at all, and when my hon. friend in front of me (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was Finance Minister, placed a duty of 5 per cent. on cordage, I remember still the indignant protests that were made by the present Minister of Customs, and by the whole Tory party throughout the country, that a Liberal Government were going to injure the fishing and shipping interests of this country by imposing a duty of 5 per cent, on cordage. It is really most refreshing to hear the hon. gentleman talking today of benefiting the fishermen by increasing the duty on cordage to 20 per cent. As has been observed by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), these duties take away more than the bounty which is given them. These high duties naturally involve high prices. The hon. gentleman says that cordage is much cheaper to-day than it was some years ago. That is another observation which is hardly warranted, I think, because the hon. gentleman will remember that cordage is an article, like others, which is affected by the value of the raw material, and if it is cheaper to day than it was some years ago, it would be 20 per cent. cheaper still if this duty was not imposed. The fishermen along our coast have to buy this cordage, and it is a very heavy item in their outfit, and I do think that, considering the position the finances are now in, the Minister of Customs should take this into account and see whether he cannot make some reduction on the article. I know that in spite of the high duty which is imposed against the American cordage, a very large quantity of it is used by our people in preference to Canadian cordage. We have a rope-walk in Halifax, one in St. John and one in Montreal. They make a fair article; I do not know very much about it, but I know that I hear it constantly remarked that the American article is very much cheaper, even at the difference of value. The hon gentleman will see that, by keeping on this heavy duty, he is putting a heavy burden upon a class of people not very well able to bear it. He is putting on them a still heavier burden in the shape of increased duties on beef and pork which they are compelled to use, and the flour which they have to buy. This burden will be insupportable, and I do not wonder that the correspondent of my hon. friend writes to him that they will have to abandon that mode of getting their living. With the duty on pork and beef, and this high duty on cordage, and the other articles which fishermen require in their daily occupation, it is more than that industry can bear, and I think the hon. gentleman has not been well advised, I repeat, in putting all these duties upon that class of articles.

Mr. GILLMOR. With regard to cordage being cheaper in Canada under this arrangement, my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), who was chairman of the Combines Committee last year, could tell us something about cheap cordage. There are some four or five factories for making rope in Canada—not more than five or six, at any rate. Evidence came before the committee that these factories went into an arrangement and combination and put up the prices of cordage in Canada, and each one of the manufacturers undertook to make a certain amount of cordage during the year, some more and some less. Those manufacturers that made less really obtained more money than those who manufactured more cordage, and there was one concern that received between $4,000 and $5,000 for making none at all. By obtaining their "combine" price they were able to allow one establishment to lie idle and pay it thousands of dollars. And yet hon, gentlemen opposite talk about the benefits conferred on the country by the tariff! The moment manufacturers have an opportunity under this tariff to make a combination on rope, in which line there are only five or six manufacturers in the Dominion, they come together, and in an hour an arrangement is made and up go the prices. I know this has occurred. I went into a store to purchase a little cordage myself, and I was charged from 2 to 3 cents per pound additional three days after a "combine" had been made, and this without any reason except that the manufacturers had united to put up the prices and divide the spoils obtained from the fishermen and all purchasers of cordage. Members of the Combines Committee present know that this is a fact, and this was the immediate result of the tariff arranged to encourage rope-making in Canada. This protective system conduces to nothing else than combines.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member has not told the whole story. Mr. Massey, who is a manufacturer of implements, and a large purchaser of binding twine in Canada——

Mr. GILLMOR. I did not speak of binding twine; I was speaking of cordage.

Mr. WALLACE. Binding twine, according to Mr. Massey's evidence, is cheaper in Canada than it is in the United States. It is true that we had at one time a combination, but the combination was destroyed, and now there is very little danger.

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Massey told us in the Combines Committee that he could not buy binding twine at reasonable prices, and that he would be compelled to go into making binding twine himself.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). From my recollection of the evidence I cannot agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). I think we had only one manufacturer of cordage before the committee.

Mr. GILLMOR. We had two, one from Montreal and one from St. John.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I thought we had only one, from St. John. That witness distinctly stated that the combination did not affect the price, but that the rise in price, to which the hon. member has referred, was caused by a combination in the United States, which obtained a monopoly of the raw material out of which cordage is manufactured.

Mr. GILLMOR. There was before that committee a manufacturer of cordage in Montreal, who had gone into the combination and had broken it up, because he thought $6,000 might as well go to the people as to a firm which did not manufacture any cordage.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Mr. Massey stated positively that he was opposed to the present price charged for binding twine. He said that the raw material came into Canada free, and the manufacturers had the benefit of all the duty upon the raw material in the cordage, and the price charged was too high. He went on to state that we required 3,000 tons of binding twine.

Mr. GILLMOR.

General LAURIE. The hon member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has pointed out that rope is very largely used by the fishermen in the Maritime Provinces, and especially on our own coast. I wish to point out as an advantage arising from the stimulus given to the manufacturers, that, with all the rope our people consume, only $3,125 worth was imported from the United States last year.

Mr. MITCHELL. They could not import it on account of the high duties.

General LAURIE. An industry has been established and home consumption created, and our people have been called upon to pay only $659 in duty. Therefore, instead of this being an enormous burden, it is a very trifling burden on the people.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am surprised that an intelligent gentleman like the hon, gentleman who has just spoken, who represents a fishing county in Nova Scotia, should actually rise and put forward as a reason why there is no hardship inflicted on the fishermen, the fact that only $659 duty was charged on rope imported into this country. The duty of 30 per cent. is so high as to compel our people to take the inferior article manufactured by these "combines" protected under this high tariff.

Mr. MACDOWALL. In the course of the discussion which occurred on the Budget the other day, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) made certain statements as to the amount of duty paid by farmers on binding twine, and they were answered by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly). It was proved by the latter hon. gentleman, that binding twine is sold at a lower price retail, than it is sold at wholesale in the United States.

General LAURIE. Referring to the assertion of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), that our fishermen have to put up with an inferior class of cordage, I distinctly assert that the rope they are able to obtain from our own factories is quite as good as that which they are able to import.

Mr. MITCHELL. I happen to have been largely engaged in shipping and snip-outfitting for about twenty years, and I happen to know something about the trade, as perhaps my hon. friend may do. I, therefore, speak from experience. Our mariners and seamen infinitely prefer American manila to what is manufactured here. The hongentleman said that only $6,000 worth of cordage was imported. Why not make the duty 60 per cent., and then there will be none imported. That is a specimen of the logic used, to show that this tariff does not impose hardships on the people.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I import a good deal of rope during the season, and I find that it is much preferred to Canadian manufactured rope. It is considerably lighter than that made in Canada. On that account it is cheaper to use American rope, and the quality, moreover, is softer, and it wears better. Hon. gentlemen opposite would lead the country to believe that high duties lower the price of articles. Surely they do not intend to lead the country astray by declaring that a high tariff has the effect of making articles cheaper, for that is really nonsense. It is a piece of injustice on the part of the Government to increase the duties on rope and other articles used by the fishermen, who are about the poorest class of the community, especially the shore fishermen. On the other hand Newfoundland fish is allowed to come in free of duty, and so our fishermen are not protected, while compelled to pay heavier duties for the benefit of the manufacturers. I repeat that it is an injustice to levy taxes on the poorer classes, to put money into the pockets of rich manufacturers. It is true that some articles the fishermen use while prosecuting their calling are free of duty, but, on the other hand, the families of fishermen will suffer from the high duties imposed on all the goods they consume. It is a great mistake to levy taxes on bread and other necessaries of the poorer people, while you leave them only cornmeal and molasses at a trifle lower duty, and which are supposed to be cheap-ened under the tariff. I again insist that it is a great wrong to be constantly levying taxes on the poorer classes for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of the rich.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is in error in saying that we are increasing the rate of duty. It is only a re-arrangement of two items. If the hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) had said we would be ill-advised in continuing the rate of duty, it might apply with some force, but when he says we were ill-advised in raising the duty he was in error, because we do not propose in this matter to change the tariff. This proposal is only to take the words "cotton cordage" out of the items which bear one and a quarter cent per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem, and to make it a separate item, leaving a duty of 30 per cent. The cordage referred to by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and others, still remains as it was under the old tariff. Whether that is advisable or not, I do not intend to discuss now. I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) would find some difficulty in pointing to any remarks of mine with reference to this item in 1874, for which he said he then denounced the then Minister of Finance. I do not think it requires me to say to those who have known me, and who know the views I entertain on trade questions, that I always spoke in favor of a protective tariff; whether that was right or wrong I will not discuss now, but if I did speak on the tariff in those days, it must have been on general principles. I am certain I said nothing about imposing a duty on cordage.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. Minister does not perhaps remember the occasion, but it was when it was supposed that my hon. friend in front of me (Sir Richard Cartwright) was going to bring down a tariff increasing the duty generally, and when his leader then was prepared, as it was well known, for a speech either way.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not know that. Not my

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes; and the leader of the party, practically; that is the present High Commissioner. He then denounced the Government of which I was a supporter for having entered the thin end of the wedge of protection. I do not remember having heard my hon. friend the Minister of Customs taking exception to the views then pronounced by Sir Charles Tupper. The question of protection was not then before the country, and it was only in their extremity, finding that they could not get the ear of the country in any other way, and at a time of extreme deprestrated who sits opposite me, who is a free trader pure and simple, is wrong. But whether I sion, that the Conservative party announced their National Policy, and that the hopes that they held out to the employes and to the mechanics, and to the laborers generally, that they were going to reap a great advantage from such a policy, placed them in the position they hold to-day. My remarks which were objected to by the Minister of Customs were to the effect that I thought he had been ill-advised in increasing the duties on articles such as beef, pork and flour, which the fishermen were obliged to purchase and which they could not raise. If the Government required an increased revenue from these articles. I thought it was time that they should consider the whole question of the National Policy and not burden these poor people with further heavy taxes. The hon, gentleman and his friends took exception to a duty of 5 per cent. on cordage when the Liberal Government was in power; and I think that can be proved by reference to the debates of the House at that time. The hon. gentleman has gone back on the principles of himself and his party from that time down to the present, and he has gone on imposing duties on a class of goods which bears very heavily on the poor fishermen who cannot afford it. His last proposal, to put a duty on beef and pork, is another illustration of this, which the hon. gentleman cannot deny. Unless he is going to amend this tariff, and allow them to have beef and pork at a lower rate, he cannot get over the dilemma he is in, that he is now proposing to put very heavy burdens on the shoulders of a class of people who cannot afford it.

Mr. BOWELL. It is very singular that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), with all his knowledge, cannot understand what I stated. The last remarks he made were, that I was imposing additional burdens on the people who use this cordage. I have already explained that there is no change in the rate of duty on this article. It remains the same. It is somewhat singular logic for one of the leaders of the Opposition to accuse me of having gone back on my principles, and then in the same breath to say that I increased the tariff still higher than before. If the hon, gentleman had been in the House as long ago as 1869 he would know that one of the first speeches I made in this House-whether it had any effect or not I will not discuss—was in favor of protection, and I complimented Sir Alexander Galt, then Minister of Finance, on the course he had pursued in placing a duty on woollens, and especially on blankets, which induced the manufacture of them in this country to a very large extent, and which caused them to take the place of the article previously imported from Europe.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What year did you say?

Mr. BOWELL. 1869.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood you to say 1879.

Mr. BOWELL. Yet the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) tells me I have gone back on my principles. I, individually, have always advocated the principle of protection ever since I knew anything of politics. I am not going to argue the am right or wrong, the charge of going back on the principle does not lie at my door. I hold the same views on this question I have always held, and I state from long experience—although it may be ridiculed—that the putting on of a high duty upon many articles will reduce their price.

Mr. McMULLEN. Pshaw.

Mr. BOWELL. It may not reduce it in the first instance, but experience in this country has taught us that the competition among the different manufacturers has reduced the price on most of the articles that are manufactured in the country to-day, and that they are manufactured in the country now, notwithstanding the tariff, and sold at as low a rate—many of them—as they are in the United States.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be impossible for the hon, member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to keep his mouth closed for at least five minutes when any one is speaking, while he indulges in talking himself for two or three hours at a time. he will learn to act with ordinary courtesy, we will end our discussion in a much better spirit. He should allow us at least to finish our remarks. do not expect to convert him, because that would be an impossibility, and I have not that power. He is too fixed in his opinions, but I listen to him with all the attention I possibly can, but if he can show me I am wrong I will be glad to acknowledge it. I rose to resent the assertion of the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that I, now or on any other occasion so far as trade is concerned at all events, have gone back on the principles I held.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope, and 1 rather incline to think, that the Minister of Customs is generally more accurate in matters of detail than he has shown himself now. The House will observe, that the hon. gentleman says he complimented Sir Alexander Galt, in 1869, for putting on increased duties on woollens.

Mr. BOWELL. No; previous to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You were not in Parliament previous to 1867.

Mr. BOWELL. But he introduced a Tariff Act, putting on a duty on woollens, before I came into Parliament. It was for this I complimented him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood you to say that in 1869 you complimented Sir Alexander Galt in this Parliament. Now in 1869, the tariff had been reduced to a uniform rate of 15 per cent. or thereabouts, and the First Minister of this Dominion took occasion, in my hearing, to state that he was extremely glad to see that the tariff had been reduced from 20 per cent. or thereabouts, to 15 per cent., and that this was a forward step in the direction of assimilating our policy to the enlightened and generous policy which prevailed in Great Britain. Those were the senti-ments entertained, I will not say by the hon. Minister of Customs' leader in 1869, because in 1869, or at any rate in 1870, the hon. gentleman was kicking over the traces and objecting, in common with myself, very strongly to the induction of the then Finance Minister, Sir Francis Hincks.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not wish to enter into what the hon. gentleman's views were, when he first entered Parliament, whether they were pro-Mr. Bowell.

tectionist or not. What I have endeavored to press upon him is this, that the people who have to pay this 30 per cent. on cordage are a very poor class, who ought to get some relief. The hon. gentleman draws a herring across the track to avoid a specific answer to my question, by speak. ing of something I never referred to at all. He answers some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this by saying that he has not increased the duty on this item at all. The hon, senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) tells us that in the changes which have been made in these 350 odd items, nineteen-twentieths of them are increases. Is it any virtue to say that he has not increased the duty on this article? No; but the lack of virtue consists in knowing the difficulties of the industry and not reducing the duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. I just wish to say, in reply to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who compares the price of binding twine in Canada with the price in the United States, that if he does not know, he ought to know, that in the United States last year there was a combine in binding twine. Do we want to encourage combines here? We are doing it. There is a combine in this country now in binding twine, as there is in the United States. But for that combine, binding twine could be sold at 11 cents a pound in the United States, whereas it was sold at 17 cents a pound, and the manufacturers of Canada combined and put it up to the same price here. I know that binding twine was imported from the United States last year, and after paying the duty of 25 per cent., was sold cheaper than the Canadian twine. That is a legitimate outcome of the National Policy which we have in this country, and which they have in the United States. But you may preach to the Minister of Customs for a month to show him the pernicious character of his policy, and you make no impression on him whatever, simply because he is blindly attached to it. You might as well try to shampoo an elephant with a thimbleful of soap-suds.

Cotton denims, drillings, bed-tickings, ginghams, plaids, cotton or canton flannels, flannelettes, cotton tennis cloth, or striped zephyrs, ducks and drills dyed or colored, checked and striped shirtings, cottonades, Kentucky jeans, pantaloon stuffs, and goods of like description, 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent. advalorem.

Mr. BOWELL. This is the old item, with the following words added: "flannelettes, cotton tennis cloth, or striped zephyrs." They were formerly rated under this heading at some ports, but at others they were passed at different rates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon, gentleman state the lowest rate and the highest per square yard at which these goods are invoiced?

Mr. BOWELL. I am informed that these articles will range from 8 or 9 cents to 25 cents a yard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would make a difference of from 20 to 40 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is another evidence of the pernicious operation of this specific duty. The cheaper kinds of these goods are used by the poorer classes for dress goods, and the better kind is used for making pantaloons and ginghams for dresses for children, and it is unfair to impose 2 cents a yard on these goods without reference to their value. It gives an advantage to the rich class over the poor class. I do not think we should lose any opportunity to point out the pernicious effects of this system, which strike in every case at the poorer article. I suppose that is done because the poorer qualities are made in this country.

Mr. BOWELL. They are all made here.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then why put on this specific duty? If they are all made here, the specific duty is not necessary; the ad valorem duty is quite enough.

Mr. BOWELL. The duty was put on in order to protect the manufacturers, and since the protection has been given they have established their mills, and all these articles are now manufactured in Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. If they are, the specific duty is not necessary.

Collars of cotton, linen or celluloid, 24 cents per dozen and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is an enormous duty, ranging from 60 to 66 per cent., and on the lowest class it must reach 100 per cent. The same observations are applicable to it as to the duty on collars. Why is there such an enormous departure in these particular articles from the general rate? Are there any manufacturers which the hon. gentleman thinks specially deserving of encouraging, and how many are there, if any? It seems to me outrageous that the whole people should be taxed for the benefit of one or two manufacturers, who cannot employ very many hands.

Mr. BOWELL. This was classed among the tariff items in 1882, with the object of protecting the manufacturers, and all I am now doing is adding the two words, "celluloids" and "xylonite."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the protection given is out of all proportion to that given in other articles, and there ought to be some special reason for such extraordinary protection.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know of any. It is simply for protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But, surely, a protection of 100 per cent., or even 60 per cent., is most monstrous on an article in ordinary use. A protection of 35 is bad enough, in all conscience.

Hammocks and lawn tennis nets and other like articles manufactured of twine, N.E.S., 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BOWELL. These were not enumerated under the old tariff, but were rated at 25 per cent. and the twine 5 per cent., so that really the article out of which they were made bore a higher rate of duty than the manufactured article. We have given a special rate of 5 per cent. above the article out of which it is made.

Drain pipes, sewer pipes, chimney linings or vents, and inverted blocks, glazed or unglazed, earthenware tiles, 35 per cent, ad valorem.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Does this include drain tiles?

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is drain tiling exempted?

Mr. BOWELL. It is provided for in the old tariff, and has not been interfered with. The only change we have made by this item is to add chimney linings or vents, inverted blocks, glazed or unglazed, and earthenware tiles. There is no change in the rate, except in one or two articles, which is at 25 per cent.

Feathers, viz.: Ostrich and vulture, undressed, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McMULLEN. You should increase the duty on that which will bear a duty, and take it off something else. The hon gentleman admits this kind of thing at 15 per cent., and charges 35 per cent. on a pair of common cuffs which a poor woman has to wear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Vulture feathers belong properly to the combines, and must be lightly taxed.

Apples, 40 cents per barrel.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. We import a few barrels, but for every barrel that comes in from the United States we export more than two. If we put 40 cents a barrel on these apples, it is only human nature to suppose that the United States will put the same duty on our apples, so it will be fulfilment of the old adage, that a man may cut off his nose in order to spite his face. Last year the Province of Ontario imported 14,162 barrels of apples, and exported to the United States 119,504 barrels, or nearly twelve times as much as that Province imported. It is interesting to note the reason why the people of Ontario import these few barrels of apples. There are early apples which ripen in the Southern States long before any apples are ripened in Ontario. Is there anything particularly wrong in our having a few ripened apples brought in before we have any of our own? Then, Quebec last year imported 31,096 barrels of apples. A large portion of the Province of Quebec is not fitted for raising apples, and I would ask if there is any reason for taxing the people there 40 cents a barrel on the small quantity of apples which they import. Nova Scotia has also been a sinner in this respect. That Province imported 3,370 barrels from the United States, but they exported 19,997 to the United States. They imported those apples for the same reason as the Province of Ontario did. The apples ripen earlier in the United States than in Nova Scotia. Is there anything wrong in the people of Nova Scotia desiring to have a few early apples before their own are ready to use? Nova Scotia is one of the best apple-growing countries on the face of the earth, and that Province has sent back to the United States six barrels of apples for every one which it has imported. New Brunswick, some parts of which are not fitted for the raising of this kind of fruit, imported 9,609 barrels. Is there any sense in making the poor people there pay 40 cents a barrel on these apples? It is the same thing in regard to other Provinces. This is a fair illustration of the way in which this tariff is going to work. This might be looked upon as a small matter, but it must be taken into consideration as a part of the system which the Government has adopted of endeavoring to force the United States to refuse to us reciprocity in these natural products. I need not point out to the House that the Government has gone back on its principles in this matter. In 1879, when the Government inaugurated the National Policy, the reason given was that they wanted to force the United States into a reciprocity in trade, and that, if they did not succeed in that, they would have a reciprocity in tariffs. Their main object was, as they said, to obtain reciprocity in trade, and they inserted a clause in the Act providing that, whenever the Americans threw off duties on natural products, Canada would do the same. need not point out how loath the Government were to carry out the law which they themselves had passed, but it was only after we had been exporting to the United States these articles free of duty for some time that they threw off the duty on apples and other natural products which the United States had admitted free. Now, however, the Government have thrown off the mask and have declared that they believe that reciprocity in natural products would be detrimental to this country. They are trying to provoke the Americans to reprisals, and to compel them to lay duties on these articles. I have pointed out that for every barrel of apples we import, we export The Government are trying to compel the Americans to charge twice as much on what we export as the amount charged on what we import. This is a fair sample of the system of protection. It is taking $2 out of one pocket to put $1 into the other. I suppose this is called statesmanship, but if a private individual were to follow that course, sure and certain ruin would be the result, unless in the meantime his friends took the matter into their own hands and confined him in a lunatic asylum.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. This item was placed on the free list some few years ago. Why has that been changed? Last year we imported 78,798 barrels of apples, at a cost of $128,782, and exported to the United States 144,618 barrels, which brought us the amount of $230,208. It is clear that trade has been to our advantage, and I cannot see why we should return to the old duty. Is it not to be feared that a retaliatory duty may be imposed upon our apples, the exportation of which brings us more money than we pay for those which we import. I know that people in some villages on the Richelieu River, and other places, get their living by importing apples from the United States, which they transport to the interior portions of the Province of Quebec, where they sell them. Some apples of this kind are very cheap in the United States; but with this specific duty of 40 cents a barrel, it will kill that trade altogether, because the duty per bushel will be more than the price paid for the apples. I think, therefore, it is clear that this duty will ruin that trade with the United States, and injure the country on the whole, more than it would benefit it.

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to add to that item the following words as an amendment: "including the duty on the barrel," in order that the package clause may not be applied to the place where imported. As the House is aware, packages containing articles bearing a specific duty, are also rated at 20 per cent.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How much revenue are you going to lose by it?

Mr. BOWELL. We got no revenue before, and I do not suppose we will lose by it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Coming, as I do, from a section of the country where a very large number of agriculturists have extensive orchards, and where extensive exportations of apples are made every year to the United States, I think it my duty to protest against placing this duty upon apples, because, as was stated by the hon member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), it must be borne in mind that by this action we are inviting the Government of the United States to retaliate and place a duty upon apples which are exported from this country into the United States. It must be evident to every man of common sense that by this duty we are injuring the farming community of this country who are extensively engaged in the production of apples, because, throughout the Niagara district and in the counties west, a great many farmers are engaged almost exclusively in the growing of apples, the United States they find market the most profitable market in which to sell their apples. Why, Sir, it is a common thing in the fall of the year, in apple time, to find American buyers coming into every county and every township in the section of the country where I live, and buying up the whole produce of a farm in the apple line; therefore, I say it will be a direct injury to the farmers of the country to have this duty imposed upon apples. It has been shown by the hon, member for West Middlesex that we export double the quantity of apples that we import, and if the Americans retaliate and place a duty upon our apples going into their country, we put by this item a direct tax upon the farmers of this country; we injure them to the extent of this duty for the simple reason that we would be unable to export our apples on the same terms as we formerly did. I say on behalf of the farmers of this country, who are largely interested in the production of apples, that this is an imposition upon them which the Government should abstain from making. It is well known that the farmers cannot be protected like the manufacturers. The manufacturers can be protected; they have been protected, and the Government of this country know that they have been protected, from the fact that they have on many occasions received assistance from the manufacturers of this country in order to enable them to carry the elections. We know that funds have been subscribed largely by the manufacturers' association of the country in order to bolster up this protectionist Government. Only the other day, in the city of Toronto, at the annual meeting of the manufacturers' association, I observed that the fees have been raised to $25 from $10, which they formerly were. What do they do with these fees? What does the manufacturers' association of this country require these fees for? I say these fees are levied upon the manufacturers throughout the length and breadth of this land, not for legitimate purposes in connection with their organisation, but for the purpose of creating an election fund for the support of this protectionist Government. When an opportunity is offered to the Government to refrain from an injury to the farming community of this country, which will induce the Americans, in whose country we find a market for a large portion of our apples, to put on a duty equal to the duty that we impose upon their apples coming into this country, I say no man who has the interest of the farming community at heart will support the Government in this monstrous proposition.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman does not surely mean to say that we find a market for the larger portion of our apples in the United States?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. members for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) and for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) have read a statement from the blue book published by the Government, which is the authority for the statement which I make.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon, gentleman will look at page 676 he will find that we sent from the different Provinces last year of apples, green or ripe, 144,618 barrels to the United States, and he will find on page 675 that we sent to Great Britain 619,217 barrels.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is to say, you send twice as many to the United States as you imported from them. I fail to see how that meets my hon. friend's argument as to the extreme folly of imposing a duty here. The fact that we send a large number of apples to England does not in the slightest degree affect my hon. friend's argument that when we only buy one-half as many from the United States as we send there, it is a very foolish thing to tax them.

Mr. BOWELL. It may be very foolish, but the statement was made positively that the United States was the principal market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. BOWELL. I say it was. That was the only point to which I referred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was not my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. BOWELL. It was precisely his statement; I think I did not misunderstand him. When I pointed out that there were three times as many barrels and more, nearly five times as many barrels sent to England as to the United States, it was simply to show that England was the principal market for the product of Canada.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. My contention was based upon the export of apples from the section of the country I come from, in the Province of Ontario. When I commenced my remarks I spoke of the section of the country I come from. Everybody who knows anything about the apple-growing district of the Province of Ontario, knows that a large portion of the apples exported from that section go to the United States. I do not pretend to say that the larger proportion of the whole country go to the United States. I was only speaking of the section of the country where I live.

 $\ensuremath{\mathrm{Mr}}.$ BOWELL. The hon, gentleman is equally wrong in that statement.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is wrong again. If he would look at the exports from Ontario he will find that there were 80,000 barrels more sent to England than to the United States.

Mr. BOYLE. I do not think it is a reasonable thing that we should be deterred from protecting our fruit-growers by the fear that the Americans will put a retaliatory duty upon apples. As the Finance Minister stated the other day, we are now endeavoring to build up a national policy irrespective of the United States, and this holding up our hands in horror, in fear that the Americans way do something if we do something, I think is unworthy of the Canadian Parliament. In reference to the export of apples, I find, from an American almanac. figures given for the year 1888, showing that of the apples which the Americans imported from us not one barrel was entered for consumption, but all were for export again. Moreover, the United States itself is an exporting country for apples. They exported, in 1888, 487,000 barrels to other countries, so we cannot look for any live market The 144,000 barrels exportthere for our apples. ed from Canada to the United States were bought by speculators to be reshipped to England, so if the Americans do put a duty on our apples, it will only have the effect of increasing the trade between this country and Great Britain direct, instead of through American buyers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Since the removal of the duty two years ago, our apple trade has gone up by leaps and bounds. Instead of our apples being sent to the United States for purposes of exportation, they have gone to Chicago and the western market. If the duty is not reimposed, we will have an exceedingly large trade in that direction; but if we impose this duty, the trade next year will be less than for the last two years.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where are the apples consumed in the United States that go from the Niagara district and from the County of Huron.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. A great many apples are sent from my district to the Western States. A friend of mine two years ago sent 5,000 barrels to Denver, Colorado, where they were sold for at the rate of five apples for 25 cents. The Minister of Customs defends the imposition of the duty on the ground that we send more apples to Great Britain than to the United States. It is a very childish argument that, because we send a great quantity to Great Britain, we must destroy our American market. It is part of the Government's policy of endeavoring to cut off all intercourse between us and our best customers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I repeat it. Our aggregate trade with Great Britain was equal to $80,500,000, while that with the United States reached over $94,000,000. I insist that the Government have taken a step calculated to destroy our trade with the United States. year the Government are endeavoring to negotiate a commercial treaty with Spain; another year with France; another year are sending delegates and samples of goods to Australia; another year we are sending to Cuba and subsidising steamers to establish a little trade with the West India Islands, while at the same time we are endeavoring by every means in our power to destroy the great market that lies at our doors. The men who are market that lies at our doors. guilty of such a policy are fit candidates for a lunatic asylum.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Our exports of apples from Ontario to Great Britain reached 199,000 barrels, and to the United States 119,504 barrels.

Mr. CARLING. How many did we import from the United States?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. 14,000 barrels.

tive of the United States, and this holding up our hands in horror, in fear that the Americans may do the country, and I repeat that our American neighbors come in and buy our apples and take them to the United States. Even admitting that we export more barrels to Great Britain than to the United States, from Ontario, I say that this change in the tariff will be a direct injury to our people, who, for years past, have sold their apples in the United States; for I utterly fail to understand how the Government expect to benefit our farmers by attempting to destroy a market in the United States for 119,504 barrels of Ontario apples every year, and smaller quantities from the other Provinces. We are destroying the market of our apple growers, and we are not offering any benefit to the farmers for the injury we are inflicting.

Mr. TAYLOR. How are we taking away the market for our apples? The markets still remain. So far as we are concerned, we are not interfering with the markets, for the Americans can come in here and buy our apples. We are simply legislating for Canada.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. These remarks are made by a gentleman who is retaliating against the labor laws of the United States. This is the gentleman who set himself up to defy the United States Government on the St. Lawrence River; this is the gentleman which is now engaged in an enquiry to ascertain what we can do to prevent American labor coming into Canada. He promises this House that the United States Government is going to stand idly by and see this Government impose a duty of 40 cents a barrel and not retaliate. Americans are like Canadians, and if we are going to retaliate, they are going to retaliate in turn and we may expect nothing else.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have as good a right to retaliate as have the Americans, and the hon. gentleman says the Americans will, no doubt, put a duty on apples going in from Canada. The Americans, by their Alien Labor Act, have prevented laborers from Canada crossing the line and working in the United States, and yet residing in Canada. I have here documents to show that at Point Edward twenty-six families were added to the exodus, which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and other hon. gentlemen opposite are, no doubt, glad to see taking place every other day, on this account.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why do you not issue a proclamation against it?

Mr. TAYLOR. The exodus is going on, simply because the United States say their Act provides that Canadians living in Canada cannot perform work over the line. Yet the hon, gentleman finds fault because I want Americans to be placed on the same footing as Canadians, and to say that Americans resident in the United States cannot perform work in Canada. I have no doubt the hon, gentleman will support my Bill at the proper time. He does not want to cringe to the United States or to any other country. We want fair play in labor as well as in apples.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We do not want to cringe to the United States, but we do not want to induce them to retaliate, and to impose a duty upon an article we desire to export to that country; and it is interfering with the interests of our farmers to impose this tax on apples coming into Canada, in the retaliation which must follow by the United States Government putting a Mr. Somerville.

similar duty on apples sent in there. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is not the man. who in the committee was proven to be one of the sinners engaged in employing American labor in his carriage factory at Gananoque. I am not a member of that committee; but I understand, from a gen. tleman who is a member, that the only evidence which was produced before that committee, with regard to the employment of alien labor, was to the effect that the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was the only man in Gananoque, or in that neighborhood, who employed American labor; and vet he gets up in this House and talks his patriotic sentiments about keeping Canada for the Canadians-he, the very man, who is chairman of that committee, and who is actually the guilty party. He is the only man who is proven before that committee to be guilty of actually employing alien labor in his own factory.

Mr. TAYLOR. I just want to say to the hon gentleman that that statement is untrue. We do employ in the factory belonging to the company of which I have the honor of being president, some four families who have removed over from the United States. They were Irishmen by birth, and were not American citizens at all. They came from the United States, engaged with us; removed their families to this side of the line, and added to the population of Canada, and they have resided in Canada since the three years we have been running our factory. That is bringing the exodus the right way, and not doing, as my hon. friend wants to do—forcing the people from Canada to the United States.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no doubt, my hon friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville), has read the fable of the wolf and the lamb, for he is now playing the part of the wolf. He has told us that if we dare to put on this 40 cents a barrel duty on apples, the Americans will retaliate. Why, the McKinley Bill, which proposes a duty of 25 cents a bushel on apples, was a week or ten days before Congress, before the Finance Minister made his Budgets peech. The hon. gentleman is, therefore, accusing the lamb of mudding the water up the stream, though he is far up the stream. At the same time it would be just as well for hon. gentlemen opposite to state facts as they exist, and not to be accusing the Government of adopting a policy which may lead our neighbors to take another course, which might be, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) argues, injurious to us. From the facts before us we know that the proposition to put a duty on apples was made to Congress before we propounded our tariff at all. I have just one word to say to my hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) who is generally fair in anything he says. He attributed to me certain remarks which I never uttered. I said nothing whatever on the point to which he referred. It was a creation of his own mind, and he set up a little man and knocked him down again most valiantly. The only object I had in rising, was to point out what I really did say, without any argument, apart from the statement, which was that the figures given in reference to the exportation of apples were not correct, in accordance with the trade returns. I made no argument.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You scarcely ever do.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not necessary when referring to you. If I were replying to the hon. gentleman who has interrupted, I might say it is impossible to reply to any arguments when he speaks, because he never utters any.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is evident from what the Minister of Customs has said that the House can easily discern why this duty of 40 cents a barrel has been placed upon apples. He has told us that the Tariff Bill, now under consideration in the United States, provides that there is to be a duty of 25 cents a bushel on apples going into the United States, and this paternal Government of ours, feeling and dreading that the United States Government would get the start of them, and put on this duty before they could succeed in putting it on, have made up their minds that they should put a duty of 40 cents a barrel on apples before the United States Government have passed this proposed law. I maintain that is no justification for this Government putting on this duty. United States Government have not as yet legalised or passed that tariff, and it is doubtful whether it will be passed. I think that this Government have shown undue haste in endeavoring to retaliate against the United States, before the United States has sanctioned this duty which the Minister of Customs talks about, as likely to be imposed on our apples going into that country. hold that this is a very ill-advised act on the part of the Canadian Government and that it is not in the interests of the farmers or of the apple growers of this country. I fancy that when the time comes the apple growers of this country will tell the Government that this duty is not in their interest.

Mr. CARLING. I would say to the hon. gentleman that the quantity of apples imported into Canada from the United States, last year, was 70,000 barrels.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We know that; it has been stated six or seven times already.

Mr. CARLING. It was stated by an hongentleman that the import was only 30,000 barrels. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The other figures were given half a dozen times over.

Mr. CARLING. You might have known it, but the House generally did not seem to know it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would just wish to say to the Minister of Customs, who accused me of misrepresenting him, that if I did misrepresent him I had no intention of doing so.

Mr. BOWELL. I believe that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If I have done it I am sorry for it. The Minister of Customs made a statement just now that the McKinley Bill is before Congress. I wish to ask him if he is well advised on that fact, and if it has been reported upon by the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. BOWELL. I find the whole tariff in the New York Tribune. I will look and see what it says in regard to it. Perhaps some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues who have been down to Washington, can give more information on this point than I can.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is it the Minister of Marine and Fisheries you refer to?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not believe it was possible that we should have a Canal no objection to his thinking that, or to his accusing dian statesman, or one who calls himself so, so excessively ill-advised as to the constitution and practices of the United States, as to use such an argument. It is an exhibition of most gross ignorance on the part of any man in Canada, who calls himself a statesman, not to know more, or appear to know more, of the usages of the United States Congress in dealing with these matters, than members on our Treasury benches appear to do. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Customs ought to know-and if he does not, I should think that any child in our schools who has had the opportunity of receiving an ordinary common school education, could tell him-that the Constitution of the United States is so wholly different from ours that the action of any of their committees, whether it be of Ways or Means or any other, bears not the slightest resemblance to the action of himself and his colleagues in now bringing this matter before our House. The fact of the matter is this, Mr. Chairman. A proposition to amend the United States' tariff by the Ways and Means Committee of Congress can be in no respect put in comparison to the action of the Canadian Government in bringing down a proposition to this House on their own responsibility. Prior to the action of the Government in this matter, the chances were a thousand to one that the McKinley Bill as it now standsand particularly that part of it that affects uswould have no chance of passing. There were strong interests which were opposed to the McKinley Bill; there are still considerable interests which are opposed to it; but, Sir, the action of these gentlemen opposite has enormously strengthened the hands of the men who would like-I will not say to deliberately injure our commerce-but to pass measures which will be exceedingly injurious to the best interests of a very large number of the producers of Canada. Until this Government had acted, until this Government had introduced these retaliatory measures—for such they are, on their authority and on their responsibility, there was a very good chance indeed that these items in the McKinley tariff would not pass. I hope they will not pass even as it is, but I tell you that the hon. Minister of Customs and his colleagues have done all that mortal men could do to imperil our trade of $94,000,000 with the United States, and to induce the United States Congress to pass the almost prohibitory clauses contained in the McKinley Bill; and in so doing they and their supporters are in the highest degree traitors to the best interests of the Dominion of Canada, especially the interests of the agricultural

Mr. BOWELL. The usual flight of oratory and indignation has been exhibited to-night by the hon. member for South Oxford, and the usual epithets have been thrown across the House of utter ignorance of the constitutions of the United States and Canada.

 ${\bf Sir\ RICHARD\ CARTWRIGHT.\ \ Quite\ correct.}$

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is getting almost as bad as the gentleman behind him; ignorance, presumption, and almost everyother epithet, is constantly being thrown across the House by that hon. gentleman. I am inclined to think that he is under the impression that the whole knowledge of the world is concentrated in his own cranium. I have no objection to his thinking that, or to his accusing me of ignorance, whether political or otherwise; it is a matter of very little consequence to me. he thinks it is not beneath his dignity to indulge in epithets of that kind, we on this side can afford to accept them for whatever they are worth. If the McKinley Bill is no indication of the feeling of the people of the United States, or of the feeling of Congress or the House of Representatives, how is it that he and his friends have been continually hurling across the House, the fact that a Mr. Hitt, with whom it has been said the hon. gentleman has been in close communication for some time past, has introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives affirming the principle of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, or whatever he calls the fad? Is he so ignorant of the constitution of the United States, as not to know that the mere introduction of a resolution—and any member of Congress can introduce such a resolution—is not an expression of the feelings and intentions of the people of the United States until it has actually passed or become law? Yet the hon, gentleman has told this House and the country, over and over again, that that is an expression of the feeling of Congress, that they are extending the olive branch to us, and that we should accept it, when in fact it is of no more effect than the McKinley Bill. Let the hon. gentleman put the cap on if it fits him. The McKinley Bill is as much an opinion of the people of the United States, while it is before the Committee of Ways and Means, as the resolution of Mr. Hitt is. He can indulge in his epithets just as long as he pleases; all $\bar{\mathbf{I}}$ can do is to commend him to the people when he appeals to them again, when he can hurl them forth with just as glib a tongue as he has done so often in the past, and I venture the prediction that the result will be just what the past result has been of such speeches, and epithets, and language, on his part towards gentlemen who happen to differ from him on the trade question or any other question. I am quite willing to be styled a thief, as he insinuated the other night, or to be called ignorant of the constitution of the United States, or anything else that pleases him. I admit that I had not the early advantages which the hon. gentleman had; but I am not prepared to admit that I do not understand the constitution of the United States and the constitution of Canada just as well as he does, with all his advantages and all the wealth with which he is surrounded. I am quite willing, so long as it pleases, that he should continue to accuse us of ignorance, presumption, audacity, thievery, and everything else he chooses, and leave the people to judge between us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is tolerably aware that I shall use just such language as I please within the limits of parliamentary rule, and if you find me out of order you will not find me unwilling to retract; but I am perfectly within the limits of parliamentary order in describing the hon. gentleman and his colleagues as manifesting the most gross ignorance of the constitution of the United States, and I repeat the statement. What did the hon. gentleman say? Why, he compared these propositions brought down by the responsible government of Canada with the propositions advanced by a par-Mr. Boweil.

the resolution passed by the Committee of Congress had no weight; but I pointed out that that resolution, in the stage to which it had advanced. was utterly inadequate ground or reason for any action being taken by this Parliament. Ours is a cabinet government, as the hon. gentleman I sup. pose knows, or ought to know, while theirs is a presidential government.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that, of course. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Judging from the language he used in reply to the hon. member for Brant, I supposed, and I had a right to suppose, that the hon. Minister of Customs was entirely ignorant of the fundamental differences between our Government and that of the United States. The point is this, and the hon. gentleman has not attempted to meet it. An ordinary Tariff Bill, such as that now before the United States Congress, is subject to perpetual and constant modification; and I point out to this House, but more especially to the people of this country, whose interests are going to be most prejudicially affected by just such clauses as this under discussion, that if these gentlemen had held their hands, if they had not wantonly challenged to retaliation the people of the United States, there was a strong probability that the adverse interests in the United States, which would be more or less affected by the passage of this McKinley tariff, would have put such obstacles in its way that it would never have got through. I tell these hon, gentlemen that by their most imprudent, their most insane folly, because it amounts to that, they are, by every clause of this kind, putting the strongest possible arguments in the hands of those persons, whoever they are, who wish to injure the trade of Canada with the United States, to enable them to enforce all the oppressive prohibitory measures contained in the McKinley tariff. If the hon gentlemen had possessed any sort of proper appreciation of their position, they would have waited at least until the McKinley Bill had passed one House of Congress. Had they then chosen to pass retaliatory measures, there might have been some show of propriety for them, though we might have doubted their wisdom; but they have been guilty of an extreme lack of statesmanship, and I shall repeat here and on every hustings if need be, that if our barley trade, our egg trade, and our whole trade of $94,000,000 with the United States is destroyed. the hon. gentleman and his colleagues more than all others will be responsible for it and the injury that will follow, by their foolish conduct in inciting the people of the United States to a war of tariffs.

Mr. COLBY. I do not think the hon. Minister of Customs endeavored to give, or thought of giving, this House any exposition of constitutional law, either as regards Canada or the United States. He has simply mentioned the fact that the McKinley Bill had been published to the world before the propositions which have been submitted by the Minister of Finance were made known. He did not attempt to say that the McKinley Bill was in any sense in the position of a measure brought down by a Cabinet Minister under our system of constitutional government; he did not go into that feature of the case, but simply stated the fact as it ticular committee of Congress. I did not say that is, and that gave an opportunity to the hon.

gentleman-an opportunity of which he availed himself with a good deal of eagerness—to rise, and, with real or simulated indignation, attempt to sit upon the Minister of Customs. Well, the Minister of Customs is a very knotty stick to sit upon, and any gentleman who attempts to sit upon him will not usually find that he is occupying a very comfortable seat; and I do not think that gentleman, or any other gentleman who goes out of his way deliberately to sit upon the Minister of Customs, will be any the more comfortable or happy for having done so. But this is quite aside from The hon. gentleman has told us that he proposes to declare in this House, and upon every platform in the country, that if this McKinley Bill becomes law this Government will be responsible, because of the tariff they introduced. That may be very good party tactics, very good partisan talk, but there is not one single word of truth or one particle of common sense in it, and nothing will convince the reasoning men of this country that it is anything more than simple political clap-trap. The McKinley Bill is the deliberate outcome of the strong sentiment which governs the minds of the dominant party in the United States, and whether that party change the tariff this session or not does not depend in the slightest degree upon the action of this Government. That Bill will be carried or defeated, just as members of Congress deem it to be for the advantage or not of the people of the United States, without any reference to us. subject has occupied the serious attention of the public men of the United States, for the past year or two so much as the unfortunate condition of the agricultural classes in the Eastern and Northern States in the Union. I took the opportunity, the other evening, of referring to the condition of the farmers in the State of Vermont, and hon. gentlemen opposite resented that comparison, because, they said, Vermont was not a fairly representative agricultural State. Well, I would refer them to the State of New York, where, according to the report of the State agent, real estate has depreciated thirty-three per cent. in the last ten years. It is a fact well known and undisputed, that, in the Eastern and Northern States of the Union, there is most serious depression. Party men will attribute that to one cause or the other, but the thinking men of the United States are of opinion that this depression is the result of causes which could not be controlled by any fiscal policy whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Flies on the wheel.

Mr. COLBY. Flies on the wheel, if you like. It is controlled by a condition of affairs which cannot be remedied. It is the competition of the West with the East; the opening up of new virgin lands in the West, those large cheap farms, and the application of labor-saving machinery, by which one man can do the work of ten men; and it is the low rates of transportation from the West to the East, which have also been reduced three or fourfold within a few years, so that the produc-tions of the Western States are brought as cheaply into New York and Boston as the production from farms less than two hundred miles away. butter from Iowa comes into New York and Boston in refrigerator cars, as cheaply as butter from the State of Vermont in the ordinary car, and in far better condition, and the cheap corn in the West from that competition that these eastern farmers are suffering. It is inevitable; it is regrettable, but it cannot be prevented. The local market, which was an excellent market a few years ago to those in proximity to the large manufacturing towns and cities, has lost its advantage, because the farmer in the West has as cheap and almost as quick access to it as the farmers in the East. This condition of affairs is exciting every farmer in the Eastern and Northern States, but besides that fierce competition which he must meet from the West, he has also to meet the milder competition from the Canadian farmers in the markets of New England and New York, and along the border, and he says it is quite enough to be compelled to be subjected to the inevit-able competition of his own people without being subjected to the competition of the Canadian farmer. In the exercise of their rights they call upon the legislature of their country to defend them from that competition, competition of a milder form, but still competition from the Canadian farmer. They are represented in the cabinet by Mr. Blaine, by Mr. Proctor of Vermont, and in the Senate by Mr. Edmunds, by Senator Morrill, the author of the Morrill Tariff, and by Mr. Frye. They have an able body of influential men representing them, who will defend their interest, and it is that sentiment which has caused agricultural protection to be a leading feature in the McKinley tariff. Whether we did or not change our tariff, their course would be the same. The hon, gentleman who has just spoken ought to know the United States very well. He visits it sometimes; he studies in it sometimes; he visits New York and Washington; and I appeal to him to tell me whether any large portion of the people of the United States really take an interest in the tariff as between Canada and the United States? Does California care a rap what tariff exists between us? Do Colorado, Texas, the Southern States feel any interest in it? Do the Middle States know anything about it? How many of the people of the United States really know what tariff there is between Canada and the United States, outside these people on the border, who feel the competition of Canadian goods in the markets which are already flooded by the products of the West? It is the people who call upon the public men to put a stop to that by a high tariff, and their public men are able, influential men in the Cabinet and in Congress. Hence the McKinley Tariff was a foregone conclusion, and nothing we can do can have any effect either as regards its coming into force or not coming into force. Instead of the people of Canada reproaching the present Government for having foreseen a thing which, I say, was inevitable, they will thank us for not resting without action for a year or two, or three years; they will thank us for foreseeing what anyone who had any judgment might have foreseen, that agricultural protection was about to be adopted in the United States, and for adopting in self-defence protection for our own industries. No truer word has been uttered than the statement of the Finance Minister, when he said that no portion of this tariff, was conceived with any feeling of retaliation. This tariff was matured by the judgment of those who desired to protect controls the prices of grain in the East. It is Government believes that the farmers of this country should feed the people of this country, that the farmers of this country should feed the lumbermen of this country, that the farmers of this country should feed the manufacturers of this country. It cannot be disputed that the lumber-men of Canada find the farmers very good cus-tomers. What better customers have the lumbermen than the farmers, who are spread all over this broad Dominion, whose buildings are principally constructed of lumber which they have to buy from the lumbermen? Let the lumberman and the manufacturers, who sell so much to the farmer, be willing to reciprocate, and to buy from the farmer as they sell to the farmer; and so give the Canadian farmer the Canadian market. We know that two million dollars worth of pork products comes into this country every year, displacing and crowding out of the market here, what should legitimately be the profit of the Canadian furmer on his own produce. I am speaking generally on this subject, and, consequently, I refer to that particular item as a convenient illustration. I say that this Government has adopted a policy of agricultural protection in the interest of the farmer. Gentlemen on the other side sneer at it. They say we want to placate the farmers by this in order to get their votes. We will not be deterred by sneers of that kind from pursuing the clear path of duty. That path is open to us, and it is to give the Canadian market to the Canadian farmer. We, in Canada, are able to produce all the meat-foods which the people of Canada can consume. Look at the great North-West, with its almost unequalled facilities for the production of food, whether beef or pork, or any other kind. In placing these duties we not only help the people of the North-West alone, but we help every Province in the Dominion and every part of the country, even as far as Prince Edward Island. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope), who is sitting at my side, brought up two carloads of pork from Prince Edward Island to use in his own shanties, and he is intending to buy more from Prince Edward Island. He prefers to buy pork from Prince Edward Island, and from the farmers in the Eastern Townships and in Canada generally, to buying the western corn-fed pork from the United States. I believe this industry will be benefited by the policy of the Government. I believe that the lumbermen of this country are a liberalminded body of men. I believe that they are perfectly prepared to take their share in the fortunes of this country, and I believe that they are willing that the farmer shall have the means to live as well as themselves. I believe that the manufacturers of this country and the workingmen of this country will not complain because we ask them to eat the food which Canada produces—Canada, which is an agricultural country par excellence. I only rose to say that I believed that the McKinley Bill, or any other Bill providing for agricultural protection in the United States, was a necessity with the Republican party which is now dominating the United States. That party could not have done anything else if they acted in accordance with their record, and with the policy which they have propounded and supported. If there was a free trade Congress and a free trade Government, and the United States, some other panacea might have suggested itself to the Government there, but, as public sentiment exists in the United States, this agricultural protective tariff was one of the inevitable and necessary things which must grow out of the present condition of affairs. That may for a time inconvenience us and prove a temporary injury to some interests, but I believe that, in the end, it will prove to be a benefit to that, in the end, it will prove to be a benefit to the country at large by making us more independ-ent and self-contained, by throwing us more upon our own resources, and by enabling us to become an independent country. If not, if this should have the effect of injuring, not temporarily, but even permanently, some great interests in this country, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not prepared to whine or complain about it, and to say that the United States are not entitled to do in these matters as they please. It is the duty of the Congress of the United States to look after the interests of the people of that country, and, therefore, it is their duty to pass a Bill, similar to the McKinley Bill. if it is in the interest of the people. It is also our duty to look after the interests of our people. We should not say to the people of the United States that they are doing us an injustice. They are simply doing their duty in the interests of their own country. It is our duty to look after the interests of this country, and if we find foreigners sending in large quantities of produce which can be profitably raised by the farmers of Canada, it is our duty to protect our farmers, and to relieve them from that inconvenience. This tariff was conceived in no spirit of retaliation whatever, but any one might have foreseen what were the predetermined, what were the inevitable results of the election to power of the present party which is dominant in the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite unnecessary for me to say that I wholly and entirely take issue with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Colby) in every part of his speech; and I tell the hon, gentleman that I believe he knows a great deal better than his political exigencies permit him to state. I believe that he is wholly mistaken in thinking that the McKinley Bill was at all a foregone conclusion, except in so far as the suicidal folly of himself and his colleagues have made it so. Now, Sir, it is just such conduct, it is just such speeches, it is just such a foolish policy as we have had enunciated by a gentleman who ought to have known better, the President of the Council, which has sent, in all human probability, a million of the choicest members of our population from our country to the United States. It is this policy of protection—this suicidal contention with the United States; it is this policy of exorbitant taxes specially directed against the interests of the farmers, as shown by every line of this tariff, not excepting these items we are now discussing, which have caused agriculture in Canada to be less profitable than it ought to be, and which have contributed to send, as I have said, something like one in four of our adult male population, if not one in three, to the United States, quite double and treble the numbers since the hon. gentlemen got into power and the National Policy was inaugurated. The hon. gentleman tells not the table and the National Policy was inaugurated. if a free trade sentiment prevailed throughout us that the condition of agriculture in the United Mr. Colby.

States, at any rate in the eastern and northern parts, is extremely deplorable, not being able to perceive, apparently, that if, after 27 years of protection, the condition of United States farmers is so deplorable, as he and his friends state it to be. there never was a stronger argument put forward here or elsewhere against a protective policy than the condition of these favored portions of the Inited States. The hon, gentleman says that United States. there are certain causes that cannot be controlled. So say we, so say I, and the House cannot have forgotten with what denunciations this very Chamber rang when I told the hon. gentlemen opposite that it was not under all circumstances in the power of the Government to produce prosperity. Sir, they insisted that a Government that could not produce prosperity by Act of Parliament was not worthy to sit on the Treasury benches, and now, Sir, we are told that there are uncontrollable He says there are some causes that are not controllable by the Government of the United States which lead to the present unfortunate position of a large number of the agriculturists. there were causes which were in the highest degree controllable, and chief and foremost among those causes were the enormous burdens of taxation inflicted in the interest of protected manufacturers on the people of the United States, and though, perhaps in a lesser degree, inflicted in the interest of the combine and of the protected manufacturers, on the agriculturists of Canada. That is a controllable cause, and the hon. gentleman knows it well, and it is to an enormous extent by reason of the plundering tariff in the United States, by reason of the fact that the hard earnings of the people have been wrung from them under the guise of law, to fill the pockets of persons like the hon. gentleman and his friends, and the friends who subsidise him and act as paymasters for himself and the present Government, that the condition of the farmers in the United States is such as he describes it, and the condition of the farmers of Canada is such as I have described it. That is the reason, and that is the controllable cause, and an easily removable cause, and so long as that cause exists, just so long will the condition of the farmers of Canada more and more rapidly approximate to the condition which he has described of the farmers of the United States, until it may well come to pass that the farmers in Canada may be selling land as he tells us the farmers are selling it in the best parts of Vermont for $3 and $5 an acre, with all improvements thrown in. That is the goal to which we are hastening, and in no one way are we hastening towards it faster than by just such enactments as the hon. gentleman is inviting us to put on the Statute-book.

Mr. COLBY. With the advantages of unrestricted reciprocity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unrestricted reciprocity means free trade and the abolition of a large amount of our taxes, and it will bring about to us a vastamount of prosperity. Now, the hon. gentleman, and I thank him for it, the first of all his colleagues, has thrown off the mask. For ten or twelve long years the whole policy of the hon. gentleman and his friends, and their press, has been to persuade the agriculturists of Canada that he and they were most desirous of bringing about reciprocity in natural products, at any rate. Not merely did his colleagues, not merely did his leader, not merely did his press and his followers, but he himself has repeatedly held out this policy as the one best likely to secure the desirable end of reci-procity in natural products, which we heard this hon gentleman tell us the other night would be an unmixed calamity to the farmers of Canada. Now, Sir, what is the use of all this? The hon gentleman cannot pretend to say that these additional taxes are put on for revenue, because his colleague, the Finance Minister, has told us that we have a surplus secure for the present year, and for the next year and for the year after. What earthly good will it do our farmers to increase the revenue in this manner? I repeat to him, as I have told him before, that as regards the one article in which perchance a few farmers may obtain the advantage of an additional tax upon pork, it would be infinitely more beneficial to the farmers of Canada if he were to admit, as we have repeatedly asked him to do, corn free to feed the pork, and they would make ten times as much out of that as out of the paltry duty of one or two dollars additional on pork, which pork will be used by the lumbermen, and as the hon, gentleman well knows, and every gentleman here knows the truth of what I am saying, the lumbermen will continue, notwithstanding this increase of duty, to buy the vast portion of their supplies, just as they do now, in the Chicago markets. He knows, and they know, that no greater sham and delusion was ever put on the Statute-book than this duty on pork, in so far as it is declared to be a duty which will benefit our farmers. I tell the hon. gentleman again that so far from this duty helping the farmers, he and his friends are doing all they can to strengthen the hands of those parties in the United States who are clamoring for an increase of duty. Now, Sir, the hon, gentleman is very well acquainted with the United States. I do not know whether he was born there; I believe he was educated there, an advantage which did not fall to my lot, and I rather think the hon, gentleman is connected in many and near ways with the United States. He knows very well, and his argument shows it in the clearest possible manner, that this McKinley tariff at the present moment is only supported by a mere frac-tion of the people of the United States, that a very large number of States take no interest in it. knows perfectly well that the two parties in Congress are almost equally balanced, that this Bill must pass in all human probability in this Congress, or it will never pass. I believe, to-day, that the Republican party have a bare majority of eight on the floor of the House of Representatives; I doubt if they have even that. That Congress expires this year; their successors are elected, I think, in the month of November. Now, there are many and numerous interests in the United States hostile to this Bill. There are also, as he truly says, certain influential and dexterous politicians who may have a personal interest or a political interest in pushing this Bill through. this House. Is it possible I appeal to man to play more directly into for any the hands of the very gentlemen whom the Presi-dent of the Council named as being desirous of pushing this Bill through, than for the Cabinet of Canada to introduce these retaliatory resolutions?

admits distinctly there is only a small portion of the United States that have an interest in this Bill, that there are a small lot of influential politicians who may desire to bring it about, and he professes to be incapable of seeing how powerful a weapon he is putting into their hands for the purpose of bringing about their object. Now, Sir, I know what I am speaking of, as well as the hon. gentleman, and I tell him this: That no single act could have been brought forward in Parliament less calculated to benefit the farmers of Canada, and more certain to play into the hands of the knot whom he speaks of, and who may desire to put these duties on our products, than the identical provisions of this tariff which we are now considering.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I desire to say a few words in answer to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He says that the President of the Council appears to be acquainted with the people of the United States. I have no doubt the President of the Council is acquainted with the people of the United States, and I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is himself trying to become acquainted with the people of the United States, if all reports speak true. Now, I do not know what objection there is to the President of the Council being acquainted with the people of the United States, and knowing what they are I would like to ask the hon. member for South Oxford how the present resolutions before this House could be the cause of the McKinley Tariff, when the McKinley Tariff was introduced two weeks before these resolutions were introduced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will answer the hon. gentleman's question, if he wishes. I never said this was the cause of the McKinley Tariff, but what I do say in this: If the McKinley Tariff is passed these resolutions will be the cause

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I believe an intimation was given at Washington as to what course would be pursued by this Government, in order that Congress might so shape their resolutions as to form a policy for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at the next general election. To show that this is true, I will read a report sent from Washington, indicating that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as leader of the Reform party in this country, will, when he gets into power, use the Reform party in order to bring about such legislation as will be pleasing to the people of the United States. I find a Washington despatch to the Boston Globe as follows :-

"Though the most important of the American neighbors of the United States, Canada is not represented in the Pan-American Congress, that country is embraced in Mr. Blaine's plan. Operating directly through Mr. Hitt, now Chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in co-operation with the Liberals or free traders of the Dominion, Mr. Blaine has succeeded in rousing on the other side of the border a tremendous feeling in favor of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, as shown by the vote on that proposition a few days ago it the Canadian Parliament, when the reciprocity party carried their side.

the Canadian Parliament, when the reciprocity party carried their side.

"Sir Richard Cartwright, leader of the Canadian Liberals and the coming Premier of the Dominion if his party can gain ascendancy over the Tories, has within a month or six weeks been in Washington in consultation with Mr. Blaine. The agreement was then reached between the two statesmen that while Mr. Blaine was pushing reciprocity with South and Central America in Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

the Pan-American Conference, Sir Richard Cartwright was to do all in his power to lead Canada up to free trade with the United States."

I think I am justified in saying that the hon. gentleman is well acquainted with the people of the United States; that he knows as much about the legislation, as much about the purposes and desires and future operations of the statesmen of that country, as he knows about the purposes of the statesmen of this country. But I do not think it was a handsome spectacle that while this Parliament was sitting, the hon. gentleman, being accredited by the people of a constituency as their representatives on the floor of this House, should go to Washington and be in free consultation with the statesmen of the United States as to the kind of legislation they should introduce in order to push the people of Canada into passing such legislation as might be conducive to the welfare and prosperity of the people of the United States. We have desired, and for years we have endeavored to bring about reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). That is, a reciprocity based upon such an arrangement as will suit the people of this country, but not unrestricted, undefined and undefinable reciprocity which hon. gentlemen opposite are talking about at present. In what have all our negotiations resulted? What was the result of the negotiations conducted by the late Hon. George Brown when he was accredited to Washington? No attention was paid to him; even his representations were not considered by the House of Representatives or the Senate; he was treated with contempt by the people of the United States.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Never.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I, as a Canadian. have no desire to be placed in that position any We Canadians can live as Canadians by ourselves if the United States do not care to trade with us. It is in no spirit of hostility that this tariff, or any other tariff, has been introduced into this House. It is framed directly in the interests of the people, and, especially, latterly, in the interests of the farmers. This particular item under discussion is placed in the tariff at the desire of the apple growers, who raise apples for the home market, or for export. If this is the desire of the apple growers, which it is, why should not the Government introduce legislation in order to give them a market in this country? Hon. gentlemen opposite would lead us to believe that the only market for the produce of the farm is to be found in the United States. Our great markets are Liverpool and Europe, and all our surplus products must eventually find their way there. For this reason. that this continent as a whole is an over-producing continent in agricultural products, and if we sell in the United States, we sell for middlemen who transfer the products to Liverpool and receive the benefit, and also the price of the transportation. Not only does the middleman receive his profits, but all the railways receive payment from Canadian farmers for the transportation of these products. So there is nothing consumed in the United States that is grown in Canada except in this sense, that instead of eating one bushel of American wheat, the people may eat one bushel of Canadian wheat, and export the bushel of American wheat. And so it is with respect to the meat question. England today is filled with the dead meats of the United States. Do you pretend that the United States is a market for Canadian dead meat? The Americans are not allowed to land live stock in England, but they send in dead meat. Thus it is clear that the markets of the United States are in no sense markets for the farmers of Canada. It is true that Canadian products are sold to the United States, but they are sold to middlemen who send them to the European market. Look at Chicago and Buffalo to-day and at the elevators and refrigerators that are filled with American grain and meat, and any man will be convinced that the United States is in no sense the direct market for the product of the Canadian farmer. The producers of Canada have a right to the best and most careful consideration of any Government, whether Reform or Conservative. In this sense, and in every sense, this Government has acted correctly. Give the Canadian producer the Canadian market, and thereby build up the great producing element in this country not only in manufacturing but also in farm products.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have been much amused at the speeches to which I have listened. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has told us that they do not want our products in the United States. Why, then, have we been selling the Americans more than half the exports of Canada? Why has not the National Policy, which has been in force eleven years, changed the current of trade and taught the Canadian people where they might obtain most money for their products? We have had the humble confession of the President of the Council that Canada is now in a state of depression, that half of the people are poor and ground down; and the remedy he proposes is that you should go to work and cheat and plunder the other half to help those in distress. That is the logic of the arguments of hon, gentlemen opposite, that because the farmers are depressed under protection, therefore the lumbermen who are not quite so much depressed must be called upon to give them $2 or $3 more a barrel for pork; and because the farmers are depressed, therefore operatives and workingmen and all engaged in other callings have to be compelled to put their hands in their pockets and assist the farmers that the National Policy has impoverished, and you cannot deny it. That is the trouble with our friends on the other side of the House. They talk about the depression of the agriculturists in the United States, and the depreciation of farm property in Vermont, New Hampshire and other States, but I can tell them that the cause of that is 27 years of a false, pernicious, and ruinous protective policy. My hon. friend says that the policy of the ablest men in Congress is to relieve the farmers. Now, with regard to the shaping of a fiscal policy, I myself think that nations ought to be independent. I think that the United States ought to shape their own policy and that Canada should shape her policy. I would not allow any other man to regulate my affairs, and if I was responsible for the nation, neither would I allow an outsider to meddle in my business; but I hold that we, in Canada, should not follow the pernicious example which has ruined the agriculturists of the United States.

It is excessive taxation that has ruined them, and it is excessive taxation that will ruin our farmers. They are not all on the one side in Congress, in favor of this protective policy; not by a great deal; they are very evenly balanced, and some of the ablest men of that country are proving that the depression of the agricultural interest is due to excessive taxation. Abundance of agricultural products is not the cause of business depression; yet the policy he proposes is that the people of Canada should have less to eat and less to wear and less comfort of every In order to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked in this country, we have got to pay two prices for everything we want. What a two prices for everything we want. false and pernicious policy! I am glad to see that the people of Canada are not to be bood-winked by this policy any longer, and the Government, knowing this, propose to skin another class of the population in order to help the agricultural classes, as they say, whom they have already skinned and ruined by their protective system. I suppose my hon friends are sincere, but I regret that they are not more enlightened upon trade questions. Now, let us examine the causes which have made the agriculturists of Canada depressed. The goods imported into Canada last year amounted to $74,475,139, on which we paid duties to the extent of $23,-742,316. It is under the mark to say that the people of Canada consume three times the amount of goods and wares of all kinds, that are manufactured in the country, than those which were imported, and that would make the consumption $223,435,417. Now, I contend that, as the people of Canada consume three or four times as much as they import instead of paying duty on imports amounting to $23,742,316, we pay nearly $100,000,000 on the goods manufactured in this country, which goes in the pockets of the manufacturers. Not only have the farmers been paying this $23,000,000 on imports, but they have been paying a tribute of nearly $100,000,000 to the manufacturers. There is no doubt about that at all, and that is what the ablest men of the Democratic party and the revenue tariff party in the United States are declaring to-day. I will quote to the House a few extracts. Ex-President Cleveland in his last message to Congress says:

"That the tariff renders it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers of certain articles which are protected and taxed to sell them for a price equal to that demanded, for the imported goods that have paid the Customs duty, so that it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people who never used any of the foreign products, purchase and use the things of the same kind in this country and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price, which the duty adds to the imported article."

Now, I have gone into the stores in many places in Canada, and I have talked with the merchants, and I have found that there are three or four times as great a quantity of the goods manufactured in Canada, sold to farmers and to consumers generally, as of the imported goods. I am assured by these merchants that, without any exception, they always add the duty to the price of the manufactured domestic articles. Let me quote from another able man in Congress, Mr. Benton McMillan, whom I have no doubt the hon. President of the Council, and other gentlemen, know to be among the ablest men who hold a seat He says: in Congress.

"It is estimated that for every dollar paid into the treasury on imported goods, there is paid to the manufacturers of this country five, so that the tariff taxation costs not only what is paid into the Custom house, but the incidental increase of expense upon all, or a greater part of the dutiable goods made and consumed in the United States. The lowest estimate that can possibly be placed in this increased cost to the people is hundreds of millions of dollars."

I quote from S. S. Cox, member of the House of Representatives of the United States, in a speech of last year:

"It will not be doubted that it is an under statement that to get $200,000,000 into the treasury it cost $1,000,000,000."

In another part of the same speech he says:

"If I am correctly informed the sum thus paid is five or six times the amount of the duty.

These are extracts from speeches made in Congress by these able men who have clearly pointed out the cause of the depression among the agriculturists in the United States, and the same cause applies to the depression existing among the farmers in Canada. There is no reason in the world why Canada should be depressed, were it not for the enormous cost of living and the added cost of everything they use on their farms. Everything they use is taxed, and our friends opposite must know it. What has come over hon, gentlemen opposite when they are obliged to admit that there is depression in Canada? They told us that there was to be no depression in the country when they got the National Policy well under way, and after they had it in operation, when oats or barley or any other commodity went up a cent a bushel in price, no matter from what cause, they pointed to the National Policy as being the means of increasing the price. What can they say now, when everything is depressed in Canada? How do you expect the country can improve by taxing the meat on the workingmen and the laborers all over the country, who do not now get fresh meat more than once a week, and some of them not more than once a month? How are you going to help them by doubling the price of meat and pork? Is that policy kind to the poor, the hungry, and the needy? Is that the way you are going to help the workingmen, by making the articles of absolute necessity for their existence twice as dear as they would be under free trade? I am a free trader. I want to see the people getting their food and clothing cheap, and that is the evidence of good times for me. But your policy is to keep out everything the people desire, and make it as dear as possible, and by that means make this country rich, and comfortable and happy.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to say a word or two on this item, coming as I do from a county which is largely interested in the apple trade. I suppose there is no county in Ontario so deeply interested in it as that county, as it is well known to be particularly adapted to fruit raising. This duty of 40 cents a barrel on apples will not, I think, be of much advantage to the farmers of Canada, for this reason, that we import 70,000 barrels, and export some 763,000, so that it is quite clear that we produce a great many more apples than we need. must certainly be to our advantage to import the small quantity we do or else we would not import Mr. GILLMOR.

only some 14,000 barrels, but the Province of Quebec imports a very large quantity. There is no doubt that these apples come from southern climates and ripen before our own crop comes into market; consequently, the importation is an advantage to the people of Canada, and to put this duty of 40 cents a barrel on these apples will be of no advantage to our own people, but will only injure those who have been in the habit of importing those early apples. I think it would have been far better to have allowed those apples to come in free, be. cause they do not enter into competition with our own fruit at all. It is perfect nonsense to say that this is going to be a protection to our farmers, when we export so much more than we import. Now, I may take this opportunity of saying that, in my opinion, it would have been far better for Canada if no changes whatever had been made in the tariff this year. I quite admit that some of the changes will benefit the farmers in the part of the country from which I come, notably the increased duty on pork; but while I would like to see those farmers benefited, yet I cannot but recognise the fact that every single dollar you are putting into their pockets comes out of the pockets of the people of the other portions of the Dominion. If the Government had the interests of the farmers at heart, they could easily, in a great many ways, have helped them without increasing the burdens of the people in other parts of the country. For instance, salt is an article of prime necessity to the farmers of Ontario. In my own county it is estimated 20,000 barrels of salt are consumed every year for different purposes, besides a large quantity which used to be applied as a fertiliser to the land, and I am sorry to see that in all these changes there has been no change in the duty on salt, which is subject to a duty of 15 cents per 100 pounds, besides a heavy duty on the barrel. In the town of Courtright, in the County of Lambton, salt was selling, last fall, at the wells at $1.10 a barrel, while right across the River St. Clair, at Marine City, in the State of Michigan, the same kind of salt, with the same weight in the barrel, was selling at 60 cents a barrel. deals largely in salt, and we had occasion to purchase five or six carloads for our own use, and we bought that salt floated across the river and put on the cars at Courtright for 60 cents a barrel. This was early in January of this year. So that the farmers of Ontario have to pay 50 cents a barrel more for their salt than they ought to pay, or than they would pay if the duty on salt were removed. The firm who sold us that salt told us that the average price for salt in Marine City, last year, was 56 cents a barrel, at which price they were enabled to meet all expenses and pay a handsome dividend to their stockholders. While they could do that by selling their salt at 56 cents a barrel, our salt men in Ontario have been charging $1.10 a barrel. There is this also to be borne in mind, that the Government get scarcely any revenue from salt, as there is very little imported into Canada, and if they have the interest of the farmers at heart, why do they not remove that duty altogether? By that simple act they would enable the farmers of Ontario to save 50 cents on every barrel of salt they buy, and my own county, which consumes 20,000 barrels every year, would save $10,000 a year on that article alone. There are many other things on I find that the Province of Ontario imports which the duties could be reduced to the great advantage of the farmers, without increasing the burdens of the people in other parts of the country. I am sorry that any changes at all have been made in the tariff this year, and I believe the action of the Government in making them, and especially in re imposing the duties on apples and green fruits, will, as the hon member for South Oxford has said, cause the Americans to increase their tariff. As the President of the Council has stated, there is great pressure brought to bear upon the American Government in order to help the farmers of the New England States who are suffering from severe depression. Lands in those States have decreased in value and become unproductive in a great measure as they do not raise the grain they formerly did, and the whole tendency of public opinion in the United States has been that something must be done to help these farmers. has been the cause of the agitation for the imposition of duties on goods from Canada, but, as the hon. gentleman also stated, a large portion of the people of the United States neither know nor care anything about Canada. California has no interest in anything imported from Canada. The southern States are equally indifferent, but if it was going to be to their interest to have a lower tariff imposed by Canada, they would support the Democrats in their efforts to reduce their tariff, and thus get their goods into Canada free. Consequently public opinion in the United States has been somewhat divided on this point. A large portion of the people are in favor of increasing the duties on goods from Canada, and a large portion are opposed to that. The action taken by the Government at the start held out no hope to the people of the United States that we were in favor of free trade relations, and especially the unfortunate words of the President of the Council, that he and his Government were decidedly opposed to reciprocity even in natural products. For my life I cannot see how any man who looks at the interests of this country can help acknowledging that reciprocity with the United States in natural products would be greatly to the advantage of our people. I cannot conceive anything that would increase the welfare of Canada so much as a reciprocity treaty with the United States. When we look at the great quantities of exports which we send there - all our barley, horses, wheat, eggs, lambs, sheep and horned cattle of all kinds. Why do we send them there? Simply because it pays us best to do so. We would not send them there if we could get more anywhere We are trying now the experiment of growing two-rowed barley to send to England; but our farmers tried that experiment years ago, and it fell to the ground, because they found that it paid them best to send their barley to the United We send our cattle there and our lumber, because it pays us to do so. Look over the Trade and Navigation Returns and see the enormous quantities of goods which Canada sends to the United States, even under a thirty-five and forty per cent. tariff. It will be the worst possible thing that could happen this Dominion if by any chance the legislation now before Congress should pass. If a duty is placed upon barley, horses and cattle, that will practically exclude our stock and our grains from that market. Therefore, I think the course we are taking crop of the Western States was brought into competo-day in raising our tariff, and especially in tition with the wheat of western Canada, both of replacing on the dutiable list those goods which we put on the free list a few years ago, cannot fail to have the effect of proving to the people of the United States that we are not in favor of reciprocity. They need not entertain any doubt on that subject, since the President of the Council has said that the Government are opposed to reciprocity, and that it would be the very worst thing that could possibly happen for the farmers of this Dominion. I regret very much that those changes have been made. We might have reduced the duty on coal oil, our people are taxed to death. Coal oil can be bought in Detroit for one-half the price we must pay here. Not only the farmers, but the mechanics, artisans and manufacturers are suffering very much on account of the stringency of the tariff. It is known that when the crops are poor and prices low, that affects all other branches I will not detain the House longer, but will conclude by again expressing my regret that those changes should have been made in the tariff, as I believe they will have the effect of strengthening the hands in the United States of those who are in favor of the McKinley Bill,

Mr. MASSON. I will only take up the time of the Committee for a few minutes, in reply to the hon, gentleman who has just sat down. The statements of the hon. gentleman with reference to this duty upon apples are in keeping with the statements of the Opposition in reference to all duties for the protection of farm products. He has told us most positively that the duty on apples will not increase the price even to the growers in his own county, although he admits his is an apple-growing county, but he declares the duty will increase the price for the consumer all over the rest of Canada. Such statements carry their own contradiction, for they are not reconcilable with each other. It is the claim of free traders generally that the duties increase prices, but if they do they must increase the prices to the producer as well as to the consumer. When we find this one-sided free trade class declaring that the duty does not increase the price to the producer, but does to the consumer, we have a new version of the free trade doctrine. The protectionists on the other side appreciate the fact that the duties enhance the price at first, and, if the condition of the producer is not immediately enhanced, at all events he obtains a better market. This policy produces a home market, which every one who is acquainted with questions of trade must admit is the best market. Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that, while this increases the price to the producer, it does not increase the price to the consumer, that the price finds its own level, and in the end it does not cause any increase of price to the consumer. We heard it stated the other night that the increased duty on flour would not benefit either the farmers or the millers, and yet we were told that it would increase the price of flour to the consumer in the east. We were told by the member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) that the increased duty on flour would not increase the price of flour in Nova Scotia or the other Eastern Provinces because there was a different class of producers who were contending for that market, that the producers of America and the producers of Canada were competing, that the wheat them seeking their markets in the east. It has also been stated that in Boston and other eastern markets, Canadian flour, either in bond or out of bond, could be purchased at the same price as American flour. We were told that, so long as Canada exported one bushel of wheat or one barrel of flour, such duties as these would not enhance the price. What are the facts which are patent to every farmer who studies the market as the quotations are published in the newspapers? The markets in Canada have, for many years past, been better than the markets in the towns and cities of the United States in comparison with what they were before the introduction of the National Policy. The statement is made that the duty will not increase the price of apples, and I have no no doubt that the hon. gentleman will apply the same reasoning to the duty on flour, although I understand that a short time ago he desired to have the duty on flour increased. And for what reason? The hon gentleman would apply one rule to flour and another rule to apples, but that might be accounted for by the business which the hon. gentleman follows. From the evidence which we have as to the existing price of flour and from what we know as to the markets of the United States and of Canada, I submit that the increased duty will prove a benefit to the farmers and the millers of Ontario. It has been asked why such a benefit was not given years before. argument of the hon. gentleman is that there was no necessity for protecting flour when we were exporting it; that, while we were producing a surplus of wheat and flour, and exporting more than we were importing, a duty could have no effect in raising the price. It was not until the evidence of the Trade and Navigation Returns was produced in regard to the last financial year, when we were brought face to face with the fact that Canada had imported over half a million barrels of flour, equal to a million and a quarter bushels of American wheat, ground in American mills into flour, and imported to be used by the people of Canada, that the fallacy of the hon. gentleman's argument was apparent. The hon. gentleman says that a great many of the American people do not care much about Canada, that they have not cared much for the interests of Canada in any part of their history, that they abrogated the reciprocity treaty which existed from 1854 to 1866, in their own interests and not for the benefit of Canada. He says that neither of the two great political parties in the United States think of framing a tariff for the benefit of Canada, that both those parties are determined to frame their tariff entirely regardless of the interest of Canada. He might go further, and say that neither of these two parties is in favor of free trade or of anything like it. The question involved in the last presidential election was not a question of free trade against protection, but of an honest and fair protection against prohibition. The present tariff in the United States, which is very high, was originally framed not for the purpose of protection but for revenue, and now they are clinging to the high duties which have been imposed regardless whether the people are taxed beyond the necessities of protection or not. One of the political parties in the United States holds the view that the duties are too high, but they are as strong protectionists as the other party, though they desire that the tariff should be framed for the purpose of protection simply, and not for the purpose of taxation. Mr. Masson.

The hon. gentleman said he was grieved to hear the President of the Council state that he was opposed to reciprocity in natural products, and I may say that the majority of the farmers in Ontario are pleased that the Government, through the President of the Council, have stated that they are opposed to reciprocity in natural products. It was a very strong Liberal farmer, a great supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, whom I first heard make the statement "you are protectionists for the manufacturers and not for the farmers. You are willing to give away the protection you have given the farmers, if the United States will give reciprocity in natural products." That was the statement of a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, who knew that the farmers of Ontario were obtaining a benefit by the tax put upon the importation of natural products, and he feared that this Government would carry out some scheme that would allow natural products again to come in free. I believe it was the hon, gentleman who followed the Finance Minister in the Budget debate, who first stated that an increase of duty on farm products was a bid for the votes of the Ontario farmers. That statement showed that he recognised the fact that the farmers of Ontario would appreciate the benefit which this Government was offering them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the hongentleman explain why the Government is offering reciprocity in natural products to the United States every day by their statutory offer?

Mr. MASSON. Such an offer was put upon the Statute-book and was assumed to be enforceable by hon, gentlemen opposite in detail. Such an offer was placed upon the Statute-book when it was believed, by supporters of the National Policy, that reciprocity in trade would be better than reciprocity in tariff. That was the statement made then. and honestly made, for the reasons I explained the other night, that the people looked back to the good times of those years and forgot the other circumstances that caused the good times, and gave credit to reciprocity for them. But our experience for the last 11 years has shown that our markets to-day in Canada are better, relatively speaking, than they were before; they show us that where we were below the American markets, comparing market with market, we are now above them; they show that where our export price before was way down below the American export price, for the last three years our export price has been higher. I refer more particularly to the larger products such as wheat and grain. We find with regard to them that when American grain came in free—and the same thing applies to apples—their grain, their apples and their fruits come in earlier than ours. This applies with more force to grain than to fruits, because fruits are of a more perishable nature and do not glut the market so long. But in the case of wheat, before our Canadian farmers had their grain ready for the market all our large milling establishments had their mills and their storehouses full of American grain, so that when our Canadian farmer had to sell his grain he had to sell to some trader who would sell to another trader, and so on until it was sold in England. Now, the theory on which protection is said to benefit the producer in this case and also to benefit the consumer, is that it brings the consumer and the producer nearer together. It will be admitted that the producer who first produces the article and passes it out into trade is the man who sells it at the lowest price. The same principle applies at the other end—the man who consumes is the man who pays the largest price. Every hand through which the article passes makes a profit and increases the price. There is the cost of storage, there is the cost of transportation, there is the cost of insurance to protect it while in storage and while in transport. All these things add to the price until it reaches the consumer. The producer gets the lower price and the consumer pays the higher price, and the policy of protection is to bring these parties nearer together by creating a home market, so that the producer may deal more directly with the consumer. Protection increases the manufacturing industries, it increases the population, it increases the consuming power of the country, and in doing so it brings the producer and the consumer nearer together. There are fewer middlemen between them, and the articles are also consumed quicker; there is less cost in storage, there is less cost in maintaining them, and, consequently, all this gain is divided between the consumer and the producer, and in that way both are benefited. At the very inception the producer will be benefited by an increase in price; in the long run the consumer will get the benefit, for as production increases, all these things will go to equalise the price and both will receive a benefit. Our experience during the last eleven years shows that our millers did pay a higher price than the American millers, that the home market was higher than the American market, and the retaining of our home market higher forced our export market higher, until in course of time our export market was far above the export market of the United States. So that the example drawn from our experience shows that what was contended for by protectionists on that point has been realised in

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to have a ruling from the Chairman, whether at each stage in the discussion of this tariff, it is proper to go into a general disquisition as to the merits of protection and free trade. I would like to know, because at some stage in the progress of these resolutions I may desire to take advantage of the ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman is travelling beyond the item.

Mr. MASSON. I have only been following the remarks of several hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on this question. However, I cheerfully bow to the ruling of the Chair, and if it is enforced to the end of the debate, I shall feel that I have contributed something towards shortening the debate. I had nearly concluded my remarks when the hon. gentleman interrupted me, and I will only say further that there is no doubt that the statement made by the hon. member for Kent that the American fruit comes in earlier than ours, is a cogent reason why there should be a duty placed upon it, because in coming in before ours it captures our markets. They are producers also to a larger extent than we are, and they pour in and fill our markets, and thus our producer has got to seek a distant market for this perishable article, instead of having a market at his doors. In so doing the prices are not only reduced for the time but permanently and generally reduced. 1081

Mr. WALDIE. We have listened to a very able dissertation from an hon. gentleman who evidently does not understand matters of trade, because I never heard that our export market price could be above the price of the market to which we exported, because the moment such an advance took place exportation would cease. I represent a county where apples are a very large item of export, and where the people are very much interested in small fruit culture, but I am not aware that they asked for the protection of apples. Apples have been free in this country. And imports of apples have taken place owing to rates of freight and for geographical There were imported in the Province of Quebec 30,000 barrels, from Rochester, Oswego and Ogdensburgh, part to be sold in Montreal, and the balance exported. As they came in free they paid no duty, but the transportation charges were beneficial to our railway companies. We are an exporting country so far as apples are concerned and the quality of our apples command good prices. If the statements of the Minister of Customs and the President of the Council were correct, that this tariff is a Canadian tariff, there was no necessity to prove that the McKinley tariff was sure to come into force. If we are legislating purely for Canada, the Government had an opportunity in 1887, to place a duty on fruit, and they did so, and then they receded from that duty, I suppose in the interests of Canada. During the discussion today, it has been asserted that, because the Mc-Kinley tariff was sure to come into force, these changes in our tariff were justified. That is making it a retaliatory tariff, which hon gentlemen opposite have always denied. I am not in favor of a retaliatory tariff, while I am in favor of a Canadian tariff, and I am quite willing to endorse any proposition that is in the interests of our people. I do not think the duty on apples is required, or is in the interests of the people.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words in reply to the President of the Council. hon. Minister led the House to believe that the McKinley tariff was virtually adopted by the United States, and that the course now dopted by the Canadians was because the McKinley tariff had become a fixed fact. In the State of New York, in Boston, Buffalo and several other large cities a most hostile feeling has been developed towards certain provisions in the McKinley tariff, including hides and potatotes; and it is very doubtful whether that Bill will become law. imposition of the duty on apples was undoubtedly a great mistake, especially in view of the fact that we are large exporters of apples. While we export largely to Great Britain we also export largely to the United States, and it is not in accordance with common sense to slap one of your best customers in the face. The worst feature of the whole action of the Government is that they are driving the Republican party to carry out the retaliatory policy introduced by the McKinley tariff.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to take exception to the statement made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) to the effect that this duty was inserted at the request of all the producers and exporters of apples in Canada. I represent a region of country that exports as many apples as any other portion of Canada, and I know that statement is not a fact. On the contrary, the Fruit Growers Association of Nova Scotia took up this question and passed a resolution to the effect that they hoped the Dominion Government would not impose any duty upon apples, for fear that the United States might retaliate by a corresponding duty. It is only fair to my constituents that I should make this statement, and I have a letter from the President of the Fruit Growers Association, one of the most prominent Conservatives in the western part of Nova Scotia, and another letter from the secretary of that association, also a very prominent Conservative, saying they hope the Government will not reimpose this duty. In addition to that, I would remind the Government that only during the present Session a convention of the representatives of fruit growers in the Dominion was held in Ottawa. The Minister of Agriculture was present, and he will bear me out in this statement, that an attempt was made by certain delegates to have a resolution passed calling on the Government to impose a duty on the resolution was withdrawn. The apples, but the resolution was withdrawn. position taken by the hon member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) is not sustained by the facts; and so far from wishing anything of this kind, the fruitgrowers, at all events in the eastern portion of the Dominion, were exceedingly anxious that it should not have been done. Independent of those opinions I have quoted, I think it is very unfortunate that the Government should have taken this Apples constitute one of those articles contained in the famous statutory reciprocity offer made to the Government of the United States. It is one of the articles upon which the United States withdrew their duty some time ago, and to which action the Government of this country responded only two years since. Even supposing, as our Government claim, that the McKinley Bill is more or less a fait accompli—which I do not admit—it is very unfortunate at this particular juncture and exceedingly unwise that the Government should take this step. Surely they could have waited for another year, and if Americans had adopted a duty upon apples, and it were then thought wise that our Government should propose one, it would have been time enough for them to have taken this course. The hon, member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) very properly pointed out that this duty cannot help the fruit-growers of this country, while it is a tax upon an important article of food. It cannot benefit the fruit-growers because of the fact that the apples imported into this country are imported before our own apples are ripe. It is sufficient to look at the trade returns to prove that the duty will not have any beneficial effect. We imported last year only about 70,000 barrels of apples, while we exported about ten times that quantity. Admitting even that the apples imported are used in this country-which is not at all established, because it is probable that most of them were shipped to the old country from Montreal-the small importation could have no effect on supply and demand, when it is shown that we exported ten times the quantity. One hon. gentleman has spoken about our getting a home market for our producers. What would be the good of a home market for our own producers when we export 700,000 barrels of apples? If our producers had nothing to depend upon but the home of the Government wish to encourage the people to Mr. Borden.

market they would be in a very sorry plight in.

Mr. WATSON. I cannot allow this item to pass without raising my voice in protest against this very unfair and unjust tax on the people I represent. This is a tax placed directly on the people of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, because in those Provinces we do not grow apples, and our apples have to come from Eastern Canada or from the United States. We are so situated in Manitoba that the freight rates are against our bringing them cheaply from Eastern Canada. By this tax you compel us to bring our apples a thousand or fifteen hundred miles, instead of allowing us to bring them one-half the distance, from the United States. We are told by the Minister of Finance that he has a surplus, and I cannot see any reason whatever why the Government should place apples on the dutiable list again, if it is not for revenue purposes. The balance of trade in apples is in our favor, because while we only import 70,000 barrels a year, we export to the United States 144,618 barrels, and to Great Britain 619,216 barrels, or ten times more than we import. This duty is a hardship on the people of the North-West. If the Government are going to force the people of the North-West to take their apples from Eastern Canada instead of from the United States why do they not say so? I do not see that even the other Provinces outside of Manitoba will be benefited by the imposition of this duty. In 1888, the first year apples were on the free list, and before people got in the way of it, Manitoba imported 5,000 barrels from the United States. I have no doubt that when the returns come down for last year we will find that instead of 5,000 barrels we imported 30,000 or 40,000 barrels from the United States, because last year the apple crop in Ontario was almost a failure. If the Government wished to help the fruit-growers of the country they would succeed much better by placing shrubs and trees on the free list than by placing a duty on apples. It is hard to understand the logic of the arguments of the hon. the President of the Council. A short time ago he told us that free trade in the natural products of the country would ruin the Canadian farmer, but he tells us to night in a lengthened argument that the Americans now feel that they have to put up a wall of protection against the Canadian farmers, because they are competing successfully against the American farmers in the United States markets. I cannot understand the hon gentleman's logic, unless it is that the position he occupies now is not the same as that occupied by him some years ago, when I used to think he talked good sense and good logic. As the Chair has ruled that we should confine ourselves to the articles under discussion, I am not at liberty to reply to the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite, some of which are very amusing to hon, gentlemen on this side of the House. We heard the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) stating that protection had done so much for the farmers that it actually how he arrived at that sort of reasoning, for it is hard to understand how any natural product of our raise their own food, they should have admitted corn free instead of putting a duty upon pork, because it would be much more in the interest of the farmer. They say they are going to admit corn free for human food, but why should they not admit corn free to feed the hogs that make human food? Notwithstanding what has been said in this House about the farmers of the North-West by hon. gentlemen from Manitoba and the Territories, I may say that all that we want is a fair field and no favor, and we are prepared to compete with the agriculturists of any part of the world. We don't want you to say that we are protected in our beef and pork. We can grow those commodities there as cheaply as any place in the world, but we object to being taxed for everything that is used by the farmers. The people of Manitoba do want unrestricted trade with the United States. I regret very much that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs have seen fit to again place a duty on fruits, because it appears to me that it is simply an attempt at retaliation against the American people. We do not want a revenue, and it appears to me that this duty is put on for nothing else but retaliation, and will no doubt have great weight with the Americans in inducing them to pass the McKinley Bill. Two or three years ago, after hon. gentlemen opposite had been arguing that unrestricted trade would be injurious to this country, Sir Charles Tupper came into the House and stated that so far as lumber was concerned, he would not reflect on the intelligence of this House by saying that the lumbermen would not be benefited by unrestricted trade. With regard to fruits, I find that on the 20th of February, 1889, a question was asked in this House as to the quantity of fruits imported into this country when they were on the free list. The question was asked by Mr. Boyle, the mem for Monck, and it was answered by the hon. Minister of Customs in the following words:-

"The value of our entire importations from the United States of green fruits, seeds, trees, and articles placed on the free list by Order in Council of the 4th April, 1889, from that date to 1st January, 1889, is $831,399. The amount of revenue which would have been collected upon such importations if they had not been placed upon the free list, is $219,636. The value of such importations from the United States for the corresponding period of the previous year, that is to say, from the 4th April, 1887, to the 1st January, 1889, was $498,183. The value of our exports to the United States of those articles, from 4th April, 1888, until 1st January, 1889, is $1.486,022, of which apples amounted to the sum of $1.315,452; berries, $80,690; seeds, &c., $50,000; leaving $40,570 for the smaller fruits."

Now, it appears to me that if we attempt to retaliate on the United States, even with regard to the duty on apples, we are going to be at a great loss, because according to the statement of the hon. Minister of Customs we exported to the United States nearly a million and a half dollars worth of fruit between April and January, 1889. It is a very serious matter for the consideration of this House, and those who represent the farmers here should in their interest protest against this increase.

Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries and strawberries, N.E.S., three cents per pound—the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty. Cherries and currants, one cent per quart. Cranberries, plums and quinces, thirty cents per bushel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to ascertain definitely what the weight of the package means. I understood the Minister to say the other day that he did not mean to include the crates in which a number of boxes are placed, but simply the small light boxes in which the fruits are stored.

Mr. BOWELL. That is the case. The crates were never charged duty under the old tariff, which read the same way as this, except that this is a lower rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is satisfactory so far as it goes. I am not going to revive in detail the discussion that has taken place on apples; but what has been said on apples applies to these items measureably. It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman does not require these duties for revenue purposes, for it is more than probable that the increase will reduce imports, if not destroy them altogether. What we are doing here, it appears to me, is open to several objections. In the first place, we are going to destroy a valuable and important trade, which is increasing all the time; in the next place, we are deliberately depriving a very large number of our people of what may be called a luxury, but what in this climate is in many respects an extremely useful, wholesome and palatable contribution to the food of the people. I will read for the benefit of the hon. Minister of Customs and hon. gentlemen opposite an article from a supporter of their own, the London Free

"The idea of raising the duties on such articles as fruits is one that does not now run current with public necessity or public opinion. The tact is that modern modes of transit have made it possible for us to avail ourselves of the early fruits that are grown to the south of us at a period of the year when our own fields are still in a frozen condition. The use of those articles is not only pleasant but valuable, and it seems to be an unnecessary interference with the habits of the people to place a tax on them in such a way, to such an extent, as to deprive the general consumer of the privilege of using the 'fruits of the earth —no matter whence they may come—to his own advantage."

For once I entirely agree with the London Free Press, that this is in every possible shape or way an objectionable duty. There is no question that we were obtaining an immense quantity of valuable fruit from the United States, which could by no possibility be produced in this country; and there is no question that these duties are reimposed, not in the public interest, but simply as a sop to a few fruit-growers in certain parts of the Province of Ontario. For their sake a gross injury is inflicted on the community, and in particular on several Provinces which are even less able than Ontario to supply themselves with fruit.

Mr. GILLMOR. In conversation with intelligent men I have often heard it stated that if the Government wish to encourage an industry that would be of vast advantage to Canada, they should encourage the production of jams, jellies and preserves for exportation, instead of importing them as we do now from England. The fruits are grown on perhaps the dearest soils in the world, but in England they have the advantage of cheap sugar, while we in Canada can hardly afford to preserve any fruits for our own use. In the Maritime Provinces, whatever may be the case in other parts of Canada, we have hundreds of thousands of bushels of native wild fruits going to waste on the ground every year, because we cannot go into the manufacture of jams and jellies owing to the high price of sugar. I see by the quotations to-day that granulated sugar in England can be bought at three cents a pound. If it were so cheap in this country we could produce immense quantities of jams and jellies from these wild fruits, and send them to other countries.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister to explain why he has put these articles on the dutiable list. I have not heard him give any argument in favor of the motion. I think there ought to be a reason assigned.

Mr. ELLIS. The duty on these small fruits is certainly very objectionable to the people of the Province in which I live. The course of trade there is that we import in the early part of the season a great quantity of these fruits from the United States, and later on we send back our fruits to them, so that there is quite a trade both ways. The markets of Boston, and probably New York, are supplied with fruits like strawberries a fortnight later by our growers than they could supply themselves. Now it is proposed to put a restraint upon that principle by this tariff. With regard to peaches and fruit of that kind, which we cannot raise in the Maritime Provinces at all, the duty is objectionable, simply because these fruits are used largely as food when they are in season.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The imposition of this duty will be considered very objectionable in the Maritime Provinces. We rely upon the American market for our small fruits for about a fortnight before we produce them ourselves, and from that time forward they come into our market. Later in the season we send our fruits by steamer to the American market. That trade is increasing, and it would be disastrous to that trade if the people of the United States would entertain the view that the imposition of these duties generally, and on these items more particularly, means that we consider ourselves independent of them, and retaliate. Now, with regard to peaches, no matter what the duty is, we must get them from the United States, as Ontario is too far away for us to import them from that Province. If we had our choice and could import our peaches either from Ontario or from Boston, the hardship would not be so great, but, under the circumstances, we have to get them from Boston by steamer, which only takes from twelve to twenty-four hours, while from Ontario the voy. age would take four or five days. The Government are, therefore, making us pay a duty, not to protect any one, but simply to take more money out of the people.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister what is the reason for the change in policy? Two years ago the Government put these fruits on the free list, and now they make them dutiable. Have the Government any continuity of policy, or is it a mere matter of whim? I would ask them also what is the weight of a basket of peaches, so that we may know what the duty per pound will really amount to?

Mr. HESSON. Numerous deputations of people interested in the fruit-growing trade interviewed the Government on this matter, and I had the pleasure of forming part of a deputation which waited on the Minister of Customs and impressed on him the desirability of protecting our fruit-growing industry. That industry was depressed on account of the Americans flooding our market for a few weeks previous to our fruits coming in, so that our people could not get a fair price for their goods. When the American fruits came in first, our people had to pay fancy prices, from 50 cents to 70 cents for strawberries, but when the time came for our fruits to be put on the market, they reduced their price to 15 cents and lower, and flooded our market with their cheap fruit, sometimes as low as 5 cents. Therefore our fruit-growers complained that the Americans had possession of the Canadian market. If people want these fancy American fruits, let them pay for them. They can have peaches at a cent a pound duty.

Mr. MULOCK. How much will that be on the basket?

Mr. HESSON. Fifteen or 20 cents. A small basket of peaches will weigh about 20 or 30 pounds, and a cent a pound is not expensive for peaches. It is perfectly in the line of the National Policy that these fruit-growers, no matter how humble they may be, should be able to make their honest living in their own country, and have the benefit of their own market. The hon. gentleman knows well that there was pressure brought upon the Government—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. HESSON. And the Government did not, as the hon. gentleman foolishly did, when he was in office, close their ears to the complaints of men in business who were endeavoring to make a living in their own country. That is what was wanted in those times. It was not considered that these men had a right to be heard. I say that the interests and the industries of this country required these men to come to the Capital and place their requirements before the Government. Those who are not depressed probably remain at home.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon, gentleman said he accompanied a deputation of fruit-growers. Will he state who they were?

Mr. HESSON. They were from all parts of the country. The president of the association was here.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who was he?

Mr. HESSON. He was Mr. Wellington, of Toronto.

Mr. MULOCK. Were the consumers represented on that occasion, or was it simply ex parte? I understand that my hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces are compelled to obtain American fruit.

Mr. WATSON. This is a very unjust tax, and I was surprised to hear the member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) express himself in favor of it. I do not know that he represents a fruit-growing constituency.

Mr. HESSON. The hon, gentleman is mistakell. We exported thousands of barrels of apples in 1888.

Mr. WATSON. What we are talking about now is small fruit, which is to be taxed 3 cents a pound. This is a tax which more than nine-tenths of the people of the Dominion will have to pay for the benefit of the fruit-growers in three counties in Ontario. I believe this will increase the price of fruit 100 per cent. Not only that, but these are perishable goods, and a great proportion of those which are shipped in are spoiled, and the consumer has to pay for the loss of the retail dealer. This is class legislation of the worst kind. I believe that, including the package, the duty will amount to at least 4 cents a pound, and, perhaps, 5 cents.

 $\ensuremath{\mathrm{Mr}}.$ MONCRIEFF. Can you not grow strawberries in Manitoba ?

Mr. WATSON. We grow very few.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was anxious to know why these duties were re-imposed. I can only give him the same answer as I did in regard to other articles. When the duties were previously imposed upon fruits, the growth of fruit was encouraged in this country, but, after the duty was taken off, hundreds of acres which were under cultivation had to be diverted to other purposes, and the capital which the fruitgrowers had invested in those enterprises was lost. I have heard of cases where hundreds of acres were added to orchards and gardens to extend this industry and to supply the demand of this country, but, as soon as the duties were removed, the competition from across the line was so great that these lands became valueless for this purpose. The Government believing in giving protection to all classes of interests-not only to manufacturers, but to agriculturists and fruit-growers, but to all other interests—and believing that we have in this country all the area required to grow the fruits and at the same time to give employment to the people of our own country, have proposed that this duty should be re-imposed. The suggestion of the hon, member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) was of a practical character and deserves the consideration of the Government. If the hon, gentleman looks at the Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that the exportation of canned fruits is growing very rapidly. I know that a very large quantity of canned fruits are being exported from the county represented by the hon, member for Prince Edward, and I am sure that this industry will grow just in proportion to the quantity of land brought under fruit cultivation there. As to peaches, I am informed that the weight per basket will reach from fifteen or sixteen pounds to twenty or twenty-two pounds. The larger basket, I am informed, will weigh from one to two pounds, and the smaller basket will not exceed a pound and a half.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon, member for Lincoln could tell us the weight of the half-bushel ${\rm Mr.}$ RYKERT. From sixteen to twenty-two pounds.

Mr. MULOCK. That means a tax of from 16 to 22 cents, so it might average 25 cents a basket. I would like to ask the Minister what the effect was on the price of Canadian fruits when the American fruit was duty free.

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot tell, but I suppose it affected the price of early strawberries.

 $\rm Mr.$ HESSON. They were sold at Toronto for 5 cents, and less than that.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the Minister should drop this item referring to peaches. We cannot raise peaches in this country except in a small part of Ontario, and we cannot get them in the eastern part of Canada by express in less than seven or eight days, and by that time the fruit is spoiled. We shall have to get our peaches from the United States; therefore, I think this item of peaches should be dropped. If you are going to raise them in Ontario, and we could get them from Ontario, then your position would be sound, from your point of view, but in the Maritime Provinces we can neither raise peaches nor can we get them from Ontario. Therefore this is an entirely exceptional tax upon the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. TAYLOR. You can get them from Niagara in 48 hours by express.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon, gentleman is entirely mistaken, unless you get them by express, which will cost you five times more than they are worth. By ordinary express you cannot get them under five or six days.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is nonsense to talk about peaches being sent from Ontario to the Maritime Provinces. We talked last year about sending buggy tops from Ontario to the Maritime Provinces; that is possible, but it is not possible with peaches. There is no better evidence of the gross injustice of your protective system than this very item. Here is a most desirable article of food. We cannot raise it in the Maritime Provinces, and we have to go to the States for it; therefore you are putting a direct tax upon the people of the Maritime Provinces. It cannot be defended even on protective principles. It is a gross injustice; but such is the demoralising effect of the tariff that even hon, members from the Maritime Provinces supporting the Government will be among the first to stand up and support this tax. I do not blame the Minister of Customs a bit; it is the members from the Maritime Provinces that I blame for allowing the iniquities of this protective tariff, because if they were true to the people who sent them here they would be able to prevent them. Still, they will support the Minister of Customs in this piece of iniquity, and in kindred pieces of iniquity, for the benefit of a few people in Ontario who may have a very good case as against their immediate neighbors. You may have a good case on behalf of the growers of peaches and small fruits in the western peninsula of Ontario, in preventing fruit from coming into that part of the country, that is, from a protectionist standpoint; but when you tax people a thousand miles away from them, I say the act cannot be characterised otherwise than as a piece of iniquity and an injustice. I was surprised to hear the hon, member for York ask if the consumers were invited to take part in the discussion when these taxes were agreed upon. He knows that the consumer's interest is not considered here, it is only the interests of a small class the manufacturers that are considered. This class of interests have all the consideration of the Government and they give a good quid pro quo in return. I have not seen any instances yet where the consumer's interest was allowed to override that of some small producer.

Mr. HESSON. It is not unusual to see a large quantity of fruit come down from California. And I do not think the Maritime Provinces are so far away from Ontario as we are from California. We have also seen fruit from British Columbia, and I have seen peaches, pears, plums and grapes from California. I venture to think that my hon. friend himself has seen California fruit in the markets of his own Province. I have myself seen in Brandon, and Winnipeg British Columbia fruits. As Prince Edward Island is no further from the fruit-growing district of Ontario than is the State of California from its eastern market, the members from Prince Edward Island need not despair of receiving an ample supply of fruit from Ontario.

Peaches, one cent per pound—the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Mr. PLATT. Experience has shown that the Ontario peach crop does not find its way more than one hundred miles east of Toronto, and even at Belleville there are ten baskets of the United States peaches to one basket grown in this country. Of recent years there has been no extension eastward of trade in the western Ontario peach crop, and it cannot compete with the American peach crop even as far east as Montreal. Reference has been made to the growth of the fruit canning industry in Picton. That industry is one that deserves to be looked after as carefully as the peach growing industry, because it is of more general importance. The imposition of a duty on green fruits cannot in any way benefit the fruit canning industry, and it must have an entirely opposite Great advantage accrued to this industry when we had free fruits. One season, when there was a smaller crop, one of the factories sent to the other side and got a schooner load of fruits, which were afterwards canned in Picton. The admission of peaches free would be of vast benefit to our canning factories. There could be nothing more outrageous than the imposition of duties on early southern fruits.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Minister of Customs any idea of the quantity of peaches grown in Canada?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot tell you.

Mr. WATSON. I thought perhaps the deputation that visited the hon. gentleman, with a view to securing the duty would have informed him. It appears that some years there is hardly any crop, and if there is any fruit that should be admitted free it is peaches. When the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Larivière) was a member of the Government of Manitoba and made up a statement of the disadvantages under which it was suffering, he protested very strongly against duties on fruits, and I will be glad to hear from him now.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.45 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th April, 1890.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPRESENTATION OF NEW WESTMIN-STER, B.C.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that, having received a notification of a vacancy in the representation of the Electoral Mr. Hesson.

District of New Westminster, B.C., by the demise of Donald Chisholm, Esq., I have issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ for an election in the said electoral district.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call attention to the report presented by the Committee on Printing, and to ask that it may be understood that that report shall not be adopted without notice being given, as it is desirable there should be some discussion on it.

Mr. BERGIN. I shall put a notice on the paper. I refrained from moving the adoption of the report to-day in order that I might consult the Premier about it first.

REPRESENTATION OF KENT, N.B.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister whether the rumor is true that a vacancy had occurred in the County of Kent, by the appointing of the sitting member to be county judge, in the place of the late Mr. Botsford.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is true.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE—ANDERSON'S CONTRACT.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to a letter published in the Montreal Herald, on the 4th of April, from Messrs. Anderson & Co., by which it would appear that the contract with them for a fast mail service was not terminated for the reason assigned by the First Minister. The First Minister said that Messrs. Anderson, having been unable to procure the necessary funds, had given notice that they could not carry out the contract, but these gentlemen reply as follows:—

"We consider it due to ourselves to state that the last sentence of this extract entirely misrepresents our reasons for surrendering the contract."

It is very important, in view of this statement, that the House should be put in possession of the true reasons which influenced the Messrs. Anderson—whether it was on account of the terminal points asked for by the Government, or the speed asked for, or any other consideration. It would be advisable, therefore, to have this contract and the correspondence relating to it placed before the House. It is very important, at this stage of the question, to know exactly how it was viewed by such an eminent shipping firm as the Messrs. Anderson, and it is due to the House that all the correspondence relating to the contract should be laid on the Table, so that the public may judge fairly the grounds on which the Messrs. Anderson gave up the contract.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question, as to whether or not the Government are prepared to lay the contract and papers before the House, this was discussed some three or four weeks ago on a motion put by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and the First Minister and myself replied that it was not in the public interest to do so. Matters have not changed since. As regards the question raised between the First Minister and the Messrs. Anderson, I prefer that the First Minister should deal with that himself. My recollection is, that the Messrs. Anderson did not carry out the provisions of the contract because of their failure, for various reasons, to interest capitalists in the undertaking, and, therefore, they surrendered it into the hands of the Government.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman has repeated the statement, that the Messrs. Anderson failed to carry out the contract because they were unable to supply the necessary capital. The Messrs. Anderson emphatically deny this. It is proper, in the changed position of the question to day, that the House should be put in possession of the reason why the contract was terminated.

Mr. FOSTER. I will call the attention of the First Minister to the matter to-day.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of Bill (No. 65) further to amend the criminal law.

Mr. BERGIN moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be sent back to the Committee with instructions to omit all that portion of the second section after the word "ward" on the tenth line and down to the word "is" on the fourteenth line of the Bill.

He said: I will state as briefly as possible why I object to the words which I propose should be expunged. The first portion of the clause, which relates to a ward and her guardian, is, I think, legislation in the right direction, but I object to the rest of the clause, because I think it opens the door to conspiracies and blackmail, and is likely to lead to much more injury than benefit to the community. Take the case of the manager of a department in one of our great cotton or woollen mills. If, for any reason, whether well or ill founded, one or more of the operatives desire to get rid of that manager, all they have to do is to conspire and take advantage of this Bill, and the man will be obliged to flee the country, or to await arrest and imprisonment. I understand that the Minister of Justice has provided a certain sort of security for the party who is charged, but that is far from being sufficient. It is true that the party may himself give testimony on his own behalf, and then it would be a case of one witness against another; but anyone who is desirous of doing such an injury to an overseer can very easily obtain another to join in the plot, because it is probable that more than one may desire to remove the overseer, and in that case the man is completely at their mercy. I know that such things have occurred. We know that such cases have occurred in my own town, and we must, if possible, protect these people against conspiracies of that kind. Again, I object to this clause because it is class legislation. I am not aware of any reason that has been advanced to justify the application of this clause solely to persons employed in a factory. It may be said, and I have no doubt it will be said, that the labor organisations in this country have asked for protection of this kind for the female operatives. The mistake they make is that they have not remembered that theirs is not the only class in the community, that there are other classes, and I think it is a great mistake on the part of the labor organisations to ask for this special legislation, because, in a sense, it brands the operatives as being less able to protect their own virtue than any other class. It is, therefore, invidious legislation, and seems to me to stigmatise one class in the community unfairly. For these reasons, I think this provision ought not to be adopted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope the House will not take the view the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) does, although I am aware that he has considered the subject very carefully and that he takes exception to the clause for reasons which influence his judgment. This section, as I previously explained to the Committee, is intended for the protection of operatives in factories. It is one of the measures which were promised in the Speech from the Throne in relation to labor, and it was pressed upon the attention of the Government by the delegates of the Knights of Labor organisation who were connected with the subject of legislation. I use the report made by that delegation, not for the purpose of influencing the opinion of the House on the ground that they represented an organisation which is powerful as to numbers and influence in the country, but because they were speaking for their own class, and they must have a better knowledge as to the necessity of legislation of this kind for their own class than the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) or myself.
When persons having such knowledge ask for legislation of this kind, I think it would be very hard for Parliament to turn a deaf ear to them. The statement which they made in their report of last year is this:

"Although your committee is glad to believe that so far in Canada the evil does not exist to any appreciable extent, yet by reports from other countries, and through their knowledge of the conditions which sometimes exist in workshops and factories where women and girls are employed, they are convinced that it would be the part of wisdom at the present time to throw around female employés special legal protection against seduction by employers, superintendents and foremen, who, by reason of their power over them, may be in a position to unduly coerce them. We have, therefore, urged upon the Premier and the Minister of Justice the desirability of enacting legislation making it a criminal offence, punishable by severe penalties, for any employer, superintendent, overseer, foreman or other person exercising authority over a female employé, either with or without consent. The views of your committee seemed to meet with the approval of both gentlemen, who expressed themselves as favorable to such a measure, provided proper precautions were taken against the Act being used for purposes of blackmail. We would, therefore, recommend that it be an instruction to our successors to press for legislation in the direction indicated."

I take it that, in answer to a request of that kind, it is not at all sufficient to say that the legislation demanded may be made an evil use of. The same arguments—only in a greater degree—could be availed of against any section of our criminal code, and against any part of the criminal law imposing punishments of any kind. I say in a greater degree, because here we have taken unusual precautions to provide against the abuse of this section.

Mr. MITCHELL. How?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have provided in this case that—as is provided in only two or three other cases in the whole criminal code—the accused person can give evidence in his own behalf. We have also provided that there shall be corroborative evidence of the testimony of the accuser, and that there shall be evidence also of the previous chaste character of the accuser. Under these circumstances, not one of the hon. gentlemen who contested the progress of this Bill in Committee was able to suggest any other safeguard that should be adopted, but they met it with the statement that it was liable to abuse, and for that reason the people should be refused the protection to which they are entitled, and which was requested on behalf of a large section of them. Now, with regard to the other clauses of this Bill, I submit it does not lie in the mouth of an hon. gentleman making an argument against the protection that is given here to say that there are other classes who ought to have the protection extended to them. That, as an argument, would be available to my hon. friend if he proposed this Bill should be referred back to Committee for the purpose of enlarging its provisions and extending them to other classes. On this point I have simply to say now, as I said in Committee, when, I think, the hon gentleman was not here to hear me, that we have a particular request from those who have a right to be heard for legislation of this kind; we have evidence of an evil existing to some extent in this country, and likely to grow, when we regard the experience of other countries, and we propose here practical legislation to meet a practical evil. When necessity requires this provision to be enlarged, I think I may hope for the support of the hon, gentleman to make it extend to any class that asks for protection, or that shows a case for such protection to be given. I think, when we consider the discretion which will exist on the part of the court, and when we remember the precautions which are taken in respect to the evidence of the defendant, it is very difficult to imagine a case where there might be a successful conspiracy for the purpose of securing the conviction of a foreman or a superintendent who is distasteful to the employé.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will be in the recollection of the House that when this Bill was introduced and the hon. gentleman gave an explanation of the motives and object of the Bill, I took exception to this particular section on the ground that it would prove a fertile source of blackmailing. that objection still stands. It is a well-known fact that blackmailing very frequently prevails, and that women are just as liable, indeed far more liable, to be the authors of blackmail against men, than that they should be the victims of the evils to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and which he states are the foundation of this section of the Bill. Now, the hon. gentleman bases this measure upon the fact that it had been indicated in the Speech from the Throne. Well, that may be, but there are a great many features in that Bill, and it does not follow that because it was indicated in the Speech from the Throne, therefore every feature of that Bill, every section of it, should be adopted verbatim et literatim in this House. The hon, gentleman says that the reason why the Government promised this legislation in the Queen's Speech was the fact that the Knights of Labor—I presume it is from their report that the hon, gentleman read—asked that legislation of this character should be passed. He says they are much better Sir John Thompson.

informed as to the wants and interests of their class than the hon. gentleman who moved this amend-ment, or myself, could possibly be. Now, what is that recommendation which was made by this Labor Commission? Their report merely states that this evil had existed in other great and popu. lous countries, in large communities on the other side of the water and on the other side of the line. where larger crowds of females are crowded together. and perhaps with less facilities for keeping the sexes separate than we have in the factories of this country; but the very report which the hon. gentleman has read declares that no positive evil of that kind exists in this country. Therefore, he asks this House to adopt legislation in anticipation of any evil which may possibly arise, but of which we have no evidence that it exists at present. I entirely agree with the amendment moved by my hon. friend, and it will receive my support. I hold this legislation is unnecessary, that it is uncalled for. If the hon, gentleman founds an argument to this House in favor of this legislation upon the report of the Labor Commission, then I say this Bill does not go far enough. What the hon. gentleman should do, in order to be consistent, is to strike out the restrictions that he has introduced in this Bill where he uses the word "factory, mill or workshop," where he says protection is necessary for females associated in labor where they are grouped together in buildings, and he should apply this very clause to all classes of female labor, because we know that if they require protection in factories, mills or workshops, they require it equally in the wholesale and retail shops, where they are grouped together by the dozen, throughout the chief mercantile centres of this land. They require it equally in the numerous offices where lady type-writers are brought into close proximity with the people who employ them and who control them; they require it equally in offices of the telegraph companies, where you will find thirty or forty of them grouped together under one or two gentlemen; they require it equally in telephone offices where the same condition of things exist, and in the offices of the Civil Service, where females are employed and who are under the control of the heads of Departments. I may tell my hon. friend that the Civil Service has not always been considered the purest place for ladies to be engaged. The hon. Minister stated the other day that he had never heard such a thing even hinted at. Let me ask his associates in the Council, let me ask those hon. gentlemen who sit in Council with him every day, whether they have heard anything of that kind. Let me ask any member of this House whether he has ever heard, and I will venture to say that nine out of ten of the members of this House have heard reports of that kind. Then, Sir, is it not required in public schools There is also the large class of servants employed in the numerous hotels throughout the country. and indeed in every branch or occupation where females are employed, and where they require protection equally as much as they do in factories. Now, Sir, I object to the legislation of my hon-friend on these grounds. First, I say that the clause is not necessary at all, and that it will afford a strong inducement to blackmailing. In the second place, if it is required at all, it is unfair that an important class and the most numerous class of females in this country should be precluded from the benefits of the protection which the hon gentleman says is so necessary. I do not attach the same meaning to that report of the Labor Commission that the hon. gentleman does. I do not understand that the Labor Commission have asked for the legislation which the hon. gentleman has introduced in this Bill; they certainly have not asked for partial protection to one particular class of people; they have asked for protection to all, or they have asked it for none. Therefore I shall support the amendment of my hon friend.

Mr. CHARLTON. It will be in the recollection of the House, no doubt, that several years ago I had the honor to introduce a Bill dealing with offences of the character dealt with in this Bill; and the great objection raised to that Bill in the discussion of the subject during several Sessions was the objection raised to-day, that it would lead to cases of blackmail, that the Bill would lead to many offences of that kind. After struggling three or four years the Bill became the law of the Dominion, and it has been the law for several years, and many cases have been tried under it. It contains the same provisions with respect to evidence as are found in this Bill. It gives to the party accused the right to give his evidence, and it requires corroborative evidence, and I think experience of the public with respect to that Bill, will be a very good criterion as to the results which will follow the present Bill. I have never heard of any case of blackmailing under that Act; I never heard of any attempt of blackmailing under

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you heard of the other case?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; many cases have been tried under the Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon, gentleman name instances?

Mr. CHARLTON. I cannot give them just now. From time to time reports appear in the newspapers of trials under that Act; and in the practical operation of the Act we have pretty fair evidence that it is impossible to blackmail under its provisions, and it will be equally so under the provisions of the present Bill submitted by the hon. Minister of Justice. I do not believe any danger exists on that score, and I have no hesitation in the state of the state tion in supporting the Bill so far as objections with respect to blackmailing may be made against it. I can agree with the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that the provisions of the Bill might possibly be extended, but the Bill, so far as it goes, is a good measure, and I have no fear whatever that the evil results anticipated by the hon member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), and the hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), with respect to abuses under it by levying blackmail, will ever be realised.

Mr. TISDALE. I will read what a learned judge of the Superior Court of Ontario said only Yesterday in connection with offences of this sort. I am told that a considerable number of hon. members of this House do not believe attempts to blackmail are made in this country, so the remarks of this judge to the jury will be applicable. The case before the court was one of blackmail, a Coughlin, money claim for indecent assault. His Lordship, addressing the jury,

"Spoke strongly of the action of parties who bring cases of this kind into court for the purposes of blackmail. This was the second action of the kind tried at these assizes, and a very bold attempt to extort money. 'That may be tried in some of these cases once too often.' he said, 'and when the proper case comes up I shall not hesitate to instruct the County Crown Attorney to prosecute for perjury. These attempts at blackmail are becoming too common, and the imposition of a long term of imprisonment is the only way of dealing with that class of people.'" class of people.

I propose to support the motion of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), and largely for this reason: I believe if the employes of factories, the women employed there, were asked the question, they would say they did not want legislation of this sort. I am not going to be instructed by the Knights of Labor or any other class, except those who suffer, when I am asked to vote for a measure to pass into law. There may have occurred occasionally cases of seduction, but I have no evidence that legislation of this character is required, and I will, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now that the policy of the Government in protecting women has been affirmed by this House, it is due to the consistency of Parliament that the Bill should be altered so as to protect all women, whether employed in factories or not. I hold that hon members who voted against the amendment of the hon member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), which I had the honor to second, have by their votes declared that they endorse the principle of protecting females who follow pursuits of manual labor, no matter in what capacity. I have, therefore, prepared the following amendment, which I now move:

"That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee, with instructions to omit the words in the thirteenth line of the second section, 'in a factory, mill or workshop,' and in the four-teenth line,' in such factory, mill or workshop,' and in the fifteenth line, 'in such factory,' and in the sixteenth line, 'mill or workshop,'? also, in the twelfth line to change the word 'thirty' to 'twenty-one,'"

This will include all classes of female labor, whether they are type-writers, to whom we have referred; shop girls, who are employed by hundreds through the Dominion; telegraph girls, who are also employed by hundreds; telephone girls, who are numerously employed; female clerks in the Civil Service, clerks in general employment, or female scholars in the numerous schools from one end of the country to the other. If protection is needed for girls in workshops it is also needed for girls employed in stores, telephone and telegraph offices and in the Civil Service, and I wish this House to be consistent, as I desire to be consistent myself. I do not approve of such legislation as is proposed by this Bill; but the House having adopted the principle, I bow to its judgment, and now that we have decided that protection of female employés is absolutely necessary, let us make it general, and give type-writers, telegraph and telephone operators, shop girls, women in the Civil Service, females The proattending our schools, that protection. posal should recommend itself to the good sense of this House. It will be carrying out that moral legislation of which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), two or three years ago, set so bright an example, when you, Mr. Speaker, used my name as the seconder of his motion. I repeat Mr. TISDALE.

that I do not consider such legislation to be necessary to protect female employés, who are pretty well able to protect themselves; but the House having decided to give that protection, if it does not give protection to these other classes I have enumerated it will not be acting consistently, and the legislation of the country will have a peculiarity about it that will not recommend itself to the logical character of the legislation which it passes. Therefore, I move this amendment, seconded by my hon, friend, Mr. Charlton.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very glad to see that the hon. gentleman has changed his opinions, but I object to the speed with which he goes when he changes his mind.

Mr. MITCHELL. Speak louder; I cannot hear you.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very sorry for that, but I will say it again. I am very glad indeed that the hon. gentleman has changed his mind as to the necessity for a provision of this kind in the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not change my mind: I changed my action.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am unable, then, to enjoy the pleasure of understanding the hon. gentleman as being consistent in this matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are very simple.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I fancy so, and the hon, gentleman is very candid when he tells the House that he has changed his action without changing his mind. Now, Mr. Speaker, the fact in regard to the amendment which the hon gentleman proposes is simply this. We have, with regard to the Bill as it now stands, a tangible request from a responsible body, upon evidence which was before them and which was before the Government, of the necessity for legislation as far as the Bill goes. We have no cause, and we have no request, and we have no reason to believe, that more stringent legislation in that line is necessary at the present time. When a case is presented for us. or when representations are made for legislation so stringent as that is, we will come to the House and ask that the Act be amended. Until then, I think that the House would not be justified in making the provisions of the Bill so wide as to ensure what the mover of this amendment desires, namely, its ultimate defeat. As regards the provision as to age mentioned in this amendment, it was considered in committee, it was divided upon in committee, it was carried by a majority of two to one in committee, and it was carried on representations made to this House that cases had occurred calling for the intervention of the law, in respect to which the limit of age which appeared at first in the Bill, was altogether too short. Under these circumstances, I think the Committee will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. BLAKE. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think the hon. the Minister of Justice was in a very fortunate position to throw upon my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) the charge of a change of opinion. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman is relieved to some extent from that difficulty by the frank statement of the hon. member for Northumberland, which I have understood from the beginning to be his attitude—that he had not, in fact, changed his opinion. Upon the propriety of his pressing the House to make what he thinks a bad law a worse law, of course opinions may differ. My own view is, that if I entertained the opinions of the hon. member for Northumberland I should not propose amendment. I do not think there is any obligation upon us, because we think that legislation is bad, to make it worse. But with reference to the suggestion which the hon. Minister of Justice made, that he was surprised to find a change of opinion, and the speed with which that opinion was changed, I repeat that I do not think he was in a very fortunate position to institute such a criticism upon my hon. friend from Northumberland. I am of the opinion, also, that the hon. Minister was in a very unfortunate position when he proceeded with another part of his argumentin fact, the only other part of the argument which was put forward by him—that we were the recipients of no request, no suggestion, no warrant of any kind, for passing such legislation as this. Why, Sir, the Bill which we have before us contains a clause just the same as that which the hon member for Northumberland proposes, with the exception that it is more enlarged than that suggested by the hon, member for Northumberland. The Bill, as the hon. the Minister of Justice, the organ of the Government on this occasion, introduced it into the House, as he requested the sanction of this House for it, as he called upon us to pass it, as he proposed it to us, as a good and requisite law, contains, I say, language differing from that of the language of the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland, in this only, that it is larger. It is the same, in fact, with the exception that it does not contain a limitation of age. The second clause of this Bill, as the hon. Minister of Justice, upon first thoughts, brought it down to us, reads thus:

"Every one who, being a guardian, seduces or has illicit connection with his ward, or who seduces or has illicit connection with any woman or girl of previously chaste character, who is in his employment, or who, being in a common employment with him, is, in respect of her employment or work, under, or in any way subject to, his control or direction, is guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to two years' imprisonment. to two years' imprisonment.

So that it contains the exact proposal of the hon. member for Northumberland, except that it includes no limitation of age, which the hon. member for Northumberland introduces. Therefore, I say that we, independent members of this House, who are called upon to deal with legislation, can hardly accede to the view of the Minister of Justice, that we had no request to legislate in this direction. We had a very authentic request; we had a request to which the majority of this House, during my long experience of that majority, has lent implicit obedience, and to which it has given its adhesion always. We had the request of the Government of the day, who proposed the clause. But the hon. Minister may say: "I have a right But the hon. Minister may say: "I have a right to change my opinion;" and he may also say: "Second thoughts are best." Well, Sir, he gave us his second thoughts, because he gave us the Bill reprinted, as proposed to be amended in committee. I have his second thoughts here, and while he varied other provisions of the Bill, on second thoughts this second clause remained the same; so that the improved and more matured and further consideration of time, of the suggestions of others, and of the reconsideration of his colleagues—his second thoughts were the same as his first thoughts, and still dif-fered from the member for Northumberland's amendment only in the one particular to which I referred, namely, that his law was larger in that it made no limitation of age, as the hon. member for Northumberland does. It was not until the third time that the hon. Minister had reflected that hecame down to alter the clause, which he now says he brings forward only because the labor organisations asked for it. Under these circumstances, I repeat the observation that the hon Minister of Justice was hardly warranted in discussing with the hon. member from Northumberland his changes of opinion, and that he was hardly warranted in addressing to us the proposition that we had no request for legislation like this. What moved the hon, gentleman when he introduced the Bill, and what moved him when he reprinted the Bill, to bring in and to continue this clause in the enlarged sense, I cannot, in view of his present attitude, say. But, I presume, that it was after consultation with his colleagues, and because he and they agreed that the legislation was wholesome. I believe, Sir, that it is wholesome legislation; I believe, that with reference to those who are in a position of subjection or dependency, it is very wholesome legislation, and this legislation is confined to those in such a position; and, therefore, because I agreed with the hon. Minister when he brought in the Bill, because I agreed with him when he introduced it in its second form, and because I agree, not with the opinions, but with the action of the hon. member for Northumberland, I propose to support the amendment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may, perhaps, be allowed to make an observation or two on the singular speech which has just been addressed to this House, and in which the hon. member for West Durham, with very little warrant indeed, has accused me of inconsistency in reflecting on the hon. member for Northumberland for having changed his opinion on the course to be adopted with reference to this Bill. To start with, I made no such reflection on the hon, member for North-umberland. I said that I was glad that he had changed his opinion; he had as good a right to do it as I had, if I had changed my opinion; but what I commented on was the statement that the hon, member for Northumberland had done what the hon. member for West Durham is now doing, changed his action without having changed his Now, it is true, the Bill, as I introopinion. duced it, provided for the prohibition of this of-fence committed by any employer with his employé. It was introduced for the purpose of meeting the very grievance which is now before the House, but it was defective in this particular, that it was not restricted to factories, which was the particular case we had in hand; and on reflection, and on conferring with members on both sides of the House, I found that they were willing that legisla-tion should be adopted for the particular case for which it was asked, and that that would satisfy all demands for such legislation. The hon, gentleman has taunted me with having second thoughts on this question, and he has referred to the reprint of the Bill in which the clause appeared as it was in the first print. I had nothing to do with the second of the Minister of Justice, after having the benefit | print; I never distributed it or had it distributed; I asked that it should be cancelled as soon as I found that it was about to be distributed, and I immediately substituted the Bill which was before the House yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your name is on the back

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. τ do not care whether it is on the back or on the front; I am simply stating a fact. But what of the second thoughts of the hon. member for West Durham? The hon. gentleman sat for three days in committee on this Bill, and during all that time he never offered the amendment which he now thinks should be inserted in the Bill at the third reading. I should like to ask him where he got his second thoughts, and I should like to remind the House that it was at his instance, on his own motion, and at his own pathetic appeal, that the Committee agreed to extend the age from twenty-one to thirty years. Now he proposes, on second thoughts, to vote for the amendment to strike out that change.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not in order to strike out the change in age that I propose to vote for this amendment, but because, as I said, with reference to another clause, a greater amount of justice on the whole will be obtained by the clause as proposed to be remodelled than by the clause as it stands. The remodelled clause enormously extends the class of cases of persons in a subordinate and dependent position to which the law shall apply. So extended, I believe it is wiser and safer that there should be a restriction of the age, and I believe more good will be done by passing the clause with the wider application, but with the restriction of age, than by confining it to one particular class with the age extended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is to be regretted that passion or feeling should be introduced into the discussion of a question of this kind. think the hon, member for Northumberland is ill-advised in coupling the amendment as to the age with the other limitation in the clause, because some will be disposed to accept the one portion of his amendment and not the other; and I am disposed to accept both. The clause we have passed says that any person who occupies a position which gives him an improper influence over a female under his charge shall be liable for a misdemeanor. The three classes included in it are a guardian over his ward, an employer over a woman in his employ, and a workman over a female in a common employment with him who is at the time subject to his control or direction. If we adopt the principle that an employer or workman who seduces a woman under his control in a factory should be punished, on the ground that she is not a free agent, I cannot understand why the principle should be confined to them. The Bill does not go so far, with the words struck out, as many hon. gentlemen suppose. The woman seduced must, in the first place, be of previously chaste character; in the second place, she must be under the control or direction of the person who seduces her; and in the third place, she must be of a certain age. I think, therefore, that the principle we have adopted in the clause as it now stands is one that should be agreed to without the limitation reprint of the Bill. The first part of the section refers to a guardian who seduces his ward the Sir John Thompson.

second part to an employer who seduces a woman in his employ, and the third part to a man who. being in the common employment, seduces a woman who is in any way subjected to his control or direction. A man in common employment with the woman would not be liable for the offence unless it were proved at the same time that the woman was under or subject to his control or direction. This is the principle on which we carried the clause-that it is supposed that the woman is not a free agent. With these limitations and guards, I submit that the fresh limitation brought in, limiting the section to a factory, mill or workshop, weakens unnecessarily the legislation, and I shall support the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. MITCHELL. I just rise to say a few words to set myself right with this House in regard to the manner in which I think the hon. Minister of Justice has attempted to mislead the House with regard to my attitude. I appeal to the members of this House who listened to the remarks I made when I seconded the motion of my hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), if I did not distinctly state that I was opposed to the extension of the principle, and I supported his motion because my conviction was that such protection was unnecessary. I stated distinctly then, that, as a matter of justice, the House having decided that this legislation was necessary, I stood convicted in my own mind that my judgment must be wrong; and therefore, when I bowed submissively to the will of the House, what else was there before me but to ask this House to make its legislation consistent with the opinion it expressed. The hon, gentleman should not have attempted to mislead the House as to my attitude. I will say nothing about the course of the hon. gentleman and his uniformity of opinion in relation to this matter. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has sufficiently dealt with that, and placed my hon friend in a queer position. Is he to be taunted, too-the hon. member for West Durham has defended himself, but I may say a word in that connection—is he to be taunted, too, because while he believes the limitation of time should be thirty in place of twenty-one, but still finding a larger extent of protection to females in my amendment, coupled with a reduction of the term from thirty to twenty, and having the option either of accepting a larger protection than be believes to be necessary or losing the whole, he should allow the minor idea he entertains to be subservient to the larger The House has voted that we must give protection to women. Let us give them that protection as extensive as possible, and it is the duty of every hon. gentleman to support the amendment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not agree in the observations of the hon, member for Northumberland or my hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Blake). It is very important, in our legislation, that we should undertake to legislate with the view of correcting grievances, and not undertake to punish sin as if sin were a crime. In so far as Acts of this sort affect the good order and well-being of society, it is important we should consider them. Where refers to a guardian who seduces his ward; the another with a view of injuring reputation or character, we have the right, as a legislative body, to intervene; but it does seem to me that if the House undertakes to go as far as the hon. member for Northumberland proposes, it will altogether go beyond the line marked out by any real grievances which have been suffered or endured. Other hon, gentlemen may hold a different opinion, but I certainly entertain the view that the clause is better for the accomplishment of the object it has in view, as it stands, than if it were widened in the way proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland. What does this clause propose to deal with? It proposes to deal with grievances and wrongs arising out of the dependency of one class of the community upon another. Does that dependence extend as wide as the relations between employer and employed? I do not think it does. I do not think anyone here will pretend to say that is the position of things. In many cases, the employed are as independent as the employer, and there is no necessity for protection in such cases—as for instance, in the case of ordinary household service or the employment of educated females. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that a literary woman, employed as a clerk, stands in the same position towards her employer as the ordinary hired woman in the factory?

Mr. MITCHELL. I say she stands more so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I believe that statement would be regarded by any woman so employed as an imputation on her character and her ability to take care of herself. Why, a woman in a factory, if dismissed to-day, knows not where she may be employed to-morrow. She is only fit to perform certain work. She may be one of a large family in straitened circumstances, and from the necessity of her position is entitled to the protection of this House. Does experience point out injuries in other cases in the same way?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not agree with my hon. friend. I do not believe it tends to promote the moral standing of the people throughout a community to undertake to extend protection, which, experience shows, is not called for and in cases where, experience shows, instead of the employed being dependent on the employer, the difficulty is to get the employed to continue in that relation. If the hon. gentleman can show that the classes here spoken of—those in the factories, mills and workshops—do not embrace all the classes in which this extraordinary dependence exists, he will make out a case for adding others; but it seems to me, the very wide provision he proposes by his amendment is not one which experience shows to be necessary, and therefore I prefer the clause, as it now stands, to the amendment.

Mr. MITCHILL. Just one word in reply to the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman asks if literary women are as dependent upon their employers as women in factories. They are ten times more so. The masses of women in factories and workshops can find employment anywhere. Can literary women or women in shops? No, they cannot; and therefore the hon. gentleman's illustration does not apply to the position he has taken.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to one observation of the hon. member for Bothwell, I would say it has been established by statistics, carefully obtained in England, that the ranks of prostitution are recruited, not mainly or even to any large extent from factory girls, but out of all proportion from the ranks of domestic servants seduced by their employers.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I had hoped my hon. friend would not have coupled the two propositions in the resolution in your hands, Sir, because I find myself unable to vote for the whole proposition as submitted, although I would be glad to vote for the proposition to reduce the limit from thirty to twenty-one. So far as I am concerned, I have not changed my opinion with regard to this measure. I have never thought, and do not now think, that the measure is necessary; and therefore I voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin). Although there is a great deal of force in the argument of the hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), that if you adopt the theory that protection is necessary to any class of women in any employment against their employer, or those who are in common employment with them, you should extend that protection beyond the limits defined by this Bill, yet, holding the opinion I do, that this legislation is not necessary at all, I find myself compelled to vote against the amendment of my hon. friend, because I hold, if legislation is bad it ought to be confined within as narrow a limit as possible. Therefore, while prepared to vote for the reduction of the age to twenty-one, I feel obliged to vote against the other proposition.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish just to say a word in explanation of the vote I shall feel obliged to give upon the amendment now before the House. Had I been in my place at the time, I should have voted for the amendment of my hon. friend the member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), but not having had the opportunity of doing so, I desire to say that I think the amendment of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) only makes the matter worse, that it only makes the clause more mischievous than it was before, and I think it would be difficult to adopt any more mischievous legislation than that which we are now passing. I feel satisfied that, while we are trying to remedy one evil, we are opening the door to an evil which is much worse. I do not desire to detain the House, but I wish to enter my protest against this legislation altogether, believing, as I do, that the result will be that many young men who have had little experience in life will find that they are the seduced, and that they are in a position which will entail a fearful amount of sorrow and suffering upon themselves and their families. I think that the mothers of Canada, when their sons are going to enter upon a city life, will feel still more alarmed as to the dangers they are to encounter than they do now, when they find that this Bill has been placed upon the Statute-book.

Mr. TISDALE. I beg to move, in amendment to the amendment:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee, with instructions to substitute in the twelfth line of the second section the word "twenty-one" in place of the word "thirty."

That is the strong ground which I have taken from the start in regard to this Bill. I regret that I was absent from the Committee when the change was made. I had read that clause, and I supposed that there would be no question of changing the age. I know of many other members who were inclined to pass the clause in its original shape, but they never supposed that such a change would he made as to raise the age to thirty. According to our law, if a man or woman ever comes to the age of discretion it is at twenty one years of age, and I strongly object to anything being placed on the Statute-book which will have the effect of saying that the age of discretion for all purposes is not twenty-one years. I told the Minister of Justice that I proposed to move this amendment, and he asked me not to do it then, but to do it at this stage of the Bill, so that the business of the House might be proceeded with. This being an opportune time, and this being one of my principal objections to the Bill, I move it now. I am opposed to the principle of this legislation altogether, but as the House has expressed an opinion to the contrary, I must bow to it, and I, therefore, take what, in my opinion, is the second best proceeding.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the attention of hon, members to the fact that it would be better to have only one way of drafting amendments to motions which are before the House. The amendment should be that certain words should be struck off and others substituted. In this case, for instance, the amendment should be that all the words after the word "instructions" should be struck out, and then the amendment should instruct the Committee to alter the word "thirty to the word "twenty-one."

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the sub-amendment is out of order altogether, as it is not applicable to the amendment which I moved, and I think it should not be put.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is in order, because it proposes that part of the amendment be struck off. and that the latter part of the amendment should be changed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, will you allow me to correct you?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am correcting the Speaker on a matter of fact, which, no doubt, has escaped his attention. I contend that, on that ground, the amendment is out of order, because it is not an amendment to the one I have moved.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), I think, is correct on the point of order. What my hon friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) wants, can be obtained by moving his amendment subsequently.

I submit that the amendment Mr. TISDALE. to the amendment is in order, if it proposes to drop a material part of the original amendment. posing the amendment of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) were lost, would it then be in order for me to move this amend-

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly. Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. TISDALE. Because, if I could not move it then, the House having already pronounced on the main question, I could not have an opportunity of proposing to reinstate the age as in the original Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. As a matter of form, I think the amendment to the amendment is out of order, but I think it would be in order to ask the House to affirm one part of the amendment and to disaffirm the other part. At the same time, I have no doubt that it would be in order for the hon. gentleman to move his amendment after the other amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. TISDALE. I wish to put my motion in order. I confess that I am quite ignorant of the technical rules of the House, but I wish my amendment to be put as an amendment to that of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. MITCHELL. The question has been called, anyway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) will withdraw his amendment, because those who are supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and are also in favor of the amendment to the amendment, will be obliged to vote against the latter. I want to support both amendments, and if the hon. gentleman with-draws his amendment he can move it subsequently.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) will certainly get a larger support for his amendment if he moves it independently than if he moves it now as an amendment to the other amendment, because he must see that it will eliminate from the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland the words which many members desire to see adopted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would advise the hon, member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) not to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), because he is opposed to the change suggested by the hon. member, as, in fact, it was at his suggestion that the age was changed from twenty-one to thirty.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not a statement worthy of the Minister of Justice. It amounts to saying that my suggestion was disingenuous because my opinion as to the age is different from that of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). made a statement very clearly to the hon. member for South Norfolk, that if he withdrew his amendment now, he could move it again after this amendment was disposed of, but that if he moved it now, it would, if carried, defeat the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland; so that several members who were in favor of his amendment would have to vote against it in order to prevent the defeat of the other amendment.

I have just one word to say Mr. MITCHELL. in reply to the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale).

I think hon. gentlemen are Mr. SPEAKER. getting out of order by speaking several times.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am speaking on the amendment to the amendment, if it is before the House. The hon. gentleman has

Mr. SPEAKER. already spoken on this amendment. Mr. MITCHELL. I have not spoken on this point.

 $\dot{\ }_{Mr.\ DAVIES}$ (P.E.I.) Let the point of order be ruled on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let me say one word to the hon. gentleman. He knows that amendment was prepared by myself, and was only to be moved in case my amendment failed, and I think he is not pursuing a course that will commend itself to this House.

Mr. TISDALE. I think it is necessary I should make an explanation. In the first place, I am obliged to all the hon. gentlemen who have offered me their advice. I always appreciate that, but I generally prefer to follow my own judgment. It is true, as the hon. member for Northumberland says, that he gave me that amendment; it is true, he told me that two others were going to be moved, but I did not say whether I would support either of them. It is equally true, as twenty gentlemen, at least, on this side of the House know, that I told them not only to-day, but after my interview with the Minister of Justice, that I would move such a resolution as that. When the discussion took the turn it did to-day I thought that the most opportune time for my motion was after the main amendment was lost, and that the present was the most likely time to carry the amendment in which I felt an interest, and by which I hoped to shorten the proceedings. I propose to press my amendment to the amendment, and leave the House to decide.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the ruling of the Chair, whether the amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I decided that the subamendment was in order, inasmuch as it tended to strike off part of the provision of my hon. friend, and to accept another part.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the main motion is put, I desire to get a statement from the Government. The majority, I understand, is only 12. During the term of Lord Dufferin, in 1873, when I had the honor to be slightly responsible for public affairs, a crisis occurred, and I recollect that Lord Dufferin declared at that time that if the majority of the Government in a division was not greater than the number of the members of the Govern-ment in the House, the Government were practically defeated. I would now like to ask the right hon, gentleman what course he intends to pursue under the circumstances?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The majority is greater than the number of the members of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. Their number is only 12, I understand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is 14.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then the Government is saved by a majority of 2.

I wish to direct attention for a moment to another description of concerted action nursery stock already purchased in the United Mr. MITCHELL.

than that to which our attention has been directed this afternoon, and upon which I made some observations yesterday. I refer to the provision with reference to trade combinations. It is not my intention to engage in the fruitless task of pressing my views to a division, but I will simply take occasion to record them. I move the following amendment :-

amenument:—
That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with power to amend the eighteenth section by omitting the proposed substituted sub-section of section 13, chapter 173 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and inserting in lieu thereof, the following:—
"No prosecution shall be maintainable against any person for conspiracy in refusing to work with or for any employer or workman, or for doing any act, or causing any act to be done for the purposes of a trade combination, unless such act is an offence indictable by statute, or punishable under the provisions of the twelfth section of this Act."

Amendment page va

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of the Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. I move:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee, with instructions to amend the second clause by inserting in the tenth line, after the word "one," the words "being over twenty-one recess of age." years of age.

1 wish to explain that the purpose of the amendment is to protect boys under twenty-one years of age from the operation of this Act. It seems to me that it is a proper thing that an inexperienced boy should be protected from this Act. Boys who come to the city, for the first time, from a country place, and fall into the hands of designing young women and are seduced by them, are by this clause liable to punishment by two years' imprisonment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman who has proposed this amendment has not fully considered one feature of the clause, which seems to make it unnecessary to adopt a provision of this kind. The Bill makes it punishable for any person, and it desires the age to be defined, to seduce or have improper connection with any person in his employ, in a factory, mill, or workshop. The man is not likely to be under twenty-one years.

There are many under that Mr. BERGIN. age who are superintendents in mills.

I think the word "direction" Mr. McNEILL. mentioned in the Bill is a very wide term, and it is difficult to define or limit its meaning. Any boy who happens to be a little in advance of some young woman connected with the same work and has the direction of it is subjected to the penalty of this clause. Any boy who has only arrived in the city a few weeks ago, may be superior in knowledge to a young woman who came into the factory about the same time, and have her as a subordinate, although she may be a city girl and a very different sort of person.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BRIEN. I desire the Minister of Finance to take up Nos. 171 and 182 with respect to States. I find from the information in my possession that the duty is now practically prohibitive, and it is necessary that a decision should be arrived at in regard to this matter. In the section of country from which I come delivery should take place now or next week, and if they are not allowed to take the consignments out at the old duties much loss will be inflicted. When you add the new duty to the cost the amount exceeds that which can be obtained for the stock. If the stock be not allowed to be taken out under the old duties the orders cannot be fulfilled. I have a letter here which I desire to read.

Mr. FOSTER. I have received several representations of a similar nature to those received by the hon. gentleman. The resolutions must be taken in order. There are other interests besides those of nursery stock, and quite as pressing in-terests, and we will get through the work all the more rapidly if hon. gentlemen opposite will assist in the despatch of business.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Before you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was calling attention to the fact that I thought it would be desirable for the Government to allow trees and nursery stock, which had been ordered in the United States some time ago, to be admitted into Canada under the old tariff. These admitted into Canada under the old tariff. contracts were entered into in the fall of the year, when there was no possibility of the men engaged in this business having any knowledge that a change would be made in the tariff. In fact, it might be considered that it was very unlikely a change would be made in this respect, because it was only in the year 1888 that trees and nursery stock were placed on the free list. Neither the farmers nor the agents had any idea, therefore, that a duty would be imposed. I have a communication from a gentleman in the constituency I have the honor to represent, which, with the permission of the House, I will read. It states the difficulties which will arise unless these articles are admitted under the old tariff. It says:

"KINGSVILLE, 9th April, 1890. "Dr. Brien, M.P., "Essex County, Ont.

"Dear Sir,—I write you to-day, asking you to use your influence with the Minister of Customs regarding the nursery stock which I have bought in the United States, and cannot bring it into Canada on account of the heavy Customs duty. My stock of grape vines cost me $8 per 1,000 in New York, while the duties are $30 per 1,000, being nearly 400 per cent. over value of stock. The duties alone are more than what I have re-sold the same stock for: consequently it is cheaper for me to lose the entire stock for which I have paid than to pay the duty. I am of the opinion there is a great mistake in duties on vines, as 400 per cent. means to prohibit their importation. as 400 per cent, means to prohibit their importation.

"Yours, etc., "WELLINGTON WIGLE."

The name of the gentleman who signed the letter will easily indicate what his politics are. It may be said that if the permission is granted in this case it should be granted in various others, but I think there are special reasons why this permission should be granted to those who have ordered this nursery stock. In the first place, they may not be able to obtain what they need in this country, that the consequence is that the country will be either deprived of the use of this stock altogether, or those engaged in the business will lose money. I cannot help but thinking that the Government, in imposing this duty, have done so for want of thorough information on the matter. As the Min-ister of Customs and the Minister of Finance will see, the new tariff is entirely prohibitory in the case of some of those articles. There have been some precedents for the course which I now ask the Government to take. It was done in 1887, with regard to the duty on iron, and I will read the clause of the Act which refers to this matter. It savs:

"All goods actually purchased on or before the said thirteenth of May at any place out of Canada, for importation into Canada, on evidence to the satisfaction of the Minister of Customs of the purchase having been so made, and all goods in warehouse in Canada on such day, may be entered for duty at the rate of duty in force immediately before the said day; but the provisions of this section shall cease to have force and effect on the first day of July in the present year, excepting that goods from the United Kingdom or any British possession, carried by way of Cape Horn may be entered in British Columbia under the provisions aforesaid until the first day of November in the present year."

I will also trouble the House with a short extract from a speech delivered by Sir A. T. Galt, under similar circumstances, in 1859. This speech was made some time after the Budget had been brought down, and on the occasion of a similar request as that I am now asking being made in the House. might say that when Sir A. T. Galt made this speech the changes in the tariff were not anything so great as at the present time. He said:

"That he had stated last evening that the Government would be prepared to consider the way in which the important interest of Upper, and he might say Lower Canada, would be affected by the immediate changes that were about to be made in the mode of levying duties.
"The Government had taken the matter into consideration, and he was now prepared to state the modifications which he felt it his duty to move in reference to certain articles."

which he felt it his duty to move in reference to certain articles.

"1st. With regard to tea. Being desirous to interfere as little as possible with this article, the Government have come to the determination, that the duty be reduced from 25 to 15 per cent., and that it shall not take effect until January next.

"With regard to sugar, he thought the same causes were in operation which had rendered it convenient to reduce the duty on tea. But it was intended that the new system with regard to them should come into operation on the first of June next, which he thought would give sufficient time for merchants to make arrangements to meet it." to meet it.

The change referred to by Sir A. T. Galt was simply from a specific to an ad valorem duty; but in this case it is imposing a heavy duty upon goods which, previous to this proposed tariff, were on the free list, and the reasons for making the concession which I ask in this case are far stronger than the reasons which induced Sir A. T. Galt to make the remarks I have quoted. I might say that, for my part, I think that this duty is an injustice to the section of the country which I represent, and which is largely interested in fruit-growing. policy of the Government being to protect our native industries, I think it would be desirable that the fruit trees should be allowed to remain on the free They are to the producer of fruit what the raw material is to the manufacturer, and I think it would have been better policy to have allowed these fruit trees to remain on the free list. In looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that, in 1889, we exported fruit to the amount and it is too late in the year now to re-order, so of $1,675,818, which is equal to 37 per cent. of all our exports of manufactured goods. Under the circumstances, I think the least the Government can do is to allow the fruit trees which have already been ordered to be brought in under the old tariff. Unless they do that, a great injustice will be perpetrated on the people who have ordered these fruit trees, and no benefit that I can see will accrue to the country apart from the amount of duty received. It has been stated that the duties imposed upon small fruits will be of great advantage to the fruit-growing sections of the country; but, considering the heavy duty imposed on fruit trees, that advantage will not be very great. Taking as a basis the imports of fruit trees and nursery stock last year, the amount of revenue that will be received from these duties will be something like $50,000. What we in our section are afraid of is, that the re-imposition of these duties may lead to retaliation on the part of the Americans. Living close to the border, as we do, we produce many small fruits, and I believe the fruit industry might be cultivated to a very profitable extent in that part of the country. I hope, therefore, that the Government will see their way to grant this slight request, in justice to the farmers who desire these fruit trees, as well as in justice to the agents, who had no idea that fruit trees, at any rate, would be placed on the dutiable list. They thought that whatever change might be made, fruit trees, in accordance with the policy of the Government, would probably be left on the free list. I am very anxious to have a decision on this matter as soon as possible, because the season is already so far advanced that it is time that these fruit trees were planted. Unless an immediate decision is come to it will be too late for the farmers to order their stock elsewhere, many of them will lose their purchase money, the country will lose the benefit of the trees, and a great deal of inconvenience will result to all parties.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I quite agree with all that has been said by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Brien) in reference to this matter. I think it would be only right if the Government would allow orders which have been already taken, to be filled, without imposing the duty. As has been stated so ably to the House, orders were taken during the winter; and I may say that in consequence of the very large fruit crop which we had in the western part of Ontario last year the farmers made up their minds to go into fruitgrowing much more extensively than they have done heretofore, and, therefore, gave a much greater number of orders during the winter, and the duty on these is so large that it will be quite impossible for the nurserymen to fill their orders on the old terms. So that I think that, for this season, at all events, the Government ought to allow the stock to come in without paying the duty.

Mr. TISDALE. I wish to endorse what has been said in reference to this fruit tree business. I acknowledge that it is very difficult for the Government, when framing a tariff, to make any exceptions, and I think that should not be done unless a special case is made out. From what I understand of this fruit tree business, in my opinion it is a special case, because the trees must be ordered in the fall, and they cannot be delivered Mr. BRIEN.

until the spring. In this respect they cannot be considered like ordinary goods, which can be brought in at any time, for the dealers in these trees gave their orders last fall, when they had no idea that there was going to be a change made in the tariff. I think this is one of the cases in which the Government ought to try to see their way to remit the duty for this year, and I would certainly strongly urge them to do so. In doing so, I do not think their action will be inconsistent with applying the ordinary rule to other things, unless a special case is made out.

When I was going west a Mr. LANDERKIN. short time ago a gentleman engaged in this business spoke to me on the subject. He had been taking orders last fall and winter for fruit trees, and he had not the slightest idea that there was going to be any change made in the tariff. It was rumored about the time I was going home that a duty would be placed on these trees, and if so it was going materially to injure his business, because he was bound to deliver the trees for which he had taken orders, and any duty that might be imposed would come out of his own pocket and would be a very serious loss to him. He urged that the sales already made should be allowed to be carried out without the duty being imposed. He appeared to me to have a very strong case. He stated that he had made application to the Department of Customs to that effect, and he was very much concerned about the matter. I hope the Government will see their way clear to permit such cases as this to be fairly considered, so that those engaged in the business will be able to get them in as they did last year.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter have made out a very strong case, but seem to be at a loss for a precedent on which the Government can act. Speaking from memory and subject to correction, I think I can give them a precedent which meets the case. When the tariff was rearranged some few years ago and an increased duty put on iron pipes and plates and other articles of which iron formed the chief constituent, the importers of Montreal and Toronto were very much in the position of the fruit tree men, and several of them applied to me in the matter. I stated that they had a strong case, and that they should lay the matter before the Government. They care to the Government They came to the Government in a body, and I think the Government agreed that whenever it was shown that an actual order or shipment had taken place, prior to the imposition of the extra duty, these things would be allowed in

Mr. FOSTER. I think it was confined to contract.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well, to contracts if you like; but the principle was recognised that where actual purchases were made under the old duty these purchases would not be subject to the additional duty. While on this question, I will speak on a cognate subject, that of fruits and early vegetables. It is a mistaken policy to tax fruits and early vegetables coming into this country. On our continent climatic difference exists to a great extent. It is summer now in Georgia, Alabama and the Carolinas; ripe strawberries are growing in those regions, but we cannot get these luxuries without paying an enormously heavy duty. Later on, when their season for strawberries is over, we can export ours to the United States and the same remarks reply to gooseberries, raspberries and other berries. In the matter of eggs, too, we get eggs early in the season from the States, and later on we export eggs to the States. Why should we have to pay a heavy duty on these fruits and other products, which are almost necessities for the health of the children of this country? I think the Government would show judgment and a proper regard for the health and welfare of our community if they would allow these things to come in free. In any case they should grant this request of the fruit tree men, and carry out the same principle with regard to fruit trees which they carried out with regard to iron.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The statement made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) ought to convince the Government that it is their duty to follow the precedent they established with regard to iron. It is well known that all the orders taken for fruit trees from our farmers are taken in the shape of contracts. The agents go around in the fall of the year and get the farmers to sign contracts for the number of trees they require, to be delivered in the spring, and in every case where these trees, shrubs, plants and grape vines are imported in the spring, they were bought on fall contracts. The interests of the men who sold the vines and the trees are not the only interests to be considered, because it is well known that fruit-growing is becoming an important industry all through the Province of Ontario especially, and, I presume, also in other Provinces. The farmers enter largely into this branch of industry, because they find they can make more money in this way than by growing cereals, and this duty will be a serious blow to that industry. The duty will, in some cases, be prohibitory, and the consequence will be that the agents who have taken the orders will fail to fulfil them, and the farmers who have given the orders will be unable to obtain the stock they intended to plant for the purpose of starting or increasing their fruit-growing farms. Just to show the large amount of money at stake in this matter, I will read from the Trade and Navigation Returns the imports in 1889 of fruit trees and grape vines:

It must be manifest that if we imported that quantity in 1889, a larger number of orders has been given during the past year for importation this spring. It would be a great injustice to the farmers and fruit growers if the Government insisted upon putting a duty on the stock coming in this year and ordered by contract last fall. I hope, therefore, they will seriously consider the matter, and not do this injustice to the farmer and fruit growers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no doubt whatever that the regular practice always has been, and of necessity must be, to decline to consider cases in a general way parallel to this, but the Minister of Finance must be aware that this is done because, as a general rule, merchants are pretty well able to guess what the tariff changes will be, and it would be very unfair to assist them in obtaining moneys that belong to the public. But this is an exceptional case, and there are precedents for dealing with such cases. I can give the hon, gentleman a somewhat analogous case, though perhaps not exactly the same in detail, but practically the same in principle, which occurred, if my memory serves me, under Sir Francis Hincks. The tea duty was remitted, and I think Sir Francis Hincks had then recourse to the extraordinary expedient of paying a sort of bounty to the parties who held tea, and whose tea, as he alleged, was in a certain sense depreciated in value by the duty being throw off. Speaking from recollection, that was the course taken by the Government in 1871 or 1872, and certainly that would be a greater stretch of precedent than would be involved in recognising the contracts which have been made under the circumstances stated by my hon. friend. Of course, this is a matter wholly within the discretion of the Government, and although I think no harm could arise—particularly after what has been done before—in recognising these contracts, I am not prepared to press the matter further than to point out to the hon. gentleman what has been done by his predecessors. As to the general question of the tax upon grapes and apple trees and the like which has been brought up, I would call the attention of the House to this fact, which I think should weigh with the Government. It is of the greatest possible benefit to fruit growers all over this country to be able to obtain fresh stock, fresh apple trees, fresh plum trees, fresh peach trees, and so on. That is equivalent to obtaining seed from different localities, and I have no doubt that all over this country, and particularly in the older settled portions, it will be found that a great number of our fruit trees are dying out and it would be desirable to replace them by fresh stock from the United States or elsewhere. We may discuss this at greater length when the items are before us in committee, but I call the attention of the Finance Minister to that view of the question.

Mr. KIRK. This is a matter of considerable importance to the Province of Nova Scotia, from which I come. I have taken no part in this discussion so far, because I felt that the Government, like Ephraim, have been joined to their idols, and, therefore, it would be better to leave them alone. I think that the adage that "those whom the gods intend to destroy, they first make mad," must apply to the Government. I think they have gone mad, and for that reason, perhaps, they should be allowed to have all the rope they want and they will soon hang themselves. The duty on fruit trees is of great importance, especially to the east-ern portion of Nova Scotia. In that section we have not gone very extensively into the growth of fruit, though they have raised fruit very extensively in the western portion of the Province. Recently, however, our farmers, who have been under the impression that the climate or the land, or both, in eastern Nova Scotia, were not adapted for raising fruit, have found that fruit can be raised with profit, though, perhaps, notas wellas in western Nova Scotia or in some other portions of the Dominion. Many farmers in eastern Nova Scotia are beginning to plant young trees and cultivate young orchards, and with considerable success. I will give a little of my own experience in this matter, in order to show the necessity for the farmers being able to secure their trees fresh and green for the purpose of planting. Being a farmer myself, I have been doing something in this matter in a small way. Although I have tried to raise fruit trees for a number of years, I have never succeeded very well; but in 1888 an agent from one of the Ontario nurseries came to me and solicited an order. I gave a small order for $5 worth of trees. I forget the number of trees, but they were to be delivered in the spring. Afterwards, a gentleman came along who represented a nursery in the State of New York— I think in Rochester. I told him I had given an order to a firm in Ontario for all the trees that I intended to plant the next spring. He explained to me that the railway connections were so bad that the trees I would get from Ontario would very likely not grow after I got them. I thought there might be something in that, and I duplicated my order, but I got nearly twice as many trees from the Rochester firm as from the Ontario firm for the same money. When I received the trees from Ontario in the spring the roots appeared to be dry. However, I planted them; some of them died; others were sickly, and remained sickly to the fall. The trees I received from Rochester were as green and fresh as when they came out of the nursery. I planted them; they grew beautifully, and have been doing well. I do not intend to say a word against the Ontario nursery, but the condition of the trees was owing to the distance they had to be brought.

Mr. DENISON. What firm was it?

Mr. KIRK. I think it was Stone & Wellington, of Welland, Ont. This has been my experience. I not only got more trees from the Rochester firm, but better and greener trees, and they grew better. I do not know how they will turn out later on. Most of what I got from Stone & Wellington died, while those which I got from the Rochester nursery thrived. I think, therefore, that it is wrong for the Government to prevent us from getting these trees from any place, no matter where, in a proper condition to grow. I do not pretend to say that the fault was in the firm in Ontario. It was simply that the trees had to be brought such a long distance and were kept so long on the way that they were dried up before they arrived, and were of very little use when they came to me. Naturally, I would not again give an order to that firm in Ontario for fruit trees, because, if I were not shut out by the laws of the land, I would order my trees from Rochester, in the State of New York.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am certainly in full accord with the hon. gentleman who brought this matter before the House. There are many reasons why I think the Government ought on this occasion consider the representations made to them in reference to granting, for the time being, the importation of fruit trees of various kinds from the Mr. Kirk.

United States. As has been stated, they have before them examples, in 1887, where contracts between entered into and agreements made between different parties, and they allowed the articles that had an increased duty placed upon them to come in under the former duty. Here we have an example of this kind, that in reference to contracts entered into by the Car Wheel Company to supply car wheels at a certain price for a certain firm, and the Government allowed the pig iron that was necessary for the completion of that contract to come in, and the firm were unable to manufacture the necessary number of car wheels that they had contracted for. That was only reasonable. I know this to be the case from the fact that it occurred with a firm in the town from which I come. Then, again, it was only two years ago that the Government changed the policy they had been pursuing before that time. Before that time they had a duty placed upon small fruit trees coming from the United States, and the nurserymen here found the Government changing about so suddenly, having placed duties upon these trees one year, and suddenly, by Order in Council, changing or remov-ing the duty, that they felt an uncertainty, they felt that they were justified in making up any deficiency they might have in their nursery, by going to the United States and importing a certain number of trees to complete their orders. Orders are taken either in the fall or during the winter, and they have to supply these trees at a certain figure. Now, unexpectedly—because no one imagined for a moment that the Government had removed the duties on these trees, on account of their standing order having been placed upon the Statute-books ever since their fiscal policy came into operation—they removed that two years ago. I say, could any of these nurserymen for a moment imagine that the Government would suddenly come down and impose a duty upon these trees and place those individuals who had engaged in these contracts at a disadvantage, and compel them to pay a heavy duty upon fruit trees coming from the United States? I do not think the Government could for a moment expect these men, after they had entered into a contract upon the faith of the Government having removed the duty from these trees, to go on and cultivate trees in Canada. Now, I say, the Government on this occasion are bound in honor to allow, for the time being, all trees to come in here where the individual importing those trees can give satisfactory evidence that the contract had been made prior to the imposition of the duty upon these trees. While we are appealing to the Finance Minister to deal justly by the farmers and the farming community, to deal out to them the same meed of justice which they granted at the proper time to the rich and affluent manufacturers, those who are engaged in the manufacturing industries of iron and other things, while we are compelled to do that to-day, it is very soothing, no doubt, to the Finance Minister, because he goes off quietly to sleep. I think that shows the amount of interest the Government of the day take in the farming community. I say, in all fairness to the farmers, in all fairness to those small nurserymen, an important class, these small nurserymen in Canada who have not a sufficiency to supply all the contracts they have entered into, that they should have the duty removed, or, at least, they should be allowed to bring into the country the amount necessary to fill all the orders they have taken. I hope that the Government, though I must confess it is a despairing hope, will consider the just claims of these individuals and allow them to import their goods into Canada.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Of course, changes in the tariff must be kept a profound secret, that is in the public interest, and when they are announced they will take parties by surprise, and in tariff changes there will be more or less hardship entailed upon individuals, and I recognise that it is a delicate matter to ask the Ministry, after the tariff changes have been announced, that they should make an exception in the levying of these taxes, and it is only when a special occasion is made out that I think they ought to give it consideration. I do not wish to weary the House by repeating arguments; no doubt the Ministry have made up their minds; at least they have had the benefit of the views of parties generally in reference to it. I do think that in this individual matter that a special case is made out. From the nature of the transaction, the contracts have been made necessarily some months ago, and the delivery necessarily being delayed, not because parties were not ready to take them, but on account of its being the winter season, and they not being able to ship them, it might be viewed, it seems to me, as a transaction absolutely closed under the old tariff. Another point that I may just mention that has not been dealt with is, that in many cases the people who will suffer hardship under this change in the tariff are agents, who will lose, perhaps, all their commission. It will not come upon the seller in the United States, who could view it more pleasantly, nor will it come out of the consumers or be divided among them, else the burden would be lighter; but in many cases the losses will go on accumulating upon the agent, who is generally a man just earning his livelihood, and as I understand it, he being unable to fulfil the contract that he has made with these individuals, must suffer the loss himself. variety of circumstances might take place. I only instance this as one of the hardships. I have had communications from nurserymen who are interested in growing stock, and they state they have to import certain kinds of stock; so even they are somewhat interested in the matter. On general principles it will not do to urge it to its full extent, but I have made these remarks because my attention has been called to it, and I have had some pleading letters from those who could ill afford to pay the amount of duty they would have to pay if this change must take place. I have more faith than the hon member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) in the Ministers, and I think the representations made will, at all events, receive their consideration.

Mr. BOYLE. I scarcely think hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on this subject are really serious. It would be a delicate matter for the Government to accede to the wishes expressed by hon, gentlemen opposite. I do not see why nur-sery stock should be placed in any other position than other imported goods. Great changes have been made in the tariff in other classes of articles, goods were also given long before the tariff came down, and if the Government allowed an exception to be made in the case of nursery stock it would likewise have to be applied to other articles. The Government, in taking any steps in that direction, would be opening for themselves a matter of extreme difficulty. Moreover, decreases in duty have been made in some cases, and if the principle urged by hon, gentlemen opposite is adopted I do not understand why refunds of duties should not be made in those cases to which I have referred. hope the Government will stand to the tariff as it is, and not make exceptions.

Mr. WALDIE. It must be remembered in dealing with nursery stock that they are perishable The trees have been removed from the soil, and are either in course of shipment or have already arrived, and sold under contract. A loss is entailed on some one, and it is not reasonable that the Government should cause that loss to fall upon a nursery dealer, a man who is engaged in selling fruit trees. Those trees having been placed on the market at rates that were acceptable to the farmers and fruit growers, the contract should be filled without loss to the dealers.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) stated that no exception should be made in regard to trees. I hold, however, that they form an exception to almost every other kind of products. There are only two seasons when they can be removed, fall and spring; they may be ordered at any period during the year, but they can only be removed at those two seasons. Almost any other goods can be brought into the country at any time. Where farmers are prepared to increase their orchards or plant young orchards the land requires special preparation for trees, and if the trees are not forthcoming they have to prepare the soil a second time. I hope, as exceptions have been shown to have been made, that this question will receive the consideration of the Government. The Government profess to be deeply interested in the agricultural community. This is something in which the agricultural community are interested, and the farmer who plants an orchard is going to receive an injury unless he is able to get the trees at the old rates of duty. As an injustice will be inflicted on the gentlemen who have made contracts with the farmers and the farmers themselves, the Government should give this matter their favorable consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to go into the discussion of the question at this time, which has been referred to by so many hon. gentlemen opposite, as to the propriety of putting a duty on either fruits or plants. That will more particularly come when the item which we are approaching will be before the Committee. I may say, however, with respect to the question of the reduction of duties that, as has been admitted by two hon. gentlemen opposite who are very well capable of speaking with respect to such subjects, it is a pretty delicate matter to approach and difficult to touch. No one knows when tariffs are framed what propositions are going to be brought down. The tariff must be brought down at once and go into operation at once, and it is impossible for any branch of trade to previse what changes will be in the tariff, and the community must take such as hardware and dry goods. Orders for those their chances as to the raising and lowering of

The precedents which have been cited are two, I think, only two in all our tariff history; one was with reference to the duty on tea, which occurred a long while ago; and the other was in 1887, in regard to iron. The hon. Minister of Customs tells me that only a few days ago he had an application for payment on some of the tea in store when the duty was removed, which remission of duty occurred so many years ago. However, these two are the only exceptions, I believe, in the course of our tariff history. With respect to the tea duty, I do not think that is analogous, and even if it were, I think it would be a rather extraordinary policy to pursue from a tariff point of view. With respect to the question of iron, I think that transcends the question which has been spoken of to-night far and far away. We must recollect that in 1887 not only were there tariff changes on iron, but numerous other tariff changes, and petitions and representations were made to have an adjustment of duty or the duty collected on the old rate on numerous other articles besides iron. It was only in the case of iron the principle was admitted, and only in cases where it had been bought and shipped from the old country, and where it was contracted for here, and actually sold; so that other sales had been made and other operations had been predicated upon the basis of the iron sold. Of course hon, gentlemen all know how far these shipments of iron go as a basis for the general trade of the country, and to what a large extent they would affect the different interests. If hon. gentlemen can show that, in the case of nursery stock, so large and fundamental an interest as that is involved, they would have an analogous case, but I do not think they have shown it. It is impossible to give this remission of duty upon nursery stock and to shut the door upon others which run on about the same lines, and which are far more important and far larger than the one which has been spoken of. For instance, there are importations of dry goods. Merchants from different ports in the Maritime Provinces have written me, and they have stated: "We have sold our dry goods, our importations are later in coming to our ports than we had expected, when they come they have to pay an increase of duty, and we have to lose the whole of that, because our goods were sold upon the supposition that the duties would remain as they were." There would be no justice in allowing the nurserymen a remission of duties, and to keep the dry goods men from having the same treatment. Hundreds of similar applications on other lines of goods have come before me and before the Minister of Customs in the same way. Therefore I say, to grant this would be to open the door, and it would be opening the door on behalf of an interest which is not at all the largest involved. My hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Wilson) has a good deal to say about the poor farmer. If we discuss this matter about the remission of duties, we ought to do so without saying it is riding hard on the poor farmers or upon anyone else. ought to discuss it on the fairness of the question involved. I do not think, however, that this is a farmer's grievance. I suppose that these nurserymen who live on the other side of the line, and who have agents to sell for them in this country, will lose something. These agents sell the stock on commission; they are to deliver at a certain time, and at a certain price, and the farmer has only to Mr. Foster.

pay that price. It is the nurseryman who has to deliver the stock. I suppose that the money lost will come upon the nurserymen, but it will certainly not come on the poor farmers. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) took one illustration on which to found a general argument. He says that because he took one order of stock from somebody in Ontario and it turned out bad, he would, therefore, not take any more orders from Ontario, and he argued that there should be no tariff wall to prevent him getting his stock from the United States, where he had placed one order for stock, which fulfilled his expectations. I may tell my hon, friend that a great many people who placed orders in the United States have received stock which is not fitted for this country at all, and which has proved an utter failure. The argument would apply one way as well as on the other. I do not believe that, from the amount involved, or the magnitude of the interest involved, or the principle involved, that we should make an exception in favor of the nurserymen. I do not see how it could be done, while the door is shut against a great many claimants of a similar kind. The attention of myself and my colleague was first called to this matter by the member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), who pressed the claims of the nursery agents before us. I told him at that time that we would take the matter into consideration, and give a decision as soon as possible. think the House must take the decision which I have foreshadowed to-night as being the only one the Government can come to in this case. It is come to, not because we wish to oppress the farmers, not because we wish to oppress the agents or the nurserymen, or anyone else, but simply on the principle involved, and which, I think, is a general one in all tariff legislation.

Mr. LAURIER. If this duty were imposed with the object of levying a revenue I would be disposed to agree with a great deal of what has been said by the Minister of Finance, because he states that the tariff, when it is formulated, is laid upon every one alike, that it would not be fitting that anybody should be relieved from the burden, that everybody must take it as it comes, and if it so happens it strikes upon someone in particular, this one has only to submit. This proposition is true, but it is a proposition which applies only when a duty is levied with the intention of raising a revenue. Of course revenue has to be levied by taxation. Taxation is a necessary evil, and when taxation strikes upon this one or the other, he has simply to bear the burden which is imposed upon him for the good of the community. But this principle does not apply here, because this duty is not levied for the purpose of obtaining a revenue to carry on the business of the country. This taxation is proposed simply to favor a few individuals who happen to be nurserymen on this side of the line. The hon. gentleman says it is not imposed with a view of oppressing anybody; but it certainly is imposed with a view of favoring somebody, and I ask is it right or fair, when a tax is simply levied to favor someone, that you should unduly oppress some others who are injuriously affected by these duties? I can easily understand, if this duty were levied for the common good, and to fill up the coffers of the country in order to carry on public business, that these men, even though they contracted last fall for these goods to be delivered this spring, would have no complaint, and would have simply to submit to the universal But when they see that this duty is levied upon them, and made to oppress them, not with a view of benefiting the community at large, or for the purpose of obtaining necessary revenue, but simply to favor this one or that one who happens to be in that same trade, then it certainly seems to me that they have just as good a right to complain as the iron importers had a right to complain a couple of years ago. I cannot see what difference there can be in this present instance and the case The Minister of Finance of the iron importers. has laid down some distinction, the force of which I cannot comprehend. He has stated that the iron trade is a large trade, and that it would create disturbance in some way, but in this case the principle of the importation is the same and the contract is made in advance for the good of those who happen to want those articles. If there was who happen to want those articles. an occasion to remit the duty two years ago, there must be the same occasion at this present time, and if there was occasion twenty years ago to remit the duty with regard to the importation of tea, it seems to me that the present is a parallel Under all these circumstances, I believe that the Government ought to accede to the demand which has been made on behalf of those who have contracted, last fall, for the supply of those goods.

Mr. TISDALE. I must again refer to this subject, if I be allowed to do so, in order to correct the hon. Minister of Finance in regard to the reasons given for this application for remission of duty. I think he must have been misinformed as to the grounds of my application to his colleague, or otherwise I should not take the liberty of asking the indulgence of the House again. My case was this, and I know of several other cases of the same sort, where the dealers themselves in Canada have ordered these goods; they have sold them at certain prices, and they are bound to deliver them now. They had to order them last fall, and as they cannot deliver them in the winter, they have to deliver them in the spring; therefore they must lose the amount of this duty. It is not the nurserymen of the United States who lose, but the dealers here who have bought the goods, and who are bound to pay for them, and have sold them in this country. This duty is, therefore, a direct loss to the people of this country. That was the case I put before the Minister, and I feel very strongly that if a special exception was ever made it should be made in this case, because the nurserymen could not help giving their orders before these duties were announced. This is not like the ordinary course of trade, where a man buys and sells right away, and he takes his chances; possibly those goods may go up if the tariff is raised, and he gets the benefit of that. But the season controls the operations of the nurserymen, for they have to give their order at a particular time of the year, and when they sell them at a particular price, they have to deliver them and they must lose the amount of this duty. In one case I know a man, who is not able to afford it, will lose $500, if this duty is not remitted, and I have been told that there are a number of cases of the same kind. I think, therefore, that the Government should remit the duty in this case.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that it has been urged on the Minister of Finance that there is a very peculiar feature in this nursery trade which, perhaps, does not appertain to any other trade in articles imported into this country. Transactions in fruit trees, vines, and so forth, are usually commenced in the autumn and are continued through the winter season; the orders are solicited, the sales made and the prices fixed at the same time; but the goods cannot be delivered at the time the order is made, but they must be delivered in the spring. The sales were made and the prices fixed before this tariff went into operation, and the only reason why the goods were not delivered was because nature barred their delivery through a portion of the year. In this respect, this is a peculiar case, and I would impress that view on the Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. Dry goods importations are in the same position.

Mr. CHARLTON. The dry goods are not sold until they are delivered, either by sample, or by the goods themselves being placed before the buyer; but, in this case, the agent comes to a farmer and he says he has a certain line of nursery stock to sell, that the price is thus; and so the farmer knows what a standard apple tree, or plum tree, or grape vine is, and what the price ought to be, and the contract is made, and the delivery is to take place as soon as nature will permit it—that is, in the following spring. In the meantime, my hon. friend intervenes with his tariff and disarranges the whole transaction. That is a feature of the trade to which, I think, the hon. Ministers have not given due consideration. With regard to the cases instanced by the hon member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), I am aware, that in the county we represent there are dealers who are importers as well, and who have been making contracts with the nurserymen in the United States for supplies which cannot be obtained in Canada, and they will be the losers. Under all the circumstances, I think the reasons are peculiarly strong for making a similar concession in this case to what has been made before, in our financial history, on two occasions. I do not think there is any trade which can present so strong a case as this for a remission of duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say a few words——

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon, gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that when I asked, before the House parted at dinner time, that we should be allowed to go into Committee and discuss this question there, I was met with the suggestion, which I thought was a very sensible one, that the discussion might take place when the Speaker is in the Chair, so that an hon, gentleman should only speak once. If we are going to discuss it just as if we were in Committee, it seems to me the agreement will not be carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, and I was only going to make one remark—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman has spoken, and I hope a motion for adjournment will not be resorted to again simply in order to enable an hon, member to speak when he has no right to speak.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not have moved anything of the kind it it had not been a common practice in this House. I wanted to put myself right on one point, and the hon. gentleman right on another. However, I will defer that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. Minister of Finance will find that nearly all the trees likely to come into the country were ordered before there was any change made in the tariff. They must be ordered during the winter, with the arrangement that they are to be shipped just as soon as the condition of the country will permit their being planted. Therefore, the hon gentleman will see that this is not a case of a few contracts having been entered into before the tariff was changed, but that all the trees and shrubs to be brought from the United States and planted this spring were ordered before any change was made in the tariff, and when there was no duty upon them; and it seems to me that if the hon. gentleman would allow these shrubs to come in under the old regulation he would be only doing what is fair to the various parties interested. They are not in the position of dry goods purchasers, many of whom, not having sold their goods, will simply add the duty to the price of the goods. The tree man agrees to sell at a fixed price, and that is the reason a contract is made; his order has been sent to the nursery, and he is bound by his obligation. In many cases the amount of duty exceeds the price of the article, so that it would pay better to lose all that had been paid than to import the article and pay the duty. Looking at the way in which these contracts are made, and the time they are made, it seems to me that the Government ought not to attempt to collect any duty on them during the present season. contracts made in the future should be, of course, subject to the tariff.

Mr. BOWELL. The remarks made by the hon. gentleman on this question are, beyond doubt, true to a certain extent. Whatever changes are made in the tariff, some persons must necessarily suffer. I cannot myself see any difference between the position of the importer of fruit trees, who has made his bargain before the tariff came into force, and a wholesale dry goods merchant, who, through his travelling agent, has sold a large quantity of goods in different parts of the country, the price of which is raised by the tariff. If it be equitable to allow fruit trees, which are sold prior to the imposition of the duty, to be brought in free, it is equally equitable to grant the same privilege to a merchant who can show that he has sold his goods prior to the imposition of the new duty. I will give you a case in point. A wholesale merchant of St. John, N.B., on the day before the tariff resolutions were announced, entered and paid the duty on a whole cargo of glass which he had imported from Belgium, and which had arrived in port on the 27th April, and an entry made, paying 30 per cent. duty on the glass. He makes an application to the Department for a refund of the amount of difference between the present tariff and the old tariff, which is 10 per cent. How am I to deal with cases of that kind which are constantly arising, and they arise in every branch of trade in the Dominion? My hon. friend, the Finance Minister, said, very correctly, that only the other Mr. SPEAKER.

day, when I was coming out of the Russell House, an importer of tea, who has been doing the same thing for several years, attacked me on the street, saying that he had not received justice at the time tea was put on the free list, but that he should have been repaid a certain sum of duty which he had paid. Having investigated the matter, I could not say he was entitled to what he claimed, but he still persists, and I believe honestly, in pressing his claim. Ever since I have been in the Customs Department I have had applications made for refund of duty in connection with machinery which was admitted under the old tariff free, when not manufactured in Canada, and these applications are made with respect to shafting and belting and to other articles made in this country. From what has come to my knowledge since this House adopted the resolution with reference to the iron duty, a good many frauds have been perpetrated by agencies of foreign houses, declaring that the goods had been purchased before the addition of the tariff. I merely give these instances to point out the diffi-culty in the way of carrying out the principle the hon. gentleman advocates. I certainly can see no difference between a man who has sold one hundred trees and has been caught by the tariff, and a man who has sold one hundred bushels of clover and timothy seed, and is in the same position; and many applications have been made to me, since the resolutions were presented to the House, for the free admission of these seeds, on the ground that they were sold before the resolution was adopted. If the concession be allowed in the one case, it will have to be made in the other cases. To my mind the seed men seem to have a stronger case than those men who import and sell trees, because, in some cases, the tree pedlers are the representatives and agents of foreign nurserymen, though I frankly admit all of them are not. I know cases where members of this House who have purchased trees and plants from American nurserymen, and that as soon as the tariff was announced they sent word to them, saying We will carry out our engagements, and will divide the duty with you, if you will only take the goods. There are other cases again where, although the goods have been actually sold and the sellers responsible for them, the American nurserymen insist on the agent paying the duty, as I suppose, in most cases, the purchasers insist on the delivery being made. I am sure my colleagues and myself will give this matter, as we have given it in the past, our most serious consideration. If there were any way in which what hon. gentlemen desire could be done equitably to every branch of business there would be less difficulty in carrying it out; to select a particular trade at the expense of the others would not be equitable or justifiable.

Mr. COOK. I wish to say a few words on a matter which is of vital importance to the country, and particularly to some individuals. It is a matter pertaining to the fisheries in our inland waters, and I am satisfied that when it has been brought thoroughly to the attention of the Government they will endeavor to right the wrong which has been done. I will not make any elaborate statement, but will confine myself largely to reading extracts from papers and from letters written by individuals interested. The Canadian Sportsman, a paper edited by Alderman E. King Dodds, of the city of Toronto, referring to the fisheries in Georgian Bay, says:

"We had hoped ere this to be able to chronicle a more enlightened policy by the Minister of Marine in connec-tion with the better protection of fish in our inland waters. We have evidence in our possession which very tion which were vidence in our possession which very clearly proves that the present system is altogether inadequate, and if the Government fail in their duty much longer it will take many years of costly work to remedy the mischief now being wrought, which by a more common-sense policy on the part of the authorities might easily be avoided. Illegal fishing is carried on in the most barefaced manner along the northern shore of Georgian Bay, and on a very large scale at that. There most barefaced manner along the northern shore of Georgian Bay, and on a very large scale at that. There are men engaged in the work who are making thousands of dollars out of it, and though we are informed that the Government have been notified of such doings, yet that no official notice has been taken of it, and the illegal fishing still goes bravely on."

In another paragraph the same writer says;

"We understand the steam yacht Cruiser has been in these northern waters for two seasons past, but for all the good she does in protecting the fishing interest she might just as well be tied up at Midland City. We are not acquainted with the captain of the Cruiser, the vessel in question, but we have been told by those who ought to knew that he is totally unfitted for the duties he is supposed to perform. He knows nothing either of the habits or haunts of the fish or of the poachers who are so successfully plying their work, and we have been told on good authority that the pilot in charge of the boat is very much mixed up if he is not in the employ of a ring of fishermen."

This is a very serious charge. In the first place, according to this statement, the captain of the Cruiser is not capable of performing the duties with which he is charged, and it is further stated that the pilot of the Cruiser is implicated with poachers in this illicit fishing. Then, in another paragraph, it is stated:

another paragraph, it is stated:

"Such a state of affairs as is here outlined should not be allowed to exist, and we hope the Department at Ottawa will take some steps to ascertain the true condition of things in those northern waters. How to accomplish this work it is not necessary for us to outline. The Hon. Mr. Tupper is a young man of progressive ideas, and we are confident, if he will but charge his mind that a reform is necessary, he will require no prompting to select the proper means to cure the evil. The regular overseer over the stretch of waters we have alluded to has no chance to detect the law-breakers. If we mistake not, the Department only allows inspectors expenses for travelling over their territories during the close season; if at other times they obtain information which in their judgment should necessitate a personal inspection, they would have to pay their own costs unless the Department ordered them out. It can, therefore, be readily understood what an easy time of it the illegal fishermen have. The Minister has a wide field for the exercise of his abilities. The whole system of fishery inspection on the rivers and lakes in this Province is a howling farce, and the money paid out by the Government is just so much cash thrown away. Paying a man $100 a year and then expect him to properly gard fifty miles of water is an absurdity on the face of it, and we know of districts where the inspectors do not make more than a single trip in the year, and where poaching goes bravely on all the year round. If the Department at Ottawa will put half a dozen shrewd men on the trail they will in six months gather sufficient information to prove to the Minister that the present information to prove to the Minister that the present is necessary if the Government care one straw about preserving the fish in our fresh waters."

This is a very serious matter, coming from a preserving the fish in our fresh waters.

This is a very serious matter, coming from a paper edited by such a strong Conservative as Mr. E. King Dodds. Then, on the 1st April, we find a letter in the Empire of Toronto, written by a party who signs his name "Collingwood," and it is to this effect :

"SIR.—I desire to point out the existence of an injustice which probably only requires to be publicly mentioned to be redressed. I have no doubt that the injustice referred to is quite unintentional, but its effects are very keenly felt by the fishermen of the Georgian Bay.

"It appears that about four years ago a regulation was passed by the Department of Fisheries at Ottawa forbidding the use of pound nets in any waters east of an imaginary line between Cape Hurd and Spanish River. The district thus cut off includes the fisheries of Collingwood, Meaford, Killarney and other most important stations—the heart of the lake fishing industry. Although many of the fishermen in this district have large quantities of these nets, they appear quite willing to abide by the departmental regulations, as they admit the pound nets to be very destructive and hurful to the fishing industry.

"During past seasons, however, one C. W. Gauthier, has obtained from the Department a lease of nearly all lake waters west of the line referred to, with the privilege of setting pound nets. He has established fishing stations at the Duck Islands, Big Channel, Cape Roberts, Barrie Island and Bay. Grant Islands and North Shore, South Bay or Manitoulin Gulf, Missisauga Point and River, John's island, on both sides, and Spanish River. At all these points the pound nets are used, as well as at Thessalon Point, where another favored party has a lease.

"If it is advisable to prohibit, pound nets at all—and the fishermen do not deny it—the points referred to are above all those at which the prohibition should come into effect, as they are all favorite resorts for young fish, being land-locked and protected from the heavy south-west gales which prevail in the waters east of the line. The use of pound nets is especially pernicious at rivers, and none should be allowed either in the rivers or within five miles of their mouths. It is a well-known fact that the lake fish go up the tributary rivers to spawn, and from this it will be seen how exceedingly destructive pound nets must be at such places as Spanish River, etc.

"All the fishermen of the Georgian Bay ask is that the prohibition of pound nets be made general, and

"Yours, etc... "COLLINGWOOD."

In view of that letter, which appeared in the Empire on the 1st April, the member for East Grey asked this question, and received an answer from Mr. Colby as follows:

from Mr. Colby as follows:

"Mr. SPROULE asked, Whether it is correct, as alleged in a communication which appears in the Empire of 1st April, that one W. Gauthier, a fisherman, has obtained a lease or license to fish with pound nets in the waters surrounding Duck Islands or in Big Channel, Cape Roberts, Barrie Island and Bay, Grant Islands and North Shore, South Bay or Manitoulin Gulf, Mississauga Point and River, John's Island, both sides, and Spanish River, also Thessalon Point? If so, is it the intention of the Department to continue the privilege to Mr. Gauthier while refusing it to the fishermen of the Georgian Bay?

"Mr. COLBY. The statement as alleged in a communication which appears in a copy of the Empire of 1st April, is not wholly correct. Mr. C. W. Gauthier does hold licenses to fish in the vicinity of Duck Island; he owns the island, having purchased it from the Indian Department; he also holds licenses to fish at Cape Roberts, at Grant's Island, Serpent River Bay and John's Island; but not at Bone Island Bay, not at South Bay or Manitoulin Gulf, not at Mississauga Point, not at Spanish River, nor at Thessalon Point. No licenses to fish with pound nets have been issued in Georgian Bay since 1885, except two, one each to Captain Allan and David Porter, in 1888. These were issued in connection with the operation of procuring ova for the hatcheries. No fishermen have been fished in the fishermen of Georgian Bay or any other applicant."

Now, the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Colberts in which the constitution of the fishermen of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Colberts in which stands the constitution of the fishermen of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Colberts in which the constitution of the fishermen of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Colberts in which the constitution of the fishermen of Marine and Fisheries.

Now, the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries, (Mr. Colby) simply evaded the question. It is well known that Mr. Gauthier represents many American companies, and these companies have the privilege of fishing in our Canadian waters to the exclusion of our Canadian fishermen, and they use the most destructive nets. I received the following letter from a gentleman in Collingwood a little while ago, and I may say that most of the fishermen there are supporters of the present Administration, and they deputed this gentleman to address me on the subject:

"Collingwood, 24th March, 1890.

"H. H. Cook, Esq., M.P., Ottawa

"DEAR SIR,—I thought I would let you know a few of our grievances and the way the Government of purity at Ottawa deal out fair play. It seems about three years ago that a line was drawn from Cape Hurd, Lake Huron, to Spanish River, allowing no pound nets to be set to the east of this line which have your defensions. line was drawn from Cape Hurd, Lake Huron, to Spanish River, allowing no pound nets to be set to the east of this line, which cuts us and others out to the eastward; that we have a stock of those nets to the value of five to six thousand dollars, and not able to set any of them, which means a big loss to us; that Mr. Gauthier, Marks, Dobie and others, have all the ground west of this line, at the following places: Spanish River, John Island, both sides, the islands outside of Algoma Mills, Mississauga River and Point, Grant Islands, and north shore opposite, Thessalon Point, Mississauga Channel, Cape Roberts, Barrie Island, Duck Islands and South Bay, Manitoulin Island. Those men must be good supporters of the Government. This is hardly fair, to allow those parties to fish while we and others have to keep our nets idle. I would wish you to inquire how many licenses are paid to the Department. They cost fifty dollars each license. We would be willing to lose our stock in nets if the Government would do away with them altogether. It would be better to fish east of this line than west, as in the North Channel the young fish would be protected and not caught off the same as they are now by those pound nets. Also, we were stopped from fishing a pound net at Horse Island, and since then the Department have granted a seine lease or license, one of the most destructive of nets, for it brings everything ashore, and the large fish only being shipped, while the small ones are thrown on the beach to the numbeer of 40,000 to 50,000 in the season. while the small ones are thrown on the beach to the number of 40,000 to 50,000 in the season.

"Kindly attend to this and oblige, "Yours respectfully,

"CHARLES NOBLE."

Now, of all the nets that could be used, I suppose the seine nets are the most destructive. A large number of small fish are brought to land not fit for shipping purposes, and they are thrown upon the shore and allowed to rot. Pound nets are also of very great injury to the fish, of which they catch large quantities. The hon. Minister has, as I said, in his reply, misled the House—I must say, misled the House. Whether he did it intentionally or not I will not say. I do not think he did it intentionally; but, if he did not do it intentionally the Department should be put in possession of the facts, so that they may have a knowledge of what is going on. I have here a copy of a letter that was addressed to the hon. Minister of Fisheries, on the 7th April, which I will read:

"Dear Sir.—If not taking too much liberty we, as good Canadian citizens, would respectfully ask your consideration of the pound net system. We, as a firm, have in stock, from five to six thousand dollars worth of pound nets, and on account of an imaginary line from Cape Hurd to Spanish River, and no nets being allowed to be set to the eastward of such line, debars us from setting our nets, as all the available ground to the west of this line has been taken up by parties to all intents and purposes Americans, excepting Messrs. Marks & Dobie, of Thessalon. Also, there are two pound nets in South Bay, where the young whitefish go for protection in May and June. Also Mr. R. Green has a license from Fishery Officer Brinkman to haul a seine where we had a net at our line at Rattlesnake Harbor. Fitzwilliam Island, and from which there is from fifty to sixty thousand young whitefish thrown away in May and June. We think it is hardly fair to allow these people to fish in those bays and inlets, where the young fish go for protection, and deprive other equally deserving citizens from fishing in the open other equally deserving citizens from fishing in the open lake. The Department must have been misinformed by one of its fishery officers or those privileges would never have been granted to Gauthier and others. Now, Sir, we know that Gauthier, on the Duck Islands, Missisaga Channel, Cape Roberts, Barrie Islands, Barrie Bay, both sides of John Island, Algoma Mils, Missisaga River, Grant Islands and North Shore, opposite, has in some Mr. Cook.

cases two and three nets on the one lead, and has between thirty and forty pound nets in use at Thessalon Point and Dollar Bay. Marks & Dobie have some five or six pound

You will please remember that the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated there were only two pound nets allowed in the whole Georgian Bay. and that these were allowed for breeding purposes: but here we have the evidence of gentlemen whose authority cannot be doubted, that in one bay alone are thirty or forty pound nets set:

"Again, Sir, there has been pound nets set all winter in the Spanish River, and the same was reported to Cant.

I suppose Capt. Wilson is one of the overseers.-

"Sault Ste. Marie, who came down to make a seizure, but was sent off on a false trail while the parties sank their nets. There has been between thirty and forty tons of fish shipped from there this winter, which should have offish shipped from there this winter, which should have been left there, as no pound net or seine, under any circumstances, should be set or drawn within five miles of the entrance of any river. As within our recollections nearly all the great rivers were full of fish, and being easily taken at certain seasons of the year, have been depleted. Now, Sir, we believe it would be the best thing for the country at large to grant no pound net license whatever; but if any are granted, we will make application for (12) twelve licenses in the vicinity of Killarney, as our main business is situate there: but we would sooner lose the whole of our stock in nets if the Department will issue no licenses at all. The lightkeeper at the Sister Rocks, above Bruce Mines, has two pound nets in use also."

So you see that, although the Minister stated there were only two pound nets used in the whole of Georgian Bay, pound nets are used in almost every direction. I know that in the fall of the year fishing goes on as if there was no close season at all. Large fish come to the mouth of the river and close to the shore for the purpose of spawning, and they are taken in great numbers all along the line with impunity, no one looking after them whatever. I thought it my duty to bring this to the attention of the Government, and I trust they will look into the matter, because I consider it of vital importance that some measures should be taken to prevent our inland waters from being depleted of fish.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. gentleman has drawn attention to a subject which is of very great interest in the district I have the honor to represent, and which ought to be of very great interest all over Canada—that is, the preservation of the fish in the great lakes. There can be no doubt that there is a great deal of over-fishing going on in Lake Huron, There are so many appliances now between pound nets, seines and all other sorts of nets, that the lakes are actually becoming depleted. The fish lakes are actually becoming depleted. are swept out and sent off fresh, packed in ice, to the American market. Our own country derives very little benefit from them before they are shipped away, and if the present state of things continues for a few years more we will have no fish at all. The Americans, on their side of the lakes, have succeeded in destroying fish so utterly that over long sections of the coast of Lakes Huron and Superior there are but few fish of any kind now to be found. On the Canadian side we are not yet so badly off, as the fish, until now, have been very abundant. They are getting thinned out in the Canadian in the Georgian Bay, but along the north shore of Lake Huron there are yet a great many. The hon. gentleman alluded to the Government vessel. There is no doubt that that vessel is rather too small for the service in which she is employed. There is not so much fault to be found with the captain, who is,

I believe, a very good and efficient man, as with the vessel; she is so small and unseaworthy that sail boats can pass her in a storm; indeed, she cannot venture out when sail boats are able to do so. The first thing, therefore, is to provide the captain with a better vessel, and then he will perform a better service. I repeat, that I believe the officer in charge is a very good and very competent man, and is very anxious to do his duty. There is a question connected with the fisheries of the lakes to which I wish to draw particular attention; but, before doing so, I shall first allude to the remarks made in regard to one Gauthier. I do not think Gauthier is more culpable than other fisher-They all endeavor to get all the fish they possibly can catch, and he is a very active man, who has been very successful in securing large quantities of fish. There are several others who also fish very extensively. This leads me to draw attention to the fishing at the Duck Islands. In a little channel quite near the islands a very active and energetic man engaged in fishing. He set pound nets in the channel, and in a few weeks he caught 500 tons, which is a very large quantity. The same practice was followed in the same place the second year, and half the quantity was caught in three weeks. He tried it the third year and caught but few fish. I mention this to show the disastrous effect of pound nets in destroying the fisheries of the lakes. I could point to other instances where pound nets have produced the same effect. Further west, in another portion of my constituency, is the Lake of the Woods. There is a certain kind of fish there which has been until now very abundant. I refer to the sturgeon. The Indians of that part of the country, and they are very numerous, there being 3,000 or 4.000 on the shores of the Lake of the Woods, have depended chiefly, if not wholly, on the sturgeon as their means of subsistence. I am sorry to say that the pound net has made its appearance there. The Indians were in the habit of herding the sturgeon, in much the same way as the Indians of the plains herded the buffalo, and they drove them into particular parts of the lake. In this way they would not catch more than they required at a time. It was their habit to make permican of them and store it for the winter. But pound nets have come along, and the fish have been swept away. The Indians seeing that their sturgeon were being swept off became reckless themselves, and destroyed the fish which they formerly husbanded in large quantities; one set of pound nets in the course of one day, I have authority to say, caught 900 large sturgeons weighing about 100 pounds each. Nothing can stand such destruction, and in permitting it we are depriving the Indians of a means of subsistence. Their game is being killed off, and they have not advanced far in agriculture; and so, within a very few years, those Indians will be here demanding support from the Government, and it will have to be given to them. But this does not apply to the Indians of the Lake of the Woods only, but also to other Indians in all parts of the country. At Sault Ste. Marie for generations the Indians have depended very largely on their fish. They have been in the habit of catching fish in the rapids there, scooping them out by hand nets. Pound nets have, however, of recent years been introduced, not only on the British side, but on the American side, in the channels leading to the rapids, and the consequence is that the fish are being exterminated. They are killed before they reach the rapids. But, I may say, the Indians are not suffering as much now as they did a few years ago because they can now find other employment. A few years ago they suffered greatly from the destruction of their fisheries, but they now find work among the settlers who are coming in. I think hon. gentlemen of the Opposition have not done justice to the effort of the Fisheries Department to preserve the fish. The Department has exerted itself to its very utmost, and at Spanish River and Mississauga River they have prevented pound nets being set within a long distance of the mouths of the rivers, in order to allow the fish to ascend. Some years ago the Indians on the banks of those rivers were complaining very bitterly, and I drew the attention of the Department of Fisheries to the fact, and the Department immediately took the most effective measures within their power to prevent the fish being exterminated or nets set near the river mouths. I believe, with the limited means at its disposal, the Department of Fisheries is doing everything within its power. But when fishermen from the American side and from the Canadian side come upon the fishing grounds, and when the lakes become regularly covered with fishing boats and fishermen, how are you to protect the fish? It can only be done by stopping fishing to a very large extent. The population is increasing, and the people will have fish, and more and more fishermen every year are engaging in the business of catching them. There is one thing that might very reasonably be stopped, and that is the boat licenses. A fisherman gets a license for $5, and thereafter sets nets, and catches an immense quantity of fish, and throws the offal into the lake and frightens the other fish away. Those who fish systematically, if left to themselves, do not do so much harm; and if the fishing grounds were leased, or if certain sections of them were leased, to different parties, those persons would have an interest in protecting the grounds; but the men who have boat licenses are free rovers who go everywhere and follow the fish. Moreover, the fishery of the lakes is not like the fishery of the sea, for in the former case the fish are very easily exterminated. There are now complaints of the fisheries on the Newfoundland Banks being destroyed, and how much more easy it is to destroy the fisheries in the lakes? I am very glad attention has been drawn to this subject, and I hope the Government will take some steps in regard to it. It is very important that the Indians should be protected in the fisheries, and very important to future generations that the fish of these great lakes should not be exterminated.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am very glad that the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) has directed the attention of the House to the wholesale slaughter that has been practised on our fisheries in the northern lakes. I have spent two or three summers in the district of Muskoka and Georgian Bay and have witnessed myself the wholesale slaughter which has been prevalent there. It seems to me a pity, that while we maintain here so efficient a department under Mr. Wilmot, for the propagation of fish and their dissemination throughout the lakes, so little pains should be taken to see that this money so expended should result in proper advantage. It is only to-night that I received from a friend a letter with reference to the destruction which has taken place in the neighborhood of the Manitoulin Islands, and which I will read to the

"The lake is well stocked with fine bass and other kinds of fish, which should be preserved for sport, but is in danger of being entirely depleted by fishermen residing at Madge Bay, who during last summer—and I am informed in previous summers—have had ordinary nets, and trap nets set, with which they have caught tons of fine bass, shipping the same to Buffalo and other points. I saw nets of both kinds there last summer and felt strongly inclined to destroy them. I take my summer outing on the border of the lake, and hence my desire to preserve the fish from destruction."

It is not only on the lakes of Muskoka and Rosseau that this wholesale destruction is going on, but it is extending also to the Georgian Bay, and I was surprised to hear the remarks of the member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), which are corroborated by a gentleman beside me, who tells me that the vessel employed there to prevent this poaching and destruction of fish is utterly unable to perform the duty, that in stormy weather it is not safe for anyone to venture out in her, and that its movements are so slow that it is unable to overtake and capture those who may be engaged in this illegal fishing. I have no doubt that now that the atten-tion of the Government has been brought to this matter, when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries returns from Washington he will display his usual energy in dealing with it. The fish in our upper lakes are comparatively as great a source of wealth to us in Ontario as the sea fisheries are to our friends in the Maritime Provinces, and they should be properly and efficiently protected.

Mr. O'BRIEN. This is a matter in which I am very much interested. But at this late stage of the Session, and at this time of the night, with important business before us, I do not propose to take up the time in a general discussion, which I should think it my duty to give to it on another occasion. I most earnestly ask the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries to pay attention to the statements made by the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), because if they are true, or anything like true, it is a matter which deserves to be carefully and fully looked into. The use of pound nets on that particular part of the coast with which I am familiar has not been permitted by the Department, and has been practised to but a very slight extent last year, but if it is true that thirty or forty pound nets are in operation in the Georgian Bay, either with the permission of the Department or contrary to its regulations, it is a very serious matter. I hope the Minister will pay particular attention to this point, because it is the most important of all. The question of the boat licenses alluded to by the hon. member for Algoma is altogether too large a question to be entered upon at the present time, but the Department of Fisheries must make up its mind that if the fisheries of these inland waters are to be protected as they ought, more money must be expended and their officers must be paid a little better than they are now. One of the most useful and efficient of the fishery officers in that district has a hundred miles of coast to look after. and the Department only allows him $150 for the season's expenses. Anyone who knows that coast knows that they might as well dispense with the service altogether as to allow such a small sum. As to the vessel used in the protection service, I time diminish the revenue. It is bad every way. Mr. Cockburn.

may say that anyone who knows anything about the Georgian Bay knows that it is in no way suited for the purpose. I quite agree with the motives which led the Department to purchase the vessel in the first instance, but she is not fitted for service on that part of the lake, although she may be found useful in some other waters. I would ask the Minister to give the statements made by the hon. gentleman to-night his immediate attention.

Mr. McNEILL. I quite agree with hon. gentlemen who have stated that the Cruiser is altogether insufficient for the work she is called upon to per. The vessel is not seaworthy, and it is as much as a man's life is worth to go out with her in bad weather. We know very well that on the Georgian Bay we are sometimes subject to very bad weather, and have a very dangerous kind of sea, and, therefore, a good seaworthy vessel is necessary. I wish to say also, that the fishery overseers should have something like reasonable compensation for the work they are called upon to They are obliged to look after the perform. licenses, and to see that men are not fishing during the month of November, which is the close season. At this time of the year, when the Georgian Bay is very dangerous to navigate, these men have to go out very often in small open boats, at the risk of their lives, and they are paid only a miserable pittance, so that it is most unreasonable to expect them to perform their duties as they ought. I hope that the acting Minister of Marine and Fsheries will give this matter his immediate and careful consideration.

Mr. COLBY. I was not aware that this important subject would be brought before the House this afternoon. I can only say, at this moment, that the observations of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter will be most carefully considered in the Department.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Gloves and mitts of all kinds, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

This is an Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why is it made? increase.

Mr. FOSTER. It is an increase of 5 per cent. We are taking some of the articles which were formerly free, and putting them on the dutiable list, as they are now manufactured in the country; I find that the imports of gloves and mitts amounted to $346,059 last year, and it was thought only fair to give an additional 5 per cent. so as to retain the Canadian market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is to say, this is a deliberate corner for the benefit of some friends of the hon. gentleman. These gloves and mitts are articles of necessity in our climate, and here the hon. gentleman, for no earthly reason, for he has plenty of revenue, is deliberately raising the duty on articles of prime necessity. I can only say that a more worthless reason I never heard given. It is only done to help some manufacturer. It is regular robbery.

Mr. FOSTER. It will rather have the effect of reducing the revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; it will add to the tax on the consumer, and at the same Fur felt hats, $1.50 per dozen, and 20 per cent. ad valorem. Hats and caps, N.E.S., 30 per cent. ad valorem. Ladies' hats and bonnets, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to be allowed to drop items 73 and 75, and amend item 74 by making it read, "Hats, caps and bonnets, 30 per cent. ad ralorem." That will have the effect of reducing the duty on fur felt hats, keeping the duty on hats and caps as proposed, and adding 5 per cent. to the duty on ladies' hats and bonnets. After a great deal of discussion and consideration we concluded that it would be better to have one item covering the whole, and to fix the duty at 30 per cent. It is almost impossible, for instance, in some cases, to tell the difference between ladies' hats and gentlemen's hats.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this not an increase of 5 per cent. on men's hats?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. McMULLEN. I really think there was no necessity for that. I have been in conversation with several dealers in Montreal on this very question, and the general opinion is that 25 per cent. is amply sufficient to protect the hat manufacturer of this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am informed by a gentleman engaged in the business of making hats and caps, that the alterations to the tariff will, no doubt, give additional protection to hats, but that the alterations affecting caps really put a duty of 59 per cent. on the material, which is a great deal more than the duty on the manufactured article, and that the cap maker would receive a good deal more protection under a 15 per cent. tariff than he will under the tariff which the hon. gentleman proposes.

India rubber boots and shoes with tops or uppers of cloth or of material other than rubber, 35 per cent. ad

Valorem.
India rubber boots and shoes and other manufactures of India rubber, N.E.S., 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. They were formerly 25 per cent. Gradually, however, these boots and shoes were made with the smallest amount of rubber, and the largest amount of cloth of different descriptions, and were ruled according to the duties on the different cloths. A great many disputes arose out of this at the Customs, and we thought better to make the division between India rubber boots and shoes with cloth uppers, and boots and shoes made entirely of rubber, the latter of which are charged at the same rate as before.

Corset clasps, spoon clasps or busks, blanks, busks, side steels and other corset steels, whether plain, japanned, lacquered, tinned or covered with paper or cloth; also buck, bone or corset wires, covered with paper or cloth, cut to lengths and tipped with brass or tin, or untipped, or in coils, 5 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the minimum and maximum value of these articles?

Mr. FOSTER. They vary a good deal. We calculated the duties to average about 35 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At 5 cents per pound and 30 per cent. you are really putting on a duty of something like 45 per cent. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) The hon. to 40 cents per pound, which would make the average duty 40 to 45 per cent.

Mr. WALDIE. The average is 60 cents a pound, which would make the duty about 40 per Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a very material difference from what the hon. gentleman states.

Ferro-manganese, ferro-silican, spiegel, steel bloom ends and crop ends of steel rails, for the manufacture of iron or steel, $2 per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the same duty. The only thing we have added is hub iron. Formerly we let that in at $2 per ton for the manufacture of steel, but it is also used in the manufacture of Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the value, on an average, of these articles per ton?

Mr. FOSTER. About $25 a ton.

Builders', cabinet-makers', harness-makers' and saddlers' hardware, including curry-combs, carriage hardware, locks, butts and hinges, N.E.S., and tools of all kinds, N.E.S., 35 per cent. ad valorem.

This is the same duty, but we Mr. FOSTER. have added butts and hinges, which we have taken from another item, where they are charged I cent a pound and 25 per cent. We have added tools of all kind. A large number of these tools were scattered in other parts of the tariff at the same rate of duty, and in one or two instances the duty is slightly raised, the idea being to include them in one item.

Mr. McMULLEN. Common butts are things which are largely used, and it is exceedingly unwise to increase the duty on them. A reduction should be made on harness fittings. These things are not made here at all, and I have known harness-makers complain very much about many things they have to get from the United States, on which they are charged an enormous duty. Is this the duty which formerly existed?

Mr. FOSTER. The very same. They are made here, I am told.

These goods are made in a Mr. TAYLOR. factory in Gananoque, which employs eighty hands in doing nothing else but making harness trimmings. I would like if the hon. Minister would insert after the word "hinges" the words "brass or copper rivets." We have an industry with a capital of $135,000 engaged in the manufacture of brass and copper rivets. A duty is charged on the copper wire of 15 per cent. These goods now come under the tariff as "manufactured brass or copper, not elsewhere specified," at a rate of 30 per cent. The makers pay 15 per cent. on the raw material, and made application for an increased duty, but, for some reason or another, these articles do not appear in the revised tariff. Although the parties engaged in that industry are politically opposed to me, in justice to it, it is my duty to advocate their claims.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whether they are or not opposed to the hon. gentleman, his proposition should require little consideration at the hands of the Finance Minister, if he looks to the interests of the consumer. I think it would be intolerable if applications of this kind were granted, says the average value of these articles is from 30 for I presume the Finance Minister gave this subject full consideration when revising the tariff, and having made a general increase all along the line, I hope he will not allow any additional charge to be hoisted on us in this way.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon gentleman is in error. This is a reduction on butts and hinges, which formerly were charged 1 cent per pound and 35 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) that I do not think this would be a good item in which to insert that. It has received some consideration at the hands of my colleagues and myself, but I would rather not insert it here.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may state that I was not making any declaration on my own knowledge, but was simply giving information which I hadreceived from a gentleman engaged in the saddlery business. I was told that the ordinary kind of saddlery and trimmings were made here, but that the finer kind was not manufactured in this country, and the duty upon that was very high.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon, gentleman goes into the Department of Costums he will find that the most expensive goods, gold and silver plates and so on, are turned out by the factory in Gananoque.

Surgical and dental instruments of all kinds, 20 per cent. advalorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that, where there is such a large unnecessary revenue, surgical instruments, of all things, should be admitted free. In the first place, they are tools of trade, and in the next place, as every medical man knows, no impediment should be thrown in the way of obtaining the best class of instruments. I must say that I am amazed that such things as this should linger in our tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. I might be amazed also at the strong plea of the hon. gentleman on behalf of surgical instruments as tools of trade, while the tools of the trade of the workingmen have to pay a higher duty. Surgical instruments only bear a duty of 20 per cent., and dental instruments, which formerly paid 30 per cent., are reduced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman does not appear to understand that surgical instruments are intended for the relief to suffering.

Mr. FOSTER. I had a faint idea that that was what they were for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is a barbarity to continue to tax these instruments. I may say further, that I object to taxing tools of all kinds. It is no reason for charging this duty of 20 per cent. on surgical instruments to say that other tools are charged a duty of 35 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. The charge comes on the person by whom they are used.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt the charge comes on the person who is suffering, and for whose benefit they are used. No doubt it is a direct additional tax on the unfortunate; and I may say without, I hope, hurting the susceptibilities of the hon. Minister, that I regard it as a brutal and a barbarous tax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If the Finance Minister will reduce the duty to 10 per cent. I Sir Richard Cartwright.

think it would be a very fair protection to the manufacturers; but, I am not disposed to complain very much of this duty, because the Minister has considered the surgeons in regard to the instruments they require more than he considered those who require suspensory bandages. If this duty were reduced to 10 per cent. there would be a larger competition in the Canadian market, and I think the price would be reduced which we have to pay. If the surgeons are charged large prices for their instruments the money is taken out of the sick, and in the end it devolves upon the farmers and others who pay the surgeons. If the duty were reduced, no doubt the surgeons would be more lenient to their patients.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This tax is not on the farmers, but upon the medical men. These surgical instruments are not bought for each particular case, but one set of instruments lasts a surgeon for a number of years—sometimes for a lifetime—and certainly no surgeon charges more in any particular case because he has had to pay more for his surgical instruments. As to the different prices of instruments in the United States and in Canada, every surgeon knows very well that the surgeons of Canada do not use very many instruments manufactured in the United States if they can get the English instruments, which are very much better.

Mr. WALDIE. They pay the same duty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is a tax on doctors and not a tax on farmers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The price of these instruments is twice as high as it should be, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) knows. He knows very well that he can get the same instrument in the American market at a much less price than he can here, and I think that a little more competition from Germany or England or the United States would stimulate the Canadian manufacturer to make better instruments. We know that the English instruments are the best that are manufactured. Why should they be excluded in order to compel Canadian surgeons and dentists to purchase Canadian goods? I think 10 per cent. is quite sufficient protection for any manufacture.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I must say that I entirely disagree with the doctors on this occasion. If any class of the people ought to be made to pay towards the revenue it is the doctors. I would be in favor of increasing this duty to 35 per cent. I think the doctors are well paid, and if we taxed the doctors and the lawyers I think it would be a good thing for the rest of the community. It is ridiculous to hear doctors complaining that they have to pay a duty of 20 per cent. on these things which they bring in for use in the practice of their profession. These instruments last for a lifetime. I do not think this duty is bleeding any one. The doctors bleed the public, and they should not complain if they are bled in the interests of the community at large. I believe the doctors make more money than any class of the community except the lawyers. If this money is wanted for revenue I think we ought to get it out of the doctors and the lawyers.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). To some extent I agree with what the hon. gentleman has stated, but I disagree with the assertion that the tax upon surgical instruments is monstrous. I agree with the last speaker that in proportion to their value and the length of time they last, and the money possibly earned by the man who buys the instrument, any surgeon or practicing physician in this country who has to buy any considerable number of instruments for his own use must, of necessity, earn a considerable income, and this is the smallest possible conceivable tax. I am not for a high tax, but to say this is monstrous, or burdensome, or barbarous, is simply ridiculous; it is the absurdity of ridiculousness.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I happen to know that men quite as high in that profession as the hon. gentleman is, or is likely to become if he were to live to the age of Methuselah, complain exceedingly of the expense of getting surgical instruments. I know that many skilful medical men, though, perhaps, not quite so well supplied with income as the hon. member for Brant supposes them to be, are prevented, by reason of the cost, from getting surgical instruments which would be very much to their advantage. For that reason I repeat that taxes of this kind are in their essence barbarous.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I certainly cannot agree with some of the remarks made by medical men on the other side of the House with reference to the cost of surgical instruments. It is well known that they are a necessity to the profession, and we know that in order to get a good quality of instruments we have to pay a high figure for them. The majority of surgeons purchase their instruments from the old country, they use comparatively few of those manufactured in the United States, and the duty placed upon a high-priced instrument is certainly very great. I have no sympathy with the remarks made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville). If there is one man in the House more than another who raises his voice in fierce tones against injustice, hardship, and cruelty towards any class, especially the printers, that hon, gentleman is the very one to cry out. On every occasion where there is an item of expenditure going where printers are concerned we find him to be the defender of high prices for them. I would tell him here that if his knowledge of printing is not better than his knowledge of surgical instruments I pity the printing as well as I would pity the poor unfortunate patients if they were to ask him to select their surgical instruments. To say that a physician should be compelled to use an inferior knife, for instance, when he has to perform an operation, is to advocate a cruel principle. Every one knows that if you have to perform a difficult operation you must have a good instrument in order to do it skilfully. My hon friend would say, no doubt, that it made very little difference whether you had a fresh instrument or an improved instrument, or whether you had an inferior one; that it was not worth while to go to the trouble of getting a new instru-ment. An hon. gentleman opposite said that physicians do not require new instruments very frequently. I pity the patient he has to treat if he adopts an old fashioned instrument that has fashioned instrument used in years gone by are as efficient for performing an operation as the new fashioned instruments. Any man, to be proficient in his profession, requires to keep up with the improvements in instruments, no matter what the expense may be, and he must resort to the very finest kind of instruments if he is going to be a successful operator. I say the high duty placed upon these instruments shows on the part of the Government neither considerations of justice to the physician nor of mercy to the patient.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not very much surprised at the violence of the language used by the hon. member for South Oxford, but I am surprised at the statements he has made here to-night. He tells us that it is brutal and barbarous to make the duty on surgical instruments 20 per cent., that is, to reduce it from 25 to 20; whereas he, when Finance Minister, actually increased the duty on these articles to the highest point in his tariff, namely, from 15 to 17½ per cent. Where was his idea of barbarity then? On mechanics' tools and other tools of that class there is charged a duty of 35 per cent., while on surgical instruments the duty is reduced to 20 per cent., thus putting them on a better footing than any other class, which should be satisfactory to them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon, gentleman does not appear to be able to understand the plainest possible distinction. In that case there was a need for additional revenue; here you have a surplus of $2,000,000. In my case the duties were excessively moderate, in this case the duties are excessively high all around. How can a Government better employ a surplus than in applying a portion of it to the reduction of the duties? After all that has been said, it is clear these duties must press heavily on persons who are suffering, because everybody knows, who will give the matter one moment's consideration, that in many cases the suffering patient would be greatly relieved if the operator possessed the higher classed instruments than he can well obtain under this tariff.

Mr. BOWELL. Then the hon. gentleman's idea of brutality, monstrosity, and all the other adjectives of which he has such a wonderful command, consists in a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty. The hon gentleman raised the duty on this article 21 per cent; was it all right to resort to such a robbery, to commit such an inhuman act, as to tax this article 21/2 per cent. additional when he wanted revenue. Surely he should have taken some other article in the tariff instead of adopting the monstrous principle of taxing surgical instruments. In 1879 when the general rise took place all the unenumerated articles were placed at 20 per cent. The present proposition is not to change that duty; it is simply to take it from one item, making a separate item of it, and add to it dental instruments, which formerly paid 25 per cent., and make them 20. That is the whole story in a nut shell. If we are brutal and brutes, the hon. gentleman must be an angel—unfortunately an angel in disguise, for the people of this country have never appreciated him. That is the difference.

physicians do not require new instruments very frequently. I pity the patient he has to treat if he adopts an old fashioned instrument that has been discarded. I say it is unscientific for any man in the profession to pretend that the old ing the exact words which were used by his late leader sitting on the Opposition side of the House, and in order that we might have an opportunity of comparing that gentleman's principles with his practice, I called the attention of the House to it. Now, if any one disputes it, I will send and get the Hansard and read the paragraph again. If hon, gentlemen choose to indulge in this kind of reply to a reasonable demand for using the surplus for the purpose of alleviating the sufferings of a class who desire to have their sufferings alleviated, we will have a little discussion over it. I point out that all through this tariff, where you have a surplus, your first duty is to use it for the purpose of relieving persons in distress. That first duty has been violated already by the maintenance of the duty on trusses and suspensory bandages, which I characterised very properly the other night. It is still further violated by the maintenance of this duty now. The duty is utterly insignificant in amount, and it does not produce any revenue of moment. I find on looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns that the value of the articles imported was $27,827, the duty collected on which was $5,566. I say it is utterly indefensible under the circumstances to maintain a duty like this; and for the express purpose of calling the attention of the House again to the contention of the hon, gentleman's friends and leaders I will read to them, as they appear to be so destitute of memory, and they cannot remember what was said on that side of the House, what Sir Charles Tupper said on the subject. He said:

"There never was a time when the hon. Minister of Finance had it in his power to deal with this question in a manner more just to the people than at present. He says we have a surplus of half a million. I say the Government have no right to have a surplus. If they have, they should endeavor to get rid of it, and the best way to do so is that pursued by us, and by the Government of Great Britain—by lightening the taxes on the people."

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who said that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sir Charles Tupper in 1875. It was a year after the increase of duties to which I referred, or to which the hon. gentleman referred. It was before this same National Policy, for taxing the people to the very last sliver for the benefit of certain "combines" and friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, was introduced. It was a year after I had made my speech on the tariff in 1876, when Sir Charles Tupper expected I was going to announce an increase of taxation, and that hon, gentleman, being interrogated by the member for West York, then Premier, admitted frankly to him that if we had brought down propositions to increase the tariff, that hon. gentleman, the exemplary champion of the National Policy, intended to have attacked us then and there on behalf of the Maritime Provinces for having introduced the thin end of the wedge of protection and ground the people of the Maritime Provinces under the iron heel of an Ontario Finance Minister. But, finding we were not going to tax the people, he made an appeal to a set of gentlemen who put themselves up for sale, and who, the moment I refused to buy them, what +1 went and sold themselves to hon. that was opposite—yea, There never was an elector who sold himself for $5 who sold himself more completely than the to hon. gentlemen opposite. We did not buy them, and they sold themselves and their votes to hon. gentlemen opposite. On that occasion the late Finance Minister was prepared, whatever course we took, to take the opposite course, and he did not deny it. His principle was simply this: Whatever policy would pay him best, and give him more money or get him more votes that policy he was going to adopt. That is the policy hongentlemen opposite are adopting and acting on now. This tariff through and through is in defiance of their own recorded statements and propo. sitions, such as I have read to-night, and yet they are prepared wholly and entirely to abandon all the principles they ever advocated, whether reciprocity in natural products or in regard to the distribution of the surplus, it matters not to them.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman read the speech Sir Charles Tupper was going to deliver ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This duty on surgical instruments at 20 per cent. may be deemed an excessive We, however, must take into consideration that the Government are determined to levy certain duties on articles imported, and the doctors should be willing to pay their share. The farmer has to pay 35 per cent. on his implements. Files are charged 10 cents per pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem, and they are used by mechanics. Picks and hammers weighing three pounds are charged 1 cent. per pound and 25 per cent. The shovels and spades which are used by laboring men, workingmen, mechanics and farmers, are charged a duty of $1 per dozen and 25 per cent. ad valorem. It, therefore, appears that imported articles used by farmers, laborers and mechanics are charged from 35 to 50 per cent. duty, and the doctors should not grumble at their instruments being charged 20 per cent. They can make more money and charge higher fees than probably any other class in the community. Indeed, I think that every medical man in this House should voluntarily rise and offer to have the tax increased to 35 per cent., because they are well able to bear their share of the burdens which it appears the Government are determined to impose on the people.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a word in reply to the hon. Minister of Customs. I understand the Minister is anxious to have these resolutions passed through Committee, and I believe the Opposition were aiding him, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was endeavoring to facilitate the passage of the items as rapidly as was consistent with our duties as an Opposition. But the Minister of Customs last night embraced the opportunity of hurling across the floor very insulting remarks with respect to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman could not lose the opportunity to-night of speaking in the same strain. But the hon, gentleman must be very dull of perception if he does not understand the difference between a tariff drawn from necessity and a tariff drawn when there is no necessity for the imposition of duties. When the hon member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) framed his tariff, it was to meet the necessities of the Dominion, but to-night we have a tariff when there is no protected manufacturers of Canada sold themselves | necessity for its imposition. I hope the Minister of Customs will hold his wrath in abeyance, and not allow his spleen to be aroused, as it was last night, when he got a little opportunity to have a fling, an opportune fling, at my hon. friend in front of me, who, I know, is assisting all he can to pass these items. I think if the Minister studies his own interests, and the interest of the progress of business, he will try to button up his wrath a little. Just keep quiet now.

There is no duty on tape-Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. McMULLEN. Just keep quiet now.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. With the permission of the House I will drop item 85 of the tariff. That will leave the duty on iron tubing the same as it is

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the duty under the old tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. Six-tenths of a cent and 30 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is that equivalent to, ad valorem?

Mr. FOSTER. About 35, I think.

Mr. WATSON. This was a proposed change that I was very much surprised at, and I am glad to see that it is dropped; but even under the present tariff I think it is a very high duty, and one which is materially interfering with a large number of people who use this tubing. Now tubes for several purposes are allowed in at 15 and 20 per cent. and lap-welded tubes are allowed in at 20 per cent. to be used in petroleum oil wells. I do not see why the owners of petroleum oil wells have any better right to a cheap tubing than the manufacturers of radiators for hot water heating. This is an exceedingly high tax for the people of Canada, and it is all done for the purpose of maintaining one rolling mill in Montreal. I hold that specific duties are very unfair at any time, but they are exceptionally unfair on this particular article, because the price of tubing varies very much. I looked into this matter, expecting that the duty was to be increased, and I find that the discounts on this tubing in 1886 were about 80.

Mr. FOSTER. The discounts now are only about 60.

Mr. WATSON. I say that this specific duty is very unfair; for, when the tubing is cheap the specific duty makes the percentage very high. On manufactured radiators imported into this country the duty is only 30 per cent., while you practically tax the manufacturers of these radiators in Canada, at present prices, about 53 per cent. ad valorem. This is very unfair to the manufacturers of these radiators, for you practically charge a higher rate of duty on the raw material than you charge on manufactured radiators, and the result is that the radiator manufacturers have got to go out of the business. When the hot water heating system came into force some years ago these manufacturers of radiators started with getting tubes free. In 1877, the duty was $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; in 1885, 25 per cent., and in 1886 it was raised to 30 per cent., and in 1887 to 30 per cent. ad valorem and for of a cent. per pound. The result has 110 manufactories of radiators for hot water heating purposes have had practically to go out of the business, because of the present tariff, and because the manufactured radiators could be brought in cheaper than they could be manufactured here. I would rather have seen the hon. Minister place these duties at 40 per cent. ad valorem than to place a specific duty on these tubes, because they so largely in price. Tubes are now worth \$5.67 per hundred feet of 171 lbs., while in 1880 the import price was only \$3.37. You can see that a specific duty is a very unfair duty on these things, while you allow the manufactured radiators to come in the country at an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. I certainly say that you should not have a higher duty on the raw material than you have on the manufactured goods, and all for the purpose of attempting to build up one industry in Montreal. There is only one industry in Canada which makes these tubes, and I can say, from my knowledge of using Montreal and Scotch tubes, that the Scotch tubes are much superior. All these tubes under one and a-quarter inch are butt-welded tubes, and very often in cutting the thread of the end of the Montreal tubes they are cracked, and are practically useless. I hold that the manufacturers of radiators and the people who use these radiators are of a great deal more importance to have their interests considered by the Government of this country than a small manufactory in Montreal. Manufacturers who make a good radiator, and who have a particular care to do good work, will use the Scotch tubes. That being the case this duty is too much of a tax to put on the people in order to bolster up one manufactory. I believe that the Minister should reduce these duties to at least as low as the duty on the imported manufactured radiator. It will be seen that we imported a very large quantity of these tubes last year. If the Minister had not withdrawn this item I had intended to test the sense of the House on it by asking for a division, because the manufacturers of these radiators employ ten times more men in Canada than the manufacturers of butt-welded tubing in Montreal. That being the case, it is better to encourage the manufacturers of these radiators and people who use the wrought iron pipe, than to attempt to build up an industry that is not natural to the country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Though the hon. Minister drops this item, there are some others that come under the same category. In this case you have an illustration of the difficulty of working a tariff framed purely for protective purposes. You will notice that in nothing more than in iron. When you started by imposing a duty on pig iron you found how it ramified extensively through all the different lines of iron manufacture, and, therefore, to be consistent with protectionist principles, when you have protected the first maker of iron, you have enhanced the cost of the raw material to the next man; he requires to have a proportionate increase in order to give him a fair chance in the market; following that, the finished product of the second man is the raw material of the third man; and so you have to go on increasing the duty, while, perhaps, there is still a fourth man whose raw material is the finished product of the third man. So that, been that men who attempted to build up large to do justice to these manufacturers, you have to increase the duties until they become something enormous, and people looking at them would naturally say that these manufacturers are bleeding the country to death. They would say, what a terrific duty is imposed on some articles, amounting to 40, 50, 60 or 70 per cent.; and while they are right, it is not correct in many cases to say that these manufacturers are bleeding the country, because the fact is lost sight of that burdens have been imposed upon them by the imposition of duties on their raw material. The fact is that in the arrangement of many of these duties, while there is nominally a protection to the extent of 20 or 30 per cent. to the manufacturer, he has not that advantage at all. consumer of course suffers, but the manufacturer 'has not a corresponding advantage; it is taken from him by the protection given to another individual who precedes him, and whose finished product is his raw material. Thus a false estimate is often formed of the business of many of the manufacturers of this country; and when people speak of the manufacturers alone being benefited they lose sight of the fact that many of the manufacturers-I do not know but I should be right in saying the great proportion of them—are injured instead of being benefited by this protective tariff, for the reason which I have mentioned. In that way, when the third or fourth man is reached, if he has a proportionate increase the taxation has reached a point which enormously presses on the consumers of this country. In speaking of this parti-cular article I speak with a little diffidence, because I am not in the iron business and do not understand it as thoroughly as my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson); but I notice that a firm, writing in the Journal of Commerce, who, I suppose, are conversant with this matter, say that at present prices of these pipes the increase in the duty from six-tenths of a cent a pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem to 13 cents per pound, is equal to an increase of 5 per cent. ad valorem; but aside from that, the old rate-under which the specific duty, of course, amounts to less than it did when the price was lower—was equal, not to 30 per cent., but to 48 per cent ad valorem. Here is the position. There are industries in this country using this tubing as their raw material—the manufactories of radiators; and this is becoming a large industry. In that and kindred industries, in which this tubing is the raw material, it must be inevitable that there are ten men employed-my hon, friend says a hundred, but I want to speak within bounds—in the manufacture of radiators and steam-fittings, to every one employed in the manufacture of tubing; so that you can see that you are, perhaps, doing a greater injury to the development of the industries of this country, which you think you are promoting by your tariff, than if you left the first man without any duty at all, or had not called his industry into existence. When this duty was first put on boiler tubing, I pointed out to this House, for I was posted on that matter, that it was an impossibility for any tubing factory to be established in this country on a paying basis, for the reason that there was not as much consumption of the finished product in Canada in a year as one factory could turn out in a very short time, unless it was a very small factory, which could not compete with the larger ones abroad. But that policy was per cent., it is evident that the manufacturer of Mr. Paterson (Brant).

adopted, and the duty at once became a burden on all the steam boiler manufacturers in the country, employing thousands of hands, while this factory which was called into existence employed, I do not know how many. So far as lap-welded tubing is concerned, I suppose there is hardly a foot of it made in the country, and even the manufacture of butt-welded tubing, calls hardly any men into employment. The manufacturers of radiators, who employ a vastly greater number of men than this one factory, have only 30 per cent. imposed on their finished product, whereas the duty on their raw material amounts to 48 per cent. What is the result? That must mean the crushing out of that industry which employs tenmen, or as my hon. friend says a hundred men, to every one employed in the industry which this duty is designed to promote. In these iron duties we have an illustration of the difficulty of working a tariff which has an eye to protection alone, and which departs from the principle of merely levying a duty for revenue purposes and under the incidental protection offered, by which a protection sufficient to the development of the manufactures of this country was given, as was shown by their growth and increase and prosperity under our old revenue tariff. It is only fair to the manufacturers to point out that while excessive duties are charged to protect the articles which they produce, they are charged so much on the raw material they use that they lose the benefit of that protection and, in fact, are in a worst position than before the protection was introduced. It is plain to any one who will consider the question how that may be. It is shown in this business we are discussing more clearly than in any other subject which has come before us. I need not tell this House that the measure of protection an industry enjoys is the difference between the amount of duty on the raw material used by it and the duty on the finished product, and if the duty on the raw material is higher than that on the finished product the manufacturer not only gets no protection, but is absolutely legislated against. I believe the great bulk of the iron working establishments of this country, which employ thousands of hands, have been placed in a worse position than that in which they were under the 17½ per cent. tariff, owing to the imposition of these duties, as illustrated in the case under consideration, so that the consumer has to suffer from the heavy taxation without any benefit being derived by the manufacturers.

Mr. KENNY. I have listened attentively to the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman. I cannot agree with him when he says that no advantages have accrued to Canadian manufacturers from the present tariff as compared with the 17½ per cent. tariff. Of course, there is nothing in this world which is perfect, and, perhaps, even the tariff of the present Government, whose acts are generally so perfect, may have some imperfections. If there is an item in the tariff which is imperfect it is the item under consideration. I do think the manufacturers of wrought iron tube radiators are laboring under very great disadvantages. Their raw material pays a duty of 30 per cent. and six-tenths cent per pound, and when you consider that the American radiator, with which they have to compete, pays only 30 the Canadian article is placed at a very great disadvantage. In addition, the manufacturer of the wrought-iron radiater is brought into competition here with the manufacturer of the cast-iron radiator, who pays, if I am correctly informed, only a duty of about 20 per cent. on his raw material. He is also brought into competition with the manufacturer of the boiler tube radiator, who pays a duty of 15 per cent. only on the raw material. I was hoping the Minister of Finance would have seen his way clear to make the duty on the 31-inch pipe imported for this purpose, at the same rate as the radiator, 30 per cent. It must be borne in mind that pipe of the dimensions used for the wrought-iron radiator is not now produced in large quantities in Canada, and it is difficult for these manufacturers to use the butt-piping. I regret the Minister of Finance did not see his way clear to make the tariff 30 per cent. on this item.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman is slightly wrong with regard to butt-welded tubing. There is no lap-welded tubing made less than $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch in diameter, and there is none made in Canada, and the manufacturers of cast pipe radiators have to pay a high duty on their raw material. fact, all manufacturers are placed at a great disadvantage by the high duties on iron. The price in Glasgow, of the iron used by the manufacturers, is 50s. and 6d. per ton, or equal to \$12.10 per ton of 2,240 pounds, and \$10.80 per ton of 2,000 pounds. The duty is \$4.00 per short ton, and \$4.48 per long ton, or $41\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and that is the duty which the manufacturers of cast-iron radiator have to pay on their raw material. To these figures we have to add \$1.50 a ton bounty, and in a very few years, the Minister has told us, we may expect to see it at \$2 a ton on the pig iron. Adding \$1.50 bounty to the \$4.48 per ton gives \$5.98 per ton of a tax on this industrial. industry. And if you consider the loss in carrying the coal to the iron mines over the Intercolonial, and in carrying the iron from the mines to the manufacturers in Canada, you will find that we have to pay nearly \$8 a ton for the privilege of using pig iron manufactured in Canada. Wrought iron is paying a duty of \$13 per ton, which, on the price of Scotch or Welsh iron, will make $35\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. Our manufacturers are not fairly dealt with by this Government, when charged such exorbitant price for their raw material. connection with pig-iron, I believe the Government pay more bounty than they should, for I am in-formed that the manufacturers use about threefourths pig iron to one-fourth scrap, so that they get a bounty for using up old scrap. The manufacturers of Canada are treated very unfairly. the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has said, they are sometimes blamed for charging exorbitant prices, but they are placed at great disadvantage on account of having to pay the high duties imposed under the present tariff. In every instance, I say the manufacturer ought to get the benefit of an ad valorem duty. These specific duties are not fair, because a great many of the manufactured articles are admitted on an ad valorem duty, and it is not fair to place a specific duty on the iron, because iron rises and falls in value very frequently. My hon. friend from cent. in 1886, because of the difference in price. It was \$3.37 in 1886, as compared with \$5.67 now. If the Finance Minister desires to do anything in the interests of the manufacturers he should be willing to allow them to bring in their goods at an ad valorem duty instead of a specific duty. The duty on welded tubing is entirely for revenue purposes, because there is none made in Canada, and I do not suppose there will be for years to come. The raw material should be admitted free for the benefit of the manufacturers, but you tax them on the raw material, and then you increase the duty on the manufactured goods, the result being that the consumer has to pay the duty.

Wrought iron or steel nuts and washers, iron or steel rivets, bolts with or without threads, nut and bolt blanks, T and strap hinges and hinge blanks, 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WALDIE. I should like to know why T and strap hinges are not included with the other hinges at 35 per cent? They are used by the poorer people for their houses, their barns and their gates, and I think it is only right that they should be charged at 35 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. They are made in this country.
Mr. WALDIE. I am well aware of that, but so are butt hinges and other articles which are charged 35 per cent. This tax will amount to 45 per cent. if you include the specific duty, and I think the Government might very judiciously make the change which I have suggested.

Jellies, jams and preserves, 5 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This appears to be a large duty on these articles, the average value of which is only about 8 cents a pound.

Mr. WALDIE. We are manufacturing them here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This amounts to a duty of about 60 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Where can you buy them for 8 cents a pound ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Your Trade and Navigation Returns state that they are invoiced at about 8 cents per pound, and, looking at the price of sugar in England, I think that is about a fair price. I find that 315,000 pounds were invoiced at an amount of about $25,000. The hon. gentleman will see that that is as nearly as possible 8 cents a pound, and, when you can get sugar for about 3 cents a pound, as you can in England, that would be about a fair price.

Mr. FOSTER. We make any quantity of these preserves here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will not make them as cheaply as long as sugar remains at its present rate.

Lard, tried or rendered, 3 cents per pound, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to add after the word "package" the words "when of tin."

of the manufactured articles are admitted on an advalorem duty, and it is not fair to place a specific duty on the iron, because iron rises and falls in value very frequently. My hon. friend from Brant said that this duty on tubing would amount to 48 per cent. The duty would have been 85 per this is a duty which should not be imposed. It is taxing the fool of the people, and of that class of the people who live in sections where no advantage whatever is derived from the protective policy of the Government. In my own county, where there is not a single industry protected under the National Policy that I know of, they consume a great quantity of lard in the lumber camps, and among the fishermen, who earn their living hardly on the water. Even among the farmers, lard is used in many cases in place of butter, which is used by the better classes there and in different parts of the Dominion. I think this tax is too high, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen—though I fear I appeal without success—to treat the people of the east with fairness. I think the report of the hon. gentleman treats the Maritime Provinces especially in a very unfair, unjust and severe way. I ask the hon. gentleman to consider, not the state of political parties, but the position of the people there. They are taxed upon all articles of food which are imported, and they have received no benefit from the operation of the National Policy. I find that $165,660 is paid in duty upon an article which largely goes into the consumption of the lumberman and the fisherman, and a portion also goes to the farmers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As far as I can understand, hitherto the packages in which the lard was imported were free of duty.

Mr. FOSTER. No; they have been dutiable. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where would the duty on packages be stated?

Mr. BOWELL. The duty was levied on the packages with their contents. The authority is found in the general package clause.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then we did not import eight million pounds of lard, but a certain quantity of lard plus packages?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What proportion of this total weight would be represented by the packages?

Mr. BOWELL. There is a large quantity that comes in tubs a large quantity also comes in in barrels, some of tin and some of wood. The package so made would bear 20 per cent. duty in addition to the specific duty upon the contents of the package.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am advised, although the point is one on which I speak under correction, that the probable effect of the duty on the packages means that the importer or the consumer has to pay 3½ cents duty in addition to this 3 cents a pound extra duty on the package. That is an enormously heavy duty on an article like that, bringing it up to about 7 cents a pound. There is 50 per cent. on an article of food largely consumed by the poorer classes.

Mr. WALDIE. They are not charging a duty on the package of wood, as I understand it.

Mr. FOSTER. I have changed that to read "the weight of the package, when of tin, to be included in the weight for duty."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not hear the hon. gentleman say that. That would improve the matter.

Mr. BOWELL. If it is in barrels, it will bear the same duty it did before.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand that the Government persist in refusing to make any modification in this duty on lard?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think any modification can be made under the general line of policy which has been adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can you alter the general line of policy in order to extend a little justice to the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. FOSTER. It has been so well received by the country at large that it would be a pity t_0 alter it.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a universal outcry against the Government who have introduced it.

Mr. ELLIS. As far as this item of lard is concerned, it is not correct to say that it has been well received. In the Province of New Brunswick we import a great deal of this American lard. I think the value of it last year was something like $55,000 for 743,000 pounds. It is taxing the very class of persons who are least able to pay this kind of tax.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is used very largely in the manufacture of biscuits throughout the country. How would this tax compare with the tax on biscuits?

Mr. FOSTER. We will come to that biscuit item later. We do not propose to change the duty on lard.

Leather-board and leatheroid, 3 cents per pound.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that item come in the celebrated Inland Revenue Bill regarding stamps?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that goes without stamps.

Mr. BOWELL. This leatheroid is a combination of leather and paper and other things of which I have no knowledge, nor have we been able to discover what it is. It is used largely in the manufacture of trunks, and makes an article less liable to be broken than sheet iron trunks. We have been obliged to rule it as a manufacture of paper at 35 per cent. That precluded the possibility of manufacturers using it, as there is a certain quantity of paper in it, something of the papier-maché character. It is a very hard article.

Skins for morocco leather, tanned, but not further manufactured, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to change it from 10 to 15 per cent., the same duty as it bore before.

Mr. WALDIE. These are the skins that we are importing in pickle now and manufacturing, and if you put 15 per cent. on them, and allow only 15 per cent. on the leather after it is produced, we have no protection at all.

Mr. BOWELL. These are tanned.

Mr. WALDIE. A large quantity of sheepskins is imported in pickle from Australia. Some of them are split in England and imported into this country and enter at 5 per cent.; they are manufactured and sold with a protection of 15 per cent. When you add the increased weight of the skin in pickle as compared with the reduced weight when it is manufactured there is no protection at all. I think the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance have been misformed in this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the same duty that was on before.

Mr. WALDIE. Still there was an entry made of 10 per cent. on those pickled skins and they are treated as tanned skins.

Mr. BOWELL. The Customs never did rule a pickled skin as a tanned skin.

Mess pork, as defined by the General Inspection Act, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound.

Mr. MITCHELL. What changes do you propose making in the duties on pork?

Mr. FOSTER. On mess pork we do not propose any change except that the barrels containing the same shall come in free. In regard to item 102, we propose to divide it into two parts, making salt beef in barrels 2 cents per pound, and leaving fresh or salted meats at 3 cents per pound.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand that mess pork will be changed 1½ cents per pound, while other mess will be 3 cents per pound, which would cover pork not mess pork? That definition would cover clear pork and prime mess pork, and that would be charged 3 cents per pound as against 1½ cents for mess. It is well known that in Chicago during the last week clear pork has sold for half a dollar a barrel more than mess pork. Within the last four days mess pork has jumped from the price of clear pork to be $5 a barrel more than clear pork. In other words, a man who purchased, last Saturday, pork for his lumbering operations, would have to pay $15 for mess but only $11 for clear, which is a better quality than mess.

Mr. FOSTER. I admit that the facts may be as stated; but it was agreed that these three items would remain over and not be discussed to-night; I am simply stating the changes proposed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand that the barrels have to come in free only in the case of mess pork?

Mr. FOSTER. Mess pork, as defined by the General Inspection Act, will only pay $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound.

Mr. MITCHELL. What will be the charge on clear pork and on prime mess? Will the barrels for those kinds come in free?

Mr. FOSTER. Long clear cut pork is mess pork.

Mr. MITCHELL. Long clear cut is not known as an article of commerce, as is mess pork, and the same remark applies to clear pork. But I want to know whether clear pork is to be charged at 3 cents while mess pork, an inferior grade, is charged $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents, and whether all the barrels will be allowed to come in free?

Mr. BRYSON. There is a point in the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). It is important that mess pork should be defined, because there are many varieties. There are several brands, such as Boston clear, Boston extra clear, and Boston heavy clear, all of which are mess pork, and should come in at 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not propose to discuss the question to-night, but I desire to know whether I understand correctly the statement the hon. Finance Minister has made.

Mr. FOSTER. I say the only change we propose to make in these three items is in item 102. Item 101 will remain as it was, item 102 will be divided as I have stated, and item 103 will remain as it was. Item 101, in reference to mess pork, may be found, when we come to discuss it, to include more than my hon friend has to-night indicated that he supposes it will.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is satisfactory for me to know that my hon. friend takes the same view as I do—that is, that clear pork is included in the word "mess."

Mr. FOSTER. Let us leave it over until we come to discuss it.

Lubricating oils composed wholly or in part of petroleum and costing less than 30 cents per gallon, $7\frac{1}{5}$ cents per gallon.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change in this. We simply make three items do the duty of four formerly.

Mr. WATSON. A specific duty on lubricating oils, as on iron tubing, is very unfair. Seven and one-fifth cents a gallon means about 100 per cent. on some of those lubricating oils. It is an unfair tax.

Mr. WALLACE. Oils used for lubricating purposes of any value, are worth from 40 to 50 cents a gallon.

Mr. WATSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Some of these oils manufactured from petroleum sell at 30 cents a gallon less than others. The oil used to-day on railways and for some steam engines, is only worth 10 or 11 cents a gallon.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know where the hon. gentleman gets his information in reference to lubricating oils used on railways. We had an investigation recently which took us a week or two to ascertain the facts in connection with this very item, and I know that the invoices from the United States showed the value to be some 40 cents per gallon, and that the party importing it invoiced it below 30 cents, in order to evade a higher duty. That is the case to which I called attention the other day and that is one of the reasons why we change the duty.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but the oil used for the journals of the freight cars only cost 9 or 10 cents a gallon.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I know that cheap oil is used very largely for lubricating purposes in some small factories, and for saw mills. Of course, there are lubricating oils that cost from 60 to 80 cents a gallon, but a good deal of these oils cost a very small sum. I cannot conceive why it is necessary to put such a tremendous duty on these oils. In this connection, I might say that I think it is to be regretted that the Government have not seen fit to reduce the duty on coal oil. Last year we imported 4,600,000 gallons of coal oil, and when you take into consideration the tax upon the barrels, the duty is over 70 per cent. I think it is unfair that the people of this country should be taxed to such an enormous extent to keep up this industry, and while we are making changes all round a change ought be made in this direction.

Mr. WATSON. I find that black lubricating oil used by the railway companies is sold at from $2 to $3 a barrel of 40 gallons. It is used for lubricating steam engines and saw mills, and it only costs from 5 to 7 cents a gallon.

Mr. BOWELL. All lubricating oils, other than those which cost 30 cents, come in at 5 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CARGILL. I do not know of any saw mills or of any flour mills in the country that are able to procure their oil at 10 cents per gallon.

Mr. WATSON. I did not say flour mills.

Mr. HESSON. Order. Shut your mouth.

Mr. WATSON. Who will shut his mouth? I wish to remark that I did not say flour mills.

Mr. CARGILL. I pay 40 cents a gallon. Cylinder oil is usually the best used, and we pay $1 a gallon for it.

Mr. WATSON. We buy the best cylinder oil in Manitoba for 85 cents. This black oil is I know used by saw mills, and they buy it at from $2 to $3 a barrel. Probably the hon gentleman does not use it.

Mr. CARGILL. That is not lubricating oil.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Customs tells us that these oils are provided for elsewhere, but if I understand clause 108, everything that is lubricating oil, and costs less than 30 cents a gallon, will be 74 cents a gallon.

Mr. BOWELL. Only if it is petroleum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If that was imported at $7\frac{1}{5}$ cents a gallon, it would be at $7\frac{1}{5}$ cents duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; if made from petroleum in whole or part.

Opium (crude) $1 per pound, the weight to include the weight of the ball or covering.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the object of keeping the duty on opium? It is used constantly by every medical man.

Mr. BRIEN. I think this is a very objectionable duty. It amounts to an increase, because the weight of the ball is included.

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is the same. That has always been included in the ruling.

Mr. BRIEN. There is no medicine used in practice more generally than opium.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This is another tax on the sick, and I think it should be reduced.

Mr. TAYLOR. For the benefit of the doctors.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It does not benefit the doctors, because the doctors do not keep medicines, but it is a benefit to the sick. This is something that is used every day.

Colors, dry, N.E.S., 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have had a letter from a tribe of Caughnawaga Indians, who complain that the duties on the dyes and paints or colorings they use in making baskets are increased very much. I do not know who they are, but I suppose that, hearing that I was a man who always looked after the interests of the poor, they wrote to me to see if I could get them any amelioration.

Mr. FOSTER. If they mean dry colors, they have not been increased. On the item of beads, they communicated with me, and I reduced the duty from 30 per cent. to 20 per cent.

Mr. WATSON.

Paints and colors, pulped or ground in oil or other liquids, N.E.S., 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that an increase?

Mr. FOSTER. That is on the whole an increase of probably 5 per cent. on a number of articles which were formerly at different rates. These paints and colors are made here, and are ground in linseed oil, which bears a duty of 30 per cent. I want to take from item 115, "all liquid, prepared or ready mixed paints," and add them to 114.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for Halifax will notice that by this change the case he brought to my attention has been corrected; that is, the copper paint for vessels has been put under the head of 30 per cent. This has been done with all the commoner paints.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am glad the hon. Minister has made that change; but I have a representation with reference to another class of paints, that is, ready mixed paints in tin cans.

Mr. FOSTER. Those are changed to 30 per cent.

Paints and colors, ground in spirits, and all spirit varnishes and lacquers, $1 per gallon.

Mr. BOWELL. These were formerly unenum-We ruled them at 20 per cent. ad valorem and 25 cents per gallon. The reason was they contained a very large quantity of spirits. It came to the knowledge of the Department that they were imported largely from Germany, and the spirits then extracted, leaving the shellac just as valuable as while in the varnish. This will make the duty a little higher and prevent the smuggling of spirits in that way.

Paper hangings or wall paper in rolls, on each roll of eight yards or under, and so in proportion for all greater lengths of the following descriptions, viz.:-

(a) Brown blanks, white papers, grounded papers and satins, 2 cents.
(b) Single print bronzes and colored bronzes, 6 cents.
(c) Embossed bronzes, 8 cents.

(d) Colored borders, narrow, and colored borders, wide,

6 cents. (e) Bronze borders, narrow, and bronze borders, wide,

(g) Embossed borders, 15 cents. (g) All other paper hangings or wall paper, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to add to the first item brown blanks and white blanks, printed or plain, at the same rate; and then white papers and grounded papers, not hand made, and satins, 3 cents, because those grounded papers are considerably higher than the white blanks or brown blanks.

Pickles in bottle, 40 cents per gallon, including the duty on the bottles, and each bottle holding less than one-half pint shall be dutiable as containing one-half pint, and each bottle holding more than one-half pint but not more than one pint shall be dutiable as containing one pint, and each bottle holding more than one pint but not more than one quart shall be dutiable as containing one quart. one quart.

Mr. ELLIS. Is there any change in the mode of collecting the duty on these articles?

Mr. FOSTER. No; that is the way they were ruled.

Mr. ELLIS. I have a communication from a firm in St. John referring to item 138, pickles and sauces, but the objection they take is precisely the same as that which was taken to item 127. They

"Under the old reading it was felt to be a grievance that we had to pay duty on a reputed or wine pint as though it was an Imperial pint. As a matter of fact, a reputed half pint' contains six ounces of liquid, or four ounces less than an Imperial half pint; consequently, to meet the inconsistency of the tariff it was proposed, for a meet the inconsistency of the tarm it was proposed, for a cheap package, to import quarter pints or five-ounce bottles. You will at ence see that under the new inter-pretation of the tariff any bottle, even though it contains but one ounce, will be liable to the same duty as one of ten ounces, a most absurd and unjust way of fixing the duty. It would be far better to make it at once into an ten ounces, a most absurd and unjust way of fixing the duty. It would be far better to make it at once into an ad vulorem duty.

"I do not think Canadians would mind so much if it were not that the Canadian packers of sauces, instead of putting up Imperial measure, take very good care to put up 'wine measure,' and the consumer is thus just as much defrauded (assuming that it was to prevent his being defrauded the curious regulation was made).

"No one will object if the old ruling is maintained, absurd as it is, only let quarter-pints be fairly recognised as such, and make them the minimum measure instead of one-half pints.

Plumbago, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to make that 15 per cent.

Woollen netting for the lining of boots, shoes and gloves, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is raised from 10 to 25 per cent. because that is now manufactured in the Rubber belting, hose, packing, mats and matting, and cotton or linen hose lined with rubber, 5 cents per pound, and 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WATSON. This industry is very highly protected, and I think, if the duty were reduced on some of these articles, the consumer would receive a much better quality. Under the present high protective system it is almost impossible to import these goods. A man would rather give $10 more for a belt to drive a threshing machine of American manufacture than for one of Canadian manufacture. If the duty was reduced on some of these goods, the Canadian manufacturer would give a bester article. I think I might call in my hon. friend from Bruce who will know the difference in the quality.

Mr. CARGILL. I can only say that I use both kinds of belting, and I prefer the Canadian article.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member is the only man I have ever heard who preferred Canadian rubber belting to American; but, of course, he supports the Government on a high protective tariff. If he had to choose between the two without prejudice, I believe he would select the American belting.

Mr. CARGILL. I have used Canadian hose and belting, and American hose and belting, and in every case I have found the Canadian equal to the American article.

Soy, 10 cents per gallon.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very considerable reduction for the benefit of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones).

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am afraid the consumption will be very small.

Seeds, when in bulk or in large parcels, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to make that 10 per cent.

Mr. FISHER. I understand that clover and grass seeds will be included in this. I suppose the Minister has had representations made to him as to the special hardship which the dealers in the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces will suffer in consequence of the particular time when these tariff changes have been made. Generally seedsmen take their orders at an earlier time than this, but they do not import their seeds till later. I am aware that the Montreal seedsmen have given large orders to supply the country dealers, and through them the farmers at certain rates, and they will lose a large amount of money unless it is provided that seeds which were bond fide ordered before the changes were introduced in the tariff are allowed to come in free, as in the case of iron. I am sure everybody must appreciate the fact that in this way not only the seedsmen are going to suffer severely, but the public at large will still have to pay an increased duty. The farmer will be asked to pay the increased price of the retail dealers, and I fear very much they will have to pay the increased price of the importers who supply the retailers at the price agreed upon before the tariff was changed. I would like to ask the Minister whether any relief has been granted in this case. I know that strong representations have been made to the Government asking for this relief, and I would like to know whether there is any hope that such relief may be obtained for these men.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon, friend had been in his place in the early part of the evening he would have heard an interesting discussion on this principle in the case of the nurserymen. After discussing it, I think the House came to the conclusion that it was impossible to grant relief in one case without granting it in all—with the exception of the hon. gentleman for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), who wished it granted in the case alluded to. Representations have been made by the seedsmen from various parts. My hon, friend will see the difficulty involved in giving remission, or allowing these articles to come in after the tariff has been fixed. However, the change from 15 to 10 per cent. will help them somewhat.

Mr. FISHER. I quite understand the difficulty. At the same time, this particular tax falls very heavily upon the Province from which I come and the Maritime Provinces. We all know that the season is later in those Provinces than it is further west, and the business of supplying seeds to the farmers has not been advanced so far in those Provinces as it has been in the Western Provinces. As a matter of fact, almost the whole incidence of this tax will, this season, at all events, bear upon Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. The people of Ontario, to a large extent, have already got their seeds, and the people of the North-West also, I suppose; consequently the incidence of this tax will chiefly affect Eastern Canada. I may say that I think it is unfair, it is a hardship, to the agricultural classes in general, that grass seeds should be included in this paragraph. I regret extremely to find that a duty has been reimposed upon clover and grass seeds. These are seeds which in certain seasons we are unable to produce satisfactorily in this country, and we have to import large quantities from the United States. It is true that a few years ago we were able to export some of these seeds to the United States when their season proved unfavorable, and when ours was favorable. I regret to see that these seeds are now made to pay a larger duty. It was a great relief to us heretofore to be able to get them cheaper in consequence of the duty having been remitted. At this time when we ought to refuse to place any further burdens on the farmers, it would be a great pity if we increased the prices of these grass seeds.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman is much mistaken in his assertion about seeds having been brought in from the United States after the duty was placed upon them. We use a pretty considerable quantity of clover and timothy seeds, and not only were these seeds imported into this country long before this duty was placed upon them, but they had passed through the hands of the wholesale dealers into the hands of the retailers, and from the retailers into the hands of the farmers, before this duty was imposed at all.

 $\operatorname{Mr.}$ FOSTER. Not in Quebec and in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of what has actually occurred. The farmers of this country do not wait till the seeding season is over to buy their seeds; the dealers do not wait until the seeding season is passed before they bring in their seeds into the country. The whole supply was in this country long before the duty was imposed.

Mr. FISHER. If the hon, gentleman had listened to what I said he would have heard me state emphatically that such is not the case in the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, whatever may be the case in Ontario and the North-West.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not suppose you know very much about the Maritime Provinces. Speak of your own.

Mr. FISHER. I happen to know that the Maritime Provinces are largely supplied with seed from the city of Montreal, and I have my information from the largest seed dealers in that city. Everybody who knows anything about the agricultural operations of this country knows that the seed time in the Maritime Provinces is later than it is further west. I pointed out particularly the fact that the incidence of this change of duty would bear particularly upon the Maritime Provinces and Quebec, for I had no doubt that in Ontario and the North-West these seeds had been distributed before this tariff was introduced.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I am sorry the Minister has seen fit to impose a duty upon seeds just at a time when the farmers of Ontario, at least, feel the necessity of changing the system of farming, and in that change they must increase the use of clover and grass seed. There are many farmers who would do well to sow clover on every acre of land they have got, for the reason that clover is such a good fertiliser. There was a time, in the Province of Ontario, when we could raise our own clover seed, but for a few years past, on account of the clover midge, we have not been able to raise our own seed. I think that the Minister ought to have some consideration for the farmers of this country and give them an opportunity of procuring their grass seeds free. This is their raw material, and why in the name of goodness should the raw material in every direction be taxed against the farmers, when it is allowed to come in for every Mr. FISHER. other class of the community. Seeing that the Government do not require the duty for revenue purposes, seeds ought to be placed on the free list. Clover is an actual necessity, and the longer we farm a great deal of our land, we must use clover in order to keep up the fertility of the soil. I, therefore, hope that the Government will see their way to putting at least clover and timothy on the free list.

Mr. LANDERKIN. While it bears heavily on the farming community it is not very satisfactory to the dealers. A case was brought to my notice in which a merchant in Durham inspected clover seed in Detroit on 24th March. It was not entered at that time, and the consequence is that he is liable to pay the present duty. Another merchant who bought clover seed a few days earlier, got it in free. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) has spoken, no doubt, the sentiments of the farmers of Canada, namely, that clover seed should be placed on the free list, for if our farmers are not able to raise clover seed they should be allowed to bring it in free.

Stereotypes, electrotypes and celluloids for almanacs, calendars, illustrated pamphlers, newspaper advertisements or engravings, and all other like work for commercial, trade or other purposes, N.E.S.; and matrices or copper shells of the same, 2 cents per square inch.

Stereotypes, electrotypes and celluloids of newspaper columns, and bases for the same, composed wholly or partly of metal or celluloid, three-fourths of one cent per square inch, and matrices or copper shells of the same, 2 cents per square inch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does this duty compare with the old duty?

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible to make any comparison. When that item was framed these matrices were of metal, and were very heavy. The duty was by weight, and amounted to something. Now the composition of the matrices has been changed, and the weight has been reduced to a minimum, so that the duty affords no protection. Accordingly we changed the duty from a weight to a measurement basis. In the first class, which is for trade and advertising purposes, the duty is 2 cents per square inch; for newspaper columns, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per square inch, which does not amount to the price of composition.

Mr. ELLIS. It is a great mistake to impose a duty on an article of this kind, which is a comparatively new invention of the printer's art. By it newspapers have been able to be started all over the country, in towns and villages where formerly a newspaper could not be printed, they thereby have the benefit of a local paper. This duty is imposed for the sake of one manufacturing establishment in Toronto, in order to give it protection; and it is proposed to shut out enterprises that would give employment to a great many persons, and which would have the effect of establishing newspapers in small towns and of disseminating useful knowledge. It is one of the most absurd propositions ever made in an enlightened country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon member for St. John (Mr. Ellis.) Anything that strikes at the material prosperity of the newspapers is not in the best interests of this country, and it should not be endorsed by this House. A proposition of this kind, which is calculated to do an injury to the press of the country districts, and perhaps in the cities likewise, is one which this Committee should not pass-at all events, the rate should be reduced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I objected to this duty at the time it was imposed. The obstacle in the way of newspapers availing themselves of the there is but one establishment, and all the newspapers are supplied with casts of the same sort.

Now, by getting them from the other side, they generally make an arrangement not to furnish any two newspapers in the same district with the same plates. The hon. gentleman opposite, therefore, seriously burthens the newspapers of the country by this duty.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think the objections are well taken to this item. We have been discussing for a day or two the interests of the workingmen, and I have heard gentlemen on the opposite side continually finding fault with the Government because they allowed men to come into the country to compete with the laborers, artisans and mechanics who already live here. The real object of placing this high duty—and I admit it is a high duty—was, in the first place, to protect the printers of this country from a competition which deprived them of their labor; and, in the second place—and, I think, if we had no other reason this would be a good one—that some of the matter which is introduced in many cases from the United States is of a character not such as I am sure the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) would like to see in the hands of his children or of the general public. If we want to educate the rising generation to be American in sentiment, and to be American in feeling, and to learn all the little incidents which have occurred in their country since the Revolution, at the expense of Canada, and to see the public men of the United States extolled to the seventh heaven, and all other public men denounced, we had better continue the system of allowing this kind of litera-ture to be circulated among the people. I am quite aware that it will impose a higher tax on the publishers of these newspapers, if they continue to import these plates at a higher rate, but I believe that the good which will result from this duty, and the extra amount of labor it will give to the printers of this country, will be ample compensation. I am not a publisher now, but if I were in the business to-day I would support this duty with all my heart for the reasons I have given.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. Minister is quite wrong. In the first place, the effect of establishing more newspapers in this country is to give employment to more labor, and the effect of being able to use this matter is to start newspapers in places where they could not be supported before. It is true that there would not be quite as many men employed as if all the type was set up in this country, but if these plates are not allowed in you cannot have a presentance at all in many places. cannot have a newspaper at all in many places where they are established now. As to the matter selected, the Minister is again wrong. He states what he deems to be a general fact in regard to this literature, but it is not so. There may be some of it objectionable, but, if he objects to it, he can stop it by placing it among the indecent literature, and prevent its importation altogether. The on. gentleman has probably not time to read the find that it is as good literature as can be found anywhere, and that the selection is probably better made than if left to the ordinary editor, who is hurried and clips what he can. I am sure that the greater part of the literature is selected from as good authors as can be found in the literature of any country.

Mr. BOWELL. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his information. I accept it with due humility. If there is anything which I know something of it is the printing business, from the sweeping of the floor up to the editing of a newspaper. When the hon, gentleman tells me that this duty will prevent the establishment of newspapers in different parts of the country, and that it will not give more work to the printers, he will excuse me if I say he is in error. present, you can carry on two or three newspapers with less actual work in setting up than you could with one ordinary newspaper under the old system. If you have men or apprentices to set up your type, you require more actual labor in one ordinary printing office than you would with three or four newspapers, by importing these electroplates. you require with these plates would be simply to import them, mount them on blocks, insert in columns of newspaper, run off on a power or ordinary hand press, and you have the whole thing done. I think I know whereof I speak in connection with this matter. Perhaps I may have spoken a little too general in reference to the literature, for I quite agree with the hon, gentleman that there are many stories of standard authors sent over; and there are also many of the sermons of eminent preachers in different cities, but I refer to the general character of the literature which is printed and circulated in country places by the newspapers to which the hon. gentleman refers. I never said that the literature was indecent, and I am sorry the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ellis) used the expression. If he knows anything of the Tariff Act he would see that it is very difficult to rule certain literature indecent, and to keep it out. I might regard it as not agreeing with my own individual opinion, but I think he would hardly justify me in ruling it out on that account. I hope the House will carry these items for the reason, if not for any other, that it will enable us to give more employment to a worthy class of men—the printers of this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that this duty will cause more employment to be given. If the hon. gentleman could show that there would be the same number of newspapers, with the same amount of matter published under the new tariff, then it would be simply a question of arithmetic, and his statement would probably be correct. But that is not the case. The hon, gentleman knows that there are newspapers published at a low price—and they must be published at a low price, or they cannot find subscribers—that will cease to exist if this tariff is imposed. I venture to say that the hon, gentleman's proposition will wipe out a large number of newspapers that are at present comparatively prosperous, and will do so simply because of the high duties imposed. The can stop it by placing it among the indecent literture, and prevent its importation altogether. The ture, and prevent its importation altogether. The consequence of the ingular dates indecent literture, and prevent its importation altogether. The to laborers, but if the arrangement wipes out hundreds of newspapers it will not give more employment to laborers. There is no doubt whatever about what the effect of the hon. gentleman's proposition will be, and it is within the experience of everyone who has some connection with newspapers that if the duties are increased the effect will be, not to give employment to parties to replace this matter by actual type-setting, but to wipe out certain newspapers altogether.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think that the newspaper press is so badly used in this country. I find, in the first place, that while other machinery is charged 35 per cent. duty, the newspapers are allowed to import their printing presses for 10 per cent.; and more than that, the Government deliver their newspapers all over the country, without charging them one farthing. I think that if this tariff keeps out this United States literature it will be a good thing for Canada. We know that the most disloyal sentiments to Canada emanate from these American electroplates. If we have them produced in Canada we will have a loyal sentiment promulgated through the country, instead of circulating American ideas emanating professedly from Canadian newspapers. I think that, in every way we view it, the idea is a good one to have the electroplates produced in Canada, instead of importing them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance how much revenue he expects to realise from this source?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not base any hope on this of realising money.

Saccharine or any product containing over one-half of one per cent. thereof, $10 per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This seems a very remarkable clause.

Mr. BOWELL. This article is prohibited in France altogether; it is prohibited in England for use in breweries, and in Belgium there is $12 a pound placed on it. The smallest possible quantity will change the whole character of any article into which it is put. It is a new discovery from the distillation of coal tar, and it is found to be injurious.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:45 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 17th April, 1890.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PONTIAC JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BRYSON moved that the petition of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company be now read and received, and referred to the Committee on Standing Orders. He said: The Bill is to consummate an agreement pending between the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway for a portion of the line between Hull and Aylmer. It appears there is some doubt as to the right of the companies to enter into this agreement, owing to certain legislation which took place in the early days of the Session, and I make this motion with the view of removing this doubt.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell)

Motion agreed to.

STEAMBOAT ENGINEERS' LICENSES.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 139) to amend the Act respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers employed on them. He said: By the Act of 1886 the engineers who had previously been engaged in this work were given a certain time to come in and get their certificates renewed, but some of them were not aware of the provision and did not come in. They are not a class of men who are likely to be generally aware of amendments made to the law, and, through no fault of theirs, many of these engineers lost their certificates. This is intended to relieve them from the effect of the provision in the law, of which they were unaware, though they will be still subject to the other provisions of the law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE DROP BOXES.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. CASEY) asked, Who is the contractor for collecting mail matter from the drop boxes in Montreal and delivering it at the post office? How long has he held the contract? How much is he paid for the service? Was the contract let to him by public tender? Has it been renewed to the present contractor without calling for tenders? When does the contract expire? Will tenders be called for when it expires?

Mr. HAGGART. The name of the contractor for collecting mail matter from the drop boxes in Montreal and delivering it at the post office is Patrick Kennedy. He has held the contract from the 1st September, 1883. The sum paid for the service is $4,031 per annum. The contract was let by public tender. It has been renewed to the present contractor. The contract expires on the 31st August, 1891. In regard to the last question, I cannot say what the Postmaster General at that time will do.

MR. JOHN ABELL.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to bring to the notice of the House a matter which, I think, is of some public importance, and is certainly of importance to certain people in this country. Some time ago, it was stated in this House and outside of this House, that Mr. John Abell, of the city of Toronto, a gentleman who was doing a large business there as a manufacturer of steam engines and machinery of various kinds, had become insolvent, and that his property had passed into the hands of Rice Lewis & Son, and that it was employing no hands. I have received the following telegram from Mr. Abell:—

"Mr. Cook's remarks reported in the Mail concerning my business are entirely unfounded, and I am surprised that any member of the Commons should make such a statement without first verifying his premises. The assertions that I have lost money through coming to Toronto, that Rice Lewis & Son Co. control my business, and that there is an Abell Manufacturing Co., are all false. On the contrary, I have made money by coming to Toronto, and I am to-day worth far more than when I left Woodbridge. I own, manage and control my own business, as Mr. Cook might have readily ascertained, and I shall expect him to withdraw what he has said in the House in as public a manner as he has made his assertion.

"JOHN ABELL,"

We have waited for the hon. gentleman-if honorable would apply to such conduct as that-

Mr. SPEAKER, Order.

Mr. WALLACE-and we have waited in vain for any such retraction. I have also here a letter written to Mr. John Abell by the firm of Rice Lewis & Son, Limited, in which they say:

"Dear Sir,—We have had our attention called to the statement in the Mail newspaper of this date, in which Mr. Cook, in his place in the House of Commons, has seen fit to make the statement that the Abell Manufacturing Company are in the hands of Rice Lewis & Son, Limited. We have written to our member, Mr. Cockburn, and have in the House of Commons. We are sorry that you should be dragged into publicity in this way without any reason or cause whatever."

I think, in reference to those statements which have been made by Mr. Abell and by the company of Rice Lewis & Son, it is my duty to bring these facts before the House, and to have the statement contradicted as publicly as it was made. I have known Mr. Abell for many years. He lived nearly 40 years in Woodbridge, where he built up a large business, which he afterwards transferred to Toronto. He has also built up a reputation for sterling honesty and integrity which any man in this country might be proud of. He has, from the smallest beginning, by his indomitable energy, by his ability, and by the qualities which are prized by all good men, given himself a name in this country and a reputation which should not be ruthlessly and needlessly assailed by any man in this country, be he a member of the House of Commons or not. I am very sorry that the hon. member for East Simcoe has not seen fit, in face of these facts which he knew of before, to withdraw the assertions he has made with reference to Mr. John Abell.

Mr. COCKBURN. I may state, in confirmation of what my hon. friend has just said, that I did receive a letter from Rice Lewis & Co., one of the largest firms in Toronto or in the Dominion; and they most unqualifiedly denied the statements made in this House by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook). I had myself hoped that it would have been unnecessary for me to rise in the House and draw his attention to the misstatements which he then made; I had fondly hoped, although I was deceived in my hope, that a sense of honor of what was due by gentlemen, would have led him to get up in this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am perfectly in order. I stated that I had hoped. I did hope it then, but I hope it no longer.

Some hon MEMBERS. Order, order. Take it back.

Mr. COCKBURN. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House hope that he will correct the misstatement, they have more expectations than I have.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not in order.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am perfectly in order. I merely stated that I had hoped that the hon. gentleman would withdraw the words, would withdraw the very serious charge which he had made against a most respectable house, a house with which he might be proud to be associated, if he ever had the chance of being taken into such a partnership. I hope that since a most explicit denial has been given by Mr. Abell, and also given by a firm of such respectable standing as Rice Lewis. & Son, that the member for East Simcoe will consider it a duty which he owes-I do not say to himself-but which he owes to this House, and which he owes to these gentlemen whom he has maligned, to withdraw the statement which he made in this House, and express his regret for having given utterance to a statement so utterly unfounded.

Mr. COOK. If anything has been said with reference to the financial standing of Mr. Abell he can thank his friend the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) for that statement, because I never mentioned the name of Mr. Abell until after the member for West York had mentioned the name himself. I am led to believe that Mr. Abell has not been a success in business in the city of Toronto; that when he went there he purchased a large quantity of land, at that time of little value, and since then land has increased rapidly in value, by which fact he has been able to extricate himself from the difficulty in which he had been placed by his removal to Toronto. That statement was made to me by a member of the firm of Rice Lewis & Co. I am in a position, as I said before, to make this statement on the faith of a partner in the firm of Rice Lewis & Co., who told me of this transaction. I have been told since that the greater portion of the building occupied by Mr. Abell, on Queen street, is not operated by him, and is not occupied at all; it is only the southern part of the building that he occupies, and the number of men is not very I have no desire whatever to injure Mr. Abell in the least, or any other gentleman doing business in this country. I say again that Mr. Abell's name came to the front by the action of the hon. member for West York—his indiscreet friend, his pretended friend, in fact, the man who comes here and attempts to browbeat the members of this House because of a statement that the hon. member made himself, that he had heard from responsible parties who were themselves interested in that transaction. Now, as regards the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn): We know something of the doings of that hon. gentleman. We know that there are a class of men in that city who have formed themselves into syndicates who operate in booming property to the disadvantage and to the ruin of a great many others. I will give you a little idea of the manner in which that business is done. It does not lie in the mouth of that hon, gentleman

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, are there to be no "limits" to this hon. gentleman?

Mr. COOK. It does not lie in the mouth of that. hon. gentleman-

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I will ask my hon. friend not to insinuate anything against the hon. member for Toronto. I think the language of the hon. member for Toronto was rather strong, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not follow his example.

Mr. COOK. I will endeavor, then, to set the hon. gentleman an example. Now, Sir, there are certain gentlemen who are interested in syndicates in the city of Toronto, for the purpose of booming property; there are a number of such syndicates. One syndicate buys a tract of land in one part of the city, and another syndicate buys another tract of land in another part of the city. Suppose there is a piece of land worth $5,000. One gentleman in one syndicate would put a ficticious value upon it of $30,000, and another gentleman in another syndicate, in another section of the city, does the same thing, and then they trade together, and report that they have sold the land at these ficticious prices.

An hon. MEMBER. Who does that?

A gentleman of the syndicate, most of the parties, not every one, but a great many of them who are interested in lands in that part of the city. I do not say the hon. member for Centre Toronto is one of that class; I would not impute motives of that kind to the hon, gentleman, although he can impute motives to other gentlemen in this House, and he can make statements that are derogatory to the honor of gentlemen on this side of the House, and he can compare them with other men—with Mr. Abell—and say that they would be glad to be taken into certain firms. have never said a word against Mr. Abell. I believe him to be a highly respectable citizen. I have never said a word against him; I only repeated statements that, as I said before, were given to me by a member of the firm of Rice Lewis & Co. I hope it will not injure him, if he is in such a position that it would injure him, but at the time I was only illustrating that this iniquitous tariff policy of the Government had actually ruined that man. I am glad to find it stated by the hon. gentleman that such is not the case; I am glad that he has escaped. He is one of the men who have escaped, and he has been fortunate, for many have fallen under the harrow of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. And that was the manner in which this was brought to the at-tention of the House. I have been told—I did not see this in the Mail newspaper the other daythat some friends or pretended friends of Mr. Abell telegraphed him the statement, and then he supposed he was being very unjustly dealt with, and therefore he gave the papers his statement, which he was very foolish to give. I wish to add this statement: that so far as I was concerned I was only stating what was given to me by a member of the firm of Rice Lewis & Co.

Mr. WALLACE. So far as regards the statement——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. WALLACE. I want to make a statement with respect to myself.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think there has already been enough personal explanation on this subject, and the business of the House should be proceeded with.

Mr. HESSON. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to refer to the statement made by the hon, member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), that I brought up Mr. Abell's name Mr. Speaker.

in this House. I will show how much honesty there was in that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say dishonesty; I said I would show how much honesty there was in it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This practice of moving the adjournment of the House is so reprehensible that something should be done to put it down.

It was said by the hon. Mr. WALLACE. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), that a large manufacturer had left Woodbridge and come to Toronto, and that to-day he was not worth a dollar and did not employ a man. As only one large manufacturer left Woodbridge and came to Toronto, I say the hon. member for East Simcoe could not have referred to anyone else except Mr. Abell. That was the way in which the reference was made; he did not mention the name at first, but he mentioned it in such a way that every one knew that reference could only be made to Mr. John Abell. Then the hon, gentleman attempted to get out of it by saying that some property other than his manufacturing establishment is at present not owned by Mr. Abell. But what has that to do with the statement made, that he did not own a dollar and did not employ a man? The hon. gentleman further said that if Mr. Abell was a good man and in prosperous circumstances he could not be hurt by any malicious statement made. Some men cannot be hurt by any statement made; but although Mr. Abell stands high, a statement of this kind, made on the responsibility of a member of the House, is likely to do a great deal of injury. I am sure there are men, not only on this side of the Atlantic but on the other side of the Atlantic, who would be pleased and gratified if their transactions with certain Canadians had been as satisfactory to them as the transactions of Mr. Abell had been to his creditors. I am sure certain Glasgow shareholders, on the other side of the Atlantic, would be so, as is pretty well known.

Mr. LAURIER. There is a lesson to be drawn from this incident. If the manufacturers of agricultural implements are so very successful, perhaps the Government will consider whether they should not remove the duty of 25 per cent. from that class of goods.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER. I call the attention of the House, as I did yesterday, to the fact that at this period of the Session it is an abuse of the privileges of the House to move the motion for adjournment at the beginning of its sitting, more especially when there is no other object to be served than that of securing a repetition of what has already been said.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that while yesterday I obeyed the suggestion made by you, Mr. Speaker, and took my seat, that course was not followed to-day on the other side.

THE ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the House resolves itself into Committee of Ways and Means, I desire to draw the attention of the Postmaster General and the House to a matter of which I gave the hon. Minister private notice some time ago—the unfortunate position of our transatlantic mail service. Last year a discussion took place with respect to improvements in this service, and it was contended by hon, gentlemen on this side of the House that we should not seek to obtain a service of the same character as that between England and New York, that is greyhounds running at a speed of twenty miles an hour. It was then stated by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that some of our own Dominion lines were prepared, if the Government were willing to accept a reasonably fast service, to complete and put proper steamships on the line. The Government did not see fit to do so. They required a service varying from seventeen to twenty knots; they were not very definite or clear as to what they required. They, at all events, gave us to understand that they required an extremely rapid service, and they were going to enter into a contract with Messrs. Anderson, and we were told that contract was approaching completion. Since then we have learned that the Government were unfortunate in their dealings with Messrs. Anderson and they have not arrived at any contract, and at the present moment the country is not in a position to know whether the statement made by the right hon. Premier as to the cause of the failure or the explanation of the Messrs. Anderson is the correct explanation of the facts. We should know that, and we should know it at an early date. The point to which I desire to call attention is the fact that the service we have to-day is in about as unfortunate a position as it can be. Loud complaints have been made from time to time, particularly by passengers, as to the condition of the vessels now engaged in that service. I do not know that the owners of the line-the Allan lineare to blame so much; I think they are probably not so much to blame. They were willing to enter into a proper contract and to supply proper boats; but the Government would not accept their offer, and the mails are being carried under a very temporary contract indeed. Of course, when the contract is only a temporary one we cannot expect men to invest large capital in the service, and we must expect to obtain very inferior boats. Such is the present condition of affairs. I hold in my hand a letter written from Halifax by a passenger who arrived on the Peruvian the other day, and the facts stated therein are such as demand the attention of the hon. Postmaster General. The writer

Says:

"I arrived here yesterday in the Peruvian. We had a terribly rough passage of fifteen and a-half days; head winds and high seas all the way across. The old steamer's boilers are 16 years old, and the certificate of seaworthiness expired five days after we left Moville. The Captain could not press her, and, as it was, some time was lost in repairing the old boilers as we came along. There was great indignation among the passengers at having been entrapped on board an old thing practically without a certificate, upon the understanding that they had taken passage on a first-class steamer carrying the Canadian mails. They wanted me to draw up a round robbin, an indignation protest, but I declined, as I could not be bothered. We intended coming out by the Parisian, which was advertised to sail on the 13th, put forward I take it, as a decoy to prevent passengers going by other conveyances, and then she was withdrawn for fourteen days on the plea that further repairs were needed." the plea that further repairs were needed.

If the statements made in this letter are correct, and they are written by a gentleman in whose credibility I have every confidence, and who is a practical man and knows what he is talking about, that steamer sailed with a certificate of seaworthi-

Moville, a state of affairs which calls for the interference of the hon. Postmaster General. The fact is, we talk about inducing passengers to come out by our Canadian lines, but unless we have better steam vessels to offer them than are on the line now, we need not hope for any increase, but, on the contrary, we may look for a large decrease in our traffic.

Mr. KENNY. I think it is very much to be regretted that the hon, gentleman did not bring this matter forward by resolution, when the hon. members of the House who take an interest in the question might have had an opportunity of preparing themselves to debate it. I cordially agree ing themselves to debate it. I cordially agree with every remark that has fallen from the hon. gentleman in reference to the very unsatisfactory condition of the present trans-Atlantic mail service. The hon. gentleman, and hon. members of this House who take an interest in this question, are aware that lately one of the subsidised ocean mail steamers of the Canadian Line actually had not coal enough to carry her on a fourteen days passage across the Atlantic, and was obliged to burn part of her cargo to enable her to land her 700 passengers at their des-The hon, member for Queen's (Mr. tination. Davies) has read a letter pointing out the fact that the steamer Peruvian was fifteen and a-half days making the passage from Liverpool to Halifax to which he refers. Hon. gentlemen who crossed the Atlantic in the days of the old paddle steamers of the Cunard Line will remember that it was very exceptional when one of those steamers was more than fourteen days on a passage. I myself have made many passages in the old Cunard paddle steamers, and I was never more than fourteen days crossing the ocean. Yet, here we are to-day subsidising a line of steamers, one of which takes nearly sixteen days to cross the shortest Atlantic route. There is another point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House while this matter is under notice, and that is the fact that the present contract enables the subsidised steamers to make their terminal ports outside of the Dominion. On an average, there are from twenty to twenty-five passages made by these subsidised steamers between England and Halifax and Portland. Every one of these steamers lands on an average from 1,000 to 1,500 tons of freight in a foreign port, while for the past two years they have not landed within the Dominion more than an average of 200 tons of freight for transhipment by mail to points in Canada. When we consider the very large dis-bursement necessarily involved in the discharging of the inward cargo of these ships, and the loading of their outward cargoes, hon. members will recognise that we are actually subsidising a line of steamers to build up a foreign port at the expense of our own ports. Now, Mr. Speaker, as regards the insinuation that the Government is to be blamed because the contract was not made with the owners of the Allan and Dominion Lines, the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) is conclusive evidence that from the unsatisfactory manner in which they performed the service they are not entitled to any special consideration. I think, therefore, that it was wiser in the public interest—as unfortunately the price of iron has advanced, and consequently the price of steamers ness which expired five days after she left is very much increased—that the Government should wait for a year and secure a service which shall be satisfactory, and which shall have its terminal ports within the Dominion, than to renew anything like a permanent contract with companies which have done their work so very unsatisfactorily as these two companies have during the past two years. Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) I may state that in the contract existing at present between the Dominion Government and the Allan Line of steamers the terminal ports are: Moville, Liverpool, Halifax, Quebec and Montreal. A contract was entered into on the 12th of the present month, I think, which is only to last for one year. Speaking from memory, as I did not know that this matter would be discussed to-day, I may say that I do not think the Peruvian There are only is one of the contract vessels. four or five of the best vessels belonging to the Allan Line in the contract, and we have the opportunity of substituting four or five vessels for them; among the latter three or four vessels which the Allan Company promised to have repaired and fitted up with triple-expansion engines. think the contract requires a speed of fourteen knots per hour. As to the Peruvian which the hon. gentleman speaks about, as soon as I got his letter notifying me that he intended to make the enquiry, I sent the following telegram to the Allans' in Montreal:

"Notice is given that inquiry will be made in the House of Commons as to the condition of the Peruvian when she left Liverpool on her late trip to Halifax. Please enable Postmaster General to reply by giving him all the information in your power."

I got the following answer from Mr. Allan:

"The fact of Peruvian having British Board of Trade certificate that she was in every respect fitted and found as a mail and passenger steamships, is ample proof of her efficiency. The Board of Trade surveyors would not have allowed her to leave Liverpool had anything in her been deemed inefficient."

That was the answer I got to the query.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think, the fact that she took fifteen days to come to Halifax from Liverpool is prima facie very strong evidence that she was not fit to be a passenger or a subsidised mail steamer.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think she is a subsidised mail steamer now.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This discussion proves what I have been endeavoring to show the House for some time, namely: that the Government have been very remiss in their duty in not dealing with this question in a practical manner. It was evident from the first that the position taken by the Government, as announced by the Minister of Finance, could never be realised. We were told by the Minister of Finance that they were going to establish a line of twenty knots per hour boats, equal to the fastest lines leaving the city of New York. Those who were at all familiar with the subject assured the hon. gentleman that no contract could be entered into for such a speed, on such a basis, for anything like the amount which the Government were offering for that service. That prediction has been justified by the withdrawal of Messrs. Anderson from the temporary contract which they entered into. Now, it is very important to understand this question thoroughly, that the House should be in possession of a correspond-Mr. KENNY.

ence to which I referred yesterday, because it is evident that the Government did enter into a contract, and it is evident that for some reason-whether on account of the terminal ports on the other side. or the speed required from the vessels-Messrs, Anderson were not able to carry out the contract, I, therefore, repeat that before we can discuss this question intelligently we should be put in posses. sion of the reasons which induced Messrs. Ander. son to sign the contract with the Government. I regret very much to observe that the Government have not proposed a renewal of the subsidy which was in the Estimates last year.

Mr. FOSTER. What subsidy?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The $500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not in the Estimates.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It was a resolution. Up to the present time the Government have given no intimation to the House of their intention to ask for a renewal of that subsidy. Whether it is required or not I do not know; if it is required, I hope they will deal with it.

Mr. FOSTER. It is an Act of Parliament.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then that stands in a different position; I thought it was in the Estimates. However, be that as it may, the Government do not show any anxiety to improve the mail service. They have had it in their power at any time during the last year or year and a half to make a contract with responsible parties for a service of sixteen or seventeen knots, which is all that this country requires. I think the Government must be satisfied of that fact; their own press has stated that to be ample; and they have at this moment an intimation from reliable companies that they are willing to put on steamers to undertake the service on that basis, but the Government give them no encouragement. The Government still adhere to their absurd idea of attempting a twenty-The two companies who have been knot service. performing this work for some time have now some large steamers under contract. I know that one company, and I believe the other, have intimated to the Government that if they would make an arrangement with them they would have these steamers made capable of seventeen knots. But the Government are shilly-shallying and putting the matter off from year to year. It must be remembered that the Government are not accommodating the companies by giving them the mails to carry, but that the companies are accommodating the Government; they are merely carrying the mails as an act of favor, and they will not make the same effort as they would under other circumstances; and unless the Government are prepared to deal with this matter in a practical manner the service will go on next year and the year after in the same unsatisfactory way as it did last year. I do not know anything about the long voyage which has been referred to, but I know that these companies have done good work in the service of Canada in the past, and if during the winter time a tempestuous voyage is longer than usual, I suppose it is susceptible of explanation. 1 do not stand here to justify these companies, because their service to the country is a sufficient justification; but what I repeat is that the Government, by their want of promptness and business management, are allowing this affair to drift on in an unsatisfactory way. We know that the temporary contract expired on the 12th of April, and if they renew it for another year, when it is up to the 12th of April next year, they will be in precisely the same position that they are in to-day; and no company, no matter what their resources may be, can go into the market and get a line of steamers ready, with the necessary capacity, under one or two years. The steamers have to be contracted for and built, and all their arrangements to be made; and so this delay may go on ad infinitum. The sooner the House and the country understand the position of this matter, the sooner I hope public opinion will react on the Government and compel them to do what any reasonable business man would do under the circumstances, provide for a permanent service without unnecessary The Government are responsible for the unsatisfactory manner in which the service stands at present, and apparently they do not intend to take any immediate steps to bring about a remedy.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not propose to occupy any time beyond what is necessary to endorse every word that the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has said. I think the course of the Government is unfair to the Allans, who were the pioneers of this service, and who for thirty years have performed the work as well as any company could possibly do it. It is utterly impossible to expect, with the delays and want of determination on the part of the Government as to what will be done, that these gentlemen can, under temporary arrangements, give the country that accommodation which it has a right to expect. I believe the Allans' have one or two fast steamers, and, with the Dominion Line, performed the service each alternate week with their steamers, and if one of the steamers has made one long voyage, I do not think the Allans should be condemned for that circumstance. I think the Government ought to take some decided step to give the Allans a permanent contract, with the understanding that they will improve the speed of the vessels, or else adopt an arrangement with some other company. Something ought to be done, and not have the service depending on temporary arrangements.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the question of the mail service, the bond fides of the Government was, of course, shown in its recommendation to the House of a very large vote in order to get as good a service as was possible between our own country and European ports. The House very generously placed the sum asked for at the disposal of the Government, and the Government lost no time in inviting tenders in the most public manner for a service of a high class. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that the provisional contract given to the Messrs. Anderson was after a length of time returned to the Government, because of the inability of the Messrs. Anderson to carry out the contract.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What speed was provided for in that contract?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon gentleman will know what the speed was, together with all the conditions, when it becomes proper to bring the correspondence down to the House. We have already discussed the question of bringing down the correspondence, and the Government have stated that they do not consider it best in the public interest that it should be brought down at present. I was going on to state that it was no fault of the Government that the Messrs. Anderson were not able to carry out the provisional contract. gentlemen know that there was a very great rise in the price of iron, and consequently in the cost of ship building, which made it unwise for the Government at such a time to ask for tenders for another contract; but the Government in the meantime made a provisional arrangement with the Allan Line. I quite agree with the hon. gentlemen opposite that we cannot expect a perfect service from the Allans for a short time under a mere temporary arrangement. The Government have not, however, lost sight of the main part of the business, which is, as soon as possible, and at as an advantageous a rate as possible, to get the best possible service between this country and the old country, and we are now taking steps to bring that about. The Government have not been lax in the matter, or failed in any way in putting forth all proper efforts, and at present the Government is losing, and, in the interim, will lose no time in trying to obtain what I think we all wish, a reasonably good and well equipped service for carrying mails and passengers between this country and the English ports.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does appear to me that the Government are treating the House in this matter as if they were a parcel of children. I do think that we are perfectly com-petent to discuss this matter and to receive the information which would enable us to do so; and I doubt exceedingly whether, when the correspondence is brought down, it will be found there were any valid reasons in the public interest for not acquainting the House with it. What information has leaked out appears to point to a very strong difference of opinion between those gentlemen and the Premier, or whoever was conducting this mat-ter on behalf of the Government. It does appear to me that nothing will be lost in the public interest by discussing this thing fully on the floor of the House. The House is aware that business men all over the country entertained from the first the very gravest doubts as to whether it was at all possible to carry out what the Government proposed to do, and I believe that the policy enunciated by the Government, more particularly that part which proposes a terminus at a French port, is utterly indefensible from any point of view and calculated to injure the prospects of the line in the highest degree. Under these circumstances, it was the duty of the Government to bring these down, and the public interest is more likely to be injured, a bad bargain to be made, and the public money to be lost, by refusing the information than by bringing it down.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. the Minister of Finance said the Government were still in negotiation. The hon. gentleman must know that they have an offer from one company at least, and that the Dominion line, to entertain the proposition to put on steamers of seventeen knot speed and to make arrangements at an early day to convert a steamer, which this company is now building, of some 6,000 tons, into a seventeen knot boat, but when they approached the Minister of Finance, they could not get any assurance that the Government would entertain such a proposal. Therefore, neither that company nor the Allans would proceed to make the arrangements necessary to carry out such a contract. If the Government had been willing to enter into an arrangement for a seventeen knot service at a moderate rate, probably for considerably less than the amount placed at their disposal, we should have a seventeen knot service at an early day.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Sugar-candy, brown or white, and confectionery, including sweetened gums, $\mathbf{1}_{4}^{1}$ cents per pound and 35 per

Sweetened biscuits of all kinds, candied peels, popcorn, preserved ginger, condensed milk, and condensed coffee with milk, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to make some transposition between 150 and 159. After sweeetened gums in 158, I wish to add candied peels, condensed milk, when sweetened, and condensed coffee with milk, when sweetened. These belonged coffee with milk, when sweetened. These belonged to that category before, and I find they were transposed to the second one, 159, to which they The duty is left the do not properly belong.

Cut tobacco, 40 cents per pound, and 12½ per cent. ad valorem.

Cut tobacco came in the same as other tobacco. A change has been made so as to give an increase from 30 to 40 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the supposed value of that cut tobacco?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Kirkpatrick) informs me it is retailed at $1.50 per Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is with the duty added. If I am correctly advised, the original value is very small. Speaking impartially, for I neither smoke or chew, nor intend to, it must be remembered this is a luxury very largely indulged in by a large number of people. although, if you want revenue, I would have no objection to your getting it out of tobacco or spirits, I am told that this tobacco costs only 7 cents a pound, and in that case the addition to the duty of 10 cents a pound requires some explanation, and ought to bring a large addition to the How much do you expect from it?

Mr. FOSTER. Not very much, I think. has been no distinction between the cut tobacco and the plug tobacco, and this is to make the distinction between the cut and the plug. Cut tobacco is supposed to be so much sweeter than plug tobacco, that I think no one will object to this duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Still, it is a rather stiff addition to the duty.

Mr. FOSTER. I should not like to cut it myself for the difference.

Mr. WALDIE. Does this apply to cut stems as well as to the cut leaf? The cut stems are only worth about 10 cents a pound, and they are sold in large quantities in barrels.

Mr. Jones (Halifax).

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman any idea how many people there are in this country who are expected to make their living by cutting tobacco?

Mr. FOSTER. We have no statistics in regard to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we ought to know how much revenue it is expected to get from this.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no way of telling that by the returns, because this was not denominated before. I do not think it will be very large.

Files and rasps, 10 cents per dozen and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to drop that item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the effect of dropping it?

Mr. FOSTER. That will leave it as it was before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. the duty before?

Mr. FOSTER. 35 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad that is dropped, because I intended to move in regard to it.

Picks, mattocks, hammers weighing 3 pounds each or over, sledges, tracks tools, wedges or crow bars of iron or steel, 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might call the attention of the Government to a curious fact in connection with this tax, which is illustrative to some extent of the way in which our tariff works. In the first place, I would ask if this is an additional duty?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the same.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not a matter of very great moment in one sense, but it is slightly noteworthy as to the effect of the tariff. I find that there is a very considerably higher duty on all this class of goods imported from Great Britain, which imports our goods free, and the duty which is levied on goods of the same class from the United States. The duty on the goods from Great Britain appears to be about 52 per cent., and the duty on goods from the United States something under 40 per cent. I wonder that the hon. gentlemen do not remedy that anomaly; I wonder that these loyal British subjects have such a curious way of showing their loyalty.

Mr. BOWELL. Where do you find that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On page 227 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that the value of these articles imported from Great Britain was $2,329, on which a duty was collected of $1,195, which is about 52 per cent. From the United States, the imports amounted to $3,878, and the duty was $1,469, which, speaking roughly, is about 35 per cent., or a little more. To show our loyalty, we tax these articles of prime necessity about 17 per cent. more when they come from Great Britain than we do when they come from the United States. If I had done that, I suppose the whole of the members on the other side of the House would have risen up to denounce me as a traitor, but the hon. gentleman does it without a whimper being heard from the loyal Imperial federationists on that side, none of whom, by the way, I see here at present.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has observed the different qualities of these articles imported from the United States and Great Britain, respectively, or he would see that, if the same class of article came from Great Britain as that which comes from the United States, there would be no difference in the duty, but if the quality which comes from Great Britain is better than that which comes from the United States, the duty is necessarily larger.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The House will observe that the Minister of Finance does not deny the facts; he does not deny that there is a duty of 17 per cent. extra on the British article to that which is imposed on the American article, so that the Government are discriminating against the loyal British article, and in favor of the traitorous United States article.

Shovels and spades, shovel and spade blanks, and iron or steel cut to shape for same, $1 per dozen and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the supposed value of what are called shovel blanks and spade blanks? What I want to ascertain is It might save the hon. of some importance. gentleman some trouble if he could give us the equivalent of these double duties. For instance, what does the specific duty on shovel blanks, coupled with the ad valorem duty, amount to? If I am correctly informed, I understand that the duty on these articles ranges from 50 per cent. to 75, or even 80 per cent. This appears to be an outrageous duty, whether it is imposed for purposes of revenue or for purposes of protection. These are articles which are used by every agriculturist, by every market gardener, by almost every day laborer, and this appears to be a monstrous duty to impose upon such articles, and I cannot conceive on what score such a large duty can be defensible. In the first place, it can hardly produce any revenue; and, in the next place, it is a direct tax on articles of prime necessity to the agricultural population.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, in an article like shovels and spades with such a large range of prices, it is difficult to get any duty which, if it bears heavily in the one case, would not bear lightly in another, that is, to range one duty for a large class so as to bear equally on all the parts. If the shovel and spade are of a small variety and low value, then $1 per dozen added to the 25 per cent. may be a high duty; but if these tools are of a better grade and the price is higher, then the duty is very small.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the value of a high grade and what is the value of a low grade?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the figures, but they must range between a very low and a very high limit.

Mr. WALDIE. These common shovels are worth from $3 to $4 a dozen. I think that would be 60 per cent. on the common kind. I am glad that none of them are imported into Canada, because they are too common. When we come to a better quality I do not think the duty is more than 35 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be still less in some cases.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Seeing the hon. Finance Minister is not doing this for revenue purposes, I hope that he will take the interest of the farmers into consideration. It is an article of prime importance to every farmer of the country. used by them in their barns and stables, and it is an article that every laboring man who works in the country has got to provide for himself. In Western Ontario, a large number of workmen make their living digging drains in the summer, and here they have got to pay 45 per cent. on picks and over 32 per cent. on shovels. I can remember that, last Session, the hon. Finance Minister showed us how the incidence of taxation would bear upon the wealthy man who went to New York to buy pianos, upon which he would pay 20 per cent. Last night it was shown that the physicians, a class far better able to spend money than the farmers are, would only pay a duty of 20 per cent. on surgical instruments; while here, the laboring men and the farmers have to pay from 45 to 50 and 60 per cent. on their shovels and spades.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. gentleman and the House will observe that I have not in this instance commented on the manufacturer's part in this matter, for the reason that I am inclined to believe that these enormously high duties do not afford them anything like the protection that appears to be involved, by reason of the enormous increase which the policy of the Government has made to the cost of the raw material, the iron and steel required to be used. But I do want to draw attention to the innumerable ramifications of the duty on iron, and the immense additional duty which has lately been put upon iron in the raw state, and it almost compels the Government to maintain these excessive high taxes on articles of common use. cannot possibly continue to tax iron without, as in this case, taxing the agriculturists enormously higher than they need to be taxed.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think we should allow this item to pass without pressing upon the Minister the necessity of reducing the duty on spades and shovels. It is an outrageous thing that farmers should be called upon to pay 45 or 50 per cent. upon spades and shovels simply because it is not thought desirable to have them manufactured in this country. We have no desire to prevent the introduction of these articles, but we say that the protection granted under this tariff is unreasonable. Shovels and spades without the handles are charged a specific duty of $1 a dozen, besides 25 per cent.; that amounts to 45 or 50 per cent. I cannot understand why the Government should do this. An enormous quantity of these tools are used in this country. I think that the protection on these goods in this country has been going on long enough to enable parties to make spades and shovels without the assistance of the Government. This manufacture was going on in Canada before the National Policy was introduced, and I do not think it is necessary that the Government should keep their ears open to the remonstrances of those people who are anxious to make more money out of the people than they are entitled to make. piece of gross injustice; it is simply for the purpose of building up a huge wealthy institution and giving them power to collect from the people of this country money that they are not entitled to.

Mr. WELSH. I quite agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Huron, and other gentlemen in this House, and I will suggest that the Finance Minister strike out the 25 per cent. ad valorem, and leave the $1 a dozen. That would be about 8 cents on every shovel. If the farmers and laborers of the country pay 8 cents into the revenue on every shovel they use, I think that would be quite sufficient. I have never interfered with this tariff much, but I would suggest to the working classes.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid I could not adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend who spoke last. That would be rather against his own policy.

Minister that he make this change on behalf of the

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then lay the duty on the other way, strike out the $1 a dozen and leave the 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is very accommodating. The hon member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh), proposes that we should drop the 25 per cent. and leave the $1 a dozen, and when he finds that that would tax the poor man's shovel and leave the fancy shovel of the amateur almost without any duty, the hon member for South Oxford then turns round, and is willing to have it fixed the other way. Although there is a high duty, these shovels are largely made in our own country, and the competition between the shovelmakers themselves keeps the price down. I think the hon gentleman can buy good shovels, as I have to sometimes, very cheaply indeed, on account of their being manufactured by several firms, and the competition keeps the price down. My hon friend for Halton (Mr. Waldie) can bear testimony to the good grade of these shovels.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We brought in last year 47,000 spades and shovels without handles, so it is tolerably clear that, with a higher rate of duty, the Canadian manufacturers' must charge close up to the limits of it, or else this 40,000 would not be brought in. It is curious to observe, again, that here, also, by an extraordinary freak of our tariff, we charge 52 per cent. on the English article as against 40 per cent. on the American article. An hon. gentleman near me suggests that it was not a freak; that it was done purposely.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very ungenerous.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The value of the English article is $6,192, and the duty on it $3,221, about 52 per cent. The value of the American article is $8,000, and the duty, $3,444, a fraction over 40 per cent., a direct discrimination against the mother country of 12 per cent. in the article of spades and shovels alone.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not each country pay exactly the same rate of duty?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently not. Our country is paying 52 per cent. on the value of the article, and the other pays 41 or 42 per cent., to be very exact, on the value of the article.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps there is a difference in the quality of the article.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be; but it does not affect the rate of duty. The ad for revenue purposes, o valorem percentage, according to the hon. gentle-Mr. McMullen.

Great Britain, is over 52 per cent. Mr. BOWELL. 51 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the other is a little over 40 per cent. Where are all the Imperial Federationists? What are they thinking about while these important facts are being disclosed, in regard to discriminations in trade against the mother country?

man's own tables, on the articles imported from

Mr. FOSTER. They do not appreciate the facts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They do not appreciate any facts that bear on the questions, which are of great interest as between English and American goods. I know very well the temper entertained by a great many English manufacturers towards us on account of these irregularities in the tariff, with which they are very familiar. They are keenly alive to the facts in regard to the practical working of the tariff, and much has been said about our discriminating in favor of American as against English goods, for we find hon. gentlemen opposite are practically discriminating against English and in favor of American goods.

Mr. McMULLEN. The duty on shovels and spades is more than equal to 8 per cent., as has been stated. A dozen shovels will cost about $3.50, or as low as $3. A large number of these common shovels are used by farmers in the spring, and the duty on them will not be less than 40 or 50 per cent., while on the better quality the duty will be less.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to drop No. 168, and to leave the duty as before, 35 per cent.

Trunks, valises, hat-boxes, carpet bags and carpenters' tool baskets, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Trunks bore a duty of 30 per cent., valises 10 cents and 30 per cent. A valise may have been of trifling value or worth $8 or $10, and the same remark applies to satchels. Carpenters' tool bags bore a duty of 10 cents each and 30 per cent., while in some cases the bag was not worth more than 10 cents or 15 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I would suggest is that carpenters' tool baskets should be placed on the general list, which is 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I will do that, and strike it from this item.

Mr. COOK. The trunk manufacturers, under the benign policy of the Government, have been doing a rushing business. They can hardly supply the wants of the people who wish to leave the country. I thought, perhaps, it was part of the policy of the Government to increase the duty on trunks, in order to stop the exodus.

Mr. FOSTER. We will leave that to the hongentleman when he comes in.

Satchels, pocket-books and purses, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. This is an increase of 5 per Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you require this 5 per cent. increase? Is it required for revenue purposes, or, if not, for what special purpose is it required?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not required for the purpose of revenue, but for the assistance of the branch of industry that is engaged in making these articles. Pocketbooks and purses are being well made in this country, but the manufacturers have to meet very heavy competition, and they have to pay a pretty large duty on the goods which enter into their manufacture, and so, when we came to work out the matter, we found that they had not very large protection. We, therefore, propose to give them an additional 5 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In my part of the country the necessity for the use of pocket-books and purses is rapidly diminishing, and I do not suppose this increased duty will burden the people very much.

Mr. FOSTER. Then there cannot be very much objection to the increase.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As regards my part of the country, which is adjacent to the city represented by the hon. the First Minister, the duty will certainly not damage our people very much. Where are the manufactories situated?

Mr. FOSTER. There are two in Toronto, some in Montreal and one in Hamilton.

Mr. MITCHELL. While the people in the constituency of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) may not want pocketbooks, they certainly will require, on account of the exodus, a good many satchels.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty on satchels has been lowered. If the poor people do not want purses, they will not have to complain of the duty, while wealthy gentlemen, like my hon. friend opposite, need not complain; and as regards satchels, the duty has been reduced.

Mr. GILLMOR. The coolness with which the Minister of Finance answered this question about adding to the prices of these articles for the benefit of the manufacturers, strikes me as a very singular thing. I can understand that the Government have a right to tax people, in order to carry on the affairs of the country, and to make people support our institutions. We have to submit to that. But when the Government of this free country proposes to take money out of the pockets of one class of the community to give to another class, I do not understand that principle of taxation. We are dealing with this question as though it was a trifling mat-The money which a man earns by his toil, or by his enterprise of any kind, is his own; and by what law, natural or moral, do you, gentlemen opposite, sit down here and openly admit that you are taking one man's earnings to give them to another man? I am astonished that in a free country, where we profess to be free men, and where every man has a right to what he earns honestly, that you are not ashamed to stand up here, in the nineteenth century, and propose deliberately and without a blush, that you are going to take a man's money and give it to another man. Why, if a private individual attempted to take money out of my pocket to give to another man, it would be a crime and he would be incarcerated. But you sit down here in free Canada, which has been educated and instructed from the pulpit, and you speak as a matter of course, that you are going to rob millions out of one class of the people to give to other people. You do not hesitate or blush to say you are going to tax everybody else and take from them their honest earnings to hand over to somebody who is making pocket books or purses in Montreal or Toronto. I am astonished that men can sit quietly by and see such gross injustice done in this free country, where every man is supposed to earn his money honestly, and where we do earn it by hard toil. You do not seem to hesitate in this course, nor do you seem to think there is anything wrong in it, while to all right-minded people it is clearly a violation of the natural and moral law, and a violation of right. But you become accustomed to it, and the people have lost their independence and have become demented when they allow you to take their money in this manner and hand it over to other people. I see that hon. gentlemen opposite laugh at this; for they cannot see that there is anything wrong in robbing one man by law to give his hard-earned means to another man. The people submit to it, and why do they submit to it? Because party has robbed men of their independence and political morality, and independence of thought and action have been crushed out by your system, and we have to submit to be kicked, and cuffed, and spit upon for party purposes,

Mr. McM1LLAN (Huron). I have been a little astonished at the Minister of Finance, because he states that in this branch of business the competition has become very keen and that this duty is required to assist the manufacturers. I understood always that the National Policy was introduced to establish industries, but the Minister of Finance now says that when we have established more industries than the country really requires, we must impose an extra duty in order that these manufacturers may live. I would like to know when is this going to end? The competition is becoming too keen in all branches of industry. I visited one or two woollen factories, recently, and I found their shelves lined with goods and their mills standing idle; and these gentlemen will, no doubt, say: There is too much competition; we cannot carry on our business; we are losing money. Where is this bleeding of the general public going to end, if this pernicious system is to be followed, and if the Government is going to continue putting on a duty to encourage industries, and then, when you have encouraged too many of these industries, put on an extra duty to support them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am rather astonished that my hon. friend (Mr. Gillmor), after sitting here for so many years and seeing the course taken by the Government, should express surprise at what is being done now. Why, the Government is carrying out a scriptural injunction: "To him that hath they give, and to him that hath not they are taking away even that which he hath." That is the rule upon which the Government has long acted, and there is no reason, I suppose, why they should not still adhere to it. There is an advantage to them in pursuing this rule, because, when aid is required to carry on elections, it is much easier to deal with a few men than it is to deal with a large number, and so there is every reason why the Government should continue to pursue the course which it has hitherto adopted. Then again, Mr. Chairman, the Government are proposing to help people along in various enterprises, when otherwise they could not succeed at all.

They assume that the people of this country require a sort of commission of lunacy to issue on their behalf, and as they would be altogether incompetent to decide what course or what industries to engage in, in order that their capital might be profitably invested, the Government undertake to regulate these industries, that otherwise might not be established in the country at all. And so in the community, instead of every man being left responsible for the investment of his own capital and the conduct of his own business, the Government take paternal care of it, and undertake to decide for him what in other countries he is supposed to decide for himself. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Gillmor) has very old-fashioned notions. He has not learned the new notions which prevail on the Treasury benches, and which the Government have found so useful to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. In what way?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why, the hon. gentlemen are on the Treasury benches, and they would not have been there under different circumstances.

Mr. MITCHELL. In what way ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend knows that quite as well as $\mathbf I$ do.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I know it, and I will tell you. It is in this way: When these people come up and want an increase of 5 cents specific and 5 cents additional ad valorem, I venture to say that they pretty generally understand that when the time comes around, $500 or $5,000 will be needed from them for the election fund. That is the way it is useful to the Government at election time.

Plants, viz.: Fruit, shade, lawn and ornamental trees, shrubs and plants, N.E.S., 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps, Sir, it would be convenient that on this first item we should have a discussion on the following twelve, which are substantially the same. Of course I have no objection to carry it on item by item. I really think that, in the interest of the great mass of the people, at any rate, the Government ought to carefully consider this duty. The fact is, and I think it must be familiar to my hon. friends who take any interest in horticulture, that it is highly desirable, indeed almost vital, to the successful prosecution of fruit growing, that you should be allowed to get trees where you can get them best and in any quarter without impediment; because, as everybody knows, our trees in this country are very apt to wear out. I hardly know at this moment where to go, in Ontario at any rate, to get anything like plum trees, which can be depended upon to bear fruit. I have tried in every imaginable quarter unsuccessfully, and that has been the experience of a good many of my neighbors; and the same remark applies in a pronounced degree to all these duties on fruit trees and shrubs. Moreover, I believe, the tax imposed will bear an enormous proportion to the value of the articles, taking into account the larger number that perish in transport. We have already discussed the point, that a re-imposition of these taxes is pro tanto a repeal of the reciprocity clauses in the Tariff Act of 1879, and is likely to encourage retaliation from our neighbors, and I shall say no more on that. There cannot be much revenue, and even if there should be, it is not needed. Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

But, in my judgment, a considerable inconvenience will be experienced from the re-imposition of these duties by those who grow orchards, and I hope the Government will reconsider their intention of imposing them. I know why it is imposed, not for the general benefit, but in the interest of a few nurserymen scattered up and down this country. If these men could supply our wants, there might be something to be said for it, but in a country like ours, with such a narrow range of climate, it is exceedingly foolish to accede to their demands, by putting on duties which, if not prohibitive, will seriously interfere with fruit culture.

Mr. BRIEN. As the Government have already made some reductions in the tariff, perhaps they might consider whether they cannot reduced this duty. I see that grape vines costing 10 cents and less are charged 3 cents each. Would the inference from that be that if they cost over 10 cents they will come in free?

Mr. FOSTER. No; they come in under the general rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BRIEN. Well, I hope the Government will see their way to making some reduction in these duties, which on the basis of our imports of last year, will be very burdensome. Last year our imports of nursery stock, with the amount of duty paid, were as follows:—

	Number.	Rate of Duty.	Amount of Duty.
Apple trees	542,886 25,072 84,583 77,752 67,843 8,433 34,731 6,435	2 c. 4 4 4 5 2½ 20 p. c.	$10,857 72 1,602 88 3,383 32 3,002 08 3,392 15 210 72 6,946 20 24,131 25 $52,926 32

Therefore this duty is really prohibitive. There are many inequalities in this tariff. The poor man who digs a grave has to pay from 35 to 40 per cent. on his spade, and the doctor has to pay only 20 per cent. on the instrument with which he probably killed the patient.

Mr. CARPENTER. So far as grape vines are concerned, we have three nurserymen in the county I represent, who, last year, propagated over a million vines, and what can be said of the grape vines can be said of almost every other class of fruit. All our nurserymen ask is to have the privilege of supplying our own people, which, I think, should be allowed to them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All they ask is that the whole public should be taxed for the sake of half a dozen people. All they ask is that they should be allowed to put their hands into my pockets and into the pockets of everyone else who grows fruit, and rob us for their private advantage; and the imposition of this duty is simply aiding and abetting robbery by these people. They have no right to take my money. The Government may have a right to take it for the general public defence and public utility. But there is the inwardness of the whole duty: It is for the purpose of robbing the public for the benefit of a few people, otherwise a million or more of these various articles would be imported from the United States.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The hon. gentleman is pretty strong in his language.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All protection is robbery, for that matter.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I can tell the hongentleman that, so far as fruit trees are concerned, we do not want any protection against a legitimate trade on the part of American nurserymen. But, when the market of the United States becomes supplied with trees, a very inferior kind are thrown together in packages and sent to this country, to be sold by agents to our farmers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The hon. gentleman says "oh," but I venture to say that he never planted a fruit tree in his life, and knows nothing about the business. I have had some experience in this matter, and I can state that the farmer, after he buys his tree, has to wait for five or six years to ascertain what kind of tree he has got, and if he does not get the kind he ordered, but one of an inferior quality, he has no recourse against the person who sold it to him.

Mr. BRIEN. I repudiate any such insult, so far as the people I have the honor to represent, are concerned, because they do know the difference between these different plants and fruits.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I do not deny for a moment, that every farmer knows the difference in the different classes of fruit, but no man can tell by a peach tree, or a pear tree, what class of fruit it is going to bear when grown. He cannot tell by the bark, nor can he tell until the fruit grows upon the tree.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the hon. member for Welland, whether the large nurseries, such as those of Rochester, N.Y., have not a character as high as that of the nurseries in his own county. I would ask him, whether these people are not scrupulous as to the character of the stock they furnish. My experience as a farmer is, that the best nursery stock we get comes from the United States. These gentlemen have a reputation and a character to be particular about, and it is an object to them to maintain their reputation for business integrity. This proposition is simply one to make the farmers contribute thousands of dollars per annum for the benefit of a few nursery growers in this Province. It is not a tax in the general interest. It is an imposition on the farmer, and if this Government intend to do anything for the farmer-and they are professing to do something by the duty on meats—let them give the farmer, free of duty, the raw material or the stock necessary to put into his orchard for the production of fruits. Let him purchase that stock where he can get it to the best advantage, and not compel him to buy from a class of nurserymen who, it is claimed, supply inferior stock to that furnished by nurserymen in the United States. In my experience, I have found more inferior stock in nurseries on this side of the line than on the other. If, as the hon. gentleman alleges, the Americans dump on us their over production at much less than it is worth, that is no disadvantage to the farmers, but, on the contrary, is an advantage to them.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The hon. gentleman tries to make me say what I did not. I did say was that we have no objection to legitimate competition, but, as the hon. gentleman knows, the surplus stock of the United States nurseries is sold to jobbers who bring this stock to this country and sell it to our farmers. hon, gentleman not think that the nurserymen of this country have as high a character and are as careful of their reputation as those who grow fruit trees on the other side of the border. We have as high-minded a class of men in that trade as they have in the United States, but the hon, gentleman seems to think there is nothing in the shape of man or beast, or produce in this country, equal to the United States. As far as the nurserymen are concerned, we have as good nurserymen here as can be found in the neighboring republic. I do not say anything against the nurserymen on the other side, or against their legitimate trade, to which we have no objection. They are careful of their reputation and character in the markets where they expect to sell 90 per cent. of their goods, but the other 10 per cent. they sacrifice and sell to jobbers who carry them to this country, to sell to our farmers, and our farmers cannot tell, until the fruit appears upon the tree, the character of the fruit they are purchasing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has made a statement with regard to the farmers of Canada at variance with the facts of the case. The farmers are not so unenterprising that they will be ready to take any tree or plant the jobber may bring. Why should a jobber undertake to sell fruits of this class in Canada? Why should the 10 per cent. come into Ontario any more than in Michigan? Where does the hon. gentleman find trees purched by the farmers of this country of the kind he mentions? The hon. gentleman is drawing on his imagination for his facts. truth is that the farmers of Ontario are just as particular about the character of the fruit trees which they plant in their orchard as any farmers in the State of New York and Ohio. I believe the farmers of Ontario are just as well informed, just as enterprising, and take as much pride in their farm operations as those in New York and Ohio, and are no more ready to buy the refuse stock which may be brought in from Rochester than to buy the refuse stock from the nurseries in the hon. gentleman's own county. It is trifling with the common sense of the House for any hon. member to address to the Committee the kind of argument the hon. gentleman has, from time to time, addressed to this House upon the question. He says you cannot tell what sort of fruit the tree will bear until it actually does bear. If that were so, you could not tell it from a nursery in the hon. gentleman's own county any more than from a nursery in the State of New York. The truth is that the hon. gentleman is mistaken. the hon. gentleman not tell the difference between a Rhode Island Green apple tree and a Northern Spy, between a Northern Spy and a Baldwin, yet the hon gentleman parades himself before this House as a farmer. I venture to tell him that if he would go among the farmers in his own county, he would not find that they could not tell whether an apple tree is of the one variety or the other, and the argument that the farming population of this country are a class for which a commission of lunacy must be issued and that the hon. gentleman himself must take charge of that commission, is assuming a good deal. Yet that is the position taken by the hon. gentleman. I believe it is of great importance to the Ontario farmers that they should go more largely into fruit-growing than they have gone hitherto; and it is not promoting their interests to put impediments in the way of their planting out large orchards in that peninsula which lies between the Great Lakes and the West. The hon. gentleman talks about the interests of the fruit growers. I will venture to say that the interests of the farmers in any one township, ten years hence, if the Government will take off the tax in this matter and leave trees and shrubs of all sorts come in free will be infinitely of more consequence than the interests of all the nurserymen from now until the day of judgment. The hon. gentleman proposes to sacrifice the interests of hundreds of thousands of people-interests that will affect the population to the extent of millions within a few years—for the purpose of promoting immediately the interests of a few parties who are engaged in the nursery business. Such a course is most unwise, yet that is the course the hon. gentleman proposes. I do not say that the nurserymen of Canada are not of as high class as those of anywhere else, but no nurseryman would, apart from all considerations of high principle, be so foolish as to sacrifice his future interests by selling stock which is of no value or not of the class represented. So far as I know, there are no job lots put up in the way the hon. gentleman speaks of. How are the American fruit trees brought into this country? They are brought by fruit tree agents who show the farmer a statement of the kind of trees he requires. Then a contract is entered into in which the varieties of trees are set out. They begin to prepare those trees in the early winter, and they ship them at the proper season when they should be planted. I do not believe, as far as I know, that any one of these American firms has attempted to impose upon the farming population a different class of trees from that which it has undertaken to provide. I have purchased a good many of these trees myself, and I have found, when they came to bear, that the fruit they produced was the kind which I had purchased. It seems to me that there must be great inequalities in this proposed list, and I do not understand upon what rule the Government are imposing these specific duties. I would like to know from the Minister of Finance what is the amount of the ad valorem rate he intends to impose upon the various trees and vines mentioned here, and whether that is intended to be uniform, or whether he intends to impose higher duties upon some sorts of trees than upon others?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) does not appear to be as well informed as many farmers are, in regard to the tricks which are perpetrated upon them with fruit trees. In the part of the country from which I come, orchards have been planted and the names of the trees have been registered, but, when the trees were bearing and the fruits were shown, disputes have arisen, because these fruits were not true to name, and we have had to send sample of apples to Beadle for be of a different kind from what the trees were sold put upon it. The great bulk of the importation of Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

In my own garden, not one out of ten trees. that I obtained through an American agent, turned out to be as described. I have often been engaged as a judge of fruit, and I know that troubles arise annually with us, and we are obliged to apply to the nurserymen to settle these disputes, because the fruit is found not to be true to name, when the fruit trees were purchased. The hon gentleman asks, what is the difference between the American nurseryman and the Canadian nursery. man in this respect? The hon. gentleman must know, as a lawyer, that if the Canadian supplies me with an article fraudulently, I can prosecute him; but, if the American nurseryman does not supply me according to order, and fraudulently imposes upon me by sending an article which I did not order, I cannot prosecute That is him, because he is outside the country. one of the difficulties in dealing with American nurserymen. He also says that he does not know of any job lots being sold. That proves how little he knows on the subject, because I am aware that many dealers have gone over to that country to fill job lot orders, and where fruit trees of any particular variety could not be conveniently got, the order was filled by others, less valuable and not true to name, and were practically worthless. I selected a number of fruit trees which were represented as a winter apple variety, which are the most valuable here because they last the longest, and, out of some twenty varieties, I have only one that was correct. Is not that fraudulent? Those were fruit trees from American orchards. It is the duty of Parliament to protect the Canadian farmer from being imposed upon in that way, and we should endeavor to exclude these American trees if we can find men at home with whom we can deal; and from whom we can get redress if they impose upon our farmers.

Mr. WALDIE. I do not see how this tariff can affect the honesty of the dealer at all. If the farmer buys from an unknown nurseryman, from a casual peddler of trees, he takes his chance, and buys at his own risk. The tariff does not affect the honesty of the dealer. It is known to everyone who is engaged in horticulture that, owing to the continuous climatic changes and the changes in the nature of our soil, the kinds of fruit which are most profitable and desirable at one time are not so desirable at other periods, that varieties of apples which were the most desirable kinds a few years ago are not so now, and that the more advanced horticulturists are desirous to bring in new varieties suitable to our soil and climate. As agriculture has not been so profitable of late years. a large proportion of the farming lands are being devoted to fruit growing, and I think these fruit trees should be admitted free of duty, in order to give protection to this industry and stimulate it. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that of recent years the growing of plums in this country has become profitable, the black knot has ceased to trouble us, and there has been a great demand of late for plum stock. There is a very limited supply of that among our own nurserymen, and, therefore, they have to import it. If we want a tree large enough to transplant at the present time, we have got to fruit trees is made by our nurserymen to supplement those of their own growth. They do not grow profitably the great varieties, they grow profitably only the leading lines, and they supplement by importation those lines from the nurseries that have a larger field of distribution. I do not think this tariff is protective in the proper sense, and I think the grower of fruits should be given the advantage rather than the nurserymen. It is the larger number who are interested in fruit growing who should get the advantage, and not the limited number of nurserymen.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think it is evident that the people of this country are to be taxed heavily for the benefit of a few friends of the Government living in particular sections of the country. evident from the observation of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), that he and a few others in his section expect the rest of this Dominion to pay tribute for their benefit. Now, the whole tariff, the whole financial policy of the nion to pay tribute for their benefit. Government, is nothing more or less than what has been called a system of legalised robbery, of making the many pay for the benefit of a few. Perhaps the Government are consistent in that respect, but when you look upon its bearing on the people of this country generally, the operation of the tariff in this one item, will be shown to bear most unfairly and most heavily on some distant Provinces, particularly Nova Scotia. Last year that small Province alone imported in the neighborhood of 160,000 fruit trees. The cultivation of fruit, as I observed the other night, is very largely on the increase. Public attention has been drawn to the fact that Nova Scotia possesses, from some peculiar reason, some climatic advantages which makes her fruit, and notably apples, mature more gradually, and they are of a better keeping quality than the fruit raised in any other part of the Dominion. Hence all through our western counties there has been of late years, a desire to extend the cultivation of fruit, which is found to be very profitable. Now, the people who are engaged in that industry in Nova Scotia know that in the United States there are horticulturists supplying these fruit trees in whom they can place every confidence. I am sorry to say, and I do not say it out of any disrespect to Canadian nurserymen, but I have heard it generally observed in our part of the Dominion that more reliance can be placed on the stock which is imported from the United States than on Canadian stock. I have not had any experience myself, but I believe to-day that if a Canadian traveller and an American traveller were to visit our district at the same time, the American traveller would get the order, even at a higher price for his trees than the Canadian traveller would ask, on account of the impression that exists that American stock as a rule is nearer to what it is represented, and more satisfactory on the whole. Now, this particular item well exemplifies the whole tariff system of the Government. I do not know why we should waste much time on this one item; it is an illustration of the entire tariff. The tariff is patched up here and there to benefit a local industry, to benefit a particular manufacturer, to benefit a certain class of people at the expense of the creat body of the consumers. The Government have been going on, they have been come down now to the smallest, and meanest, and pettiest article that they can get within their grasp, and they raise a tariff from it under the pretext that they are going to benefit some indivi-duals. Well, it may be that a few people in some part of the country may get a temporary advantage, but it will not last very long, and, moreover, it will not give them the control of the markets, in our part of the country, at least, because, as I observed, our people prefer the American article in which they have more confidence. The item of fruit which we had before us the other night, is an illustration of what I say. No matter if western Canada produces a million bushels ef peaches, they cannot be sent to the Maritime Provinces, and other fruits cannot be sent from that section to the Maritime Provinces; but still, in order to give these people in a few counties in the West, the benefit of keeping out American fruit for a short season, all the rest of the Dominion must pay tribute to those few fruit growers or nurserymen in the West. The idea is so absurd that if one were addressing an argument to reasonable men who were disposed to listen to a business-like and reasonable argument on any question, you might hope to make some impression, but the Government seem to be tied hand and foot, they seem to have no freedom of action in this matter. The Government seem to be completely in the hands of the manufacturers, and at last they have come down till now they are in the hands of the hon, member for Welland. We remember that in the discussion last year the hon. mem-ber for Welland threatened them, when the Finance Minister came down and took the duty off these articles. We know very well what the member for Welland threatened on the Government, and what he and his friends said, and he has now brought sufficient influence to bear to make the Government carry out what he wishes. I regret very much, for the sake of my own Province, that the Government has followed his advice. If these gentlemen in the western part of the Dominion choose to agree among themselves that everything is to be kept out for the sake of benefiting a few people in that industry, why, they may fight it out among themselves, if they can get the Government to back them up. But so far as this item is applied to the rest of the Dominion, I say it is disgraceful, it is a disgrace to any Legislature to attempt to force upon the people of a distant Province these articles, be they good or bad, be they of a superior or an inferior quality, when they can get from other sources their trees at a cheaper rate. The whole system which is advocated from the other side of the House, is entirely contrary to modern progress, to honest thought or to honest legislation, and is intended to benefit a few individuals at the expense of the vast body of the consumers of this country.

whole. Now, this particular item well exemplifies the whole tariff system of the Government. I do not know why we should waste much time on this one item; it is an illustration of the entire tariff. The tariff is patched up here and there to benefit a local industry, to benefit a particular manufacturer, to benefit a certain class of people at the expense of the great body of the consumers. The Government have been going on, they have been driven on from their first position until they have old adage is that nothing teaches like experience. I have a right to give my personal experience as well as the hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). I do not mean to say that nurserymen of Canada generally are in the habit of doing such things, I do not mean to say that their stock is not as good as the American stock, but I mean to say, taking them man for man, the character of the American producer stands just as high as the character of the Ontario producer. I speak from personal experience. I have purchased trees from the Rochester nurseries, and I found they arrived in good condition, were fair, standard trees, and, more than all, when they came to bear fruit they were true to name. I cannot say the same of all the trees I have obtained in this country. I have had trees from nurseries in Ontario, and from the neighborhood of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), and when they came to bear they were not true to name. I state that fact, and it is susceptible of proof; and I was not the only one who had that experience. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has remarked, this is a specimen of the tariff arrangement of the present Government. It is the old principle of taxing hundreds of thousands in order to benefit two or three individuals. I suppose the Government are determined to take this retrograde step, but I protest, in the name of the people, against necessary commodities being taxed for no other purpose than to enrich a few at the expense of the many.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I may say, for the information of the hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that it is not in a political sense I was discussing this question, because the only nurseryman in my county is secretary of the Reform Association. I may also inform the hon. gentleman, that before a nurseryman in the State of New York is allowed to sell in Michigan, he is compelled to give bonds that the character of the trees he sells is what he represents. If we had bonds of that kind given, perhaps there would be no objection to allow nurserymen to come over and sell fruit trees. I defy the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), with all his agricultural experience. to tell the difference between apple trees by the bark and the limbs, for this can only be done by an expert. There is no question but that the nurserymen of the State of New York at the end of the season have job lots of trees which they wish to dispose of, and these are sacrificed in the Canadian market. I do not desire to refer to the paymasters, who have been mentioned by the hon. gentleman for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and the statement, that the manufacturers are the paymasters of this Government, and of the hon. members on this side of the House. call us hirelings from time to time; but, if that be true, I would prefer to be paid by the manufacturers than to be paid from Washington.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon, gentleman's remarks have any force whatever it is that we ought to impose restrictions with respect to the admission of trees or nursery stock. If it has been found necessary in the State of Michigan to require bonds from New York nurserymen, it may be objection to the free importation of American nur. sery stock would be removed. Very well; let us impose the restriction, and let us guard the farmers' interests in every proper way. That is, however, quite a different matter from increasing the cost to the purchaser. No one will object to the imposition of proper restrictions with respect to the importation of nursery stock.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I have had an orchard planted nearly twenty years ago. When. ever farmers purchase from agents, either of American or Canadian nurserymen, let them purchase from known responsible men, and, I have no hesitation in saying, they will get trees true to name. I have planted a large number of trees, and I have also lost a large number; but I have lost more Canadian than American trees, and the American trees have proved to be true to name. During last winter all through Ontario, some nurseryman, a member of the Fruit Growers' Association, attended each farmers' institute for the purpose of instructing farmers with respect to beautifying their homes by planting fruit and ornamental trees. I believe this is a necessity in Ontario. Many of our farm dwellings have too naked an appearance, and do not look comfortable homes, for lack of fruit and ornamental trees; but the Government are not doing their duty to agriculturists in assisting them to beautify their homes and increase their orchards by placing heavy duties upon trees. I have found I can obtain trees more cheaply by sending to the nurseries on the other side of the line, than by obtaining them from agents. When we consider that the cost of an apple tree is from 12 to 14 cents, on which there is a duty of 2 cents per tree; when pear trees can be bought at from 25 to 30 cents, on which a duty of 4 cents per tree is imposed, I hold that the duty is in the interests neither of the nurserymen nor of the farmers. Such duties prevent the farmers from planting trees to increase their orchards as they would otherwise do.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I hope some alteration will be made in the rates of duties on the different trees. At present, the duty is the same on peach trees as on apple trees. There is a tax of 5 cents on each rose tree, the value of which ranges from 2 cents to $2.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME. Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That, as the time for the reception of reports from the Committee on Private Bills expires to-day, the same be extended until Thursday, the 1st May next.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

I have some changes to make in Mr. FOSTER. these items in reference to trees. In item 172, make gooseberry bushes 1 cent each instead of 2; us that if such restrictions were in existence his rose bushes (item 173), 2 cents each instead of 5; Mr. Armstrong. apple trees of all kinds (item 176), 3 cents each instead of 2.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The effect of that addition on apple trees is to add two or three times more than you reduce on the others, because we import more apple trees than we do all the others put together.

Mr. FOSTER. The apple trees are higher in value.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not say that you, especially, but the whole of you deserve to be hung on a sour apple tree for these duties.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you go marching along.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This duty on apple trees is a very heavy tax for our fruit growers in Nova Scotia, because, as I pointed out, we imported between $7,000 and $8,000 worth of apple trees. If the hon gentleman wants to ruise money for the benefit of some agriculturists in a few districts in Canada, he had better pass around the hat for a subscription at once, and then we will know who pays the duty, but he should not tax the whole people of the country for the benefit of a small industry such as that.

Mr. FOSTER. We propose to reduce plum trees (item 179) from 5 cents to 3 cents, and I hope to delight the heart of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), by stating that we will take off the 10 per cent. ad valorem on item 122.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And put it on the free list?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hear, hear; progress is being made.

Mr. BOWELL. Will that save the hanging on the sour apple tree?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, as far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, but we cannot afford to be too indiscriminate. There is a legend in the Hindoo which says that one good being saved the members of a similar Cabinet.

Cotton twine, 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does this duty amount to?

Mr. FOSTER. It will be about 35 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What reason has the hon. gentleman for putting 1 cent a pound on cotton twine?

Mr. FOSTER. It is now being made extensively in this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely 25 per cent. ad valorem is enough, in all conscience.

Mr. FOSTER If yarn pays a duty of 15 per cent. and 2 cents, it is not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rather you would allow the yarn to be put on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. A greater difficulty would have to be to net in that direction.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many mills are there that make cotton twine?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the most of them \max cotton twine.

Mr. WALDIE. There are two: one in Hamilton, and one in St. John, N.B.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman has any idea of the quantity of cotton twine consumed in the Dominion, and what the effect of this impost will be. We know what the imports are, but we ought to know also what sort of a burden this duty lays on the consumer. Twine is an article of very large consumption, and my impression is that this additional one cent per pound will be a very appreciable extra tax.

Mr. WELSH. A great deal of twine is used for various purposes. A considerable quantity is used in sail making and for fishermen's nets, and I do not see any reason for this additional duty upon it.

Twine for harvest binders of jute, manila or sisal, and of manila and sisal mixed, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is time there was a change. I think the time has arrived for putting twine on the free list. It is one of the things in which you might do some service for the farming community. We know that in the last Session or two the manufacturers of binding twine formed a combine and charged exorbitant rates to the They assigned many imaginable reasons farmers. for doing this—that the material had given out, and so forth-which is the ordinary ruse of combines. It is not only the amount of the tax paid into the Customs Department which indicates what the twine duty costs the farmer, but you have to consider the enhanced price. Surely, the hon. Minister, having regard to the hard times bearing on the farming community, might, to some extent, lighten their burdens; but nothing for the farmer can be placed on the free list; everything he requires must be taxed; there is no relief for him. is a tax of which the farmer might be relieved, and I move that this item be put on the free list.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. Minister says there is no change in this item. The duty on binding twine at present is $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty is 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WATSON. This is a decided increase in the duty. I had occasion to make some remarks on this matter the other night, and I was replied to by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly). That hon. gentleman read a long letter which he had received from the Massey Manufacturing Company of Toronto, and I will take the figures given in that letter to bear out my argument. Mr. Massey states:

"The price of a standard twine manufactured out of half manila and half sisal hemp we believe is worth in Chicago to-day, in wholesale consignments of say 100 tons, about 13½ cents to 14½ cents a pound, while pure manila is worth from 15 cents to 15½ cents a pound."

That is the wholesale price in Chicago, according to Mr. Massey, and no doubt he tried to make it appear as high as possible, and he admits that he charged the Manitoba farmers last season 19 to 20 cents a pound. That is an advance of 5 cents a pound on the American price, and if you allow 2 cents a pound for profit to the manufacturer for handling the twine, you have 3 cents a pound as the extra cost to the consumer, just what I claimed, the amount of the duty. The present arrangement is going to make it still higher.

Mr. FOSTER. We might as well have a fair understanding at the start. I tell the hon. gentleman that the duty on binding twine before was 25 per cent., and it is now 25 per cent. There has been no change.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I decidedly object to the duty of 25 per cent., and I will show that my estimate of the extra cost was entirely too moderate. I understand that 1½ cents a pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem was the duty in 1887, as I read it in the Customs law. But if we take 25 per cent. as the duty, we will find that on binding twine at 14 cents a pound wholesale, the price given by Mr. Massey, the duty amounts to 3½ cents a pound, and at 15 cents, it amounts to 33 cents a pound. That is an unfair and unjust tax on the farming community; and as I stand alone from the Province of Manitoba and the North-West in protesting against these high duties, I might give the reason which was assigned the other night by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) for supporting the tariff resolutions. He stated:

"With regard to the tariff, I might say that we in the North-West consider that during the past we have been one of the Provinces which has been a principal sufferer in that connection, inasmuch as we have nothing there that is protected."

That was the language used by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross), a gentleman who, on all occasions, supports the Government. But he did not stop there, he had to give a reason why the members from Manitoba and the North-West support the Government; and I am satisfied a great many people ask the question repeatedly how it is possible they should do so, when the whole tariff bears so very unfairly on the people of Manitoba and the North-West. He said:

"I may be asked why do we in the North-West, if we all suffer in regard to these duties, continue to support this Government. One of the principal reasons is that in the North-West we have more confidence in, if you call it so, the jovial optimism of the policy of the Government than in the policy indicated by the leader of the Opposition."

Well, he may appreciate keeping his feet under the Minister's mahogany and have a good time generally while his constituents are suffering very grievously under the tariff. In fact, his position puts me very much in mind of the story of an American who had a lot of hogs to drive to market. He was advised to ship them by rail, but insisted on driving them himself. He was asked, on his return, how he got along and how the speculation turned out. "Well," he replied, "there was not much money in it, but I had a hell of a time with the hogs." Well, the members from the North-West are having a hell of a time with the hogs while their constituents are suffering from the high duties. The tax imposed on the farmers of Manitoba for the purpose of maintaining four or five manufacturers of this binding twine, amounts to such a figure that the people of Manitoba could better afford to keep every man employed in that industry in one of the first-class hotels in the country. We are paying, according to Mr. Massey's own figures, 3²/₄ cents per pound duty on it. It was argued that because it was not imported we are not paying the duty, but that is nonsense. If the Government were obtaining revenue from the tax there might be some excuse; but last year only some $150 were realised on it by personal observation last summer, I may state, Mr. WATSON.

the Government, and the balance went into the pockets of the manufacturers. When Mr. Stairs, a manufacturer of binding twine, was in this House a few years ago and I protested against the duty, the First Minister said: Stairs supports me, and I support him. No doubt, these few manufacturers contribute largely to the support of hon, gentlemen opposite, and to protect them, the whole country is taxed. In 1887, the duty was made 14 cents per pound and 10 per cent. but to-day as the price of twine advances the ad valorem duty is increased to 25 per cent. I am in favor of putting this article on the free list.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this House should consent to the resolution placed in your hand. We know very well that the farmers to-day are not in a position to stand this drain on their resources. Take the amount of twine a farmer requires for his crop. He requires two and a half to three pounds for every acre taken off, which means 45 cents per acre for twine; or, in other words, it takes \$45 worth of twine to take off one hundred acres of crop. There are about three thousand tons of twine manufactured in Canada yearly, on which the manufacturers get 5 cents per pound extra, by means of this duty, because twine can be sold at $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, and it was sold last year at 18 cents per pound, which makes 5 cents per pound profit. Thus, on 3,000 tons of twine, the manufacturers have taken out of the farmers about \$300,000 extra on twine last year. This is unfair to the agriculturists in their present strained condition, and it is nothing short of extortion to continue this duty which enables the manufacturers of twine to collect out of them \$300,000 a year more than they would pay were it not for this duty.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). This is a very important question to the farmers. Three or four years ago the farmers had to pay $240 to $250 each for binders, because of the protection the manufacturers received; and to-day, on account of the duty on twine, it has become a very great question whether or not it will not pay better to throw the binders into a corner and turn again to the reapers, as the farmers find they can bind the grain cheaper in the old way than by buying the twine and using the binder. In this way the farmers are being deprived of the benefit of one of the most improved machines invented. In 1888, we were told by one of the most experienced men in Canada that we would require 3,000 tons of twine during that year. During last year we must have required 4,000 tons. The amount of duty on twine which went into the treasury was $14,547, but something like $300,000 must have been taken out of the farmers and put into the pockets of the manufacturers, and preventing him from deriving the benefit which he should derive from improved machinery. If it had not been that labor has been so scarce during the last season or two, I believe, the binder would have been thrown into the corner by many farmers.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I do not suppose 1 can say anything to influence the Ministry in reference to this matter, but it is one upon which the farmers feel very strongly. I suppose Ministers do not feel at liberty to accept any suggestion as to abolishing the duty altogether, but, from my own that as soon as the hurried part of the harvest was over, it was a question with the farmers in my neighborhood, whether they would not drop their high-priced binders and go back to the old selfrake. As far as the difference between the manufacturers in Canada and those in the United States are concerned, the hon. gentleman should know that the manufacturers in the United States have to pay a duty on their raw material, before they commence to manufacture this twine at all, while our manufacturers obtain their raw material free. I think, a more moderate protection should be enough for us, when the Americans are handicapped in that way. I can assure the Minister that he could not do anything more satisfactory to the farmers, than to make a moderate reduction on binding twine. This duty is one of those irritating things which people notice particularly and which is certainly a great source of irritation to the agricultural population.

Mr. ELLIS. There must be a very large profit made in the manufacture of this article. Before the Commission on Combines last year, a gentleman named Morris gave evidence, a part of which I will quote from the Journals of the House. He was examined by Mr. Gillmor, as follows:—

"Q. Mr. Connors is in your combination? A. He was in, but there is no combination now.

"Q. How many men were there in the combination? A. Five.

"Q. You proportioned out what each one should make? A Yes; we each had a stated percentage.

"Q. What proportion of all the quantity that was to be made for Canada did he make? A. On binder twine last year, he had a percentage, I think, of 10 per cent. of the whole; and, I think, he manufactured about two tons of twine.

".Q. How much did he get last year of the pool, as you call it, as near as you can tell? A. I think about $6,000 or $7,000. Perhaps hardly as much as that; it might be $5,000.
"Q. For not making rope? A. No; not making binder twine."

Here is a gentleman who made only two tons of this binder twine and received $5,000 as his share of profit. I think a suggestion of that kind should be taken advantage of by the Ministry and the duty should be reduced in view of all the circumstances of the case.

Motion of Mr. Mulock negatived—Yeas, 36; nays, 60.

Twine of all kinds not elsewhere specified, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. ELLIS. What is the increase on this?

Mr. FOSTER. 5 per cent.

Mr. ELLIS. This, I presume, applies to lath ties?

Mr. FOSTER. If they are twine, it will.

In the city of St. John, a large number of mills are employed in manufacturing refuse lumber into laths. The lath ties are used to tie up these laths in bundles which are sent back to the United States. It seems hard to tax this twine at 30 per cent. It was taxed at 25 per cent. last year, and an arrangement has been made both in Canada and in the United States as to the price on these laths. The Canadian maker gets the full benefit of that pool, which was made before this increase was spoken of, and he has the clear benefit of the difference between this and the old tariff, while he gets this laid down in St. John from the United States, for 1½ cents a pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What reason is there for the increase of 5 per cent. on this article?

Mr. FOSTER. Because it is being made in this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And for the sake of two or three confounded manufacturers, for the sake of the paltry support or the paltry subsidy which the Minister expects from them, he is going to tax this article of universal utility.

Mr. MULOCK. Probably this 5 per cent, is the subsidy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose that may be so, and that these corrupt animals will make that return to the Government.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like the Minister to tell me if he does not think that 25 per cent. on this binder twine is sufficient under the circumstances, seeing that you can land it in the city of St. John for less than the St. John manufacturer could make it for even with a protection of 25 per cent., to which you are now adding 5 per cent.

Umbrellas, parasols and sun-shades of all kinds and materials, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is another increase.

This is an increase which is Mr. FOSTER. designed to assist the industry of manufacturing umbrellas, parasols and sun-shades in the Dominion of Canada. Last year we imported $303,646 worth of these articles. There does not seem to be any good reason why a large proportion of these shall not be supplied by makers in Canada. The duty has, therefore, been raised from 30 to 35 per cent. The manufacturers have to pay 30 per cent. on the silk which forms the top of the umbrella, and also a duty on the other coverings, according to the grade of the umbrella; and the manufactured article being placed at 30 per cent., with the silk stuff at the same rate, gave very little opportunity for the industry to develop itself in this country. It is, therefore, proposed to add 5 per cent. to the duty and make it 35 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was in hopes that the factory was in existence.

Mr. FOSTER. It has already been started in the city of Toronto, and umbrellas will be more largely made in Montreal, where that industry has been established for some years.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then the factory must have been started before the additional duty was put on?

Mr. FOSTER. It was struggling, and we propose to help it.

Mr. MULOCK. When was it established?

Mr. FOSTER. One was started in Toronto five or six months ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect that the parties will manufacture all the umbrellas required to replace those which have been imported?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not expect they will manufacture all that we have heretofore imported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does he suppose they will manufacture one-half?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell how soon they will manufacture a-half or a-third, but I think the protection is sufficient to enable them to keep their industry going. If they manufacture one half, I shall be very glad.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As one-half the total tax on the present importation would amount to about $60,000, what the hon. gentleman is now proposing to do is deliberately to take $60,000 of the people's money in order to subsidise these two manufacturers, a sum representing the interest of two millions of money, if the hon. gentleman's expectations are fulfilled and they manufacture to the extent of one-half the present importation. That is the practical result.

Mr. FOSTER. That is only the theoretical result.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If they manufacture equal to one-half of our importation we must lose the $60,000. The hon. gentleman knows that, as a rule, the duty paid is but an insignificant proportion of the total cost of the article. It may be more in this case; that is a point on which he should inform the Committee. Taking his own figures, there would be an apparent loss of $60,000, less the duty received, on the articles manufactured. Can he tell us what that would be? Before introducing a proposition of this kind he ought to know what it would involve.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend should see that it is very difficult to tell what is involved in a proposition of that kind. It is absurd for me to go into a fanciful calculation of what will be done upon a matter which is but an experiment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The point I put can be answered without knowing whether these people will manufacture one-third, or one-file, or one-quarter, or any proportion. I want to know what percentage of the 35 per cent. duty is represented by the cost of the material, which is about 30 per cent. That is a reasonable question, and one which should be settled between himself and the Minister of Customs.

Mr. FOSTER. I think probably about one-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does he mean that the cost of the material as imported is one-half? which is a large proportion.

Mr. FOSTER. If it were silk covering, it would be more than one-half.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These umbrellas are by no means all of silk. A large proportion are of the inferior quality. He does not distinguish in his tariff what is silk and what is gingham, or alpaca, or other qualities.

Mr. BOYLE. I cannot understand by what method of computation the hon. gentleman arrives at the figures he has just given to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will explain when you have done.

Mr. BOYLE. If the manufacturer of umbrellas imports his covering, his handles, his ribs, he pays on the cost of these 30 per cent. into the revenue, while he only receives 5 per cent. protection. The history of all these manufactures is about the same. The cheaper and more popular class of goods used by the common people will be manufactured in his country, and the competition of the two factories will bring down the price to a reasonable figure. The higher priced goods, the tony goods used by the aristocracy, will be imported as usual, and will pay into the revenue 35 per cent. ad valorem. I think, therefore, the country will be benefited by this method of taxation, which will enable the people to buy their goods more cheaply, and will collect an additional tax from the wealthy, who are well able to bear it.

Sir Richard Cartwright.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The tax h would receive on $340,000 worth of importe umbrellas—

Mr. FOSTER. $303,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The tax on that would be, speaking roughly, about $120,000, more or less.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty collected is $91,000. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But you are making it 35 per cent., and you must add to the amount one-fifth of $90,000, which will make about $120,000. That would be $50,000 less to the revenue by the result of this tax, supposing it resulted in the manufacture of one-half the articles which are now imported. Against that there is to be deducted the duty received on the raw material, whatever that may amount to.

Mr. BOYLE. Four-fifths

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; the Minister supposes one-half to be manufactured.

Mr. BOYLE. It would be about four-fifths.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the increased loss of duty would be also four-fifths.

Mr. BOYLE. No; four-fifths of the material will be imported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is likely enough. However, in all probability, even assuming the Minister is correct, one-half the cost of the umbrella only is in labor, and the other half in the cost of the raw material, which is a high proportion. It may be correct in this case; I cannot say. He would then lose the $55,000, less the 30 per cent. on what would be imported, which might be put at, perhaps, $20,000 or $25,000. There would be a loss, then, of $30,000, if the reduction of the importation does not exceed the figures the hongentleman gave.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In addition to that, if the same quantity is imported, the country will pay $15,000 to $20,000 more each year for their umbrellas than they are paying now.

Mr. CURRAN. Yes; and getting them cheaper.

Mr. MULOCK. It is possible to discuss this question in two ways. We have the importation of the cotton umbrella and the silk umbrella. I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that last year the value of the imported cotton parasols, umbrellas and sunshades, was $94,017, the duty upon which was $28,205.10. For umbrella materials for the same class of goods, I suppose, the duty collected was $16. The principal item of umbrellas imported was the silk for the more wealthy classes, while the umbrellas for the poorer people were imported in very small quantities last year. Was there a manufactory last year in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. They were manufactured in

Mr. MULOCK. For how many years have they been manufactured?

Mr. CURRAN. They have been manufactured for the last five years, at any rate.

Mr. MULOCK. I cannot speak of the importations prior to this date, but for the year 1889 there were only $94,000 worth of umbrellas imported, so that would not anything like supply the demand of the people here. It is quite clear, therefore, that the local manufacturers were able to manufacture for the last five years, under the protection they then had, all the umbrellas the people required. This one factory had a market of five millions of people.

Mr. CURRAN. There are several makers, of all kinds, in Montreal.

Mr. MULOCK. It is extraordinary that, this being the case, the price of manufactured articles should be kept so high. The Government are imposing this additional tax of 5 per cent. to put it into the pockets of the manufacturers, first taking it out of the pockets of the people. The increase is wholly unnecessary for any other purpose than that of enriching the four or five factories that are so ably represented on the floor of this House by the hon member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). Why should the same duty be imposed on silk umbrellas as on those of lower qualities? If an additional duty is required, it should be imposed on the better qualities, and the Government should have some commiseration for the poorer classes of the people.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty is an ad valorem one.

Mr. MULOCK. It is, but this is an increase of 5 per cent. It is not required for any purpose, except to toy with, and to carry on extravagant expenditures. This increase of 5 per cent will fall on the umbrellas of the poor people. Had they been so prosperous under the care and management of the Administration that they can bear heavier burdens? Do the Government want a little re-distribution of their wealth; or are they carrying out the natural effects of this policy, to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. There is no possible defence for this increase. The Minister of Finance cannot offer an explanation in regard to it. The hon. gentleman says that umbrellas to the value of $325,000 were imported, and, therefore, we should increase the tax on umbrellas. Why does he not tell us honestly and candidly, that a deputation came from Montreal, met him in the Secret Chamber, and took him by the throat and said: We must have a higher duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I could not have said so, because it would not have been true.

Mr. MULOCK. Who advocated the case on behalf of the people who were the consumers? No one appeared except those who advocated an increase of duty, and the Government are coming down in this particular case as they usually do. The only reductions we hear of are reductions made on the demand of manufacturers. If the manufacturers come here, or persons who are not going to pay the bill, their representations are listened to by the Government; but when the consumer comes he is never listened to, but he is taxed. There will be an end, I suppose, to this state of things some day.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has pursued his usual tactics of getting very violent when he has a weak case. The result as regards the manufacture of umbrellas will be, as it has been in regard to the manufacture of every article in this country, cheapen the article, and it has been the result of additional protection in nine out of every ten cases.

Mr. MULOCK. Is binding twine cheaper?

Mr. WALLACE. We have the evidence of Mr. Massey that in the case of binding twine, he had to pay as much for it in the United States as in Canada, and he had to pay the duty on bringing it into this country in addition. In cotton goods they are 100 per cent. better quality than we obtained when inferior articles were imported into this country. The same remark applies to agricultural implements. We have imposed additional duties on implements of every kind, and I defy any hon, gentleman to take any implement and show that its price has been increased, although there has been an increase in duty. On the contrary, there has been a large decrease in price. Only a few years ago, $280 was paid for a selfbinder that would not compare with the article for which, to-day, less than half that money is paid. Take any article of hardware, cotton and woollen goods, and we have the same result. Additional protection has been given to the manufacturers of umbrellas and parasols, and if it is sufficient to cause the manufacture of them to any extent here, it will result in the article being produced at a lower price.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon, gentlemen opposite will contend that so soon as two or three establishments are under way, the prices will be lowered. If the hon, gentlemen opposite have faith in their nostrum they should double the taxes all round, in order that goods may be obtainable for next to nothing.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Wallace) is posing in a different character from that he assumed a year ago. was then acquiring fame by his antagonism to the results of this protective policy. He was chairman of a Committee to investigate the causes of the high prices under the combine system that prevails in Canada. He having assisted to build up a Chinese wall, placing the people at the mercy of the manufacturers, he got the Combines Committee appointed, and after sitting in incubation for some time they brought in a report, which, for the time being, covered the hon. gentleman with glory and fame. He is now, however, engaged in two businesses; he is creating a disease, and afterwards he is called in as the healing physician.

Mr. WALLACE. What did we find in that enquiry made by the Combines Committee? We found that the most obnoxious combinations were not manufacturers; we found there was no combination in woollen manufactures or in any class of agricultural implements. We found that the coal dealers of Canada had a combination, and although we found some combinations existing among manufacturers, those most hurtful to the people were not connected in any way with the manufacturing industries. If these existed, the measure we brought in last year, as it passed the Senate, and which we hope to amend this year, will cure any of the combinations hurtful to the interests of the people.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has told us that the price of manufactured goods has been greatly reduced with a high tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. I say, by being manufactured in this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose it was the increase of price that stimulated increase of production. But the hon, gentleman says no. We put on a tax and on account of it we have diminished the price, and as the price is reduced the production is increased. No doubt he will tell us that the imposition of duties on wheat, barley and corn will act in the same way. no doubt he will go among his agricultural supporters and tell them that by the imposition of taxes on corn, wheat and barley he has succeeded in diminishing the price and in securing a larger production. The home market is beneficial to the farmer, he thinks, because by the high taxes the farmer produces very much more than before, and produces it at very much less cost. Certainly, if the tariff operates to diminish the cost of manufactured goods, it must have exactly the same effect in diminishing the cost of producing cereals. The hon. gentleman will be consistent in explaining to his agricultural supporters how he secured the home market, and he will explain to the manufacturers how they are able to obtain breadstuff, at very much lower prices than ever before. I should think that the hon. gentleman would scarcely venture to address to the House arguments of that sort. They are hardly suitable for a backwoods school-house, and not being capable of imposing on the population of these districts, the hon, gentleman ought hardly to impose on the time of the Committee by saying that we put on a tax to put up the price of this article, and that we put on a tax to put down the price of some other article; both of which are produced in this country

Mr. WALLACE. We, on this side of the House, will go back to the farmers and tell them that our policy has secured to the Canadian farmers the Canadian markets.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). At a higher price.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; at an increased price in many instances, but in every case that they will have a secure market for their products, which is a most important point. We will also tell them that the members of the Opposition were anxious to bring in the products of the American farmers free of duty so as to drive the Canadian farmers out of their own markets. We can tell them in addition to that, that we have secured a tariff to-day which we believe will be a pretty fair and suitable protection for the farmers of Canada and which they are justly entitled to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would also quote such facts in illustration as this: that in 1878, the price of barley was from $1.10 to $1.15 a bushel, and that to-day it is from 32 to 35 cents a bushel.

Mr. McMULLEN. I challenge the member for York (Mr. Wallace) next year, that if he will reorganise his Committee on Combines, I will put a being drawn witness in the box who will prove that binders proposed no were manufactured this year and turned out of 15 per cent.

the shop at a net cost of between $78 and $80, and that they were placed in the hands of the farmer at $140, because of a combine arrangement by the men who manufacture these binders. I want the hon. member to take that down and to remember it. The hon. gentleman also says that prints have been made in Canada, and that they are cheaper now than they were before.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not refer to prints. I said cotton goods.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, printed cotton goods. Those which are manufactured in Canada are of a very common style, and if you want to get a decent print, you have to buy an imported one. The people of this country are paying $166,000 a year extra duty for the purpose of supporting that one small printing establishment.

An hon. MEMBER. They do not print.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, if they do not print it is worse, because we are paying this $166,000 for nothing at all. That duty was put on ostensibly for the purpose of aiding that particular institution, which was brought into existence by the President of the Council, who stood at the head of the institution, and who advocated that this increased duty should be imposed, because they were going to manufacture all the prints that were to be used in this country. It is unfair that this country should be subjected to enormous taxation under the plea that the Government is trying to encourage home industries, when they are in reality only putting a law on the Statutebook to rob the consumers out of their just rights.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to say to the Committee that the discussion for the last half-hour has been under the item relating to umbrellas. If the Committee would select those items which are a little more appropriate to the discussion, it would be better. I say that to both sides.

Watches, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to raise any objection to this, but my impression was that the duty was unduly high for revenue purposes, inasmuch as these are articles which used to be smuggled in, to a considerable extent, when the duty was high.

Watch cases, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CHARLTON. Why is the duty on watch cases higher than the duty on watches?

Mr. FOSTER. It is in order to help the industry here. Watch cases are made in the country, watch movements cannot be made in the country, and they come in at a low rate of duty, and the duty on the watch complete is kept at its original rate of 25 per cent.

Wire, covered with cotton, linen, silk or other material, 35 per cent, ad valorem.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the reason of the increase?

Mr. FOSTER. It has been raised from 25 per cent. to 35 per cent. because wire of brass or copper, which was formerly on the free list, has been placed under a duty of 15 per cent. It is already being drawn in Hamilton and Montreal, and it is proposed now to give it a moderate protection of 15 per cent.

Pails, tubs. churns, brooms, brushes and manufactures of wood, N.E.S., and wood pulp, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MULOCK. In connection with this item, I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that convict labor, in penitentiaries, is now being used for the manufacture of woodenware. understand that some of the manufacturers of woodenware have already laid their remonstrances before the Government. It seems an extraordinary way to protect the manufacturers of woodenwaie, to put on duties against outside free labor, and at the same time to allow the free labor of Canada to be interfered with by convict labor. I have no doubt there are difficulties in the way of finding employment for convict labor, but it is the duty of the Government to see that it does not come into competition with free labor. I see by the report of the hon. Minister of Justice that his attention has been called to this matter, and I hope he will be able to inform the House that it is to be discon-

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The only penitentiary at which woodenware is manufactured is the Dorchester penitentiary, which is an amalgamation of the two penitentiaries that used to be at Halifax and St. John. The machinery which had been operated for years in those prisons was removed to Dorchester, and has not been added to in any way, and the output at Dorchester is not greater than it was in former years in the penitentiaries at Halifax and St. John. The product has not in any way come into competition with the product of free labor of the like manufacture, except as regards the supply. The prices we have always instructed our officers to keep up to the trade prices. That has been well understood. There was a complaint made recently that we had cut the prices so as to compete unfairly with free labor. That was investigated, and the fact was found to be quite the reverse—that while we had kept to the trade price, the free labor manufacturers were actually under-selling the product of the penitentiary. But we came to a conclusion eventually, which was satisfactory to both parties, by which the manufacturers outside agreed to purchase from the Government the whole product of the penitentiary.

Mr. MULOCK. If all the manufacturers of woodenware in the country, and other industries, are satisfied with this arrangement, no one else can complain. I am not aware what induced them to make this bargain with the Government, but it is more than probable that it was "Hobson's choice" with them—that the Government insisted on maintaining their factory of woodenware, and offered this as a compromise, and that the manufacturers accepted it as the lesser evil. Nevertheless, that does not meet the case at all. The convicts are manufacturing woodenware, and to that extent are displacing occupation and employment for free men outside. The manufacturers may have made this bargain with the Government, but what about the laborers were they represented? Did the Knights of Labor and the other labor organisations of the country come down and agree to this arrangement?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They never made any complaint on the subject, nor anybody else, except the manufacturers themselves.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) seems to be extremely inconsistent in his argument, because, while he would is a specific duty, and will of necessity fall much 112 wish to exclude the product of convict labor from coming into competition with the product of the free labor of the country, he is quite willing to admit the product of the labor of other countries without restriction. This class of men, although not the most desirable in the world, are consumers at home, and even if their product did come into competition with that of free labor, it would be, to my mind, less objectionable for that reason than the competition of foreign labor.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon member for East Grey approves, then, of convict labor coming into competition with free labor. I am glad to know where he stands. Is there ever a proposition made by the Administration, of which he does not approve?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I did not say whether I approved of it or disapproved of it; but I showed the inconsistency of the hon. member for North York in wishing to exclude the competition of convict labor at home, and admitting the competition of foreign labor.

Mr. WALDIE. I think the hon. member for North York is perfectly justified. He has a manufactory in his own constituency that he is bound to look after, and I do not think the Government should destroy it by putting prison labor in conflict with it.

Mr. MULOCK. There was at one time a manufactory in the riding of North York, but it was gerrymandered out of the riding.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think the hon, gentleman will remember that the chief manufacture of woodenware is by the convicts of the Central Prison at Toronto. They carry on a large manufacture.

Mr. MULOCK. No, they do not.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; they carry on the manufacture of woodenware there very extensively.

Mr. MULOCK. No; it is not the case. The hon, gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Our institution at Dorchester does not send a bucket, or a tub, or anything else to Ontario. Every dollar's worth is sold in St. John or Halifax.

Mr. BLAKE. Let every tub stand on its own bottom.

Fibre ware, indurated fibre ware, vulcanised fibre ware and all articles of like material, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a decrease. It was nonenumerated, and rated at 35 per cent. before.

Clothing, ready-made, and wearing apparel of every description composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca goat or other like animal, made up by the tailor, seamstress or manufacturer, N.O.P., 10 cents per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish, after the word "description," to put in "including horse clothing, shaped."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. increase the hon. gentleman proposes, and why?

Mr. FOSTER. $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not a very large increase, but it is in a bad direction. It heavier on the cheaper articles of clothing than on any other. The case was bad enough before, but it is made very much worse by adding 21 cents per pound. In the case of some of the coarse clothing, this will amount to a very large duty, coupled with the 25 per cent.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). While the Government are placing a heavier duty on coarse woollens, they are careful not to protect the farmers by putting a duty on the wool we raise. They allow the wool not raised in this country to come in free, and thus act unjustly towards the farmers who have to pay the extra duty on the manufactured goods. True, there is a duty on the wool similar to that which is raised in Canada, but that does not protect the farmers, because we have to export a large amount of the same description of wool. If the Government are going to impose an extra duty on woollen goods, why should they not consider the farmers by imposing a duty on the wool we raise. I would like to call the attention of the Committee to the statement of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) with respect to what Mr. Massey said about binding twine. The hon. gentleman stated that Mr. Massey said he could purchase binding twine as cheaply in Canada as in the United States. But what did Mr. Massey say before the Committee on Trade Combinations. Here is his evidence:

"Q. If you can buy twine elsewhere and get a better bargain, what is your complaint? If you are obliged from the combination, that would be a different thing? A. I say we can buy it and lay it down cheaper than the Canadians, after paying the duty."

It is unfair that the heavier class of clothing, which is imported into this country in a manufactured condition in considerable quantities, should have to pay a specific duty of 10 cents per pound. strikes at the poorer quality of clothing, and in this way works an injustice to the workingmen.

Mr. BOYLE. That is a case where specific duties are justifiable. The only clothing made up, which we import under any circumstances, is that made out of English shoddy, the sweepings of factories, which weigh heavily, and represent small value, and are of no use whatever. are very deceptive in appearance, and have no wearing qualities, but sell because they are cheap. The Government act wisely in prohibiting by a specific duty the importation of such goods.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman will not deny that the duty will apply to clothing made of good wool as well as that made of shoddy. objection raised by the hon, member for Huron should be considered; and, if the specific duty is to be advanced 2½ cents per pound on woollen goods, the hon. Finance Minister should take into consideration the interests of the farmer, and impose a duty of 3 cents per pound on all grades of wool, for his protection.

Mr. FOSTER. In this item (201) there has been no change in the duty. That has always been the rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It used to be 7½ cents.

Mr. FOSTER. No; 10 cents and 25 per cent. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, it was the hon. gentleman who led us into error.

Sir Richard Cartwright.

Yeast cakes, compressed yeast and baking powders in packages of one pound and over or in bulk, 6 cents ner pound.

Mr. FOSTER. After the words "one pound and over "strike out the words "or in bulk" and add "not exceeding fifty pouunds.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is that ad valorem?

Mr. FOSTER. They run about 30 per cent. I propose a new item:

Compressed yeast in bulk or mass of not less than 50 pounds, 4 cents per pound.
Uncolored cotton fabrics, namely, scrims and window scrims of cotton, plain or colored, cambric cloths, muslin apron checks, brilliants, cords, piques diapers, lenos, mosquito nettings: Swiss, jaconets and cambric muslins, and plain, striped or checked lawns, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you added to the duty there?

Mr. FOSTER. 5 per cent. in the main, though some articles are reduced from 30 to 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the use of adding 5 per cent. ? You say you do not want revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. Most of these have borne a duty of 20 per cent. Within the last few years the cotton manufacturers have begun to make them of good quality, and it is thought that 25 per cent. is not too large a duty for all this class of goods.

Manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the Alpaca goat or other like animals, viz.: Blankets and fiannels of every description; cloths, doeskins. cassimeres, tweeds, coatings, overcoatings, felt cloth of every description, N.E.S.; horse-collar cloth; yarn, knitting yarn, fingering yarn, worsted yarn, knitted goods, viz.:—shirts and drawers, and hosiery, N.E.S., 10 cents per pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the average weight of a pair of blankets? Does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the hon, gentleman is proposing to increase the duty on these articles, when he proposes a tax which will fall heavily on every settler coming into the country, he should be aware of the manner in which the tax will fall.

Mr. FOSTER. I am informed it would be from five to seven pounds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you have a specific duty of 60 cents and 20 per cent. ad valorem on a pair of blankets. Supposing they were worth on the average $4 a pair, there would be a specific and ad valorem duty of $1.40 on one pair of blankets. In a country like this where a large portion of our population are exposed to a very inclement winter, though not an unwholesome one, it appears to me that such a duty is a distinct discouragement to settlement, and a serious tax on the mass of the population, and the hon. gentleman should give some better reason for burdening the population in matters of this kind.

Blankets are cheaper in this Mr. BOYLE. country than in almost any other country in the worl d.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And, therefore, we import many thousands of them.

Mr. BOYLE. The manufacturer's price varies from 35 cents to 45 cents a pound, but this is aside from the question, as we can get all the blankets we require as cheaply as they can be bought in England. Unless people want blankets made of fine Saxony wool, colored and ornamented in style, they can get all they require here. The same thing applies to clothing, This tax will prevent a number of spurious goods coming into this country, and it is in the interests of the people to prevent their purchasing that class of goods.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If there is the smallest particle of foundation for the statements made by the hon. gentleman, then this tax is wholly superfluous. He tells us that blankets can be manufactured in Canada cheaper than in any other part of the world. Why, then, should we impose a duty of $1.40 on a pair of blankets. What possible use is there in that? If the hon. gentleman's statement is correct, he ought to second him in moving that the duty be abolished, so that those parties who prefer to get blankets where they can get the best, may have the privilege. Now, I happen to know that they cannot be bought in Canada at all as cheaply or as good as they can be bought from the other countries. I can obtain far better blankets from England than I can from Canada for the same price.

Mr. WALLACE. You cannot do anything of the kind. You can get a good quality of Canadian blanket made of pure Canadian wool, with no shoddy, a white blanket, because a white blanket is pure wool.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. What does the hon. gentleman mean?

Mr. BLAKE. I was cheering the ridiculous observation, that a white blanket is necessarily pure wool.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, always pure wool. A white blanket made from pure wool is bought to-day in Canada for 42½ cents a pound, of excellent quality, that makes $3.40 for the blanket. It takes about ten pounds of wool to make an eight-pound blanket, and that wool is worth about 21 or 22 cents a pound, say about $2.15 or $2.20 for the wool contained in that blanket. The balance is for the profit of the manufacturer and the profit of the wholesale dealer; so that there is no duty paid on the article at all, and the Canadian consumer gets the cheapest article that is made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And as a proof of that, last year this deluded Canadian consumer imported from England $48,230 worth of blankets, and he was idiot enough to pay $20,947 in duty. Argument is at an end, I must say, when we hear hon. gentlemen, in the teeth of the Trade Reports, make such assertions as we have just heard. As to the statement that white blankets can only be manufactured of pure wool, I am afraid the hon. member for York is a long way behind the age. He will find that his talented constituents, many of them, understand very well how to mix inferior wool with inferior shoddy.

Mr. TISDALE. Will the hon. gentleman state where he ever saw a white blanket made of shoddy?

Mr. BLAKE. I can say that so far as it being the case that white blankets are necessarily made of pure wool, that wholesale merchants have to apply chemical tests to white blankets to find out how nearly they are of pure wool or otherwise. I have seen those tests applied myself and the result of them.

Mr. SPROULE. Did you find there was shoddy in them?

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. Shoddy is wool, and the chemical test the hon. gentleman refers to is to determine not whether shoddy is mixed with it, but to determine whether there is cotton mixed with it. That is the class that is imported, but our Canadians manufacture pure wool white blankets. Those he speaks of, half cotton and half wool, are the imported blankets. The chemical test he speaks of will not distinguish shoddy and wool.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course not, because the chemical test is one which eliminates the vegetable and leaves the animal matter. What I said was that it was a ridiculous observation to say that white blankets were necessarily pure wool. I have seen the test applied with very unsatisfactory results to white cotton blankets.

Mr. WALLACE. What I said was that the white Canadian blanket had no shoddy in it, and the hon. gentleman knows I made that statement.

Mr. BLAKE. And what the hon. gentleman said was that it was of pure wool.

Mr. WALLACE. I said if it was of pure wool, there was no shoddy in it.

Wrought scrap iron and scrap steel, being waste or refuse wrought iron or steel and fit only to be re-manufactured, the same having been in actual use, not to include cuttings or clippings which can be used as iron or steel without re-manufacture, $2 per ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this scrap supposed to be worth? Just now what would you call that ad valorem?

Mr. BOWELL. $16 to $20.

Wrought iron or steel sheet or plate cuttings or clippings, as cut at the rolling mills, and fit only for re-rolling and to be used for such purpose only, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BOWELL. This is one of those explanatory clauses of which I spoke last night. Under the former item, 211, they used to import sheets of steel complete, three or four feet long. Steel plates are used in shipyards where they put very long sheets of steel upon the vessels, and, in some cases, have to cut off three or four or five feet lengths, and they contend that that was a waste and a scrap of the shipyard. The former tariff provided that the material should be of such a character as was only fit for re-manufacture. We have had a great deal of difficulty in cases of this kind, hence we have rearranged the two items, making it explicit.

Sulphuric ether, 5 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a new item. It has been non-enumerated before. The United States duty is 50 cents a pound, prohibitory in fact.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is impossible, almost.

Mr. FOSTER. There are many things in the tariff of that country to surprise us.

Perhaps the Finance Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Minister will tell us what is the nature of it.

Mr. FOSTER. It is used in medicine and the My hon. friend, probably, has an indistinct idea of what it is used for. Before we take up Schedule B, there are some items which I wish to add:

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the following items in the Schedules to the Act 49 Victoria, Chapter 33, Revised Statutes, intituled: "An Act to amend the Duties of Customs," viz.: Schedule "A," items numbered 29, 281, 417, and to make further provisions, by adding to the Schedules to the said Act as follows, viz. —

SCHEDULE "A."

214a. Bird cages, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.
214b. Brass and copper nails, rivets and burrs, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.
214c. Boots and shoes, N.E.S., twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

214d. All manufactures of leather, N.E.S., twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.
214e. Barrels containing linseed oil, twenty-five cents

214f. Lime-juice, fortified with or containing not more than twenty-five per cent. of proof spirits, sixty cents per gallon.

And when containing more than twenty-five per cent. of proof spirits, two dollars per gallon.

214g. Lime-juice, sweetened, and fruit syrups, N.O.P., 214p. Lime-juice, sweetened, and fruit syrups, N.O.P., forty cents per gallon.

214h. Lime-juice, and other fruit juices, N.O.P., non-alcoholic, and not sweetened, ten cents per gallon.
214i. Granite and freestone, dressed; all other building stone, except marble, and all manufactures of stone, N.E.S., thirty per cent. ad valorem.
214j. Grindstones, not mounted, and not less than twelve inches in diameter, two dollars per ton.
214k. Ships or vessels under Canadian register repaired abroad—on the value of such repairs, whether to hull, riggings, machinery, or fittings, except in case of an accident to the ship or vessels on an outward voyage necessitating repairs in order to enable her to return to Canada, in which case such necessary repairs only shall not be dutiable.
214l. India rubber clothing or clothing made waterproof with India rubber, N.E.S., thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

214m. India rubber surfaced waterproof clothing, ten cents per pound and twenty-five per cent. ad valorem. 214n. Biscuits of all kinds, not sweetened, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem

In the item of bird cages, which were formerly at a duty of 30 per cent., we have raised the duty, as has been explained to the Committee, and I propose to give 5 per cent. additional to the bird cage manufacturers. Brass and copper nails and rivets were formerly 25 per cent. I propose to place them in the list, making them 35 per cent. for the same reason. Boots and shoes, N.E.S., 25 per cent. ad valorem. They were before the same, except that this is meant to include a variety of shoes made from felt, which the Customs were necessarily ruling under the high duties of the material of which they were made, as cloth. are a very cheap shoe, and we put them at 25 per cent. Wire, 25 per cent. ad valorem, the same as at present. Now that we have made linseed oil subject to a specific duty, it is proposed to place a duty on the barrels, at 25 cents each barrel, to prevent any dispute as to value of barrels. This is less than the 20 per cent. There are three divisions of lime juice. That containing 25 per cent. of proof spirits will be dutiable at 60 cents per gallon, and when it contains more than 25 per I hope such an appeal will not be cent of proof spirits it will be subject to a duty of without due attention being paid to it. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Lime juice, sweetened, and fruit $2 per gallon. syrups, 40 cents per gallon; lime juice, unsweetened and non-alcoholic, 10 cents per gallon.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What was the duty before?

Mr. FOSTER. Some varieties were unenumerable; the alcoholic varieties were rated among the spirits.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What rate will be charged on lime juice from the West Indies?

Mr. FOSTER. If sweetened and non-intoxicant, 10 cents per gallon. Granite and freestone, dressed, and all other building stone, except marble, 30 per cent., formerly 20 per cent. These are varieties of stone native to this country, and the duty is not placed on the raw material, but on the dressed material, so that labor may be employed on it here. Grindstones were formerly simply entered as such, and all kinds of fancy grindstones, such as are used by jewellers, were brought in at $2 a ton duty, and it is proposed to restrict the item to: Grindstones, not mounted, and not less than 12 inches in diameter, $2 a ton. India rubber clothing is at present subject to a duty of 35 per cent. In regard to the India rubber surface water-proof clothing, it is proposed to change the duty, and make it specific and additional and the surface water-proof clothing. valorem, 10 cents per pound and 25 per cent. That will add a little to the duty on the heavier qualities, while it will reduce the duties on the lighter qualities. Biscuits of all kinds, not sweetened, are now 20 per cent., being on the unenumerated list. The duty on lard has been raised 1 cent a pound, and a calculation shows that the addition of 5 cents will equalise, for the present, any increase that has taken from raising the duty on lard. Accordingly, biscuits will be 25 per cent. ad valorem, instead of 20 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have received a letter from the Caughnawaga tribe of Indians. It is as follows:-

"CAUGHNAWAGA, 5th April, 1890.

"To Hon. P. MITCHELL, "Ottawa.

"Ottawa.

"Dear Sie,—We the undersigned Indians beg to inform you that us and our whole tribe feel that we are unjustly treated by the high duty forced on beads that we use to manufacture beadwork of which the largest number of our tribe have no other means to earn their living by—only to manufacture beadwork and the largest portion of it is sold in the United States and is admitted free of duty; if it was not passed in the United States free a large number of our Indian people would almost starve, and now since the new tariff the Montreal merchants we have to buy from having advanced prices on their beads, these high prices we are forced to pay for beads will lead us to starvation. We have had it very hard to make a living before the new tariff (35 per cent.) We humbly beg will you please be kind enough to look down on us poor Indians and get the bead duty repealed and reduced to 25 per cent. By doing this you will deeply and greatly oblige us in need.

"We are very truly,
"Your humble and obedients servants, mark I hope such an appeal will not be passed over Mr. FOSTER. It has not been passed over; I have lowered the duty on beads.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. Minister might remove the duty altogether from that class of beads.

Mr. FOSTER. The communication I had from those Indians was to the effect that, instead of increasing the duty 5 cents, it should be allowed to remain at its original figure.

Boots and shoes, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McMULLEN. On the question of boots and shoes, I may say that I was in the city of Montreal yesterday, and one of the largest manufacturers there told me they were prepared for free trade at any time in preference to the present system.

Salmon, pickled or salted, 1 cent per pound. All other fish pickled or salted in barrels, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would ask my hon. friend if he thinks it is wise to put his duty on fish? Wefind a proposition in the United States to tax the fish coming from our ports, and while the Americans are still in throes of their arrangement of the tariff, I would ask if it is prudent to tax the fish coming from the United States? We take very little fish from them, and this is simply a provocation on our part to cause them to retaliate upon us.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how it can be retaliation, as this is merely the whole old duty which has been on the tariff for years.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is really a provocation, and the hon. gentleman would do well to take it off.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How would this apply to Newfoundland?

Mr. BOWELL. None of these apply to Newfoundland.

Mr. MITCHELL. You cannot discriminate; you must apply it to Newfoundland. The principle laid down by the British Government is that they will not sanction discriminatory tariffs as against one nation in favor of another.

Mr. KENNY. Newfoundland charges a duty on our flour and I do not see why their fish should be exempt.

Mr. CHARLTON. Our import of fish from the United States is so very insignificant that it seems to me we ought not to impose this duty, because it invites retaliation. This duty might be wiped out without any greater loss to the revenue than a few thousand dollars at most.

Mr. MITCHELL. There can be no exemption made in regard to Newfoundland, or any country outside of Canada.

Mr. KIRK. The late tariff was just the same as this. According to the old tariff, duties were charged on fish imported from Newfoundland just the same as fish coming from other countries, but by an Order in Council, and on account of some arrangement between this Government and the Government of Newfoundland, they were allowed to import fish here free of duty on the understanding that our flour was to be admitted free into Newfoundland.

Mr. FOSTER. That was a sort of reciprocal arrangement.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the hon. Minister will remember that they imposed this duty against Newfoundland, and that when Newfoundland threatened to impose duties against Canada, the Government had to back down, as they will probably have to do again. I should like to know under what conditions our trade with Newfoundland is carried at the present time—whether on an Order in Council or by an enactment.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is by power given under the general Act.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. Minister should be able to say more positively. Our trade with Newfoundland is very important. We import a large quantity of herrings from there, and we ought to know exactly in what position that trade stands.

Mr. FOSTER. It is under section 3 of chap. 33:

"Fish and other products of the fisheries shall be chargeable with and there shall be collected thereon the rates of duty set forth and described in schedule B to this Act and set opposite to each of them respectively: Provided that the whole or part of the duties imposed by this section may be remitted as respects either the United States or the Island of Newfoundland, or both, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of the United States and the Island of Newfoundland, or either of them, have made charges in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in the said countries respectively."

Mr. KIRK Was there ever an Order in Coun-

Mr. KIRK. Was there ever an Order in Council passed in reference to Newfoundland?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I think there was.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That applies whenever Newfoundland remits the duty on herring.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not specify whether it is to be in kind or not.

Mr. CHARLTON. With regard to the two items in schedule B, I find that last year we collected $199.87 on the imports of pickled salmon from the United States, the value of the imports being $713, and on the imports of all other salted fish from the United States we collected $79.95, and the value of the imports was $241. As the duty on these articles only amounts to the paltry sum of less than $300, it seems to me an act of folly almost to impose any duty under the circumstances, because while our export trade is a vast one, our import trade is almost nothing. I think it would be better to drop this duty altogether. If it is calculated to produce any effect, it will not be a beneficial one.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have they not got the same duty against us?

Mr. CHARLTON. It does not matter. If we impose this, it is a provocation to them to retaliate.

Mr. SPROULE. We had better attend to our own affairs, and let them attend to theirs.

Mr. BOWELL. It has been there for years.

Mess pork, as defined by the General Inspection Act, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound.

Mr. KIRK. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if it is the intention of the Government to continue the arrangement to allow Newfoundland fish to come in free, with the understanding that flour is to go there free, and if he thinks that is fair to the fishermen of Nova Scotia and the Dominion at large. It appears to me that if you are going to have protection, you have no right to sacrifice the interests of one class for the interests of another class. I do not think the Government are doing justice to the fishermen of Nova Scotia by giving away their market to the fishermen of Newfoundland in order that the Canadian millers may send them flour.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not seem to be a proper item under which to discuss that question. If my hon, friend will put that question at another time I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. KIRK. Very well, I will put it to-morrow before the Orders of the Day are called.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We have been taking a good deal of liberty in going back and forward over these items, and I think the hon. Minister should answer the question. As my hon. friend says, herrings that come from Newfoundland go to the Montreal and Quebec markets to supply the demand which would otherwise be supplied by the herrings from Nova Scotia, to enable the millers of Canada to send a certain quantity of flour to Newfoundland for their benefit. There is a great deal in the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. Finance Minister has intimated his intention to answer this question to-morrow. To save time, I desire to call his attention to the fact that the Nova Scotia fishermen, when they go to the Newfoundland coast, are taxed on the salt and barrels and equipment they take there, and it seems rather extraordinary that we should let their fish in free.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That may seem hard, but there is this much to be said in explanation, though I do not approve of it. Our vessels go down with salt and other supplies and enter in their harbors and trade for fish with the traders there.

Mr. FOSTER. The Inspection Act defines mess pork as follows:—

"Mess pork shall consist of the rib pieces only of good hogs, weighing not less than 200 pounds each. The packages containing such pork shall be branded on one of the heads, mess pork."

That takes in what is generally known as the heavy mess pork and the clear cut pork as well.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the hon, gentleman whether or not what is known as clear pork will be admitted under the one and a half cent per pound duty. I object to the increase of duty at all; but since it is to be increased, I would like to have it clearly defined whether or not clear pork is included in the tariff of one and a half cent a pound; as I understand, at present it comes in at three cents.

Mr. FOSTER. The definition I have read confines mess pork to the rib pieces only of good hogs, weighing not less than 200 pounds each, and I think that included what my hon friend speaks of as clear pork, provided it is from hogs weighing 200 pounds.

Mr. GILLMOR. Will the hon. gentleman insert that in the tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. The tariff is explicit enough under the definition I have read.

Mr. MITCHELL. There should be no ambiguity left in relation to so important an item. If the hon. gentleman will add clear pork to mess Mr. Kirk.

pork, that will suit all purposes for which we are contending, so far as the definition is concerned.

Mr. CHARLTON. That will be necessary, because clear side is not classed as mess pork. Mess pork is barrel pork. Lumbermen, in buying their pork, buy mess pork, and barrel sometimes what is apparently clear side. It is a different way of putting up pork of the same kind. To exempt that from the duty of 3 cents per pound, it would be necessary to make this definition.

Mr. WELSH. I understand what mess pork is, and I think the definition of the Minister of Finance is clear. I would ask the hon member for Northumberland what he means by clear pork?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mess pork is the standard pork of commerce, and the speculative article. Clear pork is not a speculative article. It is the pork in which the belly part of the pig as well as the sides, with bones taken out, is specially cured and put up. It generally averages in the Chicago market 50 cents higher than the mess pork, as there is not so much, if any, bone in it, and there is none of the back bone in it. It is very much used in the lumber camps in the place of mess pork. It is also the whole side of the clear part of the pig. Being free from bone is what constitutes clear pork. To show the hardship that may have existed during the past week, mess pork, which is the speculative article, jumped from $1 to $5 per barrel over and above the price of clear pork. This shows that our people may be mulcted by the speculative price in buying the mess pork, while if they buy the clear pork they will not have to pay the speculative price. With regard to the prime pork, that is an inferior grade of pork. I can understand a duty being put on that, because there is a great deal raised in this country. It is from the smaller hogs and the inferior parts of the larger. But our people do not grow to any great extent the mess pork, and, therefore, no duty should be imposed on it, and certainly the duty on clear pork should not be put higher than that of mess. If the hon gentleman will put into the item clear pork, he will define more clearly what is meant.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) says we do not grow that kind of pork in Canada, but the reason is the market has been so low our farmers gould not grow it with profit. Give them the Canadian market, and they will grow lots of it, and they are desirous to grow it all over Canada. When a pig gets to a certain growth, it is much more profitable to feed it and so to obtain the growth of fat than it is when the pig is younger. Now, the Canadian farmers are compelled to kill the hogs when they are only half fattened, and the heavy pork is brought in from Chicago or from the State of Michigan. If you give the market to the Canadian farmers, there would be plenty of that heavy pork.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why does not the hon. gengleman go to the root of the matter? The reason why we do not raise heavy mess pork here is that in the United States they can get orn in the State of Kansas for 15 cents a bushel, and that is the food best fitted to raise heavy mess pork, so that they can afford to keep these pigs for a year or a year and a half, while in this country the farmers have to slaughter their pigs when they are seven or eight months old. They cannot keep them longer, simply because corn is not allowed to be imported free into this country and the expense is too great. The hon, gentleman says the hogs can be fed upon coarse grains. Are there any coarse grains for the feeding of hogs to be compared to corn? He speaks of barley. Barley has been worth 60 or 70 or 80 cents a bushel, and how can that be used to feed hogs when they can be fed on the other side on corn at 15 cents a bushel? Who is to pay for this difference? The hon, gentleman is going to make the lumbermen and the fishermen pay for it. He is going to make the people in the Maritime Provinces, who consume a great deal of pork, pay this extra cost. If the Government had taken this duty off corn, the people in the Maritime Provinces could have fed the pigs so as to provide what was required for our own market at least.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In regard to the statement of the hon. gentleman, I find that the letter I have says, speaking of the difference between clear pork and mess pork, that the former consists as follows: Heavy fat shoulder butts, with blade bone left in, and California or picnic ham taken off. The clear pork is often used in preference to the mess pork, and one would imagine that it was of equal value; but, under this proposal, it will pay 3 cents per pound, while the mess pork only pays 2 cents per pound. Then there is a quality of prime mess pork, and another called prime pork, and those pay $6 a barrel. That class of pork is largely used by our fishermen—not by the bank fishermen, because, as they take it in bond, they would take the American pork in bond, and, therefore, it does not affect them—but by the people along the coast-people who are part fishermen and part farmers, but who raise neither pork nor beef for themselves. They have to buy both, and the Government will see how hard upon them will be a duty of $6 a barrel. I do not think the Government has considered how injurious this will be in regard to these fishermen, and upon the lobster fishermen, and upon those who go to sea, leaving their families ashore. It seems difficult to understand why the lumbermen, who, as a rule are better off than the fishermen, get their pork at a lower rate of duty. I was in hopes, after the representations which were made to the Government, that they would have made a considerable change before asking the Committee to pass these resolutions. The people in this country, as has been very properly stated by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), cannot raise pork as cheaply as the people of the United States, because we have no corn to feed them on. Where corn is 15 cents a bushel, pork can be raised cheaply, but we have no cheap food on which to raise pork except potatoes, and in some places not even that. In Prince Edward Island they will have the benefit of this duty, because potatoes are very cheap there, but I object to this increase, and to the inequality in the duty imposed upon the fishermen as against the lumbermen. think the Government could not have considered the way in which this tax would affect the coast fishermen, and I now make this final appeal to them on behalf of these poor people, and ask that they should not be charged the heavy duty which the Minister of Finance proposes.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) has been building an argument on nothing in regard to the way this will bear upon the Province he represents. I find that $5,000 duty was paid on the lower class of pork, and the total amount imported was 516,000 pounds in the Province of Nova Scotia. I am informed also, the importation was largely for the lumbermen and not for the fishermen at all, so that this cannot apply so heavily to the poor fisherman as the hon. gentleman represents.

Mr. MITCHELL. Last year there was imported fifteen million pounds of pork into this country, and a duty of $152,000 was paid.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) stated that it paid the farmer better to feed the higher class of hogs than the younger. That statement is fallacious. The younger the animal is, the greater is the amount of tood required in proportion to the live weight. I will read a statement as to the increased cost of hogs in proportion to their age and weight.

"From the data given in these tables, and from conclusions safely reached by observation. I desire to point out that as a hog becomes older and heavier there is a gradual increase in the quantity of food consumed per pound of increased live weight. It is not prudent to base a scale of the per cent. of increased consumption of feed upon these few tests, but I may mention that, in the case of feeding hog upon middlings only, from 226 pounds each up to 291 pounds each they consumed 86 per cent. more feed for every pound of increased live weight than did the hogs from 90 pounds each up to 145 pounds each."

This shows positively that the farmers of Canada will not be able to feed hogs up to the weight required to produce heavy pork as long as they have a market for hogs weighing from 150 pounds to 175 pounds. While this may benefit farmers in certain localities, it will have very little effect in other localities. Taking the exports and imports of pork, beef and meats of all descriptions, and the imports and exports of animals that produce meat, we have still a balance of both amounting to $6,608,846. The great effect of this duty will be to displace one sort of meat for another, so that the benefit to the Canadian farmer will not be so great as re-presented, except, perhaps, in some localities. In some localities a farmer may benefit, but I hold he cannot benefit by feeding these heavy hogs, According to experiments that have been made we find that if we feed corn we can produce a pound of pork just about I cent a pound cheaper than we can upon either pease, barley or shorts. Now, if we received the corn into Canada without duty and left the duty upon pork at the price it was, a greater benefit would be conferred upon all the classes of the community, and the consumers would not have to pay the increased price, and the farmers, if they had free corn, could produce the pork more cheaply by I cent a pound than they can at the present time.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hongentleman, who professess to be a practical farmer, if he finds that the rule is universal that all animals, the younger they are when he commences to fatten them, the less they consume in proportion to the increase in weight, and if that principle is correct, why he does not turn out those hundred head of cattle he is feeding to-day before they are half fattened and put younger ones in their place? Everyone knows that cattle will consume not more than one-third as much after they get pretty fat as they will when you put them up first. The longer you keep them and the fatter you make them, the less they will consume. The hon.

member for Huron said all animals—I agree with him if he confines it to pork, but I do not if he makes the sweeping statement that the same rule applies to all animals. The reason why farmers do not feed this pork is because it is not profitable. They have no market for it. We want to give to the Canadian farmer the market for this twenty-three million pounds of meat that we import. The hon, gentleman says we do not raise large hogs. I have heard a statement made by, I think, the hon member for Hastings, the other night, that they ship hogs from Belleville just because they could not find a market at home for that heavy class of pork. If they bring in these large hogs to market, they will get half a dollar a hundred less for them than for the small ones. I saw hogs weighing 175 pounds offered in the market in my place for $5, while hogs weighing 300 pounds and over, were sold for $4.50 per cwt. There is no market for them, because they are supplied by the American farmer from the Western States. From the information I have received from the farmers lately, they are much pleased with the proposed increase of duty, and some of them fear that the Government are disposed to back down or to change the kinds of pork that is brought in so as to allow more to come in under a lower rate of duty. I believe there is no one in this country who raises pork or beef who will not approve of this increase of duty, because it will tend largely to keep out the American produce which comes directly into competition with

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The hon. gentleman's experience is not like the experiments made by Mr. Groff in Waterloo. He fed cattle, some of them, until they were two years old, some three years old, some four and some five. He kept an account of the amount of food consumed and the price realised, and found that he made the greatest profit from animals two years old. I find from experience that I can make one-third more profit by buying steers two years old than by buying them at a later age. It is an understood principle that the earlier you can bring an animal to market the more profit you will make out of him. want the hon, gentleman to understand that when he brings a young animal into the market it must be in a fat condition. In the Western part of Ontario, to-day they are feeding hogs five, six, and seven months, and selling them when they weigh 160 or 170 pounds.

Mr. TISDALE. I understand the hon. gentleman to say the profit is greater, or does he mean the proportion of profit? In other words, you take a young steer two years old that will weigh 600 pounds, you fatten him up to four years, and he will weigh 1,300 lbs. Does he mean to say that he will make more money on each animal selling him at two years old than by keeping him until he is four? He will make a greater proportion of profit, but he will not make nearly so many dollars per animal. I am speaking of something I know, because, probably, I have sold more thousands of cattle than he has hundreds. If you should go into the United States and tell a large stock man that he could sell his cattle at two years old for a greater profit, he would say that you did not know anything about your business. They never think of selling their cattle at two years old.

Mr. SPROULE.

The proportionate increase after they pass two years is greater, because all risk is past, you have the animal bred and well started in growth. Some of them may sell animals at three years, because at that age a thrifty steer is almost as good as he is at four years. Possibly they will sell 20 per cent. of their animals at three years old, because they are peculiarly thrifty, but 90 per cent. of all the cattle are kept until they are four years old.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the doctors and the lawyers, like the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Tisdale), had better establish a school for the farmers and the breeders like the hon. member for Huron.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The hon. gentleman spoke about a steer two years old, weighing 600 pounds. I handle no such animals. I have steers in my possession this winter that weigh 1,200 pounds at 18 months old. It would pay no farmer to raise a steer at that age, which weighs only 600 pounds. I have taken steers to the English market for several years. One year I took over steers four years old, and the highest price I got for them was £24 10s., and for two-year old steers the highest price I got was £22 10s. Last year I got £19 15s. for two-year old steers.

Mr. TISDALE. I want to make this explanation in answer to what the hon. member for West Durham says about establishing schools. matter of cattle I do not want to be taught by the hon. member for Huron. If hon. gentlemen will look at the Chicago markets they will find the average of beeves is 1,200 pounds for a four-year old. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) was talking about a particular class of high bred stock when he spoke of 1,200 pounds as average cattle. The hon, gentleman laid down a general proposition, that he could make more money selling cattle at two years old than when they were under that age. I can quote the markets of Chicago, where during eight months of the year from 10,000 to 15,000 head of cattle are sold every day. I am speaking not only of what I have read, but what I have seen; I am speaking of cattle in the Western States and territories, and range cattle particularly. I say that neither of these classes prefer to sell 20 per cent. of their cattle at two years old. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) was simply speaking of a few dozen or a few hundred cattle of special breeds, when he said they would go from 1,800 to 2,000 pounds when four year olds, which no doubt is the case, and from 1,200 to 1,400 pounds as two-year olds. That particular class may pay better to kill as two-year olds, but the hon, gentleman was speaking of the general cattle market of the world.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) undoubtedly possesses a great deal of knowledge as regards the business of ranching in Montana. That, however, is not a case parallel to the raising and feeding of cattle in Canada. Montana cattle on the ranche at two years old, I admit, are not very good stock, and no doubt they are much better at four years old. I would give much more for the practical knowledge of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) than the knowledge of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and four or five others like them with respect to the matter we are discussing. The assertion made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), that there would be relatively a larger percentage of profit on young than on old cattle, is undoubtedly true. He did not say that two-year old steers would be worth as much as four-year olds, but he claimed that, taking the first cost, the time spent, and the amount of feed, the percentage of return would be greater from young cattle than from four-year olds. His practical experience has shown him that such is the case, and no doubt he is right, and I submit the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) knows little about it. The latter hon. gentleman is interested in Montana ranches and has handled a great many cattle there, but his knowledge of the cattle business in this country is not as reliable as that of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), and he has not the practical knowledge possessed by that hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me remind the Committee that we are now on the item of mess pork.

We have before to-day found Mr. SPROULE. out that the arguments of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) were not infallible. Only a few days ago the hon. gentleman gave a long list of agricultural implements as having come into the country before 1878 duty free, and I showed that such was not the case. His present argument in regard to the interests of the farmers is as unreliable as his argument was on that occasion. If the hon, gentleman applied the number of pounds of feed to fatten cattle, as a feeder and not as a farmer, there might be more force in his argument. But farmers benefit not so much by buying food for their cattle as by using straw, chaff, turnips and food that is round the barn, which costs little. and thus keeping the cattle going for one, two or three years, and thus obtaining an increase of weight at very little cost. If cattle are fed with corn, it may, perhaps, be more profitable to fatten them as two-year olds. But farmers are only to a small extent feeders, and, therefore, it is not to their interest and benefit that they should turn out their cattle at two years old. At that age they cannot fatten them with profit; they have not money to go abroad and buy feed. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) may be a great authority and may display evidence of superior knowledge and ability on agricultural subjects, but he must not taunt hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with ignorance when they rise as representing the farming community and discuss these topics. If the hon, gentleman will go among his own farming friends he will find they do not accept him or his theories. Not one in 500 is a feeder, and it is only the feeder who can purchase American corn for feed, and to him alone is it important that American corn should come in duty free. It will not be until the farmers abandon the general principles of farming and direct their attention entirely to feeding that it will be to their interest to get in American corn free of duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Pork.

Mr. SPROULE. Are hon, gentlemen afraid of hearing an argument in regard to the farmers? Hon, gentlemen opposite will have to go back to the farmers and win their support or they will not be returned to this House. As regards cattle, it is the interest of the farmer to feed them from year to year on a class of food representing very little value, and get back his profit partially in the manure, and when the cattle have reached the proper age for feeding the farmer can then fatten them to advantage.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). What I stated was, that under the Mackenzie tariff, agricultural implements were admitted free and I can prove it. The antiquated ideas the hon. gentleman entertains in regard to feeding and breeding are those which prevailed in Canada ten, fifteen and twenty years ago, when people advocated scrub cattle and not the improved breeds of the present day.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member Mr. POPE. for Huron (Mr. McMillan) has said that there was a greater profit in handling cattle up to the age of two years than there was after that. If that is a fact, why is it that he confines nearly his entire dealings in cattle to those animals which are from one to two years old and upwards, instead of producing these animals from calves up to one or two years? It is the same with regard to pork. He must surely be a shrewd man, because he is apparently from old Scotland, and his countrymen are noted for their shrewdness. If his dealing in these cattle is satisfactory to him—and, he pursues his business year after year as evidence of satisfactory results-and if he finds that in exporting these cattle between the ages of two and four years he makes a greater profit than if he raised them between one and two years, why does he not say so? When he comes to the finishing of the pork, the same principle prevails. The small farmer with his limited means can grow these hogs up to a certain time, and then they can be purchased by just such a sample of a farmer as the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan)—and I have no doubt he is a very good farmer. He can finish the light pork into heavy pork just the same as he can finish the light steer into the heavy steer for export.

Mr. SCRIVER. I must confess that I am not a practical farmer, but judging from what my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) says, I know as much about fattening hogs as he does; and per-haps a little more. I am the better prepared to say a few words on this question, as I am a subscriber to the New York Weekly Tribune, which publishes an excellent agricultural column. I have been reading some articles in that paper, interesting to me even, and written by Mr. Curtis, who is known as perhaps the most successful producer of hogs in the United States. He wrote in one of these articles which I remember, that it was a false policy on the part of the farmer to think of keeping a hog until he was more than a year old, and that more profit would be made by slaughtering hogs before they were that age than keeping them longer. I was a little surprised to hear my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) go so far as to say that the longer you keep a hog the more profitable he would become, and he repeated that observation, which would lead one to think that his idea was that the longer you keep hogs the more profitable you would make them. Perhaps, as he placed no limit, his theory is that the farmer should keep them until they were of venerable age. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) he has experience in this matter. I have a little experience myself, and my neighbors have had experience, and I am satisfied that they have all come to the conclusion that there is no profit for the farmer in raising what is called heavy pork.

Mr. SPROULE. I have every respect for the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), but I must confess that I have not so much respect for his argument regarding the raising of cattle and His argument would lead to the conclusion, that the younger a pig was killed the more profit there would be. Now, if that be correct, why not kill it when only a month old, and do the same with cattle. That was not what I stated. I said just as other hon. members have said: that the profit of the farmer is obtained by feeding cattle with a kind of food which represents little or no value—such as chaff, straw and turnips, and that in the meantime it grows. When the beast gets to a certain age, it takes less, in proportion, to fatten it than when the animal is younger. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) has pointed out the situation of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) who buys his stock from the farmer. Would any gentleman say that he is a fair specimen of the farmer in Western Ontario? No. They would say that he is a speculator and a feeder, and that he is not a farmer in the proper sense of the term. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) says he would rather send us to a school like that for information, than he would to the hon. member who sits beside me, or to the hon. member for East Grey. That may be the opinion of a chancery lawyer, and of a speculator, but it would not be the opinion of the practical farmers of this country.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) must remember that he is perhaps confounding things a little. He has in truth applied his experience to a condition of affairs to which it does not apply. The longer he keeps the animals by which he makes his living, the more he profits by it; for his profits cease when they die. But he must not apply to others who profit by the death, the experience of a man whose profit ceases by the death.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems there is a strange similarity between us in that line.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) is a little wrong in speaking as he has done. It is true that in a certain sense my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) is a producer of the finished article, and that he does buy cattle and finish them, In doing so, he uses his own judgment. But my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) is perhaps not aware that in addition to doing so, and as a part of his business, my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) actually tills and cultivates about 450 acres of the choicest land in Western Ontario, and that he has made that the choicest land in Ontario by his skill as a farmer and cultivator, in producing the raw material which he puts into those finished cattle which he exports to England. I would like to say a word or two with regard to the feeding of hogs which was referred to by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule). I do not think there is any doubt whatever about what the hon, member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) said, namely, that if you feed younger cattle you get a greater return for your feeding. The question of how much money you Mr. SCRIVER.

make on an animal is how much more you can get for it than your food cost you, and there is no doubt whatever, from careful experiments made in England, and, I believe, in Canada as well; that when you feed a young animal you get a larger return than when you feed an old animal. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) talks of feeding cattle on straw, and chaff, and turnips, but any gentleman who knows anything about farmers, knows that if they feed their animals on such foods as those, the return will be small indeed. It is only by using these cheaper foods in conjunction with better foods that the farmer can use them at all. The hon, gentleman is no doubt very desirous that our farmers should use only these cheap foods, such as chaff, turnips and straw, because he is anxious that the farmers should be forced to pay a larger price for the better food, but if the hon. gentleman knows anything at all about farming, he must know that the farmers must have the better kinds of foods to use with the cheaper kinds of foods in order to raise their animals to the best advantage. The hon, gentleman seems to want our farmers to go into the producing of heavy pork, such as our lumbermen want, which is the cheapest variety of pork. During the last year or two, our farmers have been specially directing their attention to the production of the dearer varieties of food, the things on which they can make the greatest profit, on which the greatest skill is displayed, and the least raw material is used. On this principle, the small animal, which produces the finest bacon and the finest hams, ranging up to 15 cents a pound, is much more profitable to the farmer than the animal for which he can only get 4 or 5 cents a pound. It is also in the interest of the Canadian dairyman, the most rapidly increasing and most prosperous class of our farmers, that they should use their skimmed milk and whey to produce the finer variety of pork, for which they will find an ample market and better prices than they could get from the lumbermen for heavy mess pork. This is the direction in which our farmers ought to go, and in this direction the present tariff does not help them at all, because it increases the price of corn, which is the cheapest and best food they can use for the production of fine pork, not when fed alone, but when fed in conjunction with the clover and skimmed milk which they have in abundance. This tariff, which keeps the duty on corn and puts a duty on heavy mess pork, does not help them at all. If they could get their corn free, they would immediately command a large export trade with England, in which this tariff does not help them, but only hurts them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose there is no part of the whole Dominion which is a greater sufferer in proportion to population from what we call the iniquitous tariff than Prince Edward Island. The fact is that of the five or six hundred articles on which taxes are imposed there is not one on which the duty is levied for the purpose of protecting anything produced in Prince Edward Island. Until we came to the articles of lard and pork, I think the taxes were purely and simply taking money out of the people without protecting anything they produced; but on these two articles there may be some protection given to the producers of Prince Edward Island. On the subject of lard, I think expectations are indulged in which will not be realised, because the lard produced in the United States is so adulterated with cottonseed oil and other viler greases, that the United States are able to undersell the world, and the duty will not enable the producers in Prince Edward Island to compete with them at all. Prince Edward Island is a large producer of pork supplies for the neighboring Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the increase of the duty on mess pork simply amounts to one-half a cent a pound. That pork is sold largely to the farmers and lumbermen of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

An hon. MEMBER. The lumbermen and fishermen-not the farmers.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Yes; to the farmers in some parts. I happen to have letters under my hand from the three largest packers of Prince Edward Island, in which they tell me the different parts where they sell to the farmers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I am speaking by the book. The only increase is one-half a cent a pound on mess pork. I undertood the hon. Finance Minister to say that he is going to pass an order stating that mess pork includes not what is said in the General Inspection Act, but clear pork also. he does that, this increase of one-half a cent a pound will be no protection at all, because the lumbermen will import all their pork from the States. The Government are only dealing fallaciously with the people of Prince Edward Island, who imagine they are going to get a benefit from this duty. If clear pork was included, as I supposed it was, under the title prime mess pork as defined by the General Inspection Act, there might have been a hope of some benefit from the duty; in other words, then we would transfer some money from the pockets of the lumbermen and fishermen of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the pockets of the impoverished people of Prince Edward Island, and our people who have been robbed to such an extent would have some little return made to them. But prime mess is usually used for ship stores, and on this the hon. gentleman puts a duty of $6 a barrel, or 3 cents a pound, and the ship owners buy that in bond from the States, and we will get no benefit. In Prince Edward Island. you can buy prime mess pork for $3 less than you can buy mess, and prime mess will be imported by the shipowners in bond from the United States; and on the mess, on which we supposed we were going to get a benefit, we shall receive none, because he is going to class clear pork with it, so that I do not anticipate any benefit for our people

Mr. MITCHELL. I am surprised at the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies). Why, Sir, he is just as selfish and bad as any Ontario man. He is looking entirely after the interests of his own Province. He says there is not going to be any benefit to the farmers of Prince Edward Island, by an increase of half a cent a pound on mess pork. They get $3 now, and does he want to put $3 more on the food of the lumbermen and fishermen of the country?

Mr. FOSTER. That is free trade.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is a queer free trader. The fact is the hon. gentleman is speaking to the constituency of Queen's now; he is not speaking his when he asks for an additional duty for his constituents, and he will fleece the lumbermen, and fishermen, and farmers of our Province out of $3 a barrel additional over and above what the Minister is prepared to say he will give. As I understand the definition given by the hon. Minister as to pork is this: Under the reading of the General Act that clear pork, being the pork between the fore shoulder and the hip, and known as clear, is admitted and classed as mess pork. If that principle is recognised, the thing is clear that it is only liable to 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You will get your pork from the States then.

Mr. SPROULE. We will supply you.

Mr. MITCHELL. If our farmers can raise mess pork or clear pork, as defined by the Act, we will get it from them, but up to this time they have not been able to raise it. The reason we go to Chicago is because we cannot get it any place Surely $3 a barrel is quite enough else as cheap. protection on food of that character so extensively used in those two great industries to which I have referred.

Mr. WELSH. I am a free trader, and, if I had my way, I would take that tariff list and the tariff list of the United States and destroy them altogether, and raise taxes in some other way. In this whole tariff, there is not one item which is not a burden on the people especially of Prince The only item which has a ten-Edward Island. dency to benefit them at all is the duty on pork. The hon, member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) told us that clear pork pigs weighing from 500 to 900 pounds do not bring as much money by 1½ and $\hat{2}$ cents per pound as the smaller pigs.

Mr. SPROULE. Not so much difference as

Mr. WELSH. That was the drift of his argument, and it shows the hon. gentleman did not know what he was talking about. Big pork brings larger prices than small.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not.

Mr. WELSH. We raise ten pigs to the one you do for every square mile in this Dominion. I have seen from three thousand to four thousand pigs a day selling in Charlottetown, and the large pork always commanded one to two cents a pound more than the smaller pork.

Mr. SPROULE It is not so in Ontario.

Mr. WELSH. You do not know what good Mess pork is four-pound pieces and no bones. The other mess has not a jowl. pork is. jowls or bones. Clear pork is pork cut without the back-bone, and it goes right around the shoulder. Although I am a free-trader, I am going to support this item, because it is the only one in the whole tariff which will benefit the people who sent me here.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). With respect to the falsity which was attempted to be put on to my statement, that agricultural implements come into the country free under the Mackenzie tariff, I find on referring to it, that farm utensils and implements when imported by agricultural societies, forthe encouragement of agriculture, were admitted free. I would advise the hon. gentleman not tobe so ready to give to my statements the characmind, but he is speaking from a selfish sentiment teristic that distinguishes his own. I never made a statement in this House that I did not believe to be perfectly true.

Mr. GILLMOR. My own impression is that the explanation given by the Government with regard to this question of pork will satisfy those who are in the habit of buying clear pork. That portion of the hog which forms mess pork will also form clear pork. Clear pork is the pork with the ribs and bone taken out, and that will be interpreted as coming under the head of mess pork.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is not all the clear pork imported from the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman wants us to import it from the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. You can make clear pork and mess pork in the Island if you have the hogs.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In other words, this is an ingenious mode of defeating the protection which the tariff was intended to give. The object which the tariff was intended to give. The object of the tariff was to protect those who raise mess pork, and if you are going to admit clear pork as mess pork that object will be defeated.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you want $6 a barrel put on clear pork?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) No; I would like to see 2 cents a pound put on all round. These hon. gentlemen, in their own interest, are advocating that clear pork shall be imported at 11 cents per pound, and they will buy for the lumbermen all clear pork, and the mess pork will not be bought

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I represent a farming constituency, and being somewhat of a farmer myself, I feel a very deep interest in this question. I must congratulate the Government on the course they have taken in protecting this class of agricultural products, for I think upon no special item in the whole three hundred in the Tariff Bill could they have taken any action that will redound so much to the advantage of this country as will their action on this item now under discussion. The hon. member for Charlottetown (Mr. Welsh) said that heavier pork was more valuable than slighter pork. Experience in Ontario and the market reports are against him, because the value of any article is largely made by the demand. In that connection I will just read a short extract from Bulletin XXX of the Bureau of Industries of the Ontario Government, which bears specially on this point:

point:

"The day of the fat hog has gone by, excepting in the lumber woods and other places where large numbers of laborers are employed, and instead of carcasses of 350 to 500 pounds, 90 per cent. of which is white, the market now calls for carcasses of 110 to 160 pounds of firm meat, well streaked with lean and fat. For this quality of meat there appears to be a steadily growing demand in our towns and cities, as shown by the figures of pork packers, and an almost unlimited demand in the markets of England."

One reason why I refer to that especially is because I do not quite agree with the proposition of the hon. member for Grey regarding the profitable feeding of hogs. I have not much experience in feeding hogs, but am constantly in contact with those who have, and the pig which can be matured for market during the summer season is the most profitable hog, and that is the stamp of animal which the present tariff specially protects. Last year the returns showed we imported 15,206. 172 pounds of pork, 3,658,967 pounds of hams and bacon, and 8,290,001 pounds of lard. That is 26,155,140 pounds, that came at a cost of $2,000,000 to the Canadian consumer. There is no reason why the Canadian farmer should not only supply that amount, but should also raise a large extra quantity for export at profitable rates. There are several reasons for that. One, and the chief reason, is this: The farmers in Ontario and older Provinces are drifting into the dairying business, and are finding out the injury which they suffer by making their exports all of grain, so that, I think, any means by which the surplus grain can be reduced to a smaller bulk, and exported either in the form of pork, or beef, or mutton, or dairy products, while leaving the fertilising elements on our farms, which are carried out of the country when we export grain, will do a service to The report of the Ontario Agriculthe country. tural farm makes this statement :

tural farm makes this statement:

"The facts presented in these quotations indicate that there is a large demand for hogs and their products that might be and ought to be furnished to our own markets with profit by the dairy farmers of the Province. By way of further introduction of this subject, I will quote some passages from an address which I had the honor to deliver before the Dairymen's Associations in 1889.

"Dairymen neglect one of the best servants they can have in the animal creation, when they do not avail themselves of the hog to aid in making money from the by-products of milk. The attitude of farmers towards the pig has been an unfriendly one. It is a popular, though untrue, saying that the only good Indian is the dead Indian, and farmers seem to cherish a similar belief in regard to the hog. That opinion, however, is in direct opposition to the best interests of the men who keep cows for the manufacture of dairy products. If the man who keeps ten cows will fatten twenty hogs in the summer and half as many in the winter, he will find, perhaps to his amazement, that this little branch of business will bring him in more money and profit than he thought could be made from it. Whey is a valuable hog feed. There are nearly 7 lbs. in every 100 lbs. of whey which the hog can use to advantage."

Further on he says:

Further on he says:

"These elements of food value in whey should produce at least two pounds of live weight in hogs. 100 pounds of whey, fed in the most judicious manner, should produce two pounds of pork; it will not do it when fed alone, but fed in combination with other foods it will."

Further on he says:

"I consider that it is possible, by a judicious mixture of grain in hog feeding, to obtain one pound of increase live weight up to 200 pounds for every four pounds of grain fed."

And still further:

"I believe the hogs of this Province are an unrecognised and undeveloped source of wealth for the men who will endeavor to understand and use them well."

I have made a computation based on these authoritative and reliable figures, as I believe them to be, because they are inferences which have been drawn by competent men who have been experimenting without any view to the cost of the experiment at the Ontario Agricultural Farm. We have in Ontario to-day, as I compute, about 500,000 cows. I base my calculation in this way: The number used in the manufacture of cheese, taking that from the report of the Dairymen's Association, is 300,000, and I think 200,000 more may be added, making half a million. Upon that estimate, the refuse of the dairy industry alone would produce about fifteen million pounds of pork. Of course that would not be all a new product, because a large proportion is converted into pork to-day; but, in conjunction with barley meal, which the same authority proves to be the most valuable food for raising pork, we could, if the market were once secured, double the 500,000 cows in the older Provinces and thus be able to produce over seventy million pounds of pork, which, at 7 cents a pound—which is not more than half the price suggested by some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House-would add about five million and a half dollars to the revenue of the farmers. I have made this computation, not depending on the tariff so much for any increased price, but I look upon the tariff as designed to secure a constant, steady and reliable market, free from the fluctuations mentioned by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), as to the result of "bull" and "bear" operations on the stock exchange in Chicago. I hope and believe that this tariff will protect the home market from those fluctuations, so that the farmer, when he com-mences operation in the spring, will be able to depend, with a considerable degree of certainty, upon the prices he will receive in the fall. I do not say that this tariff is going to enhance the price, but I do say that it is going to make the price stable. If we give the farmer of Canada that reliable market for that class of meats, he will derive great benefit, because, of the twenty-seven million pounds imported into Canada from the United States for consumption, fifteen million pounds were of light meats, and of the hogs imported into Canada in bond, a large proportion was made into hams and bacon and sent out of this country in a form which showed the great demand there is for hogs of this description, both in Canada and in England. Last year, I find that England imported over 500 million pounds of pork. Canada only sent 27 million pounds of that amount, and the United States sent a little over 300 million pounds. The hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the price of corn, and say that we cannot compete with the Kansas corn growers. Of course we could not, if you allow the Kansas corn grower to invade our territory, when corn is at 15 cents a bushel as it was two months ago-

Mr. MITCHELL. I thought the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) said it was 33 cents a bushel.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). That is the price at the present time, according to the quotations of the newspapers, but I am speaking of the price two months ago. I say that, in the present state of the pork market, in conjunction with our dairying business, and with the coarse grains which we can successfully grow—especially barley, for which the Americans have now refused us a market—we should not only be able to supply the home market with the whole quantity which we now import from the United States, but should be able to produce a large quantity for export; and I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that, within ten years, the dairy industry of the older Provinces, instead of having 500,000 cows in the Province of Ontario, will have a million. We would be able to feed such a number of hogs, in conjunction with barley and coarse grains, that we would be able to supply fully as much of the British market for that class of pork as the Americans do now, so that we would not only be able to save that two million dollars we now pay to the Americans for feeding us, and which goes to the Kansas corn-grower, but we would be able to produce a large amount for export, the returns of which would go into the pockets of the farmers of Canada. As to the heavy pork, there is such a small amount of it required in Canada in comparison with the lighter pork, that an occasional hog here and there, one 300 pound hog in 10 that we raise in this country, indeed I may say one in 20, would furnish all the mess pork that the lumbermen of this country requires. I will go further than that, and say it is as much the duty of Parliament to legislate in the direction of preserving the health of the laboring men of this country, just as much as it is to find them opportunities of labor and cheap food. I state unhesitatingly that as a food element for restoring the strength and wasted vigor and energy to a lumberman, a hundred weight of mixed fed Canadian pork is worth one dollar more to any man than any American corn fed pork. The reason the lumbermen are so anxious to get the American pork is that it is soft and flabby, it does not contain so much muscle, is not so firm, and in boiling and in frying a larger amount of lard is procured. That is the reason given to me the other day by a New Brunswick lumberman. It saves them from buying lard. They take the lard, fried out of the American mess pork, and mix it with beans and peas for the men. Let him buy the firm, healthy, good, substantial Canadian mess pork, and buy decent Canadian lard made from the kidneys of the same hog, to mix with his beans. I remember, 25 years ago, the only food taken into the lumber camp were mess pork, flour, molasses, black tea and beans. men ate this stuff all winter without any variety, and when they came down in the spring you would fancy 20 per cent. of them had the leprosy. day, perhaps their own avarice has led them to feed them vegetables, fresh beef, beans, molasses, fish, and every possible variety of food, because they have discovered that the greater the variety and the better the quality of food, the more work they can get out of their men. On that principle, I say let the lumbermen of Canada feed Canadian pork to their men, and we can do without Yankee mess pork. On this point, I said a moment ago, speaking of the dairy interest, that I was satisfied these two industries running on parallel lines, would in ten years in this country, instead of having 500,000 cows would have 1,000,000, and that would mean a product of 70,000,-000 pounds of pork; the feeding of 10,000,000 bushels of barley in conjunction with the same, would mean 70,000,000 pounds more, or a total product of 140,000,000 pounds, and you can count the revenue to the farmers of this country upon that amount of pork. I believe that is just as possible as it has been to produce our present cheese product, which was only an infant industry in this country fifteen years ago. I took an interest in the second cheese factory ever constructed in Canada. I remember distinctly the statement made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), after returning from his first trip over the Canadian Pacific Railway, when he referred to the astonishing fertility of the soil of the Province of Alberta, and its peculiar and salubrious climate. He said that the friends who surrounded him, who had visited that country previously, had misled him. The statement was published in the Globe, and he said that country was capable of almost unlimited production, owing to the fertility of the soil, but the great difficulty to its being settled up rapidly was the long transport of the grain. I mention this because it occurred to me the other day when listening to the hon. members from the North-West and Manitoba, asking that increased subsidies be given to promote immigration to that portion of our country. In no part of the continent of America which I ever visited, and I spent three or four months continuously in that Province, both from the character of the soil, and its topographical, and its climatic conditions, did I ever see a region so suited to pea growing as Alberta. The pea, I wish the House to understand, and as everybody having any knowledge of pork feeding knows, is the best possible food for producing firm, healthy pork. So that the conditions there for the growing of immense fields of peas which may be fed by the farmers in that country, largely in the same manner as the Kansas farmer feeds his hogs are of a very superior kind. In Kansas they send cattle into their corn fields to break down the corn so that the hogs may reach it and we may adopt the same plan in the North-West. Owing to the character of the soil and the climatic conditions of the country, we will be able to produce bacon and ham the equal of which the world has never seen. Now, we have secured a British market for cheese, as the finest element of food that enters that market. Our wheat, as I saw the other day, stands at the head of the list, and flour also. We hold the British of the list, and flour also. We hold the British market for grass-fed beef. We will have the butter market yet if our farmers pay attention to it, and if we get the pork, we will have secured the unlimited kitchen markets of England. Now, I suppose some of the figures I have given may appear extravagant to some hon. members, but if they will give some thought on the line that I have indicated, they will see that it is not only quite possible but very probable that we may realise the results which I have pointed out. If the tariff will bring about that result, without in any way injuring any existing industry, the Government is to be commended, and the country is to be congratulated, on the result. Some hon, gentlemen have referred to the duty of $2 a barrel on pork, as it affects the lumbering interests. It is notorious that there is scarcely a man, especially on the Upper Ottawa and the bordering portions of Quebec and Ontario, who has been hand-ling saw logs and square timber for five years, who has not built a mansion and retired as a millionaire. The tax on pork would not amount to 5 cents a thousand on sawn lumber, and why men who are following such a lucrative calling should hesitate to give that advantage to the farmers, I cannot understand. I believe the lumbermen do not complain; they are too generous and large-hearted and the majority of them are too patriotic to make any protest in that direction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will not address an essay to this House on this subject or critisise the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I think, however, the farmers of the country will employ their time properly and direct their attention to those lines that are most profitable, if they are let alone. I rise to make a few observations in regard to the speech of the hon member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). The hon. gentleman has given a description of pig-feeding in his county that was entirely novel, with a Mr. Ferguson (Leeds).

single exception. I remember many years ago, hearing John B. Gough telling about going through a country where the people were engaged in raising pigs, and he asked whether they were raising them for the purpose of placing them on the pork market. "No, not at all," they said, "we are raising them purely for the bristles." The meat was of no account whatever. Mr. Gough must have travelled through the county represented by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), where they feed pigs on straw and chaff, and I can well be lieve that the bristles will be a larger crop than the meat. Gough also said that in the same country in order to prevent pigs slipping through the fences they were obliged to tie knots to their tails. I think the pigs in the hon gentleman's constituency must all have knots in their tails, or it would be utterly impossible to fence them in. A hog will be a veritable land-shark when it is fed on straw and chaff. The people told Gough that those pigs paid for their feed; and he asked how that occurred? They said they were troubled with Canadian thistles, that the snouts grew to an enormous length, and the tails constituted a sort of flag staff, and a pig could stand on his head and dig and eat a quarter of an acre of thistles in a day. I can easily understand how, in a county where they raise pigs of the sort described by the hon. gentleman, pig-feeding after all may be pretty profitable, and I am quite sure the hon member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) knows more about this kind of feeding than any other hon, gentleman in this House. I think his description, for I had supposed Mr. Gough had drawn on his imagination when he was telling the story, was certainly worthy of the hon. gentleman, and it was most important information to communicate to the House.

Mr. SPROULE. I think I am entitled to a chance to reply to the statements of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), for in addition to being a philosopher his last speech shows he is bristling with new ideas. I am quite willing my language should be taken for all it was intended to imply, in regard to the subject to which it was made applicable. In speaking of the use of chaff and straw, I was speaking of feeding cattle, and the question whether it would be more profitable to feed cattle to kill at two years, or to keep them to a later age. Hon, gentlemen have a dozen times in this debate not only misrepresented me, but applied language which I used in speaking of the feeding of cattle to the feeding of hogs, and have made use of it in their facetious way. I have endeavored to show that it was in the interests of the farmer to keep stock of any kind until it arrived at maturity rather than kill it at a premature age. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that if you continue that line of argument you must feed stock until they are very old. That is carrying the argument to an absurdity. Every sensible man knows there is a time in the life of all animals during which there is an increase of growth, and that means an increase of weight, and both these may be obtained at a very small outlay to the farmer. During that time the beast is growing, but when it comes to maturity it is unprofitable for the farmer to keep the animal longer, and he should then fatten it and send it to market as soon as possible. That was the argument I wished to present to the Committee, not that pigs should be fed on straw or chaff. I did not make use of that language in regard to feeding pigs but to feeding cattle, and I said that young cattle could be fed on those kinds of feed, and that the farmer had ample time during the winter to attend to them, and he also required the manure to improve his lands. hon, member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) said I had evidently not taken much interest in the subject, and had not read many agricultural papers and periodicals. I have read a few of them, and if my memory serves me correctly, I read something about a patent food prepared by a scientific farmer in the Eastern Townships. It was supposed to be of that peculiar nature that a very little of it would keep an animal alive; but it appeared to have been invented by the hon. gentleman who now poses as such high authority on agricultural matters, and in practice it was found to keep the animal alive to a certain stage, and about the time the farmer expected to receive a fair price for the animal it died from starvation

Mr. CHARLTON. Chestnut.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be a chesnut; but chestnuts sometimes are very applicable, and if only stories which are not chestnuts were repeated in this House, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would not be able to make such a variety of tariff speeches and on different sides of the question. With respect to the statement made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan). I said that he had stated that during the Mackenzie regime all agricultural implements were imported free, and I said that was not correct. The hon. gentleman flatly contradicted me, and read from Hansard to prove his statement. I find in Hansard his very words, at column 2969 he

"Just let me read a little statement to show how the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie encouraged the farmers of this country, during the time they held office. During that time, we could get all our agricultural implements into the country free; now we have to pay 35 per cent.; waggons were free, they now pay 50 per cent.; buggies were free, they now pay 41 per cent.; a hay-knife was free, it now has to pay 79½ per cent.; hoes were free, they now have to pay from the United States 45½ per cent. and from Great Britain 53 per cent.; a clothes-wringer was free of duty, now it has to pay 73½ per cent.; picks, spades and shovels were free, now they have to pay 40½ per cent.; itles were free, now they pay 20 per cent.; titlesty, clover and other seeds were free, and we have had timothy and clover free only during the last two years, but now a duty of 15 per cent. is imposed on them; turnips, mangolds and beets were free and we have been paying a duty of 15 per cent. on them up to the present time, but now they have again been placed on the free list."

I read the hon centleman's own words, and, there-

I read the hon. gentleman's own words, and, therefore, I was not misquoting him, and I have read them again to night to fortify the statement I made: that he is not always reliable. It is true he went on to speak further, and in that he probably finds the quotation he has given to night. Speaking of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, he

"He allowed the manufacturers to have free iron from which to manufacture agricultural implements, and he allowed agricultural implements to come in free to the agricultural societies."

It is true the hon, gentleman referred to the fact that agricultural societies could bring in their imthat they only brought in a very small number of them free, and that it was not to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie or his Government, that the farmers were indebted for this consideration, because I understand it was due to an Order in Council passed by the present Premier and his Government, in the year 1868, and which was continued by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie when in power, that the farmers got the privilege of bringing in their implements

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman should not bore the Committee; we are talking about pork.

Mr. SPROULE. I only mentioned this to show that I have not misquoted the hon. gentleman, and in order to defend the statement I made.

Mr. FISHER. I am not going to prolong the discussion, but the hon. gentleman made some allusions to myself, which I confess I cannot quite understand. I would not pay any attention to them at all had it not been that similar insinuations were thrown out by gentlemen on the other side of the House during this Session. I confess that their insinuations are rather far fetched, and I cannot understand what they mean. I can say that I did not use any patent cattle food in my farming experience, and I can also say that I have not lost a single animal through dying a natural death in my barns. I cannot understand what story my hon. friends opposite have been stuffed with, or at what they are driving. As these insinuations are getting rather common, it is perhaps as well that I should allude to them, and give them a contradiction.

Mr. PURCELL. My experience in Canada is that it is much better to raise pork for eight months, when we can get two hundred weight, than to keep it longer. The best food we have in this country for raising pork is either pease or corn. Barley is not near so good, nor one-half so productive for fattening purposes, and sometimes the barley is dearer than either of the foods I have mentioned. Of course, if we want to get pork in this country for lumbering purposes, that young pork which I have referred to is not quite so valuable, and it is rather more expensive than the American pork. In my opinion, it would not at all be profitable for the farmers to raise heavy pork, considering our climate and that the winters are too long. The most profitable pork we can raise in Canada is the pork from six to eight months old.

Mr. BRYSON. Just one word, Mr. Chairman, before you pass that item. I do not know that I would have spoken had not the hon, member for Leeds (Mr. Ferguson) taken exception to the avarice of the lumbermen of the Ottawa valley. He seems to think that the lumbermen are a class of people who have been exceptionally favored by the National Policy in this country, and that we should not complain of the duty on pork. We, as a trade, use largely the beef of this country, and so far as the beef is concerned, I heartily agree with the changes in the tariff in that respect, and in regard to light pork the increased duty is quite in accord with my views. Anything that can be produced by the Canadian farmer should be protected. But when we strike at an article such as heavy plements free, but I showed in opposition to that pork, which in my humble opinion, cannot be produced in Canada, owing to the climate, and the want of feeding which is necessary to raise heavy pork, I think it is a mistake to increase the duty. Of course time will settle this, and I believe that two years will show that we are right in the contention which we now make. Take the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, which imported pork very largely for the last two years, and you will find that the Provinces of Ontario and Quebcc alone have paid an average duty to the extent of about $100,000 in round numbers. production of pork has not increased, and the addition of half a cent a pound on mess pork will not, I contend, foster the industry of raising pork to any profitable extent. The Ontario pork which is stamped "Windsor" was largely used for years in the Ottawa Valley, and we found that it was not a profitable pork, simply because of what has been said by the hon. member for Leeds, that I presume it had been fattened on milk and potatoes and certain other ingredients which were not calculated to make it a firm and lasting pork. It will be seen in two years whether we continue to import American pork or not, and the hon gentlemen who have seen fit to place themselves on record this evening as stating that the farmers of this country would produce that kind of pork will be found unable to meet the statements which they have made. I am perfectly satisfied that the class of pork the lumber interest this country requires will not be produced in this country, and this duty will not encourage the farmer to raise it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the hon. gentleman kindly tell us why the lumbermen prefer the heavy pork?

Mr. BRYSON. I think every hon. gentleman who has used pork in the woods, or in new settlements, where a farmer has to clear the land in a section of country where the roads are unfit for heavy loads, knows that the heavier class of pork is more profitable for him, because it answers the two purposes of food and lard. The heavier pork is the most profitable our lumbermen can use.

Mr. FOSTER. In item 148, referring to liquors, some changes have been made. When the resolutions were brought down, it was provided that each red case of gin of 15 bottles should be dutiable as containing four gallons, and each green case of 12 bottles should be dutiable as containing two gallons. After having looked into the matter, I think it would be unfair to charge these measurements as full measurements, and I propose that the duty shall be charged on the actual quantity. The principle upon which the duty was to be levied was that all spirits should pay so much on proof, and that no allowance should be made for any liquors under proof, and that all over proof should pay in proportion. There has been a great deal of correspondence in reference to this. It is not necessary for me to go over the arguments pro and con; I will simply say that we propose to change this so far as to make the initial rate on proof to grade down to 15 below proof, to allow nothing on what is below 15 below proof, and charge for every degree of strength above proof.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In some cases the liquors are 20 to 25 per cent. below proof.

Mr. FOSTER. Some of them run to as far as 30 below proof, but the standard liquors are about 15 below.

Mr. Bryson.

Beans, viz: Tonquin, vanilla and nux vomica, crude only.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to strike out the words "crude only," and to insert the words "not refined."

Bells, when imported by and for the use of churches.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman should include with that those for the use of schools as well.

Mr. FOSTER. Bells are manufactured in this country, and it would not be well to interfere with their manufacture.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are interfering for the benefit of churches. The churches have been protesting against connection between church and state, and you should not give this special protection against these protests.

Mr. CHARLTON. Substitute schools for churches.

Books specially imported for the bond fide use of public free libraries, not more than two copies of any one book.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to add to this "books which have been printed and manufactured more than twenty years, bound and unbound."

Mr. SCRIVER. Does this exempt village libraries supported partly by annual contributions and fees.

Mr. FOSTER. They must be free public libraries.

Borax, ground or unground in bulk only.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to add after the words "in bulk only," "not less than twenty-five pounds."

Cabinets of coins, collections of medals and of other antiquities.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Do you not think these should be made dutiable. Cabinets of antiques ought to be taxed to protect the native industry. Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have all we want of them.

Chalk stone china or Cornwall stone, and cliff stone, manufactured.

Mr. FOSTER. After Cornwall stone put in "feldspar" and instead of "manufactured" insert "ground or unground."

Indian corn of the varieties known as "Southern Dent corn" (Mammoth Southern Sweet) and "Western Dent Corn" (Golden Beauty), when imported to be sown forensilage, and for no other purpose,

Mr. FOSTER. Add to this the words "under regulations to be made by Governor in Council," and also after "ensilage" the words "and soiling."

Mr. BAIN. It ought to be broad enough to cover fodder, as the word "soil" would mean used in the green state, whereas it may be used in a dry condition.

Mr. FOSTER. I will add "fodder."

Mr. FISHER. Could the Minister not limit it quite so much. Instead of intimating special varieties, he might let the farmer choose the variety by saying: "such corn as will not ripen in this country" or "any corn to be used for that purpose."

Mr. FOSTER. It will be difficult to work as it is, and would be more difficult by being made wider.

Fish-hooks, nets and seines, and fishing lines and twines, but not to include sporting fishing tackle or hooks with flies or trawling spoons, or threads or twines commonly used for sewing or manufacturing purposes.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Minister, in this case, really mean what he says, that fishing lines and twines are to be free? I have brought this question up before, but, by some regulation of the Department, twines under a certain degree of fineness, were put on the list of threads, and it appears that the Department will still have the option of saying what are threads and what are twines. All the nets now used on the inland lakes are charged 20 or 25 per cent. duty, but this proposes to make them free. A good many of the poor people in my county spend their time in knitting nets for themselves or others, but it turns out that the thread is subject to a duty. It should be definitely stated here that the fishermen are permitted to use these nets. I have seen invoices on which heavy duties were charged, amounting in one case to $4 on a small quantity of twine which was charged as thread.

Mr. FOSTER. This clause is in plain English, and shows what the law means. The question of administration must be arranged with the Minister of Customs.

Mr. PLATT. Strike out all the words after "spoons."

Mr. BOWELL. The language is plain. The difficulty has been in drawing the line between fishing lines and twines, and threads. The most extraordinary arguments have been brought forward to sustain the position taken by the member for Prince Edward. I remember one person stating that the article was not a thread because it would not unravel in one particular way, forgetting that by taking the other end it would unravel. I admit there has been a great deal of difficulty, but we could not possibly rule as twine that which was neither more nor less than a coarse thread. If the hon. gentleman compares this with the old item, he will see it is much broader, and I think it will be better understood.

Mr. PLATT. So the Department will continue to charge duty on these nets?

Mr. BOWELL. The Department will continue to charge duty on threads which are brought in for purposes not contemplated by the Act.

Mr. PLATT. This is a special thread or twine which costs a large price, and is put up in balls of a very different kind from ordinary thread, and I think it is very easy for the Department to remedy this evil, and remove what is an anomaly in the National Policy, because it is really allowing the manufactured article to come in free and taxing the raw material.

Lumber and timber planks and boards of boxwood, cherry, chestnut, walnut, gumwood, mahogany, pitch pine, rosewood, sandalwood, sycamore, Spanish, cedar, oak, hickory, whitewood, African teak, black heart ebony, lignum vitæ, red cedar, redwood, satinwood and white ash, when not otherwise manufactured than rough sawn or split; and hickory billets to be used in the manufacture of axe, hatchet, hammer and other tool handles, when specially imported for such use; and the wood of the persimmon and dogwood trees, when imported in blocks for the manufacture of shuttles; and hickory lumber sawn to shape for spokes of wheels, but not further manufactured.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to add the following: 113

Hickory spokes rough turned, not tenoned, mitred, throated, faced, sized, cut to length, round tenoned or polished.

Mr. CHARLTON. I want to call the attention of the Minister about putting pitch pine lumber on the free list. Perhaps the Minister is not aware that our own lumber would be likely to meet with serious competition from this class, which is produced in great quantities in the Southern States. We have found, from year to year, that it is crowding away further north, and it has cut off our market for coarse-grained lumber in New York, and it is even sold in Cleveland, Chicago and Detroit. If it is admitted free of duty it will compete seriously with certain grades of our own lumber in Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. I believe it is a fact that South and North Carolina pine is competing successfully with the Michigan pine in the Eastern States. Pitch pine was placed upon the free list in 1869, and has continued there ever since, because it was used largely in ship-building in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. WATSON. It is a pity that some of the other industries of Canada have not got the same privilege as the carriage manufacturers of Gananoque, because they are practically getting the manufactured spoke free of duty, and all that is to be done is simply to clean it off. These spokes are practically turned spokes, and they only require to be sand-papered.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon, gentleman will come over to the Department I will show him one or two of them, after which he will not make that statement again.

Mr. WATSON. I have seen several thousands of them.

Mr. BOWELL. They were not free.

Mr. WATSON. The person who had these spokes in his possession told me they were to be free, and that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had secured that great benefit to the wheel manufacturers. These spokes are practically manufactured.

Mr. BOWELL. These have already been on the free list for years. The free spoke that was admitted originally was split from the wood. Now they take the lathe into the woods, and it cuts the spoke from the rough. It is just as easily done as the splitting into shape, but they have to be put into the lathe again.

Mr. WATSON. This wheel manufacturer told me these spokes only had to be finished up on the sand-paper belt, that being the case, they are practically finished. He also told me that was one great benefit the wheel manufacturers had of having a good representative in Parliament.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon gentleman evidently does not know what he is talking about. This rough spoke, after it is received in the factory, has to go through four different machine. It has got to go through the throating machine, then the mitreing machine, then the facing machine, then the round tenoning machine, and over two sand belts. What labor is necessary to be done to the spoke, has got to be done after it arrives here.

Mr. WATSON. Except the turning.

Mr. TAYLOR. The old tariff admitted hickory lumber sawn to shape. There is no difference between sawn to shape and rough turned to shape.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is a "nigger" in the fence.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was admitted before our factory was started. All the manufacturers in the country, and there are several of them, have the same privileges. The hon, gentleman says that a wheel manufacturer told him so. I tell him that no wheel manufacturer in the country made any such statement, because if he did he stated what is absolutely false.

Mr. WATSON. The charge I made the hon. member does not deny. I say that the spoke is a turned spoke, and comes into this country manufactured, so far as turning is concerned. It has only got to be finished with sand-paper. The hon. gentleman will not say that it has to be put in a lathe and be turned again.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the theory of the hon. Minister of Customs and the hon. Minister of Finance, last night, was good, their conduct in this respect is not logical. They told us, with reference to some things brought in here, that it would interfere with the workingmen and reduce their employment. If we were importing turned spokes manufactured, it would be interfering with the labor market here. Hon, gentlemen opposite tell us when they impose a duty that it does not increase the price, and when they remove a duty it does not affect the price. The tariff is framed on a very peculiar system.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). There is a good deal of force in what the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) has stated. There are factories in this country engaged in turning, and if carriage builders are allowed to import their material free, an injustice is done to these factories. We have a turning factory in St. Thomas, and this tariff may prevent that factory from selling turned goods to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). There must be some influence brought to bear to induce the Government to make this arrangement of duty, and, perhaps, important services rendered to the party are to be rewarded in this way.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know whether, as the hon. member for Leeds is a free trader in his own business, we should object to it. It is a beginning made in the right direction, and I cannot find fault with the hon. gentleman getting his spokes in. It shows he is more advanced than are the Government.

General LAURIE. I should like to bring to the notice of the Committee the tropical fruits mentioned in item 312. I think the same principle should be applied that is applied in the case of molasses, and they should be free from the country of production, in order that we may encourage direct trade between the West Indies and our own ports. We have already lines of steamers running, and, instead of our purchasing these fruits in Boston and New York, we should encourage our own ports to be the entrepots at which these articles should be obtained.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How is a distinction to be made between these articles grown in the West Indies and Florida? If they were purchased in New statement made by the hon. Minister, that corn is Mr. TAYLOR.

York they would be bought in the country of production.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be very difficult to carry out the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne (General Laurie).

On imported Indian corn, to be kiln-dried and ground into meal for human food, or ground into meal and kiln-dried for such use, under such regulations as may be made by the Governer in Council, there may be allowed a draw-back of 90 per cent. of the duty paid.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the Minister would do well to explain how the miller is to specify that the meal is only to be used for human food. A very large portion of the meal, which is vulgarly supposed to be eaten by the people of the Maritime Provinces, is used for feeding cattle, and, therefore, under this clause, it would not be entitled to a drawback. Perhaps the Minister will inform us what arrangement he proposes in this respect?

Mr. GILLMOR. We have several grist mills in the County of Charlotte and on the frontier. They have been in the habit of drying corn, but not kiln-It is not at all necessary that the corn should be kiln-dried in order to make meal for human food, and as soon as this dried corn is ground, it is disposed of for human food. Nobody can tell when a person buys this meal and takes it home, whether it is to be used for human food or the feeding of animals. I want to know if the Government cannot allow these millers to get a drawback on the meal used for human food, the same as if it was kiln-dried? If this drawback were given it would encourage the manufacture of this meal, and give these mills large employment. It would be conferring a great favor on these mills if this drawback was allowed when dried cornnot kiln-dried—is used for human food. I have several communications from persons in my county on this subject, and I would like very much if the Government would make such an arrangement as I have suggested.

This matter has been very care-Mr. FOSTER. fully considered and the item as it is here provides all that the Government consider is best in the general interest to do. The corn to come under this item must be kiln-dried and ground into meal, or it must be ground and the meal kiln-dried after being ground. The latter is being done now in some of the mills of the Maritime Provinces, especially for the West India trade—a trade that my friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) thought would never be worked up.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have never heard of it. Mr. FOSTER. There are some things, even in the Maritime Provinces, that my hon friend has not heard of.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There are a great many more things which my hon. friend can imagine than he has ever heard of.

Mr. FOSTER. It is true that corn can be ground without being kiln-dried and used for human food, but it does not have keeping qualities when it is not kiln-dried.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is evident from the statement made by the Minister of Finance, that representations made to him by interested parties have very great weight. I venture to say that the ground for export to the West Indies, is entirely inaccurate. There is no such thing. Whoever made that statement to the Minister intended to had him astray, with the object, perhaps, to induce him to make this regulation. The hon. genduce him to make this regulation. tleman may, perhaps, find out that in all these subjects he is yet in the chair of a student,

Mr. FOSTER. And before a most eminent master, who is now opposite to me.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). He may have to occupy that chair a long time before he attains to the seat of a master. I desire to know what arrangement the Government can make, so as to see how the miller, who grinds the corn, may dispose of it according to the regulations of this item? Suppose a miller sells a hundred barrels of meal in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, that can never be true.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have no doubt that the hon, gentleman's experience never compassed a hundred barrels of meal, until he got here to manage the finances of the country, and, therefore, he cannot understand the extent of such a transaction as that. But the miller may sell his hundred barrels of cornmeal to the local merchant, and that is to be distributed to the 200 different people throughout the country. What certificate are they to give that this is all to be used for human food, and that no portion is to be used for other purposes? I think they will have a good deal of difficulty in providing for that.

The hon. gentleman is afflicted Mr. FOSTER. with two diseases: in the first place, he knows too much, and, in the second place, he seeks knowledge too eagerly before its time. He will get the knowledge when the Order in Council is passed and brought before the House, and not before. As to my hon. friend's assumption of superior knowledge, it goes but a very little distance. I never pretend to know more than I think I have a chance of knowing, and what I said with reference to cornmeal was not said in the way of criticism, but I was carrying out what was said by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who is always courteous when he addresses the House, and from whom the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) might take a lesson.

We have a couple of mills in Mr. LOVITT. Yarmouth, and their proprietors have written to me to say that it is a delusion and a snare to suppose that they can grind this for human food.

Mr. FOSTER. It is for human food; it is not for animal food.

Mr. LOVITT. They must grind it to fatten their hogs. I think it is more than a delusion and

Mr. GILLMOR. The mills do not put this meal in barrels; they put it in two-bushel bags, and it goes to their customers in small quantities when it is needed. This meal is as much used for human food as it would be if kiln-dried and put in bar-I have no doubt that kiln-dried meal will keep longer for exportation than meal which is not kiln-dried; but the mills at St. Andrews, St. Stephens and other localities, are grinding thousands of bushels of corn, and I do not think the 1131

the hon. Minister will see his way to let them sell this meal for human as well as for animal food. After a man buys a bag of meal and takes it home, how can you find out whether he eats it or feeds it to his cow?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Charlotte to strike out "kilndried," ought to be adopted. As a general rule, the corn is always kiln-dried before being made into meal; but I know that a large quantity is made into meal without being kiln-dried. For instance, in August and September, when the corn is dry and hard, a great quantity is ground into meal without requiring to be kiln-dried, while at this season of the year it will need to be kiln-dried to make it keep.

Mr. FISHER. When the hon. Finance Minister, in the course of his Budget speech, expressed his intention of allowing a rebate on corn, he specially indicated it as being something given to the people of the Eastern Provinces in return for the extra duty imposed on flour. He practically said that he hoped and expected that the people of those Provinces were going to get this commeal for food at a cheaper rate than they had got it in the past, and might substitute it for the flour which he was going to make dearer to them by an increase of the tax upon it. I think the conditions attached to this item show clearly that the people of the Eastern Provinces are not going to get any benefit from the reduction of the duty on corn. It is evident that the words "kiln-dried" simply mean that only the corn used for export will get the rebate; in other words, the people who might buy corn in small quantities for human food will not get the advantage of it, because it would not pay the mills to kiln-dry it for the sake of the small quantity they would sell. The hon. Minister says that no doubt the cornmeal would be used for human food if it were not kept for a long time. As a rule, it is only poor people who will buy this meal in small quantities, and when they do it is not necessary that it should be kiln-dried in order to be fit for human food. The difficulties and restrictions hedged around this provision, which the hon. Finance Minister has not in any way lessened, will be such as practically to nullify the effect of the provision altogether. I am rather surprised that the hon. Finance Minister and the hon. Minister of Customs have taken the expedient of a rebate. We can all remember when they refused to allow a rebate on corn that might be used for feeding cattle, in the same way as they allowed a rebate on corn used for making whiskey. On that occasion the hon. Minister of Customs explained how difficult it would be to prove that the product was really exported. I think he will find it equally difficult to manage the regulations regarding this rebate; and although the Government have decided at this late hour of the Session to do away with that rebate of the duty on corn for whiskey, I am rather sur-prised that the hon. Minister of Customs is now willing to undertake the difficulties which he so graphically pointed out before. He is now quite willing to face these difficulties, because he hopes thereby to turn the edge of discontent throughout the Eastern Provinces which will be occasioned by the increase in the duty on flour. It is not an excountry would suffer by the change I propose, but pedient which is going to accomplish any good for the people would be accommodated, and I hope the people in whose interests it is professedly adopted. The Ministers clearly indicate that they expect that their increased duty on flour is going to be a hardship to the people, and they are going to compel them to eat this cheaper food.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.35 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 18th April, 1890.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAVERS

AYLMER BRANCH, C.P.R.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 141) to facilitate the purchase by the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company from the Canadian Pacific Railway, of the branch line between Hull and Aylmer, and that Rules 49 and 51 be suspended as relating thereto, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VACANCY IN KENT, N.B.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to give you, Mr. Speaker, official information that Mr. P. A. Landry, member of Parliament for Kent, N.B. has ceased to be a member of this House, having accepted an office under the Crown-Judge of a County Court, I believe-and I would ask you to issue your warrant for a new election.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), who has been called away, has received a telegram from the firm of which he is a member, in the Maritime Provinces, relating to a matter which he has asked me to bring before the House. I had better read the telegrain.

Mr. SPEAKER. It would be better to bring that matter up on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Very well.

SERGEANT VALIQUETTE'S CASE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. When the Estimates were before the House, my attention was drawn by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to a letter which was contained in the papers I placed upon the Table in the case of Valiquette, in which some remarks were made in reference to the action of Lieut. Col. Hughes, who, it was stated, had received the money paid on behalf of Valiquette. I think it is due to Lieut.-Col. Hughes, who occupies a very prominent position, to lay on the Table of the House a statutory dethe conduct which Colonel Hughes followed at friend, a good soldier on the battle-field, and a Mr. FISHER.

It is in French, but, for the convenience of the House, I have had it translated, and I shall read the translation:

Mr. BLAKE. I do not wish to enter into any discussion of the matter now, but I do not think that what I said on that occasion has been fully answered by the declaration the hon. gentleman has read. The observation I made upon the subject I do not think has been fully answered by the hon. gentleman's declaration.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If I recollect correctly the remarks of the hon. gentleman, they were with reference to the fact that Colonel Hughes had been the bearer of a power of attorney for Valiquette. I fully agree with the hon. gentleman that it is a debatable question whether any Government official should be the bearer of and act under a power of attorney.

When the matter comes up in Mr. BLAKE. Supply I am anxious that the hon. gentleman shall give some further information on the subject.

Mr. BERGERON. I am very glad to hear the words which have fallen from the hon. Minister of Militia and Defended Militia and Defence, accompanying the reading of this document from Colonel Hughes. I had no doubt, when my hon. friend from West Durham made his remarks sometime ago, that there was a misunderstanding somewhere. I, like yourself, Mr. Speaker, have had the pleasure of knowing Colonel Hughes for manual languages. Colonel Hughes for many years, and I have always

THE MODUS VIVENDI.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 134) respecting Fishing Vessels of the United States of America. He said: I am very sorry that it is not yet printed in French. I will ask the House to expedite the Bill, for the reason that the season is advancing when its provisions will be required.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Bill which the hon. gentleman asks us to read a second time practically assents to a renewal of the modus vivendi; that, I take it, is practically the meaning of the Bill. wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that its language differs very materially from the language we adopted when we passed the modus rivendi on the refusal of the United States Governor ment to ratify the Treaty of Washington. Act does not lay down the rates which were to be charged by the Government in granting these licenses; that power is transferred to the Governor in Council. Now, I submit this is a very bad principle that we are introducing into our legislation from year to year. This matter particularly affecting international arrangements, should be discussed and decided by this Parliament. charged heretofore was $1.50 a ton, but under the present Act the Governor in Council is authorised to issue the licenses at such fees and on such conditions as they deem advisable. Now, even if the House should consent to the proposition to delegate this important power to the Governor in Council, a proposition which, I think, we should not assent to, still, before doing so, we should have the fullest information as to the condition in which the matter now stands, and as to what the Government propose to do, whether the intention of the Government is to adopt the same scale of fees and the same divisions which were adopted and attached to these licenses, or whether the condition of affairs now has given rise, in their minds, to the opinion that a change should be adopted with regard either to the divisions attached to the license, or the fees to be charged.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The intention is to charge the same fee, and I have no objection to put that in the Bill. It was only for another reason that appears upon the face of the Bill, that we did not state the fees.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I would like the hon. gentleman to state whether he is in a position to give the House any information as to the state of the negotiations at the present time between the respective Governments in regard to this important question. We know that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has been at Washington for some time past, and the general understanding is that he has been taking part in negotiations with regard to the differences with respect to the Behring Sea seizures. Now, this important question must have been brought up, or should have been brought up, and I dare say has been brought up. It is a matter on which the House is entitled to any information which the public interest justifies the hon. gentleman in giving us.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All I can say about that subject is that the negotiations down to the present time have been almost exclusively with reference to the Behring Sea question, but there has been an intimation on the part of the United States authorities that when that question is disposed of, they will not be unwilling to renew negotiations for the purpose of settling any differences with regard to the fisheries on the Atlantic coast. The negotiations on that subject have been deferred until the conclusion of the negotiations with respect to the Behring Sea. I cannot speak more definitely than that, but we think that what has been done justifies us in asking for a renewal of the modus vivendi.

Mr. LAURIER. I must certainly take exception to the manner in which this proposed legislation is introduced to the House. I apprehend that at this moment no subject of greater importance can be brought before the attention of a Canadian We have not received the slightest Parliament. information with regard to this subject except that which has been extracted from the Minister, and even the information which he has now imparted This is a to us is of the most meagre character. subject upon which the Government have been reticent for years past. Whenever it was broached we were always told that negotiations were progressing, and the Government did not think it was advisable to give any more information. I do not, for my part, complain of any reticence that is justified by the public interest; still, I think, when such important legislation is introduced the people are anxious to know, and ought to be informed, what is the condition of the relations with the United States with regard to this pressing matter. The Government, in my estimation, will better serve the public interest by stating exactly in what position the negotiations now stand, if there is any proposition to negotiate any treaty or if new propositions are to be entered upon. This is a power which rests in the hands of the Government. This Bill will not go into law except at such time and manner as the Government think it advisable. This is not a proper method to adopt. I am glad to say, however, that the hon. Minister is to correct it to some extent; but, on the whole, I submit the Government have not given us the information which this House should possess in regard to this important matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not my fault, because I have given the hon. gentlemen all that has transpired with respect to this subject, and it is impossible for me to invent information. If the hon. gentleman desires the information respecting the working of the modus vivendi, the number of licenses issued and the terms, I can give him that information; but as regards other matters, I have no further information to give.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think the explanation of the Minister of Justice is one that exactly meets the enquiry made and the information sought by the leader of the Opposition. We know very well, what the working of the modus vivendi has been in the past; certainly it has not been too satisfactory, and as the House is now approaching, we hope, the close of its labors, the Government should be prepared to give us some information as to the position of the negotiations, the progress made, and whether unreasonable demands have been made and concessions asked. The Government should be prepared, at all events, to give us some information on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire at this stage, to bring before the House, a matter of which I spoke earlier in the day, before the Orders of the Day were called, and it is apropos of this Bill which we are now asked to read the second time. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) received a telegram with respect to the admission Dominion fishing vessels into the harbors of Newfoundland. It contained information that the Newfoundland Government propose to impose a duty of $1 per registered ton on Dominion vessels every time they enter the harbors of Newfoundland for the purpose of purchasing bait. These vessels have to enter four, five or six times a year to replenish their stock of bait, and as the vessels average a tonnage of from 80 to 100 tons, each vessel will be subject to a duty of about $400 a year, which will be a most serious matter. should like to ask the Government if they have any information on the subject, and whether the statements contained in the telegram are within their knowledge. The telegram reads:

Newfoundland merchants wire us our fishing vessels will have to pay $1 per registered ton for every time they enter Newfoundland this year. This means about $400 each vessel."

Have the Government had any information on the subject, and, if the Government have had information, has any official action been taken with respect to the matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Nothing more definite has been received by the Government than that which the hon, gentleman has read to the House. That has been communicated to a member of the Government, and telegraphic communication will be had with the Government of Newfoundland.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Communication has not yet been made?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. Do I understand that this Bill is identical with the Act on the Statute-book?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not identical. The point to which the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) called my attention was, that the fee for license was not mentioned in the terms of the Bill, but was left to the discretion of the Governor in Council. I now propose to state what the fee will be. I do not know there are other material points in which the Bills differ.

Mr. BLAKE. The Bill was not distributed to We had no reason to suppose it would be taken to-day, and we had no opportunity of looking at it, and I can see the great importance, if there be any difference in the present proposal of the Government as compared with the old Act, that there should be an opportunity for hon, members to consider it. If the hon, gentleman is simply going to repeat the old Act, I would not raise any objection; but if the conditions are to be altered, the very circumstance that it is a grave international matter is reason rather for dilatoriness than for undue pressure on the House as to the passage of it.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to look at the Bill, I will read the original Modus Vivendi Act. I find the language is not precisely the same, but the effect will be the same. The old Act says:

"For the purpose of carrying into effect the protocol set torth in section b to this Act it is hereby enacted that ending the exchange of ratification mentioneed in article 16 of the treaty, and for a period not exceeding two years from the 15th day of February, 1888, the privilege of entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coast of Canada shall be granted to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses at a fee of $1.50 per ton for the following purposes; (a) the purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines and all other supplies and outfits; (b) transhipment of catch and shipping of crews."

Mr. BLAKE. This Bill is, in one sense, more limited, and, in another sense, more extended. The license in the old Act was limited to the Atlantic coast, but it also applied to bays, harbors and coasts; but in the present Bill it is limited to a port, but it may be a port anywhere. So while American vessels will not be allowed, under the present Bill, to enter bays and harbors, this Bill will allow American vessels to go into ports on the Pacific coast, and other ports as well.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have no objection to limit the Bill to the Atlantic coast, and it is so intended.

Mr. BLAKE. That is one restriction, but in another part there is another restriction. You have a restriction to any port in the Dominion of Canada. But the old Act covers much more than ports.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Bays and harbors.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, and they are left out in the present Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think port is a more accurate expression, as a vessel cannot buy bait or transship crews without going into port. Every harbor in the Atlantic coast is a port; it is impossible to enter a harbor there without entering a port.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman consider that the Bills are identical in meaning.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I do. I think the term port more accurate. Bays and harbors was the expression used in the treaty.

Mr. BLAKE. There was nothing said in the Act with respect to terms and conditions.

No terms and con-Sir JOHN THOMPSON. ditions were stated.

For what reason were they Mr. BLAKE. omitted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In order to enable us to spread on the face of the license what is in-The license issued is in these terms: tended.

"Minister of Marine and Fisheries

"Collector of Customs at the port of

We, at present, have no definite arrangement for this season with the Government of Newfoundland, and they have hesitated to give their assent to this modus rivendi. If they should give that assent, we want it expressed on the face of the license that it is good for Newfoundland as well as for Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are two sub-sections of the section ratifying the modus vivendi, which the hon, gentleman has not inserted in this Bill; one of them relates to the reciprocal trade in the following terms:

"If during the continuance of this arrangement the United States remove the duties on fish fish oil, whale oil, and seal oil, as well as on the necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans and other useful and necessary coverings containing them, as in section 12 of this Act set forth, such licenses shall be issued free of charge by such officers and in such form as the Governor in Council may determine." mine.

Of course the hon, gentleman contemplates renewing that section, and also the other section, which is as follows:

" No United States fishing vessel entering the bays and "No United States fishing vessel entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coast of Canada for any of the four purposes mentioned in article one of the Convention of the twentieth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and not remaining therein more than twenty-four hours, shall be required to enter or clear at the Customs, provided that such vessel does not communicate with the shore."

That is a question whether it would not issue for The main the period mentioned in section 14. section provides:

"That pending the exchange of ratifications mentioned in article 16 of the treaty, and for a period not exceeding two years from the fifteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, the privilege of entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coast of Canada shall be granted to the United States fishing vessels by annual licenses at a fee of one dollar and fifty cents per ton, for the following purposes:—
"(a) The purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines and all other supplies and outfits; "(b) Transshipment of catch and shipping of crews. If nothing more is said about that it is a question

If nothing more is said about that, it is a question whether it would not lapse, and whether it is not necessary that the hon. Minister should re-enact those provisions in this Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It strikes me otherwise. In the first place, the reason for inserting this provision was that the modus vivendi was to last for two years. In this case it is only for a short time, and the probability of the duty being removed is not very great. I think that sub-section 2 of section 12 of the Act of 1888, covers the case. It says:

"Upon such removal of duties, and so long as the aforesaid articles are allowed to be carried into the United States by all subjects of Her Majesty, without duty being re-imposed, and so long as privileges are continued or given to fishing vessels in Canada on the Atlantic coasts of the United States, the privilege of entering the ports, bays and harbors of the coasts of Canada aforesaid, shall be accorded to the United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes:

poses:

"(a) The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits;

"(b) Transshipment of catch for transport by any means of conveyance;
"(c) Shipping of crews."

The purpose being the same, I understand that still remains in the statute.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will see that the section to which he calls attention has reference to the state of facts which would exist whilst the Treaty of Washington was being ratified; but then we have special legislation with regard to the treaty with respect to the refusal of the Senate to ratify, in which case we passed section

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman mis-recollects it to a certain extent. Section 14 was not intended to provide for the contingency of the treaty failing. It was intended to provide for the interim between the signature of the treaty and the time it would be ratified. I think it is a standing provision that the United States fishermen will have these rights whenever the duties are removed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I call the hon. gentleman's attention to section 3 of section 14, which I have already quoted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that it is in force now, because it is a sub-section of section 14.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be necessary to re-enact that?

Mr. MITCHELL. It strikes me that if the Act of two years ago, which was a very full and elaborate Act, was necessary, it is equally necessary now. This present Bill is an exceedingly brief and meagre affair, and I can quite understand, if the old Act is in force, all that we have to do is to extend the term for a calendar year, but if it is not in force, we have to re-enact these clauses of the old Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Sub-section 4 of section 14 says:

"No United States fishing vessel shall be subject to forfeiture under the Act respecting fishing by foreign vessels, except for the offences of fishing or preparing to fish in the waters referred to in section 9 of this Act."

That is one of most important provisions in the Act of 1888, and that whole section is made dependent upon the action of the Senate of the United States, and it declares that the whole section shall cease to have any force if the treaty is rejected by the Senate of the United States. So that these two sub-sections I spoke of, doing away with the necessity of clearing at the Custom house, and in reference to forfeiture of a vessel which is seized by law, must be re-enacted, unless Parliament chooses to go back on the opinion they formed in 1888. To my mind, it is absolutely essential to re-enact these sections of the Act.

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask the Minister of Justice if it will suit his convenience to leave this Bill over until the next sitting of the House, inasmuch as other members, as well as myself, have not had time to look into it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection.

Committee rose and reported progress.

DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL INFORMATION.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 122) to prevent the disclosure of official documents and information.—(Sir Adolphe Caron.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In moving the second reading of this Bill, I explained it; but there is one point to which I should like to draw the attention of the Committee. The hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) expressed a desire to see the dispatch which was received from the Imperial Government in reference to the measure, and I am happy now to be able to produce it for his information. It merely states that this legislation has been obtained in England, France, Germany and other countries, and requests on behalf of the English Government that we should pass it here, provided it is acceptable to the Canadian Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. The document is just about what I expected it was. It is a request from the British Government that we should pass an Act to enforce the protection of the naval and military stations against sketches and photographs being made of the defences of the country. But the hon. gentleman has engrafted on the Bill something like a slur on the Civil Service of this country. I am not aware that there is any necessity for that, unless the hon. gentleman can state that something has occurred to render it necessary.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg to state, what I did before, that I did not draft any part of the Bill, except a portion of one clause fixing the penalty. That is the sole difference between this Bill and the Imperial statute. There is no clause attacking the Civil Service. The law applies to everybody, and is for the purpose of protecting the fortresses, and preventing the disclosure of official documents or information which might be injurious to the State.

Mr. MITCHELL. So far as regards the legislation asked for by England for the protection of her military arsenals and stores, it is perfectly correct, and I do not object to it; but I want to know where he finds in the English statute which he has shown me, any provision similar to section 2, which seems to me to cast a slur on the Civil Service of this country, by providing punishment for certain offences which it has never been suggested that anybody has been guilty of. The only instance I know of in which a fellow ought to have been sent to the penitentiary, was the case of that Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who kept back our returns in the last election, but I do not find any provision in this Bill with regard to him.

Mr. BLAKE. Where was he sent?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh! he was promoted for his iniquity. However, I have had my say in this matter. If the hon. gentleman will quote a single instance in which a civil servant has imparted information, I withdraw my objection, but unless he can do so, I do not think we should pass the second clause.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to send him the English statute, Sir John Thompson.

of which this Bill is a copy, he will see that they are both clause for clause exactly the same.

Mr. MITCHELL. I read over what the hon. gentleman sent me. It is true, it is a copy of the Gibraltar Act.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is quite a different thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is the hon. gentleman's own mistake, if he did not send me the right Act. Why did he not explain this at the outset, and save all this discussion?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did explain it two or three times.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 130) to amend the Interpretation Act.

On section 1.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I take this opportunity to make the explanation which I was asked to make a few days ago, in relation to the point as to how far this Bill changes the rule of construction in force in England. I wish to say, in the first place, that I may have too strongly stated the nature of the judgment given in our own courts on this question. What I did say, of course, was from information I had received, but, on asking for a copy of the judgment, I was informed that the decision was not written, but had been delivered orally, and that the opinion I referred to, was the opinion of two members of the bench and not of all the judges who rendered judgment. The judgment delivered by the Exchequer Court, however, was in writing, and I will read the passage which deals with this point. I only desire to add that, while it may not be conclusive of the matter, I am greatly confirmed in the view I have expressed by the amondment to the Customs Act made by Parliament in the Session of 1889 (52 Vic., chap. 14, sec. 7) to which my attention was directed at the hearing, by which among other things it was provided that goods which are permitted to remain unclaimed, as the teas in question were, in any country intermediate between the country of export and Canada, should not be censidered as intransitive through such intermediate country, but should be treated as goods imported from such intermediate country and valued and rated for duty accordingly. circumstances of the case were, as I pointed out the other day, that certain teas imported into the United States, and sold there as unclaimed, and then sent to Canada, were claimed as being in Canada direct from the country of growth. The question having been raised by Council, on a claim made against the Department of Customs, that goods permitted to remain unclaimed in the United States were direct importations from the country of growth, the Minister of Justice sought to remove that difficulty by introducing an amendment to the Customs law, providing that where goods are permitted to remain unclaimed, as these in question were, in any intermediate country between the country of export and Canada, they should not be considered in transit. I do not suppose there can be a doubt that every hon. gentleman understood the original section precisely as they understood the amendment, notwithstanding which the judge was strongly influenced by the idea that Parliament intended to change the law when it passed the amendment. It does not seem from his judgment that his mind would have been free from doubt except for that presumption, which was wholly fictitious. I think I may say that the Bill will not change the rules of construction as adopted by the English courts. As I stated on a previous occasion, we are continually amending the statutes without changing the law. The necessity for this arises from the peculiar circumstances of the country, which are widely dif-ferent from those of England. The Superior Courts are scattered in the different Provinces, while in England they are concentrated. It is impossible that the decisions of all these different courts can be known to every member of Parliament, and it is oftentimes wise to remove doubts which have been cast by a decision in the shape of an amendment, rather than wait until litigation has finally settled the matter by appeal in the highest courts. The Bill to amend the Act relating to lands in the North-West Territories, introduced this Session, is an instance of that. There cannot be a doubt that Parliament intended the adoption of the Torrens system to be compulsory in the original Act; but one or two judges have held that the adoption was not obligatory, but that two land systems might co-exist. The adoption of the amendment, which will be before the House in a few days, will remove the difficulty arising from those decisions, and under a forced rule of construction this amendment may be held as changing the law. cannot adopt the remedy of declaring that the law was otherwise than the decision has made it appear to be, because that would be to change existing rights perhaps, and at any rate to make a declaration of what the law is, inconsistent with that which some courts have decided it to be. To show that the Bill will not materially change the existing rules of construction in England, I make a few citations from Endlich on the construction of statutes, his treatise being founded on Maxwell

" 'A mere recital in an Act whether of fact or of law is "A mere recital in an Act whether of fact or of law is not conclusive, but courts are at liberty to consider the fact or the law to be different from the statement in the recital; unless, indeed, it be clear that the Legislature intended the law should be, or the fact should be, regarded as recited."—Maxwell (2nd ed.), 381.

"Maxwell recites a number of instances of the application of these rules, and adds, page 381:
"In all these cases, no inference necessarily arose that the Legislature intended to alter the law, and to make it as it was alleged to be.
"A different effect, however, would be given to an Act which showed whether by recital or enactment that it intended to effect a change.
"If the mistake is manifested in words competent to

If the mistake is manifested in words competent to make the law in future, there is no principle which can make the law in future, there is no principle which can deny them this effect."

Whether there is any object in enacting that no declaration shall be involved as to the view taken by Parliament is another question.

'In some States (United States) the principle has been made a statutory rule of construction, that the repeal of an Act is not to be deemed a declaration that any Act or part of an Act, expressly or impliedly so repealed, was previously in force.—Endlich, sec. 372; Stimson's American Statute Law, page 1043."

This is in the California Political Code, sec. 4,504:

This is in the California Political Code, sec. 4,504: "The repeal of any statute or part of a statute here-tofore repealed must not be construed as a declaration, express or by implication, that such statute or part of a statute has been in force at any time subsequent to such first repeal."

The New York Revised Statutes of 1828, chap. 21, sec. 9, contain this provision:

"The repeal by this Act of any statute or part of a statute heretofore repealed shall not be construed as a declaration or implication that such statute or part of a statute has been in force at any time subsequent to such first repeal."

Again, in the Wisconsin Revised Statutes, 1878, section 4,979 we find:

"The repeal of the Acts mentioned in the preceding section shall not * * * be construed as a declaration that any Act or part of an Act heretofore expressly or impliedly repealed was in force at any time subsequent to such first repeal."

Now, I have even a higher authority, the Imperial Interpretation Act, 1889, section 38, which provides:

"Where this Act or any Act passed after the com-mencement of this Act repeals any other enactment, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the repeal then, unless the contrary interaction appears, shall not "(a) Revive anything not in force or existing at the time at which the repeal takes effect, or "(b) Affect the previous operation of any enactment so repealed, or anything duly done or suffered under any enactment so repealed."

The Act 51 Victoria (Ontario), chapter 2, "An Act respecting the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1887," contains this provision in section 3:

"The Legislature is not, by reason of the passing of this Act or of the Act passed in the fiftieth year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled: 'An Act respecting the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1887,' to be deemed to have adopted the construction which may, by judicial construction or otherwise, have been placed upon the language of any of the attenties included among the Revised Statutes." any of the statutes included among the Revised Statutes.

The proposition which I submit to the Committee is that the principle embodied in this Bill is a principle of construction which is not at variance with the existing state of English law, or with the state of law in this country, excepting in so far as doubts have been cast upon these rules of construction by the dicta of judges, recently delivered, and that, in so far as they may be affected by dicta recently delivered, it is desirable that the intention of Parliament should be made clear, and it is safer to establish a principle which should be followed unless the reasons for a different rule are apparent on the face of the Act itself, that the change of the law is intended, and does tend, to prevent an artificial presumption on the part of the courts, and prevents the construction of statutes being made on a fiction which has no foundation in fact, namely, that Parliament has desired to adopt judicial construction previously pronounced in re-enacting any statutes; but in all these respects the duty will always be cast upon the courts still to declare the real intention and meaning of Parliament. The courts should not be relieved from that duty, and under the English laws, they are not relieved from the duty of ascertaining what the intention of Parliament was, simply, because Parliament has desired to make the law more clear and not to change the law. When this Bill was in committee before, I explained the cause in reference to judicial con-I have read the provision in the struction. Revised Statutes of Ontario to the Committee, in order to show that this is the rule adopted in those statutes, and I think that it should be adopted here, more particularly in view of the different position of our courts, existing as the do, in different Provinces, and their decisions being rarely subject to revision or appeal.

Mr. BLAKE. I must confess that I apprehended that the object and intention of the clauses of this Bill, as they were explained by the Minister of Justice the other day, were much more extensive than I am disposed to understand, by his explanations to-day; not that the interpretation is inconsistent with his original statement, but from what I gathered as the discussion proceeded. I am not disposed at all to quarrel, not having looked at the matter since, with the view he takes, except in case of very special circumstances in the language, that a subsequent Act which repeals or, at any rate, amends, a former Act, is not to be taken as an absolute declaration with regard to the prior Act. That involves conclusiveness, it involves a decision of the subject, it leaves nothing to the judicial mind to consider except the determination whether there is an amendment or a repeal, and then the court is to draw its conclusions from the parliamentary declaration. I conceive that has never been the English or Canadian rule of interpretation in those courts with whose decisions I have any familiarity. Nor has the hon gentleman, as far as I can see, justified the view that, to lay down this rule of interpretation given by this Act, is required by the judicial dicta or decisions to which he has made reference. He has told us of the decisions or the dicta of two judges of the Supreme Court in a certain case, of which dicta, however, he has not been able to obtain any report, and, therefore, has not been able to produce them. I, therefore, set them aside. The Minister of Justice has read us a decision of the learned judge of the Exchequer Court, by which I do not understand him to state that he adopts such a rule of interpretation as this As far as I could gather the Act condemns. language of the learned judge, I understood that he had come to a certain interpretation of the Act of Parliament which he was construing, and that he was greatly confirmed in that by the circumstances under which the amendment of the former law took place. That is not laying down the view that there was a statutory declaration, by virtue of the amendments, which precluded further discussion or deliberation, that the law as it was before was different from the present law. I do not understand the learned judge, therefore, to have enunciated any doctrine which is condemned by this statute, and, that being so, I do not understand the necessity of this declaration to be established by the decision which the hon. gentleman considers an erroneous decision. The quotations the hon. gentleman has made from other statutes have only a limited application. The statute of California is very much like his own provision, but those of Wisconsin and New York were only statutes of revision, and it is quite obvious that the principles of interpretation in cases of revision, as to their effect upon pre-existing laws and vested rights, require special rules of action. The circumstance that in statutes of revision certain precautionary principles of interpretation are adopted, which are not to be found in reference to the ordinary statutes of the land, instead of being an argument in favor of the general view that the communities which adopt, in the exceptional cases, such exceptional principles of interpretation, adopt them generally, is an argument gentleman is introducing, arises from complaints just the other way. So the language of the Imperial made in my own county with reference to the last Sir John Thompson.

Act to which the hon. gentleman alluded seemed to me hardly to bear out the view that it was a precedent for this statute. However, as I have said, my impression is that so far as the interpretation of this Act goes which the hon. gentleman gives to-day, and which I quite admit it fairly bears, namely that the amendment or repeal shall not involve an absolute declaration of the fact, which will end all consideration of it, is an interpretation which is in general accordance with the existing principles of interpretation. But I am very much afraid that the Act will be taken to mean something more, having regard to the fact that the citation which the hon, gentleman makes in support of it in this House, is rather, to my mind, an attempt by the learned judge, rightly or wrongly, to introduce what I understand are principles of interpretation which do prevail, which I think do continue. and which, whether rightly or wrongly applied to that case, seem to be sound and wholesome, namely, that you may take into consideration, though not conclusive at all, but as a circumstance in forming your judgment, the fact that the Act is an amending Act, and I do not think that the existing conditions of judicial decision demand this legislation.

Bill reported, and read the third time and

INDIAN ADVANCEMENT ACT.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 132) to amend the Indian Advancement Act, chapter 44 of the Revised Statutes. He said: There are three amendments proposed in this Bill. The first is to give to the Indian Council power to pass regulations relative to the size and style of the sleighs used during the winter. It has been found that they use sleighs of all sizes and descriptions, which injure the winter roads, and this is to give the council power similar to that vested in the municipalities adjoining the reserves. The second amendment is to supplement clause 11 of the Act, by adding after the word "kind" the following :-

-"or who neglects or refuses, without reasonable cause to attend meetings of the council when notified thereof in the manner required by this Act, or who refrains from taking part in the proceedings by at least voting when present at such a meeting, or who either himself obstructs or induces any other person to obstruct the business of any such meeting, shall, on proof of the fact to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General. he discoulified any such meeting, shall, on proof of the fact to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General, be disqualified from acting as a member of the council, and shall, on being notified, ceaseforthwith so to act; and the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled in the manner hereinbefore provided."

The third amendment is to provide a day of nomination for candidates for election as councillors.

What is the reason for that Mr. LAURIER. last provision?

It has been asked for by the Mr. DEWDNEY. Indians themselves.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the election to be by ballot?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; I think not.

The Indians will hardly be Mr. LISTER. satisfied with the provision giving them a nomination day, unless you go further and give them the vote by ballot. I believe the provision the hon. gentleman is introducing, arises from complaints election for councillors in that county. They had no regular nomination, their vote was an open vote, and there were many and great complaints as to the way in which the election was carried on. Influences were brought to bear, and the Indians threatened that, unless they voted in a certain way certain advantages would not be given to them. Many of the most intelligent Indians on that reserve have complained to me that they ought to have, in the election of councillors, the same safeguards and the same rights that they have in the election of members to the House of Commons. If they are qualified to vote for members of the House of Commons by ballot, they say they are equally qualified to vote for members of their own council by ballot. Whether these influences exist or not, I would say to the Minister that there is a feeling among the bands of Indians of whom I know something, that such influences are exercised. If an election has been improperly conducted there is no way by which the wrong can be rectified, there is no court that they can appeal to. The last elections for councillors in the Chippawa Band upon the Sarnia and the Kettle Point Reserves, I have no hesitation in saying, were improperly conducted, and some men were elected councillors who ought not to be there, and have taken the place of people who were really the choice of the electors of that municipality. As the Minister has gone so far as to fix the nomination day, I would urge upon him to provide that their election shall be by ballot, and in doing that I believe he will conform to the wish of a great majority of the Indians upon whom the franchise has been conferred, and many, if not all of whom, are just as well qualified to vote as the rest of the electors throughout the country. It seems to me anomalous that we should say to them that they may vote by ballot in Dominion elections, they have sufficient intelligence and education to vote for members of the House of Commons by ballot, but in the smaller matter, though a great matter to them, the election of their own councillors, they shall have neither a proper nomination of candidates, nor shall they be permitted to cast their ballot as they wish, and as the spirit of this age approves.

Mr. LAURIER. The first provision of this Bill seems to me an unobjectionable one. It is to meet the requirements of keeping up good winter roads, and to keep them in the same manner as they are kept in the adjoining neighborhood. So far, the power which is sought to be given to the council, to regulate the manner of keeping winter roads, and to place them in the same position as those in the adjoining neighborhood, is quite appropriate, and so far I endorse the view of the hon. Minister. But the second section is altogether objectionable. It is sought by this provision to give the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs the power to remove a councillor for certain offences, among others, for the alleged offence of drunkenness. I am not disposed to endorse the view of the hon. Minister on this point. If you give the Indians the right of managing their own municipal affairs, that right given to white men, they should be treated as white men are treated. If the people in any municipality select a man as councillor, it is not fair, that he should be made the subject of removal if he does not come up to the standard of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. Hon, members are aware that the charge of drunkenness on the reserve is one that is very flimsily thrown at one another. The hon. Minister is aware that charges have been made within his own knowledge against men who were innocent of it. Moreover, a man has been charged on the floor of a deliberative body with being a drunkard, when he was not open to that reproach. I suppose the Indian Council is elec-The charge is made by some one that a councillor is a drunkard. That councillor may be obnoxious to the minority, who may have been unable to defeat him at the polls, and they then go to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs with this complaint of drunkenness. How is the hon. gentleman to decide? There may be a certificate signed by five or ten men that he is a drunkard; on the other hand, there may be a certificate more numerously signed, that he is not a drunkard. How is the trial to be made? It would be unfair that he should be deposed, except after a fair trial How is the trial to be arranged? Are you to compel the parties to come to Ottawa and to have a regular trial before the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, or are you going to send some officer to the reserve to try the alleged offender. Either one or the other course is not and cannot be followed with satisfactory results. Another provision in the Bill is that whoever refuses to attend meetings of the council when notified, or refrains from taking part in the proceedings by at least voting, may be removed by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. This proposal is not worded as I would wish it to be; but the idea which is here embodied is not one with which I would be disposed to find fault. If he refused to act as a councillor after a certain time I would not object to his office becoming ipso facto forfeited, but the power should not be given to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. The powers give the Superintendent General more control over the Indians than he should possess. For these reasons I consider the second clause is altogether objectionable, even although it contains a grain of good, and the suggestion made by an hon. friend behind me is one worthy of accept-

Mr. BLAKE. This is a curious commentary on the progress of the Indian and on his fitness to control the destinies of the country by voting for members of Parliament. The statute to which this is an amendment is not the statute applicable to the mass of the Indians; it is the Indian Advancement Act, it is the statute applicable only to the select Indians, to those who have advanced more in intelligence, and otherwise, than the mass, and it grants to these such special liberties, immunities and privileges, as it is considered fit to grant. By section 3, it is provided:

"Whenever any band of Indians is declared by the Governor in Council to be considered fit to have this Act applied lo them, this Act shall so apply, from the time appointed in such Order in Council."

As I said, the general Indian Act is the Act for the mass, this is the Act for the elect or the select. Being the Act for the elect and the select, entitled to greater privileges, to a more advanced citizenship, to larger rights than the mass of the Indians, it is yet hedged around in the original Act itself with precautions, with provisions for a continued tutelage on the part of the Minister, who is the great father for the time, being the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, which are very extraordinary. Section 11, which the hon. gentleman proposes to repeal, does of itself contain several of the provisions which are contained also in the substituted clause. For instance, it is provided that every member of a council elected under the provisions of this Act, who is proved to be an habitual drunkard, shall be disqualified. The council are elected annually, and, therefore, it is in the course of the year that proof is to be made and a result is to be arrived at. As to proof of his having become an habitual drunkard after he was elected, of course that is not intended, and it is hardly possible. Nor is it so limited. If the Indians choose to elect a person who may, to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, the great chief, the arbiter, the autocrat, the Czar, be held to be an habitual drunkard, -if such an Indian be chosen by the Indians, by the select Indians and the best and most advanced Indians, is he to be disqualified? In spite of the fact that he may be an habitual drunkard in such a sense as to render him liable to disqualification, they may elect him; but in this more dignified assembly there has been, not of course in these better days, but in other times still near, something very closely approaching habitual intoxication. is habitual intoxication? I have never, however, heard the proposal that the hon. the Premier of the Government, or the Governor General, or Mr. Speaker, or any other analogous officer should be called upon to make a trial of the fact whether a condition of habitual drunkenness subsists on the part of any one so elected, or that he should determine whether the person in question should cease to be a member of this body. The next clause provides that a councillor shall be disqualified if he has been living in immorality. What does that mean, and to whom will you apply it? Will you apply a higher standard of morality to the poor Indian, whom you are declaring to be under tutelage, to be inferior, not to be entitled to all the immunities of the white man, than you choose to apply to members of Parliament? Will you say that he shall be bound by stricter laws, he shall be encompassed in the discharge of his duties by stricter provisions than we dare to apply to ourselves? Will you tell him that, although you do not hold him to be wholly fit to govern himself, you lay down for him a stricter rule than you lay down for ourselves? We are honest enough not to attempt to set up any such doctrine as this for ourselves. should we set it up for them? The Act further says :-

"Or to have been guilty of dishonesty."

A large phrase; not larceny; not any specific offence against the criminal law. What is the meaning of "dishonesty?" How far would the Superintendent General stretch the meaning, or within how narrow limits would he confine it? Who shall lay down the rule? Is it to be determined as in old days it is said that equitable considerations were determined—by the size of the Chancellor's foot? What is to be the size of the foot in this case? The moral temperament, and standard of the Superintendent General for the time being on the law as to whether a crime—no, not a crime, but Mr. Blake.

an act of dishonesty—has been committed by the Indian, of such a sort, that though elected by the people his place has to be vacated. Again the Act says:

"Or of malfeasance of office of any kind."

That, of course, is more definite language. That indicates a crime or misdemeanor perhaps known to the law; at any rate, punishable, and except in so far as the tribunal which is to dispose of the question is concerned, in respect to which I have grave objection, it is not unreasonable, that such proof being made, vacation of the office should succeed. But, inasmuch as malfeasance of office partakes of a criminal character, it is unfortunate—and this observation applies, perhaps, to another item too—that we should provide for its trial without the formalities of a public court, without the security of a jury, without the advantages of a judicial tribunal, without the publicity which attends criminal trials. It is unfortunate that we should provide for the trial of a criminal offence of this kind by the Superintendent General, forsooth. Well, then, these are all the causes of disqualification which existed in the Indian Advancement Act; but, Sir, the hon. gentleman has found that he has not got control enough of his Indians, even so. He has found that the elect of the select Indians require still further limitations, or that he requires still further powers, and so he proposes to introduce this new provision; which says:

"Or who neglects or refuses, without reasonable cause to attend meetings of the Council, when notified thereof in manner required by the Act."

Who is to determine the reasonable cause?—the Superintendent General. There is no definition here of what reasonable cause should be, and no indication of any line of proof to establish what shall be reasonable cause. But still further, Sir, this new provision says:

"Or who refrains from taking part in the proceedings by at least voting when present at such meetings."

So that compulsory voting is to be established as the rule of the councillor. He may not understand the question, though we all know that is not disqualification, for I suppose it has happened to all of us to vote sometimes without understanding the question. He may not be satisfied to say "yea" or "nay" to a question. He may think it is a question the affirmative of which he does not like to sanction, nor yet the negative. He may be disposed to seek the convenient shelter of the lobby or the corridor, as a great many of us do occasion ally; but he must not do that. He must vote. And under what penalty?—under the penalty of the Superintendent General turning him out of his office. This, Sir, is the law proposed to us in this heyday of the advancement of the Indian, after for a period of nearly two general elections he has been thought fit to elect members of the Parliament of Canada. That is the law proposed for the chosen of the most advanced; for the best men elected by the best Indians. These are the restraints which the Government think fit to impose upon the best of the best of those who are made electors of Can-

Mr. DOYON. (Translation.) I cannot allow this Bill to pass without a protest. I do not know what motive the hon. Minister of the Interior has for moving this amendment to the Act other than the troubles which have existed, and which still exist, on the Caughnawaga reserve, and which he sought to remedy, but the remedy was worse than the evil. You talk of preventing from sitting a member of the council because he indulges in drinks! But were you to prevent from taking a part in the proceedings of council all those who indulge in drinks, there are in the council of the nation persons who should be deprived of their rights, and is it to be said that more importance attaches to the matter when applied to the council of the Indians than when applied to the council of the nation? Mr. Speaker, since the Advancement Act was applied to the council of Caughnawaga, liquor was used as a pretext for many endeavors to do away with opponents who barred the way, and I think I am able to substantiate this statement. After the election of 1887, they began by removing the measurer of stones, who had been appointed by the Government now in power, and he was removed, because, so they said, he had taken a part in the contest, but, they added, that he got drunk. Well, I think, that on the election day, not only in that county, but in many other counties as well, there were people who saw the bottom of the bottle. That man was removed for getting drunk out of duty. Later on, the council of Caughnawaga wanted to appoint a substitute to the present policeman, and the substitute they proposed was a man named Louis Beauvais, who had been organist in the Catholic Church. in order to decline his services, they again protested that he was a drunkard. Captain Jackson, whom the hon. Minister assailed last week, had already been assailed before. In 1882, he came to the Minister of Marine for securing a certificate as master of a steamer, intending to sail in all the Dominion waters, and before the Minister he was charged of being a drunkard. How did he clear himself of that charge? He had to write to the United States, to a man in whose employ he had been for seven or eight years, and the references he received from him was so favorable that the hon. the Minister of Marine granted him the certificate, which I am about to read and which is most contrary to what the hon. Minister of the Interior has recently stated:

"CANADA.

"GEO. E. FOSTER,

(Signed) "GEO. E. FOSTER, "Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

Here is a man who was charged, before the Minister of Marine, of being a drunkard and who had to produce evidence of the contrary. He is vindicated as to that charge by the certificate granted him by the hon. the Minister of Marine. Perhaps, sober man in 1888, but that since he might have become a drunkard. For my part, I conclude that as he was unjustly charged in 1888, so he is now, and he might produce once more evidence of his sobriety. And what shows that all these charges are groundless is the fact, not only that he was elected, by a good majority, a member of the council, but even chief of the council, in spite of all the protests of his opponents; I should say, perhaps, in spite of what might have been sent from the Department to have him deposed. More than that, Mr. Speaker. Does any one wish to know how far they went? What a good mother liquor is! Here is a letter by which they sought to implicate me in a liquor case, at the time of the election, in 1887. They said: If we could have that man charged, we might easily deal with him. I will read that letter:

your utmost, with the assistance of Moise Lefort and other friends, to discover the illegitimate means by which our majority was reduced. Most important. I feel quite convinced that another contest would redeem Laprairie.

So that Sir John A. Macdonald wrote, on 24th February, 1887: "Are there no grounds to protest Doyon?" And Mr. Tasse wrote, on 25th February: "Let us try to implicate Mr. Doyon as having distributed liquor; this is the only means to get rid of him, otherwise he will always be in our way * * " Well, Mr. Speaker, here is a new evidence of the liquor being used as a means of destroying not only a man's character, but also of removing him from his position and substituting for him a friend of the Government. I stated a moment ago that the hon. Minister of the Interior was led by the troubles which happened at Caughnawaga with reference to the council to amend clause 10 of the Indian Advancement Act. Why should the Indian Department seek to introduce a new restriction in the Act, when the majority of the Caughnawaga Indians are asking for more extended powers, that is to say, are asking that they might be allowed to manage their own affairs; or, in other words, that will it be said, that he was acknowledged as a what is done by their council should not require, to be valid, the sanction of the Department? The whole trouble lies in this: that the council wants to remove the present policeman, Mr. Lefort, to whom a sum of $383 is paid yearly, while they could have one for $165. It appears to me this resolution of the council is very fair; and the best municipal council in the Province could not do any better. The fact is the municipal council of the Indians are trying to have, at a lower cost, a municipal officer, whose duties should be as well performed as by the officer they have now. The Indians ought to be more civilised now than they were ten years ago. And ten years ago they only paid $250 for that officer. Besides, I might say that the present officer, Mr. Lefort, has, to assist him in his duties, two additional policemen who were appointed last year by the council. two policemen receive no salary other than the fines paid by those whom they arrest and who are fined. The Government sanctioned the resolution of the council appointing these two policemen. They have not enquired, and I think there was no report against these two men, stating whether they were sober men or habitual drunkards, inasmuch as they have no salary other than what I have just stated with respect to fines. Well, Mr. Speaker, what I have just stated seems to have no connection with the question now before the House, but I hold that this is the only cause of the present troubles. I do not directly charge the Government with mismanaging the affairs of the Indians. I rather think the mismanagement is the outcome of the system, which is bad. fact is the Government are bound to trust the reports of their agent. Now, the agent at Caughnawaga is like all human beings; and whenever an opportunity offers for him to promote his interests or serve his dislikes, or oblige his political friends, he fully avails himself of it. What was the reason given for the maintenance of Mr. Lefort as policeman? It was said that so long as he should perform his duties as he had in the past, he should be kept in his position. But are not the Government aware that that very man was summoned before the police court in Montreal, for having himself given liquor to Indians? I hold here a copy of the judgment. That judgment was reversed, but the fact still remains that there were found witnesses in Caughnawaga who incriminated him and had him pronounced guilty and sentenced by the court. Those are the facts. The council were indignant at the refusal of the Government and a portion of the councillors declined to sit, saying: We have been long enough playing the part of boys; we need no council if we are bound to wait till our resolutions, to be worth anything, are sanctioned by the Government. As well might the people on the Caughnawaga reserve write to the Department through the agent when they have resolutions to pass or improvements whatever on the reserve are asked for. It would come to the same thing, and they would not be charged with things they are not guilty of, and slandered not only in Montreal, but in this House as well. What next did they say? They said that the property holders censured the course taken by the present councillors, and the council was supported only by the scum of the people on the reserve. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are 351 voters on the Caughnawaga reserve, and of these 302 are property holders. I hold here action of the council in asking for the removal of Moïse Lefort. This petition was drawn up in October; it was not sent at that time because, I think, the hon. Minister intimated, or, at all events, the agent on the reserve had intimated, that the hon. Minister was to personally visit the reserve, if not to investigate, at all events, to ascertain whether the facts reported to him were true or false. I have even here a telegram sent by the hon. Minister, in which, answering to the invitation extended to him to visit the reserve-I think it was in the latter part of December-he states that the Session was too near at hand and he could not possibly go. That is why the petition was not forwarded. Here it is:

"That said Louis Beauvais is a respectable Indian and an ex-chief of the tribe:

"That no action has been taken on the recommendation by the agent, Alexander Brosseau, who states that he does not think it necessary to replace the present incumbent of the office of constable;
"That the said Councillors, to wit: L. F. Jackson, Michel Bourdeau and Michel Daillebout, are determined that the said Moise Lefort be dismissed, and are supported by a majority of the Indians, and intend not to transact any other business as Councillors until the said Lefort is dismissed;
"That your petitioners strongly support and endorse the action and petition of the said three Councillors, and pray that the said Moise Lefort be removed from his said office of constable."
"Signed at Caughnawaga on this 20th of October, 1889."

office of constable. Signed at Caughnawaga on this 20th of October, 1889."

This petition is signed by 110 persons. Thus, Mr. Speaker, it can be seen that the action of the council was endorsed by a great many members of the tribe; and, nevertheless, the Department would not approve of this resolution. The question now before the House is not whether the council should be free to manage their own affairs, since it is a new restrictive amendment the hon. Minister seeks to introduce into the Act. I have only mentioned the above facts as accessories. Should the hon. Minister alter the law so as to allow the Indians to make charges against the councillors by denouncing them as being habitual drunkards and in this way having them disqualified, he might as well repeal the Advancement Act; for, if not reasons, at all events means of charging them, are sure to be found at any time. And this, not only as far as the present councillors are concerned, but even against those who are the friends of the hon. Minister of the Interior. That Act is bad enough as it is, we need not make it worse. It is a source of quarrels and bad feeling. One can hardly imagine the state of excitement that prevails there. Presently, charges of every kind are made against my supporters, whom it is my duty to defend here. But I do not intend to defend only those who supported me; I think it my duty to defend the others a petition signed by 110 voters approving of the too, for I think the amendment proposed will be injurious to all the Indians. Thus they charged one councillor-in order to prevent his being returned-with having pledged himself to the erection of a Protestant school and a Protestant chapel on the reserve. The census of 1881 shows there is not a single Protestant on the Caughnawaga reserve. By examining the report of the Department of Indian Affairs for 1889, at page 252, I find that a sum of $250 was paid to John A. Dionne, as Methodist teacher. It is surely not Mr. Jackson against whom this charge was made-who engaged him or proposed to introduce him on the reserve, for he has been councillor only a year, the teacher already received his salary, and it is a well-known fact that the schools are under the control of the council. Moreover, the whole reserve belongs to the Catholic faith. In injuring the Indians who are now members of the council and in ruining them in the esteem of their fellow-residents, there will be no difficulty in finding accomplices, and with the amendment proposed they will all be changed. I have here another petition I received last month, asking that clause 10 of the Indian Advancement Act be amended and approving of the action taken by the Caughnawaga council. The petition reads as follows :-

"CAUGHNAWAGA, March, 1890.

"To Cyrille Doyon, Esq., member of the House of Commons of Canada for the County of Laprairie.
"The humble petition of the undersigned citizens and voters of Caughnawaga, respectfully represents:

"I. That they are informed that you have brought up in the House a Bill affecting very seriously their interests.

"2. That this Bill was held over until to-day without good resons."

2. That this Bill was need over unit to-day without good reasons,

"3. That your petitioners pray that you press the adoption of this measure, which is calculated to act as a safeguard with respect to their dearest interests.

And your petitioners will ever pray."

This petition is signed by 116 Indians. while the hon. Minister of the Interior stated to me some time ago, that the Indians did not ask for more liberty than they had now, I think I am in a position to show that such is their wish since the Advancement Act was applied to them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that, in the interests of harmony and good-will and advancement of the Indians, it would be better the amendment proposed should not become law. Should it be passed, how shall the evidence be received? Will it be received before the agent, or before both the present policeman and the agent, who shall at the same time be accusers and judges? I am inclined to think my humble opinion will not weigh much in the balance, but I say that, in the interests of the inhabitants of the Caughnawaga Reserve and even in the interests of the Department, this amendment to the Act should not be proposed. Therefore, I shall vote against this Bill.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I was unable to follow the hon. gentleman through his remarks and he will, therefore, have to excuse me for not answering them in detail. As to the changes proposed, there is a difference of opinion among the Indians on the reserve. I hold in my hand a petition signed by a great number of Indians asking that the powers of the Superintendent General be not taken away. I will read a portion of the petition which refers to that :

ment, has introduced in amendment to the Indian Advancement Act, whereby the council of the reserve of Caughnawaga will have complete authority without the interference of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and which he has moved for its second reading, is inimical and contrary to the welfare of the Indians of the said reserve of Caughnawaga, for the following amongst other reasons, to wit:—That the Council of the said reserve of Caughnawaga will be invested with too much rower and will be responsible to no superior authority. serve of Caughnawaga will be invested with too much power, and will be responsible to no superior authority; that the said Council of the Caughnawaga reserve will be invested with absolute powers, such as have never been granted in the Province of Quebec to any Municipal Council, which possesses limited powers, and in cases where appeal lies is answerable to the County Council. The latter is answerable to the Circuit Court when it does not remedy the injustice alleged to have been committed by any Municipal Council against individual rights. That moreover, the said Bill grants no relief whatever to any Indian when his interest may be attacked by the said Council of the reserve of Caughnawaga."

Mr. RIAKE How many signatures?

Mr. BLAKE. How many signatures?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Between fifty and sixty. I understand they represent the bulk, if not almost all the property holders on the reserve.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member behind me says there are over 300 property holders on the reserve.

Mr. DEWDNEY. These are the principal ones. I dare say the hon. gentleman knows that there a number of Indians on the reserve who have no property and are worth nothing, and at present are really running the business on the reserve. There is a strong feeling on the part of those who have lived there for years and have nice homes, large farms and valuable improvements, against others who are trying to deprive them of their rights. Returning to these amendments to which I ask the support of the House, I rather expected to have the support of the hon. member for West Durham than otherwise, because, if I recollect aright, the hon. gentleman thought, when the original Act was passed, that it was an admirable

Mr. BLAKE. I propose we should extend it to this House.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. gentleman thought it was an admirable clause. I will read what he

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. gentleman had been here and heard how I said it, he would have understood.

Mr. DEWDNEY. When this question was up in 1884, the hon. gentleman said:

"Why should not this be extended to the whites. It is an admirable clause; any member of a council elected under the provisions of this Act, who shall be proved to be a habitual drunkard, or to be living in immorality, or to accept a bribe, or to have been guilty of dishonesty, or of malfeasance of office, shall be disqualified from acting as a member of the council."

To which the leader of the Government replied, it would be a very good clause for the whites.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEWDNEY. And the hon gentleman said: "Why should we be more moral with our Indian friends than with ourselves;" and the leader of the Government retorted: "It might diminish the members of the Opposition.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite content the hon. gentleman should read my speech again.

"The humble petition of Sawatis, Karoniaktatie, Saksarie, Anetenre and others of the reserve of Caughnawaga, respectfully showeth;—That the Bill which Mr. Doyon, M.P., during this Session of the Federal Parlia-Mr. DEWDNEY. I have merely looked through

With regard to the other section, which the hongentleman criticises, I should have thought he would have also supported that, if, as he indicates, it would necessarily bring about compulsory voting, because I understand the hongentleman at one time introduced a Bill advocating compulsory voting. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton, I am not at all sure that I agree with him with regard to the ballot. That was never suggested before, or I would have given it consideration. During recess I will consider it and get an expression of opinion from the Indians as to whether they desire it or not. There are people who object to the ballot. An hon gentleman who stands very high in the politics of Ontario, and who supports the party of my hon. friend, objects to the ballot in the case of separate schools.

Mr. LISTER. These people do not want it; the Indians do.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The question is, whether the Indians do want it, and I shall give it considera-I need not detain the House longer on this question, except to state that there have been on the Caughnawaga reserve, some very obstructive tactics practised, which has delayed business on the reserve. I do not wish to discuss the character or habits of any of those members of the council on that reserve. It would not be fair to do so, but as the hon, gentleman knows, there are gentlemen who have very strong feelings on the subject, and who think that some of the members occupying positions on the reserve do not worthily fill them; and they think if this clause is added to the Bill, these people will not continue to carry on the same tactics in the council.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Indians I have the honor to represent in this House, have not asked to come under the Indian Advancement Act. They prefer to retain their own system of government. They are governed under the provision of the Indian Act. I do not know how many bands of Indians have asked to have this Act applied to them, but I do not think many have. This Act was introduced in 1884, as a means of inducing the Indians to advance in the direction of self-government, and the administration of their own affairs. And after the Government have told this House that, not only the more advanced bands, but that all the Indian bands in the old Provinces had advanced to such a degree of intelligence that they were not only fitted to have, but it was requisite for the welfare of the State that they should have, a voice in the affairs of the Dominion, in common with the other inhabitants of the various Provinces, it is rather strange, that now, some years later, we should find an Act introduced—not to extend the provisions of the Indian Advancement Act, not to give greater self-governing powers to the Indians, not to limit the power of the Superintendent General over the affairs of the Indian councillors elected by themselves, but we have to-day an Act retrograde in its action, an Act intended to take away powers from the Indians which they already possess, and to place greater powers in the hands of the Superintendent General in regard to these bands. It is a commentary upon our legislation which, I think, it is not pleasant to contemplate. I am unable to agree with the Superintendent General that it is desirable to Mr. DEWDNEY.

enact the legislation contained in section 11 of this Bill. As to the provision for the day of nomination, I have no objection. As to the amendment in regard to determining the size and style of sleighs, in which larger power is given to the Indian, I do not take any objection. But when, in addition to the other restrictions placed upon the Indians, when, in addition to the powers vested in the Governor in Council to summarily dismiss a councillor elected by the band, they ask us to add a provision that any councillor who—

-"neglects or refuses, without reasonable cause, to attend meetings of the council when notified thereof in the man-ner required by this Act, or who refrains from taking part in the proceedings by at least voting when present at such a meeting, or who either himself obstructs or induces any other person to obstruct the business of any such meeting. shall, on proof of the fact to the satisfaction of the Super-intendent General, be disqualified from acting as a mem-ber of the council, and shall, on being notified, cease forthwith so to act; and the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled in the manner hereinbefore provided." I say that, when they ask us to sanction legislation of that kind, the House should not affirm it. What does it leave of self-governing powers in the members of the council, powers that are on the Statutebook and powers in regard to various matters which they may properly attend to? The passing of this Act is, as I understand from the remarks of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Doyon)—though I could not completely understand all he said—supposed to be justified simply in order to meet a case which occurred in the Caughnawaga reserve. I understand that the councillors who were there elected by the Indian band thought, in their wisdom, that it would be advisable that a certain person should be removed from office, and another appointed, thereby affecting a saving in their money and accomplishing what they considered would be in the interests of the band, financially and otherwise. When that resolution, passed by a majority of the council, and clearly within their power as laid down in the Statute, came before the Superintendent General, he said: No; I do not approve of your action and will not sanction it, and it shall not become law. Then, if I understood my hon. friend aright-and, of course, I speak under correction—the councillors said that, if in a matter as simple as that, which was clearly within their right and affected their finances, any regulations they passed were to be disallowed and summarily vetoed by the Superintendent General, there was no use in their meeting in council at all; and, standing upon their proper dignity, as I would consider in that case, some of them did not take part in the proceedings of the council. If that is the reason which has induced the Superintendent General to introduce the Bill, I think it should not become law. What power does the Superintendent General retain without this additional power being given to him? It is declared in the opening section of this Indian Advancement Act that, when it appears to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General that a band of Indians are fit to be brought under the operation of the Act, the Governor in Council can call the Act into operation by giving certain notice; but it provides also that if it should appear to the Superintendent General at any time subsequent, that this band are not, in his opinion—in his opinion—capable of working out this Act satisfactorily, he shall have the power to issue an Order in Council declaring that fact, and saying that they are no longer under the Indian Advancement Act at all, and sending them back to the operations of the Indian Act as before. That power the Superintendent General has retained for himself in this Act. If the Indian Council in Caughnawaga or any other Indian Council are not working the Act according to his satisfaction, he can so declare, and then the council ceases to exist as a council of Indians, and that reserve thereafter comes under the provisions of the Indian Act, and has not the benefit of the Indian Advancement Act at all. One would think that was power enough. What calls upon us to add this clause to this Act? other clause provides that the election of councillors shall take place every year, and that four members shall constitute a quorum. The Act does not define how many councillors shall be elected on a reserve. How many councillors are there on the Caughnawaga reserve?

Mr. DOYON.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then it would not be in the power of any one councillor to impede the despatch of business. It would require at least two to be of the same mind in order to do that, and, if the chief councillor had voted and the vote should be even, he has a casting vote in addition under the Act. But why should not the working of these councils be left to the operation of the laws in regard to other municipal councils in the cities and towns and other municipalities of the Provinces? It is not unknown to those who have been engaged in municipal matters that there are many times when occasions have occurred where, in the interest of their constituents, members of those councils have deliberately withdrawn in order to prevent a quorum so that a measure should not be put through which they considered contrary to the interest of their constituents. Would you place the arbitrary power in the hands of any individual, under those circumstances, to say that the councillors who withdrew should be disqualified? The remedy is provided by the fact that, at the end of the twelve months, these councillors have to go before their constituents, and if they have refused to attend meetings, if they have refused to cast their votes when present, if they have refused to form a quorum, these things will urged against their re-election, and if that action on their part is not approved by a majority of the electors, these men would not be sent back, but would be replaced by other men. matter, I ask why it should not be left in the hands of the electors on the reserves, if you are going to give them any powers at all. They will have the remedy in their own hands, and if any Indian councillor who, by refusing to attend or by abstaining from acting for a time, obstructs the business and injures the interest of the band, you may rely upon it, that when he appears before the electors, which time cannot be deferred longer than 12 months at the furthest, he will be dealt with, the remedy will be applied by them as it is applied by white citizens in any municipality in the various provinces. I say it is something that I think the Superintendent General should not ask the House to agree to, that further limitations should be placed upon the Indians whom we are endeavoring to bring forward, as was alleged in the introduction of this Act, and to take from them the powers which were given to them, and to centre more if it can be altered in some way.

power in the hands of the Superintendent General, now, five or six years after the Act was passed, some years after they have been given the right to vote on great national and state questions, to ask that in the mere matter of the appointment of the dismissal of a pound-keeper or a constable, the hiring of one man at a lesssalary than another, or the dismissal from his office of an incompetent man and putting another in his place, or, if he does not suit His Highness the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, the latter shall say: I will not consent to it. I can readily understand that a council treated in that manner, feeling their dignity insulted, should resent it, and that they should say, as has been said by the councillors of Caughnawaga: If our request upon matters affecting our own interests, affecting our own moneys only, is to be treated in this way, it is nothing less than a farce for us to meet together to transact business at all; for if we are only to transact it as approved by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, we might as well abandon the control of our own affairs altogether. This is the way that the matter strikes me, and I think it behoves the Superintendent General to give stronger reasons than he has yet given before he can ask the House to amend the Indian Advancement Act in the direction, not of giving greater powers to the Indians, but of taking from them even some of the littler powers they have under the Indian Advancement Act, and centreing more directly those powers in the hands of the Superintendent General.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon, gentleman says that one of the reasons why this Bill was introduced was because the Government had refused to sanction the appointment of a certain man to a position. He was correct in stating that the party who had been nominated by them was prepared to do the work at a less figure than the gentleman who had been doing it already for some years, and it was represented very strongly by the agents, by whom we must be guided, that these parties, for there were two of them, were utterly unreliable. He gave the reasons why they were unreliable, and it was for that reason the Government refused to assent to that resolution. On the strength of that action, a portion of the councillors obstructed the business of the council until the end of their term, which has lately lapsed. They have had another election, and all the six old councillors were returned again.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then the band sustained them?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And you want to override that?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; but we want to prevent the deadlock occurring again. I am aware that the Superintendent General is given very large power, and can withdraw this Act from any band to which it has been applied, but the Superintendent General and the Government do not wish to do that. They would rather be in a position to act as this amendment gives them power to act. However, I will ask the House to go into committee on the Bill and pass these two clauses of it, and I will reserve the other section for reconsideration to see

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this clause is a very objectionable one, and it is all the more objectionable on account of the franchise having been extended to the Indian population. Minister of the Interior must see that after having extended the franchise to the Indians, after having given them the highest rights that belong to freemen, they do not stand in a position to be treated as minors and wards of the Government. Now the hon. gentleman has, by the provisions of this Bill, assumed that the Indians, with regard to these municipal matters, are not competent to manage their own affairs. Apart from that objection, which is an objection in principle and which, it seems to me, ought to be fatal to any provision of this sort, unless the Government are prepared to withdraw the elective franchise from the Indian population; it is also open, I think, to serious objection on account of the very arbitrary power that the Superintendent General proposes to exercise over the moral character and conduct of those who have been entrusted by their fellows of the band with certain municipal powers. Now, that election is for a very short period of time, it continues but for twelve months, and at the end of that time these parties are out of office. If they have misbehaved themselves, or have shown themselves unfit for the position which they occupy, then they will not again be elected. Unless the Minister is prepared to ask that those who are entrusted with the powers of election are not qualified for the exercise of those powers that have been conferred upon them, why should the Superintendent General take power to interfere? If it is thought that interference was necessary at all, then there ought to be some judicial proceeding, not merely an administrative proceeding, in reference to those Indians. But the ceeding, in reference to those Indians. But the whole difficulty, from my point of view, is that the Government are asking to exercise very important powers over the Indian population, powers of a coercive character, interfering with the freedom of those people, and at the same time allowing those persons to exercise the elective franchise. Now, it is scarcely a decent proceeding, to use no stronger expression, for a Minister of the Crown to assume over a certain portion of the electors of this country, the powers which the hon. gentleman had under the Bill as it before stood, and which he proposes to extend by the provisions of this Act. Why should the hon, gentleman undertake to exercise those powers? He is in a position to be suspected; a Minister occupying the position of Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, as long as the Franchise Act remains in force as it now stands, is in the position of one to be suspected. How can the public for a moment suppose that he will discharge his duties fairly towards those Indians and without reference to the political complexion of the band, as long as that band continues to exercise the powers given them by the elective Franchise Act? Why, Sir, the petition presented by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Doyon), which he has made, the peti-have come into the hands of the speech tions which Ministers, the letter from the defeated candidate in that constituency, all point to the fact that the difficulties and the disputes that have arisen there have grown out of political differences amongst the Indians, and between the candidates who sought the suffrages of those Indians. If that be so, why should the Superintendent General un- into contact with general public sentiment, and a Mr. Dewdney.

dertake to interfere? If he interfere, can it be for a moment supposed that he is not interfering in the interest of the defeated candidate, and with a view of promoting the interest of the Government? Now, I say that a Minister of the Crown ought not to be placed in that position, and he must necessarily be in that position unless he withdraws his control over the Indians, or unless he withdraws from them the elective franchise that has been conferred upon them. The two positions are altogether inconsistent, they cannot stand together. The Indians either are qualified to exercise the electoral franchise, and, therefore, should be wholly independent of Government control, or if they are not so qualified, and they must still remain subject to Government control, it is perfectly clear they are not competent to possess the electoral This is the position of affairs with franchise. respect to the Indian population. The title to Indian lands is in the Crown, and you do not give to the Indians control over their own property or an interest in their lands; but you, nevertheless, make that a basis for granting them the electoral franchise. Why did you do it? Because you assumed that the possession of property is an indication of thrift, which should qualify a person for the exercise of that power. Yet the possession of property is no indication of thrift in the case of Yet the possession the Indians, because they do not control their property; and yet you propose to make them still further subject to the Government, when, if your supposition is sound, they should be independent of Government control. This Bill is objectionof Government control. able on every ground. It is objectionable on account of the extraordinary powers it confers on the Minister, because it is not a power regulated by law in the ordinary sense. You cannot see how the Minister is going to ascertain the facts, or what sort of judgment he is going to exercise. Is he going to take steps to disqualify a man who has acted in support of the Administration, on account of the disqualifications mentioned in this Bill? Is he going to use that power against his friends and in favor of his opponents? I do not think so. If it was here admitted that the hon, gentleman would so use the power, would it be believed generally by the public that he would so use it? It confers upon a Minister of the Crown powers which subject him necessarily to the suspicion that he may be influenced, an objectionable condition of affairs, but one that flows from the provisions of this Bill. The hon gentleman would not undertake to justify such control by the Attorney General or some of his officers in a Province over a Municipal Council, and why then should it be exercised over the Indian Council? If you were to provide by the Bill that the seat of a councillor who absents himself from a certain number of meetings should become vacant, that would be a vacancy created by law and under the provisions of law; but it would be a wholly different condition from the provisions existing in the Bill. No one can tell how the Minister is going to exercise his power, and the Indian is not a portion of the body politic in which abuse of power will be readily detected, he is not one that touches the sensibilities of the population of the country as a unit. affects a class of people among whom few newspapers are circulated; a class that is not brought class among whom abuses may be committed without being readily detected. The representation of the Indian population is not likely readily to attract attention, and an abuse of authority is not readily to be criticised or condemned by those who support the Administration, whatever that Administration may be. On every ground this provision of the Bill is objectionable, and the hon. Minister certainly ought to change this section, either by striking it out altogether or by so amending it as to allow the law to state the conditions on which a vacancy should occur, and to provide that the vacancy should absolutely arise, thus substituting the determination of the law for the will of the hon. Minister for the time being.

After Recess.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 125) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada.

Mr. CURRAN. When we were in Committee before on this Bill, I made a motion to amend the 8th clause by adding certain words which would have given somewhat additional privileges to the company. That amendment was met by an objection from one or two hon. members of the House, and I am now about to suggest a different amendment which will meet the objection raised, and which has received the approbation of the leader of the Government, to whom the amendment I am about to suggest has been submitted. stated on a former occasion that this company was desirous of leasing certain lines of railway which had been chartered by the Local Legislature of the Province of Quebec, particularly, and it was then stated that the difficulty which presented itself might be got over by giving a list of the railways that were desirous of amalgamating with or leasing with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. To that the company has very strong objection, because it would give a fictitious value to the lines in question, and, perhaps, make it next to impossible to carry out the arrangement. The proposition I now make is that the clause read as follows:—

"The company may enter into working arrangements with, or enter into a lease of, or acquire running powers over, or the right to work, the line of any other company in Canada under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, which has been hitherto duly empowered to make or grant the same to or with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, or which may be at any time so empowered by the Parliament of Canada."

The balance of the section stands as before. This amendment will enable the company to carry on its business on certain lines which are now actually operated by it, but on which there is a private staff keeping the accounts, and entailing a very large expense which is altogether unnecessary. The powers of this Parliament will be safeguarded, and the policy of the Dominion Parliament which was mentioned by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and concurred in by the right hon. leader of the Government, as being endangered by the adoption of the amendment proposed at our last sitting, will be protected from invasion by the Local Legislatures. We shall be merely giving the heretofore duly empowered to make or grant leases to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada; and then, in order that the company may not be restricted in its rights, we add: "Or which may be at any time so empowered by the Parliament of Canada." I do not think there will be any objection to this clause, which has met with the approval of the right hon. Premier, and which I think also meets with the approval of the hon. Minister of

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot say that I think the proposal altogether meets the difficulty, but it goes very near to meeting it, and I can well understand the observation the hon. gentleman has made, as to the injurious effect that might be produced in concluding arrangements which are under negotiation by a schedule. The phraseology, however, does not appear to me to be correct. I think the word "hitherto" ought to be "heretofore' ; this is a very unusual use of the word "hitherto."

Mr. CURRAN. I have no objection.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose we may be said, in some sort, to give an approval, and to have considered what the condition of things is by using the word "heretofore," inasmuch as a credulous public may be under the impression that we have enquired what railway companies have up to the present time been empowered by the Provincial Legislatures to enter into these arrangements, and that we are thus entirely cognisant of what we are authorising; while, in truth, we know nothing whatever about it.

Mr. MITCHELL. As the person who called the attention of this Committee on a former occasion to the departure from what was agreed upon in the Railway Committee, I wish to say, that I think the alteration now proposed meets the difficulty, and I withdraw any objection I had

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

H. H. VIVAN & COMPANY.

House again resolved itself into Committee on (Bill 124) respecting H. H. Vivian & Company (Limited).—(Mr. Dawson.)

(In the Committee.) .

Mr. DAWSON. When this Bill was under consideration before, some explanations were asked for, and it was postponed. I have been looking into it since, and I find that this Bill is a mere transcript of a number of Acts empowering mining companies incorporated in England, and also American companies, to carry on their business in Canada, and it in no way interferes with provincial Clause 1 follows section 1 of the Act respecting the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, 47 Vic., chapter 74. That was a company incorporated in England under the Companies' Acts in the same way as the one now under consideration. The powers asked for in that Act railway. were to re to construct a railway.
and 4 of this Bill follow Clauses 2 and 3 of the following Acts, except the latter part of section 1 of these Acts which company the right to operate such lines as have been is rendered unnecessary by the provisions of the Interpretation Act and the Companies' Clauses Act of Canada, section 2; the Canada Consolidated Gold Mining Company, 44 Victoria, chapter 60; the Canadian Copper Company, 49 Victoria, chapter 99; and the Anglo-American Iron Company, 49 Victoria, chapter 97. The Canadian Consolidated Gold Mining Company was a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. The Canadian Copper Company and the Anglo-American Iron.Company were companiesi ncorporated under the laws of the State of Ohio, and all these were recognised as corporations by these special Acts. The powers asked for in the present Bill are exactly the same as those granted by Parliament to the three companies above mentioned. In none of these cases were the articles of association or incorporation embodied in or published with the Acts. In the case of the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, section 13 of the Act provided that a certified copy of the memorandum of association in England should be filed in the office of the Secretary of State in Canada, and a clause to that effect can be added in the House to the present be added in the House to the present Bill to meet the objection made as to the The articles of association not being printed. certified copy of the articles of association was before the Private Bills Committee when the Bill was being considered by them. The latter part of clause 1 of the Bill will prevent the company exercising any power under these articles for which special power from Parliament would otherwise be necessary. The articles of association are long and minute, consisting principally of the details for the internal government of the company. If these were printed along with the Bill they would occupy about 60 or 70 pages statute size, and the printing and translation would cost about $200. Clause 5 of the Bill is rendered necessary because the Companies Acts, England, already govern this company in matters respecting those provided for by the Companies' Clauses Act, Canada. As to the objection raised, that Parliament has no jurisdiction to recognise or authorise this company as a mining con pany, because its objects are only provincial in their character, reference should be made to the British North America Act, ss. 91, 92, and to Citizens vs. Parsons, 7 Appeal Cases, 96, Colonial Building and Investment Association vs. Attorney-General Quebec, 9 Appeal Cases 167, showing the view taken by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on this point. Also to the following Acts of the Parliament of Canada incorporating Companies for exactly similar purposes as those intended to be served by the present Bill: 1st. The Acts respecting the three companies I have mentioned; 2nd. The Acts respecting the Dominion Phosphate and Mining Company, 46 Vic., c. 91; the Dominion Mineral Company, 52 Vic., c. 102, and the Canadian Superphosphate Company 52 Vic., c. 101. In some of these Acts powers are given to mine in only one Province, and in others of them power is given to mine in any Province or territory of Canada. In order to enable the company to mine in each of the several Provinces, it surely cannot be necessary to go to each Province and obtain a Provincial Act of incorporation.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed. $_$

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to call the attention of the Government to a paragraph in to-day's Empire, being a despatch from Niagara Falls, as follows:—

"Three Chinamen, two of whom had attempted to cross the frontier with Mun Lee, of Toronto, a couple of weeks ago, the other a stranger, presented themselves for admission to Canada this morning, having been hustled over to this side by United States Customs officers. The two belonging to Mun Lee's party were allowed admission, having Canadian Customs certificates in their possession. The stranger, not having the necessary document and only ten dollars to pay the Canadian tax of fifty dollars, was denied the privilege given to his almond-eyed companions, and was sent back to the American side of the bridge. He was there stopped, and the gates of the bridge closed on him. The only place for the poor heathen is to remain on the bridge, where he has been since and is likely to remain for some time. Collector of Customs Flynn communicated with the Commissioner of Customs at Ottawa for instructions. The Commissioner replied to have him sent back whence he came. Further communication has been sent, and, no doubt, the matter will be brought up with the Washington authorities. Meanwhile the Celestial remains on the middle of the bridge."

If that statement be true. I think the facts are a

If that statement be true, I think the facts are a disgrace to the civilisation of two Christian countries. If the Customs authorities at Ottawa were communicated with, and did not interfere and exercise the discretion within the power of that Department or of the Treasury Board, it is a crying shame; and I am sure I have only to call the attention of the Government to this matter to have it enquired into. To compel a human being to remain on the bridge, scorned and spurned by the civilised communities on both sides, and treated as a mad dog, is setting a poor example to the heathen Chinee of the civilisation of two Christian countries.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject has been brought to the notice of the Minister of Customs to-day only, and from the information he has received, the paragraph just read is substantially correct. The two Chinamen who accompanied this man were duly certificated, and had a right to come into Canada, but it appears the third had no certificate and no money to buy one. The Customs officer of Canada made an attempt to send him back into the United States, but that was refused, and he had no alternative but to refuse him admission into Canada.

Mr. BOYLE. The Mail has a following paragraph on this subject, showing that the Chinamen were expelled from the United States. So that the charge against the Canadian Government is without foundation, and the responsibility lies with the American Government.

INDIAN ADVANCEMENT ACT.

Bill (No. 132) to amend the Indian Advancement Act, chapter 44 of the Revised Statutes, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee).

On section 3,

Mr. LAURIER. I would submit to the Minister that the third clause should be dropped. The law now provides that the election shall take place on the same day as the nomination of candidates, if there be more than one candidate. The proposed amendment is to adopt something like our parliamentary system, and to have the nomination on one day, and, if there be more than one candidate, to allow a week to elapse before the polling. What reason can there be, on an Indian reserve, to prolong the excitement for a week? In matters of this small importance, if you have the excitement of an election prolonged for a whole week, it is much to be feared that certain means of influence which were referred to this afternoon by my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Doyon) might be resorted to, and the questions are not so important as to require a week to debate them. I do not think it can lead to any good result to allow a week to elapse between the nomination and the voting.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I can see no reason why the Minister should not adopt the rule which is adopted in the election of school trustees in Ontario, to have the nomination and the election on the same day. It is not as if it were a constituency extending over a large area, and where a large vote had to be polled. The people on these reserves are all together, and the nomination might be made and the election might conveniently take place immediately.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am hardly able to agree with the leader of the Opposition and my hon friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) on this subject. Of course you might get up an excitement in a reserve, but that is exactly what we may do in other municipalities, where we have the poll taken a week after the nomination. The object of that is, I suppose, to allow the different candidates to pronounce their views and allow the electors to make up their minds as to whom they will select. If we do away with section 2, as we propose, in a case where a difficulty occurs such as that which has been alluded to, where councillors do not attend meetings, or matters of that kind, if we desire to curtail the power of the Superintendent General, there should be power left with the people to deal with such questions, and the councillor should have time to give reasons why he did not attend the meetings of the council or did not vote at them. The pros and cons should be debated and the reasons should be considered.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Could not that be done at the nomination?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose it might, as it might in any of our nunicipalities, but if the Indians are to be educated to our modes, I am not inclined to restrict them, and I thought this was a very good provision.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Indians themselves who have had experience on the Caughnawaga reserve, to which allusion has been made, were the very parties who pressed this very strongly on the Government. They had some difficulty—I believe it was at the election before the last—and they thought, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) says, that it would not give them a fair opportunity of judging of the candidates if the election were sprung on them immediately. The Government thought this was reasonable, and that is the reason for this proposed amendment.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand that the Indians of Caughnawaga have asked for this change?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not understand that there is any objection to the nomination. The only question is as to the interval of time between the nomination and the election. I do not myself know, in regard to the reserves of advanced Indians, what the extent of territory is, and whether the Indians are close together or not; but, if the territory is small and the Indians are easily assembled, it might be well that the time between the nomination and the polling should be short. The hon, gentleman is aware that in the borough elections in England, even in very large boroughs, the time allowed to elapse is, I think, about three days. In the counties it is longer, because the area is greater. I can see, however, that, in regard to these people, who are exposed to certain temptations which have been referred to, the interval of a week might be a week of excitement and possibly of drunkenness, which might affect them, according to what we are told, more than it does the whites. While consideration has to be given to the merits of the candidates, I think that might be done in a less time. While I am on my feet, I may call the attention of the Committee to the fact that this is a Bill to amend the Indian Advancement Act, and I may call the attention of certain members of this House, who take a deep interest in a certain class of questions, to the fact that this Act provides amongst the powers given to the council:

"The religious denomination to which the teacher or teachers of the school or schools established on the reserve shall belong, as being that of the majority of the Indians resident on the reserve; but the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority on the reserve may also have a separate school or schools, with the approval of and under regulations made by the Governor in Council."

I do not observe that my hon. friends of the Equal Rights party in this House pay much attention to the regulations affecting their brethren of a red color as compared with the interest they take in those affecting men of their own color.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think that is from the Indian Act.

Mr. BLAKE. No; it is from the Indian Advancement Act, 10th section, sub-section (a.)

Mr. DEWDNEY. I suppose the hon, gentleman makes that reference in consequence of the remarks made by the hon, member for Laprairie this afternoon.

Mr. BLAKE. In part.

Committee rose and reported progress.

INLAND REVENUE ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 133) further to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, chapter 34 of the Revised Statutes.

and they thought, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) says, that it would not give them a fair opportunity of judging of the candidates if the House in postponing Bills of this kind until this present period. These Inland Revenue Bills occupy a good deal of time. If they were necessary to be considered they ought to be brought down earlier. All the time occupied now is taken from vastly more important legislation.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I explained in introducing the Bill, this section provides for ascertaining the quantity by weight as well as by measure.

On section 12,

Mr. MITCHELL. I made a suggestion the other day, when one of these Inland Revenue Bills was up, that, I think, might be repeated now. We spend, every Session, a good deal of time upon Bills of this sort, of which we have five or six every Session, and they keep people watching to see that they are not passed through without discussion. There is one Bill in relation to the stamping of leather, which it is necessary for me to watch to see that it is not brought in and passed when I am out of the House. Some of these Bills have been on the paper ever since the first week of the Session; every year there are half a dozen of this class of Bills, and I think it would be better that they should be consolidated altogether, making the thing simple, and not having amendments made to them every year. They are complicated in such a way that it would require a Philadelphia lawyer to interpret them.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The section under discussion has nothing at all to do with the Bill the hon. gentleman refers to. The House is not dealing with the Inspection Act. The hon member was kind enough to say that every Session we are tinkering with legislation in connection with the Inland Revenue Department. I do not know that there is any particular reason the hon, gentleman has for paying such a left-handed compliment to me. I hold that we do not tinker with legislation in the Inland Revenue Department. The hon. gentleman must remember that the Inland Revenue Department is composed of seven different branches, and he says they ought to be consolidated. The Inland Revenue Act is consolidated like other Acts, but he does not expect that the Inland Revenue Act, the General Inspection Act, of which he complains, the Inspection of Gas, the Weights and Measures Act, the Prevention of Adulteration of Foods and Drugs, the Fertilizers Act, the Cullers Act, -that all these should be consolidated in one Act. It would be very inconvenient. When the hon. gentleman considers that we have seven different laws to administer, he will see that amendments are neither frequent or numerous.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not remember having seen the resolutions on which, I think, a Bill of this kind ought to be introduced. May I ask the Minister of Inland Revenue whether resolutions were brought forward covering various changes herein proposed?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They appear to change the duty.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no increase of duty. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am inclined to think there is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman perfectly certain there is no increase in the duty?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He is aware that if there is an increase, we cannot go on.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Knowing that, of course, I was advised it was not necessary to proceed by resolution, as no increase was proposed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Judging by the Act we have been discussing for the last few days, for which the Finance Minister is responsible, it is difficult to tell whether there is an increase or a decrease. If the hon, gentleman follows the example of his financial leader, it is more likely that there will be more increases in his Bills than decreases.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon gentleman has jumped to a conclusion too quickly. There is a decrease effected by this Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I jumped at no conclusion, for I offered none. It is possible, there may be a decrease; but I said, if the hon. gentleman follows the course of his financial leader in regard to matters we have had under discussion for three days, the chances are very largely in favor of an increase, and of the introduction of so much ambiguity as would make it difficult to ascertain whether there was an increase or not.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am of the opinion that this Bill should have been introduced by resolution, for there is an increase in the duties. I observe that $7 per thousand is charged on cigars, when put up in a certain shape. The present law does not charge that duty on any cigars, however put up.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I suppose the hon. gentleman refers to the paragraph, which states:

"On all cigars, whether the product of foreign or of domestic raw leaf tobacco, when put up in packages containing less than ten cigars each, $7 per thousand." The change was made in the Inland Revenue Act last Session. No increase is made this year; I can assure the hon gentleman of that. I agree that if there was any increase the Bill should be introduced by resolution. The hon member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) complained that the Bill has been introduced at a late period of the Session. This Bill, however, has been announced for some time. The hon, gentleman asked when my estimates were under discussion if I was not if I was not aware that complaints were made in the country against the administration of the law as it now stands. I told him that I was quite familiar with the complaints. There was trouble with respect to the breaking of packages, and we were endeavoring to ascertain if we could not find some remedy which would meet the wishes of the people and at the same time protect the revenue, and it was considered that this result would be obtained by the present Bill. Some time was necessary to bring about such a change as would, while protecting the revenue, remove as far as possible the cause of the complaints at the present time. I think we have succeeded in doing so. The great cause of the trouble was the necessity of breaking packages, because the manufacturers, with the exception of two, who put up packages of five pounds, used large packages. This Bill contains provisions by which a manufacturer can put up tobacco and obtain stamps for packages as small as one pound packages. On four pounds and under we make a reduction of 1 cent per pound, for additional cost imposed on the manufacturers in putting up small packages, and in that way we encourage and secure that tobacco will be put up in small packages to meet the wants of the smallest retail trade in the country. In order to make that change of il cent per pound in favor of these small packages, we had to take up that section and deal with the whole tobacco duties, dividing the paragraphs according to the We take up the class of tobacco and cigars. whole section and re-enact it all in this Bill, changing that portion referring to packages of four pounds and under, so as to place the duties at 19 cents instead of 20 cents.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the necessity for enacting section 2?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I explained the object on introducing the Bill. Under the law provision has been made by which liquors can be bottled at the distilleries under the supervision of an officer, with the label of the Department that the liquor has been matured, is of a certain age and is pure. Then people know what they buy. It has been found that large quantities of liquor are being put up of inferior qualities, and a label has been devised closely imitating the label provided by the Department, and they state in some instances on these labels that the liquor has been bottled in accordance with the provisions of the Inland Revenue Act. Although it does not violate any provision of the Act, it is misleading, and we propose to provide against that abuse by enacting this clause. That is the reason for submitting it.

On section 4,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of this change?

Mr. COSTIGAN. We have abolished the drawback on Customs duties on corn imported by distillers, and of course the Excise duties are always refunded in case of export.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is the effect of the change you are making?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

On section 6,

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I explained on introducing the Bill, we made a change some two or three years ago with regard to methylated spirits. We had reason to believe that abuses occurred, and the Department made the mixture of these spirits and distributed it to the trade. Besides the mixture of wood alcohol and spirits, we introduced some oil or essence which, while it discolored the spirits, increased the offensive odor to such an extent that there was no danger of its being used for potable purposes. We find now that by a chemical process they can extract the offensive odor from this mixture and reduce it to a state of pure wood alcohol again. We, therefore, make it an offence for any person who deodorises or redistils these spirits or uses them in medicinal preparations for internal use. They are used largely for outward application, but it is certainly objectionable that they should be used inwardly as medicine.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are there different qualities of methylated spirits produced by the Department?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The best quality, I suppose, is pure, and not dangerous to use internally?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is none of it free from wood alcohol. The hon. gentleman asked me, when the Estimates were under consideration whether this branch of the Department was carried as self-sustaining, or whether it involved a loss to the revenue of the country. The facts are, that after paying all expenses in connection with it, besides the duty of 15 cents a gallon, we have a balance of several thousand dollars in favor of the Department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I presume my mistake arose from the fact that the accounts do not seem to be kept in the same manner as the other accounts.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman in hastily looking at the accounts thought they showed $25,000 to the debit of the Department, whereas it was to the credit of the Department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I took it the other

Mr. COSTIGAN. Naturally any person might do the same thing.

Mr. WALDIE. I would like to enquire whether any of this alcohol is imported from the United States or from France?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have already stated that the Department manufacture the methylated spirits, which are a mixture of wood alcohol and the spirits manufactured in the country. We import the wood alcohol from foreign countries; we have imported a small quantity from the United States. But we expect to be able to obtain nearly all we require in Canada before very long, and at a cheaper rate than we are paying for it now. It is already manufactured to some extent in the country, and what is produced is of a very high quality.

On section 7,

Mr. COSTIGAN. This section is to amend section 258 of the Act, which deals with the whole question of the duty on tobacco and cigars. My object was to make a reduction of one cent a pound in the duty on a particular class of tobacco. thought the object might be attained by fixing the duty on that class of tobacco at 19 cents a pound, while it is 20 cents a pound on the other classes; but I find that if the duty is reduced in that way, it will be necessary to change our books in all the manufacturing establishments in the country, which would be quite inconvenient. Therefore, I would prefer that the House should give me authority to make the reduction by granting a rebate of 1 cent a pound, instead of fixing the duty at 19 cents a pound. In place of section 7, as it stands, I would suggest the following :-

"Section 259 is hereby amended by adding thereto the following sub-section:

"A drawback of 5 per cent. on the value of the stamps used shall be allowed to manufacturers of foreign leaf tobacco licensed under this Act, in respect of uncut plug or cavendish tobacco manufactured by them and put up in packages containing four pounds and under, to be paid under such regulations as the Governor in Council may establish in that behalf."

On section 8.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The change made by this section is simply to reduce the weight of the smaller Formerly it read from five pounds upwards, and now we propose to make it read from one pound upwards.

On section 9.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What does this require, in addition to what was provided for

Mr. COSTIGAN. Just the destruction of the box. We have considered this for some time, and have arrived at a well-founded conviction that it is in the interest of the revenue, the consumer and the honest trader that an empty and used cigar box should be destroyed. It is of no commercial value, and it is the means of a good deal of fraud amongst dealers of a certain class, while it subjects the consumer to be imposed upon by making him liable to buy a 5-cent cigar out of a 15-cent box.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the penalty imposed if any empty box is found with a person and not destroyed? I think there is no penalty, and perhaps it is just as well that there should not be any beyond the destruction of the box.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think the hon, gentleman may be satisfied that the law, as it stands, imposes a penalty. Section 102 of the Inland Revenue Act provides that every person who violates any of its provisions, for which violation no penalty is other wise specially provided, shall incur a penalty of $200.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will that apply to the holder of an empty cigar box? It is a very stringent provision.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the law were administered by sending an officer into the private rooms of gentlemen to look after empty cigar boxes, it would be very stringent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You cannot tell what may happen. Any gentlemen having an empty cigar box may be compelled to pay $200.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It need not necessarily be $200. It can be made as low as the circumstances require.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think this change in the law allowing the doing up of tobacco in small packages is to be recommended. It was hard on retail dealers that they should be liable to be fined if they had less than five pounds in their possession, not in the original package. I know of instances of widow women, doing a small retail trade, who had only two or three pounds of tobacco in their possession, which could not be in the original package, and whose stock was seized by Customs officers. I am glad the Minister has changed the law so as to allow package of tobacco to be done up in smaller quantities. I notice by the amendment that a rebate of duty is allowed to all persons who put up packages under four pounds. Is this limited to any quantity, and does the hon. gentleman think that this rebate will be sufficient to encourage the manufacturers to put Mr. Costigan.

each, so that small dealers will be able to buy as cheaply as the large dealers?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do. I was very anxious indeed to find some way of relieving the Department of a very unpleasant task. The reduction of 5 per cent. in favor of packages of four pounds and under will be sufficient, coupled with the interest of the manufacturers to supply the trade. In fact two large manufacturing establishments in the country have begun already, without this law, to put up their tobacco in smaller packages, and they say their trade is growing; and after a little while those who say that the present rebate is not sufficient encouragement, will be forced by the requirements of the trade to do the same. Mr. McDonald, Montreal, said he was quite prepared to make smaller packages in order to suit the retail trade, although of course that would add to the

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). With respect to the empty cigar boxes, for having which in possession a penalty of $200 is provided, the Act does not say "or under $200." Is that penalty absolute?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a general statute relating to punishments which provides that when it is enacted in any statute that a person shall incur a penalty, the penalty, unless a minimum is provided, may be anything less than what is proposed. It might be 50 cents unless a larger minimum were provided.

Mr. TROW. at all? You ca What is the object of the penalty You cannot open a box without breaking the seal. I have seen them in country places kept all the summer. I have seen them around this House. I have some myself here, and I hope the Minister will not send his menials into my room, because I might have some trouble in consequence. This regulation is not understood.

The Department has taken Mr. COSTIGAN. a good deal of trouble to acquaint the public, that is, those who might be affected by any changes in the law, of those changes. In the first place, information is sent to every collector in every division, with instructions that a copy should be given to those in the retail trade who are affected. The same course will be followed in any changes made now. No advantage has been taken by the Department either in regard to the first offence or in regard to ignorance of the law, but, in the interests of the revenue and for other reasons, as well as in the interest of the consumer, this provision should be made.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is quite proper to enact that no cigar manufacturer or dealer should be found with a second-hand box in his possession, but it is going a long way to say that a punishment should be inflicted on the thousands of purchasers who have these boxes. The manufacturer is aware of the provision of the law, but the people of the country become liable to the penalty without having thought about it for one moment. When the stamp is destroyed, I do not very well see how the box can be made use of again. Many people use these boxes to put flower seeds in, and for various other purposes.

I have never known any Mr. COSTIGAN. great hardship that has been suffered by innocent up the tobacco in small packages of one pound parties. The hon, gentleman might use the same argument in regard to any penalties which are imposed by law. The public cannot be acquainted with all the laws which are passed here imposing penalties. This is not intended for the punishment or the inconvenience of innocent parties, and I do not think there is any danger of that taking place.

Mr. TROW. Any malicious person may enter a private dwelling or a private office and convict innocent parties under this provision. You may find in the country districts the boxes, with the top taken off, used for planting seeds, and you may find them placed in the windows. I suppose those people would be liable to a penalty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister says there has been no prosecution under this Act against innocent parties, but is it advisable that we should have to congratulate ourselves upon having a law upon the Statute-book which is, day after day, persistently defied and disregarded? That is the position we are now in, taking the view of the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon, gentleman has changed his course.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes; because you have changed yours.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I did not say it was desirable to have a law on the Statute-book which might be evaded day after day, but the hon. gentleman was referring to men who might be open to prosecution by some malicious person for having these articles innocently in his possession. I think the danger is very small. But, if any class of the people, will persist in the violation of the law, they must be fined, no matter who they are. It is very different from the difficulty which the hon. gentleman suggests. He may have empty cigar boxes which are not being used, and he says it is contrary to the law for him to possess them, and that is true, but I think it would be a great hardship that he should be prosecuted.

Mr. TROW. Those boxes are used by merchants to send their customers' groceries home in.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Why do they not use paper packages?

Bill reported and read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before you leave the Chair, I want to enquire of the Minister of Finance what is the exact effect of the alteration proposed to be made by him last night in clause 148 of the tariff affecting spirits or alcoholic liquors? I was not present when the hon. gentleman explained the nature of the alterations he proposed to make, but I have since obtained, from the books of the House, a copy of the alterations proposed, and if they are as I understand them to be, the effect is of a very important character, and would require very much more serious consideration at the hands of the House than could possibly be given them at one o'clock in the morning. Now, I desire, in the first place, to enquire clause, as I am informed they have done, by making the duty to be:

"For every gallon thereof, of any strength not exceeding 15 degrees below the strength of proof, and when of a greater strength than 15 degrees below the strength of proof, at the same rate on the quantity there would be if that were reduced to 15 degrees below the strength of proof, that is, $2 per gallon."

I would enquire whether it is the intention of the Minister to carry on those changes as I have read them?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not. At one o'clock this morning, I found that the amendment to that resolution was not as I had intended it, and it is not, I think, as I explained it to the House. The proposition which I intend to move in Committee again is this: Our first proposition was, to commence at proof strength and to levy a duty of $1.75 a gallon on proof strength. The proposition that I desired the House to consider last night, was to move that point down to 15 degrees under proof, and to change the duty to $2 instead of $1.75, so that would allow for under proof down as far as 15 degrees below proof, and charge on over proof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly under the circumstances, as it is a complicated matter, on. gentleman it may be as well to defer it until goes into Committoe again.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a clause written out which, I think, will make the meaning perfectly

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a matter of importance to the trade, and also to the country. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, had better place on paper what he proposes to do, so that we may have time to consider it. I do not suppose any injury to the revenue can accrue from that.

Mr. FOSTER. On the contrary, there would be an increase, I think, on the whole.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. great difficulty in changing any of these things at all until we get the clause before us, but I may say to the hon gentleman that if I follow him correctly, the altering of the unit, so to speak, on which the duty is levied, from proof to 85 degrees, that is 15 degrees below proof, will involve a large addition to the spirit duties, so far as I can see. However, as the hon gentleman states that the clause as actually amended is not the clause he proposes to introduce, I will let the matter stand at present.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Kingston Penitentiary.....$155,263.23

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have estimated for the maintenance of the same number of convicts as last year, we have no particular reason to expect an increase. The increases are all statutory down to the tailor assistant instructor. That will be a new officer. The tailor instructor, of course, is engaged principally in making clothing for the convicts, and in addition to the men who are under his charge, there are about ten convicts in charge Their duty is to attend to keepof the clothing. ing the clothing in the storeroom, the changing of whether the Government propose to alter that the suits of the prisoners from time to time, the putting away and delivering at due time of the clothing which the convicts bring in with them, and mending and repairing the clothing. It is an important position, and we thought it proper that the convicts employed should be under the charge of an instructor. We have, therefore, taken one of the keepers for that place, and give him $600 increase. The other items do not involve any material increase or decrease. They are simply the changing of guards to keepers, in place of keepers who have been retired on gratuity in consequence of advancing age and long service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to call the attention of the Ministry to the circumstances connected with an old officer who filled the position of hospital steward, by the name of Haliday. I am informed by this man's family that he had actually tendered his resignation before his death, which resignation, if accepted, would have entitled him to a considerable sum of money as a grant. But he died before the resignation was accepted. I desire to know if the case has been brought to the attention of the Minister, and whether he thinks any allowance can be allowed to the family other than the ordinary two months' salary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. His resignation was tendered, but tendered too late, and it was tendered to the warden and not to the Department. It is out of my power, under the statute, to make better provision than the two months' grant. I will, however, consider whether any special provision can be asked for in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not pretend to say that such cases can be avoided, but I suppose that had his resignation been forwarded and accepted, the family would have been entitled to something like $2,000, as he had been in the employ for 30 years. I am not disposed to advise any extravagance, but the House, I think, would be very willing to consider the proposition if the Government chose to recommend it, to make some allowance to the family of the deceased under the peculiar circumstances. However, I leave it with the hon. Minister, and he will no doubt consider it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I observe there are decreases in the salaries of the chaplains at all the penitentaries, while the salaries of other officers have been increased.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is owing to new chaplains coming in, and they commence at the minimum salary.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. . $100,740 74

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a large increase in this vote. I specially want information as to the very large increase under the heading of maintenance, which has increased from $29,647 to $38,143.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a considerable increase in the number of convicts expected. The number is estimated by the warden, who knows the number of prisoners committed for trial, and he estimates what the usual percentage will reach him. Among the increases is $1,200 for heating. An amount is required for a small organ and for payment of an organist. Additional expenses are estimated for the kitchen.

Sir John Thompson.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the number of additional convicts estimated?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Twenty-five. I will give some of the details: Convicts' clothing, $1,234.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister will note that the items amount collectively to about $4,300, so that the charge for the additional 25 convicts would be out of proportion to the cost in other places, or to the cost we have previously paid in Dorchester.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The increases are based on the contract prices. It is expected that the increase for beef will be $2,583.15; for flour, $1,946, together with increases on oatmeal, butter, molasses, sugar, bread, tobacco, vegetables and some other similar items, amounting altogether to $5,184.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total number of convicts estimated for there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 350.

 $Sir\,RICHARD\,CARTWRIGHT.$ And how many in Kingston ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 580.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see that in Kingston the total maintenance of 580 convicts is about $41,000, and in St. Vincent de Paul the cost of maintenance of 350 convicts is as high as $38,143. Allowing for the expenses that the hon. gentleman enumerated, for chapels and such matters, the disproportion would still be very large for St. Vincent de Paul as against Kingston. I do not think there has been any increase in the cost of flour or beef to warrant such an increase of price as indicated, unless, indeed, the prisoners of St. Vincent de Paul were underfed before, and I hardly think that can be the case, on comparing the estimates for Kingston. Prima facie, I suppose that the cost of these chief articles of food would be nearly as great in Kingston as in St. Vincent de Paul?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The expense of maintenance has always been greater there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not in that ratio.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I expected that the hon. gentleman would call attention to the cost of maintenance at the different penitentiaries, and if he has no objection I will, in the end, give such explanation as I can, with reference to the comparative cost of maintenance in the different institutions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I intended to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the discrepancy which I think will require some explanation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We must consider the stock on hand at the beginning of the year and the stock on hand at the close. I have given the figures of that. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has taken that into account.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know whether I was able to do that, as the Deputy Minister declined to give the Auditor General the figures he wanted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I gave him the figures of the stock on hand at the beginning of the year and at the close. He wanted a statement of the number of convicts from day to day. That was being prepared in my report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see at page 16-B of the Auditor General's Report that the actual maintenance of 325 convicts for the year 1889 was $25,563. What he asks for here is $38,000 for the maintenance of 350. Deducting $4,000 for the special items to which the hon. gentleman refers, there would still be an increase of $9,000 over the actual expenditure in 1889. That is a very large increase, unless there is some very special cause for it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will endeavor to discuss that when we come to the last resolution.

Dorchester Penitentiary $44,156 30

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a statutory increase to the warden of $50, and an increase to the deputy warden and chief keeper of $150. By a mistake made last year the latter's salary was placed at that of the deputy warden at his appointment, the fact having been overlooked that when he was appointed the offices of deputy warden and chief keeper were amalgamated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I forgot to ask the hon. Minister what sort of employment he has found for the prisoners at St. Vincent de Paul and at Kingston?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At Kingston we are transforming the workshop occupied by the locksmith work, which will occupy the whole of this year and probably part of next year. The next thing to be taken in hand will be the remodelling and reconstruction of the old-fashioned cells. The cells in the old part of the building are only the width of the bed, which is made to fold against the wall. The effect is apparent to anybody who visits the penitentiary, that the cell is a very unfit place of abode for a man, especially between Saturday night and Monday morning, and in winter, when there are long hours of confinement. These cells have been condemned by all visitors acquainted with prison affairs, and we thought it desirable that they should be enlarged. The work will occupy a considerable length of time. These, with the ordinary occupations of the prisoners, are ample to employ nearly the whole of the population there for the present year and the next. At St. Vincent de Paul the prisoners are engaged in building a boundary wall, and in finishing the new wing, which will supply them with ample work for at least a year ahead. I am not able to say what means of employment will be provided after that. I shall have to ask a good deal of advice on that subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a troublesome question, no doubt, particularly if the honest laborers object to these prisoners being employed in useful work. I think they push the objection too far, however. In the vote for the Kingston penitentiary there are two distinct sums of $15,000 for the electric light. Is one of these a revote?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. The cost of the work will be under $10,000. The work is nearly finished.

Manitoba Penitentiary...... $50,904 48

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is an extraordinary difference in the maintenance of the convicts in the different penitentiaries. The cost of mainappears to have been $9,216 as against $7,699 for 175 convicts at Dorchester.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In the Manitoba penitentiary there is an addition of a warden's. The warden has heretofore had the assistance of one of the guards as a clerk, and I believe a clerk is necessary. I propose, instead of using the services of a guard, that we shall take a vote for a clerk and dispense with the guard. There is the addition of a carpenter instructor also. We had none there before. The number of trade instructors there has been very small, and we propose to increase it according as we get convicts employed in trades.

Mr. WATSON. I see a gratuity to H. Hall of $687.06, what is that for?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Hall, who was guard at the Manitoba penitentiary, had to resign on account of ill-health. He was in the service fifteen years, his salary was $650, and he was allowed the usual gratuity on retiring.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Warden Bedson was stated in this House to have been the recipient of some furs concerning which an investigation is going on. I do not know whether it is the duty of the Department to obtain explanations from him, but he has not been brought before the Committee yet.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not sure whether the Committee intend to send for him or not. Perhaps the hon. member for Marquette can tell us?

Mr. WATSON. I think not, for the simple reason that the Committee have not the power or instructions to do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not wish to interfere with the investigation of the Committee, but I call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that it was stated on the floor of this House that this officer was the recipient of a large portion of the insurgent's furs.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In several previous years when that item was up, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) mentioned the fact that an order had been given for the delivery of these furs, some to the General, and some to other officers, including Mr. Bedson; and I had from him a very strong statement denying that he had received any furs at all. Of course, I have had no opportunity of calling his attention to the particular evidence before the Committee, as it was only distributed within the past few days.

Mr. WATSON. He was also charged with possessing himself of a pool table while at Did he make any explanation with Batoche. regard to that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have only seen that in the evidence, and did not draw his attention to

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. gentleman explain the extraordinary discrepancy in the cost of maintenance of the penitentiary in Manitoba compared with the cost elsewhere? Every year for years past, in Committee of Supply, we have brought up the case of the Manitoba penitentiary, where there appears to be a greater waste of money than anywhere else. Why is it that Mr. Bedson, taining 100 convicts at the Manitoba penitentiary the warden of the smallest penitentiary in the Dominion, receives the largest pay? The salary of the warden of the British Columbia penitentiary is $2,000; of the Dorchester penitentiary, $2,050; and of the Manitoba penitentiary, $2,800; and Mr. Bedson appears to have received last year, in addition to his salary, $400 for travelling expenses.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The salaries of the wardens are graded according to their length of service. The warden at Kingston began at $2,600 and has reached his maximum of $3,000. At St. Vincent de Paul the warden's salary runs from $2,400 to $2,800, and he has reached his maximum. The warden at Dorchester begins at $2,000 and goes to $2,400, and he has been recently appointednot more than two or three years in office. The warden in Manitoba begins at $2,000 and goes to $2,400. He is receiving $2,800 because he was appointed before the present Act came into force, and his salary remains at $2,800. Last year, in the Committee, when the estimates of Manitoba were up, I expressed the opinion, and have since no reason to change it, that I thought the place was altogether too expensive; but I was unable, for want of information, to give the Committee as full explanation as I would have been glad to give. The vote passed the Committee of Supply, but was challenged on concurrence, when the House divided, and I consequently felt it incumbent on me to have an investigation made into the expenditure. In the month of December last, that investigation was begun by the accountant of my Department, assisted by counsel, in order that the enquiry might be as searching as possible. The enquiry lasted some six or eight weeks and extended to every branch of the management of the penitentiary. That investigation has been concluded and a very elaborate report made, but as the Session was in progress I have not had an opportunity of dealing with the report yet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Could the hon. gentleman give us a summary or explanation of the contents of the report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I really could not. I have gone through it as carefully as I could, but have not been able to come to a conclusion as to what should be done, and feel I must further enquire into it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I notice a charge in the Auditor General's Report, on page C-103, of $18 for one pair of pants. That seems a very high figure.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As to the unusual expense for heating per capita, it appears to be very large, but I am informed that it is impossible to reduce the cost of heating without shutting off one part of the penitentiary from the other. The cost of fuel will not be increased, but in British Columbia they have timber limits from which they get their fuel and they cut their own wood. Coal oil costs 12 cents per gallon more than it does in Kingston. The winter is severe and long. I have made every effort to get the amount of the contract reduced, but without effect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The transportation of coal oil would not be more than 2 or 3 cents.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have invited the widest competition without succeeding in reducing the price.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. LISTER. Have you asked for tenders in Petrolea?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; and in London and in other places in the West.

Mr. WATSON. The price of $27\frac{1}{2}$ cents a gallon does not appear to be excessive.

Mr. LISTER. It must be American oil.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; it is not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am afraid there is a colored man somewhere there.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As to the fuel, the practice heretofore has been to lay in a large stock of wood, but it is intended to dispense with that and use coal almost exclusively.

Mr. WATSON. Is the wood asked for by tender in Manitoba?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is given by contract.

Mr. WATSON. I think Mr. Bedson, in making his report, might have congratulated the Government on the health of the convicts. I see that only $306 was charged for drugs as against $1,300 two years ago. I observe, however, that these ICO convicts have eaten three barrels of flour each per annum, but I suppose this large consumption of flour is due to the health of the convicts which has resulted in the reduction of the cost of drugs. I also see that the quantity of tobacco consumed has decreased, and no doubt the criticisms of the expenditure in that penitentiary which have been made in this House have had some effect in causing Mr. Bedson to retrench his expenditure. As to the heating of the Manitoba penitentiary, I think the charge is exorbitant. I see it costs nearly $7,000.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I did not get any explanation from the Minister as to the charge of $18 for a pair of pants. Can you account for that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; I cannot.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Last year or the year before a large amount was asked to lay in a supply of medical instruments for the Manitoba penitentiary. I am afraid those instruments could not have been very good, because I find in the report of the Auditor General that you have purchased additional instruments such as these-Aspirator, $75; dental forceps, one set and case, $35; ditto, 3 pair, $8.50; ear speculum, $1.75; opthalmoscope, $25. Why do they require an opthalmoscope? That is not required in Manitoba. Then there is a tonsillitine, $15. There are very many similar items to these, and many of the same kind were furnished to that institution two years ago. Then, we have a charge of Dr. Lynch, three visits at $20 a visit. I do not know who this Dr. Lynch is, or where he resides, or what he is doing there. It must have been either a serious case that he was called to attend, or it is a serious charge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Go thou and do likewise.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I should hate to do a thing of that kind and call myself honest. Here is a man who charges $60 for three visits. Then I find that the warden has a horse charged for. I am surprised that Bedson needed a horse, because I thought he had a white horse which he obtained from Batoche. No, I am wrong, it turned out to be a grey horse. This may be the old white horse, but here $225 is charged for the old animal. There was an item which we disputed last year of $450.-12\frac{12}{3},} and we find that this year it amounts to over $700 paid to Mr. Bedson for fuel and light. According to the Auditor General's Report, there is a question as to the propriety of that account. We have him credited for travelling expenses "S. L. Bedson, travelling in Canada, $176.35. S. L. Bedson, travelling in England, $136.58." I would like to know what he was travelling in England for?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has asked me a variety of questions, I will answer from memory as well as I can. With regard to the surgical instruments, I am sorry that my medical education was neglected and I cannot explain the use of those instruments he has named. The discussion which the hon. gentleman raised in the House last year was on the item which I proposed to take for the hospital, and which I expended, including a purchase of instruments. We have taken charge, in the Manitoba Penitentiary within the last year, of a number of insane patients as well, who are attended by the physician, and it is necessary to have for them a complete outfit. I am not able to say whether he sent a requisition for surgical instruments, or whether they are absolutely necessary; he is qualified to know far better than I am, and he has assured me that the outfit of instruments which he procured is all that he expects to be necessary for some time to come. The hon. gentleman will find a list of them all in my report, and likewise a list of the entire stock of dry goods on hand, for which an expenditure has been made. The item which appears in the Auditor General's Report as paid to the account of S. L. Bedson, appears to be this: He was allowed fuel and light, and last Session the Auditor General required that I should get the amount charged to him for fuel and light voted, and accordingly, in the Supplementary Estimates, the amount of $450 was voted. The other $200 consisted of sundries for what is known as officers' quarters, which consists of a reading and recreation room for the officers of the prison. gentleman will remember that that was fully discussed last year on the item for the penitentiary, and my attention was called to the various items then in the Auditor General's Report. The Auditor General has added this to the amount of $450 which was voted for his fuel and light, and that would make the $700 odd. As regards Dr. Lynch, the circumstances are these: When the insane patients were taken to the penitentiary from the asylum, the surgeon requested, in view of his increased charge, that he should be permitted to visit the larger penitentiaries at Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul, and likewise some institutions of the insane, if I remember right. I thought it was a proper request, and, I think, he derived considerable advantage from doing so. The only expense involved was the expense of providing a substitute for him. Dr. Lynch paid the visits, which are charged there, at $20 per visit. As regards the travelling expenses in England, the circumstances are these: The warden the circumstances are these: The warden about 18 months ago, obtained leave of absence to go to England, and he asked me, on his way thither, whether I would be willing that he should received, of course, no travelling expenses for his visit to that country, but I agreed that, in visiting the prisons in England where he could get information as to prison management which would be useful to us, I would pay his simple travelling expenses for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I asked, also, in reference to his travelling expenses in Canada. I see, also, that Dr. Sutherland, whom I did not mention before, receives $210.10 for travelling expenses for examining the various institutions, besides the $60 paid to Mr. Lynch. It is customary, I think, when an individual goes off on a travelling tour, to pay his substitute during his absence. I do not know why Dr. Sutherland should be paid his full salary and allowed his travelling expenses in visiting the different institutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The travelling exenses are probably his expenses going to and from Winnipeg in relation to the purchase of supplies, payment of accounts, and the necessary business of the prison. I do not remember any other travelling expenses which he would incur in Canada. It consisted principally of livery hire. As regards the doctor paying his substitute, if it was simply a question of a holiday I would have required him to pay the substitute as well as to pay his own expenses, but he has taken additional charge of all these insane patients without any extra remuneration, and I thought I might reasonably give him his travelling expenses and not require him to pay a substitute. His salary is small, and he gives his whole time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am inclined to ask the hon. gentleman to allow this item to stand until he is able to digest the report of the gentleman he appointed to examine this warden's expenditure. For the past four or five years there have been items in the Public Accounts that have struck hon. members on this side of the House as unjustifiable extravagance on the part of this warden of the Manitoba penitentiary. Last year the hon. gentleman appointed a commission to report upon it, that commission has reported, and the hon, gentleman has no doubt had time to submit to the House the result of that investigation. We find last year in the Auditor General's Report, that whereas it cost us $44 per head to maintain convicts in Dorchester, it cost $92 a head to maintain them in Manitoba. We find accounts amounted to $500 or $600 for coal oil, which is charged 12 cents per gallon more for the Manitoba penitentiary than for Kingston penitentiary, while the cost of transport could not reach more than 2 cents or 3 cents per gallon. That alone is evidence that there is something wrong in the management of the Manitoba penitentiary. The warden, Mr. Bedson, charges for army lists $15. Why should the country pay for army lists for the warden? From the beginning to the end, there is extravagance permeating that penitentiary management, and I should very much like the Minister of Justice to read the report of the investigation before he asks the vote this year. The amount asked is $50,904, but the previous year the expenditure was only $38,960.

the circumstances are these: The warden about 18 months ago, obtained leave of absence to go to England, and he asked me, on his way thither, whether I would be willing that he should visit some of the larger prisons in England. He be made in that institution. I cannot pretend to undertake to effect the changes, or pretend to do justice to the report when we are so near the end of the session, and I must have the vote in order to carry on the business. In due time I will arrive at an opinion with regard to the action that is necessary, and I hope to be able to satisfy the hon. gentleman in regard to the changes made when the House considers the question next session. While I admit, as I have done, that I am dissatisfied with the large expenditure in Manitoba penitentiary under the present system, there are some items which hon gentlemen opposite have attributed to the extravagance of the warden which are not due to his conduct at all. The army lists are not for him, as was explained last year. The penitentiary being some distance from Winnipeg, it has been found reasonable and proper to have a recreation room where the officers have amusements and reading material. The army lists are of interest to the officers, for a number of them are old army men. The amount paid is not for four copies of the same list, but for four of the series. As regards the oil, the warden has nothing to do with Tenders were advertised for and samples received here. Hon. members from Manitoba and the North-West will bear me out in saying that the price we have been paying is not in excess of the price in Winnipeg.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who has the contract for the oil?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A firm in London; I do not remember the name, but I can give the name to the hon, gentleman later. Tenders for the oil contract were called for in July. I was dissatisfied with the prices as compared with the prices in the Eastern Provinces, and I declined to make a contract, and it was not until December or As regards January that a contract was made. the vote we asked being in excess of the expenditure last year, that is a mistake; we are estimating for a reduction. The amount of expenditure last year appears to be small in comparison with the vote, but it is due to the fact that there were refunds for maintenance and clothing and other matters, including accounts with officers of the prison. The quantity of provisions and supplies per head of the staff seems large as compared with other penitentiaries, but the peculiar circumstances of Manitoba penitentiary must be remembered. It is situated fifteen miles from settlement, and we had to make arrangements by which the officers can receive, at contract prices, stores, coal oil, and all their provisions. They stores, coal oil, and all their provisions. They pay their accounts out of their monthly salaries, and the money is placed in the banks to the credit of the Receiver General.

Mr. LISTER. No doubt there is something wrong about the coal oil contract. If the Department is paying 26½ cents a gallon, they are paying enormously more than it can be bought for. Sunlight oil is, no doubt, the best quality, but it can be bought in Petrolea at 12 cents a gallon, and shipment to Winnipeg would not cost more than 2 cents per gallon; and on no account should it be charged more than 15 cents in Winnipeg. The Dominion Coal and Coke Company appears to be the company which furnishes oil to the Manitoba penitentiary. There is no such concern doing business in the oil region, but it is one whose Sir John Thompson.

business must be confined to Winnipeg. There are very many oil refiners in Petrolea who would be glad to supply this oil, unless all the refiners of oil have united for the purpose of forming the Dominion Coal and Coke Company. So far as the warden of the penitentiary is concerned, I may say, that the Minister, who has been in Ontario only during the last few years, is not aware of what is the comment throughout the western country, namely, that Manitoba penitentiary has been most extravagantly, if not most corruptly managed by Mr. Bedson, the warden. That is reported throughout the whole country. Every person who knows anything about the North-West and Manitoba, is aware that there has been the grossest extravagance, if not corruption, in the management of this penitentiary, and that Mr. Bedson is not the man for the position. He is a pleasant fellow, who makes himself agreeable with every person, and he trades upon that agreeable manner. Now, so far as this man Bedson is concerned, he has been charged, practically, in this House, with having taken the property of half-breeds in the North-West; and he has not deigned to answer these charges here, although an investigation has been pending. He has been charged with taking, not one horse, but many horses, belonging to the half-breeds, and he has not appeared before the Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was he summoned?

Mr. LISTER. No. The investigation which the Minister has ordered, and upon which a report has been made, will doubtless give a good deal of insight into the management of this Manitoba penitentiary. I believe that the scrutiny should be a very close one; and, I believe, that many changes involving large sums of money can be made in the management of that penitentiary. It seems to me ridiculous that the cost of maintaining the Manitoba penitentiary should be so enormously greater than the cost of maintaining the other penitentiaries.

Mr. WATSON. As far as the coal oil is concerned, I cannot find much fault with the price paid for it; and I would just remind these hon. gentlemen that we have not got an Intercolonial railway carrying our frieght at a loss to the country, and that in the west our freights are exceedingly high. The Minister stated that these travelling expenses in Canada would, no doubt, be Mr. Bedson's expenses from Winnipeg to the penitentiary. I see that Mr. Bedson bought for himself a horse for $250, and I also see that he paid O'Connell & Burke, livery-stable keepers in Winnipeg, $214.50, and 221 trips of teams, $123.50, and cab hire, $4.50. It appears to me that on the amount for feed, Mr. Bedson could keep sufficient horse flesh to do his own driving, and that he should not be allowed such excessive travelling expenses. I am sure that the House is pleased to hear that the Minister has made an investigation into Mr. Bedson's accounts. I do not know whether it was taken into consideration that while in the North-West he appropriated the goods and chattels of several people to his own use, while acting as an officer under the Militia Department, if not an officer of the Department of Justice. I think these should have been taken into consideration in the enquiry; and if Mr.

Bedson is found guilty of the charges made on the floor of this House, that he should be dismissed. There is no doubt whatever that he is a very extravagant official.

Mr. MACDOWALL. In the first place, I think it is perfectly contrary to British justice to try and bring this case of Mr. Bedson before the House now. A committee is trying his case at present.

Mr. WATSON. What committee?

Mr. MACDOWALL. You say he is charged before a committee.

Mr. WATSON. I said he was charged in this

Mr. MACDOWALL. I think the charge about the furs was made simultaneously before the committee against General Middleton, Mr. Hayter Reed and Mr. Bedson. I may say that it is rather a curious course that has been adopted. I believe that a parliamentary committee is a most unfair way of trying charges, and I believe that a departmental enquiry, such as the Minister has instituted, is by far the fairest way. I think it is contrary to all sense of justice that the jury, the judge, and the counsel for the prosecution and defence should be all one and the same. It reminds me of some of the stories I have heard told of western life in the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I am surprised at the ignorance of the hon. gentleman. He ought to know, if he does not, that Bedson's case has not been referred to that committee. I am also surprised at his charging that committee with being an unfair tribunal. It appears to me that it is a great reflection on the selection of gentlemen made by the First Minister, that they should be charged with being unfair and unjust. There could be no better means of trying General Middleton, or Bedson if he were before it, than a committee of this House.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I did not say the committee was unfair, and I have nothing to say against the formation of the committee. But I say that the system of trying men before a committee is an unfair system.

Mr. WATSON. I have no doubt that it is better for some of the friends of the hon. gentleman who are in the service of the Government that they should be tried by a departmental com-mission. I believe and I hope, that as a result of this enquiry, which the Minister of Justice has made, the chances are that Bedson will get his just deserts—which are dismissal. I see that Bedson has travelled in England and Canada during the last year, and I would ask the Minister of Justice what time this official has been absent from the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He has had three months' leave to go to England, and no leave except that. Any other absence would be in Winnipeg, I suppose.

Mr. WATSON. Is any of his time taken up by his military duties? He is major of a battalion. Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He had no leave for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) After the explanation made by the Minister of Justice, and the promise he has given, that he will present the report of the enquiry he has made at the beginning of next | are wrong, I will have an enquiry.

Session, I shall await the presentation of that report, and shall feel myself charged to make a special examination of the accounts of this peni-tentiary next year. I am satisfied, after listening to the discussion-and the Minister himself is satisfied from the fact that he appointed a commission—that something was wrong in that penitentiary. In fact, we have a straight and fair admission from the hon. gentleman that it is so. I shall deem myself charged with the responsibility of looking closely into that expenditure next year, and if it is not improved, I shall take up more time discussing it than I did this year or last. Anybody who looks at the accounts of this peniteniary with an unbiassed mind must come to the conclusion that the administration is rotten. Either there is gross extravagance, or, as my hon. friend says, there is something worse than extravagance.

British Columbia Penitentiary..... $44,434.29

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The increases are statutory down to the hospital overseer. The warden vacated his quarters in the prison and a house was built for him outside, and his quarters are now used as a hospital. We had no hospital there before and a hospital overseer is appointed at the minimum salary. There is to be appointed an additional There is an estimated increase of 30 in the number of the convicts. There is also an estimated increase for working expenses: heating, $200; light. $450; maintenance of buildings, $80; armory, $30; kitchen, $40; stationery, $40; farm, $80; and stables $80. In the industries there is an estimated increase of $2,000. The warden states that the working expenses for the fiscal year 1888-89 exceeded the appropriation owing to the necessity ofhaving works completed as soon as possible which were charged to working expenses. He estimates that there will be required for works which he is now carring on in connection with prison repairs and for the purchase of new tools, &c., for the farm and the workshops, $1,400.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the hon. Minister why he needs so much more than was expended? Last year $56,000 were voted, and only $36,000 expended in the British Columbia penitentiary; and yet, you ask for $47,000 for 1890-91, although the increases in the salaries amount to only $3,000. For maintenance alone, $6,000 were voted more than was required. There is no use of the Committe going on voting a great deal more than is necessary. In a case like that of the Manitoba penitentiary, where the warden spends all he can lay his hands on, I object to voting more than is actually required.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will take the risk of reducing the vote for maintenance and for working expenses $3,000.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). In the expenditure for the maintenance of the stables, I see you charge for bran four tons and 1,974 pounds, $147.61. That would be about $29.50 per ton. I find also, for shorts, two tons and 1,154 pounds, $90.19. That would be $36 a ton. Then, you have chairs at $11 and ten at $3. All these appear to me to be excessive.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot tell the prices, but, if the hon. gentleman knows that any Mr. WILSON (Elgin). When the Minister makes an estimate, he ought to have a reason for the estimate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the warden estimates that he wants that quantity of bran and has to pay that much for it, I have no means of knowing that his statement is not correct. If the hon. gentleman says it is not, I will look into the item. I have to take the opinion and advice of my officers, as I have no personal knowledge in the matter. If the hon. gentleman says I am paying more than the current prices, I will make an enquiry and find if they are wrong.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). It is certainly not my place to point out the prices of the articles. When the warden presents a requisition to the Minister, it is the duty of him to carefully examine into it and see that the charges are reasonable. If the warden represented to him that he wanted to pay $29.50 a ton for bran, the natural question would be was that too much. If $30 to $40 a ton for shorts strikes his mind as being extravagant, he should make enquiries into it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Very well; I will ask that this item stand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are one or two other items that require explanation. On page C—109, there is 3,002 pounds of coal at $45. That may be a clerical error because $45 for a ton and a half is a very high figure.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I find that the price the coal cost is $8.50 for 166½ tons, and I presume this is a clerical error, but I will have it enquired into

Regina Jail..... $900

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the theory of this? Is it simply that we pay the warden and the community pay the rest of the expenditure, for the warden stands out here in solitary glory at $900, and no charge for anything else?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The jail has not yet been completed, but will be by the close of the present year, and it is intended that the prisoners confined in the police barracks in the various stations in the North-West shall occupy the Regina jail.

Mr. WATSON. We were to have some explanation in regard to the working of the agencies in the old country.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Watson) will remember that we were waiting for the report of the High Commissioner. I think he now has that report in his hands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Agriculture might as well give us a résumé of this report, the lack of which kept the House in session for twenty-two hours.

Mr. CARLING. This item is for the general expenses of immigration outside of the salaries of officers. It is for the general expenses of immigration and the printing of pamphlets, the employment of agents, and all that class of expenditure which the hon. gentleman will see stated in the Auditor General's Report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But what was specially under discussion when item 75½ was created was the salaries of the agents in Europe, and we reserved this item of $55,000 on the express understanding that the salary of agents in Europe would be discussed under this item. I want to know what were the particulars given in Sir Charles Tupper's report, which the hon. gentleman had not printed at that time.

Mr. CARLING. There are no further particulars in detail. One of the items objected to, I think, was in reference to some travelling expenses of Mr. Colmer, and another was in reference to some expenses of Mr. Chipman. Mr. Colmer had to go to Glasgow on one occasion in connection with the exhibition there, and at another time, he went to Antwerp to close up matters in connection with that exhibition.

Mr. WATSON. After reading that report, does the Minister consider it advisable to maintain these officers in their present positions or to make any change? I do not think the results of this system have been satisfactory to the people of Canada, and especially to the people of the North West. We have not had the immigration we should have had, and I think some other means should be adopted in preference to the present system. I desire to know if the Minister intends to change the present system.

Mr. CARLING. There is no present intention to make any change in regard to the agencies in the old country. Mr. Dyke, who is the agent at Liverpool, is an excellent officer, and I think no man has done better service to his country than Mr. Dyke has in regard to immigration and other matters which have come before him. Then we have Mr. Grahame at Glasgow, who is a very efficient man also; we have Mr. Connolly at Dublin, Mr. Merrick at Belfast, and Mr. Down at Bristol. We do not at present intend to make any change.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see that Mr. Dyke gets a very fine salary, and no doubt he is a very good agent. We find that he receives $2,100 as agent. Then he has a per diem allowance of $4 aday for the whole 365 days, amounting to $1,460. Then he charges telegrams, $24.45, and fare—whatever that may be—$9.16. Then his income tax is paid to the amount of $52.44. That amounts to close on $4,000. Then we find Mr. Dyke cropping up in various other places, and drawing heavily on the amount voted for European immigration. I do not understand how he is allowed to charge $4 a day for every one of the 365 days charged here; he is also paid a fare of $9.16. Is he stationary or does he travel around?

Mr. CARLING. Out of that amount, Mr. Dyke pays an assistant some $300 or $400. He has to travel to different parts of the country—in fact he is a most active man. I do not think there is any place in which he can foster immigration to which he does not go, and any one who has come in contact with him will know that he is a very active and energetic officer.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see that Mr. Dyke's assistants are paid also. The Rev. J. Bridger, clerk's assistant, received $87.60; W. Edwards, junior clerk, gets $126.53; E. Forrest, office boy, receives $75.92; G. H. Mitchell, correspondent and book-keeper, gets $292; R. Paulson, foreign corresponding clerk, gets $379.60, and the Rev. R. F. Winter, for locating immigrants, receives $115.50. That is the whole staff in the Liverpool office. I do not see how it is that he gets $4 a day for living expenses for 365 days. I think it would be better, perhaps, to send one of the members of this House over there; they might be more useful in the service there than they are in the House. I would like some further explanation with regard to this item.

Mr. CARLING. What further information does the hon. gentleman ask?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Are all these permanent? Is Mr. Dyke permanently employed at a salary of $2,100? Does he got $4 a day for 365 days for living allowance, and is he living constantly at Liverpool, or is it living allowance only when travelling?

Mr. CARLING. The living allowance is when he is travelling.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That is not stated.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Dyke has been an officer of the Government for a great many years, and he has received that amount of money for travelling expenses.

Mr. CASEY. No; it is not the travelling expenses. It is not so put down.

Mr. CARLING. Yes; he receives that, travelling or no travelling. He has received that for the last twelve or fifteen years, and during the rime that the friends of the hon. gentleman were in power.

Mr. CASEY. He gets $3,560 whether he travels or not. That is the amount of the two items put together.

Mr. CARLING. That is an allowance for travelling in addition to his salary.

Mr. CASEY. He gets $2,100 as salary and $1,460 as a per diem allowance, whether he is travelling or not. That makes $3,560 a year, and it would be just as well to put that all down as his salary. It does seem to me an excessive salary. I am well aware of Mr. Dyke's services for the country and his worth as an individual. I know him personally.

Mr. CARLING. I dare say it would be better if it were arranged that the salary should be increased. That has been going on for a number of years, and it is my intention to enquire into the travelling expenses and salaries, and to revise the salaries of the officers in the same way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to contradict the hon. gentleman, speaking from memory, but I do not recollect that we allowed a per diem allowance in the time that Mr. Letellier was Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CARLING. I am told it is so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is an unusual mode of arranging the matter, and I think had better be altered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that if we are going to pay this man $3,500 a year salary, it ought to be was entered into? They promised to relieve the so stated. I see Mr. Dyke is put down for $2,100 a year and his living allowance is $1,400 more, which, as appears now, is given to him as salary. Then I suppose the same arrangement is made with the agent at Glasgow, Mr. Graham, who is put down for $1,300 salary, and he gets for living allowance $1,460 more. I suppose that is another way of giving him an increased salary. Then the agent at Dublin, Mr. Connolly, is in the same position; he has a salary of $1,000 and $730 for living allowance. Then the agent at Belfast, Mr. H. Merrick, also gets $1,000, and $1,460 for living allowance. I think in all these cases if it is proposed to give gentlemen $3,000 or $4,000 a year salary, it ought to be so stated.

Mr. HESSON. The question is, whether his services are worth as much to this country as we are paying; whether it is divided over a per diem allowance or a fixed salary without such allowance. My impression is, that if he is required to go to Antwerp, or Belgium, or across to Ireland, or to visit any of the distant counties of England, he would probably charge his allowance without any salary. The question is, whether we would be further advanced than we are. If his services are worth $3,500 a year to the country, it is immaterial in which way he gets it. If he is required by his duties to go out there, he is supposed to go, and he gets his day allowance, and there is no reason to complain.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That shows the unreasonable course the Government is taking in reference to this matter. Mr. Dyke may be a very efficient agent, but I would ask: Has the Minister any information that he could give to this House stating what number of days Mr. Dyke has been travelling, the places he has visited in the performance of his duty, what number of days he has been out? We have no means of knowing. ought we know Mr. Dyke stays at home in his office in Liverpool constantly, and is receiving, as it has been stated, somewhere near $4,000 for staying at home. If there were any report stating that he had been travelling fifty days, or a 100 days, we could understand it. But we have no means of knowing this; we have no information given to us what Mr. Dyke has been doing, further than that he has received $2,100 as salary and $4 a day for 365 days for living expenses, and for ought we know he has been living constantly in Liverpool —I know nothing to the contrary. It would be better if we knew that Mr. Dyke was performing some service. As the Minister says he is going to investigate this matter and look carefully into it, and come to some conclusion whereby he will be in a position to know what these men are doing. I think, under these circumstances, I will not pursue the item any further.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Dyke did not travel in England much, for his expenses are placed at only $9.16. His duty is certainly not to travel in Belgium, or Ireland, or other places, but to look after his office in Liverpool. As to the question where Mr. Dyke is worth $3,560 a year, that is for the Minister to determine. I desire to say a few words in regard to agencies in Europe. To what extent has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company fulfilled the pledges given to Parliament by them and by the Government at the time their contract was entered into? They promised to relieve the country from the greater part of the burdens of soliciting emigrants in Europe, and settling immigrants on the land in the North-West. I have yet to hear of any great success attending the company's efforts. No doubt they have distributed a large number of pamphlets in Europe, but I am not aware they have made special efforts to place immigrants on Government lands in the North-West. I, therefore, ask the Minister what has been accomplished by the Canadian Pacific Railway in this connection, and how far have their promises been realised.

Mr. CARLING. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have expended a large amount of money in distributing literature, which they had prepared at their own expense, in Europe and in the United States. They have also done much to reduce the fare for emigrants going to the North-West, and they now only charge something like $12 from Quebec to Winnipeg, and in proportion to stations further on. I believe they are doing valuable service and are encouraging immigration to the North-West. They have agents in the western cities and in Europe urging those who desire to make a change to go to the North-West, and I think their efforts are being attended with some success.

Mr. CASEY. We know they have been distributing literature, and have given cheap fares to immigrants; but how much of the emigration is due to the efforts of agents of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Europe, which is almost a Government institution?

Mr. CARLING. It is quite independent of the Government.

Mr. CASEY. The question is whether the Government is independent of the company. I understand the Minister cannot give us the exact results of the Canadian Pacific Railway immigration policy.

Mr. CARLING. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the results of their efforts, but I know they are most liberal in the expenditure and most active in their efforts to secure emigrants.

Mr. CASEY. How much has been saved to the country in the way of immigration expenditure in consequence of the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. CARLING. The Estimates have been cut down for the last three or four years by something like $100,000, and as compared with previous years by three or four hundred dollars, in great part, in consequence of exertions which have been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway to promote immigration. These exertions are active. There is much greater competition in Great Britain and Europe now than there was some years ago. This is due to the fact that Australia and the Argentine Republic are offering large inducements to emigrants. wages paid in Great Britain and on the continent are also greater than they were a few years ago. Notwithstanding all the discouragements, we are getting a fair share of emigration, due to the exertion, not only to the efforts of the Government, but to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The whole system of immigration should be entirely swept away, for it is a perfect waste of public money. All political favorites provided for in that Department and throughout Ontario should be dismissed. This Mr. CASEY.

country has certainly been advertised sufficiently for a number of years, and a great many of the immigrants we think we have secured simply pass through the country to the United States. It is time the whole of this business should cease. Another objectionable feature is this, that all through Ontario we have agents appointed who are simply distributors of literature, which seeks to induce men to leave Ontario and go to the North-West. A political friend to the Minister of Justice in my own town has been paid $65 for distributing literature last year.

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman is aware that in the county of Kent, and in the town of Chatham, the Americans are more active than elsewhere in the country. We have distributed in that particular section pamphlets showing the advantages of the North-West, as we think, over the Western States, and I think the small amount of $65, for the distribution of this literature, might not be objected to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the hon. Minister is mistaken as to the amount of his literature distributed to the people of the United States.

Mr. CARLING. You will find them posted in railway stations, post offices and other public places.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the Postmaster General allows literature to be posted up in the post offices, advising the people of this country to move to the North-West, I think it is time the matter should be brought to his notice.

Mr. CARLING. Perhaps they are not in the Chatham post office, but they are in other post offices.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is my candid opinion that all this money is wasted. I would like to know if he has any knowledge as to the extent of the services rendered by Mr. Williams, of Chatham, in this direction? Although I have lived there all my life, I have never heard of his distributing pamphlets, nor do I know any man who has ever heard of his doing so. I think this item is an illustration of how this money is being wasted generally.

Mr. WATSON. I had hoped that the Minister would have some changes to suggest with regard to these agents in Europe. I am strongly under the impression that it would be much better if this large amount of money spent in maintaining offices, was expended on agents who would travel around in different sections of the country to see the people who intended to emigrate. Gentlemen who have had considerable experience in this matter advise that this course should be adopted. These agents take up a very large percentage of the total vote, and so far as I can learn, they do little or nothing outside of their offices. With regard to the expenses of Mr. Dyke, of $4 aday for 365 days, the hon. gentleman does not appear to know whether this is for travelling expenses or not.

Mr. CARLING. I have explained that $1 a day is paid to an assistant in the office out of Mr. Dyke's allowance, and $3 is really what he gets.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Dyke has several assistants besides, and I suppose that dollar a day man relieves him of some work he ought to do himself, or no doubt he would not pay it out of his salary.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Dyke acts as a consular agent. We have no consular agent in fact, but the Americans have consular agents at these different points, and they pay them very large salaries. Mr. Dyke is there as a representative of Canada, and is very attentive to all matters relating to the Government. I do not know if the hon. gentleman has been in Liverpool, but everyone who has visited that place finds that Mr. Dyke is most attentive, most active, and most energetic and that he is doing his work admirably. We owe a great deal to Mr. Dyke, in conjunction with Sir Charles Tupper, for preventing our cattle being scheduled at the time the American cattle were scheduled. That advantage to Canada is worth a million dollars a year as compared with the position of the Americans with the same number of cattle. I do not think that we should begrudge this to an energetic and active gentleman like Mr. Dyke.

Mr. WATSON. What about J. G. Colmer, who draws a salary in the London office?

Mr. CARLING. He is Sir Charles Tupper's secretary, and he is not under the Agriculture Department now.

I do not think the hon. Mr. WATSON. gentleman's reasoning is very good, for he stated that it was very much harder to secure immigrants now than it was a few years ago, while at the same time he says that he is reducing the vote for immigration. Is it because he cannot get the money voted by his Department, or is it on account of the labor organisations, that this very small amount is voted for immigration purposes? It appears to me, considering the importance of settling up the North-West, that we should have a larger vote for immigration purposes. I believe that the Agriculture Department should be the most active of all the Departments of the Government, and I am sorry to see that it is practically falling off altogether. As was stated by the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) a great number of the immigrants who settle in Manitoba are from the Eastern Provinces, and I venture to say that we get twenty people from these Provinces for the one we get from the old country. Of course, these are the very best settlers we can have and we cordially welcome them, but still we should have some immigration from the old country. I would like to know from the hon. Minister, whether Mr. Grahame, who had done good work for the Department at Winnipeg, and who had always treated the immigrants with courtesy, sympathy and kindness, was dismissed from the service of the Department?

Mr. CARLING. The chief reason for Mr. Grahame leaving the service was because he desired to. He wrote a letter to the Department saying that his health was not good, and that he wanted to change his mode of living, and would like to get leave of absence with a view of retiring.

Mr. WATSON. Was that the only reason, or was not his resignation asked for?

 $\frac{Mr.}{him.}$ CARLING. Not by me. I did not ask $\ensuremath{\mathrm{Mr}}.$ WATSON. Do you know if he was asked by the Department?

Mr. CARLING. No. 1154

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Was he allowed a gratuity?

Mr. CARLING. He was allowed six months' leave of absence and retired at the end.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if that active agent whom he praised so much the last time we were discussing this item, Mr. Metcalfe, has been re-engaged?

Mr. CARLING. No; Mr. Metcalfe is not in the service of the Government at the present time.

 $Mr.\ WATSON.\ Do\ you\ expect to\ secure\ his\ services\ this\ year\ ?$

Mr. CARLING. I do not know. I have not spoken to him on that subject.

Quarantine, Grosse Isle... $18,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you want an increase of $4,636?

Mr. CARLING. It has been necessary to increase the steamboat accommodation, as every vessel that comes up the St. Lawrence, night or day, is now inspected by the medical superintendent or by his assistant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is an increase. What is that for?

Mr. CARLING. We have employed the medical superintendent of that establishment permanently to give more attention to the establishment and to visit different parts of the country where lepers may be found. We have already found one or two cases in Cape Breton, and it was necessary to have them removed to the establishment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not disposed to quarrel with any reasonable expenditure under this head. The House is, perhaps, aware that there have been symptoms of an outbreak of leprosy in a good many quarters of Europe of late, and we can hardly be too particular to stamp it out as soon as it appears. Is there any reason to believe that the number of these unfortunate afflicted persons is increasing? I was sorry to hear that the symptoms of the disease were found in places outside of Tracadie.

Mr. CARLING. We had reason to belive that there were some cases in Cape Breton, and we sent the medical officer there to make an investigation, and we had the afflicted persons brought to Tracadie. I think that now there are none outside of the institution.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Were those persons natives or foreigners?

Mr. CARLING. Natives.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What power has the Department to deal with these cases? Are you able by summary process to arrest the persons afflicted and bring them to the Lazaretto, or do they come voluntarily?

Mr. CARLING. The only power we used last season was the persuasive power of the medical officer, and the good treatment the patients have received at the institution. I hardly think we have legal power to arrest them, but it may possibly be necessary to take power.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If even one or two cases have been found in such place as Cape Breton, it is for the hon. Minister and his Department to consider seriously whether legal power should not be obtained for the isolation of any person so afflicted. In these northern countries we are free at present from the scourge of leprosy, but everybody knows that it is a highly contagious disease, and any negligence on our part in allowing these people to go at large might result in very grave consequences.

Precautionary measures for the Public Health......$5,000

Mr. CASEY. What does the hon. Minister intend to do with this item?

Mr. CARLING. This item has been reduced by $5,000. Some part of that money has been used in giving support to the health journals and it is voted to be ready for any emergency.

Mr. CASEY. The accounts of last year in regard to this item are sadly mixed, and I suppose it is the fault of the Department, because the Auditor General must take the accounts in the shape in which they are handed in to him. I find charges for investigating pig disease, attending plasterer at Brandon, caulking steamers, and so forth—all sorts of items jumbled up together. There is no means of telling what is due to the public health, and what is not. There is a separate vote for cattle diseases and sheep scab, but I find under the charges for public health last year any number of items relating to cattle diseases. do not think that is the right way to arrange the accounts or to spend the money. In regard to the Sanitary Journal at Montreal and the Sanitary Journal at Ottawa, I do not know the former, but I do know the latter. It has been sent to me for years, and once in a while I get a bill for it, which I pay with the request to discontinue it. have not had a bill for a year or two back. not know what the Government get for the $1,200 they pay. I know it is a worthless little publication. Do the Government get a certain number of copies?

Mr. CARLING. This paper is sent to representatives of this House and Senators, to the head officers and all our immigration officers, and has been very favorably noticed by the press of the country. I have had many communications from medical men in different parts highly approving of it.

Mr. CASEY. I know the journal quite well and read it once in a while, and am satisfied it is a little speculation. For the price paid, the Government could get a fine compilation on sanitary questions and have something for their money, instead of this little ephemeral sheet. I think it is a job in the full sense of the term. I notice that Mr. John Dyke, the agent at Liverpool, has spent considerable money in travelling. Under this item of public health, he received for travelling expenses $486.56, although he is allowed $4 a day for expenses. He thus charges both amounts.

Mr. CARLING. That was a special allowance for looking after cattle in the docks, and the money, although paid to Mr. Dyke, went to some man by the name of Mitchell, employed to go to the docks at Liverpool, and give information to the men shipping cattle.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CASEY. Why, in the name of the Immigration Department—for I can think of no stronger phrase—is this charged to Mr. Dyke, when paid to somebody else? And what has this item to do with cattle? This shows the utter and fatuous jumble in which the accounts of the Department are kept. Here is $486 under the head of quarantine and public health paid to Mr. Dyke, and the hon. gentleman says it was not for Mr. Dyke, nor for quarantine or public health, but to enable Mr. Dyke to send somebody to the docks to look after cattle.

Mr. CARLING. Cattle disease is a matter which comes under this heading, as it is important diseased cattle should not go into the country.

Mr. CASEY. I am complaining that this should be charged to that account, and the hon. gentleman explains that the public health includes the health of cattle. It appears now that the duties of this man, whom Mr. Dyke employed, were not to give advice and information to exporters when they landed, but to see that the cattle were healthy before being landed. No cattle can be exposed for sale in Liverpool until they have been inspected by the English authorities, and, therefore, there is no necessity for this charge being made by Mr. Dyke.

Mr. WATSON. It would be better in future to have the name of the person employed inserted, because this leaves one to imagine that Mr. Dyke receives all this money for his own services, and if he is receiving $4,000, I think he is receiving too much.

Mr. CARLING. I admit that the item does not seem to be properly charged. There is no doubt the money was expended for that purpose, and was not paid to Mr. Dyke, but to Mr. Mitchell, who was employed by Mr. Dyke. The charges are made in a different manner this year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). What are the duties performed by Mr. Mitchell? How many visits did he make? The Minister ought to be able to explain this item.

Mr. CARLING. I believe that this payment is for nearly the whole of his time. The hon. gentleman knows that last year we shipped to Great Britain something like 85,000 cattle, and this sum of $400 or $500 is very small for that service.

Mr. CASEY. What did he do in reference to the cattle?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot give the exact statement, but for visiting the wharves on arrival of vessels with cattle I do not think the amount paid to him is extravagant.

Mr. CASEY. I see two steamers mentioned here, the Hygeia and the Challenger. Are these employed in connection with the quarantine at Grosse Isle?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. CASEY. No, Sir; I have been on my feet all the time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon gentleman has gone back to another item. We are endeavoring to keep as nearly as possible to the item under discussion.

Mr. CASEY. The items are the same in the Auditor General's Report; they are under the same heading on page D—43. I also find here charges of this kind—brushes, brooms and soap, burying child, cleaning sheds, and so on. I am a little confused by these items appearing under the head of public health.

Mr. CASEY. Is there any expectation of sheep scab this year ?

Mr. CARLING. I hope not, but it may break out.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to know if that one sheep that was imported into Ontario last year was thoroughly examined.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think, under the present system of criticism which is being adopted by one or two hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is necessary we should injure our health by remaining here any longer to-night. I do not object to fair or decent criticism, but it seems to be the idea of these gentlemen to keep us here the whole night by asking facetious questions. If we are to go through this kind of criticism, we might as well do it in better hours. If we cannot do work fairly, I think the Committee had better rise, and come back to the question another day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Go on.

Mr. WATSON. I think the remarks of the Finance Minister are uncalled for.

Mr. FOSTER. There never was a more absurd question put than that which the hon. gentleman put a minute ago.

Mr. WATSON. I think the criticisms on this side have been very fair, and have resulted in obtaining information from the Government, and also admissions that certain items were not in proper shape. In fact, the Minister of Agriculture stated that he would charge some of them in another way in future.

Miscellaneous Printing.....$30,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you ask for $10,000 addional?

Mr. FOSTER. It was under-estimated last year.

Survey of Georgian Bay......$18,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it not time this survey should be closed?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how it is at present. When I was Minister of Marine we thought that about four years would probably finish what was most necessary to be done. As my hon. friend knows, these waters are very extensive, and the extent that is got over each summer, although they work very faithfully, is not very large.

Mr. DENISON. The work ought to be continued until it is finished properly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many parties are employed?

Mr. FOSTER. There is one large boat, and last year there were two or three parties in small boats, off from the large boat.

Mr. SPROULE. They are still in the Georgian Bay.

Salary and contingencies of office of Mr. Fabre. $3,500

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think we ought to have some explanation of what he is doing, whether he is succeeding in sending us out any immigrants.

Mr. FOSTER. He is sowing the seed for future results. It takes time.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). We ought to have some report from this gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I acknowledge there ought to be a report. I think there is a report, but the Secretary of State is not present.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By the report of last year he was instrumental in bringing one immigrant, and that immigrant was never placed anywhere. I move that the item be struck out. It is utterly indefensible.

Committee divided: Yeas, 6; Nays, 18.

To assist in the publication of the 4th volume of Cartwright's Cases...... $250

Mr. FOSTER. I think the words "Sir Richard" ought to be inserted before the name "Cartwright."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would heartly support that if the Government would publish Sir Richard's speeches.

Commercial Agencies......$5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do we get for this?

Mr. FOSTER. I reduced that. It has not been expended this year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Have we any Governor General's warrants in connection with the Banff Springs?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is all there is. The expenditure this year is all within the mark.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that to be a continuous thing? Is there no end to it?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We are decreasing the expenditure every year, and I think there will be a further decrease next year. All the heavy work on the roads is about completed. There is one bridge to be built to complete the circuit of the carriage road, and after that there will be no heavy work. But it is proposed to make a few bridle trails into some of the most interesting portions of the park.

Collection of Orders in Council...... $8,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think that is a piece of extravagance altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. This vote, I think, will complete the work which has been undertaken and been going on for about two years. The Orders are all collocated that have been passed by the Council. This is to cover the remainder of the cost of printing.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think myself that has been a perfect job. It ought to have been done for about $1,000. I have examined the report and know it well; every lawyer has looked through it. There is no work about it at all. The expenditure is simply outrageous, and no defence can be offered for it. I have talked with a lot of gentlemen who understand that kind of work, and they agree that it was simply disgraceful and unpardonable. The revising officer in the district of the Minister of Justice is the gentleman who collocates these Orders in Council and publishes them. He is in the employ of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not in the employ of the Government at present. It was necessary that the work should be done, and if the gentleman who did the work was capable, what did it matter whether he was revising officer for the county or not?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am surprised that the hon, gentleman does not see that a wrong was com-The revising officer is supposed to be mitted. independent of the Government and of the Opposition; but this officer, who filled the position, was in the employ and under the dictation of the hon. Minister of Justice. It is an outrage on the face of it. Moreover, the gentleman was paid three or four prices.

Publication of proceedings of Royal Society...... $5,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Here is another amount of $5,000, from which we do not receive any benefit.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the only contribution we give to general science.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not object to a contribution to science, but I doubt whether the work is worth the money we spend on it. Occasionally there is a very nice article in the collection, but, on looking through the volume published last year, it seemed to me that many of the articles were essays which were hardly worth embalming in the historical records of the country.

Dictionnaire Généalogique de l'Abbé Tanguay.....

Mr. CAMPBELL. What amount has been spent on this work?

Mr. FOSTER. This is the sixth volume at $1,000 each. I am solemnly assured that the end of it has come.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am surprised that the Equal Righters should not and do not raise the question involved here as the families of one Province only are described. In looking through the Parliamentary Companion I find that almost every member of the Senate is descended from an ancient king. I object to money being spent on genealogical trees, going back to the time of Jacques Car-It is an outrage and it is indefensible.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If supporters of Equal Rights objected, the cry would be raised that they were prejudiced. I agree that it is a most preposterous expenditure.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have had under consideration what changes may be made to reduce the expenditure, and I have come to the conclusion that there is a certain amount of duplicating of mistaken in that. Some of the forest rangers in Mr. Davies (P.E.I.)

work, and that during the recess I will see what changes can be made. It was understood by some persons that I had indicated in the early part of the Session that I proposed moving the Land Commission Office from Winnipeg. That was not the case; but I think there can be some material reduction made, and shortly after the Session I propose to go to Winnipeg for a few days in order to go to the Commissioner's office and see where reductions can be effected.

Mr. WATSON. The remarks of the hon. Minister in the early part of the Session in regard to moving the Land Board from Winnipeg caused considerable alarm in Manitoba and the North-West. While it may be admitted that it is rather extravagant, still the people of Manitoba do not want the Land Board removed from Winnipeg, because it is much more convenient for the people to do business at Winnipeg than at Ottawa. Although there is extra expenses, still the people favor the retention of the Land Board at Winnipeg. I believe there should be something more done in Winnipeg in connection with the lands in Manitoba and the North-West, than there is today, and less done in Ottawa.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Minister would see his way to reduce this vote by transferring the whole Ottawa establishment to I am not at all certain but that my hon. friend is perfectly correct, that a very small force at Ottawa could do the work. I have very great doubts as to the policy of governing that country from this point.

Mr. WATSON. I hope the hon. Minister will consider well the suggestion of my hon. friend Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. DEWDNEY. A certain amount of the work has to be done here and a certain amount in Winnipeg. If the whole of the Department could be moved to Winnipeg, myself included, I would not at all object.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the sooner we remove the Land Board from Winnipeg the better it will be, for we have any number of clerks there who are practically doing nothing. I might ask the Minister who is the inspector of colonisation companies now? Is Mr. Stephenson still in the employment of the Government, and drawing a salary for doing nothing?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Rufus Stephenson has not been in the employ of the Government for over a There are only one or two companies in existence and we have no inspector.

Mr. WATSON. With regard to this item for the salary of forest rangers, I would suggest to the Minister that it would be much better to pay those officers a fixed salary, than to pay them the present salary and allow them to participate in a share of the fines imposed. In some cases these agents are over-zealous in attempting to increase their salaries by seizing timber which, under ordinary circumstances, they would not seize at all.

There are some few who are Mr DEWDNEY. temporarily employed in some localities who receive fees, but I do not think the permanent officers receive fees and salaries

I think the hon. gentleman is Mr. WATSON.

Manitoba receive $700 a year salary, and they increase that to $1,000 by participating in fines.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is the first time the matter is brought to my notice, and will give it my attention.

Mr. WATSON. Does the hon. Minister consider it unnecessary to have a forestry commissioner any longer?

DEWDNEY. In the Supplementary Estimates of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, there will be a vote for the purpose of establishing some Forestry Experimental Farms for the planting of trees. The Experimental Farm Act provides for eight of these farms to be established throughout the Territories, and I believe it is the intention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to establish four this year. It is intended to give more attention to forestry matters, and this is the commencement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is an interesting matter, and the House might profitably spend some time in discussing it, but we cannot do so just now. I have myself time and again in the House advocated the formation of Crown forests, and although it would not pay us, I believe that in twenty or thirty years they would be a great profit to the people of this country. Speaking for myself alone, and in no way pledging any one else, if the hon. gentleman has any project of that kind to propose, I will be prepared to give it every possible consideration. I believe that we have in our hands the means of creating a very profitable source of revenue.

Mr. WATSON. It is very important that attention should be paid to forestry in Manitoba and the North-West, and it is to be regretted that a large quantity of the timber land of that country was burned over last fall in consequence of the carelessness either of some Indians or persons going into the country. The whole country between Strathclair and Lake Dauphin, and I believe almost up to the big Saskatchewan, was burnt over. That is to be regretted, and the officers of the Department should notify all people that they will be severely punished if they make fires in the forests.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. Minister gives us any information as to the time when he will take up the Banking Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to take it up on Tuesday, provided we do not on that day go into concurrence on the tariff resolutions; and if the Banking Bill is not taken up on Tuesday, it will be on the day after.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.40 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 21st April, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock. Prayers.

LABOR LEGISLATION.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) (for Mr. LÉPINE) asked, introduce, during the present Session, the measures respecting labor promised in the Speech from the Throne?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The promise of the Government will be fulfilled.

JAMES GREER.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Whether James Greer has been appointed a fishery overseer in the Province of Ontario? If so, what was the date of his appointment, and what amount of salary does he receive?

Mr. HAGGART. The late James Greer was appointed fishery overseer on April 1, 1879, for a certain district in the County of Leeds, Province of Ontario, at a salary of $40 per year.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. PLATT asked, 1. Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the effect of the changes proposed to be made in the Royal Military College, Kingston, as per report of Major General Cameron? And is it the case, that the proposed changes, if carried out, will have the effect of reducing the number of responsible professorships, which must be held by military men, from five to two? 2. Is not part of the scheme to make one officer (himself fully employed in instructional work) responsible for the instruction in the following large range of subjects, viz.: Military history, strategy, tactics, fortifications, descriptive geometry, geometrical drawing, military topography, civil engineering, practical astronomy, and reconnaissance, which have heretofore been divided between three responsible heads? 3. Is not one of the proposals of the scheme to double (from $1,000 to $2,000) the salaries of the professors of French and English, whose work need, and does not require anything like their full time (one of them being actually in charge of a parish)? 4. Having regard to the facts, do the Government now intend to carry out the whole or any part of the extraordinary changes proposed by the Commandant in his last report? And if so, what part?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state that a report has been submitted, suggesting certain changes in the Royal Military College. The report was submitted only quite lately, and during the recess it will receive the consideration of the Government.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. DENISON asked, Whether the Government intend appointing a Board of Visitors to the Royal Military College? And if so, when?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is a Board of Visitors which has been in existence almost since the College was started.

REBATE ON SAW LOGS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether Richard Power, formerly of Victoria Harbor, received a rebate on saw logs cut on Parry Island, in the Georgian Bay, during the years 1885, 1886 and 1887? If so, what amount each year?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In February, 1886, Richard Whether it is the intention of the Government to Power received a rebate of $1,078.64 on account of lumber dues overpaid by him on saw logs in the seasons of 1884 and 1885, on the Parry Sound limit. He received no other rebate.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to call the attention of the hon. First Minister to the fact that the railway statistics for 1889 has not yet been issued. It is a valuable compilation, and it is most desirable to have it distributed. I understand the delay is occasioned by one or two companies failing to make the return required by law. I think some measure should be taken by the Government to hasten the returns in order that the publication may be issued.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There must be some mode of compelling the railway companies to send in their statements. The neglect to issue the report is due to the failure on the part of some companies to send in their statements, and perhaps I may call attention subsequently to the best means of enforcing the statutory order.

SUBSIDIES TO THE CANADA ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BERGERON moved for:

Statement of the amount of subsidies voted to the Canada Atlantic Railway Company for the construction of their bridge over the St. Lawrence River, between Coteau and Valleyfield, the amount paid by the Government up to date, and the amount unearned or still to be paid

He said: I desire to explain why this motion has been put upon the Order paper, and my object in asking for a statement of the amount of subsidies voted by Parliament for the construction of a bridge by the Canada Atlantic Railway at Coteau. I see that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) has a question on the paper to-day, asking what steps were taken in the construction of another railway, with the view of arriving at the same object which I wish to attain, that is, to secure the payment of the laborers and others who had claims against the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway, out of the subsides voted by Parliament. In the construction of the bridge at Coteau it appears that the laborers, poor men from Valleyfield, worked a part of last summer and have not yet been paid. Whether the money is due by the Whether the money is due by the sub-contractor, or the contractor, or by the company themselves, no one can find out. The Parliament of Canada voted, last winter, $180,000 as a subsidy to help the company in constructing that bridge. I need not say to the House that the men do not understand whether they should go to law, which they have not got the means to do, or whether they should attack the company, or the sub-contractor, or the contractor him-self; in fact, no one knows what to do. They have taken legal proceedings against one of the sub-contractors, but they have not succeeded. They have had a good deal of trouble, and have been subscribing among themselves to take legal proceedings against the company, but the subcontractor being the only person who formed the line of law between the company and the laborers, refused to go and give his testimony, and consequently the laborers lost. My object in making this motion is to put before the House this very queer state of things. The people naturally say Mr. DEWDNEY.

that, if this money is taken out of the public chest, a guarantee should be given to the laborers who do the work that they should be paid. I may say, en passant, that I am not opposed to subsidies being granted; on the contrary, I think it is a good policy on the part of the Government, but there is something lacking in the law in this respect, which might be remedied by an amend. ment of the Railway Act, or some kind of legislation by which it can be secured that the poor laborers working on these public works shall receive pay for the hard work they perform. It may be said that the company will say they have paid the full amount to the contractor; and the contractor may say that he has paid the full amount to the sub-contractor; but there is one thing sure, that the laborers have not been paid. Many hon, gentlemen have working people in their counties. They know that their working people are often very poor. Mine were nearly starving all winter, because they cannot secure just payment for their labor, although public money has been paid to the contractor of that bridge. I repeat once more, that the statement of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville) that, on some other occasion, the Government, acting in a paternal way I may say, appointed Mr. McGee, of the Privy Council, if I understand it aright, to be a kind of arbitrator between the Pontiac Pacific Railway Company and the laborers, which ought to form a precedent in this case. If anything of that kind could be done in this instance, I would be very glad indeed if the Government should come to such a conclusion. These poor laborers have bons in their possession which may not be very good for money, but, at all events, they prove that the work was performed by them, and I do not see why they should not succeed. If you have a stipulation that there will be supervision on the moneys which are paid by Parliament, to secure that justice is done to the working people, and if everything possible to relieve these poor people from the unfortunate position in which they are to-day can be done, it will be a step in the right direction. I, therefore, beg to move this resolu-tion, seconded by Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to the motion being carried. The subject which the hon, gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) speaks of is one of very considerable difficulty, and the question arises very frequently when either the contractor or sub-contractors fail to pay the workingmen. The Department tries in every possible way to induce the companies to see that the men are paid, sometimes with success and sometimes The contract, as the hon. gentleunsuccessfully. man knows, is a contract between the Government and railway company. The company agrees to build the railway, and upon that agreement the Government covenant to pay them a certain subsidy. If they perform the work and build the railway they have a right to the money; and the Government cannot intervene between the company and the contractor if they have done the work and if they ask payment of the money, which is pledged to them on the performance of that work. ever, we find generally that the companies do all they can to compel their contractors to pay the men, but there are contractors and sub-contractors and sub-sub-contractors, and it is quite impossible to follow these various private arrangements which are made during the construction of a railway. The Government cannot pay the subsidy to the company and, at the same time, pay the laborers who have not been paid by their employers. We have met with very considerable success, however, in obtaining payment in whole or in part for the laborers where the contractors or sub-contractors have failed to pay them.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no doubt of what the right hon. gentleman says, that this subject is one of great difficulty. But it seems to me that it would be possible to obviate these difficulties if it were known beforehand that the Government would not pay any subsidy unless all the liabilities on the roadwere discharged. This would ensure that the company would see that the contractors and sub-contractors paid their men. Of course, at present, the moment a section of a road has been built the Government is bound to pay the subsidy according to their promise, and according to the grant made. At the same time, if the Government gave due notice in advance to the company, that it would be part of their duty to see that all the liabilities of that road were properly discharged by all parties concerned, the company would see that it was to their advantage that the sub-contractors paid the men. If it were known, therefore, that the money would not be forthcoming, unless the liabilities were discharged, it seems to me that a good many of the difficulties now brought forward—in this instance by my friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron)-would be obviated. These cases of contractors not paying their laborers are becoming altogether too numerous. At present there are four or five such examples; but, I must say, in all fairness to the companies, that they have paid their contractors, while at the same time the sub-contractors have failed to pay their men. When it is known that the company has only discharged a part of its contract by simply paying their contractors, that they must take care that the money is properly applied, and that they will not receive the Government subsidy unless they exercise surveillance over the contractors and sub-contractors, a good deal of this difficulty would be obviated. I understand, that when my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was Prime Minister and Minister of Public Works, he took precautions to see that the laborers were properly paid by the contractors on the Lachine Canal. This, perhaps, would be a precedent for the Government to follow.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). that the hon member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has brought this matter before the House. In the county which I have the honor to represent, as far back as some fifteen or sixteen years ago, we had a number of men unpaid for labor performed in connection with work on the St. Peter's Canal. That work was done at the time and under contract with the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when Premier and Minister of Public Since then these laborers have been asking for their wages from the Government, or requesting that the Government should take some steps to have them paid, but without any success. Within the last two years contracts were let to several contractors for the building of a rail-way through the Island of Cape Breton, and, it so happened that although the contractors were paid by the Government for the work performed, they and a number of sub-contractors abandoned the work, leaving a number of men unpaid, who have not yet received their money. There is a clause, I believe, on the general form of agreement between the contractors and the Government, which to my mind is very objectionable. The clause to which I refer is that which gives a lien to the Government on the plant and property belonging to the contractor who may do the work. I do not think there is any necessity on the part of the Government for inserting such a clause as that, which interferes so much with the privilege of laborers in getting at the contractors under the law of the country. The amount of money deposited as security by contractors should be sufficient security to the Government for the performance of the work, and persons performing work could get at contrac-tors under the law of the country for their pay themselves, as in dealing with any other person That is with respect to any other kind of work. one clause which the Government should have removed from the general form of agreement they have with contractors undertaking work, and that would protect a great many workingmen whose claims remain unpaid, and it would enable them to get at the contractors and get their pay, the same as they would in law for any other work they performed. Under these circumstances, I hope the Government will see that those men will get their pay, and in future, arrangements will be made by which the people will be better protected than they have been in the past.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA AND TREATIES OF COMMERCE.

General LAURIE moved for:

Copies of any and all communications that may have passed between the Imperial and Dominion Governments with reference to the abrogation of such articles in the various Treaties of Commerce between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of foreign nations as preclude preferential fiscal treatment of goods of British and Colonial production by the Government of the Dominion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on the 24th of April, 1883, a return was brought down to the House of Commons, in reply to an Address, for "Copies of all despatches, telegrams and correspondence between the Government of the United Kingdom and Canada, and between the Government of Canada and the High Commissioner touching negotiations for commercial arrangements with France. Spain, or other countries, and all reports of the High Commissioner on the subject."

This report came down only to the year 1883. At that time there were still unsettled several questions connected with commercial treaties of great moment to the Dominion, and since that date nothing official has been placed before Parliament and the country showing in what position we stand with regard to this matter; and with the view of having our position defined, I have placed this motion on the Notice paper. I shall briefly outline the history of our diplomatic positions. I find that there do not appear in this return, one or two papers antecedent to the question that then arose, but of vital importance to us, as showing the position in which we stand in relation to the mother country. Up to the year 1878 it was the practice of the mother country to negotiate such treaties and to make such arrangements for her colonies as she considered advisable, without apparently in any way consulting them, except on special occasions. But, in 1878, Lord Carnarvon, who, though a Tory Tories in England and opposed $_{

m the}$ changes there which he did not consider necessary, was certainly most progressive in regard to colonial matters, communicated to the Governor General a draft article which he proposed to apply to all treaties with foreign nations. The wording of that article was as follows :-

"The stipulations of the present treaty shall be applicable to the colonies and foreign possessions of the two high contracting parties named in this article.

"The stipulations of the present treaty shall be also applicable to any colony or foreign possession of either of the two high contracting parties, of a supplementary contraction is that office.

the two high contracting parties, of a supplementary convention to that effect, "In the latter case, the stipulations of the present treaty shall, subject to such modifications as may be agreed upon by the high contracting parties, from and after a date to be agreed upon, not later than six months from the date of the ratification of such supplementary convention, become as fully applicable to such colony or foreign possession as if it had been mentioned by name in the present article."

Practically that is a charter to us, authorising us to have a voice in the negotiation of all treaties made with foreign powers, in which our interests are concerned. But, within three months after that date, it appears that the Colonial Office had forgotten that such a dispatch had been sent; for in June of the same year, the Colonial Office forwarded a communication to the Governor General. stating that they were negotiating a treaty with Roumania, and asking whether the conditions of There is no the treaty would be acceptable to us. necessity of my wearying the House by reading these communications. Two years afterwards, the Liberals having in the meantime succeeded to power in England, Lord Kimberley, the Colonial Secretary, wrote to the Governor General to say, that the British Government proposed to negotiate a treaty with Roumania, the same country as was formerly mentioned, and they asked the Government of Canada to state, whether they wished to take part in that treaty or to be excluded from it. He went on to say, that if the Government of Canada desired, the British Government would obtain exemption for Canada from the provisions of that treaty. In 1881, Sir Alexander Galt, who seems to have exercised a very close supervision over what was going on in England, called the attention, first, of Lord Kimberley, and then of the Government of Canada, which he represented as High Commissioner, to the fact that the Government of Canada were bound under certain treaties negotiated by the British Government prior to 1878, which precluded us from making any arrangements with sister colonies or with the mother country that we might desire, because any arrangements we might so make with them would inure to the benefit of the two countries therein named, namely, Belgium and the Zollverein of Germany. Alexander Galt called the attention of Lord Kimberley to the request of the Government of Canada to be relieved, as soon as convenient, from the obligations imposed by such treaties, limiting the freedom of action of the Dominion Parliament, and stipulating that neither Great Britain nor any of her possessions should admit their respective productions at lower rates of duty than those imposed upon the goods of the countries named in the Gen. LAURIE.

treaties, and requested that such action be taken as might be deemed necessary to meet the wishes of the Canadian Government. The Government instructed Sir Alexander Galt to place their views on this point before the Secretary of State for the colonies, and to urge that such a step should be taken as would relieve us from the obligation of those treaties. Sir Alexander Galt accordingly placed this view before the Colonial Secretary, who placed it before the Foreign Secretary, through whom all foreign correspondence is conducted. I find (see page 10 of the Sessional Papers) that application was accordingly made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to Belgium and the German Zollverein, asking that we should be relieved, as soon as convenient, from the obligations connected with any treaties of commerce now in existence with foreign countries, so far as such treaties limit the freedom of action of the Sir Richard Herbert, Dominion Parliament. Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, wrote as follows to this Government, giving the result of such proceedings:

"SIR.—With reference to my letter of the 7th January last, I am directed by the Earl of Kimberley to acquaint you that His Lordship is informed by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, in accordance with their instructions, placed themselves informally in communication with the Belgian and German Governments as to the exemption of the Dominion of Canada from the stipulations of Article 15 of the Apple.

German Governments as to the exemption of the Dominion of Canada from the stipulations of Article 15 of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty of 1862, and of Article 7 of the Commercial Treaty of 1865 with Germany.

"Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels has now reported, that in the opinion of the Belgian Government the exemption desired by the Dominion of Canada would necessitate the denunciation of the Treaty of 1862, and the negotiation of a fresh treaty to replace it, and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin has learned that in the opinion of the competent German authorities, it would not be either convenient or desirable to abrogate single articles of the Treaty of 1865 apart from a general revision of the whole instrument, for which, however, there did not appear to be any immediate necessity."

And so the matter was allowed to stand by the British Foreign Office. Sir Alexander Galt again brought the subject to the attention of the Dominion Government, and a further application was made by the Dominion Government, urging our position on the home authorities and pointing out the necessity of relief being given. Nothing further, however, appears to have been done by the Imperial Government, according to these returns, which only come down to 1882. In the meantime unofficial communications passed between the Jamaica Government and the Canadian Government, and the Governor of Jamaica submitted to the home authorities the question, in view of those unofficial communications, whether it was within the powers of the Governments of Jamaica and Canada to make special commercial arrangements with each other and the British West Indies generally, in the direction of reciprocal concessions in reduction Lord Kimberley replied as of import duties. follows:-

"I need scarcely say that Sir A. Musgrave is entirely right in his assumption that Her Majesty's Government could not sanction any arrangement which would involve the creation of differential duties in favor of Canada."

This reply, which was sent to the Marquis of Lorne, the Governor General of the Dominion, was by him submitted to the Privy Council here, who fully considered the matter, and sent a report thereon to the Earl of Kimberley. In this report, I find it stated:

"The Minister of Finance, to whom the confidential dispatch was referred, observes that although the Canadian Government are not at present prepared to propose any plan for a commercial convention with Jamaica or the West Indies generally, they feel it necessary to record their dissent from the principle laid down, that as between portions of the said Empire, no duties discriminating in favor of British as against foreign industry can be sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government." The report then refers to the proposal made by Canada, prior to Confederation, for free interchange of products with the Maritime Provinces, while maintaining duties on the same article against the rest of the world, which proposal was agreed to, and proceeds to state:

"That in accordance with this precedent the Canadian Government claim that it is competent for any of the colonies possessing representative and responsible Government to enter into mutual agreement for either partial or absolute free trade with the mother country or with each other, or with both, discriminating against other countries."

The report adds:

"Trade should be rendered as free as practicable be-tween the various portions of the Empire, having regard solely to their own interests, and unfettered by any obli-gation to treat others with equal favor."

One would suppose that, as the result of this discussion, some further action would have been taken, but we find that a report was brought down to the British House of Commons, on a motion of Colonel Howard Vincent, dated 27th of April, 1888, asking for:

"Return of the treaties of commerce in force between the United Kingdom and foreign powers which preclude preferential fiscal treatment of British goods in the colonies and dependencies of the British Crown, showing when such treaties were concluded, what notice is necessary for their termination, and whether the clauses placing the export trade of Great Britain and Ireland within the Empire upon the same conditions as the export trade to British colonies of foreign countries which deny trade to British colonies of foreign countries which deny a like advantage to the production of British industry, can be abrogated without prejudice to the rest of the treaties in question, and what advantage such treaties secure to British trade."

The answer to that is this return I hold in my hand. Sir Edward Hertslet stated, in preparing the return, that there are two treaties between Great Britain and foreign powers, which expressly preclude preferential fiscal treatment of British goods in the colonies and dependencies of the British Crown. These treaties are: Treaty with Belgium, 23rd July, 1862. Treaty with the Zollve-rein 30th May, 1865. The treaty with Belgium contains this stipulation:

"The produce or manufacture of Belgium, shall not be subject in the British Colonies to other or higher duties than those which are or may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin."

The treaty with the Zollverein has this article;

"In those colonies and possessions—that is, the colonies and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty—the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Unfortunately, by the application of those two treaties we come under the obligation of the mostfavored-nation clause. I find, on examining a return to the British House of Commons made in August, 1888, that there are no less than thirty-four treaties entered into by the mother country with foreign nations in which the mostfavored-nation clause is embodied. Therefore, so long as these treaties stand in force, we are bound to give the most-favored-nation terms to thirty-four other nations. While these treaties are in force, we are thus prevented from making any arrangements with our sister colonies, from which those other nations would be excluded, and are prevented from taking any action whatever which would give differential advantages to any other nation or community. But I shall return to this presently. In the meantime, we are all aware that large concessions have been made to the colonies, especially Canada. In 1878, Sir Alexander Galt, then our High Commissioner, was authorised to conduct negotiations with Spain in the interest of Canada. In 1883, Sir Charles Tupper was appointed co-plenipotentiary with Sir Richard Morier, also to conduct negotiations with Spain, and the negotiations were to be conducted by Sir Charles Tupper but signed by both. In 1888, Sir Charles Tupper was appointed co-plenipotentiary with Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Lionel Sackville-West in the negotiations with the United States; in 1888, Sir Charles Tupper was appointed co-plenipotentiary with Sir Clare Ford to conduct negotiations with Spain, the negotiations to be conducted by Sir Charles Tupper, but to be signed by both plenipotentiaries, thus binding the power of England to support those treaties. The same question has been raised in Australia. As long ago as 1871, a desire was shown by Australia to enter into closer trade relations with some of the French colonies on the Pacific, and the matter was submitted to the home authorities. Lord Kimberley pointed out that it was utterly impracticable to give differential trade relations to a foreign power and to discriminate against the mother country or against the British colonies. From a portion of his dispatch, I read:

"The imposition of differential duty on British goods compared with foreign will, it can hardly be doubted, have a tendency to weaken connection."

That summarises the position we occupy in regard to making fiscal arrangements with communities outside of our own. I am aware that this question has been brought up in this House by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in 1882, and by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1889. There was this difference between the motions made by two hon, gentlemen and the position which I advocate. In the case of the hon. member for West Durham, it was urged that permission should be obtained from the Imperial Government to negotiate with other British possessions or with foreign states, but the proposition of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was simply to deal with foreign states. The hon, member for West Durham has stated that he is inclined to the view that it is desirable to increase our export trade. He said:

"There are many classes of manufactured commodi ties capable of being produced in this country, which require for their economical production a large market. There is nothing clearer as to numerous classes of commodities, that within certain limits which far transcend modities, that within certain limits which far transcend our population. the larger the market the cheaper the goods can be produced, and long ago, in some particular cases, we had supplied to the full the home market, created to some extent a foreign trade, and were dependent for the further extension and growth of our manufacturing interest upon the facilities that one might obtain by cheap productions and reasonable arrangements with foreign nations, in sending forward our goods into their countries. That development of manufacturing to which I have referred is one not interesting to the manufacturer alone, but of interest and importance to the whole community, to the consumer as well as the producer, because it is based upon the theory that economy of production will ensue from the largeness of the production, and from that economised production, the consumer tion, and from that economised production, the consumer will obtain a portion of the benefit." The rest bears on the same subject, and is as well expressed as the hon. member always expresses what he has to say. Then I find that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has not hesitated in the same way to declare that he does not limit his desires—though possibly some people might have inferred so—to closer commercial relations with the country to the south of us, for last October, in declaring his political programme, he said in a public address:

"I would be in tavor of a more close commercial alliance of Canada with Great Britain. I would favor it with all my soul."

I am sure he would. I desire simply to declare that I think we should put ourselves in closer commercial union with those countries with whom we are more allied. While the hon, gentleman and his friends desire that we should have closer relations with the country to the south of us, we have the assurance of the Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, that he will not listen to that except on terms which would not be acceptable to us; that is, that with a change of financial policy, we must also change our allegiance. So I think we need not enter into the question of our trade relations with the United States any further. will be glad to discuss that question with my hon. friends on some other occasion, but, as I read the present political state of affairs, we cannot do much more in the way of expanding our trade with them. But I say that there are countries scattered over the world with which we can expand our trade. These countries, which extend the world over under the British flag, may be induced to trade with us without our being asked to change our allegiance, or without our asking other countries to change theirs. We find three great groups of colonies under the British flag, which are desirous of extending their commercial relations, and are willing to complement our trade resources by furnishing what we want from them and taking from us what they want. I should be very much inclined to group with Canada, in the first place, the West Indies, and I hope that, sooner or later, we shall have better relations with them. Although I have heard hon, gentlemen speak of the West Indies as offering us no prospects from increased trade, I find that up to 1845, the West Indies took one-fifth of all the export of British goods to British possessions. With that fact before us, it must be evident that they have vast consuming powers and possibilities for great prosperity, although, according to the present fin-ancial policy of the mother country, they have been sadly prostrated. But, though they do not take the same position as they formerly did, their custom is not a small one. In 1888, the imports of three of the West Indies, Jamaica, Barbadoes and Trinidad, amounted to £4,734,386. In 1874, the imports of those three colonies amounted to £4,137,058, showing an increase in 1888 of £597,328. The revenue of the West Indies is over two million pounds sterling. It is true that the revenue decreased, owing to various causes, but improved education has brought increased energy and aptitude for business, and as one of the best proofs of this I find that concurrently with decrease of revenue there has been an increase in the post office revenue from £62,370 in 1882 to £76,922 in 1886, a sure sign of growing prosperity. In 1884, the export from Great Britain, Gen. LAURIE.

of all classes of goods, to the West Indies, amounted to £3,394,736. In order to show that others than European nations set a great value on the trade with the West Indies, I will read from Isham's book on the Fishery Question, of which it gives a historical summary. Speaking of the state of affairs in 1873 he says:

affairs in 1875 he says:

"In July of the same year that the treaty was signed, an Order in Council prohibited the importation of American fish to the markets of the English West Indies. Congress wished to meet the emergency, and asked of the States permission to retaliate. This was not given. In the constitutional convention Pickering said, that the New England States had lost everything by the war. In the first Congress, Fisher Ames declared that West India molasses had been counted upon in exchange for the fish that could not be disposed of elsewhere. He concluded that, if the West Indian demand for fish were injured, we cannot maintain the fisheries.' Extraordinary measures were presently adopted to sustain the failing industry."

And that these were necessary is proved by the fact that, although in 1764 the exports of fish from the United States amounted to £155,000 sterling, in 1814, after the loss of the United States trade with the West Indies, and in spite of the great development of the country, trade retrograded until it had fallen to $128,000, showing that the West India trade is one that can be developed very largely, and become an important trade to us, if proper steps are taken. But we are told: "Oh, New York has such an immense advantage; the ports of the United States are so much nearer to the West Indies that they can furnish all the goods required in the West Indies, and distance is against us." Now, in regard to distance, I take St. Thomas as a central point, and I find that New York is 1,430 miles distant, while Halifax is 1,564 miles distant, a difference of only 130 miles. Really the difference is not so great that an enterprising merchant cannot get over it. New Orleans is somewhat nearer; but New Orleans can hardly be considered as a depot for the export of manufactured goods. I will not weary the House by reading the West Indies trade statistics, but I may say that there is very little supplied to the West Indies that we are not able to supply from Canada. I associate the West Indies, to a certain extent, with the North American group of colonies. Passing to the group of colonies in the southern hemisphere, I will consider the trade returns of Australia, and I find that Australia imported goods, that we are perfectly able to supply, to the amount of £28,000,000 sterling. That seems to me far too large a trade for us to sacrifice.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why do we not supply it now?

General LAURIE. Because other nations have already taken possession of that trade, and we would require certain facilities to win it from them. Why do we not send trade there now?—because we have not developed it; trade has gone there from other countries. We have within the last few years only begun to develop our manufactures. To show how trade is rapidly growing, I will read to the House—

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is the National Policy that makes goods high.

General LAURIE. Very well, I will read an extract from a manufacturer in Canada, under the National Policy which has made goods high, which letter shows that during the existence of the National Policy this trade has been developed. I have a letter from Mr. Massey, of Toronto, in which he says:

says:

"The writer had the privilege of an extensive trip through Australia and of opening our branch there, which is now doing a flourishing business throughout the Australian colonies. To be brief, we believe that the steps to be taken to further Canadian trade with Australia are these: First. A treaty in reciprocity in general trade. It is argued against this that the productions of the two countries are so similar that this could not be done to advantage, but anyone who would care to look fully into the matter, will, nevertheless, discover that there are productions of several characters which could be mutually exchanged to great advantage to both countries. Australian wool, for instance, is everywhere known to be the finest produced, and it is well known that the finest goods can only be made from Australian wool. These goods are largely manufactured in England, the United States having abandoned their manufacture from to be the finest produced, and it is well known that the finest goods can only be made from Australian wool. These goods are largely manufactured in England, the United States having abandoned their manufacture from the fact that the Government of that country has imposed so heavy a duty on the raw material coming from Australia that manufacturers of well-known goods have confined themselves to the cheaper lines of woollens; and it has occurred to the writer that this is an industry, which, if taken up in Canada, could be well developed and made a profitable trade. There are other commodities, which I have not the time to mention, that could be imported from Australia with great advantage to ourselves. Of course, in return we could send them manufactured goods of all kinds which they now get largely from the United States or Great Britain. As an instance of what Canadians can do in Australia, we would refer you to our own trade in the Colony of Victoria harvest field with something like a dozen machines, which were easily disposed of, and which was the foundation of our trade there. The year following we sold in that same colony over 200 machines, and in the harvest that has just passed we sold 572 self-binding harvesters—a growth of trade which is almost unprecedented; and this in the face of the keenest competition on the part of American and British manufacturers long established in Australian rade. A steamship line is certainly a necessity, and it would seem from our limited experience that it could be conducted with profit. We regret exceedingly that so little has been done by our Government in this direction heretofore, and we hope that the eyes of our officials will soon be opened to the necessity of giving our manufacturers greater facilities for disposing of their goods in foreign markets. While it is a small matter, at the same time it goes to show how dilatory our Government is. The postage between the two countries is at an absurd price, and considerably in excess of the United States postage with A

Then again he goes on to say:

"We only yesterday received the Australian mail, which gives most flattering reports of our success there during the past season, and also of the good work our machines have done in New Zealand, where we sold in the neighborhood of seventy-five self-binders during the season just passed. We also have a small mower trade in New Zealand. You ask us in which of the colonies we have done the most work. Next to this comes New Zealand. Third upon the list is New South Wales, and fourth Tasmania, in which latter we have no mean trade. We have also proceeded to open up trade in the other colonies. Our traveller who has just finished up the business in Tasmania. and who was proceeding to Melbourne with the settlement of the year's business, said that he had with him cash and notes to the value of over £4,000 sterling as the result of our first season's business in Tasmania."

Then again he writes:

There are two points which I did not mention specially in my letter, that would materially facilitate the practical side of business relations between Canada and Australia. In the first place, a more efficient and cheaper mail service. As it is now, we only hear from there once a month. There should be a mail every two there once a month. There should be a mail every the proposed Canadian line from Vancouver to Sydney could be started up. Then again, the rates are absurdly high. The postage on our monthly Australian mails, ranges from $4 to $5 each way and sometimes more. Of course, this is a small matter, but it is one of the many details which should be looked into, in connection with this enterprise. In the second place, we should have better cable facilities, more especially as regards price. Our cable messages frequently range from $25 to $30 each, and we have had them cost as high as $70, and this, too, notwithstanding the use of a good code. Both of these points, however, would doubtless soon right themselves, if sufficient interest in the matter could be awakened."

I have answered my hon. friend's question, why we do not do business with them now. It is because facilities were not offered, and Mr. Massey is showing what facilities are required in order to improve the business. I hold in my hand some statistics from the Trade Returns, showing the amount of imports into the Australian colonies in 1888, and I find that of articles that we ourselves can send to Australia, no less than £28,000,000. oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, I think, in a speech he made at Toronto last year, that:

"We are wasting our time in trying to encourage trade with insignificant communities, comparatively speaking, ten thousand miles away from you on the other side of the globe.

England has not found it very difficult to trade with communities ten thousand miles away from her. Let us compare the distances from London Halifax to Melbourne and Sydney, and I and find that we stand at an advantage as compared with London. From London to Melbourne via the Suez Canal, with all the heavy duties charged on vessels, the distance is 11,250 miles; from Halifax to Melbourne, vid the Cape of Good Hope, is only 12,000 miles, so we are really nearer to Melbourne via the Cape of Good Hope than England is vid the Cape; whilst, of course, in going through the Suez Canal, very heavy dues are imposed, which must act as a check on trade, and more than compensates for increased distance. Again, from London to Sydney the distance is 10,840 miles; from Vancouver to Sydney the distance is 7,434 miles; from London to Auckland, New Zealand, the distance is 11,840 miles, whilst from Vancouver to Auckland the distance is only 6,934 These communities may have been at one time insignificant, but they are fast passing from the stage of insignificance. I find the following in a Halifax paper published last week :-

"Is there any country in the wide world that has made such progress as New Zealand, in the past thirty years? Look at these figures: Since 1858 the population has increased from 32.554 to 607.380; the public revenue from £146.855 to £3.859.000; the savings bank deposits from £7.862 to £7.407.776; the exports from £458.023 to £7.867.325; the wool exports from £254.025 to £3,115,008; imports from £1,141,273 to £5,941,900."

And this is but one of the insignificant communities that form the magnificent group of Australasia. These may be insignificant communities, but their trade is well worth looking after, especially as I have shown it amounts to £28,000,000 a year. When we come to examine the relative values of the trade of these so-called insignificant communities on the other side of the world with the trade of other countries, we will find their trade is not so insignificant as has been asserted. I do not desire to read all the statistics from the bluebooks, but I seek rather to give a general view of the importance of the trade. I will now refer to another community, which is being developed even more rapidly than the Australasian community, that is South Africa. Hon. members are well aware that a large quantity of wool is imported into Canada. I find that the imports of wool reached 10,500,000 pounds yearly, and of that we imported direct from Australia and the Cape only 2,500,000 pounds, the remainder coming through other channels, largely from Great Britain or vid New York. Surely it is desirable that we should obtain that wool direct. It could not fail to prove advantageous, as we must obtain our wool cheaper, which would enable us to manufacture cheaper and to export cheaper; and if we imported directly, it would create an export trade, which would enable us to place our manufactures on the Cape market. Hides form another article of which we imported largely, to the value of $1,500,000 yearly. We imported all these hides, except to the value of $66,000, from the United States, and yet scarcely one of them is the product of the United States. Most of them are dried hides imported from southern countries and brought to Boston or New York and thence shipped to this country. That should not be the course of trade. No wonder our Trade Returns show a large trade with the United States, compared with that of other countries, when we purchase and sell our goods in the markets of the United States instead of purchasing the goods in the countries of production and selling them in our own markets. I can speak from personal knowledge with respect to the Cape, because I have visited there, because I have seen their warehouses and have examined the goods they import; and with respect to the class of goods they import, I am able to say that our Canadian products should be in great demand there and that the goods manufactured on this continent suit them better than English goods, and accordingly the export trade of England to the Cape has diminished while the export trade of the United States to the Cape has increased. Of course, the Cape has been looked upon in the past as a benighted community, because they had no ports at which their products could be shipped, except at very great loss to the producer or the shipper. As much as $10 a ton was paid at the time I was there for lightering goods, such as wool and hides, from Port Elizabeth and Algoa Bay, at East London, to vessels lying outside to be carried to the markets of the world. This House will realise that raw material cannot bear such an enormous charge for carriage from the shore to vessels two miles away, besides insurance, for the lighters may capsize and the cargoes may be lost. That is one difficulty which retarded the progress of Cape Colony. latterly docks have been built, greater facilities have been afforded for getting goods from the interior to ports at which vessels call, and larger vessels are now able to wharf at Cape Town and Durban, and the trade of South Africa has consequently enormously increased. I repeat that we are importing yearly 10,500,000 pounds of wool, raised either at the Cape or Australia, and that quantity can be almost indefinitely increased, because they furnish much larger exports, and we could make up much larger quantities if we could obtain it at more reasonable rates, and obtain a market for the manufactured products. A very large quantity of this wool arrives in the United States. A trade journal in Boston states that half the clip of Cape wool that enters Boston is reshipped to Canada. We should obtain this wool direct. In order to show how rapidly the Cape Colony is being developed, I may state that at the present moment north of Delagoa Bay a rail-Gen. LAURIE.

way, 1,200 miles long, is being built by the South African Company from the ocean to the head waters of the Zambesi, with the idea of developing the magnificent trade that can be opened out, and it is only right that we should secure our share of that trade, for which European nations are keenly competing. I am told that some of our manufacturers are already realising the opening that exists at the Cape. I hear that the Bell Organ Company have opened a branch in Cape Town; and, although this may be a small matter in itself, it shows that our people are awakening to the value of the Cape market. In view of the fact that we exported of cottons to China in 1887 1,742,000 yards, which quantity we increased in 1888 to 6,500,000 yards, we should be able to build up an export trade with the Cape Colony and the interior of Africa in that class of goods. The Cape is no further from Canada than it is from England. From London to Cape Town the distance is 6,065 miles; from Halifax to Cape Town the distance is 5,931 miles; Canada thus being nearer than England, which has hitherto largely supplied that market. And in order to show that the distance is not considered excessive, I may mention, that within the last few months, owing to the dearth of mackerel on our shores, a schooner sailed from Gloucester, and was only fifty-two days in reaching the Cape, and after prosecuting a fishing voyage on that coast she brought mackerel back to the Gloucester market. I have taken from the British trade statistics, statements showing the imports of South Africa in 1888, and although the trade may be termed insignificant by some, it is one in which we would willingly share. The imports into South Africa reached the value of nearly £5,000,000 sterling. Of these—and I can speak from experience a large quantity consists of goods which can be well supplied from Canada, and they included butter, agricultural implements, candles, hardware of all kinds, clothing, harness, boots and shoes, vehicles of all kinds, all of which we can supply of the description that will suit the South African colonies very well. I mentioned in a report I made some years since:

made some years since:

"Every warehouse in Durban appeared to be filled with American agricultural implements and vehicles, 'spiders' being the favorite carriage in Natal; and whilst imports from the United Kingdom increased 12 per cent., the increase from the United States, in the same year, was 40 per cent. Throughout the South African colonies the consumption of preserved provisions is something beyond belief. Rich as the country is in pasture and cattle, it is most unusual to see anything but preserved milk used at the breakfast table in the towns, and this suggests a new and profitable development of our dairy farming."

They do not use cattle as we use them. They are mainly used for trekking, for doing transportation work. Cattle are rarely killed for consumption, except in the towns, nor are cows often milked on the farms in the interior. In regard to Australia, I desire to say a few more words. The Government of Victoria, in 1871, proposed to negotiate a commercial treaty with the French colonies in the Pacific, for Victoria being a protectionist community, they supposed they would be able to secure control of those markets and supply them with manufactures. Lord Kimberley wrote very strongly in regard to this proposal. He said that the imposition of such duty would have a tendency to weaken the connection with Great Britain. The matter was brought up in the Victoria Legislative Council, and the Hon. J. O'Shaughnessy moved in accordance with notice:

"That after mature consideration, this House adopts

"That after mature consideration, this House adopts the following declaratory resolutions:

"I. That the power to make international treaties is an inherent and indispensable right possessed by supreme authority, the Sovereign of the British Empire, and that this power, in the opinion of this House, has always been exercised with due regard for the interests of all Her Majesty's subjects.

"2. This House considers that no advantage would result from the claim set up on behalf of the Australasian Colonies, to make treaties with foreign states that would compensate them politically or commercially, for the risk thereby involved, or of endangering the connection whappily subsisting between all parts of the Empire.

"The colonies of the same group as those of Australiasia, should be enabled, with proper safeguards, to conclude agreements amongst themselves for the regulation of their commerce, subject to such conditions as may be found necessary to preserve intact the authority of the Empire.

Crown to make treaties binding on all parts of the Empire.

Empire.

"That the thanks of this House are due to the Right Hop. the Earl of Kimberley, for the consideration which he has shown to Her Majesty's subjects in Australasia, in having afforded them an opportunity of discussing the grave questions raised by His Lordship's circular despatches before coming to a final decision upon them."

I only mention that, Sir, to show that after they considered the matter fully, they realised that Lord Kimberley had exercised a wise discretion in forbidding them to impose differential duties on foreign products as against those of foreign nations.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was that resolution carried?

General LAURIE. That resolution was carried. That was some years ago, and since then the question has not been raised; but, as you are aware, the Prince of Wales thought proper to invite the various colonies and possessions of the Empire, to have an Imperial Exhibition in London, in 1886, and the British public before whom the products of the colonies were more especially brought, were more than surprised at the capacity for production of the British Colonies. This has produced a great change in public sentiment in England, from that which formerly existed. At one time there was an idea, especially among Liberal statesmen -with the one marked exception of Lord Rosebery, who has shown a great desire to maintain intact connection between the mother country and the colonies—that the colonies should be allowed to go adrift. But the ideas that Liberal statesmen formerly exploited, because that is all I can really say of them, the ideas they openly expressed and advocated, that it might be well to let the colonies go adrift, have been entirely dropped. This change of opinion is largely due to the creditable exhibition made by the different colonies, and which taught the mother country that leaning on the colonies she can obtain all the supplies which she needs for her trade and manufactures. This conclusion had led to the consideration—I will not say in the form of leagues, because I will not touch on that point—but it has led to the consideration of how the mother country and her colonies may be bound more closely together. It has led to the examination of the question of what obstacles prevent the mother country and the colonies, drawing together more closely than they have done, and it led to the action of Colonel Howard Vincent, calling for, and obtaining, this return, showing that so many countries had treaties of commerce with the mother country, which precluded the colonies making intercolonial arrangements among themselves. Protest has been made, and most properly made by our Government, but up to 1888, it is quite evident that protest has been without results, or else these treaties would not have been still extant. I do think it is desirable that some action should be pressed before Parliament, to enable us, as a self-governing community, to take such steps as may be desirable to negotiate with the mother country, and with our sister colonies, for closer trade relations. I may be told, Sir, as I have heard over and over again stated, that if we were united with the United States and had commercial union with them, we should have the greatest system of free trade the world ever knew, and that was practically possible. What is the trade of Great Britain and her colonies? The imports and exports of Great Britain and her colonies, amounts to £1,093,000,000 annually.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hardly, I think.

General LAURIE. My hon, friend seems to dispute that, but I am prepared to stake my reputation upon it, and I will give the figures in detail to show that I am correct:

	Imports and Exports.
Great Britain and Ireland	£686,000,000
Indian Possessions	161,000,000
Other Eastern Possessions	50,000,000
Australasia, &c	124,000,000
America	42,000,000
Guiana, &c	3,000,000
Africa	14,000,000
West Indies, &c	11,000,000
European Possessions	2,000,000

Total.....£1,093,000,000

I have given this in detail in order to set at rest any question as to whether I am right or not. But, Sir, I want to go further than that, I want to show what great importance these comparatively insignificant communities are in their trade with the mother country, and of the importance they are, therefore, to the general trade of the world. I find that while the United States was facile princeps the largest importer from Great Britain, and that her imports amounted to £41,000,000 annually; Australasia, that insignificant community, is actually second on the list, and imports £28,500,000 annually, and actually takes a larger import of British goods than any country in Europe. I find that whilst Australasia imports British goods to the value of £28,500,000 sterling, annually, Germany imports only £27,000,000; France imports only £24,000,000 annually, and then we make a big drop until we come to Belgium, which imports £12,000,000, annually, from the United Kingdom. Next to Belgium, in the matter of British imports, is the other so-called insignificant community of South Africa. Before all these large countries of Europe, to which we are accustomed to look at, as carrying on a large trade, these insignificant countries to which I referred, offer greater facilities for increasing our trade with them, and of which we ought to take advantage. I think it is a great misfortune that commercial treaties still exist which preclude our taking advantage of the facilities for trade. say, that compared with our dropping in with the commercial system of the United States, a general customs union for the British Empire would be undoubtedly the system to which could well be applied the term "of the greatest system of free trade the world ever saw." A comparison of that trade with the Empire, which would accrue to us, as compared with our trade with the United States, will show how much more desirable a trade with the British Colonies is. Of course, I shall be taunted with the remark that this is nothing but an Imperial Federation idea. Very good, Sir, I am prepared to accept it, even on these terms, although Imperial Federation has nothing to do with my motion. I am prepared to accept it on these terms for the reason, that I do believe that closer commercial union leads to closer political union. It is for that reason I have no desire to see commercial union with the United States come into active operation, and that I do desire to see commercial union with the sister colonies under the British Crown. We have had Gladstone quoted to us in this House as the ablest man living, but even Mr. Gladstone makes mistakes sometimes. Mr. Gladstone, on the 4th December, 1889, discussing the Brazilian Revolution at Manchester, said:

"The Brazilian Revolution showed that the sympathies of the whole American continent were unfavorable to royalty."

And yet here we stand with one foot on the Atlantic, and one on the Pacific, owning and governing one-half of the North American continent, and I do not think the sympathies of this half are unfavorable to royalty or British connection. they are, then there could be very little force in the resolution passed by this House early in the present Session, and spoken to and supported not merely by men favorable to the Government, or by men who wished through the Government to promote a particular idea or play into the hands of the Government at home. We have been told of the Government at home. that there are influences which will prevent the British Empire ever being linked together, in the dissimilarity of the races of which it is composed; but my hon. friend who seconded that resolution in this House belongs to the French Canadian race, which we have been falsely told is a bar to any closer union of the British Empire. The same remark has been made of the Dutch of South Africa, and yet Mr. Hofmeyer, a leader of the Dutch party at the Cape, moved a resolution at the Conference of Colonial Delegates in London, in 1887, in favor of an Imperial tariff being imposed throughout the Empire in order that Imperial objects might be obtained. We have been told, again, falsely, that the Irish of Australia are an element fighting against closer union, and yet I have read to you to-day a resolution moved by Mr. O'Shaughnessy, whose name indicates the nationality to which he belongs, in favor of that object. The obstacles based on race are purely imaginary and are only raised for mischievous purposes. I believe that closer commercial union would lead to closer political union, and, therefore, I desire that we should promote such steps as would bring about commercial union. To that end I think that any obstacle that stands in our way, such as the obstacles contained in these treaties, should be removed, in order that we may have a free hand to take such action as we deem proper with regard to our sister colonies. It is a matter of common report that we are shortly to send a commission to Australia to discuss with the Governments there the possibilities of closer trade relations between those colonies and this country; but with these clauses standing as obstacles in the way of closer trade relations, what end could that there are a great many things which could be Gen. LAURIE.

commission serve? The British Government have stated that, as long as those treaties are in force, we are prevented from negotiating any closer trade relations with other colonies or offering any advantages to them or to the mother country that will not be claimed by Belgium and the Zollverein, as well as by the other thirty-four countries which are enjoying a favored-nation clause in their treaties with Great Britain. Any preferential treatment which we offered to those colonies, would be preferential treatment with regard to all those countries. and, therefore, would be no preferential treatment at all. I think we have learned from Mr. Cobden, in his negotiation of his treaty with France in 1860, that if we want advantages from other countries we must offer them something in return. Nations do not offer commercial advantages from feelings of benevolence, but they offer them because they expect commercial advantages in return; and we must be able to offer preferential advantages to other colonies if we expect them to grant preferential advantages to us. I attended a meeting of the Imperial Federation League in England, at the Mansion House, last summer. Among those who had in the past sneered at and belittled the proposals of the founders and active workers of the league were the London newspapers, and notably the London Globe; but, after the idea had been ventilated at that meeting, and it had been shown that a considerable amount of work had been done in England, and that the sentiment was growing, the Globe wound up an article discussing the question by saying:

"The Imperial Federationists may be dreaming a dream, but it is a noble dream at worst, and from such come the grandest benefits to mankind."

Sir, I am satisfied that we can inaugurate a system of free trade among the various possessions of the British Empire which will be of the greatest benefit to ourselves, to the mother country, and the Empire at large.

Mr. SKINNER. As the seconder of this resolution, I do not wish to address the House, because I have a motion cognate to it, and I intend to speak on that.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad the hon. member for Shelburne (General Laurie) has brought up this matter. He has given us a great deal of useful information and a great deal of sound commercial doctrine; but, unfortunately, when he is asked to apply to other countries the logic which he has brought forward in support of trade with the other colonies, he refused to do it. He is like a horse in a steeplechase, who approaches the hurdle at a tremendous pace, and shows every sign of an intention to clear it in magnificent style, but at the last moment refuses to leap, and swerves off so suddenly as to be in danger of throwing his rider and bringing him to grief. I am afraid that the hon. gentlemen's colonial policy will treat him in the same way—that his half-hearted policy of extended trade will amount to nothing except to dislodge the hon. member himself from his seat. The hon. gentleman lays down, to begin with, the very sound principle that what we need in Canada is extended markets—that there are a great many things which could be cheaply and profitably manufactured in this country if we had only a sufficiently large market. That is very true:

manufactured here very profitably if the sale were very large; but they cannot be manufactured profitably so long as the sale is confined to Canada. This is one of the strongest arguments that have been urged in favor of reciprocity with the United States, and it is very much stronger with regard to reciprocity with the United States than with regard to reciprocity with the colonies to which my hon. friend applies it. Not to quote all that he says with regard to markets, it may all be boiled down to a few words by saying that you cannot sell in a market where you cannot or will not buy; that trade has always two sides to it, and that if you want to increase your export trade you must increase your import trade at the same time, except in the case of a few exceptional commodities which can be got in no other country. For this reason, the hon, member appears to think, I believe properly, that, in order to increase our trade with other colonies, we must make treaties of reciprocity with them. He is quite sound on that point, and so are the Messrs. Massey, of Toronto, who wrote the letter he read in regard to our trade in agricultural implements with the Australian colonies. If we are to trade with them, mutual concessions must be made, although one of the Australian colonies has gone as far as it can in the direction of free trade -I mean New South Wales—and is reaping the benefits of it by largely increased trade. But when the hon. gentleman is asked to apply these sound doctrines of his to the case of trade with the United States, what does he say? Does he say that it would be inadvisable to have extended trade relations with the United States? By no means. He merely says that Mr. Blaine has told us we cannot have those extended trade relations except on the condition of the closest political relations. Well, Mr. Blaine is not the United States.

General LAURIE. He is the Secretary of State.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, but he does not dictate the financial policy of the United States for all the future, or even for the immediate future. know that already a resolution has passed the Finance Committee of Congress, asking the President to appoint commissioners to confer with commissioners from this country regarding extended trade relations, without mentioning anything about political relations; and yet, the hon, and gallant member for Shelburne insists that we cannot have extended trade relations without political relations, because Mr. Blaine, who, for the time being, is Secretary of State, has said we cannot. But the Secretary of State in the United States has not the control of the finance policy of that country which our Finance Minister has of ours. In the United States Congress, financial schemes are considered and formulated by a large Committee, composed of members of the House, and are not proposed on the responsibility of a Minister When a responsible Minister makes a statement here you may be pretty sure it expresses the policy of the Government as long as he remains a member of it; but it does not follow in the United States, that the obiter dictum, the casual expression of opinion of the Secretary of State, embodies the financial policy of that country even for the time being, as he may not be able to carry his ideas through the House. Even a large carrying trade than the Province of Nova 116 if that were the present financial policy of United States, the question for to consider is whether it is worth our while, in carrying out the idea so ably presented by my hon. friend, to try and induce the American people to adopt a financial policy which will give extended trade relations to the two countries otherwise than on the basis of political union. I do not intend to go into this question at length on a mo-tion of this kind, but I would call attention to the fact that our trade with the United States is many times greater than our trade with all the British possessions together, and is in many respects greater than our trade with Great Britain; and our trade with the United States goes on increasing at a much greater ratio than that with England. In agricultural products our trade with Great Britain from 1884 to 1888 only increased from $3,990,000 to $4,292,000, a little over $200,000. Our trade with the United States in the same class of products increased from $7,500,000 in 1884 to $10,706,000 in 1888, or over $3,000,000. In animal products our trade with Great Britain remained almost stationary, rising from $16,000,000 to $16,-571,000 only, while with the United States it rose from $3,167,000 in 1884 to $7,595,000 in 1888. In other respects, while our trade with the United States has increased, our trade with Great Britain has decreased. My hon, friend says it is not worth while to consider the question of reciprocal trade with the United States, while it is with the British possessions. Just let me give an instance of the comparative amount of trade done by us with the United States and with the British possessions. Of the products of the fisheries, we sent to the United States over $3,000,000 worth in 1888, and to Australia $130,000 worth, and the export to Australia is the largest of our exports to the British colonies except that to the West Indies, $1,130,090. Of the products of our forests, we sent to the British West Indies $197,000 worth; to Australia, $180,000 worth, and to the United States, $10,622,000 worth. Of animals and their products, we sent to the United States $7,595,000 worth; to the West Indies $1,297,700 worth; and to no other British possession, except Newfoundland, as much as $1,000, and to Newfoundland we shipped only to the value of $373,000. Of agricultural products, we sent to the United States $10,306,000; to Newfoundland, $576,000; to the British West Indies, $76,000; to Guiana, $46,000. Of manufactures, we sent to the United States, $1,632,000 worth; to Newfoundland, $242,000 worth; to Australia $132,000 worth; and to no other British possession as much as $50,000 worth. Now, when we compare these figures, we see the absurdity of striving to obtain a trade with those colonies while we refuse to trade with the market close at hand, which is willing to trade with us. To pretend that the importance of fostering trade with the British colonies is greater than the importance of foster-ing trade with the United States is absurd, more especially with regard to the Province to which the hon, gentlemen belongs. If he applies in its full sense the doctrine that a large market promotes manufacturing and prosperity he ought to apply that doctrine with special force to his own There is no part of the Dominion Province.

Scotia. Its population are accustomed to seafaring; they have a great deal more shipping than any other Province. They have every facility for manufacturing. They have natural products of various kinds eminently adapted for export. Take the article of coal alone. The hon. gentleman must understand that the markets of the United States would give a great impetus to the coal mining industry, and not only to the export of coal, but to the export of manufactures in which coal would be used. We were told by Sir Charles Tupper, when Minister of Finance a few years ago, that the facilities for the manufacture of iron in Nova Scotia were unequalled, as coal and iron are found absolutely in the same neighborhood, and close to the sea, so that these products could be exported readily. If we had reciprocal trade relations with the United States, Nova Scotia would manufacture iron for the rest of the continent. Again, look at their shipping trade. The hon. gentleman must be aware that ship-building has declined during the last few years, taking the Dominion as a whole, and taking the Maritime Provinces particularly. The report shows that the tonnage gradually grew until in 1877, under a revenue tariff, it amounted to 1,310,468 tons. It remained at about that figure until 1881, but we find that in 1888 it had again dropped to 1,089,642, only a trifle over what it was seventeen years before. That was the case, notwithstandingth at many new vessels had been built. The actual amount of shipping has not increased, but has absolutely decreased in the last few years. It may be said that this is due to the substitution of iron vessels for wooden vessels. That may be true to a certain extent, but there is still a great demand for wooden ships. The true reason is that there is a lack of employment for our vessels in consequence of our not trading as we ought with foreign countries. It has been possible to build iron vessels in Ontario, though we are at so great a distance from the markets, and still more could iron vessels be built in Nova Scotia, where they have iron and coal, if those vessels could be built cheap enough to be sold abroad, or if they could be employed in trading with foreign countries. I hope the hon. gentleman who has gone so far towards free trade with the colonies will go a little further and apply it to the Dominion at large.

Mr. SKINNER. The motion which I have on the paper is so similar to this of the hon. member for Shelburne (General Laurie) that, with the consent of the House I will move mine now, so that they may both be disposed of together.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid that cannot be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The speech of my hon. friend from Shelburne (General Laurie) is exceedingly interesting, and it is well for us to be able to consider it when we have an opportunity of examining the details of the speech as published in Hansard. The only thing I was afraid of was that his speech might bring on another debate on the subjects of free trade and protection, foreign relations, the tariff, and all the rest of it. I shall, therefore, only refer to the subject of the motion itself. Of course, there is no objection that all communications between the Imperial Government and the Dominion Government in regard to this gentleman will go beyond the colonies. Mr. CASEY.

treaties which the hon. gentleman has quoted, with Belgium and Germany, made, I think, in 1865. they contained that unfortunate clause including the colonies. The hon, gentleman has referred to the Canadian remonstrance against those treaties. and to the action of Her Majesty's Government, which was to urge upon Belgium and Germany the expediency of amending those treaties so far as they affected the freedom of the colonies. The hon, gentleman also read the answer which was given by both Belgium and Germany, who desired to hold those treaties unaltered. They desired to have access to the British colonies, as well as the mother country, under the "most favored nation" clause. Those clauses cannot be altered without the consent of both parties to the treaty. I do not think that, in practice, Canada has been injured by that refusal, as there is little or no chance of Belgium or Germany agreeing to a separate arrangement or reciprocal treaty with Canada. If, however, Canada could by any means induce Germany or Belgium to make a treaty, reciprocal or otherwise, as to the commerce of Canada, I have not the slightest doubt that Her Majesty's Government would authorise such negotiations to go on, would assist such negotiations with those two nations, and would allow Canada to be represented in any such negotiations, as was done in the case of Spain and the United States, so that the Canadian representative would have equal authority with the English ambassador and it would be a joint commission, so that, if any arrangement were come to, the treaty would be signed both by the British ambassador and the Canadian commissioner. Thus the treaty would be assented to by Canada and at the same time would be enforced and upheld as an Imperial treaty. With regard to the intercolonial arrangement, notwithstanding the dictum of Lord Kimberley, I have no doubt that any arrangement between the colonies would be assented to by Great Britain. There has been a great change since Lord Kimberley wrote that rather imperious dispatch. Though he is supposed to be a great Liberal in England, Lord Kimberley was a decided autocrat as a colonial Minister. have no doubt whatever that Her Majesty's Government would agree to any such arrangement. Lord Kimberley is rather behind the age in regard to colonial matters. You may remember that some few years ago, when Lord Kimberley was Colonial Secretary, this House passed a very respectful and loyal Address to Her Majesty on the subject of home rule for Ireland, but Lord Kimberley took it upon himself to tell us in polite language to mind our own business, just as in this dispatch he took it upon himself to say there should be no arrangements made to give special preference to the colonies in regard to arrangements amongs themselves. That, I am sure, is an exploded doctrine, and if we were able to make arrangements, for instance, with the West Indies for an interchange of commodities under certain tariff arrangements, I am sure that Her Majesty's Government would consent to it, although Australia or the Cape of Good Hope, or any other portion of Her Majesty's dominion, were excluded from that arrangement.

subject shall be brought down. As to the two

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the hon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In what way?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Carrying that doctrine further than the colonies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am talking about interprovincial trade just now. I have not any doubt that Her Majesty's Government would assist any arrangement we might make with one or more colonies to have a reciprocal trade between themselves, although that would have the effect of excluding other colonies who did not agree to the same terms. With respect to trade with the West Indies, Canada has tried again and again to see whether she could not take some steps towards developing such a trade. Before the hon. gentleman's time a commission was sent to the West Indies, years ago, to make an arrangement with the principal colonies, but it was found that we could make no arrangement. They would come to no agreement among themselves; they were quite willing that Canada should spend money, that Canada should give a large subsidy for steamers or other modes of marine communication, but they would not come to any terms in the way of making contributions to the means of forwarding that trade.

Mr. BLAKE. They were willing to take, but not to give.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. We are doing a little in the way of giving a subsidy to show our earnest desire to foster and develop trade. Since that time we have had some gentlemen of considerable importance here from Jamaica. The whole question of reciprocal trade between Jamaica was considered, but it was found that Jamaica, so far as these gentlemen represented that colony, would only agree to an arrangement which would exclude the sugar of the other colonies and give Jamaica the sole and exclusive shipment of sugar; because they said: "If British Guiana comes in, they will undersell us in the Canadian market, and it will be no advantage to us to have a reciprocal arrangement, unless it be exclusive, between Canada and Jamaica."

Mr. BLAKE. That sounds almost as if they were protectionists.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It does sound a little as if they were protectionists. Australia, my hon. friend may remember that Canada had made arrangements to send a commission to Australia for the purpose of negotiating a treaty or treaties for reciprocal trade, and also for the purpose of arranging for a line of steamers running between Australasia, including New Zealand and Canada. That commission would That commission would have gone to Australia had it not been represented to us from Australia that the period that was selected would not satisfy the various colonies there, inasmuch as most likely some, if not all, of the Legislatures would be in session when our commission arrived there, and it would be useless for the commission to go to Australia unless in the conference each of the Australasian colonies should be represented by a member of their Government, which could not be expected during the sessions of their several Parliaments. Of course, it would be of little use if one or more of the colonies were unrepresented in any such conference. Since that time there has been an attempt to federate the various colonies in some system like ours, and it | 1161 has been represented to us that until that question had its solution one way or the other, it would be well for Canada to defer sending commissioners there. Thus the matter stands. All the colonies have expressed their desire to meet Canada in conference, but they have, as I say, expressed their conviction that such a conference would fail unless all the Governments were represented, and that it would be well to postpone our commission until a confederation should be finally settled. I think, therefore, that everything has been done by Canada that can be done in the way of trying to induce our sister colonies to enter into a scheme or schemes for developing trade. The only two treaties which affect the colonies are, as has been mentioned, those with Germany and Belgium; those can only be altered by agreement between the two powers which made those treaties; but with the exception of these, no attempt has been made to combine the colonies in any commercial treaty made by England. On the contrary, in consequence of our remonstrances, which remonstrances have been re-echoed from Australia, whenever England has made a commercial treaty, there has always been a clause in those treaties stating that the colonies shall not be included in those treaties unless within a certain period named in the treaty, or the assent of the colony is given. Consequently, we have had again and again treaties communicated to Canada, and we have given answer that we did not desire to be included in those treaties, so that we might have a free land, should it at any time be found expedient for Canada to enter into direct communication with any foreign power for the purpose of making a separate treaty. In such cases, as I have already stated, whenever any one of those nations express a desire to enter into reciprocal arrangements with Canada, or to make a treaty, I have no doubt that we will be assisted in every possible way by Her Majesty's Government. Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AND CUSTOMS HOUSE BUILD-ING AT ANNAPOLIS, N.S.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) moved for:

Correspondence and all other papers relating to the purchase of a site for the Post Office and Custom House building at Annapolis, N.S.; any reports relating to such purchase, and any offers for other sites made by other parties to the Government.

He said: Some time ago the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) brought up this question, and in reply to a statement made by me, that he had been interested in certain properties until 20th June, 1888, he stated that assertion was not true. Strictly speaking, as regards that particular date, the hon. gentleman may have been correct; but I propose to call the attention of the House to the facts connected with the purchase of the property on which the Annapolis Post Office and Inland Revenue building now stands. It would appear that some years ago, I think in 1887, the first vote for a Government building at Annapolis, N.S., appeared in the Estimates. that time, or prior to 1888, several lots of land, I believe, were offered to the Government. I stated on a previous occasion that the Government own a property which was equally adapted, and even better adapted, as I am informed, for a public building than the site where the public building now stands. I speak from hearsay and not from personal knowledge. I stated at that time that two lots of land were owned by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), one being in the name of Pickels & Mills, and the other owned by himself. I stated on a previous occasion that the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) had been at one time owner of these properties, and I stated that I understood he was so up to 20th June, 1888. I am not quite correct as to the date, but in order to show that I was practically and substantially correct, I will read a certificate from the registrar of deeds of the County of Annapolis. It is as follows:

PROVINCE OF NOVA SCOTIA, COUNTY OF ANNAPOLIS. REGISTRY OFFICE. BRIDGETOWN, 11th March, 1890-

"I, Edmund Bent, Registrar of Deeds for the County of Annapolis, do hereby certify that in libro 88, folios 586 and 587, I find a deed John B. Mills and wife, to Pickels & Mills, of a property in Annapolis Royal, dated 14th of June, A.D. 1888, recorded 16th June, A.D. 1888. The foregoing is John B. Mills' interest in the property deeded by Pickels & Mills to Her Majesty.

"I also find a deed John B. Mills and wife to John Buckler, of a property in Annapolis Royal, adjoining the above lot, dated 16th June, 1888, recorded 22nd June, 1888. A portion of the last lot has since been deeded to Her Majesty by John Buckler and wife.

"E. BENT,

"Registrar."

As I understand the matter, these properties were conveyed to the Crown on the following March by the parties mentioned in the certificate of the registrar of deeds. So much with respect to the titles to the property. As I understand it, the lot of land, being part of the Pickels & Mills lot, was something like 48 by 50 feet, for which $3,300 was ever paid, which anyone possessing a knowledge of Annapolis must know is a most extraordinary sum to pay for such a quantity of land. Then we find about the same time, a portion of the Buckler lot, 50 by 44 feet, was sold for $700, and I venture to say that no sale of any other property in Annapolis was ever made at such figures. I believe even in large cities very little more than $4,000 would have been paid for a site equal to that on which the Government building in Annapolis is placed. I am informed, and I know myself personally, that according to prices paid some years ago these properties must have been very largely overvalued. I understand the properties originally were bought for a very much smaller sum, and with respect to the property owned by Pickels & Mills, it had, when it was purchased for a much smaller sum, a house on it which was afterwards burnt. So much with respect to the sale of the lands. I stated when the subject was up on a previous occasion, I understood the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) was interested in that property up to June, 1888. I find that on 14th June he conveyed that property to Pickels and Mills or a portion of, and another portion to John Buckler, that a small portion of the lots was afterwards sold for the enormous sum I have mentioned, I say an enormous sum for Annapolis, and for the position of the lots. Lots perhaps not exactly equal to, but what would have been practically as beneficial to the public could have been obtained by the Government for a far less sum. Then we have the fact that the Government had a property of their own there which was fully suitable for the purpose, and would have fully met the Mr. Weldon (St. John).

convenience of the inhabitants, on which property a light was erected which could have been easily fixed on the building erected. The two lots offered were both on opposite sides of the railway, and in order to approach them it was necessary to cross the railway track, and either of those lots could have been obtained for a very much less sum than the amount paid for the property on which the Government was erected. The lot on which the building is erected is nearly covered by the building itself, and to the southern part of it there is a right of way which is given by Pickles & Mills to the Government, but which, I am informed, and I speak subject to correction, was conveyed to another person, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), three years previously, and the Government have no right in regard to it. So much with respect to the land and the sale. Then, again, with respect to the building itself. A return has been brought down, and I find the only justification for the change of material from grey granite to red sandstone is a report from Mr. Fuller, the Government Engineer. The report is a very short document, and I will read it:

"Re STONE USED IN THE PUBLIC BUILDING, ANNAPOLIS, N. S.

LIS, N. S.

"The specification states that 'the whole of external stone-work and dressings above ground line are to be of approved grey granite from Lawrencetown, or other approved granite of equal quality.' The contractors (Rhodes &Currei, of Amherst, N.S.), submitted a sample of a red sandstone from quarries at Northport, N.S., which they guaranteed could be obtained in any quartity and of any dimensions required. This stone being in every way equal in quality and durability, and far more pleasing in colour, and better adapted for use in conjunction with red brick—its adoption was authorized. This stone, both from its pleasing colour and durable qualities, must be considered one of the finest sandstones on this continent. And as the greater portion of the exposed surface is to be quarry faced (that is without dressing) its pleasing tone of color will add very much to the effect of the building when completed. The grey granite was specified because at the time the specifications were prepared it was stated that it was the only stone that could be obtained. The only difference would be in the labor of dressing, but as there is so little required, the saving would not be much, and can be arranged at the final settlement, but the contract price would not be increased. tlement, but the contract price would not be increased.

"THOS. FULLER, Chief Architect." (Signed)

As to the question of durability between grey granite and red sandstone, I question the accuracy of the architect's opinion. But assuming he is correct, the alteration was made because the sandstone was of a more pleasing color and would add to the effect of the building, would add to its beauty, but not give any substantial benefit whatever. Then, the architect points out that the only difference in cost will be for the labor of dressing, and as there is so little dressing required the saving could not be much, and at all events, the contract price would not be increased. What do we find? We know there is a great difference in cost as between dressing grey granite and red sandstone. As I pointed out on a former occasion, and showed by figures, the difference was $1,856, of which the contractors received the benefit by having obtain, ed red sandstone from their own quarries instead of purchasing grey granite at Lawrencetown. They obtained the contract for $750 less than the next lowest tenderer, but they have secured $1,856 as the difference between using the two different stone, and that difference they of will be able to place in their pockets. That statement made by me was not answered.

I find the universal statement that there would certainly be that difference, which is an extremely large difference. That amount is not an over-estilarge difference. mate, as I am told by persons of experience of what was gained by the change made in getting the stone from their own quarry instead of purchasing it, and by putting in gray granite in accordance with the specifications upon which all other tenders for the building were based and submitted to the We are told that on this contract, it Government. was understood by the Chief Architect, that some arrangement should be made for a final settlement, but the contract price would not be increased. Even in the face of that, the Government was not justified in not enabling other parties to tender, and in allowing these parties to get the contract at a price which enabled them to have a great advantage over other parties, and to reap a benefit to the extent I have named. So far as regards this building, I am afraid that it is only a specimen of many similar transactions throughout the Dominion. We find here that, year after year, we are putting more taxes upon the country, and upon the food and necessaries of life of the people, and here we are throwing away money or expending it uselessly, in giving enormous prices for lots for public buildings, and then enabling favorite contractors to reap an enormous benefit by changing the contract after the terms have been submitted, and thus enabling these parties to put money in their pockets. I, therefore, move this resolution, seconded by Mr. Jones, of Halifax.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When this matter was before the House on a previous day, I informed the hon. gentleman about the purchase of this property. It was a property which, according to the Chief Architect, was the best under the circumstances. Each lot being too small for the purpose for which we wanted it, the two lots were purchased. The price that had been asked in the first instance for these two lots was $6,000, but after negotiating with the parties, we obtained them for $4,000, and they were considered the best that could be selected. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that I must be responsible for the action taken under the circumstances, but I have neither seen the lots nor the place itself. I also explained, the other day, about the vicinity of the railway, and its crossing. With reference to the quality of the stone, to which the hon, gentleman has referred, he has read just now the statement which I brought down, and in which it is set forth that in the contract the stone that was mentioned was granite, because we thought that was the only stone which could be found in the locality. Afterwards it was shown, in the report made by the engineer, that instead of the granite, which was not a desirable stone, we could obtain a stone which was much better in appearance, was as durable, and which would assimilate much better able, and which would assimilate much better with the brickwork. It was reported that we could obtain this stone in large quantities, and that the price of the contract would not be increased by using it. This did not mean that it would not be decreased afterwards, when the final estimate was made up, but it was ascertained from the contractor that if that stone was adopted the price would not be increased. Of course, I am only a layman and I cannot speak as to the working of the stone, but I was informed by my officers that while in one case the stone was harder and would require more labor, yet in the other case there was more work than there would be necessary with the other stone, and therefore this stone was adopted. I have seen the two samples of stone, and there is no doubt that the sandstone which has been adopted is far superior to the other. The appearance of the building will be better, the durability of one stone is as good as the other, and if I had known at first that such stone could be had at a reasonable distance where the building was being constructed, we would certainly have adopted it at once. We did not know then that that stone existed, and therefore the specifications only spoke of the granite which was on the spot. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I will show him, this afternoon, specimens of the granite and the sandstone, and he will see himself that if he had to select between the two he would have chosen the sandstone and not the granite. Of course, the correspondence, and the other papers to which the hon. gentleman refers, will be brought down.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I have been awaiting this opportunity for some time, to say something with reference to the purchase of the lot for the erection of a public building in Annapolis, and as I intimated some time ago, when I brought the question up as a matter of privilege, I should have liked to have been here the afternoon that this matter first arose in the House. However, being then upon a bed of sickness I was prevented from attending. As regards the imputation cast upon myself, that I was the owner of the property at Annapolis upon which this property was erected, it was perfectly true to say that I had owned in the property at one time, but I hold in my hand a deed by which I sold my part of that property on 3rd January, 1887, which shows that the money was paid for it, and the property transferred to a party who died a short while afterwards. The deed that eventually was recorded upon the registry of deeds was in fulfilment of the deed thats old the property on 3rd January, 1887. I have already stated to this House that I had no interest in any shape or form in that property at the time it was sold to the Government, and if any hon. gentleman wishes any further investigation upon that I invite the enquiry. There is no doubt whatever that hon. gentlemen opposite can very easily get at the truth in reference to this matter, as the property was sold to the Government by a firm of gentlemen who support the Opposition in this House, who have always supported the Opposition, and for aught I know, will always continue to do so. The lot was selected because it was the most desirable property in the town, and I advocated its selection for that reason. The only objection that any persons in Annapolis had to its selection was that it was too good for a public building. That was the only chication appropriate in Annapolis in Annapolis in Annapolis in Annapolis in Anna in That was the only objection anyone in Annapolis had to it, with the exception of the informant of the hon. member for St. John, a man named T. S. Whitman, who had a lot on the opposite side of the railway which he desired to sell, and which he offered to the Government for $2,000. I would not have advocated the Government selecting that lot, even if Mr. Whitman had been willing to give it away. In order to show the respective values of the properties, I have only to mention the rentals obtained from them at the time I owned in the one. I was one of those who bought that property for the purpose of making money out of it. After we bought it the rentals amounted to $610 a year, and the building on it was only a two-story building. The building on the property of Mr. Whitman at that time was a large three-story building, and yet Mr. Whitman's That is the true test of the value of the properties, what they would bring in the market. If my hon. friend knew the real facts of this matter as I know them he would not have spoken on this subject as he has done. I know where he got his information; he got it from a man in whom, if he knew him as well as I do, he would not place the least reliance. I say this boldly, knowing that the people of Annapolis agree with me, and knowing that I have stated the same thing before the man himself; consequently, I am not trying to cloak myself by my position as a member of Parliament. If it is desired to have this matter investigated in any shape, I am willing. If it is a crime to own property in the town of Annapolis, I have been guilty of that crime; but, as for attempting to influence the Government to put money into my pocket, I utterly repudiate any such accusation. As regards the lot on which the Government building is being erected, the Government own that lot down to what was called the "town pump." It has a frontage of 25 feet more than is being actually covered by the building; but the town is deriving a great benefit from the fact of the Government being in possession of that property, whereas if a private person had got possession of it it would be different. I have been told, time and again, that the owners of it, Messrs. Pickles & Mills, had determined to take advantage of everything that the law gave them on the street.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What is the size of Pickles & Mills' lot?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I do not know just now, but I can'tell you that it is large enough to give them a right of way of 10 feet around the whole building; and the Government occupying the whole of the lot, they give 11 feet more on the south side, which gives them an absolute right of way around the south side of 21 feet, on the west side of 10 feet, and the two streets are on the other two sides; so that it is one of the most desirable sites that could be obtained in the town of Annapolis. As regards the site on the military property, although that might have been utilised for a public building, yet, having been handed over to this Government by the Imperial authorities as military property, it is held that it should not be touched for any other purpose. Besides, there is this objection to the building being located on that site, that it would give the rear of the building to the river, which would not be desirable in the case of a public building. I consider that a public building in a town is placed there, not for a year, but for all time; and that is the consideration I had in view when I asked the Government to make an appropriation for it. Consequently, a few hundred dollars difference in the matter of the site should not be allowed to come into the balance. It is in a very prominent and most desirable position. The hon member for St. John Mr. MILLS (Annapolis).

has never seen that spot, or if he has, he has never taken any notice of it; but when he goes there this summer, and sees the building on it, and compares it with the corner opposite, I know that he will retract all he has said, and will set down Mr. Whitman, his informant, as a man who does not always tell the truth. As regards the stone used in the building, I know something about that. Mr. Fuller, the Chief Architect, when preparing the specifications, consulted me as to what stone should be used. He wanted to know if there were any stone quarries near, from which stone could be taken to the building. I told him I did not think so—that the only stone there was granite, and that I did not think it was the best that could be used, because when it got wet and afterwards became heated it was apt to crack. and I thought it would not be as durable as sand. stone. However, that granite being a mile or half a mile from the building, I recommended that it should be put into the specifications, and it was. It was not my wish that Rhodes & Currie should get the contract. I did all I could to have the contract given to a local man, Mr. Burton. Mr. Burton has been a contractor in Annapolis for years and is a first-class workman. He has built large public edifices, including the Union Bank building, and understands his work most thoroughly; and I was extremely anxious, on his account, for the sake of the town of Annapolis, that he should have had that contract. But his figures were higher by something like $750 than those of Rhodes & Currie, and they got the contract. When the contract was given, the first thing I knew about it was that it was asserted in some of the newspapers that sandstone was to be used. That was not the first time I heard of sandstone being taken in place of granite, because Mr. Burton had spoken to me about it, and wanted to know whether it would not be possible to put in sandstone in the place of granite. I told him if sandstone did not cost any more, I thought it was quite possible. If the Chief Architect was pleased with the stone, it was altogether likely that sandstone could be used. But, of course, all this was before the tenders were put in, or before any one knew of Rhodes & Currie. Then Mr. Rhodes came to Annapolis and made arrangements with Mr. Goucher, a friend of mine, to have that granite quarried and brought to the site of the building. He was to bring that granite for $1.75 a ton and place it at the site of the building, as it was but a short distance from the building, about a mile to a mile and a-half, where this granite was quarried. The sandstone was highly recommended, and a specimen of it was sent by the quarrymen, to the Chief Architect, who was very much pleased with it. Other men who understand this business thoroughly, who understand the different kinds of sandstone, were exceedingly pleased with it; and when the stone itself appeared upon the ground the contrast it made with the brick was exceedingly pleasant, and everybody was satisfied with the idea that the red sandstone was to be used in place of granite. With regard to the difference in cost, I think it my duty to give a careful estimate made by Rhodes & Currie, who got a man outside their firm entirely, to estimate the difference in the cutting between the sandstone and the granite, which shows that the man whose figures the hon. member for St. John

(Mr. Weldon) quoted the other day must have been entirely astray, when he says that $1,500 was the difference between the cost of the two kinds of stone.

Mr. WELDON. $1,856.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The whole thing would not cost more than that. Here is the difference in cutting. The cutting of granite trimming is estimated to cost $972, the cutting of the sandstone actually cost $599—hardly $400 between the two Now, where does this sandstone come from? When this matter first came up I manifested my ignorance of the geography of Nova Scotia to a certain extent, but Northport has only lately come into prominence. I have just discovered that instead of its being on the Bay of Fundy side of Nova Scotia, it is on the Northumberland Straits side, so that a vessel coming from Northport to go to Annapolis has to come down Northumberland Straits. through the Gut of Canso, around Cape Sable, past Yarmouth, to Annapolis. That brings the cost of sandstone landed at Annapolis to $10.60 a ton. Those figures show a little difference from those of my hon. friend, and I invite an investigation of the matter. Here are the actual figures showing the difference between these two stones: 120 tons of granite at $1.75 a ton makes $210; 120 tons, required to put up the building of red sandstone, at $10.60, amounts to $1,272. The cost of cutting the granite was $972. The cost of the granite is $210; making a total of $1,182. The cost of cutting the freestone is $599, the cost of the freestone is $1,272; making a total of $1,871 for the whole of the freestone. Messrs. Rhodes & Currie are to-day actual losers by the transaction to the extent of $689.

Mr. BROWN moved second reading of Bill (No. 142) for the relief of Emily Walker.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must call the attention of the House to the peculiar character of this So far as I am able to understand the precedents which exist on the subject of divorce, this is an entirely new departure. The practice of this Parliament in granting divorces has been confined to the one cause which is the most prominent cause, and which is recognised by most Protestants to be a sufficient one, though it is not so recognised by those of the opposite faith. In some of the cases which have prevailed it has perhaps been difficult to ascertain the truth in that matter, but some which is relied upon by the counsel supporting this Bill, it is contended that there was an analogous case in which the element of adultery was not established. As one who was present when that case was considered, I venture to dissent from that view, as I think the offence of adultery was established. But, whether it was or was not, the case was as widely different from this as it was possible to be. The case of Lavelle was one in which, whether the parties intended to marry or not I do not know, but they were married under fictitious names, and afterwards there was a bigamous marriage contracted in the United States by the female, which was considered in Canada to be adultery. The present is a very simple This case is put forward on the ground that the woman was not of age, that is, that she was not twenty-one years of age when the marriage was solemnised. She was twenty years and five months old. It is admitted by those who have supported this Bill, both as counsel, and as members of Parliament in another place, that that formed no legal ground for declaring the marriage to be invalid. In point of fact, then, it may be assumed that, as far as legal validity was concerned, the marriage was as valid, the woman being twenty years and five months old, as if she had been twenty-five years old. We must look for another reason for the dissolution of this marriage, and the reason put forward is that, it was not consummated. Its validity is not questioned. The perfect capacity of the woman to understand the agreement she was entering into, her deliberate intention to be married, are as plain from the evidence as any matter of evidence can be. Therefore, she was not only capable of making a marriage contract, but she understood the marriage contract, she intended to be married, and she understood herself to be married. It is true that the marriage was celebrated without the consent of her parents. It is true that her father died soon afterwards, and that her mother, when she was acquainted with the marriage about ten months afterwards, was much afflicted by it; but even as to the annoyance and grief of the mother at the marriage having been celebrated, all these facts existed five years before there was any application made to any tribunal, even to this Parliament, to dissolve the marriage. The only reason the woman alleges why she has changed her mind and desires a dissolution of the marriage is that she was led to believe before the marriage took place that her husband was earning more than she found subsequently he was earning. She stated that if she had understood that he was not able to earn more than she subsequently found he was earning, she would not have consented to marry him. The proposition then is that we shall dissolve the marriage simply because she found that she was married to a person not able to support her as well as she hoped he would be. I cannot imagine a ground of divorce which would be more stigmatised in those countries where laxity of principles, as regards divorce, are prevalent; I cannot imagine an application for divorce the granting of which would do more dishonor to this Parliament than the passage of this Bill would do. I shall, therefore, apart from my objection to divorce on general principles, oppose this Bill from every point of view, and I move that it be not now read the second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Sir John Thompson.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have read over the testimony in that case with a great deal of attention, as I have in all these divorce cases.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Ha, ha!

Mr. MITCHELL. Some hon. gentlemen laugh; perhaps they cannot all say that. Having given attention to the evidence, I must say that I think there is a clear case for the woman getting a divorce. I believe the circumstances were such that if ever a divorce was warranted it is in this case; and I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. TISDALE. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon, gentleman who has just sat down, and I will give some reasons why it strikes me that the woman is entitled to a divorce, and why, if we should refuse it, it would create a very strong feeling in this country in favor of establishing a divorce court, and would have the opposite effect from that desired by those hon, gentlemen in this House who are so strongly opposed to all divorces. I myself do not wish to see a divorce court established, if people can get relief in proper cases without its assistance; but I say that if the Parliament of Canada refuse relief in cases like this, where, in my opinion, relief should be granted, it would be what I consider a legal outrage, and it would start an agitation that, I think, would probably end, and should end, in the establishment of a divorce court. Now, in this case, the young woman was under age, and our laws declare that she is incompetent to make any contract. It is true that in ancient times, and even in times as modern as that of George II, which is a long time in one way, minors could not contract a legal marriage without the consent of the parents. The necessity, to use that expression, of the circumstances, eventually led marriages, even of minors, when they had been consummated without the consent of the parents, to be recognised. Now, what do we find here? Under our law this young woman could have made no contract. If she had sold a horse and had not wished to fulfil the bargain she could not have been compelled to do so; but here, in the most solemn and highest sort of contract that is possible for a woman to make, she made a mistake and desires to withdraw from it. It has not been consummated. The old definition and the proper definition of marriage is: first, a civil contract; second, the consummation; otherwise the marriage remains inchoate. Now, here there is no consummation, and there is no legal marriage in that sense, and yet the result of refusing this divorce would be to compel this woman to remain in a perpetual state of celibacy, or to contract a bigamous marriage. I disagree with the Minister of Justice in the case quoted by him, which is not precedent to this case. In the case he cited, though the woman was not of tender years when she made a bigamous marriage, she got her divorce.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The husband did.

Mr. TISDALE. The husband got a divorce on that ground, but the Senate refused to put into the Bill that it was on account of adultery. There is just the one case, but there the Senate recognised a distinction under the circumstances that no consummation had taken place, and they refused to put in the Bill on that ground, the only cause which,

Now, I say further, that they say, is justifiable. the Minister of Justice did not understand the evidence in this case as I read it, or he would not have said that the young woman refused, as he says, to consummate the marriage, because the young man was not earning as much as he told her. What she did say was, that if she had not believed he was able to support her she would not have consented. Those, I believe, are her words.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is what I said. Mr. TISDALE. No; I understood the hon. gentleman to say what would lead the House to infer that, so far as she was concerned, it was a matter of money--that the man was not earning as much as she supposed. That is quite a different thing, although I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman meant to misrepresent her reasons. I read the evidence carefully, desiring to see what her reasons were, and I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that the reason she gave was that she would not have married him had she not believed he was able to support her. Well, that would be the very best reason why parents should object. Love is all right; it is a necessary incident of the marriage, but prudent people and the parents of young women are not willing that their daughters should be married to husbands who are not able to support them. So it was a sensible and practicable reason that she gave; it was not simply because she found out that he was less wealthy than he had represented himself to be. Her parents were against it, and it is further disclosed in the evidence that he very soon after went away, and letters are in evidence to show that he went to another country, and he never asked her to go and live · with him, never showed any inclination to have her live with him. The result then would be that this young woman, who had not arrived at the legal age of discretion where any other contract would be binding upon her, asks to be relieved from this contract, and if we compel her to abide by it she will either have to live in a perpetual state of celibacy or to commit a bigamous marriage. There are two things necessary to constitute marriage, and one of them is absent in this case. I think it would be very unjust and very unfair to refuse the relief asked for, and I think the result of any such decision would be to raise a strong feeling for a divorce court which would have much greater powers for granting divorces than are now exercised by the two Houses. I would regret very much to This precedent will be a very see such a decision. narrow one; it will be only a precedent where the party was under age. I am not at present saying that I am prepared to go any further. The Senate have considered this case very fully; they are a body that is very difficult to move, especially in violation of precedent. The young woman was under 21 years of age, she could legally perform no contract against the will of her parents, and she performed a contract with a man who was not in a position to provide for her, and he afterwards abandoned her, and unless we are prepared to dissolve that contract, we will say that she shall for all time to come remain without a husband, or contract a bigamous marriage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry I cannot agree at all with my hon. friend with Parliament I have steadily voted in favor of divorce Bills when adultery was proven beyond a doubt; and I think it would be a great misfortune for this country, it would redound to its discredit, it would promote demoralisation to an enormous extent, it would bring on the evils we see on the other side of the line, if we did not adhere to the law of the land, and the law of the Scriptures as well, that marriage can only be dissolved for the cause of adultery. There is a great deal to be said for the position taken by the Catholic Church against divorce in any case; but looking at the statement we find in the Scriptures that for the cause of adultery divorce should be allowed, I have always voted in that direction. But I will steadily oppose in every possible way any further extension of the rule. My hon, friend says that if a Bill of this kind is refused it would cause an excitement in the country for the establishment of divorce courts. I am opposed to the establishment of divorce courts; I think it has had a bad effect in England; and I am well satisfied that our practice should continue. But if we had a divorce court established to-morrow it would decide according to law, and according to the law of England; and according to the law of divorce as known in England, and as it exists, therefore, in this country, there would under that court be no relaxation of the rule as known and established both in England and in the British Empire generally. On the other hand, if there is to be any laxity, if this Legislature is going to adopt the course taken by too many of the State Legislatures in the United States, I would go in immediately for the establishment of a divorce court, a court of Judges learned in the law, who would decide according to the law of England. My hon friend drew a strange inference from the fact that the legal age of discretion is by law 21 years. This young lady actually was seven months from the age of a woman of discretion, with all the responsibilities of a woman. But the hon, gentleman says he does not mean to say she was not capable of making this contract of marriage; he does not seem to say there was any mode of entrapping her used; he does not mean to say that she did not act with a full knowledge of the responsibilities she was going to enter upon. The hon. gentleman says: That may be so; she may have understood the whole thing; but she wanted seven months of 21 years of age, and therefore we must hold her to be absolutely without discretion. He says she could not be bound by contract to buy or sell a horse. The same law which says she shall not be responsible for purchasing a horse says she is quite old enough, if she chooses, to enter into a contract of marriage. The law draws the distinction, and says a woman who could not make a contract in other matters by law, could make a contract by which she was bound for life. I say that I look with horror at the idea of anything like the laxity that is produced by the relaxation of the rule that marriage shall be indissoluble except for the one cause—the cause of adultery.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it would be very unfortunate indeed if the argument addressed gentleman for South Norfolk the hon. (Mr. Tisdale) should prevail before this Assembly. respect to the line of argument he has taken in this case. Ever since divorce cases have come before which, if carried out, will create a court of divorce in this country, wider, broader and looser than anything that exists in any part of the United States. The ground on which he based his view of the case is one that I can hardly understand, because the proposition he advanced is one, I hesitate not to say, which would be held untenable before any court in the land. This woman is of sufficient age to enter into a contract of marriage, being twenty years and five months old, and she is perfectly competent, therefore, to enter into a legal and binding contract. This is not a case in which there is any element, so far as I can see from the evidence, that would justify this House in assisting her to dissolve the marriage. The woman was acquainted with the man for fifteen months, she was engaged to be married during twelve months, and they agreed upon their marriage two or three weeks before it occurred; she went deliberately with her eyes open, fully knowing the consequences, to church, was married by a priest and afterwards returned home. She stated deliberately and distinctly that it was a solemn contract of marriage, which is the most solemn contract into which a woman can enter, and he visited her then and for several weeks after. There is not a scintilla of evidence or suggestion to show that she was entrapped into the marriage, that duress, force, fraud or anything wrong was used to induce her to enter into the contract; and the sole possible ground on which, so far as I can find in reading the debate in the other House, the divorce is sought, is that this legal, binding, solemn marriage had not been consummated. If this House is going to adopt that as a cause of divorce, it is leaving the door wider open than in most of the United States. I desire to quote briefly from the evidence as to events after the marriage was over. Here is an extract from her evidence:

"Q. You did not see him afterwards?—A. He came up that evening.

"Q. And other evenings?—A. Yes; he kept coming up occasionally until he went away.

"Q. Did he talk to you about what he had done?—A. No; he did not seem to mention anything of that kind.

"Q. Or you either?—A. No.

"Q. You never mentioned about the marriage?—A. Oh, yes, we mentioned it, but he never spoke about providing a home for me.

"Q. Did he ever speak of your relations as husband and

"Q. Did he ever speak of your relations as husband and wife?—A. Yes.
"Q. In what way?—A. Nothing particular. He said as soon as my mother was aware of it she would be agreeable."

When she was asked as to whether she thoroughly understood the import of the contract entered into, she gave evidence as follows:-

"Q. At that time, did you consider you were going to be married, or was it simply some little lark on your part?—A. It was not any lark. We both understood we wanted to be married.

wanted to be married.
"Q. And you went there with a serious intention of being married?—A. Yes.
"Q. And living as man and wife?—A. Yes.
"Q. Was there any understanding beforehand that you were not to live together as man and wife?—A. Nothing of that kind. Of course, I should never married him had I known his circumstances—had I known that he was not in a position to keep a wife.

nim had I known his circumstances—had I known that he was not in a position to keep a wife.

"Q. Was it understood you were to go back home and not live with him as your husband?—A. I understood I was going home for a while. He gave me to understand he was getting a good salary, and he told me the figures. Had I known he was not in such a position I would never have consented to this."

So the sum and substance is this—that a man and woman enter into a contract of marriage, that it was solemnly gone through, with a clear under-Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

standing on both sides of the solemn nature of the contract entered into, and after a time one of the parties finds out that the other is not quite as well off as was expected, and so the petitioners come to this Parliament for relief. I hold that this House should by a very strong vote declare that it will not countenance such an application, and the more emphatically this declaration is made the better it will be for Čanada.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I cordially endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), and by the right hon. the First Minister. In the Province of New Brunswick we have a divorce court, and such cases as this come occasionally under cognisance. I have no hesitation in saying that this petition would have been dismissed almost without delay by that court.

Mr. MITCHELL. How do you know?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). A few years ago I was professionally engaged in a case precisely similar to this, which I argued before the court. It must be remembered that we are sitting here as a judicial tribunal guided by the principles of the law of England, and the cases put forward in the brief addresses to this House do not seem to be applicable to the present case, and, in fact, when they are examined, they prove to be opposed to the contention of the petitioner. In the case referred to-a most peculiar case and one of the latest decided in England-Scott vs. Sebright-anyone who reads that case will see that Mr. Justice Butt, the eminent judge who presided, would have refused relief under similar circumstances to these. In that case the circumstances were precisely the same as these. Nothing beyond the ceremony of marriage took place, and the question was whether it was under duress. The decision laid down by Justice Butt in that case was as follows:

"It is that long before the ceremony was gone through the feelings of this young lady towards the respondent were such that of her free and unconstrained will she never would have married him: that she had been re-duced by mental and bodily suffering to a state in which the was incorpola of officiary resistance to secretion and she was incapable of offering resistance to coercion and threats which in her normal condition she would have treated with the contempt she must have felt for the man who made use of them; and that, therefore, there never was any such consent on her part as the law requires for the making a contract of marriage. Such being the case, I know of no consideration consistent with justice or with common sense which should induce me to hold this marriage binding."

This is the principle laid down by Mr. Justice Butt, and any person who examines that case—although it is denied by the petitioner's counsel in this case-would see, that if the circumstances were similar to those now before us, Mr. Justice Butt would not have dissolved the marriage. The strong point which Mr. Justice Butt made in that case was that there never was such consent on her part as the law requires for making a contract of marriage. As pointed out by my hon. friend (Mr. Davies), it is clear that there was no attempt of duress in this case. This girl was of an age when she was perfectly capable of understanding the nature of the obligation she was entering into, and with full knowledge of the facts she deliberately got married, and, as she stated, afterwards fully realised the position. It seems to me that we would be establishing a very dangerous precedent if, under these circumstances, we would allow this Bill to become law. In the case of Lavelle, it will be recollected that the marriage was under similar circumstances to these. The wife afterwards went to the States, and married a Mr. Fralick, and the fact of that bigamous marriage was the only justifiable ground upon which the Act was passed allowing the divorce.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would my hon, friend answer one question? After having listened to the decision of the House the other night—that a woman was not able to take care of herself until she was thirty years of age—how can he reconcile that with his present position?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I did not quite endorse the views of the majority in that, but I do not think the law laid down there has anything to do with this case.

Mr. TISDALE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to lay down the doctrine that a divorce court will not grant relief to the husband who deserts his wife after the consummation of a

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Not according to the marriage law in England.

Mr. TISDALE. If that is good law I would say there is no case here, but I fail to find any case which goes that length, or anything like it, because it is a monstrous doctrine.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In the case which I recollect in the New Brunswick courts it was precisely similar to this. They separated at the church door, and on that occasion I could find no case in justifying me to come before the court to ask for a divorce. I adopted the same course as in the case of Lavelle, and obtained a divorce.

Mr. DICKEY. I wish to say only a few words in reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). There is no doubt, and there can be no doubt that this marriage was as good, and valid, and as binding a marriage as ever was contracted in Canada. The hon, gentleman says the divorce courts, under similar circumstances as these now before us, would have dissolved this marriage. I challenge the hon. gentleman or any hon. gentleman in this House to cite one single precedent where the divorce court dissolved a marriage under such circumstances. The argument was made before the Committee of the Senate by able counsel on behalf of the plaintiff, and every case that could be brought to bear on the question was cited from the English, the American and the Ontario reports. The trouble was taken not only to deliver that argument to the Senate Committee, but to print it and put it in the hands of every member of Parliament, and there is not a pretence that there was ever a precedent for the granting of divorce under any such circumstances. After a thorough examination of the subject myself, I find that there is no such decision to be found in the law books. There is in this case a marriage clear and distinct. The consent of the parents has nothing to do with it whatever, and the consummation has equally nothing whatever to do with it. All you want is a clear consent to make the contract, and the contract was made and consent given in this case. The husband, it is true, has gone to the States, and it is said that this woman has no remedy, but that is an entire mistake. Does any | Bryson.)

hon, gentleman mean to say, that if any husband in this country leaves his family and goes to the United States the wife has any right to come here and ask for a divorce, and that if she does not get it there is danger of wrong being done her? This woman can go to the United States; she can follow her husband and institute a suit for the restitution of marital rights. He is bound to support her, and to give her that marital comfort which a wife has a right to expect. I submit that there has not yet been given the slightest reason whatever to this House to induce them to vote this Bill.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 141) to facilitate the purchase by the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of the branch line between Hull and Aylmer.—(Mr.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. BARRON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to state to the hon. the First Minister that I have recently received a rather important letter from my riding, regarding the bridge across the Fenelon River. It is important that that bridge should be attended to, for the sake of navigation from the upper lakes to the lower lakes, and some of the people in that part of the country are anxious that the work should be gone on with as soon as possible. I should like also to know from the First Minister whether, in case the Trent Valley Commissioners do not report before the close of the Session, it will be possible to have their report, together with the evidence taken, printed and distributed to the members of this House during the recess, in order that they may prepare themselves to discuss it intelligently next Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I can inform my hon. friend that the report will be printed and distributed as suggested. As regards the evidence, I suppose that will follow, but I do not like to say positively that it will be printed. As to the first part of his question, if he will give me a memorandum of what he requires I will attend to it.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

Order for second reading of Bill (No. 44) in further amendment of the Revised Statutes, cl.ap. 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise, read,

Mr. BARRON. I should be willing to allow this to stand if the hon, the Secretary of State would consent to consider my proposal, or at all events to bring it up for discussion when he brings up his Bill.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I intend to put in the Bill which the Government has before the House one part of the hon. gentleman's Bill, that is to say, the provision that the qualification shall be stated in the body of the declaration. That is the only part I can add

Mr. BARRON. Do I understand, then, that the hon. Minister proposes to do away with the schedule, and insist on the qualification being mentioned in the declaration itself?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. BARRON. That is satisfactory, and I move that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to, order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

TRADE COMBINATIONS.

Mr. WALLACE moved second reading of Bill (No. 77) to amend the Act for the prevention and suppression of Combinations formed in restraint of Trade. He said: Last year we passed a Bill on this subject, in which some changes were made in the Senate, and the Bill was sent back here in order to have the changes ratified. This was during the last days of the Session; and had we refused to accept those changes the Bill would not have passed at all. Under these circumstances, it was considered better to adopt the Bill in its emasculated form, rather than have it fall through. In the Bill I now present I propose to restore the Mr. Dickey.

provisions which we adopted in the House of Commons last year. I might mention that the Senate weakened the effect of the Bill last Session by inserting the words "unduly and unreasonably" in certain paragraphs, and they also changed the last clause, which has reference to this Act not interfering with the regular and legitimate trades unions of the country, but will have the effect of preventing wholesale dealers from forming what they would call trade unions, which, we are advised, they would have the power to do under the Trades Unions Act. These are the two objects proposed. To restore the provisions, as it was in the House of Commons, by striking out the words "unduly and unreasonably," and to make it more clear what the intention of the House is with regard to trade The intention is not to interfere in any unions. respect with the action of trades unions in carrying out the objects of trades union associations.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Is it liable to punish any combination?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The word "unlawful" will still remain in the first section.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand this Bill as merely declaratory? Anybody who unlawfully designs to do an unlawful act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. That was the law before, and is the law still.

Mr. WALLACE. We want to make a declaration of what the law is. The lawyers may understand what the law is; the general public do not.

On section 2

 M_{Γ} . DAVIES (P.E.I). Does the second clause exempt trades unions from the operation of the Act? Can they unlawfully combine to do unlawful acts?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By the Trades Unions Act combines in restraint of trade are permitted, both as to workmen and employers. The effect of the clause will be to permit combines by workmen but not by employers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Even if it is unlawful? Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Even if it is in restraint of trade.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Trades Unions Act exempts in a particular way and to a particular extent, but this Act goes further.

Bill reported.

RECIPROCITY IN WRECKING.

Mr. CHARLTON. As the First Minister has expressed his wish that this Bill should be discharged from the Order Paper with the other Wrecking Bills I have no objection, and I move:

That the third Order for second reading of Bill (No. 2) to permit Reciprocity in Wrecking and the Towing of Vessels and Rafts, be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

PROTECTION OF RAILWAY LABORERS.

Mr. PURCELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 52) for the protection of persons employed by contractors engaged in the construction of railways under Acts passed by the Parliament of Canada. He said: This is the same Bill which I introduced last year, to provide for the payment of money due to laborers on railways authorised and subsidised by the Government. I think that men who work on railways should receive their pay. There have heen a great many instances lately where men have had a great deal of difficulty in getting their pay, though this condition of affairs has not been so bad of late as it was in years gone by. I could not give the details of these cases without mentioning the names of the parties, which I do not desire to do: but I think the Government, who claim to be the friends of the workingmen, should favor this Bill. On the Intercolonial Railway several contractors burst and left the men without their pay. They stayed on the road as long as they could, but many of them left the country and went to the States, and have not received their pay to this day. I have been on railways, canals and other public works for thirty years, and I have seen enough in matters of this kind to make the hair stand on one's head. These cases are very little known. Since I introduced this Bill I went down to my own place and found that my paymaster had got a number of men from Lower Canada employed there. The man by whom they were engaged was paid $400 or $500, but you could not get a $2 bill out of him with a search warrant, and he did not pay the men. The result was that I had to pay them over again. I said I had introduced this Bill, and I was not going to be the first to break it. I believe that will be a lesson to that man, as it was a lesson to myself. I hope that we will see that any municipality which gives contracts for works will be obliged to see that the men who labor on them are paid. In every country, defrauding laborers of their wages is a crime which is heinous to society. I hope the Minister of Justice will favor this Bill, and, if it is passed now, the evil will be wiped out. In Maine, Kentucky, Michigan and Texas, the magistrate settles this difficulty. If the laborers are not paid, the magistrate will sell an engine off the road, or, if there is no engine there, he will sell a piece of the road in order to pay the men. That is done by the magistrates without any necessity of bringing the case to a higher court. How can one or two, or ten laboring men go to a higher court in contest with a rich contractor, or a rich company? We have been sometimes a hundred miles away from a regular magistrate, but the Government always sends a stipendiary magistrate on these works, and, in the States to which I have referred, the stipendiary magistrate has power to settle these matters. There is not one case out of a thousand in which laboring men will sue a company. Their $5, $10, $15 or $20 are not sufficient to enable them to employ a lawyer and bring these cases to a higher court, and so they go without their pay. I hope the Government will agree to the passage of this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill is prepared by my hon. friend (Mr. Purcell) for a very beneficial purpose—the protection of the workingmen; but it may be doubted whether, under the terms of the Bill, adequate protection will be given, whether the clauses of the Bill will fully effect the purpose for which the hon. gentleman has introduced it. I have no objection that the Bill should be read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Railways, which will sit on Friday to consider another measure, and there the railway interests can also be heard, because, perhaps, some of these clauses might be oppressive on them. In that Committee the Bill can be considered clause by clause.

Mr. BOISVERT (Translation.) With the permission of the House I will say a few words with respect to this Bill. As is well known, it is calculated to benefit the laborers, who are unfortunately so often taken advantage of by some sub-contractors who do not scruple to badly pay, and even sometimes to never pay at all the poor men they employ. I hope the greater part of the members of this House, to whatever political party they may belong, will deem it their duty to support this Bill, which is intended to safeguard the in-terests of a class of the community so necessary and at the same time so worthy of our sympathies. I also hope the Government will manifest no hostility to this Bill, for they have shown themselves to be the sincere and devoted friends of the workingmen of this country. I may quote as an illustration of this the fact that, in 1886, regardless of the expenditure, they appointed a royal commission, whose duty it was to make enquiries in various parts of the country in order to ascertain the social condition of the Canadian workingmen. I am sorry the members of this commission had no opportunity to make their enquiries in the various places where railways were under construction, for they would have obtained a greater sum of information for the benefit of the members of this House as to the unjust dealings of certain railway contractors. For, as I said before, if among them there are men who pay rather well their laborers, there are others, unfortunately, who are far from discharging their duties to them. A glance on that part of the reports of the royal commission which has reference to the relations between work and capital will be sufficient to force conviction on that point; and, at page 63, we find that when the commission was sitting at Sherbrooke a witness stated that a great many laborers who had worked for sub-contractors had been losing from $15 to $16 each. Unfortunately, Sherbrooke is not the only place where this has happened. It has happened at many places. For my part, I know of a place where laborers have not been paid for more than two years now, and that, it goes without saying, is the cause of serious injury to every class of that commu-nity. In the first place, everyone knows that the laborer is a man who has very little capital, a man who lives from hand to mouth and whose credit is very limited. Well, if that man is not paid regularly he is exposed, as well as the members of his family, to be wanting the necessaries of life. Another class, Mr. Speaker, which have had much to suffer, is that of the farmers. Every one knows that when a railway is built through the country the greater half of the laborers who work on it are farmers and sons of farmers, who come from rather distant places in order to earn some money to improve their farms, and who, while thus working far from their homes, contract debts for the maintenance of their families. Now, if these men are not paid, far from having improved their condition, they will have made it only more critical, and sooner or later they will have to bear the Then, as to the merdisastrous consequences. chant of the locality, who advanced his goods rather liberally, should he, moreover, as is often the case, have taken from these laborers orders for several hundred dollars, and should, on the other hand, the laborers not be paid, he cannot receive his money back, his trade is seriously affected, so much so that, in order to prevent being run in financial ruin, he will be compelled to sue them. So that it can be seen at a glance what a miserable condition will befall these poor people. I will mention, in connection with this state of things, a fact which occurred barely a few months ago. laborer who had worked on a railway under construction for several weeks, and in the meantime had contracted debts for the maintenance of his family, not having been paid himself was unable to pay his own debts. His creditors sued him and had all his things sold by order of the court; he was almost turned out of his home. He told me quite recently that had caused him damages amounting to $200. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will be said that the law is there to protect the laborers working on railways the same as any other members of the community. Well, I say it is not always an easy thing to have justice done. In the first place, the railway companies very seldom carry on the works by themselves. In the majority of cases they let them to a contractor, who, himself, lets them to a sub-contractor, and so on, and it sometimes happens that this sub-contractor is a man of no financial standing, a kind of stopgap behind which others hide themselves so as not to pay the laborers. Sometimes this sub-contractor comes and visits the works once or twice and then he is no more to be seen, like those meteors which pass through the immensity of space and leave no traces behind them. At other times it is a representative of the company who comes and engages a foreman. This foreman engages laborers and these latter do not know for whom they work. As an instance of this I will mention a fact which occurred a few weeks ago. An honest laborer who had earned a few dollars by working on a railway under construction, annoyed at being put off from week to week, from month to month, I might rather say from year to year, finally resolved to take legal proceedings against the company for which he had worked. Well, what was the result? The company pleaded first that they had never engaged the plaintiff; and, what is still worse, they pleaded prescription, and everyone knows that in the Province of Quebec the wages of a laborer are prescribed by the lapse of one year. Well, the poor man had to pay the legal costs and lose the money they owed him. Must it not be inferred from all this that there is a great deficiency in our statutes and that it is absolutely necessary that a law should be passed to protect the laborers working on railways under construction. I am not the only one who is asking for such a legislation. are on the Table of this House many petitions asking that a law be passed to protect the laborers working on railways under construction. Does it not seem that the signers of these petitions are crying out to us: We beseech you, at all events, who are our representatives, to grant us that greater sum of protection to which we are entitled; we beseech you to grant us that protection which you grant so easily to every other class of the It is he who causes two blades of grass to grow Mr. Boisvert.

community, and especially to the wealthiest class of this country! We beseech you to protect us against that class of men eager to enrich them. selves with the money we have so painfully earned and which so legitimately belongs to us! I ask, Mr. Speaker, is there a single member who would decline to aid in the passing of this Bill in favor of the laborers, in the fortunes of which we take a deeper interest in election times than in this House. Some time ago an hon, member rose in this House to ask for the appointment of a commission of enquiry on the causes of the emigration of Canadians to the United States. I think one of the principal causes of this emigration—and there is no necessity for making investigations on that point-I have no hesitation in saying that one of the principal causes of emigration is the want of protection to the laborers, to the poor farmers and to the settlers. I repeat it, to the settler in this country, to the man who, poor but courageous, did not hesitate to part with his native parish where he had spent the best days of his youth, to go with his family in the thickest part of the virgin forest and engage with it in a struggle that will last until one of the two succumbs. And while engaged in clearing his ground he will be compelled sometimes to leave in order to earn some money to provide for the more pressing wants of his family; and then, if an opportunity offers, he will go and work for a railway contractor. Should he not be paid for his work, one can see in what a painful position his family will be; he will go back to his place, his heart saddened, saying the position is untenable; he will sell, as soon as he can, all that he owns; he will direct his steps towards the nearest railway station; but, on leaving, he will cast a last look at the piece of ground he toiled upon and where he should have been so much delighted to live with his family. But, alas! that happiness not being allowed him, he will go, with downcast eyes, like an outcast, banished from his country, to the nearest station and take the train that will soon take him to that American Republic, made up of every nation on earth, each speaking his own language, and which it is commonly agreed to call the United States Republic. After that one shall see editors inveighing, in long and numerous columns of their papers, against the emigration of Canadians to the United States, and at certain days in the year, on the St. Jean Baptiste day, for instance, one shall see young men just let loose from the lyceums, their imagination full of flowers of rhetoric, appear on the platform and deliver patriotic speeches, in which they recall the bril liant military achievements of our fathers and bitterly deplore the emigration of Canadians to the United States, of these poor compatriots who are often wrongfully charged with a want of patriotism when leaving their country. I am not in favor of the emigration of Canadians to the United States, but I think a great many of those who emigrate are just as patriotic men as those who remain in the country. One thing sure, Mr. Speaker, they have more patriotism than the railway contractors who do not pay their men. Each man appreciates patriotism in this world after his own ideas. Ask the soldier what a patriot is. He will proudly answer: It is he who gives his life in the defence of his country. Ask the farmer who is the greatest patriot. He will proudly answer:

where only one grew. Ask a laborer what a patriot is, and he will frankly tell you: It is he who has heart, courage and energy enough to earn the livelihood of his family, and if he does not find means of doing it in this country, his duty is to seek for it elsewhere. Of course, in doing this, he is actuated by patriotism, for should he remain in his country and cause his family to suffer he would not be a true patriot. Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more. It appears to me no lengthy arguments are required to show the necessity of passing a Bill to protect the poor laborer working on railways. The Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) has that object in view. If it is not found perfect, let it be amended; but I pray that it be passed, for the effect of this Bill, if it becomes law, will he to give every one his due, and so the devil will have none.

Mr. LEPINE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a Bill worthy of the consideration of this House, it is this very Bill brought up by the hon, member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) for the protection of laborers employed in the construction of railways. For several years past complaints were made by laborers employed on railways. A good many of them have lost part or the whole of their salary, and it is time this class should be protected by some such special legislation as this measure now submitted to our consideration. A few months ago the newspapers have been advocating the claims of many persons employed on railways under construction in the Eastern Townships, and on another railway under construction in the Baie des Chaleurs. Extensive strikes have occurred at these places, and they were caused and warranted by the conduct of contractors, who declined to pay the honest salary due to their laborers. By this Bill the Government will prevent the making of illegitimate profits out of the laborers employed on those works, and, as pointed out by the hon, member for Nicolet (Mr. Boisvert), who has vigorously advocated to-night the rights of the persons employed on railways, this Bill, if passed by Parliament, as I have no doubt it will be, will greatly benefit the laboring classes. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but I hope that this Bill, which no doubt will be referred to the Committee on Railways, in order that it may be more thoroughly considered, shall soon be brought back with the suggestion that the House should pass it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) is entitled to credit from the workingmen of the country for bringing in a Bill of this kind. It is a fact that cannot be denied, that from time to time we have instances of hardship, instances of poverty, that are the result of ill-considered contracts, or of dishonesty on the part of contractors. In every part of the country, and at all times in the history of the country, we have brought to our notice large numbers of laborers who have faithfully discharged their duty to contractors and sub-contractors, who have worked hard for the money that was needed to support themselves and their dependent families, and yet after that labor has been performed, after their time has been wasted, after many of them have gone into debt for necessaries to support themselves in the meantime, they wake up to realise that an unprincipled contractor has cleared out and left them without their well-earned money. This being the case, they have little or no redress. A private individual, a laboring man, who has got to contend with a railway corporation, has little or no redress. is unable to collect his wages; he may sue for them, and perhaps he finds that he has not the power to carry on the suit against the contractor, or he may find other disabilities which prevent him from collecting that which he has lawfully earned. Now, a Bill of this kind, if it could be crystallised into law—while I confess that I think this falls short of the object aimed at-still, I say, if a Bill of this nature could be crystallised into law it would be a warning to railway corporations, and would compel them to take the trouble to ascertain the financial standing of contractors, their honesty, and their means of carrying out the contract before they would allow them to enter into such contracts. Unfortunately, as it is to-day, it is a matter of little concern to railway corporations or to big contractors when they sub-let contracts, whether the sub-contractors are able to do the work; the result is, that we find that Governments are applied to—as this Government has been, not only during the present Session, but during many previous Sessions-to furnish money to pay these men who have done the work for which the public are receiving a benefit afterwards, and for which the contractors have failed to pay them. We had such an instance in the building of the North-West Central Railway, or of the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway. Year after year that stood, until only a short time ago the labor that was expended in the completion of these contracts was paid for at something like 50 cents on the dollar; but it was paid at a time when these poor unfortunate men who did the work realised very little for it, because they were in such a state of hardship that many of them were compelled to sell their claims, believing that these claims would never be realised upon, and many were compelled to sell their claims for 25 cents on the dollar. When the claims were paid it was others who profited by their labor and not them-selves; they received scarcely 25 cents on the dollar. In this case I regret to say the original company was more at fault than the contractors; but no matter who was in fault, at any rate the poor laborer who did the heavy part of the work received little or nothing in return for his labor. Now, I say that, if this Bill becomes law, it would be a standing advertisement to the world, that men would not be allowed to make a contract with a company without proving first, to the satisfaction of the company, or the first contractor, that they had some financial standing in the country, or something to back them up, which would enable them to complete their contract. It may be said by some that if this Bill becomes law it will prevent railway corporations from carrying on their operations as successfully as they otherwise would do, because the percentage held back by the company will be so great that it will require all the financial skill and manœuvring that a sub-contractor can do to enable him to complete his contract with the limited means at his disposal. But I think it would rather result in the making of better arrangements between the companies and sub-contractors; they would not only make provisions for the work being carried on—because it would be in their interest that it should be done—but they would also make provisions for ascertaining from time to time how much, if any, remained behind unpaid, how many of these poor unfortunate laborers were lying out of their money. These are the poorer classes of the community, they are the least able to bear the loss of their wages, and they are the least able to fight for them when they are cheated out of them; therefore, I say this Bill is a very important one. Now, the first clause says:

"Any railway company now or hereafter incorporated under the authority of any Act of the Parliament of Canada may stipulate and provide in any contract." I think there ought to be a change in the phrase-ology, and that the word "may" should be "shall stipulate and provide;" because it leaves it optional; they may do it, or can do it, whereas I believe the aim of the hon. member is to make a law by which they are compelled to do it. I have no doubt that when this Bill comes before the Committee on Railways and Canals, where each clause is considered separately, the wisdom of that Committee, provided they see fit to pass this Bill, will so modify it as to make it compulsory on railway companies and on the first contractor to make such a provision. I can only say that the object of the Bill is a good one; it aims at remedying an evil that has been felt from time to time in this country; it aims at giving the poor laborer what he is richly entitled to, after he has worked hard for days, it may be, in the sun, or it may be when the inclemency of the weather is such that it is scarcely fit for a man to be out, and when he has faithfully discharged his duty, laboring from eight hours a day to ten, twelve and perhaps sixteen hours a day, and still he may receive no reward for that labor unless we have some such a Bill as this to compel the contractor to consider his case and make proper provisions with the sub-contractor for his payment, otherwise some unprincipled, dishonest man may avail himself of the laxity of the law and clear out of the country and leave these poor men without paying for their labor. As I said before, I think the hon. member is entitled to credit for bringing in this He knows the need of it himself by experience as a contractor, and while saying so I must admit, from all the information I have been able to get on this subject, that he is entitled to credit for another thing also; that he has shown a disposition during his whole life to look after the interests of the laboring men, and, as I am told, in some instances he has even paid the second time laborers who have been deprived of their money by sub-contractors, to whom he had let contracts. Now, I say it comes with good grace from that hon, gentleman, because he has been a railway contractor for years, and he knows the evils that have grown up, he knows the injustices that have been perpetrated, times without number, against poor laborers. Therefore, he feels himself that it is his duty, as a member of this Parliament, to introduce a Bill which many would say would be against his own interests as a large contractor, but which will protect the poor laborers of the country. I trust that this Parliament will see fit to pass the Bill, at least in some shape, so that it may accomplish the object the hon. gentleman has in view, and while doing that I think it may also be framed so as not, in any way, to retard the Mr. SPROULE.

progress of public works in this country, because it is important that contractors should have every facility for carrying them on.

Mr. BERGIN. I desire to add a word to what has fallen from hon. gentlemen who have pre-ceded me in support of this Bill. There can be no doubt that very great suffering and great hardship have been caused, and very great wrong has been practiced upon poor laboring men in the past, and will be in the future, unless prevented by legisla-tion such as this. It has come to my notice frequently during years past that sub-contractors have failed to pay the wages of the laborers employed by them upon railways and other public It is not always the fault of the contractor, but very often it is. I mention this especially because the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sproule) has said that it was in the interest of the contractor always to see the work properly done by the sub-contractor, and the payments to the laborers promptly made. Now, we know that, so far from this being the case, frequently contractors employ sub-contractors without sufficient capital to carry on the contracts; indeed, they go so far as to induce men to take sub-contracts at a price less than that for which they can fairly do the work. As a consequence, after several weeks they find they are unable to pay their laborers; the men are obliged to cease work, and the damage is not confined entirely to the laborers, but it is pretty widely spread in the neighborhood where the work is being carried on. The sub-contractors obtain credit from the boarding house keepers, and from the merchants who furnish them with supplies. The boarding house keepers get in debt to the merchants, as do the sub-contractors, and the sub-contractor in a little while is obliged to cease work; he clears out; he leaves his laborers unpaid. The merchants who trusted the laborers and who trusted the sub-contractor lose their debts also, and the contractor induces some other foolish man to take the place of the sub-contractor who has gone away. My hon, friend who has introduced this Bill can give many instances of this kind, where three or four sub-contractors in succession have failed, owing to the false representations made to them by the contractor, and three, or four, or five sets of laborers have lost their wages. I think that this Bill would do away with that evil, that it would amply protect the laborers; at all events, as amended, as I am sure it will be in the sense implied by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), it will make it imperative upon contractors who sub-let any portion of their works to see that their laborers are paid; and if they are not paid the Government will have it in its power to deduct from the sums payable to them by the Government the amount necessary to pay the wages of the laborers. So great has been the loss to the laboring community through the sub-letting of portions of railways and other public works to men without sufficient capital to carry on their subcontracts that the attention of the great labor organisations has been called to it, and numerous petitions have been presented to this House asking Parliament to pass the Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) into law. There can be no question, I think, from all we have heard in connection with this Bill, that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) deserves the gratitude of the laboring community of this country. No one has moved in this matter before, or, at all events, has so earnestly pushed it as has the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell); and when we find that the great labor organisations have called upon us to adopt his Bill, we are in duty bound to pay attention to those representations, because, as the hon. Minister of Justice said the other night, in speaking of another matter recommended to this House by the labor organisations, we should take it, to a certain extent, for granted that they have fuller information on these matters, and must know more about them than we do who are not engaged in matters of this kind. We know, too, that the sub-contractors not only impose upon laborers and deprive them of their earnings, but they do mischief all round. When a man is employed as a contractor on a Government railway, the people in the neighborhood naturally think he is representing the Government. They think any contract entered into with the sub-contractor will be ratified by the Government; they look upon him as part and parcel of the Public Works or Railway Department, and they are certain, when they deliver the property, they will be paid by the Railway Department or Public Works Department. They little know that these people are merely tools in the hands of an astute contractor; and I could, if necessary, point to more than one case where the community in the neighborhood have been fleeced by such unscrupulous and incompetent men. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House longer, because it must be patent to every hon. member that, as our attention has been called to a great evil, it is our duty to remedy it. There is no portion of the community less able to enforce a claim against the dishonest sub-contractor than are the laborers; in fact, the sub-contractors leave them in a position that they are unable to prosecute any claim against them, and to pay the fees in the division court necessary to be paid before they can enter suit against them, but they even leave the poor laborers and their families without bread. It is a crying evil, and it is one which should be terminated if possible, and I feel quite convinced that this Bill, after it has been considered by the Committee on Railways and Canals, will be so framed that the laborers of the country may feel assured in future that when they are employed on Government railways or public works their wages will be secured, and that they need not fear being robbed by any dishonest sub-contractor.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell), who has brought forward this measure, has on several occasions requested me to read his Bill and consider it. The question is one with which he, as a public contractor—having carried out some of the most important works in the Dominion—is thoroughly acquainted, at all events in so far as the great hardships to which men are exposed who may have the misfortune to fall into the hands of persons who are unscrupulous and anxious to defraud; and he also knows how difficult it is, under existing circumstances, for poor men to enforce their rights against persons who are evilly disposed. The hon the First Minister has suggested that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and that reference, of course, will enable that Committee to take cognisance of the various provisions of the Bill, and consider exactly how far those provisions come within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The great object of the Bill is, of course, to afford ample protection to the laborer who has earned his money by hard work upon the public enterprises of the country. But we must be very careful not to over-step the marks that are traced for us with respect to our powers, and while some of the provisions of this Bill may possibly come within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, especially if the Government themselves were undertaking the construction of a public work, then it might make certain provisions in its contract that those who had charge of men or received contracts from the Government should be forced to carry out certain terms of payment with respect to those employed. Still it is difficult for me, at all events, to see how we could intervene in most cases without usurping the powers now in the hands of the Local Legislatures of the various Provinces of the Dominion. These questions will naturally present themselves to hon. members who are well versed in such matters on the Railway Committee, and I will, therefore, merely say that I congratulate the hon, gentleman on having brought this matter to the notice of Parliament; and as regards the provisions of the Bill with which we cannot ourselves deal, they being ultra vires, the matter will have been brought to the notice of those who have that power, and the hon. gentleman will have had the satisfaction of having made known the state of things which exists, so that those who are competent to apply the remedy will, no doubt, discharge their duty at the proper time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand it to be the wish of the House that this Bill be read the second time and go to the Committee on Railways. I will not oppose the motion, and I could hardly do so when the leader of the House has requested that that course should be followed. But I hope the hon. gentleman and those in favor of the Bill will not understand us all as committing ourselves at all to the principle of the Bill in so assenting. So far as I am able to judge there is nothing in it which we have power to pass, except the title and possibly the preamble; but I have no objection to the Bill going to the Committee, so that it may be thoroughly examined for the purpose of ascertaining whether any provisions of like character can be enacted within the powers of this Parliament.

Mr. BRIEN. The hon member for Glengarry is a large contractor, and on that ground alone, I am in favor of the Bill. The hon gentleman deserves the thanks of the laboring men of this country for having brought it before the House, for if there is any class that is unable to protect itself it is the laboring class. If this Bill should become law, it would do justice to those who otherwise would not receive justice. I heartily support the Bill, and I hope it will go before the Railway Committee.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE. The Bill is more important than it would, perhaps, seem to be at first sight. We have through the Doninion several railways being constructed, and we know that in my own Province, as well as in other Provinces, we have had a great deal of trouble on account of some of the railway contractors and sub-contractors not paying their laborers. In a great many instances—in almost in every case I may say-some contracts have been let to irresponsible sub-contractors, and the poor laborers after working for weeks, and for several months in many cases, have not been paid for their labor. This, as has been said by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin), is from the fact that the people who were working for railway companies, are under the belief that the Government is responsible for their wages, and that, therefore, they go on working for weeks and weeks without being paid, because they believe the payment is sure to come. Unfortunately their mistake has led them to trust these sub-contractors, who have taken contracts at a much lower price than they ought to, and who are unable to pay the poor laborers. I hope this measure will be well examined by the Railway Committee, and that such legislation as is required under the circumstances, will be adopted in order to relieve, in future, the poorer classes from the recurrence of the losses they have sustained in the past. I believe, that some means can be adopted whereby these laborers can be protected as well as men working on ordinary buildings, because we have the lien law to protect the mechanics who work on, as well as those who supply building material for ordinary buildings. I do not see why we should not have also a provision in the Railway Act, whereby those who earn their wages by hard toil, should also be protected. I hope that when this Bill is brought before the Railway Committee, legislation will be adopted to protect these poor workingmen. In itself, the Bill may not appear to be very important, but when we consider the consequences of what has taken place, the measure is much more important than it may appear. The losses may be small, but they are numerous, and the whole taken together, amount to a large sum which falls directly on the class of the community least able to sustain these losses. Men in ordinary business in life may sometimes lose very large amounts without affecting their position; but poor people, who depend upon their wages to maintain themselves and their families, cannot afford to lose even a small amount. As we are here to legislate to protect all classes of the community, the rich as well as the poor, and the poor as well as the rich, I believe we ought to adopt such means that, in every case, these poor people who give their labor should be protected against unscrupulous contractors, or against contractors who make mistakes in tendering for contracts at too low a figure.

Mr. DENISON. The class which it is proposed to legislate in favor of, by this Bill, are a class of the community who can least afford to sustain a loss. They are the lowest paid, I suppose, of all the working classes. The Bill refers mostly to the class known as navvies, who work on the railways, and that being the case, it is the duty of this House to protect them, and to see that they obtain their hard-earned wages. As we know, it very often occurs that the men employed on railroad construction are foreigners, and not understanding our language, they may be induced to delay collecting their wages, and may be imposed upon through their ignorance of our tongue. On that account, I believe, legislation should step in to in-Mr. LARIVIÈRE.

the sense of their being ignorant of the usages, laws and often language of the country. Recently, in Toronto, a move has been made, something in the same line as this Bill, by the corporation passing an ordinance of the council that no wages less than a certain sum per hour should be paid to men working on the sewers, and I think the block pave-ments of the city as well. By this means the corporation are enabled to see that the workingmen shall be paid a fair wage, and that they get it. I fancy that if a law of that sort is good in Toronto, in connection with contractors for city work, it also ought apply with equal force to men employed as navvies on railways. I see no reason why legis-lation should not be adopted on the lines of this Bill, and I believe we should pass a law which should protect the navvies and at the same time compel the railway companies to see that justice is done to the men who really build the line. I know many cases where men have lost their whole pay, or a large portion of their pay through the sub-contractors failing, and for this reason I think we should protect the workmen. I heartily endorse the principle of this Bill.

General LAURIE. It occurred to me at first sight that the provisions of this Bill apply more particularly to counties and localities in which public works are being carried on. But I believe, on second thoughts, that districts, at a distance from where these works are, are even more affected than the actual localities. A large number of workingmen leave their homes and go to the districts in which these works are being carried out, in the hope of obtaining regular em-But, if through dishonesty, or the failure of the contractors, the work is not carried on these men are thrown on their own resources. They have not their homes near the works; they cannot wait to obtain their wages through any process of law, even if they could obtain them by this means, and they must return whence they came, or seek work elsewhere. Without going into the details of the Bill, it seems most desirable that some money should be retained to pay these poor workingmen for the work they have actually done. I hope that some such Bill, as the one now before us, may become law.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am very glad, indeed, that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) has been kind enough to embody in this Bill the result of the long experience of forty years which he has had as a contractor. While I am anxious to see provision made for the due protection of the workingmen—and especially the workingmen belonging to the class mentioned by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), namely, the navvies—who require that protection perhaps more than any other laborer, yet, at the same time, I must say this is a Bill which must be entered upon and have its provisions viewed most carefully by the Committee on Railways and Canals. I find that section 3 of the Bill says:

"Every railway company, incorporated by Parliament and contracting as aforesaid, shall ascertain from time to time, by agent or otherwise, that all arrears due to laborers and workmen have been paid by their contractors, before making final payment to or settlement with them."

It occurs to me that under these provisions a railway sure that these people who are more or less ignorant company might stir up some innocent laborer to should be protected—the word "ignorant" I use in make a claim which might be well founded or might be unfounded, and the sub-contractor would be left in the position of being unable to get any money from the railway company to pay his workmen—however willing he might be to do so.

Mr. PURCELL. I intend to have that amended. It was a mistake to put that part in the Bill.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am very glad of that, because it would open the door to any amount of chicanery and cheating. I hope while the hon. gentleman is taking up the protection of the workingmen, that he will not forget also the poor working woman, who often supplies the workingman with the necessaries of life, and who occasionally happens to be left unpaid, and that he will not omit even the Chinese washerwoman. should like to see the provisions of the Bill extended to the fullest extent, so that not only the workingmen will be protected, but all connected with the contract. When the Bill goes before the Railway Committee, I hope it will be thoroughly investigated, and we shall have there the great experience of the hon. member for Glengarry to guide us. No Bill has come before the House which is more important in some of its ramifications than this, and no Bill requires to be more carefully guarded, because a Bill of this character, with proper restraints, may be of great benefit, and if allowed to extend beyond due limitations, it may do incalculable harm. I hope that whatever may be done with the Bill, the discussion will have this effect, that if we find it to be beyond our powers to deal with the question, so much attention will have been drawn to it that the Local Legislatures will take the matter under their wing, and accomplish the objects sought to be attained in this Bill.

Mr. WATSON. I have just a word to say before this Bill is passed. I am sure the House will almost unanimously agree to this Bill, and I hope the hon. Minister of Justice will give it such attention as to crystallise it into a law that will benefit the class for whom it is intended, the working class on railways. The case which has been mentioned came under my notice five or six years ago-the case of the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway. There were unpaid claims for labor on that road to the amount of $80,000, and the House practically admitted the principle of the Bill by inserting a clause for the incorporation of the North-West Central Railway Company, which took over the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway, providing that one of the first claims against that company should be the old claim of the workingmen on the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway. That claim of $80,000 was settled for, I believe, for $25,000, and I think I am safe in saying that not $10,000 of that amount went into the hands of the working people to whom it was due, because it was not paid for three or four years, and those people could not afford to wait, and sold their claims for what they could get. I think that case shows how important it is that such a Bill as this should be crystallised into working shape, and that the original contractor should be held responsible for the labor performed under sub-contractors.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. DICKEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 1175

rance Act. He said: I think it proper that I should explain to the House as shortly as possible the necessity that exists for this Bill. I would first draw the attention of the House to the original section of the Canada Temperance Act, which is the same as section 95 in the Act of the Revised Statutes, the part of which material to my argument reads as follows:

"When any petition has been adopted, the Governor in Council may by Order in Council, published in the Canada Gazette, declare that the second part of this Act shall be in force and take effect in such county or city upon, from and after the day on which the annual or semi-annual licenses will expire."

By an oversight, when the Act was originally passed-I believe those in charge of it having more in view the circumstances that existed in Ontario -the fact was overlooked that there are a large number of counties in Nova Scotia in which no licenses were in force at all. Therefore, after the Act was voted on in some ten or twelve counties, the question was raised whether or not this Act had come into force, because the Order in Council which purported to bring it into force followed in all cases the terms of the Act, saying that it should come into force after the day of the expiré of the annual or the semi-annual licenses. That point was decided against the counties by some of the courts, and the result was that an appeal was made to this Parliament in 1884, when chapter 31 was passed to remedy that difficulty. The first section of that Act provided for future cases of counties which had no licenses in force, and the second section was retroactive, declaring:

second section was retroactive, declaring:—

"If any Order in Council has been published in the Canada Gazette declaring that the second part of the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, shall be in force and take effect in any county or city upon, from, and after the day on which the annual or semi-annual licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors then in force in such county or city will expire; and if in fact there were, at the date of such publication, no such licenses then in force in such county or city, then the second part of the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, shall be deemed to have been in force and taken effect in such county or city at the expiration of thirty days from the date of such Order in Council,"

That had the retroactive effect of bringing into effect in these counties in Nova Scotia the prohibitory clauses of the Canada Temperance Act. That in the year 1884 made matters perfectly satisfactory, and brought the law into operation, as it had been asked by the majority of peeple in those counties. In the consolidation of the statutes, by the repealing schedule, this statute of 1884, 47 Vic., chapter 31, to amend the Canada Temperance Act, was repealed. It was not observed in time by any body interested in the matter that this Act had been repealed, but as time went on the point was raised—I think about a year ago—that the Act which brought the Canada Temperance Act into force in those counties had been repealed, and that the effect was to do away with the Act in those I do not think that argument will comcounties. mend itself as a sound one to any of the legal element in this House. I think that looking to the Consolidated Statutes and the Act of 1884, to which I have just referred, and looking particularly to the Interpretation Act contained in the Consolidated Statutes, which provides what shall be the effect of the repeal of any statute, it must be clear to any lawyer that the opinion I have referred to is a mistake. But we have to deal with matters as we find them, and a county court judge in 103) in further amendment of the Canada Tempe- | Nova Scotia thought the Act, owing to the repeal of the statute of 1884, is no longer in force in Nova Scotia. It will be seen at once that by an error in the work of the revisors of the statutes, an effect has been produced which never could have been contemplated by this House. The Canada Temperance Act was brought into force in ten or twelve counties in Nova Scotia by the deliberate and almost overwhelming voice of the people. There has been no intention on the part of Parliament ever to override that decision, and I do not think there will be any intention now to do anything in that direction; and the Act I propose is the following:—

For the removal of doubts as to the application of the Act hereinafter mentioned in certain counties and cities in Canada: Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Notwithstanding the repeal of section 2 of the Act 47 Vic., chapter 31, it is hereby declared that the second part of the Canada Temperance Act was and still is in force in any county or city to which such section applies, and shall remain in force in such county and city as if no repeal had taken place.

The Bill proposes simply to put those counties where they would be if this repeal had not taken place. As that repeal was not intended by the House to work any such effect as it has been made to work in the opinion of one judge, I feel I cannot look for any serious objection in any quarter to the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not intend to oppose the second reading. I have been unable to comprehend by what process of reasoning the county court judge arrived at the conclusion he did. It is an extraordinary decision; however the hon. gentleman is dealing with facts as he finds them. No doubt if the case be appealed to a higher court, that court will take a different view. I would suggest that the proviso in the Act of 1884 be renewed in this Bill, namely, that existing rights be reserved and not prejudiced by the passing of this declaratory law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The only hesitation I feel in supporting the Bill is that I think the law so perfectly clear that there is no cause for the least doubt. As to the decision which the hon. gentleman has referred, I find it impossible to have any respect whatever for it. My hon. friend is mistaken in supposing that the Act of 1884 was repealed by error, and that its repeal was not noticed. Like all Acts which have served their noticed. purpose, and which were temporary in their character, it was properly repealed on the revision of the statutes. That Act performed its purpose in fixing the date when the Canada Temperance Act came into force, and nothing but an Act of Parliament could make it cease. But a judge has been found to actually take the view that an Act repealing errors and ambiguities provides of itself errors and ambiguities. I would oppose the passage of the Bill were it not that in four or five counties a great deal of confusion exists, one appeal having been taken and a suit standing for judgment, and in the meantime the Act being interfered with.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved that clause 2 be added to the Bill as follows:—

Nothing berein contained shall be construed so as to affect any suit, action, prosecution or proceeding, now pending.

Motion agreed to.
Mr. Dickey.

Bill, as amended, reported.

Mr. DICKEY moved third reading of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIS (P.E.I.) As my hon. friend from King's, Nova Scotia (Mr. Borden), takes an interest in this measure, and as he is unable to be present to-night in consequence of sickness, I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow the third reading to stand until to-morrow.

Mr. DICKEY. This will, probably, be the last day on which I will have an opportunity of proceeding with the Bill, and, probably, any proposals the hon. gentleman may have to make may be made in another place.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Very well.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Secretary of State has incorporated the provisions of Bill (No. 108) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act, in his general amendment to that Act. I, therefore, move that the Order be discharged.

Motion agreed to, Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE.

Mr. CHARLTON. Probably it is too late to proceed now with (Bill No. 110) to secure the better observance of the Lord's day, as it may create considerable discussion, and it might be better to proceed with the next Order, which I do not think will occupy much time.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BRIEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 114) in further amendment of the Revised Statutes, chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise. He said: I am very glad we have at last arrived at this Bill. I think no better argument can be adduced to show the necessity of the Bill than the measure which has been discussed to night on the proposition of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell). So far as we can gather from the utterances of those who introduced and supported the Electoral Franchise Act, it is based on the ground of giving representation to industry. If that be the view, I believe every industrious laboring man should have a vote. The Minister of Inland Revenue said, when the Bill was first introduced:

"This Bill widens the franchise so as to bring in the laboring classes. It brings in every industrious mechanic and every industrious laborer in the country."

Last year, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), in moving the Address, said:

"It confers the franchise on all citizens who are not confirmed paupers, upon every one who has a stake in the country."

If we examine the statistics as reported by the Ontario Bureau, we find that the average wages paid to farm laborers amount to $250, and many of them work for wages under that amount. I am sure that no one will declare that these men are tramps, or are not citizens who have an interest and a stake in the country. I think the House should favor this Bill. There is no party purpose to be gained by it. It is simply intended to do justice to this class. I do not wish it to be understood that I favor the principle of the original Bill, which I cannot find a parliamentary term to characterise by its right name, but, as we are compelled to accept it willingly or unwillingly, we should make it as workable as possible. have seen workingmen on the stand hour after hour trying to figure up cent by cent what they had received, with a view of getting the right to vote. The ordinary payment of laboring men in this country is not more than one dollar a day, and it is not possible for them to work more than 313 days in the year. I find that the average amount which they receive is only $250, and it is useless to pretend, in that case, that the application of this Bill gives the franchise to the laboring class. In comparing the Provincial franchise and the Dominion franchise in the constituency which I have the honor to represent, I find there is a difference altogether of about 200 voters who are disfranchised as between the $250 and $300 income. I do not care so much about the other clauses of the Bill as the first clause. The third clause is simply to substitute an advertisement in the paper instead of posting up these I speak from experience in this matter, and I think the Government will find that it will be much cheaper to advertise in the newspapers the time of the meeting of the court, instead of posting it up. I know that lists that have been posted up have been torn down, either by some one who wanted to appropriate the list for himself, or through mischief. I do not deem it necessary for me to say any more in regard to this Bill, considering the full discussion it has had, along with the franchise question in general, and I hope the Government will allow the Bill to become law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman must see that it is quite impossible for this Bill to get through this Session. It alters, in fact, the elective franchise as it is now constituted, and it opens the door for a discussion which would, perhaps, last a week. I think my hon. friend must be satisfied in having introduced this Bill, and having called the attention of the House to it, and through the House, the attention of the country. Therefore, in order not to waste the time of the House, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). This is certainly a very summary way of disposing of a very important measure. It may be the more convenient way to get rid of it; but, certainly, I think, there is a good deal in what has been stated by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Brien). I must say, further, that I think the First Minister can hardly claim that this Bill materially alters the franchise. All it does is to place many of the honest laboring farm hands in a position that they may be entitled to record their votes for a representative to the House of Commons, as well as for a representative for the Local Legislature. Now, if the First Minister will consent to allow this clause to be added to the Government Bill, to attach it to the Bill of the Secretary of State, I will not take up a minute more of the time of the House on this Bill. All I desire is that the measure shall become law, so that the laborers may be placed in the same position for the House of Commons as they are for the Local Legislature.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a very simple matter to dispose of the principle of this Bill by either admitting it or denying it. It is a simple proposition to lower the franchise from $300 to $250 earned per annum. My own experience in Ontario is that the limit of $300 excludes a large proportion of the rural farm laborers. It is somewhat above the usual scale of wages paid to the workingmen, and I think the proposition of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Brien) is well worthy the consideration of the Secretary of State, and that it will place the franchise on a more just basis than it is at present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman does not see that although it is made to assimilate the vote to the Province of Ontario, that is not the only Province; it does not assimilate it to the other Provinces. The hon. gentleman looks at it in regard to his own Province.

Mr. BRIEN. There is another feature that strikes me, and that is the reduction of value. An income of $250 now is really worth as much as an income of $300 was when the Franchise Act was passed. It does not appear to me that the Bill would require to change the basis of the franchise. If the Prime Minister will promise us that he will let it go through next Session, we will not push it any further.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will consider it next Session.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 22nd April, 1890.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received a communication notifying him that a vacancy had occurred in the representation of the Electoral District of Kent, N.B., by the acceptance by the sitting member, Pierre Armand Landry, of an office of emolument under the Crown. He also informed the House that he had issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a writ of election for said electoral district.

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, What steps were taken by the Government to secure the payment of laborers and others having claims against the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway, out of the subsidies voted by Parliament in aid of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway? Is it true that Charles Magee, of Ottawa, was appointed to examine and report upon the claims in question? If so, upon whose recommendation was he appointed? Did he receive one thousand dollars for his services in that connection? If not, how much did he receive, and was his remuneration paid out of the subsidies voted for the railway?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the subsidy was granted it was with the understanding that the wages of the men, &c., then owing by the company, should be paid before any payment of the subsidy was made, and that any expenses in connection with ensuring having this done should be borne by the company out of the subsidy to carry on this undertaking. A commissioner was appointed to undertake this service. Mr. Charles Magee, of Ottawa, was appointed by the company to examine and to pay the just claims, reporting progress. His appointment was approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals of that day. He did receive $1,000 for his remuneration from the company, which was, I believe, paid out of the subsidy.

CARAQUET RAILWAY.

Mr. ELLIS asked, Whether the Government has been asked to take over the Caraquet Railway, or to give that railway further financial aid? If so, has any determination been reached in the matter, and what is the nature of that determination?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. F. S. A. Hanbury Tracey, George B. Crow, trustees for the bondholders of the Caraquet Railway; General Alex. Fraser, Hon. A. Cadogan and George Brook Mee, English directors named in the prospectus, by letter dated 26th November, 1889, offered to transfer to the Dominion Government the Caraquet Railway, taking the bonds at the price of issue thereof. No further action appears to have been taken, except that I caused the offer to be referred to the Committee of the Privy Council.

OFFICIAL DEBATES-ACCOMMODATION.

I desire to draw the attention Mr. BARRON. of the Minister of Public Works to the insufficiency of the Hansard room for the purposes of the reporters. I had occasion quite recently to do some private work in that room, and I then ascertained that the accommodation was such as should not be permitted to continue by the Minister of Public Works. We must all admit the great usefulness of those gentlemen, and I think it is the duty of the House to give them every possible accommodation. I ascertained that there are regularly no fewer than eighteen souls in that room from the opening of the House until its close, at all hours of the night and morning. The heat is something intolerable, and the atmosphere is most impure. I found, on enquiry, that the only means of ventilating the room is through an open window, and the moment that window is opened a draft sweeps through the room, which is most dangerous to the health of these gentlemen. I am told there is a room immediately to the west which might possibly be taken, but by taking it the rights of some other official of the House might be curtailed. Something, however, certainly should be done on behalf of those gentlemen, for, according to my personal observation and experience, after being a few hours in the room the other day, I am satisfied the present accommodation is most dan- | Ways and Means. gerous to the lives of the official reporters. It is a great misfortune that the official reporters have been allowed to remain so long in that room, cooped up in the way they are, and I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works, before we meet next Session, will take some means to provide those gentlemen with proper accommodation.
